We have had a lot of debate in recent days about the unemployment insurance changes. The economic statement stated that people who quit their jobs without just cause will not be able to receive UI benefits and that these changes to the unemployment insurance program are going to save the government $2.4 billion. Besides being a morally bankrupt policy it is also wrong-headed. There are other ways for the government to save some money. It could have made some changes to unemployment insurance to look after the problems which the Prime Minister raised yesterday concerning people who do take advantage of the system. The bulk of people who are going to be negatively affected by these unemployment insurance changes grieve what the government is about to do. It makes our situation in this country worse.

I have heard from many constituents in my riding of Northumberland who have spoken about this. I have spoken to people who work on commission, people who sell life insurance policies. Many of these people in recent times have found themselves newly employed by insurance companies selling insurance policies and they are paid a commission based on their sales. The companies set specific targets for them. Many of these people were recently unemployed and this is a new form of employment for them. They are learning the ropes. If their companies find that they cannot reach the target, which is very difficult to achieve in recessionary times, then they lose their jobs. These people would not be eligible for unemployment insurance benefits. People who have never before in their whole lives had to take advantage of unemployment insurance benefits find themselves ineligible.

As I said, there are things that the government could be doing in the area of unemployment insurance to improve the situation in this country. However the government will not do them and many people have lost confidence in this government. They are convinced that the government is wasteful. I want to quote from a letter from one of my constituents which I received recently. It points out the source of this lack of confidence in the government and the policies it takes. This constituent has recently become unemployed and states that she was taking university courses part time to upgrade her education so that she could get a better job and would no longer be required to ask for unemployment insurance. She told the unemployment insurance person who was looking after her that she was taking courses on a part time basis, and that to make up for the part-time courses she was taking she was willing to work in the evenings and on weekends. Because her courses cut into her daytime work it was not allowed. Therefore, she was cut off unemployment insurance. She was penalized for being honest with these people.

She says: "First of all, honesty does not pay and second, UIC discriminates against those they will not assist". Then she goes on to talk about her husband who was laid off from his job but was offered employment in northwestern Ontario. He went to the employment office to see if it could provide funds to assist him to get to his job.

He was told that normally there would be assistance but the fund was empty and he would not get anything. If he had gone on UIC benefits for five or six months there were funds for that but no funds to help him travel to a job in northwestern Ontario. However, he was able to borrow funds to travel to this job and work, even though it meant splitting up the family for months at a time. For the Canadian government it means there is one less person collecting UIC benefits. She went on to ask: "Does the system help those who are really willing to work? It appears not". That is just one example.

I get many letters from constituents who have good ideas about how systems can be more helpful, how the government can reduce waste. I believe, as my colleague said in relation to the GST, that this government must do a lot more consulting before it slashes and cuts any more.

I have a lot of concerns about the fact that this government does not do the proactive things to help increase wealth in this country. We have not seen the promised adjustment programs we require. There is some training but each time the government announces training the money is coming out of unemployment insurance funds. After the government's unemployment insurance bill of a few years ago it no longer contributes to the fund. It takes training funds out of the funds that are contributed only by employers and employees.

We need more training. We need more research and development. We need more assistance to adjust in this country. We need to have this government working together with provincial and municipal levels of government, with management and labour, to find new solutions and new wealth creation opportunities.

I cannot close my comments on this bill today without mentioning the unconscionable cut to international development assistance. This government has cut over $4 billion in international development assistance since 1988. Our Prime Minister went to Rio, spoke there of how important it is that the north help the south, how important it is for their well-being. He also acknowledges that it has a lot to do with our well-being. Yet he consistently and repeatedly cuts our government's support to underdeveloped and Third World nations. We cannot for the health of our planet continue with these constant cuts.

There are many people in this country who are suffering today from the cuts of this government. We urge the government to reconsider its position, to be more proactive and to come to this House with proposals. Consultation has already taken place and we really do not need more on many issues. We have done a lot. The government has the information it requires. We have made many suggestions and put forward ideas in the House in debate for years now. We urge the government to act on some of those recommendations and bring about programs that will produce wealth in this country, help improve the economy and get people back to work. We cannot urge the government strongly enough to change its approach in governing this country.

Mr. Speaker: It being two o'clock p.m., the House will now proceed to statements by members.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

VETERANS AFFAIRS

Mr. George Proud (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, last week I called on the Minister of Veterans Affairs to give a clear and unequivocal commitment regarding the future of her department and its employees, as well as veterans who are served by this department'.

At that time and again today in Charlottetown the minister made a statement assuring the employees and the veterans there would be no program cuts and there would be no staff cuts to the department. I believe this is encouraging news for Charlottetown, for Hillsborough, for Prince Edward Island and for Canada.

With that in mind I have to ask the minister to do one more thing. In light of the fact that a directive from a Privy Council official indicated a further cut of 10 per cent could be expected in all departments, the government House leader, upon being confronted with this, would not deny that there would be cuts to programs and staff.

Therefore I ask the minister if she will come into the House and make a clear and unequivocal statement in support of Canada's veterans and the employees of the Department of Veterans Affairs who serve them so well.

NATIONAL BURNS AWARENESS WEEK

Mr. Ken James (Sarnia—Lambton): Mr. Speaker, I take this opportunity to urge all members of the House and indeed all Canadians to recognize and lend their support to National Burns Awareness Week from February 7 to 13, 1993.

Burn injuries are a leading cause of accidental death in Canada with children, the elderly and disabled Canadians being at the highest risk. Most burn injuries and deaths can be prevented by increased public awareness and education. Burn prevention through education means greater use of smoke detectors, increased home escape planning, teaching children not to try to hide from fire, and training and techniques such as stop, drop and roll'.

Prevention through education will result in many lives being saved and great reductions in suffering.

Finally, I wish to thank the members of the Shrine of North America, including the Canadian chairman, Mr. Don Burnard of Sarnia, Ontario, as well as all fire-fighters across Canada, for their hard work and dedication and for supporting and promoting National Burns Awareness Week.

NATIONAIR

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, in this House on February 3 the Prime Minister in response to questions with regard to a plant in Atlantic Canada locking its doors and moving out in the middle of the night made some disparaging comments about that company and the kind of corporate mentality that existed there.

I want to draw to the attention of the Prime Minister another company in Canada that deserves the same kind of commentary from the Prime Minister. I am speaking of Nationair.

Nationair locked out its workers in November 1991 and has refused during that whole period to bargain fairly and faithfully with the workers. It has gone so far as to reject the mediator's recommendations time and time again even though the workers at Nationair are getting less than one-half of what their colleagues at Air Canada or Canadian are getting. At the same time Nationair thumbed its nose at the Minister of Transport who requested the aviation industry in this country to reduce its capacity. Nationair responded by cutting into the already in jeopardy bottom line of Air Canada and Canadian. Six hundred passengers a day were siphoned off Air Canada alone.

On the other hand the government by itself is involved because it has an ongoing contract with Nationair to transport military personnel from Canada to overseas. It has just entered into a contract to supply hangar services to a Nationair subsidiary. Finally, it has seconded a person from Transport Canada to work for the company.

I think it is time the Prime Minister took charge of this file and did something about Nationair.

MEMBER FOR SKEENA

Mr. Jean-Marc Robitaille (Terrebonne): Mr. Speaker, in a recent letter to his constituents, or rather in his householder paid for with taxpayers' money, the NDP member for Skeena said: "The bad news is that the choice will be between the Liberals led by a Quebec leader and the Conservatives also led by a Quebec leader".

How can the New Democratic Party endorse such remarks and how can the member for Chambly remain silent in the face of these remarks by his colleague from Skeena?

The member for Skeena has made clearly unacceptable remarks. Quebec is one of the cultural and social treasures of this country, but the New Democratic Party does not seem to recognize that fact.

We do have a Prime Minister who hails from Quebec—and we are proud of that—and is working hard for the well-being of all Canadians.

The hon. member for Skeena should make a public retraction.

BLACK HISTORY MONTH

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, as North America celebrates Black History Month this February it is a special time not just for the black community but for all North Americans.

As a Montrealer I am proud that the celebrations started here, highlighting the black community's notable contributions to Montreal life and to the wonderful tapestry of Canada's diversity.

Who among us would not benefit from understanding the role of black Canadians in every facet of Canadian life in science, music, dance, business, labour and athletics through events such as seminars on Olivier Lejeune, a Métis interpreter and the first known black to have been brought to New France in 1628.

It is important too that children are being involved through writing contests for this special month to help everyone understand the multicultural nature of Canada.

Given the strife and racial conflict today, we hope Black History Month fosters through knowledge mutual respect regardless of race, religion, gender or language.

What better foundations are there than awareness and understanding to build the sturdy bridges that will bond the diversity within our society and help eradicate systemic discrimination for a tomorrow of fairness and equality for all.

I ask for unanimous consent of the House to table the Op-Ed page of today's Citizen which highlights "Some facts about black history in Canada" and that this text be appended to today's Hansard as a wonderful learning tool for everyone.

DRUG STRATEGY

Mr. John Reimer (Kitchener): Mr. Speaker, over the past two decades education has played a crucial role in reducing tobacco use and impaired driving.

Much of the success was due to concerted efforts by government, the media, police forces and our schools. Today, in order to combat the serious harm of drug use and trafficking such as death by overdose or even murder, violence, lawlessness like break and enter and prostitution and the economic costs for society, a similar thrust has been initiated through Canada's drug strategy.

Canada's drug strategy works in part with law enforcement and the courts to battle the drug trade. It is through education that demand for drugs will be reduced. With no demand dealers will go broke.

Canada's drug strategy is everyone's concern and everyone's business. All Canadians from parents and teachers to community workers and police working together are needed to make this strategy work.

I urge the government to increase its efforts and heighten Canada's awareness to eliminate the scourge of drugs.

THE ECONOMY

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, today our Liberal leader has outlined the Liberal Party's approach to economic growth in the 1990s. Here are some of the highlights.

A Liberal government will shift the focus from a shrinking economy to a growing economy. This means jobs with a future and industries with a future. A Liberal government will focus on fiscal responsibility and call for unwavering discipline in expenditure control.

A Liberal government will take a balanced approach to inflation and growth. A Liberal government will promote federal-provincial fiscal co-operation. The Tory or Conservative practice of off-loading the federal debt to the provinces can no longer continue. Debt is debt to all Canadians.

A Liberal government will focus on making Canada's work force second to none. A Liberal government will challenge Canada's major banks to give small business a break. We will develop concrete measures to facilitate the growth of our economy.

We congratulate our leader on a program which will put Canadians first.

GREAT WHALE RIVER PROJECT

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I am extremely surprised and profoundly disappointed by the remarks the NDP member for Skeena made in a video shown to the energy and environment committee of the New Hampshire Senate. In this video the NDP member urged Americans not to buy electricity produced in Quebec, electricity coming from James Bay Phase II installations because:

[English]

"There is blood on that electricity".

[Translation]

Not only does the NDP member for Skeena make assumptions about the outcome of the ongoing environmental assessment of the Great Whale River project but he is joining in the chorus of people who are systematically defaming the evaluation process used in Canada and in Quebec, while everyone agrees that the guidelines applied by the commission on the Great Whale River project are the most thorough and rigorous ever seen not only in Quebec but in the United States as well. Even the International Water Tribunal has recognized the value and reliability of the evaluation process used for the Great Whale River project.

I formally request that the NDP member for Skeena withdraw his remarks on the Quebec workers involved in the Great Whale River project and that steps be taken to ensure that the video in question not be shown again in the United States, or elsewhere for that matter.

FREE TRADE

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, Conservative members attending the NAFTA committee hearings were outraged that Bob White dared bring to committee 20 unemployed Canadians representing the evidence of Tory economic policies, including the free trade agreement.

Extra security was mobilized to control the threat. One Tory insisted on knowing who paid their way and then tried to recruit them to the new neighbourhood snitch program of the new PC KGB to capture UI cheaters.

Not a single Tory asked Lorraine Wilkinson of Windsor how after 24 years at Champion Sparkplug it felt to see her job and her husband's job at Kelsey-Hayes move to the United States. Not one Tory considered that any of the concerns of the 20 unemployed or the thousands represented by the CLC were worth even slowing down the corporate agenda for gaining cheap labour in Mexico through the NAFTA at the expense of workers in Canada.

The workers were unanimous: NAFTA has to go. The FTA has to go. And the Tories will go.

CANADA POST

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I want to applaud Canada Post for its announcement on Monday of a new customer service call centre to be established in Fredericton to consolidate its telephone inquiry operations for eastern Canada as a means of improving and expanding postal services to customers.

This will be one of three locations serving all of Canada in these respects and will open in the spring of 1993.

This will be a new state of the art telecommunications centre and is expected to employ over 100 people once all phases are in operation.

This development is an example of the way in which federal privatization policies are working to enhance public services on a competitive cost basis. It is an investment decision which demonstrates great confidence in New Brunswick and particularly in the people of the Fredericton—York—Sunbury community, and one which I hope that other major telemarketing companies will be emulating in coming months.

REFUGEES

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, the Conservatives have shown that they are not interested in listening to those who argue that Canada must change its refugee policy.

Perhaps ministers will listen to their former colleague, Miss Flora MacDonald, my predecessor as member of Parliament for Kingston and the Islands. Noting that the government spends about $300 million processing the 50,000 refugees who come here each year while donating only $20 million a year to help those trapped in refugee camps world-wide Miss MacDonald said in a recent interview that she is "appalled by this allocation of resources".

Canadians are also appalled by the government's apparent inability to help those in dire need. While we must assist those refugees who make it to our shores, often jumping the line, we ignore the millions more who are trapped in poverty and famine.

I urge the Minister of Finance to listen to the views expressed by his former cabinet colleague and provide adequate funding to those agencies who help refugees around the globe. We need more bang for the buck in our efforts to assist refugees.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

Mr. John A. MacDougall (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, Canadians again have been misled and manipulated by the CBC with its blatantly biased accounting of the activities surrounding the wolf hunt in the Yukon.

Anyone knowing the facts of the wolf and wildlife population in Yukon will agree with the decision made and the actions about to be taken by the Yukon government. Leader John Os-Ta-Shek is correct when he describes the planned wolf cull as responsible wildlife management.

Let us not allow green activists or pink CBC journalists to confuse the issue. If a cull of 150 wolves is not undertaken an entire region will be depopulated of caribou, moose, elk and sheep and that is a fact.

The CBC should be fostering understanding of this issue and educating those environmentalists who know little of the wilderness of Yukon.

With its coverage this week I do not know why it chose to highlight the activities of the American greens in Alaska and the potential for confrontation.

Cheap journalism that smacks of irresponsibility provides for no understanding of the natural habitat of this region.

Canadians deserve better of the CBC, better information for the viewership and better coverage for Yukoners who are attempting to deal with a very difficult problem.

JUDICIAL APPOINTMENTS

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg—St. James): Mr. Speaker, the most recent judicial appointment in Manitoba is causing great concern to Manitobans. It has sent off to the Court of Queen's Bench a prominent Conservative, a friend of the Prime Minister, a man out of legal harness for 15 years.

An appointment of this kind does nothing for the good name of the judicial selection committee in Manitoba.

Was the committee given its marching orders? We may never know.

This appointment sends a disturbing signal to the dozens of qualified men and women who are prepared to serve on the bench. Hard work and first-rate qualifications mean nothing if the powers that be play politics.

At last count only three of the 25 positions on the Court of Queen's Bench in Manitoba were filled by women. I am told that 14 women lawyers have applied for judicial positions. It is likely that all have been approved by the selection committee. However, they were ignored in favour of a pal of the Prime Minister, a man who apparently sees the bench as his penultimate resting place and was quoted as saying: "I am a tired kind of guy".

Manitoba deserves better.

THE LIBERAL PARTY

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, the leader of the Liberal Party has failed miserably in his attempts to come up with an alternative to the GST.

The Liberals got a lot of political mileage by initially opposing the goods and services tax, but the Liberals' alternative to the GST is deceptive, expensive and would hurt those most in need.

As reported in The Ottawa Citizen on February 2, 1993, the Liberal Party is considering a hidden sales tax to replace the highly visible GST. There are a number of problems with this option proposed by the Liberals. The major problem is that basic groceries would be taxed. This would hurt those Canadians most in need.

Also the Grit sneaky tax, or GST, would be hidden. Consumers would not know how much tax they were paying each time they made a purchase, thereby making it easier to raise that tax when required.

They are not going to tell us too much now about the GST, the Grit sneaky tax. They want to get elected first.

EMPLOYMENT

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister of employment.

The minister thinks he is the top cop of UIPD. He wants to set up a 1-800 ratfink line for anonymous accusers. The minister must know that the idea of anonymous accusers went out with the disappearance of the KGB.

Why is the government pursuing a deliberate policy of portraying unemployed Canadians as liars and cheats?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, there will be no 1-800 snitch line. The suggestion had been made by members and other people but the government is not of the view that it is necessary to have that kind of operation in this country to enforce the provisions of the act.

Canadians are responsible people. They should be encouraged to individually act responsibly, which the vast majority of them do.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, we are glad the minister reversed yesterday's policy to create a "1-800-rat-fink" line. The fact remains, however, that for the past few months he has been suggesting across Canada that the unemployed are people who cheat the system and do not want to work.

I would like to ask the minister this: What specific policies does he have in mind to help the unemployed, instead of punishing them with his policies on unemployment insurance?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, unlike the Liberal Party's policy which prefers to remain oblivious to the tax burden on Canadian workers, this government has frozen employer and employee premiums. We have increased funding for worker training to help these people get back into the labour market. I do believe that the unemployed are best served by a government that protects the integrity of this system.

Only a Liberal would argue that today in 1993, with the current high rate of unemployment, a person who leaves his job voluntarily, without provocation, without just cause, without reasonable grounds, is entitled to benefits. They would ask other workers and employers to pay those benefits. That may be the position of the Liberal Party, but it is not the position of Canadians or this government.

[English]

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, I would like to suggest to the minister, who unfortunately is continuing his vicious attack on unemployed Canadians—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: I think it is obviously a matter of great concern to the hon. member and members on both sides of the House, but I would ask the hon. member to use appropriate language in putting the question to the minister.

Ms. Copps: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the minister how in the name of all that is decent could he ever consider a policy which would deny unemployment insurance to those thousands of Canadians who, in the case of 3,000 Dofasco workers, have chosen voluntary retirement to save jobs for their fellow workers? How could he ever consider a proposal to deny those workers benefits?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member may say whatever she wants but the law will be enforced. The law provides that no person in Canada will be denied unemployment insurance benefits if that person has no reasonable alternative but to quit his or her job and that will not change.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, officials of the minister's department seem to be saying something quite different. In point of fact, with companies that adjust to the market economy, trim their payroll and pay severance to employees it has now been determined by CEIC that these very same employees will be classified as quitters, hence, no unemployment insurance.

Will the minister clarify for the House why this government has chosen to hit these older workers at the very time they are in the greatest need?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I know the hon. member is concerned about the truth. He will know, or maybe he does not, that the Federal Court of Canada has already interpreted the provisions of the act. The act is clear. This Parliament has decided that any person in Canada who quits a job because there are no reasonable alternatives to quitting will be entitled to his or her benefits and that will not change.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I suggest to the minister that is quite a twist on words. The minister knows full well these severances I am referring to are not voluntary severances. Workers take them because they have no other choice. That is the reality in many parts of this country.

Is it fair for these older workers, the steel workers in Hamilton, miners in Nova Scotia, plant workers in British Columbia, textile workers in Quebec, to be denied benefits when their severance is through no fault of their own?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, again for the benefit of the member and maybe to enlighten him, I quote: "For the purposes of this section, just cause for voluntarily leaving an employment exists where having regard to all the circumstances the claimant had no reasonable alternative to immediately leaving the employment".

In any situation in Canada where a person has no reasonable alternative but to quit his or her job then that person is protected.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

[Translation]

Every day, hundreds of people lose their jobs across the country. The lucky ones are offered a voluntary loss of employment with severance pay.

The minister just said it was possible for these workers to receive unemployment insurance benefits.

As of April 1 this year the government's proposed changes to the Unemployment Insurance Act would deprive these people of benefits after the severance period. Loss of employment, whether voluntary or not, means just that, and it is hard to take. Why should these people who contributed to the Unemployment Insurance Fund be deprived of what is rightly theirs?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, for the umpteenth time, in Canada a person who leaves his job because he has no reasonable alternative will be protected under the Unemployment Insurance Act, as he is now.

The hon. member rises in the House to claim in front of Canadians that for those who are eligible for unemployment insurance benefits the issue of just cause will be different after April 1, while that is absolutely false. The only difference is that to protect the integrity of the unemployment insurance fund and protect taxpayers across the country the government has decided that anyone who without provocation, without reason, without just cause, leaves a job should not expect other Canadians to pay his benefits. I think that is a position Canadians support.

[English]

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, the minister continues to attack the unemployed and to say that those people who have a choice to take early severance or early leave will receive benefits. I suggest to him that he would like to talk to the director of public affairs for employment and immigration who has said the opposite. I will leave that with the minister.

Yesterday the minister said that he was welcoming the idea of a hot line or a snitch line for UI cheaters. Today he says he does not. I guess it shows one day makes a big difference.

I hope the minister comes to my office in Whitehorse and takes the hundreds of calls we get weekly from workers who simply want the benefits due to them. They are not fraudulent. They are not cheaters. They are laid-off miners who are suffering, who cannot get their benefits for eight or 10 weeks. Laid-off miners in Faro and Watson Lake, Yukon are still waiting after eight weeks to get their benefits.

If the minister wants to talk on the phone, this is where he—

Mr. Speaker: I would ask the hon. member to put the question.

Ms. McLaughlin: Will the minister stop attacking the unemployed, start addressing unemployment in this country and make sure that workers get the benefits they are owed?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, it may seem politically expedient for the hon. member to twist the fact that yesterday at the suggestion of members and others I said I would consider any suggestion. The difference between her members and mine is that we are making suggestions to improve the situation. I do not think she should have a problem with that.

As for the people in her riding or anywhere in Canada, I want to assure Canadians that the Unemployment Insurance Act will continue to be implemented fairly. If there are ways we can improve the way the act is administered, the intent is not to deprive good hard-working Canadians of the benefits they are entitled to. It is simply a measure to try to protect the taxpayers, the workers and the employers who pay into this account.

All we are saying is that a person who voluntarily without any reason whatsoever wants to quit his or her job should not ask other Canadians to pay the benefits.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, the government has said the UI cuts will save $300 million this year. The Auditor General through the Department of National Revenue has said that the government could save $1.2 billion a year by cutting down on income tax fraud.

As the minister wants suggestions, I will give him some. Kill this UI bill that is simply punishing workers. Instead of giving a club to the little guy, why not give him a carrot? Make sure that the unemployed get the benefits due to them. Cut down on tax fraud. Far more money will be saved for the Canadian taxpayers. They are really who the minister is worried about.

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I invite the hon. member to read the royal commission report from the province of Newfoundland and Labrador on the UI system.

The hon. member would be well advised to take into account the impact of the Unemployment Insurance Act in certain regions of the country and what it does to our people. This is also about trying to foster self-sufficiency among Canadians and avoiding measures that create dependency.

I know the hon. member for political reasons wants everybody to believe they will be deprived of rights, but I can assure Canadians who have no alternative but to quit their jobs that they will be fully protected under the Unemployment Insurance Act.

[Translation]

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, we learned this morning that between October 1991 and September 1992, 44,539 claims for UI benefits in Quebec were challenged and the claimants were subject to penalties varying from 7 to 12 weeks. If the proposed UI reform had been in effect during that period, these 44,539 claimants would have had no income in a province where unemployment is about 13 per cent.

Does the minister think that these 44,539 Quebecers are cheaters?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, we never, and I never, called someone a cheater for voluntarily quitting a job for no reason, quite the contrary. Far be it from me to call that person a cheater for only taking advantage of the provisions of the act.

Right now there is indeed an incentive in the legislation which encourages people to quit their job for no reason. These people rely on other workers and employers to pay them benefits.

All we are saying is that today, given that we must protect the UI fund and the integrity of the system, we can no longer afford to pay benefits to people who, without provocation or reason, quit their job for no just cause. That is all.

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, the minister keeps referring to the notion of just cause.

Mr. Corbeil: That is reality.

Mr. Gagliano: The Minister of Transport tells me that is reality. Let me ask a real question. With this bill, given that we have an economy in which the number of jobs is always decreasing, if an employee receives severance pay is that just cause to qualify for UI benefits? In his regulations, the minister says that people must first justify their action, and prove that they have used all available means to find another job.

If a company negotiates with its employees to reduce its work force do those employees qualify? That is reality.

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member will surely be reassured to know that a claimant is justified in quitting his job voluntarily if, given all the circumstances, the only reasonable option was for him to leave immediately.

This is the test which is used by UI officers as well as by the courts in this country. In the circumstances described by the hon. member, if this was the only reasonable solution for that person then that person would qualify.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister of employment.

I quote in part a statement which the hon. member for Laval-Est is said to have made concerning the unemployed: "I have reported some myself and I am still alive. I am fed up with paying taxes and giving to the poor. I want everybody to be rich because if I am surrounded by poor people, some day they will steal from me or kill me". Does the minister endorse such comments? Why does this government continue to force upon Canadians policies which turn them against one another? I find this situation—

[English]

Mr. Speaker: I have listened with some care to the question and I must say at the moment that I think it is out of order. The hon. member may want to put a question to the minister, but it is not appropriate to ask the minister what he thinks about what somebody else may or may not have said.

[Translation]

Mr. Duhamel: Mr. Speaker, my question is very simple. And here is a comment from a parliamentary secretary who says that he supports—

[English]

Mr. Speaker: I have asked the hon. member to rephrase his question and I know that he would want to co-operate.

Mr. Duhamel: Is that the policy of the minister and his government? Yes or no.

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the government's policy is to protect the integrity of the unemployment insurance system and to protect Canadian taxpayers by taking action to help our economy recover so that we have much less unemployment. I believe that the economic statement of my colleague, the Minister of Finance, in December was a very big step in that direction.

[English]

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I have another quotation attributed to the same individual with respect to reporting others.

Some hon. members: Order, order.

Mr. Speaker: Members can argue about it later if they wish. At the moment I am not satisfied with the way the question is being put. I am asking the hon. member to put a question directly to the minister and I am not entering into debate as to what somebody said or did not say.

Mr. Duhamel: My question then is a very simple one. As a result of an article I have read I am asking the minister why he and his government are putting in place police state-type tactics where Canadians are rewarded for snitching on their neighbours or family members.

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, obviously the hon. member wrote his question before the start of Question Period. If he looks at Hansard he will find that I answered that earlier.

Mr. Duhamel: Reporting others. Don't you know the difference?

Mr. Valcourt: As I indicated earlier, there will be no 1-800 snitch line.

Mr. Duhamel: No telephone, but will you permit the reporting of others?

An hon. member: Drop dead.

Mr. Duhamel: I don't plan on dropping dead.

Mr. Speaker: I would like to remind hon. members that the public of Canada in elections do not send members here to be faint of heart.

On the other hand it is necessary to conduct our affairs with some kind of civility, or else there will be no freedom of speech at all. I am asking hon. members to co-operate in that regard.

Mr. Cid Samson (Timmins—Chapleau): My question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. Time and time again the minister has referred to 225,000 abusers in the UI system, manufacturing for political gain a perception of huge numbers of abusers. I ask the minister to table statistics.

How many people gave sexual harassment as a reason for quitting their jobs? How many people had to move with a spouse or care for a child? How many people, like the Nova Scotia dragger crews, gave health and safety as a reason? How many had a just cause for quitting that was rejected by the system?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, obviously we do not have the time in Question Period to answer that question.

Mr. Samson: Table it.

Mr. Valcourt: The Order Paper is the answer to your question.

Mr. Speaker: I listened very carefully to the question. The minister was prepared to rise in response. However I have to point out that if one wanted to analyse the question very strictly, it was a question more designed for the Order Paper as it involved a lot of facts and figures. The hon. member knows perfectly well that ordinarily that is a question to be put in another way than as a verbal question in Question Period.

• (1440)

Mr. Cid Samson (Timmins—Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, I assure the minister that the question will be forthcoming through the Order Paper.

My supplementary question is for the same minister. How does the minister propose to benefit the economy by restricting the local purchasing power of the unemployed through a reduction from 60 per cent to 57 per cent in benefits, taking away about $200,000 per month in the Timmins area alone?

In addition, how will it benefit taxpayers to have their provincial and municipal governments paying out more money in welfare payments as a result of Bill C-105?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, as a result of Bill C-105 and the measures the Minister of Finance announced in December, Canadians will actually have to pay less tax than they would have paid prior to the statement of the Minister of Finance.

The argument of the hon. member that people will be left with less spending money in their pockets does not bear up in light of the reductions the minister announced and confirmed in December.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

This minister has repeatedly insisted that it will not be difficult for victims of sexual harassment to receive UI, but his employees have a document stating that a woman who is sexually harassed cannot quit her job and receive UI until she has demanded a transfer, used her collective agreement, hired a lawyer to make application under provincial and federal law, and tried to prove her case under the charter of rights. Even then it might take up to nine months to receive UI.

Why has the minister continued to tell the House that sexually harassed women would have no problem collecting UI when his departmental policy is so clearly the opposite?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I indicated yesterday that the document to which the hon. member is referring was not government policy.

This is a draft document that has been circulated at some levels in the department. Instructions and directives will be given to employees of the Department of Employment and Immigration to administer these provisions in a fair way so that women will not be deprived of their rights under the act.

I can assure the member that great care will be devoted to ensuring that on this sensitive issue women are protected.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, we need more than that kind of assurance. The minister knows that current procedures to attempt to prove just cause in sexual harassment or other matters are a sham.

Rather than just ensure, will the minister outline today what new procedures he has put in place to protect such workers?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the government is very sensitive to this issue of sexual harassment. I have met with my colleague, the Minister responsible for the Status of Women. I have also received a lot of assistance from the Minister of State for Employment and Immigration.

We are in a position to assure Canadians that everything will be done to ensure that these women are treated fairly.

GRANTS TO MUNICIPALITIES

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre–Dame–de–Grâce): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. Since 1949 the federal government has agreed to pay grants in lieu of taxes to Canadian municipalities for municipal services to federal facilities. Now, suddenly and without consultation the government has changed this system. For example, the city of Montreal will lose $10 million this year, $10 million that the people of Montreal need.

I ask the minister to cancel this freeze immediately and to continue his discussions with the cities.

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member had studied this subject he would know that it has been a very fast rising cost to the federal government. It has more than doubled since 1987 from about $215 million to $438 million. There have been discussions ongoing with the municipalities to try to restructure it to contain that cost.

I am sure the hon. member would be interested in knowing that in the last two years the grants in lieu of taxes have increased by 30 per cent. That is clearly not sustainable when we are trying to contain government expenditures across the board.

We are continuing to work toward the restructuring of this. In the meantime no municipality will receive less than what it was receiving last year.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre–Dame–de–Grâce): Mr. Speaker, maybe there were increases in recent years, but these were in accord with the Municipal Grants Act and were critically needed by the cities. The problem is that the government changed a long–standing system without consultation with the cities and after many cities had already prepared the 1993 budgets. As a result, the city of Montreal is suffering a shortfall during the recession of $10 million.

I ask the minister this: Would he at the very least postpone this freeze for one year while he consults with the cities on a better way to deal with these problems?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, we will continue the discussions and the consultations but we clearly have to put a cap on this. As I said, we are freezing the transfers at $424 million.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE REFORM

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Lac–Saint–Jean): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. In today's newspapers we can read that the government added 100 unemployment insurance investigators in 1992 and that it is planning to add 300 more in 1993.

I would like to ask the minister whether he can tell us how much it will cost to hire these additional investigators and if he believes that this money would not be much better spent on improving benefits for the unemployed and the poor.

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I do not have on hand information on what it cost to hire investigators last year, but I can tell the hon. member that hiring these investigators saved Canadian workers and employers over $200 million.

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Lac–Saint–Jean): Mr. Speaker, this is an all–out attack on people who are now the victims of this government's economic failure.

I would like to ask the minister if he will not admit today that this government in disarray is taking far–right measures to outflank the Reform Party on the right.

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): No, it is just to protect the Canadian taxpayer, something that would be far down on that member's list of priorities.

TRADE

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister for International Trade.

Today before the subcommittee looking at NAFTA we had 20 victims of free trade. These people who did not receive the adjustment programs that the Prime Minister promised during the last election told about their cases and the cases of their co-workers.

How does the minister respond to Marian Fraser who was laid off after 16 years, to Lorraine Wilkinson who was laid off after 24 years, to Bev Lafleur who was laid off after 25 years, to Diane Rupert who was laid off after 39 years, and to Frances Walsh who was laid off after 31 years?

How does the minister answer those people and how does he dare go into a new program, a new trade agreement with the U.S. and Mexico when these people are unemployed and when this government has done nothing for them?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, first of all, in that same presentation Mr. White recognized that there is a recession, that there is some substantial restructuring under way in the economy. He and I and my hon. friend have a great deal of sympathy for those people who have lost their jobs as a result of this.

To simply say that all of this is the result of free trade is simply not right. I ask my hon. friend to consider the situation of Clearly Canadian Beverage. In 1988 it sold 200,000 cases of its sparkling mineral water. It is a Vancouver company and in 1991 sold 10 million cases and 96 per cent of its product is for export, largely to the United States.

In Saskatoon there is a company called Flexi-Coil which develops a lot of its products through its own research facilities; 20 per cent of its business is for export and it cannot keep up with the orders now. New Flyer Industry in Winnipeg, 50—

• (1450)

Mr. Speaker: I am sure the hon. member knows there is another way to put that information across.

NORTH AMERICAN FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister.

Without a doubt during the next federal election one of the most important issues facing Canadians will be the North American free trade agreement. The implementation of this agreement will be of crucial importance to the Canadian people.

The New Democratic Party has stated clearly that we will not implement the agreement. The government has stated clearly that it supports implementation. Today the leader of the Liberal Party again reiterated his ambiguous position.

I want to know from the Deputy Prime Minister whether the Canadian people will be given a right to vote on this issue before implementation so every political party says exactly where it stands in front of the Canadian people.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, political parties will be able to vote on this.

We will have the legislation before the House. Then we will see where the Liberal Party stands. There are few things on which my hon. friend and I agree. One of them is precisely what he has just said.

The Liberal Party does not have a position on free trade. There is an old saying: "Vote Liberal and you have a choice, a choice—".

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

NATIONAIR

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Deputy Prime Minister.

A large group of Nationair flight attendants are presently sitting in at the West Block offices of the minister of defence because she refuses to meet with them and explain why her department has contracted over $30 million worth of work with Nationair which has locked out these workers over the past year.

Why does the government of the Deputy Prime Minister, which claims to be neutral in this bitter dispute, continue to expand its business with Nationair, knowing full well that this company is attempting to force poverty level wages on its workers, 80 per cent of whom are women? Is that the commitment to fairness this government holds?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, this dispute is between Nationair and the union representing its employees. The government is not involved in the dispute in any way, shape or form.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, the House leader says the government is not in any way involved in the dispute.

Recently, after the dispute started, the government went ahead and signed new agreements to store the CF-18s which had just returned from Europe on Nationair facilities. That is not being neutral.

I want to ask the House leader or the Deputy Prime Minister if they will recognize their responsibility in this matter? Will they at minimum instruct the minister of defence who seems to have other priorities outside this House to come back to Ottawa, meet with the workers and explain why this government is interfering in this conflict?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, we could debate whether that is neutral or not. In fact it is wrong.

The hon. member frequently gets his facts wrong. Canadair has the maintenance contracts for the CF-18 and Canadair apparently has leased space from Nationair to store the CF-18s. If he wants to scream and yell, let him phone Canadair.

ADVERTISING CONTRACTS

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the government House leader.

Over recent days the minister has been saying that there was no political consideration in the awarding of the $21 million worth of government advertising contracts.

If that is so and if he still insists it is the answer, can the minister explain to Canadians why the ads in question were backed by a chorus singing lyrics commissioned by the Conservative Party? Does that not at least sing off key to most of us?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member got stuck on this issue when that false media report came out saying there was no competition.

The approach used by this government since 1985 was not used by the previous government which appointed its own agencies. It is to have a competition. It is in fact a duplicate of what is done in the private sector.

If a company wants to have an advertising program it brings in the agencies to make a pitch. It is exactly the same policy we have been using. The ad agencies came in and made a pitch to a committee of civil servants and the agencies were selected to carry out the program.

It is as fair a program as exists anywhere, infinitely fairer than what the Liberals did previously. The hon. member should get on to some other muckraking.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I shall let you decide whether that was parliamentary.

I want to ask a supplementary of the minister. This is not private sector money. These are taxpayers' dollars. I want to ask the minister why he is spending $21 million of taxpayers' money through a Tory ad agency to run the Tory jingle on Canadian television. Is that not wrong?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member seems to think if he stands in his place and screams his falsifications become true.

Indeed, as our attempt, which was agreed to by all the parties in the House and every provincial government, to bring this country together united behind the Charlottetown accord there were advertising programs celebrating Canada 125, celebrating this great nation and all of those things.

The agencies put together ads which I guess in the end we can say were not enough to bring about the result we all wanted, but for the hon. member to suggest this was all done as some sort of illicit pay-off is to wallow in the mud, and I think he should get out of it.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the minister of Indian and northern affairs.

As the minister will recall, last May at a public meeting in Fredericton former Chief Emmanuel Polchies of the Oromocto Indian Band requested support from the department of Indian affairs for a formal inquiry into his earlier conviction for theft from a land claims settlement.

Mr. Polchies indicated that he was not able to pursue his appeal to the Supreme Court for lack of personal funding and was requesting financial support to do so.

I have a question and a quick supplementary. Will the minister recommend this request for an inquiry to ensure that justice is done and perceived to be done?

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I certainly did receive in the company of the hon. member, a submission from former Chief Polchies. In a letter which I sent to him, I believe on January 4 of this year, I suggested that in the matter of the criminal conviction against him in 1984 that I would ask the Minister of Justice to review the circumstances underlying that conviction and to get back to me with further information.

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, will the minister consider helping to fund Mr. Polchies' legal costs in pursuing this matter to a just conclusion?

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, my department does provide assistance in certain cases under a program called Test Case Funding. The criteria under which Test Case Funding is awarded involve matters which are of widespread importance to Indian communities and if the particular case meets those criteria we will look at it very carefully.

TELECOMMUNICATIONS

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Communications and involves the iniquitous 976 use by Bell Canada and other telephone companies as a money-making scheme.

This number is supplied to anybody who wants to make a deal with Bell and anybody who uses the phone number pays a fee on their telephone bill for the use of the line.

You cannot get out of it unless you pay Bell telephone.

I was wondering if the Minister of Communications would step into this mess. Will he ask the CRTC to rule on the 976 number and stop the use and abuse by Bell Canada of 976 and make it possible so that when anybody has 976 they have to sign a contract for 976.

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, generally I try to avoid stepping in messes but I would be pleased to accept my friend's invitation.

It is not the fault of Bell Canada that individuals or companies take out 1-976 numbers. Indeed the most recent instance was one where people who had received notices from the provincial attorney general's office in Toronto of having unpaid traffic fines received a notice suggesting they should call a 1-976 number only to discover that upon calling it they got a recorded message and were charged $24 for doing it.

I have brought this to the attention of the CRTC whose responsibility it is to protect consumers from scam artists.

• (1500)

I would invite consumers to contact Bell Canada to ask that any unfair charges be dropped because this is provided for in the Bell tariffs.

EMPLOYMENT

Hon. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. It is about jobs.

Yesterday members of the Canadian Worker Co-operative Federation met with his officials in the Department of Finance as well as other members of all three parties in this House to remind us that one year ago at a federal-provincial conference ministers responsible for co-operatives agreed that worker co-ops should be one of the four priorities in that area.

In view of the fact that the Quebec government has established a venture capital fund and the Ontario government has spent some $1.8 billion out of its job fund to help worker co-operatives, or it will spend that much—

An hon. member: One million.

Mr. Nystrom: One million I should say. What is the federal government going to do to help worker co-ops in this country? Is it going to establish a venture capital fund to establish worker co-ops? What are its plans and when will the government be announcing them?

Hon. Charles Mayer (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is absolutely right. For the last two days we have had a co-operative advisory committee meeting of about one dozen members of co-ops right across the country in Ottawa. I met with them at noon and had a chance to go over their concerns. That will be one of the things we will be looking at.

The hon. member should also be aware that in the last seven or eight years we have held, under the auspices of the federal government and the provincial governments, several federal-provincial co-ops ministers meetings across the country to discuss various aspects affecting co-operatives and how they operate.

One of the papers we looked at was worker co-operatives in addition to child care and other areas. The federal government is working very closely with the co-operative sector to see what can be done to advance its concerns in many areas, not only in worker co-operatives but in other areas as well.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister of manpower and immigration. I ask the minister, in view of some of the earlier questions and today's news report, to clarify this question of severance pay and UIC benefits. I will really bring it right down to this House.

Without making a pun of a thing and to explain it to myself and our staffs, as I understand it, if members do not come back after the next election, either by choice or by choice of the electorate, and their staff receive severance pay which they do have to a point, would they then be entitled after that severance pay runs out to receive unemployment insurance benefits?

If not, does the minister think this very fair in view of the fact that those members who do not come back are going to receive an interesting pension.

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, all I can say to the hon. member is that under the act any person who quits a job because he had no reasonable alternative to immediately leaving the employment is covered.

He can construe that with the situation which he described, in light of the basic legal statement in the act. This is what would be applicable.

TABLING OF OP-ED PAGE

Mr. Speaker: I wish to bring to the attention of the House an incident that happened during statements by members.

The hon. member for Mount Royal, who made a statement as other members were doing, suggested to the House that she be allowed by consent to table a document from which she had quoted.

I am putting it to the House whether there is agreement for that.

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: So ordered.

POINTS OF ORDER

COMMENTS DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, before I put the business question, may I seek the guidance of the Chair with regard to Question Period.

I presume the Chair was under the impression that some of the comments or remarks made by my colleague, the hon. member for St. Boniface were somehow offensive.

Yet at the same time the government House leader used words such as falsification and wallowing in the mud which—

Mr. Speaker: Just a minute. I know that there was some concern about the fact that I interrupted the hon. member for St. Boniface. I indicated that if it was necessary it could be discussed later.

I do not think it is appropriate to turn my ruling into a debate at this time. I will be very pleased to see the hon. House leader, and if it is then necessary to raise it on the floor of the House I of course will invite him to do so.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I have a new point of order concerning comments of the government House leader during Question Period. He used the word falsification. I am not referring to the other case that Mr. Speaker ruled on earlier, only the exchange between the government House leader and myself when he used the words falsification, wallowing in the mud or whatever. I may have asked the government a question which was direct but I did not use language which was inappropriate. I am sure I would have been reminded of it by the Chair or hon. members across the way.

I asked why the taxpayers of Canada should be paying for an advertisement which basically advertised the musical interlude or a jingle of the Conservative Party. I think it is a legitimate question; it is a fact, it is well-known and it is acknowledged. Surely I had a right to ask that question without receiving those kinds of insults from across the way. That kind of abuse is totally unnecessary.

I seek the guidance of the Chair to see whether at the very least the government House leader could control himself in the future as he has not been able to do so in the past.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I have no desire to see this carry on. The falsification I was referring to was of course the original newspaper article which the hon. member took as fact. He now knows it was totally false in its representation.

He had been endeavouring to build a case on it when an hon. member opposite screamed out the allegation that the entire advertising program was designed for one purpose and one purpose only: to reward Tories and so on. I consider that wallowing in the mud. If that is unparliamentary I withdraw it and I apologize.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the government House leader for his apology to the House.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps it should be accepted and we could move on to something else.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, what a day it is. Perhaps the government House leader would indicate to the House what the business will be for the remainder of today, tomorrow and Monday and Tuesday of next week.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): I will be pleased to, Mr. Speaker.

This afternoon we will continue with third reading of Bill C-98, the Borrowing Authority Act. After completion of that we hope to complete second reading of Bill C-93, the government organizations bill, and get to report stage of Bill C-76, the budget implementation bill.

Tomorrow, if necessary, we will continue with Bill C-76 in the morning after which we will deal with Bill C-111, the Tobacco Restraint Act; Bill C-69, air and maritime safety; Bill C-79, the Divorce Act; and Bill C-73, the Canada Post Corporation Act. Some of them are relatively non-controversial. I understand there is considerable agreement among the parties that these could be passed.

On Monday and Tuesday, if necessary, we hope to complete passage of Bill C-76. If time permits, it is my hope that it can be used to complete any of the previous legislation that I have mentioned which remains outstanding. We will continue discussions with House leaders concerning business for the remainder of next week and on to the week after that.

PRIVILEGE

COMMENTS OF MEMBER FOR ABITIBI

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, my question of privilege arises from remarks made by the hon. member for Abitibi.

In the remarks contained in today's La Presse it states:

[Translation]

> Guy Saint-Julien, Tory MP for Abitibi, struggled to find words to express his disappointment yesterday upon hearing this kind of statement from a Canadian. "I was surprised and deeply disappointed. This is serious, this is a case of intellectual racism directed against Quebec".

[English]

The concern that I have is in the utilization of the words "intellectual racism" in relation to a video which I have never seen and is in the hands of people who I do not know. In fact it is in the United States.

• (1510)

The remarks I made at some point in the past in relation to either James Bay I or James Bay II were certainly true at the time they were made. For the member for Quebec Hydro to be making these kinds of allegations outside and inside the House and using the words intellectual racism is quite improper and contravenes my rights and privileges in a free and democratic society and should be withdrawn.

Mr. Speaker: I have a short question and then I will listen to the hon. member for Abitibi.

I want to be absolutely sure about this. The statements to which the hon. member referred were made outside this House. Is that correct?

[Translation]

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I am not here to avoid criticism, and I wish to raise a point of order on the same matter.

On February 8, 1993 a video was screened before the New Hampshire Senate Committee on the Environment, in which the NDP member for Skeena was introduced as the MP from the National Democratic Party of Canada. The hon. member said in this video:

[English]

"There should not be any question in the mind of any American consumer in buying power from the province of Quebec that comes from the James Bay II project. There is blood on that electricity".

The video was produced by McAusland Film and Video Inc., under No. MA-617-329-7335. In my statement to Lisa Binsse, reporter with La Presse, I said that the hon. member's statement—

Earlier, the NDP member for Skeena said twice that I attacked what he said. I did not attack him as a member from British Columbia. I told the reporter that what the hon. member for Skeena had said was a direct attack against Quebec workers at James Bay and the Government of Canada.

I was once a technical survey worker with Hydro, a job I held from 1965 to 1968. When the NDP member for Skeena says in this video: "There is blood on that electricity", it is a serious matter. It is unfair to the employees of Hydro-Québec and to the Cree and Inuit of James Bay.

The James Bay Cree and Inuit have always used the courts to defend their rights. There has never been bloodshed. The same applies to Hydro-Québec workers.

I think it is odd that the hon. member for Skeena should say there is blood on that electricity, in referring to hydro projects in Quebec, while there are hydro dams in British Columbia and the other provinces as well.

It was not my intention to call the hon. member for Skeena a racist. I was mainly concerned about his reference, in a video that was screened for the Americans, to Quebec workers who have been employed by Hydro-Québec on major dam-building projects for many years and will be in the future as well.

Mr. Speaker: I thank the hon. member for Abitibi for his comments.

[English]

I want to say this to the House. First of all, except under very rare and unusual circumstances I have no authority to rule on statements made outside this House.

I think we can all have some sympathy with the concern of the hon. member for Skeena if there was an implication that another hon. member was referring to him or to any other member here as racist. The hon. member for Abitibi has made it very clear that was not the intention, even though the comment was made outside the House.

I do want to say this. I think we are at a stage in the history of our country where we should be very careful in our language and what we say about each other, whether it is in the House or outside the House, with respect to any suggestion that anybody is a racist.

We have gone through a very difficult period of time in this country and some things have been said outside this place and by people right across the country that I hope upon reflection a lot of people regret having said and a lot of other people regret having heard. I think it is very important that we carefully watch how we express ourselves out of respect for each other and this country. Again, I thank the hon. member for Abitibi. Strictly speaking procedurally it was not necessary for him to reply but he has done so generously and I think he has added to the dignity of this House.

POINT OF ORDER

BILL C-88

Mr. Louis Plamondon (Richelieu): Mr. Speaker, I had a question for the government House leader about the business of the House for the next three days. There was no reference to Bill C-88, which received the approval of members of all parties. I wonder why the bill is being held back and why the government does not table it as soon as possible. All authors and composers in Canada and Quebec are waiting for this bill. Perhaps someone on the other side would like to comment.

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, regarding the question put by the hon. member for Richelieu, we intend to debate and dispose of Bill C-88 starting Monday, in other words, early next week.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Mazankowski that Bill C-98, an act to provide additional borrowing authority for the fiscal year beginning on April 1, 1992, be read the third time and passed.

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, I want to rise this afternoon to say a few words on Bill C-98 which seeks authorization from the House of Commons to borrow approximately $8.2 billion for various public works and other purposes by the Government of Canada.

The subject of borrowing additional sums by the government is of great concern to Canadians, particularly considering the awesome debt this government has accumulated in its eight years in power. Last week, according to the debt clock in Vancouver this debt now stands at $450 billion. This is more than double the debt this government inherited less than eight years ago and pledged to control. It is clear that in eight years it has failed miserably to manage the nation's finances and today it is asking for $8.2 billion more of taxpayers' money to add to the awesome debt it has accumulated.

Today in The Globe and Mail a Japanese investment house was quoted as expressing its grave concern about the fiscal capacity of the Canadian economy that this large debt represents. A further indication of the mismanagement of this government is the fact that since it came to power it has increased the proportion of this debt which has to be financed outside Canada, causing upward pressure on our interest rates, downward pressure on our dollar and affecting our economy in many ways. In fact the Japanese own $50 billion of our debt. That is a serious issue. It is not one that was inherited from the Liberal government. It is also a serious problem for the Canadian economy.

In addition this government has achieved this debacle while adding significantly to the debt which it has off-loaded to the provincial governments. They have also seen a tremendous increase in debt, which is also a burden on the Canadian economy. We need to be very concerned as parliamentarians when the government asks for $8.2 billion more of taxpayers' money to finance unspecified services.

I would like to say a few words on this subject as it concerns my constituency of Cape Breton Highlands–Canso. I just returned this morning from two days in my riding where I attended public meetings to deal with the growing crisis in the fishery which has encircled the constituency I represent.

Last night I was in Canso. We were dealing with how this community and the surrounding communities were going to cope with the loss in income which the downturn in the fishery represented. The previous evening I was in Arichat where we discussed the same question. All around Cape Breton and eastern Nova Scotia that is on peoples' minds.

When they think about the government's fiscal dilemmas my constituents wonder why we are continuously and ever more deeply in debt. The deficits this government continuously mounts up year after year have increased rather than decreased despite the fact it has provoked a recession which is now into its third year and shows no sign of abating, certainly not in eastern Nova Scotia. They wonder where all this money is going.

We have been paying the GST now for two years. Apparently this GST collects over $15 billion per year. Despite the massive new intrusion on the pocket-books of Canadians which the GST represents, the government's debt continues to mount. The Minister of Finance has been way off on his deficit projections.

The people of Cape Breton Highlands—Canso are asking themselves where this money is going. Why does this government feel compelled to continually borrow more and more money and tax us more for projects when we do not see any results? Our economy is still mired in recession. We are still facing an unemployment level which is much too high. While the government is piling debt upon debt it is cutting out the basic lifelines and support services which people in areas of high unemployment need and depend upon to survive.

For example, the fishery is facing a severe downturn in our area. There will be a need for adjustment assistance or some form of plan for compensation to deal with those communities which are going to be left in a severe state as a result of the lack of fish, provoked largely by the mismanagement of the federal government.

The people of Cape Breton Highlands–Canso say they have yet to see a plan announced by the minister of fisheries to deal with this particular problem. They have been told it will come later this year in April, but people are already hurting in eastern Nova Scotia. The people in fishing communities have no unemployment insurance benefits remaining and no jobs. They realize that this year the fishing will be a disaster.

Today during Question Period we talked about the unemployment insurance program and what the Minister of Employment and Immigration is doing by denying unemployment insurance benefits to those who quit their jobs. Our members have tried to dissuade the government from this wrong path. In terms of sexual harassment, people are provoked into leaving their jobs.

It provokes people to leave their work. Now they will be put into more of a trap. The changes that are being contemplated by this government in Bill C–105, the unemployment insurance bill, make no sense from an economic standpoint because they will only decrease the ability of the labour force to adjust smoothly to changes that it has to adjust to in order to get the economy out of the present recession.

Rather than taking these regressive measures the government should be assisting the unemployed to take training programs. It should be using UI and other programs more creatively in order to assist people to get off unemployment and to find full-time work in job opportunities for the future.

In my area one of the problems which is of real concern is in connection with the student loan program. Many young people are being denied the opportunity to take university courses or other courses at trade school and other facilities because there are insufficient moneys available through the student loan program. That is somewhere that this government could help. If it was helping students that way we might not be so concerned about the borrowing demands of this government.

In addition the government is forcing young people in particular, but also those who are on unemployment insurance, to make the choice between staying on unemployment insurance and not taking training or taking some form of training and being denied unemployment insurance because of silly rules that exist in that program. They could easily be removed.

These are the kinds of measures which the government is not taking and which it could be taking to improve the economy, to get us out of this recession that we are in and to prepare Canadians for meaningful jobs in the future.

I just want to mention that in connection with these borrowing demands of the government. The question which is on our minds in Highlands—Canso is where is this money going. A sad situation occurred last week in Port Hawkesbury with the Premium Automotive plant abruptly closing its doors after receiving almost $2 million in government grants, concessions and generous loans. This company callously closed its doors on its workers. It took the occupation of the plant for them to get their severance pay.

Those people are now going to be facing unemployment with no immediate prospects in sight. This happened after the government provided awesome sums to a company that stayed five years and left.

These are the kinds of policies that have to be changed and on which the government has to rearrange its focus. Since it is far too late in its mandate to do so it should go to the people. It should call an election to let a better group of individuals take over and run the government.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Kootenay East. Kootenay West.

Mr. Lyle Kristiansen (Kootenay West—Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, you did it again. It is Kootenay West—Revelstoke. There are a lot of similarities between east and west Kootenay but the current member for Kootenay East and I, apart from having shared an equally interrupted record of service in the House, do represent different areas.

In rising to debate the motion of the Minister of Finance for the third reading of Bill C-98, an act to provide additional borrowing authority for the fiscal year beginning on April 1, 1992, I wish to make a few comments relating first of all to the government's record when it comes to deficits.

I do not know how many times since 1980, with the previous government from 1980 through 1984 and certainly since being back in this House between 1988 and this year, I have heard continuing statements by ministers of finance and continuing budgets that forecast almost exactly the same projections for deficit reduction year after year after year. It puts me in mind of an old quotation from a poem by Frank R. Scott, entitled W.L.M.K.—William Lyon Mackenzie King—in which he said of W.L.M.K: "Always he led us back to where we were before; do nothing by halves that can be done by quarters". In this case and in the continuing record of the government, it seems to be: "Do nothing by quarters that can be done by halves", at least when it comes to increasing the debt of this country and increasing deficits.

To be more exact, if controlling the deficit is the primary goal of the government then it has done a poor job. The projection for the deficit in February 1992 was $27.5 billion. Now the Minister of Finance says he has reduced the deficit to $34.4 billion. Strange, strange math.

The projected deficit for next year is $32.2 billion. In the 1991 budget this same government estimated a deficit for 1993 of $16 billion, less than half of what it actually will be.

All these cuts, all this hurt for those suffering from the recession, and the government has not been able to deal with the deficit. The best way to reduce the deficit must include stimulating the economy and not the government's failed trickle-down policies.

As my colleague the House leader for the New Democratic Party has said, Canadians are sick and fed up with being trickled on and it is time for a change.

One of the reasons for this increasing deficit is not only the failure of the government to manage its accounts in a better way than it has done but, and I hesitate to use the term drunken sailor, somebody has been imbibing much too much in this drunken sailor kind of spending in a number of categories which do not have the support of the majority of the Canadian people. I refer to what it has spent or is about to spend, according to its own statements: some $4.3 billion on the world's most expensive high-tech helicopters, another $40 million on studies to purchase these same helicopters, $1 billion on an air defence system to protect troops in Europe against Soviet attacks—What troops, what attacks, What Soviets—and $250 million on anti-tank guns. Great, I am sure the UN will be using a lot of anti-tank guns in Somalia and the other places it is called upon to serve.

This kind of spending just does not make sense in today's world. Eight hundred and twenty million dollars to implement the GST is what it has spent. I just hope that if there is a change of government and the gentleman who is now the Leader of the Opposition, should we have the misfortune, becomes the Prime Minister it will not mean another $820 million to implement a hidden version of the GST. How many times can we get this kind of regurgitation of failures and policy? One billion dollars on an extension of former Prime Minister Trudeau's tax breaks to the super wealthy through family trusts. Those tax breaks were to expire at the beginning of this year, the ones brought in by Mr. Trudeau in I think it was 1973. After 20 years we have decided to extend those tax breaks for the very wealthiest families in this country.

One hundred million dollars in government advertising to advertise free trade, the Tory prosperity initiative, Canada 125, the goods and services tax again, and a lot of "feel good" ads. And another one million dollars on new cars for cabinet and senior bureaucrats.

These are some of the things this government in making its so-called hard choices has determined to be worth while spending Canadian dollars on. It is one of the reasons why its deficits are continually out of control. It ill behoves it to keep preaching to those of us in the opposition—and that includes both the Official Opposition and ourselves—about our alleged failure, according to it, not to come up with suitable alternatives when it is handing money out hand over fist toward goals and projects that do not have support and do not make any sense.

I suggest it start to get its own managerial house in order. One of the other problems is that while this has been going on we have been spending this kind of money on projects that do not make sense. The government meanwhile has cut programs like unemployment insurance, hurting the unemployed; like the Crow rate, hurting farmers; like the family benefit program, hurting single parents and other programs that have hurt those who are hurting most in this recession and it still cannot get the deficit down.

I would like in the few minutes available to me to register some comments from some of my constituents who have either personal or representative knowledge of some of the impacts that these cuts have had on a number of vital programs.

On January 22 Luanne Bush of Castlegar called my constituency office to complain about how the new child tax benefit reform is working against her family. Her husband was disabled in the past few years and so they are on a limited income of $1,100 a month. Naturally they had to sell some property just to get by and that was added to their family income for 1991. They get no child tax benefit for the first six months of 1993. She feels, and I agree, that it is unfair to penalize people on limited incomes who are forced to sell property just to survive compared to ones who sell property just to flip it and make more money.

There is a difference and our system ought to recognize those differences.

Another copy of a letter that was sent by a constituent, Mrs. Val Leslie, formerly of Slocan, now of Castlegar, to the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance says: "I hope you will take a look and give serious thought to all the letters you both will be receiving since the budget statement. I suggest: 1. making all businesses pay their share of taxes, not just some, and the rest get out of paying like some big companies are now. You set the rules that all the working people have to pay. Well, why not everybody, including you?"

She goes on: "It was bad enough that you and your government wasted all that money on a useless constitution but it is appalling to see the idea you have now that when a person goes to work and works for years, pays UI to the government, and loses his job or quits you take his money and keep it. That is downright robbery. Part of that money is his on loan to you, to use until he needs it so you have no right to keep it. Therefore I strongly suggest you change the rules you have made before somebody takes you to court for keeping money that is rightfully theirs". She has a bit of a wild hope there.

Finally there is a letter from which I will quote briefly from the Employee Resource Centre in Trail, B.C. It represents a lot of people who have been unemployed from the Cominco lead-zinc smelter over the past few years as it has modernized, as all of us have been urging industry to do. This year because of some particular situations in the international market it is having some large scale layoffs affecting thousands of workers in Trail in my riding and in Kimberley in the riding of Kootenay East that are going to have serious effects.

The gentleman who is co-ordinator of the Employee Resource Centre in Trail lists many of the problems including suicides that have taken place in that city because of the inadequacy of the training arrangements that have been made through the unemployment insurance system and many others.

There are many choices this government has to make in order to get the financial management of the country under control and to create jobs for Canadians. NAFTA is not one of the ways to go. The free trade agreement and the consequences of that should have shown that to be the case.

There are many other areas in which this government could move to make things better for Canadians and keep its own financial house in order. I hope it starts listening and acts upon those suggestions.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, since you indicated to me that I should do my very best to be extremely parliamentary I shall, and I shall resist the temptation to talk about the Governments of Ontario, Saskatchewan and British Columbia in so far as their electoral promises and what they have actually done with regard to controlling the deficit, the debt, services to education and health. I am referring to the cutbacks they have actually undertaken.

I should alert my colleagues to the left in true parliamentary fashion that if they persist in being unfair and insensitive to my party that I have already gathered plenty of information for at least a two-hour address on all the sins their respective provincial governments have committed, that is, the discrepancies between what was promised and what they have actually done. They have been warned.

Let us talk about this bill. What are the issues? The borrowing authority comes up on a regular basis, but there is a deeper issue. Should the government be going forward? Does it have the moral authority to continue to govern, particularly after four years in government, and especially after the Prime Minister himself has said—of course he was not then in government—that after four years it is traditional, it is customary, it is correct to renew the mandate or change the mandate, to give Canadians an opportunity? Does it have the moral authority? It is really quite questionable. I have support there, the Prime Minister's coach, the then Leader of the Opposition.

My colleague made some statements that I find particularly interesting and I shall follow them up. For example, he said: "How confident should we be that what is being sought right now is an accurate figure?" The government has been quite inaccurate in its predictions. For example, it had hoped and predicted that the deficit would be slightly in excess of $27 billion. In fact I think it is correct to say it is in excess of $34 billion, and that is a large discrepancy. That is $7 billion, which is a huge discrepancy.

The government indicated it would be reducing the debt as well. I have mentioned this in the House and I am always delighted to be able to do so. The former Minister of Finance wrote to me in response to a Question on the Order Paper with regard to what the debt was in 1984. It was $167.8 billion. Of course the members of government are anxious to say that it was in excess of $200 billion. What has happened is really the accumulated interest over time. Of course we know that is not correct.

It needs to be said time and time again that this is not the situation. I want you to note as well, Mr. Speaker, as I know you probably have already, that the government debt has now reached in excess of $450 billion.

Let us remember this. It was not quite $170 billion in 1984. Here we are in 1993, less than a decade later, and the deficit has gone from $170 billion to $450 billion. I would be delighted to show—if I could in this House I would—a chart of the interest rates since that time and to show my hon. colleagues as well as the Canadian public exactly what the figures would be if it was accrued interest only. Now that these numbers have been corrected I hope that government members will not brag about their control.

By the way, it is also important to say, and I am saying this in the spirit of collegiality, openness and friendliness, that it is inappropriate for the government to pretend it controls its expenditures and brag about it because it has off-loaded them to the provinces so they will have to off-load them to the hospitals, colleges, universities and the municipalities whose own debts have gone up as a result of the off-loading.

It can brag all it wants. It is a little bit like if I were to say to members of my own family: here is my debt; this is what you are going to have to do without. You are going to have to pick up some of mine. Obviously I would be well off. It is the same kind of situation.

It is important for us to ask why we are in this difficult situation. It is true that there have been difficult situations throughout the world. There is no doubt about that. I think most people would acknowledge that. It is also true to say that certain countries have managed much better than we have and it is also true to say that the recessionary policies of this government have led us to a great degree to this particular situation.

It is also accurate to say that when we look at this country of 27 million Canadians with five million people living at the level of poverty or below, more than one-half of whom are women and over a million of whom are young people and children, that these are not appropriate policies. We need to ask ourselves just how much is that costing the Canadian economy in actual dollars and cents and, more important, what is the human cost?

If we look, for example at social assistance, and I am told that this year there will be in excess of 2.3 million Canadians who will be receiving social assistance, what are the costs of that social assistance when those people could be working and contributing to the Canadian economy? They could be feeling better about themselves because they would find some mission in life other than collecting social assistance.

Over two million Canadians will be fed at food banks this year, 40 per cent of whom will be young adults. Some people call them children. It is more appropriate to say adolescents and younger. What is the cost of those food banks? What is the human cost of those people having to go to those food banks to be nourished adequately? I have not even talked about the 1.6 million and a bit more unemployed. Those are the ones that we know about. How many people have given up?

A recent study showed that every unemployed Canadian costs the Canadian Treasury an average of $15,000 and $7,000 in lost taxes. It is a huge cost.

If my memory is not failing me and I hope that it is not—I am sure that government members would be disappointed if it were—I read somewhere that the UI total bill would be in excess of $20 billion this year. No wonder we have a deficit. No wonder that the deficit adds to the debt, which is in excess of $450 billion now because of those policies.

Today in the House of Commons during Question Period I tried to remind the government as gently as I could that some of the statements being made by members of its party are not conducive to creating a strong, united country where we try to work together, try to build a better nation and reach out and try to help each other. There were some difficulties and not having that statement accepted was disappointing. It was not done with any malice in mind.

It was done to point out that whenever anyone says anything that is hurtful, as was said in those quotations that I would have liked to have entered those comments into the record, it simply pits Canadian against Canadian, region against region, the rich against the poor and does not build unity or community. It simply does not.

Let me complete my remarks by saying without a hint of arrogance, because I do not know what the verdict of Canadians will be, that it is time to call an election. I say this, not because I think it is very likely my party will form the next government but because I believe it is only fair that every four years Canadians should be able to say: Yes, we want these policies to continue or we want a change.

[English]

That is what we are talking about when we call for an election. No one is saying this is how Canadians will vote in an election. Canadians are saying: "After eight plus years and after a mandate that has entered its fifth year, it is time for us to go to the polls and determine who it is that we want to govern and with what kinds of policies".

At times I am disappointed. I referred to that briefly when I talked about some hurtful remarks. My leader and the Liberal Party of Canada are going in the direction of trying to create jobs because we feel that people who are working will feel good about themselves and contribute much more than they would otherwise to this country.

I hope that this accentuation of growth in the economy could be applauded by all members from all parties.

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to participate in the debate this afternoon on Bill C–98, which is entitled an act to provide additional borrowing authority for the fiscal year beginning April 1, 1992.

As one who is interested in words and what they mean I was almost amazed when I saw the wording for this. In thinking that the government would provide additional borrowing authority or that authority would be given to the government to borrow another $8 billion and some more for an overdraft on an account when it thought it would keep its deficit to $27 billion.

Several months through the year the Minister of Finance said: "Oops, I am sorry. We estimated incorrectly and now we are revamping that to $34.4 billion".

If this happened in a private business this simply would not be allowed. When we look at the word "authority", we see that it would be giving power or restoring power upon someone to do that or to have the mandate to do that.

I really believe that thousands of Canadians would agree that the government has lost the authority to govern. It has lost the moral mandate to be in a position to say, trust us, we need several billion dollars more than we thought we needed. I think, Mr. Speaker, you would probably agree with me, being from Alberta, that it is not popular back home.

I do not think it would be any surprise to any members in the Chamber or anybody watching us this afternoon that the overwhelming opinion of Canadians, indeed those in my constituency of Beaver River, would be to tell the government: "We do not want you to borrow more money until you spend the money that you already receive in a more responsible manner".

I could quote many Canadians who feel this way passionately, perhaps even as passionately as they did in the referendum debate which we all went through last fall. Certainly money was an issue. That came to me several times as I was campaigning on the no side of the campaign. It was so important to be able to say: "Who is financing this thing?"

It was ironic for me, as I was on what in here was the unpopular side of that referendum campaign, the no side, that for every $1 the no side was spending the yes side was spending $300. Many people, rightly or wrongly, saw it all as taxpayers' dollars. Whether they were on the yes or the no side of the campaign they thought they were funding the yes side.

I know it was not all government money that was going to the yes side. Much of it was private money, but everyone in this Chamber knows that unfortunately a lot of public and taxpayers' funds were going to finance that. It left a bad taste in Canadians' mouths.

We need to be really careful we do not go to the Canadian public saying that we need this amount of money. Since 1984 when this government was elected, if we were to look at the budgets in which it was projecting what the annual deficit would be several years down the road, we would see that in the 1984, 1985, 1986 and 1987 budgets the projected deficit, what this government would be going in the hole or overspending every year, was projected in the 1991 or 1991–92 fiscal year to be just a very few billion dollars. In fact I do not have the figures with me, but I think it was supposed to be just under $10 billion.

We are seeing now that those projections, rightly or wrongly, were completely off target. As economic advisers say, they were off because of very many things that went on around the world. For instance, the U.S. recession, nobody was planning on that. It would be easy to say those factors were not taken into account, which happens in the public sector and in the private sector.

I think it would have been far more responsible for the government to come forward at that time and tell us the projections were off and the predictions were incorrect. It could have told us it was in desperate financial straits rather than telling us it was the best manager of money in this country and was the best political party for getting spending under control.

Granted, this government has perhaps spent less per capita or in absolute dollars or in percentages than the government before it. When we are facing such a crippling interest and debt load we need to spend even less than that. We cannot just break even, Mr. Speaker, as you and I both know, because we are paying 35 cents out of every dollar on interest alone.

When we look at the last budget, as I alluded to earlier, the government said it would be going in hock for $27.7 billion and now it has had to revamp that to $34.4 billion.

In the same vein of interest and debt servicing charges, I am in the middle of an interesting book right now. It is called Bankruptcy 1995. It is written by an American businessman named Harry Figgie Jr.

What I am most amazed and I suspect nervous about in that book is that he is using charts and graphs to explain matters. He has no political axe to grind, he is a businessman. I do not think we are unlike this in Canada but it is on a larger scale in the U.S. because it has such an enormous population. The projections that are given in this book are that the U.S. debt servicing cost will be more than the absolute dollars it takes in in taxes by the year 1995. We know that is very close down the road. It will pay out more in interest on the debt than it will accumulate in taxpayers' dollars. That leaves us with a sinkhole and to ask the question: What will ever become of this if we are not even able to pay the interest on the money that we are borrowing?

It would be easy for us to say that is the United States. It has its own problems and we have similarities but that is the way they do things in the U.S. Unfortunately recent figures indicate that per capita the U.S. debt ratio per person is 2.3 per cent while Canada's debt ratio is 4.8 per cent, roughly double.

We in this Chamber find that frightening. I can just imagine how that feels to Canadians out on the street who realize that their pay cheques are actually getting smaller and smaller. They wonder how they are going to pay their mortgages or buy blue jeans and Reeboks for their kids because they do not have the same amount of real dollars to spend as they did not long ago.

When I hear the government saying that it is cutting spending and that things are in much better shape than they were before I would just make mention of one specific instance. This is an example of where the government says it is saving so much money in costing contracts out for realty service for military members. This ERS service is a private company that is a wholesaling realty for military members as they are moving around within the country and even for those who are coming home now from the bases in Europe. This was touted as a program that was going to save taxpayers' dollars.

I have been in contact regularly with people in my constituency, realtors and non-realtors, who are very nervous about this ERS and the 30 per cent cut that would be delivered as a service fee or charge. This is enough to make a person really wonder about these actual programs that are being targeted to save taxpayers' dollars.

I would like the Minister of National Defence to have a look at this ERS and determine whether it really is a good program, whether it is something that is actually saving taxpayers' dollars or is it something that is perhaps working against what we are trying to accomplish here.

I will close my remarks by making an analogy to those of us who live on credit cards. I am sure every member in this House carries some sort of credit card. It is easy and convenient. However, if I say that my Visa bill is getting too high there is only one way for me to address that and that is to pay off my Visa bill without continuing to go around charging at various stores and putting more and more on my Visa bill. It would be easy for me to say that I can keep spending that money on it, but in order to balance that out I need to quit or cut my spending and my charging and at the same time pay off those bills. That is the only way that debt is ever going to go in the right direction.

I would advise the government to put a clamp on its Visa spending, to cut the government spending and continue to pay off this debt that is crippling us all.

Ms. Beth Phinney (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the chance to speak, even if it is only for a few minutes, on behalf of my constituents of Hamilton Mountain on Bill C–98, an act to provide additional borrowing authority for the fiscal year beginning April 1, 1992.

As the House leader for the Official Opposition, the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond, so eloquently stated earlier today, during the last election this Conservative government said: "Vote for us. We can manage the economy". If it was so able to manage the economy why was this Conservative Party about the only group in this country that felt it was a good time three years ago to impose a new tax, the GST? We were already in a recession. Canadians were already suffering. This Conservative government had already raised taxes over 30 times.

If the Conservatives were such good economic managers why did they impose such an unfair and badly timed tax: the GST, a tax that is costing three to four times more to collect than the former manufacturers' sales tax.

The GST is a tax that imposes a great deal of paperwork on businesses. It is a tax that has scared the consumer and slowed down purchasing right across Canada and, therefore, put many small businesses and manufacturers out of business. It is a tax that encouraged millions of Canadians to shop across the U.S.–Canada border affecting businesses in Canada. A loss of Canadian purchases meant a loss of jobs.

Obviously, before imposing the tax this Conservative government, which feels it can manage the economy, had not consulted meaningfully with Canadian taxpayers. It also had not taken enough time before imposing the GST to see if it was possible to administer. Therefore, we have had to put up with many changes, many of which have been made to make it easier for bureaucrats to collect this tax.

One could imagine that if this Conservative government could not recognize how much damage the GST was doing to the Canadian economy by listening to individual Canadians than bankruptcy statistics would have wakened it. This does not seem to have been the case.

Let us look at the bankruptcy statistics. Consumer bankruptcies in 1990, 42,782; 1992, 61,822. That is up 44 per cent in two years. Business bankruptcies in 1990, 11,642; 1991, 13,496; and 1992, 14,317. That is up 22 per cent in two years. Total bankruptcies in 1982, 41,843; 1990, 55,279; 1991, 75,773; 1992, 76,139. That is up 37 per cent in two years.

My constituents in Hamilton Mountain do not happen to think this government knows how to manage the economy; those who have lost their jobs, those who have lost their businesses, those who cannot afford to go to school, those who have been forced to retire early, those who cannot find jobs and those who need to go to soup kitchens tonight to get their dinner.

If this Conservative government still thinks it can manage the economy it should call an election and ask for once, consult for once, the Canadian people. Ask Canadians if they trust this government to lead them during the next four years.

My constituents do not want to give this government the right to borrow up to $8.2 billion. My constituents in Hamilton Mountain and I would guess that most Canadians want this Conservative government to call an election right now.

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, in the moments I have available to me to speak about this request for additional borrowing authority let me say a bit about the deficit and debt situation the government got us into. This is a request to borrow an additional $8.2 billion on behalf of the Government of Canada in addition to the borrowing authority that was granted to the government earlier in this financial year based upon the 1992 budget presented last February 25, almost a year ago now, by the current and then new Minister of Finance.

The fact that it has had to come forward and ask for more money is yet another in a series of failed projections on the part of this government in terms of its ability to forecast its revenues and expenditures for the financial years in advance. I find this chilling because $8 billion is a lot of money. It also comes from a government that from 1984 onward tried to make financial issues, particularly the reduction of the deficit, its credo.

Think back on some of those budgets. Think of May 1985 when the then Minister of Finance and current Minister for International Trade said: "This budget represents a major step toward controlling the growth of the federal debt". That was his first budget.

That in itself was an interesting time. Remember that the election was held in September 1984. In November 1984 the Minister of Finance got up and talked about how the previous government had been spending so badly. In fact he said: "If we do not bring in measures today the deficit by the end of next March will balloon to $34 billion". That is what the minister said in November.

Do you know what? By the end of March he had managed to jack the deficit up to $38 billion. That is $4 billion more than he said it would have been if he had not brought in the restraint measures that he did in November 1984.

What that means is that he spent every nickel, dime and quarter he could find up to the end of the March 31, 1985 fiscal year so that for evermore he could go around saying: "Look at the deficit the Liberals left us". That is completely hypocritical.

In February 1986 he brought in his second budget. What did he say then? "Over the last 18 months, concrete steps have been taken to correct the fiscal imbalance." On it goes to February 1988: "With the fiscal plan presented in this budget, the government sets out a solid five-year fiscal track of significant deficit reduction and debt control". That was before the election. Things got a little soft in election year, people will recall.

In the April 1989 budget, after the election, the Minister of Finance said: "Today we are acting. The government is bringing down a budget that will build for our future and not borrow from it". At that time the net public debt was about $320 billion. Since then, instead of borrowing from our future the minister has borrowed an additional $100 billion, not including the $8 billion he is asking for today.

In February 1990 the former Minister of Finance said: "Within five years the government will begin to buy back its bonds and treasury bills". On February 1991 he said: "We will put government finances firmly on the course to a balanced budget". As I say, last February the minister was still saying things like that. He finds himself today $8 billion short in his requirements for borrowing.

Let me go through some of these numbers because it is very interesting. Take for example the budget deficit for the year that ended in 1992. It came in at $34.6 billion. That was fully $4.1 billion more than had been predicted in the budget. It was just under $8 billion more than had been predicted two years earlier by the Minister of Finance.

Those kinds of projections and predictions have been repeated over and over. In the 1990–91 fiscal year the actual deficit was $30.5 billion. In June 1983, when he wanted to be Prime Minister, do you know what the Prime Minister said it was going to be? He said it would be $3.1 billion. It was only 10 times bigger. I guess maybe that is close enough for Tory finance.

On it goes. The budget deficit of this year, 1993–94, has had a number of predictions made for it. In April 1989 the government said that the 1994 deficit, the year upcoming, would be $15 billion. In 1990 it said it would be $14 billion. In 1991 it said it would be $16.6 billion. In 1992 it said it would be $22.5 billion. In December in the economic statement, do you know what it said? It said it was going to be $32.6 billion for the current year. They said in December 1992 that the deficit was going to come in at $34.4 billion. What was the budget prediction? It was $27.5 billion.

What did the government say before? In February 1992 it had said that this year's deficit, instead of $34 billion, was going to be $24 billion. What did it say back in the budget of February 1988 for this year? Remember it is coming in at $34.4 billion and the government said it would be $29.5 billion.

What a complete hash of the public finances of Canada has been made by this government. How it can continue to put forward platforms that talk about fiscal restraint, responsibility and meeting its budget targets is beyond me.

Not to say that hypocrisy belongs solely to the governing party. There is a lot of hypocrisy I have heard today in various debates coming from the left as well. When the NDP talks about budget deficits, being from Ontario I can say it knows what it is talking about.

Listen to what the leader of the NDP said on February 8 in Montreal. She was talking about Bill C-91. She said the Liberals in the Senate could have defeated the bill if they wanted to. They could have defeated it "but they chose not to". In fact, listen to these numbers. When the Senate voted on that bill 75 per cent of the Liberal senators were present to vote. When the bill was before the House of Commons—listen to them sing—out of 44 NDP members only 29 bothered to show up and vote. That is exactly what the NDP is all about.

I am sorry time has run out because I know my colleagues to the left want to hear more about the NDP record, particularly in Ontario, but we will leave it at that for today.

What is clear is that the problems of the deficit and the debt that are compounding in Canada at the federal level and provincially have to be addressed in a co-operative and clear way before it is too late.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Bonavista—Trinity—Conception—Canadian Forces Reserve; the hon. member for Trinity—Spadina—Immigration; the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce—Immigration and Refugee Board; the hon. member for Winnipeg—St. James—Grain Industry; the hon. member for New Westminster—Burnaby—Economic Statement.

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, as others have said, it is quite remarkable after this government's record on the economy and the deficit that it would be coming to this House to borrow even more money rather than addressing the concerns of the Canadian economy and addressing the concerns of Canadians to turn this economy around.

Rather than admit errors in the past, admit errors in economic policy, or the lack of economic policy, this government continues on the same track. It is not only satisfied to lose half a million Canadian jobs to the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement but is pursuing further free trade agreements with Mexico with the risk of yet further job losses and further businesses going under.

Rather than admit to the errors of the past which have given rise to 1.6 million Canadians on unemployment insurance and over four million Canadians having to rely upon social programs in order to live, this government continues on the same path of increasing the deficit and increasing the debt, rather than bringing Canada's economy into sufficient shape so that we can pay off those debts which were accrued during years of Liberal federal governments and added to by Conservative federal governments.

In contrast, one might look at the Governments of Saskatchewan, 31 years of CCF and NDP governments with balanced budgets. Not one budget was not balanced in those 31 years of government in Saskatchewan. However, with seven years of Liberal government in the middle with deficits and nine years of Grant Devine's Conservatives with record deficits Saskatchewan was left with the highest per capita debt in the country.

What it proves is that if we have Liberal and Conservative governments we have debts; we have long-term debt and we have deficits. If we have NDP governments faced with a reasonable situation when they start we have the opportunity for balanced budgets.

For the first time in a decade in the province of Saskatchewan the deficit is being brought under control, at great difficulty because of federal off-loading on to the provinces, on which I will comment in a minute.

Of course the problems faced by the government of Premier Rae in Ontario arose initially from the huge debt left by the Liberal government of Premier Peterson. The record is quite clear on that. Any Liberal member who wants to read about it and find out about it can do so.

In Saskatchewan, my province, we are faced with considerable problems arising from the economic policy and the fiscal and monetary policies of the federal government. Times are very tough in the province of Saskatchewan as a result of years of off-loading by the federal government on to the province. The government of Premier Romanow is faced with having to pay off these debts so that we can get the banks and the bonding agencies off our backs and we can take charge of our own province again. Fighting against this Conservative government, fighting against this off-loading, makes this extremely difficult.

We should not forget that the off-loading on to the provinces, the reneging of federal responsibilities toward the provinces, began with the last Liberal government, which in terms of EPF funding made three major cuts to the provinces. Again we see not only Liberal and Conservative governments generating debt and deficit but we also see them at the federal level following the same policy of transferring federal government debt on to the provinces and of reneging on federal responsibilities generally unilaterally, placing a huge burden on the province of Saskatchewan.

In terms of accumulated cuts in established programs funding by both Liberal and Conservative governments, we see almost $1.2 billion taken away from the moneys which would otherwise have gone to the province of Saskatchewan to provide services to its people. With regard to economic development we see reductions of over $20 million per year from the level of federal government funding.

In terms of agriculture we see off-loading by the federal government on to the province which will require the province to pay an extra $232 million or almost $233 million in 1991-92 and $215 million in 1992-93.

In almost every area of activity which has an impact on the people of Saskatchewan this government and the Liberal government before it transferred enormous burdens totalling billions of dollars. Indeed last year alone the Saskatchewan projected deficit at about $500 million was pretty much equal to the off-loading from the federal government on to the province. But for that off-loading Saskatchewan would have a balanced budget in spite of its huge accumulated debt.

In addition to these very open shifts of responsibility and shifts of burden to the provinces there are others that have added to the burden of the people of Saskatchewan and constituted a reneging of federal government responsibility.

Turning to the Drug Patent Act which was passed in the Senate recently and to which the former speaker made reference, we note that 38 Conservative members in that other House voted in favour of the drug patent legislation and 31 Liberals voted against it. If all the Liberal senators had been there this bill could have been killed.

The Liberals make a big fuss of fighting the patent drug bill in this House and then when they have the opportunity to defeat it and actually make a decision to benefit Canadians they avoid that responsibility.

The drug patent changes threaten the very existence of the Saskatchewan drug plan, as the finance minister of Saskatchewan has indicated. Again this adds to the burden of the people of Saskatchewan.

Unemployment insurance changes will mean that in 1992-93 an additional $19.4 million will be added to the taxation burdens of Saskatchewan, another loss from the federal government. In terms of law enforcement it is over $1.5 million extra because of changes to RCMP policies. The list goes on and on.

It is remarkable this government would ask to borrow more money when it increased taxes on ordinary Canadians while it provided extra breaks to those who are better off, increased the accumulated debt and cut services. How can the government's financial situation be so bad when taxes have gone up and services have gone down? Yet the debt goes up. How can this be?

In conclusion, the thrust and the impact on Saskatchewan have been disastrous. Clearly the only approach for the government to take is to change its approach to the economy. Instead of being obsessed with inflation, interest rates and so on, it should start thinking about Canadians, those 1.6 million Canadians who do not have jobs, those 1.6 million Canadians who are not able to provide for their families in the way in which anyone would hope to do.

Rather than follow free trade policies which do not work it is time that the government changed and listened to what New Democrat governments and federal New Democrats are talking about, that is to put job creation first to get the economy working.

If we look at the numbers we see that for every unemployed person in Canada the economy suffers to the extent of $55,000. If we put one more person back to work the economy of Canada benefits to that extent. If we put one more person back to work, even in terms of government revenues the government would be $17,500 better off. Yet the concentration has nothing to do with job creation. It is following the big business international corporate agenda of free trade.

It really is time the government put Canadians first, started to create jobs and got this economy moving.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, we are talking today about borrowing an additional $8.2 billion.

Canadians were told that the GST revenues were going toward paying off the debt. Some portions of the debt have been paid off. Today we are talking about reborrowing that money, not benefiting from having paid off some our debt.

Canadians are asking some very legitimate questions. How come we are paying 38 new taxes? How come individual working Canadians are paying more than their share of taxes eight years ago? How come we have the GST which is supposed to generate revenues and fix the fiscal situation in this country? How come we are paying more and getting less? Those are questions Canadians are asking themselves. My colleague from Ottawa South has done an excellent job of demonstrating that there is only one answer to that question and the answer is mismanagement by this government.

The member for Ottawa South documented repeated promises in every budget this government has brought forward since 1985: "We are putting in place tough new fiscal policies; we are charging you more and we are giving you less because we have to bring down the debt and we have to bring down the deficit".

The bill before us today does neither of those things. It adds $8.2 billion to the debt and it adds billions more to the deficit.

After eight years of saying this was the way to bring down the debt and the deficit, one would think that maybe the government would get the message that its plan is not working. It did not work in 1985. It did not work in 1986. It has not worked in any year since, and it is not working now.

Perhaps the government would like to tell us why we now do 25 per cent of our borrowing outside this country. Why are its policies shifting $22 billion in interest paid on that debt out of Canada, out of the Canadian economy, out of where it might do some good by creating jobs and creating economic growth for Canadians? Every day $22 billion is going out of the country because of its borrowing policies.

Not only that, but assuming a 50 per cent tax rate that is $11 billion in taxes Canadians are not collecting because foreign lenders do not pay taxes in Canada on the interest we pay them. Because of the foreign borrowing policies of this government $33 billion are lost to the Canadian economy.

We had a statement in December that was a repeat of the same old promises: "We have to toughen up. We have to tighten up. We have to get tougher on Canadians so that we can bring down the debt and the deficit". After hearing that for eight consecutive years Canadians are not believing it any more. Even the Conference Board of Canada is not believing it.

In its recent report the Conference Board of Canada indicated that the government's economic statement is contradictory: While on the one hand it is in a minor way stimulating the economy and predicting 2 per cent growth in the GDP this year, on the other hand it is freezing wages and cutting UI payments. The Conference Board of Canada says the effect of that is to dampen economic growth.

Two measures alone, the changes in UI payment and the freeze on Public Service wages, will cut projected growth this year by 10 per cent. The Conference Board of Canada goes on to issue another warning. The provinces are squeezed by this government for money, by this government which has opted out of its cost sharing agreement with the provinces. If the provinces have to make up the shortfall by also freezing wages, perhaps even to hospitals and municipalities, it will have a further dampening effect on economic growth.

Does it make sense when this country is trying to pull out of a recession, when the government keeps telling Canadians we are pulling out of a recession, to have the government putting in place measures that are going to make it more difficult to pull out of the recession?

I want to shift for a few minutes to the impact on people. I see that impact on people every Friday when I am in my constituency office meeting with constituents. At least half those meetings are dedicated to people who do not have jobs. Highly educated people who have held highly responsible positions are out of work, have used up all their UI entitlements and are now on welfare. They are trying to keep a family together, trying to keep a home together, or trying to keep the kids in university. In some cases they are trying to keep the kids from dropping out of high school to go to work and support the family. They are desperate. There is despair in this country. There is anger because of the policies of this government.

I meet with young people fresh out of school. They have done everything we told them to do. They got educated and trained but they cannot find a job. They see themselves with no future. That is what the policies of this government have done.

I talk to people who all their lives, despite a lack of education, have been able to get one job and if they lost it then get another job. They have survived and they have managed very well. Suddenly toward the end of their working lives they are desperate because they do not see that other job coming. They are asking themselves what they have worked so hard for all their lives. They are asking why they have paid taxes to a country that they thought was the best country in the world and then there is no room for them to work.

We cannot overestimate the demoralizing effect this is having, the way in which it is undermining the very fabric of our society. People see their money being stripped from them because they were wise enough to save for their old age and provide for their own retirement. They see no future for their children.

The middle income families in my riding are despairing because they are seeing their property taxes rise as a direct result of the policies of this government. It has said it will not use the unemployment insurance scheme to take care of people who lose their jobs but will expect the municipalities to do that through the welfare system.

Many of these people who see their property taxes increasing to meet an obligation of this government are themselves unemployed. People sense that something has gone terribly wrong with this country. They want back the belief they had in this country, the belief they had in the future. They want back the confidence that we can keep building a good future for our children. That is what this government has robbed them of.

They know they are not even getting the straight goods. This government says on one hand it is collecting $28 billion in GST and on the other hand it is collecting $29 billion. It cannot account for a billion dollars when people are being overtaxed, when there is no money to invest in science and research, and when commitments made to protect the environment are being broken everyday. One way or another we are taking nearly $30 billion out of the economy through the GST, but how much are we actually getting in revenue? We are getting $15 billion in revenue. Is that a sensible tax when we collect twice as much as we really need? Where is the other $15 billion going?

These are big amounts we are talking about. Canadians want some accountability and responsibility because they know they cannot trust the promises of this government. It has done exactly the opposite of everything it said it would try to do.

We see small businesses going out of business. The main generators of new jobs in this country are going bankrupt at an alarming rate. We are failing in every way to invest in our future. We are failing to invest in our young people. We are failing to invest in knowledge. We are failing to invest in cleaning up our world.

There is despair in the country and it is a result of the false promises and total lack of performance of this government. It is time for a cleansing. It is time for a change. It is time for some honesty and straight talk with Canadians. It is time for a government that wants to fix the problems.

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint–Léonard): Mr. Speaker, I also appreciate this opportunity to take part in the debate on Bill C–98, an act to provide additional borrowing authority for the fiscal year beginning on April 1, 1992 and soon to end on March 31, 1993.

For more than eight years I have had the privilege of representing the constituents of the riding of Saint–Léonard in this House. I remember during the election campaign in 1988 when the Conservative Party said clearly that it would put the government's financial house in order, reduce the deficit, reduce the debt and create jobs. All Canadians will remember the slogan: Jobs, jobs, jobs. Today, in the fifth year of this government's second term if we look at what the government has been able to achieve and at our situation as a nation, we see we have more than 1.5 million unemployed, any number of food banks, more than two million people on welfare, and I could go on about the homeless and the rest.

If we look at the Public Accounts, on March 31, 1984 the deficit was around $34 billion. According to the forecasts of the Minister of Finance, not those he gave in the February budget last year but the revised forecasts he gave last fall, on March 31, 1993 we will have a deficit of $34 billion. This comes after an economic recovery, more than 30 tax increases and new taxes and steep fee increases for federal services, including immigration, citizenship and passports. These are all taxes in disguise, and in fact government revenues have increased. Sales of Crown corporations, tax increases and increases in fees for federal services are all increases in revenue.

However, after eight years and some months, we have a deficit that is more or less the same as when they came to power, and we have a debt that has more than doubled. This government has been a complete failure as far as financial administration is concerned. It has also put us in a financial situation that will paralyse us for years to come, because a substantial percentage of our debt is not owed to Canadians but to foreign countries, which will make it very difficult for us to have a Canadian monetary policy.

The hon. member said earlier that it was a matter of people, and I agree that behind the figures I just mentioned are human beings who are affected by the decisions we make here, by everything we do on whatever side of the House we happen to be. In fact, I would like to share my experience of last Sunday. Two government ministers, the Minister of Employment and Immigration and the Minister of Justice, said we were separatists. No one is more of a federalist than the member for Saint-Denis, the member for Westmount, the member for LaSalle—Emard or myself. I do not have to prove that I stand for Canada. I make this aside just to correct some things that were said.

I went there that Sunday because some constituents had asked me to go and I wanted to support them and be there with them, even though the weather was bitter cold. When it is -25C it is quite something to walk from Lafontaine Park to the Guy Favreau Complex at the corner of Jeanne Mance and René Lévesque Boulevard.

But what did I notice on seeing that crowd? You can challenge the figures but I can tell you that there were a lot of people there. I never saw such a demonstration. We could sense their frustration. It was a cry of alarm because people cannot take it anymore. I am sure that all members, whether on the government side or in opposition, sense that frustration when we are in our riding offices. We meet people who are on welfare because they have lost their job and no longer qualify for unemployment insurance, so they cannot pay the rent and feed their family and their children. Some people who lose their jobs do not qualify for welfare when their unemployment insurance runs out because they have a small property, like their own house. It is hard when we meet them.

What I noted is that the demonstration was against all this. It was not just against the changes to unemployment insurance. It was against the policies of this government in the past eight years. They have had enough. That was why they were sounding the alarm.

After this demonstration, an editorial writer, Alain Dubuc, well described the feelings behind it. I would like to quote this editorial from La Presse of February 9, 1993, entitled "Cry of Anger":

> For a long time we had not seen 50,000 people in the streets of Montreal for anything other than a celebration. Those mainly responsible for this feat are not the big labour bodies that organized Sunday's demonstration against Bill C-105 but the Conservative government which handed them this mobilizing issue on a silver platter.
> With minor amendments, Brian Mulroney and the minister, Bernard Valcourt, could easily have short-circuited the opposition.
> Most Canadians and Quebecers are not opposed to the basic purpose of this law, that the government refuses to pay unemployment benefits to people who choose to quit their job and not to work. The debate is not on that principle, but on the way the bill would be implemented, especially the risk of bureaucratic errors and abuse by employers.
> The real mystery is that the federal government did not agree to make these relatively simple changes that would not have affected the underlying logic of the bill. If Mr. Valcourt had been open, he could also have dispelled some fears that are not always founded.
> Ottawa's attitude is hard to explain, except that we are already in the period leading up to a federal election. It is quite possible that the Conservatives' intransigence is not a blunder but part of a strategy. Confrontation with the unions and the left that is close to the NDP certainly does not hurt the Conservatives. On the contrary, this polarization helps the Conservatives bring back right-wing voters who had been drawn to the Reform Party.
> This would be a sly calculation if the upsurge of anger as seen in Montreal on Sunday concerned only the technicalities of Bill C-105. That is not the case. This indignation is also due to the image of > insensitivity of a government that is zealous in this bill after it made a virtue of not acting to help the unemployed or speed the recovery.

> On the contrary, this anger is likely to bring people together, whether they are on the right or on the left, because unemployment and uncertainty affect them regardless of party label.

This editorial reflects pretty well the feelings of those who took part in that demonstration. How many times have we in the opposition and the Leader of the Opposition asked the government to present an infrastructure project? It answers that it cannot act because it lacks the necessary funds. But when it comes to crushing the unemployed we saw the insensitivity of the Minister of Employment and Immigration today. When he was asked how much it cost to hire 100 more investigators in 1992 he replied: "I don't know. It's not important". The important thing for him is that hiring these additional investigators saved the unemployment insurance system $200 million. This $200 million does not have a human face; he did not care about the human side. The government has always neglected to put people first.

[English]

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, needless to say in standing to oppose Bill C-98, I am standing to oppose the failure of this administration to deal effectively with the major responsibility that it has and that is to deal responsibly with the tax revenues in this country. This bill is an admission of that failure.

This year's deficit is over $7 billion higher than was projected. Next year the deficit is projected to be about $32.6 billion which is twice the amount that was projected last year. If we look at the interest payments alone over the next couple of years we are looking at over $40 billion in interest payments on the debt alone.

That has to be an admission of failure. The government is broke. It is out of money. It has to come back to the House for approval to borrow more money to continue to do its job and do it inadequately.

We are basically being asked to write a rubber cheque. I think the members on this side of the House find that particularly problematic. The fact that the government has to come to the House and extend its borrowing authority through this bill is an admission of the failure of the last nine years of its administration.

Actually it goes back even more. Let us not blame it all on this government. When it came into power in 1984 it was already dealing with a deficit that was spiralling out of control because of the fiscal mismanagement of its predecessor which was the Liberal government of that time. It had ballooned the deficit to I believe some $179 billion in 1979-80.

Unfortunately, rather than dealing with the deficit and bringing that deficit down to manageable levels, it has taken that debt and more than doubled it from $179 billion to today where we have an accumulated debt of over $400 billion facing Canadians. It is an admission of failure.

I can recall when the Prime Minister was first elected some nine years ago. In his first speech to the House of Commons he made the comment: "Give us 20 years and you will not recognize this country". We have only had nine years and looking around we already do not recognize the Canada we have today compared to the Canada we had before this government came into power.

It has been nine years of fiscal mismanagement, nine years of misdirected priorities, nine years of economic failure. The Canadian people are tired of the misplaced directions this government has led this nation, all the while touting itself as a responsible financial manager.

This is nothing if not a legacy of failure. It has continued to follow the divine rule of supply side management, the trickle down theory, where if we loosen up the tax policies for those at the top echelons of society, the wealthy individuals, the large corporations, if we loosen up the purse strings and allow them to keep more of their revenue by reducing their tax structure then they will be able to blossom economically and the rest of the country will follow along in suit. That is known as the trickle down theory. It has not worked.

I think I speak on behalf of all Canadians when I say that Canadians have been trickled on enough and are tired of the policies of this administration. They are tired of the Reaganomics this government has practised over the past nine years. Look at our neighbours to the south. We have had a change in the political winds. President Clinton has recognized full well that there needs to be a substantial change in the economic policies and priorities of our neighbours to the south. That is why President Bush was kicked out of office. It was because the Americans were tired of that same kind of economic mismanagement.

• (1650)

This is a doomed policy. This government by following the policy is doomed to relegate itself to the dustbin of history. It is proof that we cannot wring out of the economy an economic recovery by strangling the very social programs which provide the safety net for those people during tough times.

The government has targeted our social programs, unemployment insurance and the income assistance programs as being the culprits for the reason it is having such difficulty balancing the books. I want to say that only 6 per cent of our debt load is actually due to the cost of social programs.

When we break down the debt load of this country and analyse where most of the debt has accumulated from we see that over 40 per cent of that debt has resulted from compounded interest. While this government continued to follow a high interest rate policy it was burdening itself with an increasingly higher debt and it had less and less ability to follow.

The remainder of our debt is simply due to the failure of this government to recover the tax revenues that were due and payable to it by its corporate friends across Canada who stuck billions of dollars away in deferred tax payments, through tax loopholes and other schemes such as the billions of dollars that have been hidden away in family trusts. It does not cancel those. It does not close those loopholes. It does not say to the corporate sector of Canada that it is time to pay its fair share.

What government does is burden the unemployed by bringing in Draconian new measures which are going to decrease the insurance that our unemployed Canadians have had as a kind of safety net to get them through these tough times. They are burdening Canada's weakest element, our unemployed Canadians, those who have been out of work for some time by cutting back on the very programs that provide them some degree of security.

It is proof that this kind of policy direction does not work, has not worked and will not work in the future.

The debt problem has been made a lot worse because of the implementation of the free trade agreement back in 1988–89. When that agreement was brought into force overnight we lost over $2.2 billion in tax revenues that should have come to the Crown but no longer did because of the reduced tariffs. That was immediately. Over the years that have followed we have lost billions and billions of dollars in taxes as a result of the reduced tariff structure. Above and beyond that we have lost over 500,000 jobs which directly or indirectly are attributable to the impact and the implementation of the free trade agreement in Canada.

We have had an economic haemorrhaging of tax revenues and an economic haemorrhaging in terms of job losses in this country, which is scandalous to say the least. As well we have hundreds of businesses moving south. Those jobs will not come back to Canada. They are gone. They are gone for good. We are undergoing an economic revolution in this country in terms of the restructuring that is taking place. The jobs that are leaving are leaving for good. They will not be back and we have to find some way of regenerating some sort of economic growth in light of that reality.

We have permanent restructuring going on in this country and the government talks about the need to become competitive. I do not disagree with that. We do need to become competitive. But the policies this administration is trying to implement in order to develop competitiveness in this country are in the wrong direction.

The tools for competitiveness in a knowledge based, information based economy are the tools that are put into the hands of people to generate the skills, and the training, the knowledge, the research and development that is necessary to develop the kind of knowledge–based, information–based infrastructure society needs today to compete with those highly developed communities throughout the Pacific rim and the other countries we are competing with on a global basis.

This government has not recognized that. Instead it continues to cut funding to our provinces, to cut the cost shared programs. It is strangling the economy rather than finding ways of investing in our economy to put people back to work and create the long–lasting knowledge–based jobs that are required if this country is ever going to be front and centre with a competitive and vibrant structure in our global economy.

This is the wrong direction the government is taking. It is going to suffer when it comes to an election because the people of Canada are no longer willing to put up with the mistaken policies and the mistaken economic direction this government has followed.

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, I would like to use the few minutes that are left to address the questions raised by this bill to extend the borrowing authority of the government and to provide for some $8 billion. As many speakers have indicated, that reflects an increase in the actual deficit for this fiscal year from the $27.5 billion originally estimated to the present estimate of $34.4 billion.

It is interesting to note what is the chief source of this increase in the estimated deficit. It is attributable to an $8 billion decrease in revenue. To what is that attributable? Fundamentally, it is attributable to the fact that we now have 1.5 million people unemployed. It is attributable to the fact that we had 76,000 bankruptcies last year. In my own home town of Windsor, where the unemployment rate is 14 per cent, there is an indication of the damage this government has done to the economy which is ultimately that to which the problem must be attributed.

I want to put emphasis on the fact that in Windsor the unemployment rate among youth is 25 per cent.

An hon. member: Shameful.

Mr. McCurdy: It is 25 per cent. We know that we have been overwhelmed with all kinds of means to save money, mostly consisting of a tax on the unemployed. I just want to take this opportunity to suggest to the government it did not need to attack the unemployed. I say that because of the savings which have been generated in the financial statement, most of which come from changes in UI: $500 million from a decrease in the percentage of wages that will be paid through UI and another $300 million by virtue of the Draconian attack that expresses itself in attempts, for example, to mount the PC KGB.

What the government might have done, just to give a few examples, is to take a look at the meals and entertainment expense deduction, which is worth about $1 billion. Actually, I think it would be very useful to have spies to count the escorts that are being paid for by our taxpayers through those deductions.

Perhaps it should look at the private family trust tax break which was generated not by the Tories but by the Liberals. By the way, that tax break was among a bunch of tax breaks generated in the 1970s by the previous government to help the rich and help the corporations that are cutting back on those things we need now which contributes to the problems we have. Take a look at that.

How about the tax cheaters? How about the fraudulent taxes? How about the shell game that goes on among multinationals to cheat Canadians out of taxes?

Yes, there is an alternative. The real alternative is the New Democrats and their leader.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Call in the members.

And the division bells having rung:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Order, please. The government Whip has advised me that the vote will be deferred until Monday at six o'clock p.m.

It being five o'clock p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 36, the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS

FISHERIES

GRAND BANKS

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should take immediate action to extend custodial jurisdiction for northern cod over the nose and tail of the Grand Banks.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak to this motion that has been in the making for a long time. I want to read the motion again. It reads:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should take immediate action to extend custodial jurisdiction for northern cod over the nose and tail of the Grand Banks.

This is a private members' motion that I put forward. It is not the first time this subject has been discussed in the House. There have been emergency debates on it. There have been opposition days and in the last four and a quarter years—I did a quick tally before I came to the House today—the subject has come up very close to 50 times one way or another.

This will be a votable motion so I would enjoin my colleagues from all sides of the House to pay attention to what we are discussing here because they are going to have to vote yea or nay on this subject.

Anybody watching this debate right now may say: "Well, why is this subject coming up at this particular point in time?" I will explain why it is coming up at this particular point in time. I came to this House 50 months ago and made a speech in which I talked the about necessity for Canada to take control of its fishing area. I talked particularly about taking control over the nose and tail of the Grand Banks which traditionally for 500 years have been part of the Newfoundland fishery and the Canadian fishery.

I have used almost every occasion in this House when the subject of fisheries has come up to encourage the House and Parliament to approve the motion so that Canada could control its straddling stocks of groundfish, particularly northern cod.

It has been a fixation with many that this be done. I am not saying that this is my only mission here but when I campaigned to come to this House of Commons, I had two concerns. I stated them and they are on the record. One was my opposition not to free trade but to the free trade agreement as it was negotiated. The second one was my concern that we should as soon as possible establish Canadian jurisdiction over the nose and tail of the Grand Banks.

I have given many speeches and my colleague behind me has given many speeches, as I said earlier. We have attacked it from the chronology of why we want it. We went through the chronology of the fact that Canada is in a unique position because it has a unique and large gradual continental shelf that goes out to 200 miles. In certain cases, it goes beyond. That is what makes this case unique.

We have argued that in an international court of law. International marine law is conducted differently from civil law and we have made the case, I am confident, that this motion is doable. We can go before the Court of International Justice and Marine Law and plead our case. We could have done so years ago. If we could have done it then we at least could do it now.

In an effort to perhaps try a different approach to convince my colleague and this House to take this action and to vote positively on this, let me work it backward. Let me explain where we are now, why we are where we are now and what this motion will do to perhaps alleviate the situation.

On July 2, 1992 the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans announced a two-year moratorium on northern cod. This is a migratory straddling stock off the coast of Newfoundland in NAFO, the Northwest Atlantic Fisheries Organization, area 2J-3KL. The 3KL area is adjacent to my riding and to the northeast coast of Newfoundland.

The government established this moratorium in the belief that a complete closure now offered the only chance for the spawning biomass of the northern cod stock to recover quickly to long-term average levels.

The estimate was that 9,000 fishermen and 10,000 plant workers and trawlermen would be thrown out of work as a result of this moratorium. The Atlantic Provinces Chamber of Commerce believes that the moratorium will affect 80,000 people in the Atlantic region, including 60,000 people in Newfoundland and Labrador. I have to add sadly that in a part of the country where a steady job is a status symbol this is atrocious. It is sad.

This is an unprecedented step. It will go down in history as an unprecedented move by any government. History will record why it was necessary. Let me explain why it was necessary. We have as a result of this action Canadian trawlers that are secured to the dock and processing plants that are closed. Foreign fleets can still fish with impunity outside the 200-mile zone.

The concern is that the European Community countries have more than overstepped their mark. They have more than caught their quotas and have more than ignored the warnings, the admonitions and yes, the diplomatic efforts of this government to cease and desist.

For the record, I want to give you some indication of how badly these transgressions have been. Since 1986 the European Community has consistently exceeded its quotas allocated by the Northwest Atlantic Fisheries Organization. I will use the abbreviation NAFO. It has no less than plundered the cod stock. NAFO, I should explain, is responsible for managing 10 fish stocks, groundfish, off the northeast coast of Newfoundland.

In 1986 Spain and Portugal in particular, which were new members, began setting their own quotas of the NAFO-managed stock and on northern cod, which is recognized as a Canadian stock.

Here are some examples: In 1986 the European Community's NAFO quota for all groundfish species—and I will round the figures off—was 26,000 tonnes. What was the catch? One hundred and eleven thousand tonnes. Between 1987 and 1991 the quotas totalled 90,000 tonnes but they reported catches of 270,000 tonnes.

In 1990 the European Community fleet scooped up 98,000 tonnes of groundfish worth more than $100 million. This amount was 82,000 tonnes in excess of the NAFO allocation. Non-NAFO fleets took an additional 40,000. The impact of this overfishing has been devastating.

The scope of this piracy was even greater when their catches of northern cod are singled out. It had a northern cod quota of 9,500 tonnes in both years of 1986 and 1987 and was not allocated any quotas beyond; 1988, 1989, 1990 and 1991. Yet, during this six-year period the European Community harvested more than 220,000 tonnes. I have to say now that a thousand tonnes of cod relates purely to about 30 to 40 jobs. If we look at the seasonal nature of the industry it works out to about 100 full-time jobs. So a thousand tonnes is 100 jobs. I just talked about plundering 220,000 tonnes.

During this six-year period the Canadian total allowable catch for northern cod fell by 28 per cent, from 266,000 tonnes to 199,000 tonnes. The European Community increased its effort by 30 per cent and our total allowable catch was reduced by 30 per cent, to speak in rough figures.

As deplorable as this is, what was the government in power doing at the time? A good question. Let me describe what it has done.

In response to this blatant overfishing the European Community had been denied allocations of non-surplus stocks in Canadian waters. Then we had the constant travel across the Atlantic by the external affairs minister and the minister of fisheries. We had members of the diplomatic corps and civil servants from the Department of External Affairs, and indeed politicians, going across in the last four years to try to get the message across to the European Community countries that we will not be able to withstand this, it must stop overfishing. It is like telling a child that he or she cannot do something, and yet not resorting to any form of carrot and stick philosophy.

The Conservative government continued to place its faith in NAFO, oblivious to the fact that this has been shown to be a feeble organization with absolutely no powers of enforcement.

NAFO instituted a hail system in which the fishing vessels were required to report when they entered or left NAFO zones. The system was intended to make it more difficult to misrepresent or under-report catches. Violators would be answerable only to the authorities in their native countries. If you transgress against Canada go back to Spain or Portugal and see what your government wants to do about it.

Here is another example of the stick and carrot method and how effective this was: The European Community was assigned a patrol vessel to the northwest Atlantic for seven months in 1991. The idea of the vessel was to complement Canada's aerial surveillance outside the 200-mile zone, specifically in the nose and tail of the banks.

However, in this seven-month period there were no reports of any arrests by this patrol vessel during its tour of duty.

After countless efforts by the government, countless speeches and countless efforts by this side of the House to enforce Canadian jurisdiction over the nose and tail of the banks, that little portion outside the 200-mile zone that we have not been able to control, on December 21, 1992, when everybody was away starting their Christmas holidays on the Monday of Christmas week, the government came out with a press release. It said: "Finally an agreement has been reached to end serious and long-standing fishing problems with the European Community".

What did all this mean? It meant that the European Community one more time said it was not going to transgress against NAFO allocations and was not going to catch any fish. Why was it not going to catch any fish? There is no fish there to catch. It is a perfectly logical thing for the European Community to do. When all our fish have disappeared the trawlers are tied up and Newfoundland and Atlantic Canadian fishermen cannot go fishing any more. Is it any wonder that the European Community agree with our government who says: "If you promise not to fish, we will do a whole bunch of things for you".

One of the things we did was to open up our ports to these communities because they are not going to fish anymore. I wonder if they went out to fish off the Grand Banks what they would catch. The House of Commons is not the place to say what I hope they would catch.

As I understand this agreement, the Europeans have agreed to Canadian observers but only on 10 per cent of their boats. This means that when they decide to fish, when the fish stocks come back, and perhaps even before our trawlermen get out to fish, on 90 per cent of their ships, fishing boats and vessels they will fish unobserved.

The minister of fisheries is quoted as saying in the local newspaper in St. John's, Newfoundland: "We have every protection in this agreement". Closer to the truth is that this enthusiastic attempt to convince Canadians is not very convincing in my mind.

How can we pretend to get very much that is reasonable out of those who have always been so blatantly unreasonable and, as the restrictions on the observers suggest, will continue to be so. The best thing about this deal announced on Christmas week is that it can be cancelled with 60 days notice.

An identical motion to this was put forward by the opposition on March 12 and unfortunately it was defeated by the government. I would have to say in the presence of my colleagues that the Liberal caucus has consistently called upon the government to implement NAFO's powers of enforcement. Otherwise the relevance of the organization must be questioned, and that is exactly what I am doing today. I am questioning that relevance.

The Liberal Party has stated that in the event these initiatives fail Canada must move to attain functional fisheries jurisdiction over the entire continental shelf, which would include the nose and tail of the banks. That is what my motion reflects.

Roughly one year ago at a policy convention a resolution was passed with the stick-handling of many of us on this side of the House. The entire convention agreed with the resolution that the Government of Canada should move toward international negotiations, and failing that unilaterally declare that the nose and tail of the Grand Banks falls within Canada's economic zone.

I have spent a lot of time and effort with international lawyers asking them if this is possible. I admit there is not total agreement. This is a judgment thing. Which side your judgment comes down on I suppose might rest on which side of the House you sit. I hope not because it is my belief that when you go forward to the International Marine Court of Justice and argue your case the precedent allows you to argue on the future of a country's economy and the future of the people who are affected by that economy.

If it had been decided when I first did my research on this five years ago that it was worth a try, and Canada may well be successful at a time when our northern cod stocks were declining, I would have to conclude that at a point in time when Canadian fishermen must remain, alongside and plants had to be closed because foreign overfishing among other things has been a major factor in causing this moratorium. Were an international court of justice—as I understand it is to consider it and follow the four precedents that pertain in this case, it is my belief we could win our case.

There is no question it would take a lot of time. It would take a lot of talent. It would take a lot of negotiation but the name of the game is to try to say that we are going to do it. Put your back behind the wheel and put your case forward because I can assure you one thing, it is like buying a lotto ticket. If you do not buy a ticket you cannot win. If we do not put our case forward we will never know whether we will be able to control our own fisheries, in this case specifically the nose and tail of the banks.

As I draw to a close my address on this motion, I believe it is one of the motions put forward in this House which if voted affirmatively could have the most positive action on Atlantic Canada in restoring our fishery and restoring our custodial management of those stocks and those resources that affect, in the words of the Chamber of Commerce, 80,000 Canadians. I urge our members and our colleagues to join me and vote when the time comes in support of this important and key motion.

Mr. Ross Belsher (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, I wish to speak in response to the speech of the hon. member for Bonavista—Trinity—Conception. I know he speaks passionately about this subject. He also speaks about a subject of which he has had a lot of firsthand experience from people in his own constituency, and I am sure he has sailed on the Grand Banks as well.

I have not, but I have been out on the Pacific. I have been where the salmon on the west coast traverse and on the rivers they go up to spawn as well. The Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and the minister responsible for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency has risen in this House on more than one occasion to describe what would happen if Canada unilaterally extended the custodial jurisdiction for cod or any species beyond the 200-mile limit.

Such gunboat diplomacy would be in violation of international agreements. The hon. member opposite is thinking in terms of gunboat diplomacy because he comes from that milieu, from a long history of being in the navy and they understand that kind of diplomacy.

I feel it would invite retaliatory action and would threaten the co-operation we are succeeding in obtaining from many states in efforts to promote sustainable development of fisheries resources on the high seas.

I would like to outline for hon. members opposite and for all members in this House two of our most recent achievements toward that goal. The first, and the member opposite has alluded to it, is the agreement we have reached with the European Community. The second is the positive outlook for sustainable development in high seas fisheries demonstrated by representatives of 48 like-minded states at a meeting which our government hosted in St. John's in preparation for the United Nations Conference on High Seas Fisheries which will begin in New York City this coming April. The comprehensive agreement with the European Community which was reached in December 1992 has the potential to go a long way toward ending the calamity of overfishing outside the 200-mile limit.

Hon. members are well aware that foreign overfishing has taken a heavy toll on stocks of cod, flounder and redfish that straddle the 200-mile limit and that the principal source of this problem has been fleets from the European Community. Now our agreement with the European Community has the potential to make the Northwest Atlantic Fisheries Organization once more as it was in the years following the extension of jurisdiction in 1977, an effective means to conserve and manage fisheries for straddling stocks in international waters.

Central to this is that the EC will now, as it did until 1986, accept and abide by NAFO quotas and other conservation and management decisions. In 1989 the Government of Canada launched diplomatic, legal and public information initiatives against foreign overfishing. Tragically since 1989 the state of straddling stocks has gone from bad to worse.

For example, the total allowable catch for the Grand Banks flounder stock, American plaice, has been cut by more than 75 per cent. However, over the last four years there have been a number of positive steps which indicate that there will be an improvement in the resource in the near future.

Let me illustrate this. In 1989 the EC set unilateral quotas totalling just over 132,000 tonnes, about 20 times its NAFO quotas. Under the agreement reached in December the EC has accepted all of NAFO's quotas for 1993. In 1989 the EC refused to accept NAFO quotas and the moratorium on northern cod catches outside 200 miles, insisting that its unilateral quotas were based on scientific advice. In 1992 the EC was guided by scientific advice to accept all of NAFO's decisions for 1993 including the moratorium on northern cod.

In 1989 EC catches exceeded not only the NAFO quotas but also the higher unilateral quotas the EC set for itself. In 1992 the EC closely monitored its fleets and closed fisheries for cod, flounder and redfish when quotas were caught.

In 1989 there was little or no international recognition of the overfishing problem. As a result of Canadian efforts the ecological consequences of overfishing outside 200 miles is a high profile international issue. For example, at the United Nations Conference on the Environment and Development, the earth summit, in Rio de Janeiro it said the 1989 agreement had not been reached on developing the Law of the Sea toward ending high seas overfishing; but late in 1992 the United Nations General Assembly approved a resolution calling for a high seas fisheries conference, and as I mentioned earlier there is good reason to be optimistic about the outcome of this conference.

Throughout the period since 1989 a tremendous effort has been made by Canada to have the principle of sustainable development given effect in high seas fisheries in the northwest Atlantic.

The Prime Minister has played a key role, raising the issue repeatedly at the highest international levels. The minister of Indian affairs and the minister of employment, when they were ministers of fisheries and oceans, had laboured hard on this issue. So have the present and former Secretary of State for External Affairs and our environment minister.

The Canadian fishing industry, unions and provincial governments have done so as well, advising every step of the way as to how the federal government should proceed and participating in Canada's efforts. All of these efforts were co-ordinated first by Alan Beesley and upon his retirement by Randolph Gherson, the current ambassador for fisheries conservation.

As our Minister of Fisheries and Oceans has observed, we should also recognize that there is a profound change in the outlook of the European Community. Critical to this was the personal commitment to sustainable development of Manuel Marin, the EC vice-president for fisheries during the period. He deserves considerable credit for his determination to resolve these problems and for the important steps leading up to the agreement.

Let me review briefly the elements of the agreement. The EC and Canada agreed to comply with all of NAFO's conservation and management decisions, including quotas, and the EC will ensure that catches by its fleets do not exceed NAFO quotas. By way of comparison, from 1986 to 1992 the EC set for itself unilateral quotas higher than those set for it by NAFO. EC catches exceeded most NAFO quotas and in some cases the EC's higher unilateral quotas.

• (1730)

Canada and the EC will work together to end fishing by non-NAFO fleets. These fleets, largely comprising Korean and reflagged EC vessels, have become an increasingly serious threat to resources outside 200 miles.

Canada and the EC will work together to revitalize NAFO through joint proposals to add a dispute settlement mechanism to avoid abuse of the objection procedure.

Canada will set a total allowable catch, TAC for northern 2J-3KL cod once the present moratorium ends, based on advice from Canadian and international scientists. Scientific advice indicates that on average 5 per cent of the biomass is outside 200 miles. Canada and the EC will propose that NAFO make allocations of 2J-3KL cod equal to 5 per cent of the total allowable catch. Canada will retain 95 per cent of the TAC.

As the EC will now be co-operating with Canada in conservation of fisheries resources outside 200 miles, as soon as both parties have given formal approval Canada will provide access to ports and any surplus allocations and permit commercial arrangements.

If problems arise from the agreement there will be consultations to seek to resolve them. Either Canada or the EC can terminate the agreement on 60 days notice.

Now we have a forum. In June 1992 the UN Conference on Environment and Development called for a high seas fisheries conference. In late 1992 the UN General Assembly created the conference. Canada is no longer alone. We have more than 50 states with us to deliver a powerful ecological message against high seas overfishing.

It has been a long and bitter road in our struggle against foreign overfishing. We have travelled a considerable distance toward our goal. While that goal still seems far off we are on the right road and we are in good company. The meeting of like-minded states in St. John's brought us another step closer to what we must achieve, which is sustainable development in high seas fisheries. I look for the day when we will lift that moratorium so that people on the east coast, particularly in Newfoundland, can go back to the sea and fish for that northern cod.

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure whether the hon. member for Fraser Valley East was reading the same motion as I am. I do not see that the motion calls for unilateral action on the part of Canada.

I did not have an opportunity to discuss this with the mover of the motion, the member for Bonavista—Trinity—Conception, but the motion reads:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government should take immediate action to extend custodial jurisdiction for northern cod over the nose and tail of the Grand Banks.

The action may or may not include actually moving in there and doing it. I am not clear in my own mind and I wish I had thought to ask ahead of time.

In any case it is great to get the reassurances. This is not a new problem. It has existed for a decade and a half at least. We have had Liberal governments and we have had Conservative governments and both have given assurances that the problem is being worked on and that progress is being made.

While progress is being made, as the mover of the motion said it is fairly easy to get people to refrain from fishing when there are no fish there. We are perilously close to that situation even off the nose and tail of the Grand Banks.

For the last four years I have been here each year has brought us closer to the point we are now at with respect to the north Atlantic cod. We now have a moratorium on fishing limits, a two-year holiday. We are giving the cod a holiday for two years. It takes cod six years to mature and breed, so what is two years going to do?

I have no confidence that the cod stocks are going to miraculously reappear in two years time. I wish that could be the case. We all wish it. However it is wishing and not doing anything concrete that has us in the difficulty we are in right now.

I can recall when the current minister of fisheries, at that time the minister of trade, said that he would not allow the cod quota to be reduced to 190,000 tonnes because it would be tough on Newfoundlanders and would create unemployment. The experts were saying it should be 190,000 tonnes or perhaps even less than that but the current minister of fisheries insisted that the quota stay at 260,000 tonnes.

That was the beginning of the trouble. I said at the time that it was short-term gain for long-term pain. I was much more prophetic than I realized at the time.

The member for Fraser Valley East spoke about the great progress that is being made and about the co-operation of the European Community. I can recall travelling to Europe with members of the committee in 1989 when representatives of the European Community told us that as long as we were harvesting the stocks the way we were and as long as we were not obeying the recommendations of our experts to cut the quotas seriously they were not going to pay any attention to the quotas either.

Now we are certainly paying attention. We have stopped fishing and that should have been done earlier than it was. We have demonstrated that we are prepared to take this measure in Canada when it is shown that there is no other alternative. We are doing it. We are proving to the world that we are doing it.

NAFO is agreeing. It has always gone along with us. It is the European Community that has not. One member of NAFO, the European Community, has not paid any attention to all the quotas that have been set. It has exceeded them regularly.

There are others however. South Korea is not a member of the European Community or NAFO. Neither is the United States. There are vessels registered under Panamanian registry or registered in other countries that are not bound by any of the agreements of which the member for Fraser Valley East spoke.

Unless we are prepared to really do something about this situation the problem will not be solved. I suggest that the thing to do is to set a time and say that by a certain date, and it cannot be too far off, in the very near future in the interest of preserving the little that is left of the north Atlantic cod Canada will unilaterally insist on taking over the management of the cod stocks off the nose and tail of the Grand Banks. We must make it very clear. Give the world some time to react to that.

Let us talk and reach an agreement as to how long this will take, what will happen afterwards if it works and how we can work together in measuring the situation and seeing what we can learn about it. Is it the environment? Is it the seals? Is it overfishing? Is it a lack of food? Is it everything? We do not know. Let us get the world to co-operate with us but at the same time say that come June 1993, or 1994, Canada will take over management of the nose and tail of the Grand Banks area and make sure that we do preserve what is left of the cod stock.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I wish to congratulate my colleague from Bonavista—Trinity—Conception for having the foresight to present this private member's motion before the House in order that we can discuss it at greater length.

I, my colleague and others in this House are fully aware of the importance of this situation but I do not think there are many members in this House who appreciate the severity of what the fishing industry is going through as much as the hon. member. He knows about this situation only too well from his own personal experience and his involvement on the seas, particularly the Grand Banks.

This is not subject matter that has just come to the attention of the House. In fact on March 12, 1992 my colleague from Burin—St. George's put forward a motion that reads as follows:

> That, in the opinion of this House, in order to prevent further ecological disaster through the pillage of transboundary fish stocks off Canada's east coast, and in order to save an essential national industry and valued way of life for many rural citizens, Canada should take immediate steps to extend its functional jurisdiction to the nose and tail of the Grand Banks.

The government of the day voted against that motion. The minister responsible for fisheries said, and I quote from page 8085 of Hansard:

> The government and I will be asking my colleagues to vote against it because it is premature and it is certainly inexplicit as to what Canada has been asked to do.

That is what the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans said. I found that to be rather alarming in view of the fact that the motion was presented by our party to solicit the support to begin the process. No member on this side has said or intimated that the extension of this jurisdiction would somehow be the panacea for all the ills that the fishing industry faces at the present time. We are not that naive. The people we represent are not so naive as to think it will be the panacea. However, why does the government of the day refuse to begin that process?

I can only suggest to this House and to the members who have been in it here for quite some time that although it may be a priority for the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans—and I underline the word may and I do so with great respect—I know it is not a priority of the government opposite.

In what jurisdiction, in what parliamentary democracy would we see such avoidance of the issue as demonstrated time and time again by the Secretary of State for External Affairs? The present Secretary of State for External Affairs is following the track record of her predecessor, the right hon. member for Yellowhead. They have not dealt with this issue as a government issue, as a national issue of great importance. They have fluffed it off. It is a fisheries thing. We will give it to Crosbie the old windbag. He will do his thing. He will get up and tell a few jokes. He will tell everybody: "Ah we cannot do this. It is not going to be this and it is not going to be that".

The credence and the significance of the forethought of my colleague is that he has presented the motion not to defeat the government but to solicit its support. Members of the New Democratic Party would love to criticize those of us in the Official Opposition and have done so repeatedly, not very wisely I might add, but in this particular instance they see the merit of beginning the process. Yet the remarks from the government, from the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans were an unmitigated disaster.

I hope we will have an opportunity to hear from the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the minister of federal-provincial relations later on in the debate about how they believe it is such a great priority.

I am disappointed in the response of the government. I want it to be clearly on the record that we as a national party, and we stated it in a national party resolution, support the extension of the jurisdiction beyond the tail and nose of the Grand Banks. We made the motion knowing full well that it would not just be by the stroke of the pen, that it would be a timely process and there would be time for the Government of Canada to move in that direction.

What have we heard? A road block, excuse, a road block, excuse, a road block, excuse. Before the hon. members stand in their places and condemn us I want them to know that we do not believe that by extending this jurisdiction the fisheries will change over night. For God's sake, as a national priority come to the aid of people who fish off the Grand Banks and off the east coast, whether in Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, P.E.I. or Newfoundland. Come to their aid and come to their cause. It transcends partisan differences. It ought to transcend different ideologies, whatever they may be. But there is this foot dragging and this excuse that we have to talk to this certain country. We cannot do this with that country and this country over here has this bilateral agreement. We are all part of this international organization and therefore they may not accept or agree. But if you do not begin the process the objective will never be achieved.

We have heard the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans say in debate on the floor of this House, as I believe my colleague made reference to, that the extension of the jurisdiction would be a laudable goal and objective. But no one in the department or within the Government of Canada has acted. I do not blame so much the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans; I blame the minister of external affairs who has shown wanton disrespect and neglect of the fishermen of this country, particularly on the east coast. I do not know how any member of that party opposite, particularly from Atlantic Canada, could support that minister or her candidacy for higher office.

I want to put it on the record that we will raise this issue again and again. We hope over a period of time members opposite will realize the importance of the goal we are trying to achieve.

I will conclude my remarks this evening by once again thanking my colleague, the hon. member for Bonavista—Trinity—Conception, for having the foresight to put this motion before the House and for having this debate on an important fundamental aspect of Canadian life; of Canadian fisheries policies. It is fundamental to Canada's place in the world as it interfaces with other countries throughout the world. I thank and congratulate my colleague for having that foresight.

[Translation]

Mr. Charles-Eugène Marin (Gaspé): Mr. Speaker, this evening we are discussing the advisability of extending the Canadian 200-mile limit. Extension of custodial jurisdiction would amount to unilateral extension of jurisdiction outside 200 miles. Since there is no provision for such action under international law, such action by Canada would be opposed by the international community. It would be unenforceable. It would invite confrontation, potential violence and threat to life at sea.

What this government is doing, instead, is working co-operatively at the bilateral, regional and multilateral level to give full effect to the provisions of the law of the sea convention regarding conservation and management of high seas fisheries.

Significant progress has been made, and I would like to review for hon. members some of the effective steps this government has been taking and will be taking through what we call our legal initiative in seeking international action to stop the overfishing on the high seas before valuable resources are further depleted and the coastal communities that depend on them for their existence are devastated.

First, however, I would like to review the nature of the problem. It is only through understanding the problem that has developed in high seas fisheries that the elements of an effective solution can be worked out in full.

The United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea, or to use its acronym, UNCLOS, contains a framework for co-operation on management and conservation for the high seas beyond the limits on national jurisdiction. Unfortunately, it leaves legal rights and obligations applicable to straddling stocks—and other stocks not under the exclusive management of coastal states such as highly migratory species—in an ambiguous state. The specific rights of coastal states and the concomitant obligations of the high-seas fishing states are only vaguely sketched out in the Law of the Sea Treaty. The resulting legal uncertainty leaves these stocks vulnerable to overfishing on the high seas by fleets from distant fishing countries.

Under UNCLOS the basis for regulating fisheries within 200 miles is clear. The task coastal states face there is to put in place measures needed to conduct the fishery on a sustainable basis. The responsibilities are very clearly established, even if there may at times be deficiencies or errors in the exercise of that authority. Those coastal states fortunate enough to possess resources have assumed this responsibility and have developed effective management regimes at considerable cost to themselves.

But how is that obligation to be given practical effect? This is not a theoretical question but a practical problem that if not addressed effectively, on an urgent basis, will continue to give rise to ecological disasters wherever straddling stocks are found.

This serious gap in the international legal framework affects conservation of important fish stocks in a number of areas of the world: hake and squid in the southwest Atlantic on Argentina's Patagonian Shelf; orange roughy on the Challenger Plateau off New Zealand; tuna in the south Pacific; and blue whiting and jack mackerel in the east central and southeast Pacific. There is also northern cod off Newfoundland's northeast coast which is managed by Canada, but which can be fished, to a limited extent, outside 200 miles.

It is worth noting that there are overfishing problems in most of these areas, whether or not a regional fisheries organization has been established. Destructive overfishing takes place unless there is agreement on effective management among all participants in the fishery.

Let us briefly review what this serious gap in the legal framework has meant to Canada's Atlantic fisheries and the fishermen, plant workers and communities that depend on them.

In 1977, Canada extended its fishing jurisdiction to 200 nautical miles, the maximum permitted under the law of the sea. However, the Grand Banks of Newfoundland extend beyond 200 miles in two important fishing areas known as the nose and tail of the Grand Banks. Cod, flounder and redfish migrate back and forth across the 200-mile limit in those areas.

Conservation requires regulation of fisheries outside 200 miles in international waters, as well as inside 200 miles. Canada and other countries that fish in this area formed the Northwest Atlantic Fisheries Organization, or to use its acronym, NAFO, in 1979. Until 1985, NAFO worked reasonably well. Catches were limited to levels recommended by scientists, and fisheries resources that had been depleted by overfishing before 1977 began to rebuild.

In 1986 Spain and Portugal joined the European Community, and the EC began to opt out of NAFO conservation decisions and set far higher quotas for its fleet. Since then, heavy fishing by EC fleets has been a major cause of decline in cod and flounder stocks on which Canadian fishermen and plant workers rely. From 1986 to 1990 EC fleets alone reported catches of cod, flounder and redfish totalling more than 530,000 tonnes, more than five times the quotas assigned to the EC by NAFO.

The question is how to give practical effect to the obligations of distant fishing states to co-operate with each other and the appropriate coastal states in the conservation of fish stocks on the high seas.

Canada has been seeking a global solution, an effective, enforceable framework for conservation and management of resources beyond the 200-mile limit.

The attainment of such rules is the purpose behind what has been called Canada's legal initiative. These rules would clarify and lend substance to the vague provisions in UNCLOS.

Canada took the lead in pursuing this goal by convening an international conference of Law of the Sea experts in St. John's in September 1990. The experts agreed on certain fundamental principles, including that: members of the international community whose nationals fish in areas of the high seas must co-operate with each other and the adjacent coastal states on conservation including enforcement and dispute settlement; members of regional fisheries organizations have a duty to ensure that their nationals comply with all conservation measures, and that they do not resort to techniques such as reflagging of vessels to escape controls; distant fishing nations must ensure that fishing by their nationals on the high seas does not have an adverse effect on the living resources under the jurisdiction of coastal states; the management regime applied to the high-seas portion of stocks should be consistent with the management regime of the coastal states applicable in its exclusive economic zone.

I can assure the members of this House that this government will continue to work toward that objective through its legal initiative and other initiatives for global co-operation, to the benefit of Canadians and and of all people who depend upon the oceans' resources, in this generation and in future generations.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The designated hour will end at 6.02 p.m. Therefore I recognize the hon. member for Davenport.

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, in the limited time available I would like to make a couple of points on this very interesting saga of the northern cod which also has some very dramatic social and economic implications.

First let me draw the attention of the House to the report entitled Independent Review of the State of the Northern Cod Stock that was produced in February 1990. It was signed by prominent Canadians knowledgeable in the field of northern cod. The panel consisted of Dr. Harris of Memorial University, D. L. Alverson, John Pope, Maxfield Short, Frank Smith, Mary Lou Peters and Robert Fournier.

What was their first recommendation? It read in respect of the northern cod stocks that as a matter of urgency there should be an immediate reduction of fishing mortality to the level of .3 and at the earliest possible date to the level of .2. This was in February 1990.

It took the government two years to act on that recommendation. It was in February 1992 when finally that recommendation was partially acted upon. Why it would take that long is beyond me to understand. When I hear the member for Fraser Valley East speak about government efforts at promoting sustainable development I really wonder what he is talking about.

Second, an interesting aspect of government policy on this matter that may prove the point made by my colleagues from Bonavista—Trinity—Conception and Cape Breton—East Richmond is that the minister of fisheries seems to be operating in some kind of isolation and impotence. In his news release of January 10, 1992 the minister said:

> Canada is calling for international support for principles and measures within the framework of the Law of the Sea convention toward ending overfishing of straddling stocks outside 200 miles.

I applaud him. That statement is highly desirable because article 63 of the Law of the Sea convention exhorts the coastal states and fishing states to seek to agree on conservation measures for straddling stocks.

The question is: Why is Canada not ratifying the Law of the Sea? How come the minister is left to invoke the Law of the Sea in the name of his mandate while the Secretary of State for External Affairs is not acting upon the ratification of the Law of the Sea? Canada was among the first nations to sign it but as you know, Mr. Speaker, there are two steps: the signature and then the ratification.

The Law of the Sea cannot come into effect and cannot become operative unless 60 nations ratify it. At this stage some 53 or 54 nations have ratified that convention. It is a very important one. According to article 63 it would permit the initiation of a number of conservation initiatives among states.

Why is Canada not ratifying the Law of the Sea? It is very relevant to the fine initiative taken today by my colleague from Bonavista—Trinity—Conception. His initiative is one of breaking an impasse, of moving in a certain direction searching for an answer. It may be the one proposed by the hon. member for Bonavista—Trinity—Conception. It may be a modification of it. We do not know exactly where we will ultimately end. Certainly this movement would be facilitated if Canada were to ratify the Law of the Sea.

It leaves the minister of fisheries alone to invoke the Law of the Sea while at the same time the Government of Canada to which the minister belongs is not ratifying it. Does it make sense?

I will make my third point very briefly. The Government of Canada went to the Rio conference after successive preparatory meetings in the two years preceding it with the intention of resolving the question of fisheries. All it managed to do at the United Nations Conference on the Environment and Development was to agree to hold another conference.

I see you rising, Mr. Speaker. We will leave it at that until the next time.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I did not see the clock so that the hon. member would have at least five minutes. He will have five minutes next time the motion is before us in the order of precedence.

The time provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business is now expired. Pursuant to Standing Order 93, the order is dropped to the bottom of the list of order of precedence on the Order Paper.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 deemed to have been moved.

CANADIAN FORCES RESERVE

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, I just finished speaking on a motion of national importance and I rise to speak on another subject, an entirely different subject but in my mind another subject of considerable national importance. This is a subject of the Canadian Forces, national defence and specifically the Canadian Forces Reserves.

I am rising on a follow-up to a question I asked the Minister of National Defence on November 30, 1992, a few days after the Auditor General's report came out. In trying to be as non-partisan as possible about this matter, and I am very serious, I had major concerns about the observations that the Auditor General made in his report released on November 24 regarding the Canadian Forces Reserves.

I had concerns because of the debt and of the seriousness of the concerns, some of which may have agreement and some which I think we need to have a very close look at. I am concerned about the growing importance of the reserve force in Canada as part of the total force concept.

Since 1987 the reserves in Canada, including the militia, the naval reserves, the communications command reserve and the air reserve have been a total part of Canada's defence effort and part of our manning. The total force concept seriously came into effect in 1987 and we started with roughly 30,000 reserves.

Right now—and I am going to concentrate on peacekeeping—the militia makes up 60 per cent of the army. In the last couple of months the media has focused on peacekeeping and the necessity for Canada to have a very close look at its peacekeeping forces.

The charge was made by the Auditor General that the reserves have a problem with accountability. They are not equipped properly. But the most serious charge made was that the reserves would not be ready.

I think the minister has to respond to that, because I find it inconsistent that the reserves now in peacekeeping make up 12.5 per cent of the force. Right now, 300 Newfoundlanders are going to Winnipeg to be trained to participate in peacekeeping. That is not a bad readiness factor.

Because of the importance of the total force concept and reserves on which we spent $750 million last year, I simply want the Minister of National Defence to address this issue and inform the Canadian public how serious these charges are and what she intends to do about them.

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I would like to outline the defence policy statement of April, 1992 to my colleague. It makes it quite clear that a highly motivated, well trained, properly equipped reserve force, capable of assuming a greater role in the defence of Canada is integral to the success of the forces' operation and activities, both at home and abroad.

I know that from his past expertise, the hon. member is aware that the reserves have always been an integral part of the Canadian Forces.

I agree with you that the Auditor General's remarks were very timely last fall and DND does concur with a number of the suggestions he made. Reservists have been and will continue to be integrated into the Canadian Forces operations. They augmented our regular force during the Oka crisis and during the past year they have been on our missions in Bosnia, Croatia, Cyprus and Somalia.

A major effort is now being directed toward reviewing the equipment, recruitment and training in the Canadian Forces.

With regard to legislation which you raised in the House that day, we do not see any need at this time for legislation that would force employers to grant leaves of absence to members in the reserve. I am very pleased you raised this today and DND does agree with a lot of the issues the Auditor General brought forward.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): On September 15 I raised, with the Minister of Employment and Immigration, the need to allow Dularie Boodlal to stay in Canada rather than force her to return to Trinidad where, after years of many violent acts in Trinidad and Canada, her husband had threatened to kill her.

The minister's reply was: "If the hon. member knows of facts that ought to be brought to my attention in this specific case, I urge him to do it".

I thanked the minister for his proposal and pointed out that my information was copied from the Legal Aid Service of Parkdale brief which they had already sent to him. In fact, a couple of days later the minister decided to let Mrs. Boodlal stay. I am very grateful for that, partly for its own sake and partly because it constitutes another very valuable precedent in an important emerging matter of law in Canada, that is to say recognition that women sometimes have special causes to be recognized as refugees because they are women.

I want to quote from the speech given yesterday to the Ottawa Womens' Canadian Club by Nurjehan Mawani, the new chair of the Immigration and Refugee Board, who has taken this matter up in a very strong and constructive way.

She points out that in such cases most people would consider that this person is a refugee because she is fleeing for her life. She says: "Can it be fitted into the form of the law that the person belongs to a group that is persecuted?" She also says that in a recent trial division decision in the Federal Court of Canada the court stated: "Trinidadian women subject to wife abuse" could constitute a particular social group within the meaning of the refugee definition. I welcome that statement by the chair of the board.

I note she has gone much further than that. She is setting out guidelines in the board which in the near future will be available to all board members to give a standard or uniform basis for interpreting such decisions and, much beyond that, she says that women refugee claimants who are often understandably reluctant to talk about what happened, especially when they come from certain cultures, will be put more at ease by having if possible women on the board hearing their cases, women refugee hearing officers, and women interpreters. She is moving in this way to make it as practical as possible for a woman to state her case as a women when she believes that she has been persecuted as a women.

She further says: "We have also established working groups of women refugee claimants across Canada to help train and sensitize members and staff alike to the unique problems faced by refugee women".

I think this is a very strong advance in the law of our country and I thank the chair of the board and the minister for it.

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the minister has determined that Mrs. Boodlal and her two children will be allowed to remain in Canada while the processing of their application for permanent residence takes place. They will be required to meet the statutory requirements relating to health and background checks. Their deportation order must be effected prior to the issuance of immigrant visas.

I am glad the hon. member brought this matter to the attention of the minister. Indeed he is quite right that there are certain areas with regard to refugee status that are changing.

IMMIGRATION AND REFUGEE BOARD

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, on February 4, I asked the Minister of State for Employment and Immigration to initiate an independent inquiry into the serious allegations that the members of the Immigration and Refugee Board were subject to political influence in making their decisions, often contrary to the evidence that was put before them in the hearings.

These allegations were made by certain former members of the board in stories which were published in the Le Devoir in Montreal last week and were made more extensively near the end of last year by Dr. Sam Ifejika who resigned from the board in protest but issued a 24-page document in which he set out various cases in which he himself had been subject to influence and pressure by senior officials with the department.

This is supposed to be an independent quasi-judicial body. The members of the board are to listen to the evidence and make their decisions based on the evidence. We must remember that in these cases lives are at risk. People have fled from countries where their lives have been threatened, where they have been put in prison. For them it is a life and death issue.

What answer did I get from the minister? First of all she asked me—and perhaps it is because she is new in her position and she has not been properly briefed—to provide her with details. All the details were provided in the brief which has been tabled with the department and the minister of immigration, the 24-page brief by Dr. Ifejika. There are further allegations available in the articles which have been published in Le Devoir. Regarding my comments with respect to appointments to the board, she tells me that the committee has the right to review appointments to the board.

Everybody knows that even though we review those appointments in committee we can do nothing about it. This is not like the American system where the committees of Congress can turn down appointments. All we can do is review them. If we find they are bad, there is not much we can say. We can make a recommendation but that does not go very far.

I want to see a full independent investigation into these serious allegations. If the government has nothing to hide, it should agree to such an investigation.

I hope today that the parliamentary secretary will take seriously not simply my remarks but the allegations that have been made outside this House by others and not simply read to us some statement prepared by officials in the department.

That kind of response to the questions we raise in the adjournment debate makes a farce of this whole procedure and a farce of parliamentary reform. Unless the parliamentary secretary can get up and give me an honest response to the questions I have asked and to the allegations I have made, I would prefer that he or she sit in their seat and not say anything at all.

Mr. Ken James (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I would like to respond to the member because I know he has a great deal of interest in the board and is responding to some of the information that has been put forward by others.

The allegations of interference with the independence of the members in the minds of the minister and those in the department is unfounded. The IRB members are independent decision makers. Their responsibility is to determine each refugee claim based upon its merit. The board has a responsibility to see that the decisions are fair and just to the claimants and consistent in that similar sets of facts produce similar decisions.

I think if the hon. member would look at a lot of those decisions or hear them, he would probably see that.

In this respect Bill C-86, as he would probably know, will provide the chairperson of the Immigration and Refugee Board with greater control over the quality of the decision making. In case of the incapacity or incompetence or misconduct of any member, the chairman may recommend to the Minister of Justice that an inquiry be held to consider if the member should be suspended without pay or removed from office.

A judge would be appointed to hold the inquiry and make a recommendation to the Minister of Justice who would forward the report to the Governor in Council for appropriate action.

If the chairman's conduct is in question, the minister may initiate the proceedings that I just noted above. The chairman may also, after consultation with other members, issue non-binding guidelines to assist members in reaching the decisions.

Hopefully that will be helpful to the member. Hopefully it is information that he feels is the proper way to handle an independent board.

GRAIN INDUSTRY

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg—St. James): Mr. Speaker, on June 18 last I raised the critical issue of wheat shipments to Russia. At that time wheat was moving at half capacity only. The problem was Russia's inability to pay for the grain. Since that time there have been several developments.

Shortly after my June statement, Russia made a partial payment and the flow of wheat to Russia picked up.

There was another suspension of shipments in early September and apparently there has been precious little action since then except for one small payment made by Russia and one small shipment through the port of Churchill, Manitoba.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs paid a recent visit to Moscow and apparently left without resolving the grain issue between Canada and Russia. We are told Russia owes this country about $80 million and Canada will not ship any more grain to Russia until some new credit arrangement is worked out.

This is a serious situation. It is alarming. Canadian grain farmers face a bleak year. Net farm income is forecast to drop nearly a billion dollars in 1993. They need every market. They need every dollar of sale.

In the spring of 1992 the Canadian Wheat Board expected to ship 10 million to 11 million tonnes of grain through the St. Lawrence seaway. By year end the number stood at 5.2 million tonnes. A big part of the problem was the Russian situation. This year's tonnage between April and July is expected to be down to 1.5 million tonnes. Again the culprit is the Russian situation.

Because of last fall's lousy wet harvest weather, there is a plethora of feed wheat about. I am told that the republic of Georgia made an offer to purchase 1.5 million tonnes of it but Treasury Board nixed the deal. Again the problem is financial.

Farmers are sitting on this wheat and they cannot sell it. It is very frustrating. I deem it timely to raise this issue of wheat shipments to Russia not only because of reasons already cited but because credit, especially Russian credit is expected to have a major impact on grain prices.

At least that was the view taken by experts at a recent Outlook conference in my home city of Winnipeg. Daniel Amstutz told the conference: "Credit will be a more important determinator of competition than price by the year 2000". The executive director of the International Wheat Council added: "Currently over 50 per cent of trade is under some sort of government-provided credit. This percentage is bound to rise in the coming years".

Russia and other former republics of the Soviet Union are the big worry. Traditionally they account for 15 per cent to 20 per cent of grain exports. They are one of Canada's biggest customers. Before the current financial crisis, they paid cold hard cash. Now they rely on credit but there has been a failure to meet terms of credit.

I believe the government should be telling this House what it is doing about the existing grain problems between Canada and Russia. Farmers want to know. All Canadians want to know. Agriculture is important to the prairies and to the nation.

I look forward to hearing what the government has to say about this.

Mr. Ken James (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, in response to the hon. member's interest in this area, Canada's credit support to Russia as he may or may not know is second only to Germany on a per capita basis.

Canada and Russia, U.S.S.R. have had a good trading relationship for many years. Russia, U.S.S.R. has been one of our biggest grain customers and we intend to do what we can to make possible a continuation of that good trading relationship.

Unfortunately shipments of grain to Russia had to be suspended in the fall of 1992 because of Russia's arrears and its inability to meet its own arrears repayment schedule. Some of the credit for grain sales to Russia before shipments were suspended did cover ocean freight costs.

We understand the difficulties this situation is causing as noted by the hon. member who just spoke. The government is doing all it can to remedy this situation. It is expected that we will be treated equitably as Russia repays its debts to Canada and other countries so that this great trading relationship and the acceptance of our wheat and so on to them can be continued.

It is ongoing and we thank the member for being concerned and bringing it to the attention of the House.

ECONOMIC STATEMENT

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I was very dissatisfied with the response I received from the Minister of Employment and Immigration on the impact his unemployment insurance cuts would have on women who are being sexually harassed in the work place.

He said that the woman should quit her job, expose the harasser and that she would be protected. I have an example of a young woman who did just that and is now in tears embroiled in a legal battle because she did exactly what she was supposed to do according to the minister.

Her employer subjected her to comments about her appearance every day. He would say things such as: "Today you look like a seven" and the next day: "Today you made it to an eight". He made other comments about her which she found to be very uncomfortable and unprofessional. She quit her job and she cited sexual harassment. In her case she won at the Board of Referees. Now the employer is contesting that. He admits to the comments but he says it was all a joke. He has found other employees who will back him up, employees who may themselves fear losing their jobs. He does not want his reputation to be tarnished so he is contesting the UI ruling. She is in tears and must find a lawyer.

The nightmare did not end when she left her job. She does not know whether he will succeed in having her UI ruling overturned and whether she will have to pay back the UI as well as pay the substantial expense of a lawyer's fee.

The new UI policy is putting sexually harassed women through even more pain. It will revictimize these women by government action.

The Quebec Association of Women who work with their husbands in business is very concerned about the new UI rules. When a woman who works for or with her husband leaves the marriage she often also leaves her job and her livelihood. These 500,000 Canadian women who work with their husbands fought long and hard for the right to UI like any other worker and now this right is de facto taken away because marriage breakdown is not considered by this government as a good reason to leave your job. These women will be left without a marriage and without an income. Some may be forced to stay in a terrible situation because of threat of poverty.

The government is promoting UI cuts as a savings for Canadian taxpayers, but what nonsense. UI is an insurance program mainly paid for by the workers themselves and the employers. Cutting people off UI means they are forced to go on welfare which is funded entirely by the Canadian taxpayer. Taxpayers lose when people are cut off UI.

Last year 28,927 UI appeals were heard by referee boards. About 73 per cent of referee board members are men. Most appeals take between one and three months and some are referred to Federal Court. The appellant must fund and pay for a lawyer. The most abused people in the work force may not have the skills or the knowledge to appeal at all.

Women will suffer disproportionately from this new policy. Women make up 53 per cent of the so-called voluntary quits even though they are only 37 per cent of all UI claimants. Forty-three per cent of so-called voluntary quits are in low income occupations compared with 28 per cent of all UI claimants in these occupations.

UI stats show that most voluntary quits do not just work long enough to qualify for UI, then quit. The drop in UI benefits from 60 per cent to 57 per cent disproportionately hurts low income people, most of whom are women.

I said in my question to the minister that he does not understand the realities of the work place for women and visible minorities who are subject to abuse. I stand by that statement. These proposed cuts make a presumption of guilt and force workers to prove their innocence. That is absurd. The evidence is clear. The government must pull back from these regressive cuts to our unemployment insurance program.

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I know my colleague has been in the House the last few days but I want to emphasize again that there are numerous legitimate reasons for quitting a job and racial discrimination and sexual harassment are considered legitimate reasons. These people will be protected under the act.

The unemployment insurance program is there to help people through the transition period of when they have lost their job and until they can find a new one. It is not a guaranteed income. If that is a totally new issue, then maybe the member would like to discuss that another day.

However, I want to assure my colleague that the changes to the UI bill that is coming in as C–105 are going to be administered fairly. They will ensure that those who lose their job through no fault of their own will continue to have access to the income support training and job development that is provided by this government through the unemployment fund.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Pursuant to Standing Order 38(5), a motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted.

Accordingly this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at ten o'clock a.m. pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

AMENDMENTS TO BILL C-76

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Madam Speaker, I know that in a few moments when we move to Orders of the Day, the Chair will rule on the admissibility of amendments to Bill C-76.

I wish to bring to the attention of the Chair that yesterday my colleague, the member for Ottawa Centre, sent an amendment at approximately 5.55 p.m. The amendment was deemed to have been not receivable because it was sent on what is known as a fax machine or telecopier instead of being sent by hand.

I am sure all members know that except for legal documents which must be served personally, it is generally acceptable that virtually any kind of transaction today is done in that particular manner. Indeed, anyone who is familiar with real estate or any other kind of procedure like that knows perfectly well that the distribution of a document by way of fax machine is deemed to be quite acceptable.

However when it comes to serving an amendment, an amendment which was duly signed, and the original of which was later sent, the fax copy was sent to the Clerk's office by six o'clock and it was not deemed to be receivable.

I submit respectfully that in the age of modern equipment, telecopiers and telephones that we now have for this House, I question not accepting a document from an hon. member because a photocopy is sent. After all a fax copy is nothing less than a photocopy sent by electronic mail.

I submit that is not in keeping with the spirit of having this House function as best as possible.

• (1010)

I ask if the Speaker would undertake to review this and possibly rule, at the moment, after consultation perhaps with the Clerk that the amendment should have been and should still be receivable. It was sent before the appropriate time, duly signed, by way of a telecopier machine.

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): On the same point of order, Madam Speaker. I must tell you quite frankly that I have a problem with the representations made to the Chair this morning by the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell.

To send documents by fax is commonplace today, but the fact remains that a legal document, an authoritative, authentic document, is one that has been sent through the normal channels, has been signed and is deemed to be an original.

Faxes are not originals. In that context, I think that as far as the point of order raised by the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell is concerned you ought to look at it as a precedent and I would suggest caution in considering this specific point of order.

[English]

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Madam Speaker, certainly in the past I have been able to submit through my caucus amendments by facsimile to the appropriate office on the Hill, provided that I have personally signed the document. It has been accepted by the Table as having been delivered in the appropriate manner.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am advised at this time that the point at issue is not just the faxing of the document. It is a little more complicated than that, since the request apparently was not in the form of an amendment per se. As we speak, we are checking the exact time at which the document was received. Once that is known, we will determine whether it was drafted as an amendment or if assistance was requested to do so, but above all at what time it was received. I have asked the Clerk to ascertain the time of arrival of this document as well as its content. I shall get back to the House later in the day if it turns out that this amendment can be considered acceptable. I think that this settles the matter for the time being.

I see the hon. member for Ottawa Centre but I cannot see what more could be said at this time.

Mr. Harb: Madam Speaker, you have covered all the main points. I just wanted to point out that they turned down the fax because, as they put it to my assistant, they do not accept faxes. The original had to be delivered to the office. I wanted to make that clear.

Madam Deputy Speaker: As I said a moment ago, we will check anyway and if the amendment sent by fax is admissible we will get back to the House at that time using the normal procedure. I have requested that we look into this matter. I believe that we all agree on that.

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-76, an act to amend certain statutes to implement certain fiscal provisions of the budget tabled in Parliament on February 25, 1992, as reported (with amendment) by a legislative committee.

SPEAKER'S RULING

Madam Deputy Speaker: Subject to the point of order that we talked about a few minutes ago,

[English]

There are 17 motions in amendment on the Notice Paper for the report stage of Bill C-76, an act to amend certain statutes to implement certain fiscal provisions of the budget tabled in Parliament on February 25, 1992.

[Translation]

After consultation, I have selected Motions Nos. 1, 3, 6, 9, 12, 14, 15, 16 and 17, standing in the name of the hon. member for St. Boniface. They will be grouped for debate and the vote on Motion No. 1 will apply to Motions Nos. 3, 6, 9, 12, 14, 15, 16 and 17.

[English]

Motions Nos. 2, 5, 8 and 11 standing in the name of the hon. member for Windsor—St. Clair and Motions Nos. 4, 7, 10 and 13 standing in the name of the hon. member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan will not be selected as they are identical to Motions Nos. 3, 6, 9 and 12.

I will now call Motions Nos. 1, 3, 6, 9, 12, 14, 15, 16 and 17.

[English]

Since the hon. member for St. Boniface is not proceeding with his amendments as he is not with us today, I shall in that case select Motions Nos. 4, 7, 10 and 13 standing in the name of the hon. member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan. They will be grouped for debate and the vote on Motion No. 4 will apply to Motions Nos. 7, 10 and 13.

Mr. Boudria: Point of order, Madam Speaker. Because of what the Speaker indicated some moments ago I wonder if the House would give unanimous consent that I move the amendments standing in the name of the hon. member for St. Boniface. In addition to solving the problem, it would make the whole other discussion academic save and except for discussion of the principle of it and it would prevent the Speaker from later having to make an additional ruling which might have to change something.

If I could ask for that consent, with of course agreement of the Chair, we could then proceed with the debate in the manner I have just suggested.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Would there be unanimous consent for the motions standing in the name of the hon. member for St. Boniface to be moved by another hon. member?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

[Translation]

Mr. Don Boudria (for Mr. Duhamel) moved:

Motion No. 1.

That Bill C-76, be amended by deleting Clause 2.

That Bill C-76, be amended by deleting Clause 3.

That Bill C-76, be amended by deleting Clause 4.

Motion No. 9.

That Bill C-76, be amended by deleting Clause 5.

That Bill C-76, be amended by deleting Clause 6.

That Bill C-76, be amended by deleting Clause 8.

That Bill C-76, be amended by deleting Clause 9.

Motion No. 17.

That Bill C-76, be amended by deleting Clause 10.

He said: Madam Speaker, first I would like to take the opportunity to thank the Chair for accommodating me this morning in this unusual situation and also to thank all hon. members for their co-operation.

If no other settlement is reached on this issue I would hope that a meeting of those concerned, perhaps even the house management committee—I see my colleague opposite, the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader—would be held soon to find a way that documents could be accepted in the form suggested this morning in my point of order, if not for the bill before us now, at least for those we will consider in future.

I think that would update this institution a little. In any case I do not want to dwell on this too much. I want to go on now with a few remarks about the bill under consideration and especially the amendments presented to it.

• (1020)

As you said so well and so eloquently this morning, Madam Speaker, the Liberals propose deleting many clauses from this bill. Of course, the ultimate goal is to delete the whole bill, because we find that it has two main components: first, it would of course impose charges on students, and second, it would also establish a process for charging fees to register lobbyists.

[English]

Perhaps I can move to the first of these themes, that of imposing fees on student loans.

Bill C-76 removes the six month grace period for Canada student loans and adds six months of interest for those students who have to borrow in order to access post-secondary education. We as a society are saying how we must all work to increase our academic level in this country to ensure that our young people have more and more of the tools that are required in order for them to have meaningful careers in order to be ready for the job market. We are all concerned about the rate of high school dropouts. We are trying to eradicate that. There is a group in my constituency, in the community of Rockland, working hard toward convincing young people who have dropped out of school to go back and, for those who have even an inkling of dropping out, trying to change the minds of those young people.

What does this bill do? The exact opposite. I see my distinguished colleague from Carleton—Gloucester, himself a former school teacher. I am not sure whether one is ever a former school teacher. I think once a school teacher, always a school teacher. The member for Carleton—Gloucester taught high school. He knows perfectly well the attractions there are for young people to leave the educational facilities and go into the work force. Those are instilled in our young people and by everything that is out there, for example the old jalopy with the chrome wheels on it that too many young people are ready to give up school to try and purchase, a few months later only to be left with the payments on the jalopy and the car parked behind the garage. It is so sad to see that immediate gratification being sought by purchasing some of these less than totally useful objects and sacrificing one's future for them.

Here we are giving a further disincentive to young people to stay in school. It is already far from easy. In the province of Ontario tuition fees have increased astronomically under the present provincial government after it promised to abolish tuition fees altogether. My colleague from Thunder Bay who is a former member of the Ontario legislature, as I am, will know what a burden it is on young people right now. In addition to higher tuition fees, the young people have to finance those tuition fees. They will now have to pay interest for a longer period of time on those increased tuition fees. They are being attacked both ways.

There is always the uncertainty, particularly in these difficult economic times, that when they finish school, the career that they had hoped for may not even be there. I hope that the recession is nearing its end. We begin to see some positive indicators, not enough, but at least some.

I hope the time will come very soon when our young people will again be able to have the hope that after graduation they can be reasonably sure of finding a meaningful job. That is what we want for all of them, but right now we are not making it any better with bills like Bill C–76. We are not making it any better of course with bills like Bill C–105. In the event that they do enter the work force it may not be in the area they are looking for but simply a make–shift kind of employment opportunity.

Then they are thrown on the unemployment insurance line. If it does not meet the new strict criteria the minister of employment has been talking to us about in recent days, those young people will be stuck with a pile of bills that they accumulated while in school; no job, no unemployment insurance. It will be a very discouraging situation for all of them.

It is still very true that the more education that one has the greater the employment opportunities, but exceptions make the rule. It is the same everywhere. If there is one young person with a masters degree who cannot find a job the news of that of course travels far and wide. Everyone knows about that particular situation and the bad news that will circulate will discourage more young people from continuing their education. That is sad.

To make all of this worse, we are going to have an extra six months additional interest. That will cost Canadian students $35 million annually. That is $35 million annually. That is from Department of Finance officials who testified before the committee. This is not just a few dollars, if anyone is of that opinion. If members across the way do not understand what that represents for young people entering the work force to collectively have a bill on their shoulders of an additional invoice of $35 million, that is sad.

It is sad indeed. It is sad that we are even discussing this kind of proposal. My colleagues, the hon. member for St. Boniface, and the hon. member for Ottawa Centre, have worked very hard, very actively, tirelessly I would add, for the betterment of young people. All I want is hopefully to convince the government to withdraw this piece of legislation.

The best we can do right now is to ask the government to delete at least that portion of the bill. In 1990 the former minister promised a complete overhaul of the student loan program. Some overhaul.

[Translation]

We could easily do without amendments like those presented to us today because the last thing young people need is to have this kind of bill to pay when they leave our post–secondary institutions to find work.

[English]

Let us all be sure of one thing. Who is going to pay for this? It is not my kids in university and it is probably not the children of people who are from other middle to upper middle class backgrounds. It is going to affect in a disproportionate manner those people who come from lesser means and who are trying to improve their situation. They have to borrow money because there are not the resources in their families.

All this is to say that it is my hope that the government will withdraw this bill and, if it does not do that, at the very least it will withdraw the offensive clauses.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Madam Speaker, I rise today to support the amendments put forward by my colleagues in the Liberal Party. They are amendments which are designed to delete particular clauses in Bill C–76.

I do so for a number of reasons, one of which is the work my colleague, the member for Windsor—St. Clair, has done in terms of post–secondary education and in tracking this particular issue.

Another is the work that the Canadian Federation of Students has done in trying to convince the government to move in a different direction when it comes to student loans. Regretfully the committee of this House that was charged with reviewing this bill decided not even to hear from the students, not to allow witnesses. I think that is a travesty.

Another is because I am a parent. I have a daughter in university. I have a son and a stepdaughter who will hopefully be in university or college at some point in their future.

I also went to university. I must say at the time of my post-secondary education I was very fortunate that not only was I able to access the student loan and student grant program as it existed then, but I also had a Department of Veterans Affairs scholarship. My father fought in World War II and was disabled because of the treatment in a prisoner of war camp. My tuition was therefore paid. I received an honorarium each month and had access to student loans. Even that was not enough. I can remember having a number of part-time jobs in order to put food on the table for my new family. Perhaps that combination is why I never completed university, why I ended up getting a job when one was available as opposed to completing university.

When we look at these particular clauses we see that what the government is doing is placing more barriers in front of our young people, our future leaders, our future business people, our future entrepreneurs, our future inventors, our future scientists, making it that much more difficult for them to gain access to college or university level.

I come from a university-college community. Confederation College in my riding has been a key in providing access to college programming not just in Thunder Bay but in northwestern Ontario. Lakehead University in the riding of Thunder Bay—Nipigon but whose faculty, staff and students live within my jurisdiction also has provided services not just to northwestern Ontario but to the rest of Canada and indeed the world. Therefore, I am very aware of the importance of education.

I am also more aware these days as we see our mills downsizing, some of our mills closing, our grain industry declining, that there are no longer the jobs that young men and women can get into right out of high school. They recognize this. They know they have to go on.

I have talked to parents who say: "I cannot afford the $10,000 a year that it will take for my child to go to school outside of my community". I have talked to fathers who are part-time cab drivers in order to help pay for their children's education.

Every time we put a barrier or a road-block like the provision in this bill which will say that the moment you get out of school, the moment you graduate, you have to start paying back, it does not deal with the reality of society today.

It does not deal with the reality of unemployment among young people, even though we all know a graduate from a community college or a university has a much better chance of getting a job. Whether your field is in the general arts or a specific trade, there is a much better chance of getting employment.

The reality is we have an unemployment rate in excess of 19 per cent. In some communities for our young people it is 25 to 30 to 35 per cent. We see migrations of young people out of my region moving to the golden horseshoe in search of work.

The reality is that the day a graduate had a job waiting for him or her the day after the graduation ceremonies is long gone. We no longer see halls full of recruiters at universities and colleges. It is difficult to get people even to come to the campuses to offer jobs for students because the jobs just do not exist. There is so much downsizing.

Therefore to say to the students who are about to enter college or university that the moment they graduate they will have to start paying the interest back is putting one more straw on a very overburdened back. It is not cheap to go to school even in one's own community. There are costs that are out of reach for a number of families. The Canada Student Loans Program has been an exceptional aid to Canadian young people in giving them access to higher learning. That is why we are supporting these amendments, the sole purpose of which is to delete specific clauses dealing with repayment in particular.

The government will argue it is doing this because it is going to eliminate the 3 per cent tax that students have to pay up front. In testimony before the committee officials said that it is not going to happen at the same time. The moment this bill passes the other place and the Governor General puts his signature on it does not mean the 3 per cent tax is gone. No, it will be gone when enough revenue has been raised through this other process.

That reminds me of the promise made—I am not quite sure whether it was just after World War I or during World War II when the Government of Canada decided to impose a temporary income tax on Canadians.

An hon. member: It was in 1917.

Mr. Angus: I thank the tax expert in the corner. In 1917 it was a temporary tax on income. Well, we all have our forms at home. We know that the 1917 temporary tax has become a permanent feature. It is said that death and taxes are with us always.

When the government says: "We will eliminate it down the road," we have no faith. We have no faith that the government will do that. In addition to convincing government members to vote in favour of deleting these particular clauses we must see how else we can assist our young people in getting that education and minimizing the barriers to accessing education. More important, an education designed toward a career does not do any good if the jobs are not there.

Everything this government has done from my perspective is to eliminate, eliminate, eliminate jobs. It has created an environment where it is impossible for the private sector to create jobs. All it has been able to do is downsize, downsize, downsize. Look at rail. Look at air. Look at the whole transportation sector.

Look at research and development. We are not putting dollars into that field either publicly or privately to create an opportunity for our young scientists or engineers to get into the workforce and do some good things for Canada and the world. We do not do enough research on the medical side so that we can put those medical specialists who are more interested in working in the laboratory than working with individual people because they know they can find a solution to a problem as opposed to fixing what is broken. We do not provide the resources there either.

I say to the government that these clauses are wrong. They should be deleted. That is why my caucus is supporting these particular motions which we would have put in in any case in the name of the member for Windsor—St. Clair. I hope the government is listening and is prepared to recognize that what it is doing is not going to help our young people get ahead in this world.

Mr. Dave Worthy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, I rise today to speak to the amendments proposed by my colleagues opposite.

It is important to remember that the budget of this government was dedicated to fiscal restraint and deficit reduction in the interest of sound responsible management. In Bill C–76 we amend the Lobbyists Registration Act, the Salaries Act and the Canada Student Loans Act.

• (1040)

All measures were designed with restraint in mind. The measures in this bill pertaining to the Canada Student Loans Program were introduced as part of the government's over–all restraint program.

I would like to remind all members of the House that we do not practise restraint because it is fun or because we are opposed to programs. We practise restraint because of the need for responsible management. The removal of the six–month post–school interest free period as of the 1993–94 loan year is an integral part of this over–all effort. Some of my colleagues want this measure removed from the bill.

The 1992 budget signalled the government's commitment to reform the Canada Student Loans Program. This was reiterated in the December economic statement. We all agree on the continuing importance of the Canada Student Loans Program in maintaining an accessible post–secondary learning system. But that does not preclude the need for constructive reform.

Like so many other areas of public policy, it is necessary to update the program to ensure that it continues to provide assistance to needy students. The amendments of Bill C–76 should be viewed in the context of other measures currently being undertaken by the government to strengthen and improve the Canada Student Loans Program.

As currently structured the federal government guarantees loans made to full–time students by lending institutions. The taxpayers through the government pay the interest costs while the students are at school and currently for the six months after graduation.

The fact is that the elimination of the six-month interest subsidy will affect students only after they have left school and are normally in a position to repay their loan.

The financial burden of eliminating the six-month interest subsidy should be minimal. For an average loan, the monthly payment will be increased by less than $3.50 which is an amount well within the financial capacity of most if not all students who have graduated.

Borrowers will continue to have up to six months after completing their studies to make repayment arrangements with the lenders. However during this period, interest on their loans will accrue. Borrowers will have the choice of paying this interest in one lump or having it capitalized into the amount of their loan.

Borrowers will still have access to up to 18 months of interest relief which is a component of the program available at the end of the six-month grace period. If they are unemployed or temporarily disabled, they will continue to have access to interest relief.

In addition it is important to remember that Canada student loans will continue to be interest free to students the entire time they are in school.

Therefore I am confident in saying that while the amendments will contribute to the deficit reduction effort, students by and large should not be disadvantaged.

Since it was created in 1964 the Canada Student Loans Program has enabled more than 2.5 million Canadians to pursue post-secondary studies thus contributing to the development of a well educated and very acceptable work force.

I urge my colleagues not to support this amendment. I have explained the rationale behind these changes to the Canada Student Loans Program and how they fit into the over-all restraint program. We all agree on the importance of the Canada Student Loans Program. The program will continue to be effective in promoting post-secondary education.

I suggest that we get on with passing this bill as was originally intended.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Madam Speaker, I would like to start off by saying that the specific part of this bill I will be dealing with concerns the Lobbyists Registration Act.

The remarks I will be making today about a specific firm that I will be dealing with are not meant to be partisan remarks. I will be talking about an organization called Government Policy Consultants (GPC). A lot of people tend to think that when we talk about the Lobbyists Registration Act we are basically talking about lobbyists who tend to be labelled as Conservative lobbyists. However this particular firm has Liberals involved.

My good friend the Hon. David Collenette, who is actually one of our candidates in a downtown Toronto riding, is a member of this firm. James Crossland, who is a very good friend of the Prime Minister, is also a member of this firm. Another member is Mark Rudolph, who happens to be a constituent of mine and is a good Liberal lobbyist. Sharon Vance is another good lobbyist who used to be an executive assistant to Mr. Broadbent and was also a senior assistant to Bob Rae. There is also another good Liberal, John Duffy, who used to be a senior advisor to my good friend and colleague the member for LaSalle—Émard.

My comments are not in any way, shape or form partisan. I am not promoting GPC because it has some Liberal lobbyists. It also has some Conservatives and some NDPers. There might even be some Reform Party lobbyists.

Included in the brochure that Government Policy Consultants sends out to its clients is a code of conduct. I am going to read two or three excerpts from this code of conduct. It says: "GPC will respect the confidence of clients and not reveal confidential or private information obtained during the professional relationship except where authorized by the client or required by law to do so. GPC will conform to the federal Lobbyists Registration Act, which requires our firm to register clients for whom we undertake direct advocacy with government officials and politicians. GPC will avoid positions of conflict of interest and will not accept assignments that will in any way bring discredit to the firm or to our profession. GPC will not knowingly place anyone holding public office, elected or otherwise, in a position of a conflict of interest. GPC will not make promises or commitments to clients that may suggest influence over cabinet ministers, legislators or government officials".

I believe that this is a sincere attempt by this corporation to put forward a basic set of ethics by which it operates. The problem we have though is that today there is a perception in this city and in this country that the lobbying industry is not functioning properly or fairly. This is an industry with fees of close to $100 million last year. That is an awful lot of money being paid by people throughout Canada to lobbying firms that approach not only MPs and ministers but officials to put forward the particular customer's position on a particular issue.

The time has come for us to radically reform the Lobbyists Registration Act. Perception being reality we have now developed an industry that has a very bad reputation. We should be examining a bill introduced in the Senate of the United States just recently, S-349.

The purpose of this bill is the effective public disclosure of the identity and the extent of the efforts of paid lobbyists to influence federal officials in the conduct of government actions. By doing that it will increase public confidence in the integrity of government.

Then it goes on to say in section 5(b)(2)(D)(3): "That in the case of a lobbyist lobbying on behalf of a client other than the registrant a good faith estimate of the total amount of all income from the client including any payments to the registrant by any other person to lobby on behalf of the client during the semi-annual period other than income for matters that are unrelated to lobbying activities".

In section 5(b)(2)(D)(4): "In the case of a registrant lobbying on its own behalf a good faith estimate of the total expenses that the organization and its employees incurred in connection with lobbying activities during the semi-annual filing period".

In the United States people must file every six months and they must be very specific about all their lobbying activities.

As we are discussing this Lobbyists Registration Act we should examine this bill from the United States. We should not just have the amounts of money that lobbyists receive from specific clients but should list the officials and MPs who are being approached by the lobbyists. Officials should also report to ministers' offices when they are being lobbied and report the specific issue. In 1985 the Prime Minister said that he was going to reform the lobbying system in this country and that he was going to develop a transparent system.

It is almost 10 years later and we have not done that. I am hearing from many people, from customers of lobbyists and from lobbyists, that they would now like to have a system that would restore the image that the lobbying industry in this country once had. We can only do that by having full disclosure of all the activities that are going on.

As part of Bill C-76 there is a little cost recovery measure related to the Lobbyists Registration Act. The government wants to charge a fee of the companies that are registering. That does not even come close to addressing the real issue that needs to be addressed.

I ask all members of this House to support the chairman of the consumer and corporate affairs committee and radically reform this act.

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Madam Speaker, I rise to talk about the amendment to the Canada Student Loans Act. We have a number of amendments on the Order Paper calling for an overhaul of the student loans act. Back on February 25, 1992 the Minister of Finance indicated that he would be negotiating a new arrangement for student loans with financial institutions and that he would eliminate the 3 per cent administration fee on student loans.

The bill came before the House and the 3 per cent tax still exists. In fact the student population was denied the right to appear before the committee in order to make its case. There was no consultation whatsoever when it came to this part of the bill. Also, the bill itself imposed an extra burden on the students.

If we examine the student loan and its impact on students the latest statistics show that there are in excess of 10,700 students in the Canadian system who have over $15,000 in terms of loans they must repay. That figure has increased by more than 500 per cent over the past four years alone.

If we consider the 3 per cent tax increase, which I and my colleagues in the Liberal Party feel should not exist, as well as the way in which the government is managing student loans one cannot help but say there is a major problem that must be addressed.

We cannot have it both ways. On one hand we are talking about the need to reform our educational system in order to improve our way of doing business in this country so we can move forward and on the other hand we are hitting those who are going to create the infrastructure necessary for that kind of move.

By the year 2000 we are going to see a vast majority of jobs that require at least a high school or post-secondary education. We are going to see a shrinking work force and an increase in the number of people who need assistance from the system. We are going to see the need for a dynamic work force.

One would think that any person with proper reasoning would put a lot more emphasis on helping those who are going to be helping the future generation. It is the student population that will be the main instrument for moving into the next century.

The government is burdening those students with an extra debt load. It is penalizing them. Many of those students are leaving school or finishing university and finding themselves in a situation in which there is no job available for them. The government cannot have it both ways. It cannot on one hand tell the public it is putting more emphasis on education while on the other penalize students who are going to school. It is trying to block students who are going to school. It is creating road blocks for them in terms of accessibility.

Just recently the NDP Government of Ontario eliminated student grants altogether. This is a government that had promised to increase assistance to educational institutions and to students. Now the federal government is doing the same thing. The student population is finding itself in a very awkward position.

We must ensure that we have an accessible national plan for post-secondary education. We must ensure that education becomes a right and not a privilege in the society we live in. It is quite sad, particularly when we look at the illiteracy rate in Canada. Forty per cent of the population group between the ages of 15 to 24 is considered to be functionally illiterate. That represents a loss of revenue to the economy of $10 billion as a result of illiteracy. The government is doing nothing to deal tangibly with accessibility to post-secondary education and education as a whole.

It is deplorable that on the one hand the government promised in 1992 that it would consult with the student population and on the other hand in 1993 it even denied students the right to appeal before a committee so they could argue their case and take the government to task about the 3 per cent tax on student loans. Enough is enough. We cannot continue to fool the public by saying that education is a priority when in fact what the government is doing, in conjunction with the provincial governments in some cases, is trying to create road-blocks, trying to avoid the reform of the educational system, trying to really deliver a blow to those who want to progress in life and move on to make a better life not only for themselves but for society as a whole. It is high time the government took this piece of legislation and put it aside until such time as the commitment of the Minister of Finance is fulfilled in trying to amend the act, trying to do the proper consultation and trying to see what really needs to be done.

I can see my time is coming to an end, but the student population—

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member will be able to continue after Question Period when we resume debate on the bill.

As it is eleven o'clock, the House will now proceed to statements by members, pursuant to Standing Order 31.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

COD FISHERY

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Madam Speaker, both fishermen and processors in the gulf and on the Scotia shelf are getting increasingly frustrated and angry with the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans' confused policies on the harvesting plan for the cod fishery.

On December 18, as part of the 1993 groundfish management plan and a campaign to prevent the capture of juvenile fish, the minister ordered all gear sectors to develop fishing plans before they would be permitted to fish. These and other new restrictions have greatly increased the cost of fishing this year. At the same time, fishermen will be facing quota cuts in the order of 70 per cent.

If this government wants to close down the fishery in the gulf and on the Scotia shelf, why does it not do so directly and provide adequate compensation and adjustment programs for those people in communities that will be affected rather than jerking the fishermen and fish processing companies around with its confused management policies?

LIBERAL PARTY

Mr. Felix Holtmann (Portage—Interlake): Madam Speaker, I would not purposely go out of my way to frighten you, but in this case hang on to your chair. When a former finance minister who brought Canada its highest interest rates, highest inflation, record increases of government spending, becomes the leader of the present day Liberal Party and he makes his economic statement, then this is scary stuff.

The Liberal boss's position on the GST must have his backbenchers almost sucking lollipops. First, he was going to eliminate it. No, no, no. Now it is going to be replaced with, well, it is going to be announced after the election. But no, no, that was not good enough. He is going to replace it with a hidden business transfer tax. No, no, none of the above. It is now going to be studied by a committee.

Now the Liberal agenda is starting to surface. The Liberal platform is sneaky and frightening to all Canadians.

WHITE CANE WEEK

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound—Muskoka): Madam Speaker, I would like to remind the House and hon. members present that since 1946, the first week of February has been designated White Cane Week by the Canadian National Institute for the Blind. A national network of special events occurred during this week to make all Canadians aware of the challenges faced by blind and visually impaired persons in our society.

The theme for this year's week, February 6 to 13, is employer awareness because there has been a tremendous increase in the last decade in the availability of educational and technological resources that enable persons with visual impairments to work. Providing employers with an awareness of the job skills and potential possessed by persons with visual impairments is an important step toward that goal.

I am pleased that the federal government has had a long and productive association with the Canadian National Institute for the Blind. The Department of National Health and Welfare has been supporting this organization—

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am sorry, I must interrupt the hon. member.

DAVIS INLET

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Madam Speaker, Canadians are pleased to learn that the Innu of Davis Inlet will have a treatment program instituted and the government has agreed to move the Innu to the mainland. We cannot stop there. This government may have succeeded in the damage control of promising to take care of the one situation that has attracted the attention of Canadians and the international community, but an official of the Assembly of First Nations informed my office that there are at least 100 communities in similar situations across Canada.

Solvent abuse, alcohol and drug abuse and suicide are rampant in aboriginal communities such as Big Cove, New Brunswick, Fox Lake, Alberta, Cat Lake, Ontario, and I could go on and on. These communities need more of a government commitment to help address these issues. It is time to stop waiting for emergencies to happen before making a commitment. Proactive steps are needed immediately, not reactive steps when atrocities occur.

GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Madam Speaker, one year ago today members endorsed a New Democrat motion which called for Canada to support a balanced GATT negotiating position on agriculture including the maintenance, strengthening and clarification of article XI and an end to export subsidies.

Lately ministers having been saying clarification when they are speaking to farmers at home and tariffication when they are dealing with negotiators outside the country.

Tariffication will destroy supply management. There are periods of the year when U.S. poultry prices are so low that even a high tariff will not keep them out. We therefore call on the government to reaffirm its commitment to advance the concerns of farmers of supply managed commodities at the GATT.

LIBERAL PARTY

Mrs. Monique B. Tardif (Charlesbourg): Madam Speaker, the Liberal Party of Canada and its leader continue their exercise in vacillation on the GST as on so many other issues.

Last night, in the second economic statement in as many weeks, a second version of their position was made public. In Ottawa last week, the GST was replaced with a VAT to be included in the price structure and thus invisible to consumers.

According to what was said in Toronto last night, the GST would not last more than a year under the Liberals, after which they would tell us what Canadian consumers could expect.

I may remind hon. members opposite that a consumer tax was introduced to put Canadian industries during this difficult period of transition on the same footing as their international competitors and that it was a visible tax at the request of consumers who wanted to make sure their government would not take advantage of the tax to increase program spending.

All Canadians, which means all consumers, have a right to know the true intentions of the Liberal Party of Canada.

A word to the wise.

MEMBER FOR ROBERVAL

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Madam Speaker, today I would like to thank the hon. member for Roberval and Minister of National Health and Welfare for his prophetic insight because yesterday the minister bravely conceded the next election to the Liberals.

In fact, the minister recognized the tremendous popularity of the Liberals when he admitted that his party was considering an alliance with the NDP. According to the hon. member for Roberval the outcome is a foregone conclusion. This is a political party that has hit rock bottom.

I therefore invite the Prime Minister to take a walk. Perhaps he could go across the street from 24 Sussex to see the Governor General and ask him to call an election immediately.

LEADER OF THE LIBERAL PARTY

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Madam Speaker, last evening the leader of the Liberal Party made a major policy speech in which he addressed many subject areas in very general terms.

One such area was fiscal responsibility which invites some interesting comparisons. For example, he spoke of unwaivering discipline in controlling expenditures. Yet in the 15 years of Liberal government during the 1970s and early 1980s the rate of growth in government program spending rose on an annual average of 14 per cent. By comparison, in the past eight years of Conservative government program spending has been restrained to an average growth of less than 4 per cent each year.

Similarly, the Liberal leader made a general commitment to reduction of the deficit in terms of gross domestic product. Perhaps he does not realize that even in the depths of recession the Conservative government has reduced the deficit in those terms from 8.7 per cent to 5.1 per cent. That is the difference between promises and performance.

MINISTER OF FISHERIES AND OCEANS

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Madam Speaker, thought to be extinct, yet again the Crosbisaurus has lumbered out of the tarsands to wreak havoc. Known to be callous, verbose, obsolete and bumptious, untethered this creature meanders about causing harm to all that fall in its path.

S. O. 31

Last night the fisheries minister said that with the proposed UI bill "it seems that everyone quitting their jobs today have been sexually harassed".

To gales of laughter from others from the tar sands, the minister went on to say that if he had been sexually harassed he would want everyone to know that he had been "so favoured".

This is an outrageous statement. Yet again the minister has shown his gross insensitivity to the issues affecting Canadian women. Yet again we see how flawed the interpretation of the new UI legislation will be.

The minister of fisheries owes an apology to every victim of sexual harassment for making light of such a serious issue. With the exception of the Newfoundland Chamber of Commerce, it is no longer even amusing that the Crosbisaurus roams about without a leash and a gag.

LIBERAL PARTY

Mr. Walter Van De Walle (St. Albert): Madam Speaker, another flip-flop for the Liberals. Last week the Liberal leader said he had a plan to scrap the GST. It was reported in the media as the Grits' sleaze tax. Hidden and unfair, it would tax food.

However this week the Liberal leader, speaking at the Toronto Empire Club, admitted that it would be up to 12 months after the next election before the details would be made public. Canadians are demanding that the Liberals come clean with the public; stop waffling.

The Conservative government has a clear economic plan. It has removed the manufacturing tax and replaced it with the GST to make Canada more competitive in the world market.

The Liberals have no plan. Canadians have a right to know where political parties stand.

CITY OF MONTREAL

Hon. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): Hélène Drapeau, assistant clerk of the city of Montreal, kindly sent me a copy of a resolution passed by the executive committee of the city of Montreal on December 22, concerning the unfortunate freeze on grants in-lieu-of-taxes which will put the city in a very difficult position because, as it says in the resolution, the decision was made without prior consultation with the municipalities.

I wish to inform hon. members that next Monday we will meet the mayor of Montreal the executive committee and everyone who is concerned about a decision that will create tremendous problems for Montreal which stands to lose $10 million without having been consulted. The entire Quebec caucus—yesterday, the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce put a question on the subject to my good friend, the Minister of Finance—understands the financial situation but our point is that there was no consultation and this puts tremendous pressure on the finances of the city of Montreal.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member's time is up. The hon. member for Sarnia—Lambton.

SMALL BUSINESSES LOANS ACT

Mr. Ken James (Sarnia—Lambton): Madam Speaker, as a small business person, I am fully supportive of the review of the Small Businesses Loans Act. Amendments to the act are indeed long overdue.

In particular, I have had a major concern that our small businesses did not have adequate access to readily available capital. A number of entrepreneurs in Sarnia—Lambton have reinforced this concern.

Today I still have some reservations that the current amendments to the act will correct this problem. Improvements rely on a firm and unwaivering commitment by our financial institutions to better utilize the program, to maximize access and to be moderate in their demands for collateral on a personal guarantee. I question whether current amendments to the Small Businesses Loans Act will guarantee this commitment.

However, let me reaffirm my support for a number of the changes to the Small Businesses Loans Act. There was and in my mind there still is room for improvement to this act. Let us make the most of this opportunity. Let us make the SBLA what it is supposed to be all about, access to needed financing and capital for our small businesses.

NORTH AMERICAN FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Madam Speaker, it is with grave concern that I rise in the House today to warn Canadians as we head into an election campaign that yes, indeed, this government is finished. There are choices to be made in the next election on precise policies. We know where the government stands on NAFTA and now we know where the Liberal Party stands on NAFTA as well.

Yesterday, as sweepers after the parade of the Leader of the Opposition's speech, the members for LaSalle—Émard and Etobicoke North said that the Liberals would probably sign NAFTA and try to change it later. That is an absolute cop-out. It is a sell-out even worse than what the Tories are doing.

MEMBER FOR SKEENA

Mr. Clément Couture (Saint-Jean): Madam Speaker, after hearing what the NDP member for Skeena had to say to the Americans about electricity from Quebec and considering his refusal to retract and stop the screening of a video that criticizes the Great Whale project, all Quebecers feel that what he said was uncalled for, unjustified, and not helpful in creating a better environment.

The leader of the New Democratic Party dissociated herself from the statement, calling it excessive. We can assume this means the hon. member for Skeena will have to leave his party and thus will not be able to apologize to Quebecers.

I therefore want to ask the Leader of the New Democratic Party, the hon. member for Yukon, to apologize to Quebecers on behalf of her party.

THE ELDERLY

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Madam Speaker, I rise today to express my extreme disgust with the continuing attack on seniors by the Ontario NDP government.

The NDP has plans to charge seniors who live in apartment buildings for basic maintenance services such as outside window cleaning and painting.

I find such policies to be reprehensible and inexcusable. The latest attack on seniors involves the NDP decision to remove pay phones from lobbies of seniors buildings. In many cases, high rise buildings with hundreds of seniors have been left without access to a public phone. The rationale for this is that it will save through the whole national capital region $18,000 per year.

By removing these phones, the NDP is putting the safety of seniors at risk. If the NDP insists on removing these phones anyway, when is it going to put in some sort of a public safety phone for those seniors?

This is just another example of poor NDP government management. There must be a better way—

Madam Deputy Speaker: I regret the hon. member's time has expired.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. John A. MacDougall (Timiskaming—French River) Madam Speaker, yesterday we had the opportunity to hear the leader of the Liberal Party at the Empire Club in Toronto tell us about his economic plans.

Instead of Canadians being able to sleep well last night, they had nightmares. They had nightmares because they can remember the six and five wage and price controls when the same member was in government. They still remember when he was in power saying the government would not tax gas. What did they do?

The economic plans of the Liberal leader and the Liberal Party are they want power and there is no economic plan.

This is the same party that gave us the 21 per cent bank rate. This is the same party that gave us the 21.7 per cent mortgage rates.

Canadians want the truth. Canadians want economic policies brought forward, not the shadow boxing the Liberals are trying to give us. Let us hear what the Liberal Party really stands for.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

MINISTER OF FISHERIES AND OCEANS

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister.

For weeks now we have heard the government claim that it is very concerned that sexually harassed women should be dealt with fairly and should have access to UI benefits.

Last night in a speech to the Lewisporte Chamber of Commerce in Newfoundland we heard a senior minister of the Crown characterize how he views sexism.

"Apparently just about everybody who quits their job is being sexually harassed. We must have one hell of a lot of attractive people working. I have never been sexually harassed myself. If I were, I would certainly want to make it known that I had been so favoured".

How can the government on the one hand claim to be serious about the issue of sexual harassment and on the other hand have a senior minister display such abject ignorance on the subject?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the government is very serious about the issue of sexual harassment and violence against women.

The hon. member knows the minister of fisheries, and knowing him as I do, and as she does, I am absolutely convinced that it was not his intention to reflect unfavourably on genuine victims of sexual harassment.

The minister is on his way to Ottawa. I can assure you, Madam Speaker, that if there is clarification required about this statement it will be issued.

I have just been handed a document which is a review of a book that was written about Mr. Crosbie. It reads: "In fact it was John Crosbie who pressed his colleagues to appoint more female judges, to federally enforce maintenance and custody orders, to stop discrimination against women in the Armed Forces and put an end to the sexual exploitation of women and children in pornography. But when it comes to a choice between his legislation or his limericks, the press usually runs with his off-coloured humour every time".

In fairness I do not think—

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. minister will have a chance to continue.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Madam Speaker, it is not the press running with off-coloured humour.

It is the minister once again displaying his absolute and total insensitivity to the issue of sexual harassment and the devastating effect it can have in the work place.

• (1120)

I want to ask the Acting Prime Minister this once again. Given that he and his colleagues claim to be very concerned about this issue, does he not realize that the comments of a senior minister of the Crown ridiculing the issue of sexual harassment in the work place sends out the wrong message at the wrong time and that this is the wrong bill?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I can assure the hon. member and all members of the House that the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans is not insensitive to sexual harassment and exploitation and violence against women. He has a clear record to substantiate that.

He is in transit. He is coming to Ottawa. If it is necessary to clarify what he has said, I know very well he would want to do that. I am sure the hon. member will find his statement of clarification satisfactory.

[Translation]

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Madam Speaker, we are being asked to change topics. It is unacceptable for the Acting Prime Minister in the House today not to deny the policies expressed yesterday evening by the minister who belittled the problem of sexual harassment in the workplace.

I want to quote again what the minister said last night: "I have never been sexually harassed myself. If I were, I would certainly want to make it known that I had been so favoured".

Is the Acting Prime Minister prepared to reject these comments categorically here in this House and say that they do not reflect the government's policy?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, as I indicated there will be a statement of clarification made by the hon. minister.

Ms. Copps: What about you?

Mr. Mazankowski: The hon. member says: "What about you?" I did not make the statement and I have full confidence that the minister of fisheries will make that clarification. She has known the hon. minister for quite some time. I think she recognizes that a jest was involved in this. He was making fun of himself and not sexually harassed women.

Ms. Copps: And cripples and coloured.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Wasn't it Jean Pelletier who said that?

An hon. member: Yes.

Mr. Mazankowski: Madam Speaker, while I understand very clearly the sensitivity of this issue, I appeal to the hon. member to wait for the minister to clarify whatever misunderstanding may have occurred. I can assure the hon. member that her reflection of what the hon. minister said is not an accurate reflection of government policy.

EMPLOYMENT

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Madam Speaker, my question is for the minister of employment. Among the victims of this recession are tens of thousands of workers in their 40s and 50s. These employees have been offered and have taken voluntary separation packages from their firms. However, under the government's new rules, if the employees take these packages they are cut off forever from the possibility of collecting unemployment insurance.

The minister has said that his changes to the unemployment insurance system were designed to catch bums, cheaters and fraud artists.

Why does the minister think that employees in their 40s and 50s who have to take these severance packages are bums, cheaters and fraud artists? Does he not realize that they are decent people who are still in the labour market and will have need of the unemployment insurance system?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, I find it incredible that the hon. member would stand up in this House and put these words in my mouth. I did not utter them.

What I indicated, and what the government has indicated quite clearly, is that on the general severance issue you cannot receive severance benefits and unemployment insurance benefits at the same time. What he does not add is that once your severance benefits run out you are then eligible to collect unemployment insurance benefits.

The hon. member is talking about an adjustment issue, policies the government has been pursuing since 1984 in a much more pro-active way than any government before.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Madam Speaker, the minister's officials said quite clearly yesterday that workers who accept severance packages will not be eligible for unemployment insurance at any time if his rules go into effect.

Thousands of Canadian workers in these tough times have been taking voluntary separation packages. There is no scam here. There is no rip-off here. They are just companies and employees trying to cope as best they can with the effects of this government's economic policies.

How can the minister talk about the need to restructure the economy and at the same time try to put into effect a policy which will undermine attempts at this restructuring being carried out in a way that is fair and humane for the men and women involved who have to stay in the work force?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, I want Canadians to know that when we talk about adjustment measures, the hon. member who just stood up and pretended to be so concerned, the Liberal Party of Canada and the New Democratic Party of Canada, are the very people who opposed strenuously for over a year the implementation of measures that would protect the unemployed people that they claim they seek to protect.

We increased the funds under UI from $350 million two or three years ago to $2.21 billion to help unemployed Canadians. In our quest to help unemployed people adjust we were opposed all the way by the now pretenders to power on the other side.

Mr. Cid Samson (Timmins—Chapleau): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

The draft document dated December 1992 written by the minister's director of benefit entitlements was sent to all regional managers and directors of insurance services and benefits programs, the executive director and directors general of insurance, the director general of benefit pay systems, the directors of insurance policy and the legal counsel of insurance.

Earlier this week the minister repudiated this document, a document which demands that workers remain in unsafe working conditions, as well as a host of other intolerable situations. This was done under the name of reasonable alternative.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member may wish to put a question.

Mr. Samson: Madam Speaker, if the guidelines in this document are not to be followed, will the minister table documents in this House which clearly state this, as well as documents which outline the sensitive procedures the minister has stated repeatedly will be followed when adjudicating claims under Bill C-105?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member, the printer of new money, should know. He should really reflect on this. Demagoguery will lead you nowhere. It will lead no one anywhere.

I have never seen the documents that he so proudly distributed to everyone on the Hill and to every media reporter in the country. This is work from some level in the department.

The important issue here is for Canadians to know that in the implementation of this provision under Bill C-105 its only purpose is to try to rule that benefits will not be given to those who choose without provocation, without reason whatsoever, to seek benefits.

These are the only people targeted and whatever he says will not change the issue.

Mr. Cid Samson (Timmins—Chapleau): Madam Speaker, with regard to the last statement the minister made concerning what I said about not changing anything, it does not matter what anybody says, nothing is going to change. At least I do not print documents that are as destructive as this one is.

On April 7, 1978 the Tories published the report of its task force on unemployment. Page 9 of the report states:

> Most people on unemployment insurance would rather be working. A problem exists, however, in that there is still a myth held by Canadians that UI causes unemployment and that people on UI are lazy.

On March 28, 1992 the minister said in The Toronto Star that unemployed workers "want to work. They are not lazy. The least you can ask of political leaders is that they identify solutions and try to put them in place".

• (1130)

Why are the minister and his government going back on their word and deliberating creating a perception that all recipients of UI are shiftless and lazy, a perception which pits Canadians against Canadians?

Madam Deputy Speaker: Those are very long preambles and long questions.

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, how can these individuals stand in the House and pretend that they care about the unemployed when they opposed strenuously the efforts of this government to try to help those people who through no fault of their own became unemployed.

We have made expenditures to train those people, which is the key to reintegration into the labour market, at from $350 million to $2.21 billion. The adjustment policies we have put in place are helping Canadians. We shall improve them because we care about them.

Mr. Cid Samson (Timmins—Chapleau): Madam Speaker, in an attempt to be brief I am not even going to respond to that ridiculous statement.

In recent days the minister has repudiated his director of benefit entitlement, his director of public affairs, and even his own stated interest in establishing a UI snitch line. How can we have any confidence in a minister when he repudiates not only his senior staff but also himself?

Is the minister going to do the only reasonable and sensible thing and withdraw Bill C-105?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, the record is clear. At least we must give them that. They argue that the hard working people of Canada and the employers, those small businessmen and women throughout the country who work tirelessly, should pay benefits to a person who, without reason, without provocation or without any reasonable circumstance, quits his or her job.

That is the position of the NDP. We respect it, but Canadians do not accept it and this government does not accept it either.

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

In Atlantic Canada jobs are scarce. There just are not enough to go around. Most older workers who retire do not want to. They retire because at least they will have some income. If they did not take voluntary retirement, younger workers with young families and mortgages would be laid off and would have absolutely nothing.

Why will the minister not guarantee the older workers of this country that he will not deny them their unemployment benefits?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, when the hon. member talks about older workers he could say at the same time: "Why don't you add POWA, a program that was put in place to help older workers?"

I am also from Atlantic Canada. I know the situation in our region of the country. I know the hon. member is concerned about this matter. So am I. I can assure the hon. member and the House that nothing in Bill C-105 will prevent the government from working with firms and their employees to help them adjust to the restructuring, the rationalizing and the downsizing that are taking place.

We have already taken steps in that direction and we shall take more.

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Madam Speaker, there is an economic catastrophe happening in Atlantic Canada right now.

When the Prime Minister was president of the Iron Ore Company of Canada he offered a retirement package. Was that voluntary retirement? That sort of voluntary retirement is happening right across this country at the present time.

Why will the minister not be fair with older workers? Why will he not say that if they qualify and they have paid into the program they can have the unemployment insurance benefits?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, we have to be careful with the words we use and not to mix the issues.

When the member talks about restructuring, obviously people who are leaving their jobs under this type of restructuring are not voluntary quitters in the pure sense of the phrase.

The Government of Canada has many tools at its disposal to lend assistance to employees and employers who are adjusting to new economic realities. All these are presently being pursued in effectively positioning companies for emerging opportunities.

I know what the hon. member is talking about. There is the general issue of severance and I want Canadians to know that once the severance benefits have run out the person is eligible for UI benefits. But when we talk about restructuring or downsizing or cashing out, for example, that may be a situation which not only UI but our general adjustment policy could help these people with.

We have POWA. We have others. We are working on retaining the best adjustment measures in the world which we already have.

Mr. Mills: There is no money in POWA. POWA is empty.

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Madam Speaker, my question is also for the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

At the moment there are about 120,000 unemployed Albertans and by coincidence the Edmonton food bank alone is serving about 120,000 people a year, thanks in large measure to this government's economic policies including the GST and its very bad stabilization policy.

Will the minister in such circumstances tell the House why it was that he did not consult with the respective provincial governments, specifically having regard to what we are talking about today: the buy-outs for people who take severance packages?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, I have just indicated that UI was one of the tools in our arsenal to help people adjust to this emerging economy. Rationalization, restructuring and downsizing are taking place. I said that in those situations obviously the person is not a voluntary quitter in the pure sense of the word. I have already indicated that.

We have taken measures in the past and we will in the future to ensure that the measures in place help those people reintegrate into the labour market. That is the issue.

They can claim whatever they want, but no government in recent history has done so much for the workers of Canada, and we will continue doing that.

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Madam Speaker, the minister still has not given us an answer to the question many of us on this side of the House are asking.

At the moment a recent opinion poll indicated that about one in five Albertans was still prepared to vote for the Tory government. I do not know how that can be.

Will the minister tell us why he is not prepared to listen to one of the few Albertans who is still prepared to be seen in public with this government, namely our temporary premier?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, Canadians will see through it. These people on the other side, the Liberals and the NDPers, are not concerned about the unemployed. They are not concerned about the economy. They are not concerned about the rate of taxes. They are not concerned about the deficit. They do not care about these people who have to foot the bill out there, the real people, the taxpayers.

Mr. Mills: There is no money in POWA.

Mr. Valcourt: They stand in this House and they ask the government to ignore reality. The reality is that unless these steps are taken in a fair way taxes have to be increased or the deficit has to go up with its dramatic impact on interest rates. It will stymie the recovery and we will not do it for the sake of the pollsters or the special interest groups that they play to.

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Madam Speaker, earlier in Question Period the Deputy Prime Minister indicated that the minister of fisheries was in transit. He is in transit all right. He is in transit somewhere between the 19th and the 20th centuries.

What the minister said last night was: "It seems that everyone quitting their jobs today has been sexually harassed". To gales of laughter he went on to say that if he had been sexually harassed he would want everyone to know that he had been "so favoured".

With this outrageous statement, I want to ask the minister of employment: Does he not agree that the minister's interpretation of the proposed UI legislation shows serious flaws in the legislation and just how vulnerable women will be when saying they have been sexually harassed and trying to prove they have been sexually harassed when that is the attitude of the government that is bringing in this legislation?

• (1140)

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I have already responded to that issue. Just to simply repeat, the interpretation of the hon. member and the interpretation of the deputy leader of the Liberal Party is not an accurate reflection of government policy.

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Madam Speaker, this particular minister has a long record of making these kinds of anti-women statements over and over again while I have been in this House of Commons.

I ask the government side of the House and the Deputy Prime Minister: Will this minister be reprimanded? Will he be removed from his position of trust and authority so that Canadian women will understand that this House of Commons and this government do not tolerate such specious remarks about Canadian women?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I have already indicated that the hon. minister of fisheries would be issuing a statement of clarification so that there is absolutely no misunderstanding.

In talking about his record in the book that was written about him—

Mr. Kilgour: You have already read it.

Mr. Mazankowski: I am just reading a review, something that has been handed to me, for the turncoat across the way.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Has anybody ever read any of your books, David? Anyone? Name one.

Mr. Mazankowski: The review states as follows: "In fact it was John Crosbie who pressed his colleagues to appoint more female judges, to federally enforce maintenance and custody orders, to stop discriminating against women in the Armed Forces and put an end to sexual exploitation of women and children in pornography".

That is a pretty good record.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. The minister does not really understand the problem in totally denying unemployment insurance benefits to those who leave their jobs voluntarily.

Yes, those who have just cause will get unemployment insurance, but there are many cases where just cause is not clear-cut and it is difficult, costly and takes months to prove. In the meanwhile the employee is presumed guilty and has no income.

How can the minister support such an excessive, harsh penalty in these questionable circumstances? Wasn't the penalty of 12 months that he introduced two years ago tough enough?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, surely the hon. member is referring to the penalty of 12 weeks.

The government has been clear. This is not about trying to go after the unemployed. This is about trying to protect the integrity of the UI system. This is about trying to avoid having to raise the premium rates to such a level that it would kill the creation of jobs in Canada.

This is about trying to ask people who have jobs, who luckily have jobs today with this high rate of unemployment, to please stick to their jobs and not expect to quit them without valid reasons and expect their fellow Canadians to pay them benefits for a period of time.

If we had all the money in the world, if we were irresponsible as the Liberal Party was for 16 years, maybe we could ignore the fact that at the end of the day it is always Canadian workers who foot the bill. We care for them and that is why we took these measures.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Madam Speaker, the minister is still not answering the key question and he is giving us a lot of rhetoric.

Proving just cause is extremely difficult in many cases. Appeals on average take three to four months and in Montreal they have taken up to two years with no income during that period. As I said the employee is presumed guilty until he proves his case.

When just cause is not always clear-cut and it is difficult to prove, how can the minister justify such an excessive, absolute penalty? Why does he not drop this ridiculous unnecessary bill?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, again I know the hon. member is a reasonable person. Why portray the UI situation for those who appeal as being all in one category when he knows that the vast majority of cases are dealt with expeditiously and within a reasonable time?

I am not saying that this is a perfect world and that we are not ready to try to improve the speed with which we deal with these cases. We are looking at better ways of delivering services to the Canadian taxpayers. The UI system will not be an exception. We will try to improve the situation and be fair to all Canadians. That is what Canadians expect and should get from us.

GOVERNMENT ADVERTISING

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Madam Speaker, my question is for the government House leader.

He said yesterday that the rules had been "followed exactly since 1985" in the awarding of the $21 million worth of government advertising. Yet Mr. Chuck Guité, senior public servant, has confirmed that the rules have not been followed.

I ask the minister which is it and when exactly will he stop defending the indefensible?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, the people who are trying to defend the indefensible are these two reporters who came up with a totally false story last Saturday. Unlike NBC reporters they have not had the backbone to admit they were wrong and get on to other things.

The fact is we are following a process which duplicates what happens in the private sector. Unlike the previous administration we did not have a process of just selecting one advertising agency. We have a process in this case where six agencies made their pitches to a committee of five. That is exactly right. They made their sales pitches and tried to convince the committee of five which one was the best agency to do it.

The hon. member shakes his head. Perhaps he should learn something about this issue before he asks any questions.

As for having heard back from some of the officials who were called by these reporters, these reporters are again distorting what was said to them, ignoring things that did not fit their biases. Frankly, the editors of The Ottawa Citizen should be ashamed to allow them to continue to write that.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Madam Speaker, two senior officials have confirmed there was no written record of the competition. If there is I would like the minister to table it now. One even said there was no rating system about the bid. We also know that the meeting to discuss the contract consisted of a lunch at the Café Henry Burger in Hull.

How can this government, if it had any conscience at all, hand out $21 million worth of taxpayers' money to Tory advertisers on the strength of a meeting at the Café Henry Burger with no written records?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, I am truly outraged. You mean there was a business lunch? Oh my goodness, what next? Who knows what is going to happen now? They actually had a business lunch. Gee, what a scandal.

The reality is that these agencies came forward, as they always do in these circumstances, with story boards, with pictures and sketches of the kind of program they would give out, with a description of what they proposed to do if they won the contract. These things were assessed by a committee of civil servants, not politicians, but a committee of civil servants. They decided on the two agencies to run this campaign.

It is a system eminently fairer than the system in place when the Liberals were in power. It is a system that works. It is a system that is duplicated in the private sector.

The hon. member should try to find some other rock to turn over and maybe he will find some other worms squirming around to focus his attention on.

ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister regarding the proposal to construct an export gas pipeline from the Mackenzie Delta across Yukon to Alaska.

Since the pipeline would interfere with the Porcupine caribou herd, would the Acting Prime Minister assure this House the position taken by various ministers on behalf of Canada ranging from Lucien Bouchard to the right hon. Joe Clark to the present Secretary of State for External Affairs that the 10–02 lands and the coastal plain of Alaska will be accorded wilderness status in perpetuity still stands?

Or does this government oppose hydrocarbon and pipeline development in Alaska but support those despite the impact on the caribou on the Canadian side of the border?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources is not in the House today and I will take that as a representation and relay it to him.

• (1150)

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Madam Speaker, what is unfortunate is that two of the ministers involved in this are sitting on the front benches.

On Monday the Liberal Party reversed its position on the $1.5 billion fixed link from New Brunswick to Prince Edward Island and said in this House: "We want a full environmental assessment of this particular project and this particular bridge".

Will the Deputy Prime Minister now direct this project to such an assessment or will he allow construction to begin as on the Oldman River dam in Alberta and have the courts order an assessment and perhaps then a decommissioning?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, it is true that the Liberals are changing their position on a lot of things. So are the NDP.

I noticed today that the minister of economic development in the province of Saskatchewan, who is an ardent opposer to the North American free trade agreement and the free trade agreement, went to Mexico with a group of 10 people and has gone through an immaculate conversion. He now says that North American free trade would be the greatest thing for western Canada.

There are a lot of conversions taking place and I will certainly take the hon. member's question in that context.

CANADA STUDENT LOANS PROGRAM

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Madam Speaker, I have a question about student loans for the Secretary of State or the minister answering on her behalf.

In the February 1992 budget it was indicated that the 3 per cent administration fee on student loans could possibly be eliminated following negotiations for new arrangements with Canada's banks.

Have these negotiations now reached the stage where that surcharge of 3 per cent on student loans can in fact be eliminated?

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship): Not yet, Madam Speaker, but the discussions with the lenders are now well advanced. From what I am advised an announcement will be made on the successful conclusion of those discussions.

ELDER ABUSE

Mr. Lawrence MacAulay (Cardigan): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Seniors.

Canadians are becoming more and more aware of the problems associated with elder abuse. Despite this our government is planning cuts of over 80 per cent to the Seniors Independence Program, a program designed to combat elder abuse.

How can the minister justify these cuts at this time?

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Vézina (Minister for External Relations and Minister of State (Seniors)): Madam Speaker, our government has been very vigilant and in 1988 we initiated a strategy to deal with the needs of seniors. Through this five-year plan, we have developed all kinds of programs which must be implemented in co-operation with the organizations and seniors themselves, including those excellent programs dealing with the problem of violence against older people.

I have a document which is ready to be discussed by cabinet and we fully intend to repeat this initiative which will be based on seniors' current needs, given that these people are active and know how to take on responsibilities and share their daily experiences.

[English]

Mr. Lawrence MacAulay (Cardigan): Madam Speaker, the government managed to find $21 million for its friends but the sad fact is that it can find only $2.5 million a year to combat elder abuse. The government is simply robbing Peter to pay Paul in funding programs to fight elder abuse.

Does the minister have a co-ordinated program to fight elder abuse and if not, why not?

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Vézina (Minister for External Relations and Minister of State (Seniors)): Madam Speaker, the government has taken an initiative on family violence. Through this program we also work with seniors. But I must emphasize again that, whether it is the New Horizons Program or the Seniors Independence Program, it is up to retired and seniors to submit programs to us. We have done an extraordinary job with the provincial governments in setting up awareness, information and activity programs within groups, and we certainly intend, as a responsible government, to continue to work in close co-operation with our partners—municipal and provincial governments and seniors' groups.

WATER

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. As he probably knows in 1987 and again in 1989 the government promised a drinking water safety act. On page 35 of the 1990 green plan the government promises that: "In 1991 the federal government will introduce a drinking water safety act". Seven years have gone by since the first promise was made. In the meantime sales of bottled water and domestic water purifiers have sky-rocketed thus reflecting the increasing lack of confidence of Canadians in their drinking water.

Will the government introduce and pass this legislation before the next election?

Hon. Mary Collins (Minister of Western Economic Diversification and Minister of State (Environment) and Minister Responsible for the Status of Women): Madam Speaker, I think we are all concerned about issues relating to drinking water. In fact just recently the minister made some statements out west indicating that how as Canadians we have to be more sensitive to the cost of drinking water and that we should be paying more for the utilization of it. We are the second lowest of the developed countries next to Italy in that respect.

We obviously have been working on an appropriate legislative framework. Not knowing when the next election will be I cannot promise that it will be concluded before then. However it is an issue that the minister and our department are working on assiduously.

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): The government has abandoned another important piece of water legislation, namely the Canada water preservation act which was allowed to die on the Order Paper in 1988. It would have forbidden major water exports.

Will the government bring back this legislation before this Parliament is dissolved?

Hon. Mary Collins (Minister of Western Economic Diversification and Minister of State (Environment) and Minister Responsible for the Status of Women): Madam Speaker, I am sure my hon. colleague is aware that in other pieces of legislation, for example the legislation dealing with the free trade arrangements, there are specific particulars which prohibit the large scale export of water. We anticipate those will also be in the legislation dealing with NAFTA. Therefore it is clear that this government does not support the large scale export of water. That has been our policy and continues to be so.

LIBERAL PARTY

Mr. Felix Holtmann (Portage—Interlake): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

The Liberal leader has flip-flopped all over in order to find a replacement for the goods and services tax. What negative impact would an ill-thought-of business transfer tax have on Canadian businesses and the Canadian public?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I think all Canadians were waiting with great anticipation yesterday for a clear signal as to what kind of tax the Leader of the Opposition was going to propose as a replacement for the GST. We are not sure whether it will be a BTT, a business transfer tax, a GST, a Grit sneaky tax, or a CST, a Chrétien sneaky tax.

The hon. member from Edmonton chirping over there had better beware because it was that minister who was part of the group which formulated the National Energy Program that gave us the PGRT, the petroleum gas and revenue tax, the petroleum compensation charge, the incremental oil revenue tax, the Canadian ownership—

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Okanagan—Shuswap.

COMMUNICATIONS

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. When announcing his decision to allow competition into Canada's long distance telephone market the CRTC reassured Canadians that affordable local rates would be maintained.

Just recently Bell Canada made application to increase local rates because of an erosion of its long distance revenues. Bell Canada, which showed profits of some $986 million in 1991, will increase local calling rates by 10 per cent in the case of residential consumers and 9 per cent for business consumers.

Does the Deputy Prime Minister recognize that these increases in local rates are anything but affordable particularly in today's stagnant economy? Will he ensure that the CRTC keeps its commitment to the Canadian people to maintain affordable local rates?

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship): Madam Speaker, I understand the matter is before the CRTC. There will be adequate opportunity for all to make their representations. The Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs made a valid intervention in a response he made in the House earlier this week. I am sure he will be monitoring with great interest the proceedings on behalf of all consumers.

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Madam Speaker, my supplementary is for the same minister.

Article 1302 of the North American free trade agreement requires that services offered by public networks be priced to reflect the economic costs of providing such service. As well, U.S. companies, including telecoms and resellers, would be given non-discriminatory access to public networks.

I would like to ask the minister whether he would agree that under NAFTA, American companies would use our networks to bleed off business from Canadian telecoms. Would he also agree that this will further erode the long distance revenues and force Canadian telecoms to seek even greater increases in local rates.?

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship): No.

SCALLOP FISHERY

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

On January 24, eight U.S. scallop boats were arrested for fishing illegally in Canadian waters off Georges Bank. This illegal fishing for scallops in Canadian waters is continuing.

On any given night between 12 and 17 American vessels illegally capture thousands of pounds of Canadians scallops worth hundreds of thousands of dollars. The U.S. vessel owners know that this government has demonstrated its inability to enforce Canada's fishing laws in our coastal waters.

When is this government going to get tough with U.S. scallop poachers and start properly patrolling our coastal waters?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, this problem was brought to the attention of the minister of fisheries and myself by the member for South Shore, who shares some of the member's concerns.

We have looked into this. We are prepared to take action in conjunction with the scallop fishery as we have indeed on other fisheries, whether it is dealing with overfishing from Europe or whether it is the agreement we have with the United States.

We have looked into the situation and we will take whatever action is necessary.

PARLIAMENT OF CANADA ACT

BILL TO AMEND

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-404, an act to amend the Parliament of Canada Act (oath or solemn affirmation).

Madam Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 68(2), the motion is deemed adopted.

Mr. Bellemare: Madam Speaker, the purpose of my bill is to make sure that a member cannot sit in the House of Commons or receive funds for his or her parliamentary duties without swearing or solemnly affirming loyalty to Canada and the Constitution of Canada.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Mr. Bellemare moves that the bill be now read the first time and printed.

Pursuant to Standing Order 69(1), the motion is deemed adopted.

Bill read the first time and printed.

PETITIONS

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Madam Speaker, this petition concerns a human rights violation in Vietnam. The Vietnamese communist government has continued to violate the fundamental human rights of its citizens through arbitrary arrests and detentions without trial, censorship of the press, denial of the right of free association and refusal to hold free and democratic elections. It has imprisoned without a fair trial many religious and political prisoners.

These petitioners are calling on this government to take the strongest possible action to ensure that the communist regime of Vietnam respect human rights.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have two petitions to file.

The first petition points out that the planned closure of the immigration office in Surrey and New Westminster means that immigrant applicants who have paid $250 for an application will receive much poorer service. It also points out that the loss of the 38 jobs in Surrey and New Westminster that will be transferred to downtown Vancouver means a loss of jobs in these communities and a further concentration of work in the overcrowded and expensive downtown core.

The petitioners call upon the Minister of Employment and Immigration to reject the planned closure.

PHARMACEUTICALS

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Madam Speaker, my second petition concerns Bills C-91 and C-22, which have effectively destroyed our generic drug industry. It calls upon the government to repeal these bills.

CHILD SUPPORT

Mr. Ron Fisher (Saskatoon—Dundurn): Madam Speaker, I have two petitions to present today. The first is from the people of Saskatoon and concerns the taxation of child support payments.

The petitioners point out that the imposition of the tax on child support payments is a heavy burden on the parents who receive them and often results in the impoverishment of children after a marriage breakdown. They ask that the government change the tax system so that is no longer the case.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Ron Fisher (Saskatoon—Dundurn): Madam Speaker, the second petition concerns the proposal of the federal government to move the services of Immigration Canada to a central processing unit in Alberta rather than having the services available to people within the different communities across the country.

The petitioners point out that in many ways this will cause hardship for people using those services and certainly will slow down the process by which the Canadian government provides services to people.

HOUSING

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Madam Speaker, my petition has been signed by a large number of residents in my constituency of Ottawa South and concerns the announcement in last year's budget of the termination of the Federal Co-operative Housing Program. That program has provided affordable accommodation for many residents of Ottawa South as well as people across Canada.

As recently before the last budget as December 17, 1991 the Minister of State for Housing stated that the benefits of co-op housing were such that a budget of $6.1 million should be allocated in 1992. This was summarily cut in the budget.

This program is one that ought to be preserved for the benefit of all Canadians.

VIOLENCE

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Madam Speaker, I have a petition signed by parents and grandparents in my riding of Carleton—Gloucester. They want to see marketing and sales of the Serial Killers board game, 1st edition, banned in Canada. The game includes a mortuary kit, 25 babies and four murderers. The purpose of the game is to commit murders. For children at an impressionable age, this is a very suggestive game. As you know, Madam Speaker, the game includes tearing off a baby's head. That is part of the game.

I therefore ask the minister to give this matter his attention and ban the sale of this game in Canada.

CRIMINAL CODE

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-69, an act to amend the Criminal Code (air and maritime safety), as reported (without amendment) by a legislative committee.

Hon. Monique Vézina (for the Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada and Minister of State (Agriculture)) moved that the bill be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

Mrs. Vézina (for the Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada and Minister of State (Agriculture)) moved that the bill be read the third time and passed.

Mr. Rob Nicholson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Madam Speaker, I wanted to say a few words at third reading of this particular piece of legislation.

Just before the summer break it was reported back to the House without amendment from the legislative committee. It is an important piece of legislation. The events of yesterday underline how important it is for Canada to take legislative initiatives and enter into agreements with other like-minded countries to try to control terrorism wherever it exists.

Once this bill has passed third reading, been passed by the other place and given Royal Assent Canada will then be in a position to implement three international agreements that we helped create. Those three agreements are the Protocol for the Suppression of Unlawful Acts of Violence at Airports Serving International Civil Aviation, the Convention for the Suppression of Unlawful Acts Against the Safety of Maritime Navigation, and the Protocol for the Suppression of Unlawful Acts Against the Safety of Fixed Platforms Located on the Continental Shelf. We will be in a position to implement those international agreements once we have made the amendments to the Criminal Code, and that is what we have done.

This bill helps to extend the reach of Canada's Criminal Code. I am sure members are aware that the Criminal Code was drafted at a time when there were no international hijackings. I suppose piracy was a problem. It is covered under the Criminal Code. This is one of a number of attempts by the government to update various parts of the Criminal Code. It is an important one because it would make a difference in the kind of case we saw yesterday where a crime may be committed in one country and the individual may end up in another.

The provisions of this bill extend the provisions of the Criminal Code so that we could prosecute an individual if they were abroad and there was a Canadian connection.

It also extends protection to the fixed platforms, the oil drilling rigs. We make it clear through our amendments that the Criminal Code provisions apply to them as well. It has been properly described as an anti-terrorist piece of legislation. This is a fact of life. There have been a number of examples.

As recently as yesterday we have seen examples of this kind of situation and Canada is under an obligation. Canada is a leader in trying to bring countries together so that there can be a co-ordinated approach to ensure that there will be no safe haven and there will be no country in which a hijacker or terrorist can land and expect to be immune from prosecution.

It is a step in the right direction. It is a bill that is directed against acts of violence against people. It covers acts involving the destruction of property, attempts to commit these kinds of offences and even complicity with those types of offences.

This particular piece of legislation has not received a lot of publicity. Perhaps it will receive more as Canadians and people in the international community reflect on the difficulties we have in ensuring that this world is a safer place in which to live and not just within the borders of Canada. It extends jurisdiction when Canadians or others are either the victims or involved with the commission of an international offence.

It is a step in the right direction and I am sure that as such it will receive the approval of this House.

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Madam Speaker, I wish to support this bill that the hon. parliamentary secretary has put forward in the House today. This legislation amends the Criminal Code to enable Canada to implement three international anti-terrorist agreements developed under the auspices of the International Civil Aviation Organization and the International Marine Organization. These agreements extend the "prosecute or extradite" principle of international law.

Canada joins the other states in an effort to eliminate our country from the list of safe havens for terrorists committing violent acts and this bill goes in that direction. The bill creates new offences in the code to deal with unlawful acts of violence. They are directed at airports serving international civil aviation, maritime shipping and platforms attached to the seaboard on the Canadian continental shelf and it extends the jurisdiction of the Canadian courts over such offences occurring outside of Canada.

The problem is that this bill has been so long in coming. It should have been before this House well before now. The government continues to play catch up in what needs to be done. It is very difficult to find reasons not to support this bill because what is said in this bill is correct as far it goes. The problem is that it should have been here well before now.

We are very fortunate some act of terrorism has not happened in this country where we needed this type of legislation but it was not available. This certainly is not a new concern but goes back many years. We should have been one of the first countries to sign these agreements.

The parliamentary secretary said that by joining this list of countries, Canada will not provide a safe haven for terrorists and that we are working toward eliminating all of the countries where this type of person will not be welcomed.

Frankly, I do not anticipate a day in the near future where there will not be safe havens for this type of criminal. It is a very tragic situation when there are countries in the world that do not realize how important it is to stamp out terrorism. Unfortunately that is just a fact of life. There will always be countries that will offer a safe haven to terrorists.

While having this bill does Canada's share in participating in these three agreements, it does not eliminate the need for further documentation, further legislation and further agreements.

I listened one time to a speech by the hon. member for Port Moody—Coquitlam advocating a world court. I have a feeling that this is the way to go. We really need a world court of criminal justice, not only to deal with terrorists, but also with hijackings, acts of international piracy, pollution in international waters, and last but certainly not least, war crimes.

Those who witnessed on the CBC News the night before last the documentary on the situation in Bosnia-Hercegovina cannot help but be touched by the tragedy and the slaughter that is occurring in the city of Sarajevo. They cannot also fail to be touched by the actions of inhumanity toward each other and the war crimes that are occurring there day after day. There is now going to be an attempt to monitor these war crimes. I really have no idea what success they are going to have in dealing with this.

Certainly these types of crimes should not go unpunished. There should be a forum that deals in this area. We do not have an adequate forum to deal with these concerns. Relatives of people who live in Bosnia who are being savagely abused in the name of war will not see these perpetrators go punished. That cannot be allowed to continue.

Canada as a member of the international community must work toward an international organization to deal with these crimes. This present government seems to have a reluctance to push in this direction, perhaps because it will offend somebody that Canada does not want to offend.

I can tell the House that it will not offend humanity. It is humanity that requires an international court of justice. It is humanity that requires us to deal with war crimes and terrorism and pollution in the high seas, to name only a few areas. If we cannot in this modern, complicated, interdependent world work out an arrangement to deal with these crimes then we, as an international community, and Canada in particular, are not fulfilling our mandate to the people of the world.

The fact is we are not moving—I am not saying we are not moving fast enough in this direction. As I have said, this bill as far as it goes is quite acceptable and I would say helpful. Unfortunately it does not go far enough as far as the government's efforts to correct what needs to be done is concerned.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to speak today on Bill C-69 on behalf of my caucus. I do so at the behest of my colleague, the hon. member for Port Moody—Coquitlam, who did the work on this legislation.

As we said at second reading, we support it. We find it somewhat frustrating that it takes more time than I think is appropriate for Canada to move to adopt the legislation that in effect implements a decision that the government agreed to, whether it was with IACA or IMO, having sat with other officials from around the world and come up with solutions to international problems. I would hope that we can find ways to streamline this process.

From 1988 until it was tabled in the spring of 1992 to passing this House in February 1993 and hopefully getting quick consideration by the other House, will mean it will be in place and up and running.

Having said that, I do not know of any particular cases that have been in limbo because this bill had not been passed. In fact I am pleased that we have not had to invoke the provisions of this bill to do it.

It is ironic that we are debating it at third reading today after having spent a lot of time yesterday—I think all of us in Canada if not around the world—watching the first hijack in something like 17 years occurring. We heard stories of Canadians who thought they were going to the Middle East only to find themselves in New York City as a result of the hijacking.

Perhaps it is a good lesson for all of us. There are those in our communities who wonder why we still have security at our airports, why we are so insistent on carry on baggage being X-rayed or hand checked in the case of smaller airports where they do not have the X-ray facilities.

We on this side of the House, on an ongoing basis, are pressuring the government of the day about security procedures at airports, such as matching baggage with the people who are on the planes. I think there are still problems out there in Canada where we could do a better job.

I would like to offer a friendly suggestion to the government. The Minister of State for Transport, who has a personal interest in this area, is in the House. Perhaps Transport Canada should send one of its staff to Frankfurt to act as an observer as the officials there begin to review what exactly happened. How did a passenger get a hand gun through security?

My sense of Frankfurt and other European capitals is that they do a much better job than we do when it comes to security. The minister shakes her head. I would be happy to hear from her how much better Canada is than the Europeans but I think there is something to be learned. Obviously the Frankfurt air officials have something to learn, to find out what happened there, but there may be a glitch in the system that will assist Transport Canada in improving our security services to an even better level.

I raised an area where I believe the government should act during second reading of the bill. It is the manner in which we contract for security services at our airports. The current procedure is that the Government of Canada makes the airlines responsible for providing the services and at each major airport through an agreed upon procedure one of the carriers accepts responsibility for security. In turn it will contract with a private security firm which will hire personnel and train them to screen passengers as they go through.

We have long objected to this process. We believe very strongly that the Government of Canada should have the responsibility and the direct control of these security services. We believe they should be Transport Canada employees. They should not be private contractors.

We have seen too often where company A's contract has run out and company B comes along and undercuts and then hires back some of the former personnel at lower wage rates. They are able to get the contract because they are able to reduce the rates of the staff. There is heavier turnover. There are always problems because the new contractor is always non-union. There is an organizing drive and they go through the whole process of whether this is a new bargaining unit or an old bargaining unit, and so forth.

All of us would be happier if Transport Canada would accept its direct responsibility and provide the security services so that we have a crew of trained personnel who could be moved across the country, where necessary. It would mean less turnover and better pay, quite frankly. In turn, we would charge the air carriers and they would charge the passengers. Let us not fuzzy that. It is the passenger who would pay for that service, but they would be paying for their own protection and I think that is appropriate.

We support this bill. I have one final comment I would like to make to the government. I wonder if it could look at how it could streamline the adoption of further protocols, of further international agreements, particularly on the safety of passengers and workers, whether it is on ships at sea, on oil rigs, or on aircraft or in airports, so that Canada comes on board legally, not just morally, much faster.

TOBACCO SALES TO YOUNG PERSONS ACT

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare) moved that Bill C-111, an act prohibiting the sale of tobacco products to persons under the age of eighteen, be read a second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Human Resources envelope.

He said: Madam Speaker, I am very pleased to address the House today to obtain my colleagues' support for Bill C-111, the Tobacco Sales to Young Persons Act.

[English]

The bill deals with a most vital goal, to improve the health of each and every Canadian, particularly children and teenagers.

I am sure that my colleagues on both sides of the House are well aware that today I refer to one of the most crucial public health problems in Canada.

Tobacco use is the single most important preventable cause of disease, disability and death in our country. According to a study conducted by Collisaw and Leahy in 1989 over 38,000 Canadians died from smoking related diseases. One in five of all deaths is caused by tobacco.

It is estimated that in 1995 there will be 48,000 deaths related to tobacco. Other studies show that tobacco use caused 85 per cent of all cancer deaths, 35 per cent of fatal heart disease, and 33 per cent of all strokes.

We can see the burden that tobacco represents in terms of loss of life and human potential, financial loss and human suffering. This burden hangs heavily on Canadian society and we must attempt by all means at our disposal to lighten it or eliminate it entirely.

Nevertheless, encouraging progress has been made to date: tobacco consumption has declined in Canada in recent years. Tobacco consumption per capita fell 20 per cent between 1985, when the government introduced the National Strategy to Reduce Tobacco Use, and 1990.

I think that it is important to point out and for Canadians to know that these results have been made possible by the efforts of all levels of government and our partners in the health field in Canada who are unanimous on fighting tobacco use.

Tobacco use has also declined among young people aged 15 to 19, but it is probably the age group where the number of smokers is still too high, especially and sadly I would say among girls, who are starting to smoke in greater number than boys of the same age. You should know that very rarely do people start to smoke after the age of 18, but once a youngster is seduced by tobacco it is very difficult to quit.

[English]

The government's anti-tobacco campaign is not an isolated measure in our efforts to improve the quality of life for the young. There are a number of initiatives aimed at providing children with the best possible environment, which will allow development to their fullest potential. For example, initiatives are aimed at pregnant and nursing mothers in order to prevent malnutrition and tobacco addiction from harming their newborn babies.

I am very pleased that the youth and tobacco measures we have put forward have considerable support among the Canadian public. Moreover, 76 per cent favour preventing access to vending machines by minors. A poll released yesterday by the National Campaign for Action on Tobacco found that the majority of Canadians, both smokers and non-smokers, are in favour of measures to curb tobacco use by minors.

I think that it also must be said that the government's fight against cigarette smoking is not limited to legislation, despite what some may think. On the contrary, this bill today is part of an overall strategy comprising several types of programs all intended to reduce considerably the number of young people who smoke. Fighting such an entrenched and widespread habit as tobacco use requires involving the whole community. When the community as a whole sustains such changes, one can realistically anticipate a long-lasting shift in behaviour. This is what we hope to achieve with the National Strategy to Reduce Tobacco Use.

We all recognize how important prevention is. Prevention can be achieved through educational programs, raising public awareness and various other measures.

• (1240)

[English]

Our resolve will not lessen despite the enormity of the problem of tobacco use in Canada. We will continue to take further initiatives to protect the health of Canadians.

It is my intention to come forward in the very near future with revised health warnings on cigarette packaging to warn Canadians, especially the young, of the dangers of tobacco smoking. As well the government will continue with new promotional campaigns including a program designed to help Canadians quit smoking.

[Translation]

Before closing, I would like to mention a few more features of the new legislation. The Tobacco Restraint Act provides penalties which we believe are now outdated.

According to the new legislation possession by minors will no longer be a criminal offence; fines for selling tobacco will be raised from $1,000 to $50,000 to show how serious it is to sell tobacco to young people; the Department of National Health and Welfare will be responsible for enforcement.

An adjustment period prior to implementation will be provided in order to develop a community-based compliance strategy through consultation with the provincial governments, municipal authorities and band councils. Of course, this will also allow retailers and vending machine operators to become familiar with their new responsibilities.

Federal inspectors will conduct investigations and prosecute where warranted.

[English]

I believe that all my colleagues are in agreement on this legislation. We must inform the youth of this country of the benefits of a healthy lifestyle. We would like to provide them with a healthy environment in which to live. We would like to provide them with an environment, a society in which it is normal not to smoke.

I ask the House to support the health of future generations. I ask that Bill C-111, an act regarding tobacco sales to young people, be supported. Madam Speaker, I think you will find consent to go through all stages of Bill C-111, including committee of the whole, and complete consideration of the bill today.

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Madam Speaker, I am delighted to speak on Bill C-111, an act to repeal the Tobacco Restraint Act and to replace it with an act prohibiting the sale of tobacco to young persons.

My son Sherwin is 17 years old. Today if he so chooses he can walk into any corner store in the country and buy cigarettes, just as thousands and thousands of Canadian youth like him are already doing. The selling of tobacco to youth will change and it must.

Tobacco mortgages the future of our children leaving them forever indebted to disease and poor health. Tobacco will leave them addicted, forming a crippling bond between clean, young pink lungs and hundreds of chemicals, many of them cancer producing substances. This wedding between nicotine and the health of youth is a match made in hell.

Currently 28 per cent of Canadians aged 18 and older smoke cigarettes. Those who have tried and stopped constitute about 36 per cent of the population while another 36 per cent never learned how to start smoking.

Obviously Canada's campaign against smoking among adults has been remarkably successful and we have also reduced the number of smokers among our teenagers. Those successes are due to educational campaigns and the increase in prices of tobacco.

The educational campaign must focus not only on the dangers of smoke to the human body but also on the dangers of smoke to the human mind. It causes addiction which is a 40-year sentence in the nicotine trap.

These measures are not enough as are demonstrated by the continuing sobering statistics among youth. It is estimated that by age 12 half of all schoolchildren will have experimented with cigarette smoking. That is a very sobering statistic.

Even more alarming is the fact that even when people only smoke a few cigarettes a day at an early age it is likely to lead them into a life of addiction. Teenage smokers become regular smokers.

A young girl named Claire Huston posed as a model for the cover of The Canadian Medical Association Journal last month for National Non-Smoking Week from January 18 to 24. She posed as a model for her peers so that they may not learn how to smoke and so they may not be placed in the nicotine trap. She sent a clear message to everyone that cigarette smoking is harmful and it is doubly harmful because it damages not only the human body but also the human mind.

For this reason I stand here today, with the Liberal Party of Canada behind me, and proudly support the Minister of National Health and Welfare in his repeal of the outdated Tobacco Restraint Act of 1908 and his introduction of the present bill. This bill will raise the legal smoking age from 16 to 18 years, decriminalize possession by minors, restrict the location of vending machines to licensed premises and impose fines on vendors who sell cigarettes to minors and thereby decrease access by minors to cigarettes.

The penalties enforcing this bill, fines of up to $50,000, have been declared harsh by some and radical by others. I sympathize with store owners who worry about making the mistake—I repeat, the mistake—of selling to someone they mistook to be of legal age.

However, our court system in Canada has proven to be sensitive and careful. At the same time I would like to emphasize that this legislation is preventive in nature. For every teenager buying tobacco with a fake identification card there will be dozens turned away at the store counter because they could not prove themselves to be of smoking age.

Some have said that this is a very harsh measure, that it is a radical measure but it concerns a serious health problem that we want to prevent among the youth of our country. Not only are they affected physically and mentally but it has the consequence of increasing demands on our health care system which runs into billions. In 1989 cigarette smoking related problems were estimated to have cost our system about $3 billion. That is a sizeable amount of money that we can spend for preventive programs.

A store owner must use discretion, ask for ID when unsure and always fall on the side of caution. Drinking establishments have been doing this for years and they manage quite successfully. We will not find that 19 per cent of young males and 25 per cent of young females are alcoholics but we will find that those numbers of youth are addicted to tobacco today.

It is a matter of social conscience and responsibility. I know very well that store owners are very responsible Canadians. However, I shudder when remembering a recent study in Halifax where children aged 12 to 14 were sent into stores to buy cigarettes. Approximately 60 per cent of them would sell tobacco to these children. That is an alarming phenomenon.

Why were they selling this addictive product so easily? I believe part of the answer is in the fines for this offence under the existing federal legislation. Fines of $10, $35 and $100 for the first, second and third offences respectively are no deterrents at all.

A cavalier manner toward tobacco sales also developed because the government and society until now have not sent a strong enough message to retailers. With 38,000 Canadians dying each year because of diseases related to tobacco addiction there is no denying the need to keep our youth away from tobacco. Retailers must heed the fact that tobacco is addictive and dangerous and not sell it to children.

I believe we have reached a new dawn in social responsibility in this country when in a survey released just yesterday 90 per cent of Canadians called for tougher government action against selling tobacco to our children and youth.

Today indeed is a day for unanimous consent among all political parties, all members of Parliament to give this bill speedy passage, saving it from death by prorogation of the House.

I would have preferred to introduce some amendments myself to further strengthen the bill, but I am willing to forgo them in the interest of the benefits already in the bill so that we can go on with that. Last summer I prepared a private member's bill calling for increased fines and even a jail term. I was advised by constitutional lawyers that it could pose a constitutional challenge and thereby delay the passage and implementation of the bill. Therefore, I will settle for the second best, it is still good.

I am sure that if tobacco were discovered today and marketed, it would never get federal drug approval. Since millions of Canadians are currently addicted we must work backward to discourage its sale in Canada and to bring up a cigarette-free generation.

For Liberal co-operation in passing this bill, I have received assurances from the minister of health that the tobacco file will still remain a top priority in his department and I thank him for that.

I would like to remind the minister that since 1989 we have waited for the improved tobacco package labelling promised by his predecessor. A recent court endorsement of the tobacco advertising ban by the Quebec Court of Appeal has now opened the door for the minister to proceed with his promise. I would like to see him do this in The Canada Gazette as soon as possible.

I also have been gravely concerned about smokers aged 16 to 18 who will no longer be able to legally access cigarettes upon passage of this bill today. I would like the minister to consider them because if they are already addicted, they need help. I am glad to say that again the minister has given me the assurance that there will be help for these addicted youths. I would like to remind the minister that I will be watching.

I ask the minister to do more and to re-evaluate his department's budget for the widest and most effective distribution of such educational campaign materials.

I have also asked the minister of health to get tougher on smugglers. He must ensure that bootleggers who sell smuggled cigarettes from the back of a truck are shut down. We know that the smugglers would be the last to ask a child for ID.

In conclusion, I would like to indicate to the House that the minister has agreed to meet with the provincial ministers of health within the next six months to discuss licensing of establishments that sell tobacco and to discuss better provincial laws governing the sale of tobacco to minors.

Again I would like to say that the Liberal Party gives its support to this bill to encourage more and better legislation as a part of a new social responsibility in tobacco legislation. Bill C-111 although not completely perfect, will show the world that children come first. Only five pages long it means a lot not just to Canadian youth but to children the world over.

Mr. Langlois: Mr. Speaker, I think you will find consent to do all the stages of Bill C-111, including Committee of the Whole, to complete consideration of this bill today and that when the question is put on any amendments moved in Committee of the Whole they be deemed negatived.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Reimer): The House has heard the terms of the motion.

Mr. Angus: Mr. Speaker, yes there have been discussions and I assume that when the motions are placed in Committee of the Whole and debated and then negatived, they will be negatived on division. That is what the record will show. With that we agree.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Reimer): Is it agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, I am most pleased to be able to speak on this bill for a short period of time. I want to congratulate the minister for moving forward on this legislation. It is an important step toward dealing with the problems of tobacco addition.

First, as was already pointed out by 1994-95, 45,000 Canadians will die because of tobacco related illnesses. Over and above that, the cost of expenditures to our health care system runs into the tens of millions of dollars. In a time when we are all experiencing funding shortages particularly in health care, it is important that we take whatever preventive measures we can to decrease the incidence of illness.

Second, it is very important to remember that all research has shown that if young people do not start smoking before the age of 19 the probability of them starting to smoke is greatly diminished. That is the essence of this piece of legislation. It is trying to clearly say to the younger people that it is a health risk severe enough that we are going to try to prevent them from starting to smoke up until the age of majority.

This bill does two or three things that I support. First of all, it does set a uniform age across Canada. I will speak a little more about that later on at the committee and report stages. It is important to have a Canadian standard rather than having 11 or 12 provincial and territorial standards.

Second, it also increases the fines to a meaningful level. One of the problems we frequently have when dealing with fines is that if the fine is too low, it simply becomes a licence for the person to continue to commit the offence. That is the situation we now have in Canada. The fines are not deterrents. The fines in no way will stop people from that activity. But now with the increase in the fines of up to $50,000 that will of course be a real deterrent.

Third, I support the bill because it does something about the issue of vending machines. Vending machines have become an unsupervised way of obtaining cigarettes.

There are some weaknesses in this bill. If there had been a little more consultation with the opposition, with the provincial legislatures, provincial governments and provincial ministers of health there could have been improvements. There would have been a growing consensus across this country that we should move to a uniform age of 19. Other provinces already have legislation moving the age to 19. I will speak briefly on that later on.

There could have been a tightening up of some of the loopholes whereby someone can simply buy cigarettes on behalf of a youth and is not subject to any penalty. On the whole, I and the New Democratic Party support the thrust of the government. We say let us go forward. Let us go forward, if there are flaws I am sure the minister and if not the minister, I certainly will be back before the House in six or seven months to propose constructive amendments to improve the bill.

I want to make a couple of other comments about where we are in terms of dealing with tobacco addiction. The minister gave his assurance to me and to others in a letter to me this week. He said: "As I stated previously, it is my intention to come forward with revised regulations under the Tobacco Products Control Act to require stronger health warnings on cigarette packaging".

I am happy to get that minister's assurance and I look forward to speedily assisting him in that bill also. I hope he takes that bill to the second step, that he stops the sponsorship of events by tobacco companies because that is a form of promotion that is now considered to be ill-advised throughout the world. Other countries, such as Australia, have stepped forward and have banned any promotion of events by tobacco companies.

I also hope the government will reconsider its strategy for dealing with smuggled cigarettes. The removal of the export tax has been a dismal failure. We have had incident after incident across this country in the last three or four months where exported cigarettes are being brought back in and sold. I am calling upon the government to reinstate the export tax.

I would also like to see the government live up to its obligation in the area of education. More can be done in that area. There has been a cutback in dollars within the health department for education.

Finally, the time has come for the government to put some real money into assisting people to shake this addiction. We spend money on alcohol treatment centres. We spend money on addiction treatment centres. But the government has never seen fit to develop a systematic workable program accessible to everyone to assist them in quitting smoking.

That is a very significant step which must be taken because more and more Canadians, not only younger people, but also middle-aged people are beginning to realize it is not in their interests and not in the interests of Canadians for them to continue smoking. However, they do need assistance in dealing with that addiction. I can give the minister the assurance that we will move quickly through all three stages this afternoon so that we can get this legislation on the books and we can move forward to deal with this problem of tobacco addiction among youth.

Mr. Lyle Kristiansen (Kootenay West—Revelstoke): Madam Speaker, I do not intend to take a great deal of time. I am not speaking on behalf of my party. I do not intend to vote against the bill. However, there are a couple of issues I want to raise.

One has to do with certain factors affecting those who are still, as I am, dumb enough to smoke, especially those who work within the House of Commons. I do not mean the members of Parliament who frequent the ladies lounge or the government lobby or some of the alcoves in the parliamentary restaurant where smoking is still rather openly permitted despite the rules and regulations.

Up until a few days ago the only place some staff and members could smoke on these premises and were allowed to get away with it in an open sort of way was in the loading bay at the back of the Centre Block under the kitchen garbage chute. Because of a fire in a dustbin hundreds of feet away, it has been decided to enforce that too.

It was a health crusade that later became a moral crusade when the anti-smoking crusade got under way, especially the rules and regulations as far as the House of Commons is concerned. There were questions raised that there ought to be some ventilated areas, at least one in each building, where those who were still encumbered with this habit could smoke without having to go outside in the middle of winter.

An hon. member: But you guys will pay for it.

Mr. Kristiansen: I would remind the member opposite that if he wants to talk about who will pay for it, nobody pays for it more than the people who pay the tobacco taxes in this country.

An hon. member: If you want a special privilege you pay for it.

Mr. Kristiansen: If you talk about the cost of health care, we also die earlier, improve the actuarial tables and save you a lot of money on pension plans. So do not worry about that aspect of it. They cancel each other out.

I come from a different world than a lot of members here. It is called heavy industry, lumber and mining. Related to that, I can remember some cancer maps of Canada a few years ago. You do not see them very often now. However, the incidence of cancer across Canada was always much higher in mining and smelting areas, pulp and paper industry communities than it was anywhere else in the country.

I do not think there were ever any statistics that suggested that people in those areas smoked more than anywhere else. One thing a lot of us who worked in heavy industry are fed up with is what used to be common practice in industry and that is to make everything an individual guilt trip and cracking down on individuals instead of cracking down on industry.

The emphasis in industry used to be that everybody had to be dressed like the Six Million Dollar Man with ear protection, respiratory protection, gloves and hard hats instead of protecting the worker from the hazards at source.

One thing that is comfortable for politically correct people on this moral crusade that anti-smoking has become is that they can keep attention on that if society concentrates all its anger and all its feelings against individual habits. It is a con job. It was a con job in industry and I suspect it is still a con job.

When there are researchers going out looking for facts to support a given conclusion, which is what a lot of them appear to be doing, how much attention is paid now to the chemicals in the potato growing industry in New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island. I know that nobody in my family will buy commercial potatoes any more.

If you talk to people who work in those areas, it is obvious that lot more of them are dying from cancers produced by the food everybody is forced to eat without warning labels than die or get sick from cigarettes or tobacco products.

• (1310)

I always told my kids that smoking was dumb and that the people who smoked were dumb. Fine. I still think that is a choice they are able to make. To move as we constantly do in the direction of deregulation of industry, deregulation of the collective and an increasing regulation of people's private lives and private habits is not my idea of a free society.

So much of the research is to steer us away from any of the other very real health problems that plague everybody in society without warning labels.

Just on the point concerning the House of Commons, I think it is a bit too much. There was a fire in a dustbin that took place hundreds of feet away from the one area where a lot of people in this House smoke. It was under the kitchen garbage chute at the back. It is a bit much that they should have cracked down on and not have proper ventilated smoking areas within this House for the significant number of people who are still encumbered with that bad habit. It is a bit much.

If we want to look at health effects we should look at the effects of bad administration, bad government and bad practices. We would do a lot better to ban booze from Parliament Hill and the rest of these precincts than we would with tobacco.

If we look around the country at the costs on family breakdown, of death and injury from alcohol, I suspect we would get very close if not in excess of what we lose every year from the bad habits that result from the smoking of tobacco products.

Nobody is suggesting that we ban booze from the Hill. It is part of our culture, but the least that people here ought to be able to expect is that there are some ventilated smoking areas for those who are still encumbered with this bad habit.

Those are some things I wanted to get off my chest. While I am probably the only politically incorrect enough person to voice some of the objections and the feelings that I have mentioned here today, they are representative of a lot of other members of this House, a lot of people who work on this Hill and a lot of people around the country who just do not believe the kind of research b.s. that we have been getting for the last few years.

It is imbalanced. It is research looking for facts to support a given conclusion. It is out of whack. It is out of balance. It does not make sense.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and, by unanimous consent, the House went into committee thereon, Mrs. Champagne in the chair.

The Chairman: Order, please. The House in Committee of the Whole on Bill C-111, an act prohibiting the sale of tobacco products to persons under the age of eighteen.

[English]

Clauses 2 and 3 agreed to.

On Clause 4—Furnishing tobacco to young persons

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Madam Chairman, I would like to move:

That clause 4 be amended by deleting in subclause (1) the words "in the course of a business".

The Chairman: The amendment as moved by the hon. member is receivable.

Mr. Pagtakhan: Madam Chairman, I would like to indicate that the rationale for proposing this amendment is to remove any possible legal loophole whereby somebody would give it to someone who has no real business like the smugglers and second, the so-called middle man. This is really an attempt to improve the bill.

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Madam Chairman, I have already served notice that I would be moving the same amendment when we were talking about getting the bill through the three stages today.

My reasons are basically the same. This appears to be a major loophole. I have had some discussion with the minister's office concerning this. I know that it is an area that will be monitored over the next few months to see if it does become the kind of problem that I think it could become.

By limiting it to a person doing business, it means that you are really opening it up for people to become brokers for youth, to go in and legally buy cigarettes, to go back out and sell the cigarettes to the youth, with both the store operator knowing that is what is going to happen, and the person knowing that is the purpose of their purchase of cigarettes, without being able to do anything. This used to be a problem within the alcohol industry and legislation was brought in to make it an offence for anybody to sell alcoholic products, or give alcoholic products to a minor. We need that same kind of amendment in this bill.

I just want to reiterate that we should move forward with this bill. If in the next six months it becomes obvious that this is a problem, I will be back before this House asking for a comparable amendment.

Madam Chairman, I need your guidance. I have another amendment I wish to make to clause 4 but I was not sure whether you were going to call for the vote on clause 4 or just on the amendment.

The Chairman: We will start with this amendment and then move forward.

Pursuant to order made earlier today, the amendment is considered negatived on division.

• (1320)

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Madam Chairman, I would like to move:

That clause 4 be amended in line 5 on page 2 by deleting the word "eighteen" and substituting therefor the word "nineteen".

It would have been a much stronger piece of legislation if the age had been 19, and I say so for two reasons. A number of provinces moved forward with legislation to establish the age at 19 for a very good reason. Within the high school system there are many 18-year-olds. This makes it very difficult for people in the high school environment and stores around the high school to know whether or not they are dealing with minors. They know that as a result of peer pressure a person who is 18 and in high school will purchase cigarettes for those students who are under age. It would make it much more enforceable to have an age where the vast majority of people in our public high schools would not be able to obtain cigarettes.

The age of 19 rather than the age of 18 is increasingly the age of majority for all sorts of other things across Canada. Therefore, to make it compatible with the legislation now before the Ontario and the B.C. legislatures it should have been 19.

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Madam Chairman, I object to the amendment. It is my recollection that the majority age for most of the provinces remains at 18 years of age.

Perhaps we will be inviting a lot of protest on this basis alone. We may lose sight of the mission of the bill which is to protect minors, those under 18 years of age. I register my objection to this amendment.

[Translation]

The Chairman: Comments?

Pursuant to order made earlier, the amendment of Mr. Karpoff is considered negatived on division, and the same vote applies to an identical amendment to clause 4, at line 25 on page 2.

Amendment negatived.

[English]

The Chairman: Are there further amendments to clause 4?

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Madam Chairman, I move:

> That clause 4 be amended at lines 15 to 20 by deleting subclause (2) and by renumbering the remaining subclauses accordingly.

The reason I am proposing this amendment is that as a former medical practitioner I do not recall a physician ever prescribing tobacco products. Perhaps the only way I could conceive of this would be in a situation where they would tell laboratory technicians or technologists to buy some for their experiments, but they would never prescribe them for patients.

On this basis I thought that this provision, unless the government could clarify it for us, was unwarranted and served no additional purpose in the bill.

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Chairman, the amendment does not say should. As I understand it, it does not apply in respect to the prescription of a physician entitled to practise.

I understand the position of my colleague. I know his expertise at that level. The bill is not necessarily inclusive in terms of what we do, but in an exceptional circumstance where it would have to be done the bill would apply accordingly. That is the reason for it being in the bill.

Mr. Pagtakhan: Madam Chairman, the reason I have great apprehension about this subclause is the implication in the subclause that doctors prescribe tobacco products and that is a very serious indictment of the medical profession. On that basis I remain convinced that my amendment must proceed.

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Madam Chairman, I do not want to get into a long discussion about this amendment but my understanding was that some prescription drugs to assist people to quit smoking, including some nicotine derivative drugs, would be considered a derivative of tobacco.

I agree with the hon. member's concern that there be no implication that under normal practice doctors prescribe cigarettes. It also talks about any product manufactured from tobacco. It may include such things as various kinds of nicotine patches used to assist people in beating the habit. Therefore I think the subclause should be left in the bill to protect the doctor in cases where that is true.

Mr. Pagtakhan: Madam Chairman, a tobacco product is clearly defined in clause 2 as:

> (a) tobacco leaves, and
> (b) any product manufactured from tobacco—
> and includes cigarette papers, tubes and filters.

Nicotine is not a tobacco product. Nicotine is not a cigarette. It is one of the chemicals that causes damage to the human body and to the human mind. It is not a tobacco product.

I remain convinced that this subclause bill is unwarranted and could leave the implication that physicians prescribe tobacco products, which they definitely do not.

The Chairman: Further to order passed earlier today, the amendment is now deemed to have been negatived on division.

Amendment negatived.

Shall Clause 4 carry?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: On division.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 5 to 12 inclusive agreed to.

Clause 1 agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare) moved that the bill be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval) moved that the bill be now read a third time and do pass.

[English]

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Madam Chairman, I would like to thank at third reading the National Campaign for Action on Tobacco. I would like to put on record what the Canadian Council on Smoking and Health said:

> Now is the time for us to seize this opportunity to simply pass Bill C-111, the Tobacco Sales to Young Persons Act.

I would also like to put on record what the Heart and Stroke Foundation of Canada has said:

> This piece of legislation is an important element of a comprehensive strategy which will greatly reduce tobacco use by kids.

Last I would like to put on the record what the Canadian Cancer Society has stated:

> With this bill Parliament can support efforts by Canadian parents to ensure their children's claim to a healthy life.

I submit that a new sense of social responsibility has dawned on us. Now we can demonstrate to Canadians that we are really serious about protecting the lives of our youth, that in fact our children come first.

I would like to make a challenge to all members of Parliament both in the House of Commons and in the Senate. If we donate $1,000 of our income a year for the next ten years, we will be able to generate $4 million and at the end of that time to contribute that amount to the elimination of smoking among the youth of Canada.

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Madam Speaker, it is appropriate at third reading stage to pay credit to those who have fought for legislation and tax policy that have made Canada one of the leading countries in the world in the reduction of smoking and cigarette consumption.

The National Campaign for Action for Tobacco, the anti-smoking coalitions, the Canadian Cancer Society and a variety of other heart and stroke foundation organizations should be commended. All Canadians owe them a debt.

We cannot let it pass without acknowledging they have done it under tremendous pressure and odds. They have taken on one of the most powerful and well financed lobbies in Canada, the tobacco lobby that has highly placed spokespeople with a lot of political influence, well financed campaigns and a tremendous amount of money to spend. In one sense it is like David taking on Goliath. Because their cause was right and they were diligent and persevered, we can thank them for the progress we have made in Canada.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the third time and passed.

DIVORCE ACT

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-79, an act to amend the Divorce Act and the Family Order and Agreements Enforcement Assistance Act, as reported (with amendments) by a legislative committee.

Hon. Thomas Siddon (for the Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada and Minister of State (Agriculture)) moved that the bill be concurred in.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: On division.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Carried on divison.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Siddon (for the Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada and Minister of State (Agriculture)) moved that the bill be read the third time and passed.

Mr. Rob Nicholson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to say a few words at third reading stage of this bill. We as members of Parliament usually say that we are pleased to speak on any piece of legislation. However, this concerns an area I have felt strongly about and I am very proud of the fact that I was able to be a part of the legislative committee and be one of the speakers on this.

In that context I want to thank the hon. member for Terrebonne who chaired the legislative committee that looked into this bill. Indeed, I thank all members of the legislative committee as well as officials from the Department of Justice. Through their work and their initiatives in the department, I think they are making a contribution to the quality of life in this country and they are making a difference by helping to solve a very difficult problem.

That difficult problem involves what happens when a couple becomes separated or divorced. This particular piece of legislation amends the Divorce Act as well as the Family Orders and Agreements Enforcement Assistance Act. It involves amendments to both those acts. They are both steps in the right direction.

One thing that cannot help but strike anyone who started to study the law of this country, as I did 18 years ago, is that there are considerable problems with the whole question of support, particularly the support of children. The law as I understood it and as I experienced it in the relatively short period of time I practised law, made it extremely difficult for an individual to enforce a support order, in most cases against an estranged husband.

There were hundreds of thousands of examples over the years in which women particularly have suffered. Just as important, of course, our children suffer because their estranged father who does not have custody is not paying for support. That is wrong. That is fundamentally wrong.

No system of law in this country or in any other should in any way facilitate or not come to the assistance of children whose mother's counsel has obtained a support order. This is wrong. Nobody has the right it seems to me to bring children into this world and then renege on their obligations to those children.

This sort of thing has gone on in this country for many, many years. Indeed, I remember seeing statistics in my province of Ontario that I am sure are mirrored across the country. Individuals who were up to date in their support payments of their children were the exception to the general rule. Normally support payments and schedules were not adhered to.

That is wrong and it seems to me that every legislator, everyone involved with the judicial system of this or any other country, has an obligation to change that, to do something about it. The problems do not involve just non-payment but what happens when circumstances change.

I can remember one particular example from when I practised law. A woman came in who had a provincial court support order in favour of her children. She told me her separated husband was not paying for the support of the children and that he had moved from Ontario to Manitoba.

The first thing that would go through a lawyer's head is good luck in trying to enforce a provincial court order from the province of Ontario if that individual has moved to another province.

It is not to say that there was not a procedure. There was a procedure. I am going by memory now about registering the provincial order in a superior court, having it transferred to a superior court in another province and then going through the enforcement procedures. It was a very long and expensive process for an individual to get justice and the support that the law requires, in that particular case, for her husband to pay.

One of the things that I was very pleased about after I became a member of Parliament was that the government did come forward with the Family Orders and Agreements Enforcement Assistance Act. It was a step in the right direction.

I know just as we have passed this piece of legislation and as we did the previous one, the knock will always be "you should have done this last year" or "you should have gone farther". I am the first one to say that this does not solve all the problems of the enforcement of custody and changes to orders under the Divorce Act.

I agree with that. I agree it does not fix all the problems but it is a step in the right direction. This is a good piece of legislation just as the previous one was. It did not get much publicity. I used to talk about it. When people would say what are you doing in the justice area, I always told them that we are making it possible, that we are getting the federal government to co-operate with provincial authorities to get involved with collecting support payments from individuals who are under an obligation, not just legal but moral, to support their children.

I was very, very proud that the federal government was involved with that. I am very proud and pleased about this particular piece of legislation. This too is a step in the right direction. It helps in the enforcement of support orders by making some refinements, clearing up some of the red tape and responding to some of the problems we found in the last few years with the original piece of legislation.

As well, it helps individuals who have obtained a divorce and then, for whatever reasons, circumstances change and they want to make a change to the original order. This gives them some flexibility in terms of where they can go to get that changed. That too is a good idea and a step in the right direction but the process is not complete.

I know that the officials from the Department of Justice I referred to earlier are in discussion with their provincial counterparts. They are working on guidelines to help bring some consistency across Canada as to what, under certain circumstances, an individual, a child might expect in a support and custody hearing. I hope to see those recommendations later on this year, which is good.

There has been progress in this area. This is a step in the right direction. There is going to be more progress in this and that is good. I should add that we have seen progress at the provincial level. I do not mind saying that. I do not know what if anything the New Democrat Party in Ontario has done that I agree with, but I certainly agree with some of the moves that have been made in this particular area because this for too long has been a neglected area in society. I have made the comment and I believe it to be true.

If for the last 125 years our system of law and government had been dominated by women, this would not be a problem and we would not need this legislation. This problem would have long since been cleared up.

I am proud to be part of an administration that believes this is a priority and is bringing it forward. I appreciate those individuals who came before the legislative committee. Indeed, I wish there had been more. We sent out invitations and we would have liked to have heard from more groups on this subject, but those individuals who did come forward did contribute positively to the debate.

One of the ideas that came forward was the whole question of taxation of support payments. That is obviously outside the scope of this particular piece of legislation but nonetheless an interesting proposal did come from one of the groups. The interesting proposal from this group was that we should remove the tax consideration of support payments in the hands of the payer and the payee. Generally in a support order the payee is in a higher tax bracket so the tax deduction is usually more valuable to him than the recipient so in effect there is a public subsidy to the whole question.

I am happily married to my wife. I have three children. I do not get a tax deduction. Certainly under the changes to legislation, it is a reasonable question to ask whether those who are separated should get a tax deduction for what otherwise is their moral obligation to look after their children.

I do not want to take up too much time but I hope that is a question that this House will consider. I agree it is beyond the scope of this bill but, as I say, it does touch on this whole area.

This is a step in the right direction and I look forward to the results of the discussions that departmental officials are having now with our provincial counterparts because I believe that too will be fruitful and helpful in this area.

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to be part of this debate on Bill C-79.

To follow what the parliamentary secretary has said, this is a bill to amend the Divorce Act and the Family Order and Agreements Enforcement Assistance Act. Its goal is to improve the effectiveness in the support payment system. We are also supposedly improving the tracing and garnishment system of support payments.

With respect to the Divorce Act, the major change in the Divorce Act appears to be the simplification of the law so that it will be easier for former spouses living in different provinces to apply for custody or a support order.

• (1350)

With respect to the Family Order and Agreements Enforcement Assistance Act this will also reduce costs, this time for investigating child abduction. The proposed amendments remove the requirement that police officers get court authorization to use general federal data banks for tracing individuals in cases of spousal child abduction.

The witnesses who came before the legislative committee were of the opinion that this bill was a step forward. However, they felt that the whole process needed to go a lot further than was the case under these amendments. The problems that exist in the maintenance of children of parents who are separated or divorced is just not satisfactory and in fact is totally unacceptable.

We have a large number of children at risk who are not receiving the support that their single mothers can give and that is really no fault of the single mothers. To give an example, in a study of broken marriages by Statistics Canada which was done in June of last year men who paid alimony and child support had incomes more than twice as much as their partners who were looking after the children.

It is quite a shocking statistic that the husbands paying the money have incomes of more than twice as much as the mothers looking after the children. I say the mothers because the parent who is paying the maintenance in 98 per cent of the cases is the father and the other 2 per cent of course is the mother looking after the children.

That does not leave a lot of funding for the mother and children to live on. This statistic was based on the tax situation in 1988 but according to Statistics Canada very little had changed since 1988 so the problem is still there.

The study also showed that alimony and child support on average made up only 15 per cent of the income of the women who received it. That is an unfair statistic I would suggest because what we are talking about here are a large number of cases where the custodial parent does not receive any maintenance whatsoever. If you average it out over all the families that are separated or divorced where one parent is looking after children and receiving maintenance from the other the income of the mother and children existing in the family is only 15 per cent.

It gives you an idea of how serious the situation is in our communities. What we are talking about are the children of Canada, a large number of children. It is certainly not the majority of children, but a very large number have become children at risk through the system and its neglect or its insufficient attention. These children will be the citizens of tomorrow. We are not guarding this resource. Not only are we not guarding it we are in many cases abandoning its welfare.

We have heard more and more of the situation that exists with respect to crime in our communities. Now more than ever we are concentrating on crime prevention and the reduction of violence in our communities.

While we are concentrating on this and talking about longer sentences for offenders, while we are talking about retribution, more and more evidence is coming forward that we need rehabilitation, treatment and care for the young people in our society.

One psychiatrist testified before the Standing Committee on Justice which studied the question of crime prevention. This psychiatrist is very knowledgeable in crime prevention and children at risk, the very young people in our community. He testified that the most important age for assistance as far as the reduction of crime is concerned, where our dollar can have the greatest impact in reducing crime, is between the time the child is born and the child's third or fourth birthday.

Now that is quite a significant statement. It shows that the younger the child is the more of an impact we can have in bringing that child forward as a citizen who does not resent his or her treatment in society and who does not represent a child at risk who could become a potential violator of the laws in this country.

It has also been said by many and the statistic that sticks in my mind is that for every dollar we put into the welfare of a child below the age of seven we will save $7 in reduced cost to the community in incarceration, rehabilitation, court costs and police costs. Investing $1 will save $7 if we want to look after our very young people.

However, we are not doing it. We are not doing it because of the stereotypical, preconceived attitudes that have existed in this country for some time. We are not doing it because we do not want to change. We want to tinker with the system a little but we really do not want to change it.

We are not changing it even though many women, because of the low maintenance and low support they receive for themselves and their children, have to supplement their income. Two-thirds of the women who receive alimony and child support are raising their children by themselves.

They are left with this very important—I do not want to say difficult because difficult is not the word, although raising a family is not easy today. Important is the best word because they are raising and moulding the citizens who will be in charge of this country tomorrow.

In that there is this important role, this important and meaningful procedure and this important and meaningful task ahead. We all should be supporting these women, these partners of broken marriages who are looking after our children.

What is the reality? The reality is that the majority of Canadian child support orders are in arrears. The majority are in arrears. Most mother-led post-divorce families live in poverty. That is over 50 per cent. This would still be the case even if all payments were made. That remark comes from no source less than the Department of Justice. The reason that even if all maintenance payments were made over 50 per cent of the mother-led post-divorce families live in poverty because the support payments are ridiculously low. Two-thirds live in poverty. That is, with payments being made two-thirds live in poverty. If the payments are not made, 75 per cent of mother-children households would live in poverty.

The Ontario government, as the parliamentary secretary has said, has taken over the collection of support payments in the province of Ontario. I join with him in congratulating it on that. This is important because the stalling and the deflection that has gone on in enforcing these payments has been totally tragic. It has been a national tragedy in Canada. But even with the full support of the Government of Ontario, and I think it is sincere in this, in that province 75 per cent of maintenance orders are in arrears. Goodness knows what the situation would be if it was not supporting them.

Research by Miriam Grassby published in May 1991 in Reports of Family Law shows that the average support awarded is considerably less than half of the actual cost of raising a child.

Therefore, in a family where maintenance payments are received, less than half of the needs of the child in that mother-led family are met by the support payments. That is just for the necessities. That is absolutely no money for the mother for leisure activities or for any kind of retirement package. That is unheard of. There is no retirement package, nothing that could be put aside. Just forget about that completely. The mother is supposed to completely forget about any kind of recreation, any kind of free time, any kind of pleasure or leisure activities or any kind of money put aside for retirement or whatever.

The case seems to be that it is hard to deny your children if you are living with them, but it is easy if you are not. I am not condemning the former husbands. This is not an easy situation. This is not cut and dried. When there is a divorce and a breakup of the family, there is a tremendous amount of animosity.

Sometimes the mother is resentful and if she has custody of the children she does not want the father to have access. If the father does have access, or the court says the father is to have access, she may throw roadblocks in the father's way. The father may be well-meaning at the beginning but because of the frustration and aggravation of trying to see the children he finally says he is not going to go through the hassle and is not going to bother trying to gain access to the children.

That is one way of doing it. That is understandable, with the degree of aggravation, but that is not fulfilling the role for the children. You may dislike your former wife intensely but the fact of the matter is the children are so very important. We cannot just look at the animosity that exists between two adults who are not putting the welfare of the children first and foremost, or one who is and one who is not, it does not matter which one. I do not want to get into that kind of an appraisal this afternoon.

It is sufficient to say that more consideration must be given to the children. As well, judges seem to be unaware of the barriers to a woman becoming self-sufficient if she is older, say in her forties. Not only may she be lacking in skills, experience and opportunity but as the custodial parent she is not free to travel, to work long hours, study at night or socialize with colleagues and may not be able to hold employment, a job that she wants to hold.

That is in addition to the fact that sometimes in marriage the wife sacrifices her career for the husband's career. She does not follow through with her own career because she is working with the children, helping them and moulding these citizens of tomorrow.

The husband can carry on and he does. The divorce takes place. The husband carries on with his career but the wife has jettisoned her career. She does not have a career. She tries to pick it up but she also must care for the children. She also must find a job. As a result of the fact that she has given up these important years of work and does not have the experience but does have an increased age she becomes less and less marketable as a prospective employee.

Add to that the inequities of the tax system. In our tax system a man gets to deduct his child support payments directly from the amount of tax he must pay. If a maintenance order is awarded by the court, if the court says to the estranged husband who is living apart from his former wife and children that he must pay so many dollars a month for the support of his children the husband is not taxed on that amount but it is considered as revenue to the mother. Not only are the courts awarding less than what is necessary for the support of the children but what the mother receives for supporting herself and primarily the children is taxable. She gets even less than what is awarded in dollar terms.

The federal government actually subsidizes the lifestyle of the divorced man to a large extent. There are many divorced men who are faithful in making these payments. They are good fathers who go out of their way to keep in contact with their children. These men really deserve an amount of credit that is not being given to them.

That father has affection for the children. It is difficult when the mother gets custody of the children and the father does not get to keep contact but must pay. He is obviously a man who is putting the consideration of the children first. That is really vital, and he knows that.

Quite often he is paying more than he feels he should be paying, and in many cases he is right. He is paying, he is being taken advantage of. There are lots of ways in which that can be done. It is not one-sided. It is a complicated situation. It is not cut and dried.

In 1988 men deducted $1.3 billion from their income tax for child support payments and saved themselves $475 million in taxes. The government then collected about $275 million in taxes from the recipients of the support payments. That leaves what we could call a divorce subsidy of approximately $200 million. That $275 million, although lower than what the husbands would have paid, was really grinding down the single mothers with children who had to pay that amount of taxes.

Advocates of the system say that it encourages judges to award larger support payments if the husbands do not have to pay taxes. It is also said that many husbands are married a second time and have second families and that there is only so much they can contribute. That is an argument, but there is absolutely no proof whatsoever that husbands separated or divorced from their families are encouraged to pay maintenance or alimony by the mere fact that they do not have to pay taxes on that amount.

Why should husbands and fathers feel that they do not have an obligation? Why should anyone have to be encouraged to support their children, whether they are children living in the family home or children and mothers living outside the family home?

An Ontario government report presented in November 1992 said that child support payments should not be deductible or included in the calculation of taxable income. There should be no tax ramifications at all for maintenance payments or alimony payments. It should be treated as income by the husband and passed along to the former wife and children without any tax ramifications or tax payable by the former wife at all.

That is a recent recommendation by the Government of Ontario. It acknowledges in this study that to do so may cause some courts to re-examine the maintenance orders by arguing that if the husband has to pay taxes then that is more of an outlay by him, and therefore they will have to reduce the orders.

In order to stop the onslaught of realignments of maintenance payments or re-examination of maintenance payments the report states that the taxes payable by the former husband should be phased in each year. For example, each year over a five or ten-year period the husband should pay a higher percentage of taxes until the final result would be that there would be no tax ramifications. It would be treated as income to the estranged husband and no taxes will be paid by the former wife and mother who is looking after the children. The parliamentary secretary mentioned that.

The present situation is costing taxpayers $235 million a year. The 1990 taxation statistics reveal that not only are divorced fathers and husbands being given a tax break but an additional $66 million is not being claimed by the estranged wives and mothers who have the custody of the children. The mothers are in such a difficult financial situation that they try to dodge the tax payments. Through what they consider to be absolute necessity they try to avoid payment of the taxes they should be paying by not declaring their support payments. It is a fact that the government is losing $66 million in that way.

The present tax deduction that men receive when they pay support is arrived at by rewarding the payer for meeting his obligations. That is not something of which there is any proof. There is no substantiation for that case.

The amount of support to be paid should be more in keeping with what is necessary. Whether it is a reality that the courts must face, or whether it is a tax change, there must be change to reflect the need for single mothers with children estranged from former husbands to have more support.

It is also in the interest of the community to ensure that this happens because the children of today are the citizens of tomorrow. They must be considered. They have to be considered because if we do not consider them then we are asking for a great deal of trouble in the future. We cannot forget about the children of this country without paying the price.

In addition to the problems that women face, quite often what they receive is what the lawyer wants. There may not be maintenance payments over a period of time. There may be a lump sum payment. That may be what the lawyer will advocate and not only advocate but absolutely demand. The lawyer may actually take his or her client to court to get what the lawyer feels is in his or her interest in terms of legal fees.

There could be $10,000 awarded to the mother for herself and the children without any maintenance payments over a period of time. That whole $10,000, and perhaps even more, could be taken by the lawyer. That leaves the mother and the children without anything as a result of the divorce settlement.

I once again congratulate the province of Ontario for trying to do something, at least in the initial stages, to correct men's ability to stall. The longer husbands work at trying to stall their maintenance payments the better they become because they know a little about the law. They get to know a little more about the system. They know that perhaps the system will not enforce the orders.

Perhaps they are big movers and shakers in the community and have some clout and that helps them to stall their maintenance payments. That helps them to renege on the support for their children and their former wife. They get to know it a little more as time goes along and of course their lawyers are a big help to them in that regard. That is not to criticize lawyers. Lawyers are there to help their clients and there are good clients and bad clients—

An hon. member: Good lawyers and bad lawyers.

Mr. MacLellan: There are good lawyers and bad lawyers. That is one of the problems.

The other problem is that maintenance orders are not being enforced. They can be held up for years. What does a family do in the meantime? The father can also use the Divorce Act to have payments reassessed and there are various ways of delaying the actual maintenance payments themselves.

Maybe there should be mandatory interest charges and penalties on overdue payments. Possibly that is one way of demonstrating that society is not going to tolerate the neglect of children in the various communities. Maybe, and I say more than maybe, there should be more negotiations in the federal-provincial area to deal with this situation. The actual collection and enforcement of maintenance orders falls within provincial jurisdiction. One of the problems we have in our great country is that divorce is a federal statute but the enforcement of maintenance payments is provincial. Therefore, some areas are in federal jurisdiction and some in provincial.

The parliamentary secretary has stated that there is some movement, some negotiations between the Minister of Justice and his counterparts in the provinces. I want to say that if movement is there it must be measured with a microscope because there is very little evidence of any movement. In fact, in 1992 there were two federal-provincial conferences on justice planned with the attorneys general and both were cancelled by the Minister of Justice.

In fairness, there was the referendum and a few other things that came about, but the fact is that priority was not given to what the government says it feels very strongly about. It was not given at all. There was no priority given to deal with this.

The new Minister of Justice says there will be a symposium from March 10 to 12, where federal-provincial problems will be dealt with. They will deal with young offenders, the problems of maintenance payments, crime prevention and many other areas where federal-provincial negotiations must take place.

It will be a two and a half day conference. How in the name of heaven are any conclusions going to be arrived at? How are we possibly going to reach any kind of improvement in two and a half days with federal, provincial, municipal officials and officials from all the organizations that deal with crime prevention in Canada at the conference in Toronto? It is absolutely incredible that we should be expected to believe there is going to be progress. There is no progress now and there is no indication that the federal government wants to make progress in addressing this tremendously important area.

The fact of the matter is that we are in the last century in the way we deal with this question. Even when the courts talk about support and funding for estranged mothers and children or the former wife and mother, they talk about the major asset as being real property, the family home or whatever property they have, be it real or personal. They do not talk about the main financial area as being the earning power of the father which is the main area which has to be considered.

We seem to be going around in circles on this question. We seem to be taking three steps forward and two back. If this country is going to work it has to be meaningful for the people who live in this country. It has to be meaningful for Canadians. It has to be meaningful for the needs of the future, and the needs of the future are our children. We are doing a tremendous injustice both to the children and our future.

If we do not come to grips with this, if we cannot get the federal government and the provinces to come together to deal with this very important question of maintenance of the mother and the children, if we cannot provide meaningful assistance, if we must say that these children and single parents must live without the maintenance orders to which they are entitled and they have been awarded by the courts of this country, if we have to say that the Canadian public has to pick it up in any fashion possible, perhaps by welfare payments or by charity, then what are we saying? We are saying that this country does not work. We are saying that the future is not important. We are saying that the children of this country can be left to fend for themselves. We are saying that we are not serious about crime prevention. We are saying that we just do not care.

I want it to be known by all Canadians that that is what they are saying. I want everyone to know that that is what they are saying so it does not become a shock, a surprise and a rude awakening to this country as the years go along. I want them to know. I want them to have the chance to do something about it.

This government knows that it does not care. This government knows that it is not going to do anything. It is not putting themselves out for the children of this country and our leaders of tomorrow. It has made its choice and that choice is to do very little. That is not good enough. It is not good enough for this side of the House and I know it is not good enough for most Canadians.

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to follow my colleague from Cape Breton who spoke forcefully and clearly on many of the issues that are raised in this discussion of family law reform brought forward by Bill C-79.

I would like to say before going into any of the technical aspects of the bill and the function that it performs that some of the issues which are touched on by revisions to the support for families in the event of divorce go beyond the narrow scope of that issue.

Bill C-79 provides an opportunity for this House to consider many of the things that concern our electors, the citizens of Canada, about the developments in modern society. Some of them relate to divorce and support for dependent spouses and children in the event of divorce but I think others relate to the fundamental issue of how well Canada is doing in the context of providing for its weakest and its poorest.

We all know and we all shared a great deal of pride in the fact that according to some standards the United Nations indicated last year that Canada had the best standard of living in the world. This reflects a number of aspects of Canadian society of which we are all justifiably proud.

What I think those of us who are concerned especially at this time and what we are aware of is the fact that despite the excellent quality of life, despite the fact that Canadians enjoy great opportunity, great freedom we also have within our borders an undue level of poverty. We have too many children, we have too many adults, who face very grim prospects as we go into a continuing winter of recession.

Unemployment remains high, in excess of 11 per cent. There are 1.5 million Canadians out of work. Poverty is clearly related to unemployment. The problems we face in our cities, in our rural areas are continually reflective of the level of poverty that has been increasing sadly over the past few years.

The 1980s were the first decade since the Second World War in which real family income failed to grow over the course of that decade. This reflects a number of things. In particular, it reflects the fact that government charges have been increasing at a very rapid rate through all of that time. Government charges in the form of taxes at both income tax levels as well as property taxes or wealth taxes, which have increased dramatically in many municipalities across the country, have imposed a greater burden on families. At the same time, real incomes were not increasing as rapidly as inflation was occurring during that decade.

It reflects the fact that our economy has gone through a period of difficult restructuring. There have been a lot of high paying jobs lost permanently during the course of that decade and the early years of the 1990s.

To some extent it is fair to say that the policies pursued by the government have contributed over the last three years directly to the degree and intensity of the recession that we face. We all know that the Governor of the Bank of Canada pursued a policy of what he called price stability, some called it zero inflation, with great ardour and intensity. His objective was more or less achieved but at a price of many jobs being lost.

It is interesting when you look at the pursuit of that policy by the Bank of Canada to always remember that the bank pursues monetary policy with the consent and agreement of the government. The Minister of Finance meets on a regular basis with the Governor of the Bank of Canada. He has the power to tell the governor to pursue a different policy. The policy we are talking about is the government's policy.

That policy to drive inflation out of the system was pursued at the same time as the government was implementing a free trade agreement with the United States. The perversity of doing those two things at the same time is demonstrated by the fact that the Canadian dollar which traded at 76 cents U.S. in October 1987 when the free trade agreement was signed, reached a peak of 89 cents in November 1991.

Meanwhile we lead the U.S. into recession. We suffered extremely high levels of unemployment, much higher that those in the United States. The result for our people has been a continuing round of poverty which remains unabated to this point in time.

It is clear that where unemployment is a problem, where the economy is weak, the price is paid by families first. It is clear that where financial problems arise, the problems within families increase.

The difficulty of dealing with the stress that is imposed by financial hardship is a clear, frequent contributor to the breakdown of marriages and is, in a direct way, a contributor to the problems we are trying to deal with in part with this bill when we are dealing with support for estranged spouses and dependant children.

It is impossible to simply take the objective of this bill, which is a worthy one which we are supporting, and deal with it apart from the over-all economic situation the country is in. To ignore the consequences of the economic policies of this government and simply applaud the fact that it is doing more to ensure that child support can be collected, is to ignore the really important factor, the failure of this government's economic policies which has led directly to the breakdown of many families and has caused hardship and poverty in families across the country.

The reality is that the majority of child support orders in Canada is in arrears. I dare say that many of those arrears are caused by the fact that the supporting parent has become unemployed and is unable to earn a living.

Even if all of the payments were made, it seems that most mother led post-divorced families would still be living in poverty.

In this country, surely one of the most prosperous in the history of the world, we continue to see in our cities and in our rural areas cases of poverty, cases of hunger. It is a disgrace and all of us should be ashamed.

Over the last few years I have had the privilege within my own region of Ottawa—Carleton and in Ottawa South of working with the Ottawa food bank and with UNICEF every year to try to address the issues of hunger in our community, which are addressed in part by the food bank and in the broader international community in which UNICEF plays a part.

Each year we encourage people to spend 24 hours without food in order that they may understand to some extent the nature of hunger when it really strikes. It is very short-lived. It is not something that necessarily changes a person's life, but it is a realization of the fact that hunger is one of those things that is part of the human experience. Very few of us in this House have experienced it in any real and enduring way but it is a fact of life for millions of Canadians.

Until we begin to see the economy expanding again and people getting back to work, sadly hunger and poverty will increase rather than decline in our land.

As well, it is clear that poverty and hunger have a direct relationship to the ability of children to perform in educational facilities. Throughout Canada school-boards, especially in the large cities, are instituting breakfast programs and other food programs to ensure that students have enough to eat. They cannot work in their classrooms if they are hungry.

All these issues are tied together. It is not possible to take them apart and deal with them on a segmented basis. We need to understand the nature of the over-all problem if we are to begin to address it.

With respect to the payments of child support, what has to be understood is that again and again our judicial system has failed, usually because of complexity, to make it easier for dependent spouses to collect support payments. This has contributed to the futility of lives, the futility of people trying to find ways to keep their families together, to keep them from being completely torn apart by the lack of resources.

According to some research published in the May 1991 issue of the Reports of Family Law by Miriam Grassby, the average support awarded is considerably less than half the actual cost of raising a child. According to the research paper this means that an already impoverished wife ends up paying a disproportionate share of child costs. She is left with no money for leisure or savings, or even for a modest retirement. She ends up footing the bill for the emotional and recreational needs of her children, needs that an absent ex-husband can easily ignore.

According to Miss Grassby, and I quote: "It is easy to deprive children if you appear to be paying a large amount for child support. It is very difficult to deprive children if you are living with them".

This points out a very important factor in the way we deal with these issues in our society. Sometimes I think that when we passed the Charter of Rights and Freedoms we ought to have called it the charter of rights and responsibilities. Maybe there is still room in Canada for us to enact a charter of responsibilities.

Based on the evidence that exists of the occurrence of poverty in mother-led, post-divorce families in Canada, it is clear that there are fathers across this land who do not consider their responsibilities to their former wives and to their children to be important enough to ensure that they do not live in poverty.

It was said, I think by Franklin Roosevelt, that we cannot prepare the future for our youth but we can prepare our youth for the future. If we allow this problem to continue, if we fail to address the needs of the children living in Canada in poverty today, we will have to deal with the problems that creates in the future. They are the people upon whom we are going to depend for the future of our country. They need to be supported and prepared for that today.

The situation that befalls a mother-led family after a divorce is often a difficult and grim one. Frequently we find the mother is ill-prepared to become the economic support for the family unit. The pressures of raising children even in a traditional family unit are significant. I can say from experience that there is a lot to taking care of a family with children.

A mother-led family that is without adequate support from a former spouse finds it difficult to collect support without going to see lawyers and paying the legal fees or trying to negotiate with Legal Aid to get assistance to pursue a husband that is not paying support payments.

It is difficult to find housing in many of our cities where vacancy rates are extremely low and where affordable housing is difficult to find. The training and experience of a mother who has been out of the work force for a period of years make it difficult for her to re-enter the labour force, to find a job that pays adequately. There are pressures to accommodate the needs of children whatever they may be. Whatever their interests or involvements may be they cost a lot. It costs a lot to have a 10-year-old in minor hockey. Yet, if our children are to have the opportunity to enjoy the lives that we hope for them, these costs have to be taken into account.

We think we have a free, publicly funded education system in this country. Anyone with children in the public education system knows very well it is not free. We know very well the requests for special payments to go on field trips, to buy books, to join the clubs and to play in the volleyball tournaments. All these things cost a lot of money.

What parent, however difficult their circumstances are, wants to be the one to say to their children: "No, you cannot be part of that team. No, you cannot engage in that activity. No, you cannot go on that field trip because I cannot afford it". What parent wants to go to the school and say: "Please, I would like to apply for the subsidy so that my child can go on the field trip. Because my support payment has not come in this month I cannot afford to do it".

This is the reality of living in our modern society in Canada. It looks very good from some points of view, so good that we can be considered to have the best standard of living in the world in some quarters, and yet for others who are deprived of sharing in that it can be very difficult.

I want to talk a bit about the issue with respect to the tax system raised by the parliamentary secretary and my colleague from Cape Breton. The numbers according to the 1988 statistics were interesting. They indicated that in 1988 supporting husbands deducted $1.3 billion in child support from their income tax. Therefore they saved $475 million in taxes. The receiving spouses in turn declared the support payments and paid about $275 million in taxes on them. In other words the difference of about $200 million in lost tax revenue is considered by some to be a subsidy for divorce; the government subsidizes divorce to the extent of $200 million.

If the $200 million were going to dependent spouses we may be able to say it is justifiable, that it makes it available. However the reality is that $200 million is staying with the paying spouses.

Would it not be better to look at readjustment of the system so that the $200 million goes directly to meeting the needs of the families, to looking after the problem of child care and the problem faced by many mother-led families of getting new training and experience to find jobs. These are the needs of these mother-led families. That is where the problem arises, and that is where we need to be adjusting the focus of our attention.

For that matter, again by imposing the tax burden on receiving spouses we add to the difficulties mother-led families often have in completing tax returns, in making proper claims and in knowing the records are correct.

These difficulties could simply be avoided by adjusting the system so that the obligation to pay tax was shifted.

All these points underline the fact that the women of Canada are and have been most hit by divorce. I would like to leave this statistic with the House: men who paid alimony and child support had incomes that were more than double those of women they sent the money to, according to a study released last year by Statistics Canada. This points out the fact that usually the women who have children in their care suffer the most by divorce.

Our support for Bill C-79 indicates our concern that the collection procedures be simplified so that support payments that are ordered are actually collected. It is the sadness that results from the economic policies of this government that must not be overlooked in considering the poverty in which many of these people live.

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Madam Speaker, I will be picking up on some of the themes that have just been spoken to by colleagues on this side of the House.

We support Bill C-79 in principle but certainly the analogy of using a band-aid for a serious disease would apply to this bill. I quickly read through the bill and it was difficult to find anything that any person of good will would disagree with.

The government just does not get it. As on so many issues it does not get the fact that separated and divorced mothers and children have bigger problems. This will do some good, but if this is the best this government that is about to be voted out of office can do, after eight years, why did it not do this years ago? Why did it not do so much years ago? Why did it mandate the Governor of the Bank of Canada to come down on less fortunate Canadians, often single mothers, disproportionately single mothers? Why did it mandate the Governor of the Bank of Canada to make fighting inflation his only goal? At what price have they won that battle? How many single mothers have lost a job working for the federal government, working for a federal Crown corporation, working in the private sector, so that a few thousand Canadians living at the top of Westmount, in Forest Hill Village and the like can live better than they did eight years ago? Some of them are not living so well these days either I understand.

What we have learned is that we need a government that tries to represent all Canadians, not just the wealthy few thousand in a few cities in our country. That is why this government is going to get itself—I do not think it is going to be surprised—a real lesson when people go to vote at the upcoming election.

To speak more directly to the bill, as you heard earlier, Madam Speaker, the majority of Canadian child support orders are in arrears I understand. Most mother-led, post-divorce families live in poverty, but that would be the case even if all of the payments were being made, because the orders themselves are ridiculously low.

Our judges still need to be sensitized. At least in my province they are getting better but they still have not got it yet. I am sure they have to be sensitized in other communities. I am told by a friend who recently became divorced that they need to be sensitized in the Ottawa-Hull area to the issues of what is an adequate payment to a wife and children.

Without those payments made pursuant to a separation or divorce order, 75 per cent of mother-children households live in poverty. The Ontario government, as I think we heard earlier, has now taken over the collection of support payments, 75 per cent of which are now in arrears. We heard reference earlier by my colleague from Ottawa South and I believe my colleague from Cape Breton to Miriam Grassby and I will not take up time on that.

I believe too many judges across the country seem to be unaware of the barriers to a woman becoming self-sufficient. She is older, perhaps in her forties. Not only might she be lacking in work skills outside the family, and experience, but as the custodial parent she is not free to travel, work long hours, study at night and that sort of thing.

This brings me to the income tax issue. Again, I am advised that we cannot amend this bill to amend the Income Tax Act with respect to child support payments. I hope I can convince you in a moment, Madam Speaker, this is a very major problem.

The custodial parent, virtually always the former wife, pays tax on child support as if it was her income. Child support payments are not income of course but a spouse's contribution to raising children. Most European countries, the United States and Australia do not tax child support payments in the hands of the mother. Why do we in this country?

Non-custodial parents claim a substantial tax deduction. The figure was given by my colleague from Ottawa South a moment ago that two-thirds of divorced mothers and their children receiving support live below the poverty line.

We have, I am proud to say, in Edmonton an organization called "People Against Child Support Taxation", PACT which has launched a campaign to throw out the law which taxes child support payments.

I have written to the Minister of Finance and I will refer to what his views on that matter are in a moment. It is essential that single parents receiving child support that is taxed join in the battle for a fairer tax system that will reflect the real needs of single parents and their children. I hope anyone watching today in that position will feel urged to contact, in most cases, her member of Parliament.

I have a couple of further comments. The custodial parent pays tax on the child support as if it were income. It is not income, as I said. This money is reimbursement for living expenses involved in raising children. Two-thirds of divorced mothers and their children receiving support live below the poverty line. Susan Thibaudeau, a social worker in Quebec, as members will know, has filed a class action lawsuit on behalf of 300 women challenging this tax provision.

For the last three years Madam Thibaudeau to her great credit has been filing separate tax returns for her children claiming child support as their income. When filing this way you are subject to interest in penalties but she feels—I am sure you are aware of this Madam Speaker being from Quebec—that it is worth it for such children when they look at the long-term consequences of being overtaxed.

I might also add that women suffer as a result of this extra so-called income in terms of decreased eligibility for student loans, for subsidized day care and subsidized housing. The burden is on women going through divorce to prepare statements on the before and after tax impact of receiving child support.

This brings me to a letter I wrote in June to the Minister of Finance, the member for Vegreville. I refer to a couple of things that have already been mentioned. I wrote first:

> Once a court divorce order is issued, the spouse with more than half the custody for the children (virtually always the former wife) must pay income tax on the other's support payments whereas the other can deduct such payments from his taxable income. In recent years, approximately 264,000 women across Canada have paid taxes on such support.
> The practical effects of this almost unique Canadian practice in effect since the 1940s—

[Translation]

—France appears to be the only other industrial democracy to follow us in this dreadful practice,

[English]

> —are very serious. For example, one of my visitors—

I was referring to people who had come to see me.

> —pointed out that fully $385 of the $800 she receives monthly must be put aside for taxes.

Of course, she is one of the lucky ones to get $800 a month. How many separated wives get $800 a month from their former spouses?

> This leaves her constantly attempting to keep the financial noses of her children and herself above water. Approximately two-thirds of divorced women and children live below the poverty line—whereas only 16 per cent of divorced men are below the poverty line after paying child support.
> In 1988, men deducted about $1.2 billion in support payments, thus saving $475 million in taxes. Government then collected about $275 million in taxes from those receiving support, thereby providing a divorce subsidy of about $200 million.

Imagine at the end of the 20th century a so-called government of an industrialized democracy subsidizing divorce. Where are the members of the government caucus on this issue?

> The answer to those who assert that not allowing ex-husbands to deduct their payments would increase the numbers of defaulters is that the default rates in both Canada and the U.S. (where deductions are not allowed) is about the same.

It is 75 per cent I am sorry to say.

I wrote to the minister that it would strike any fair minded government or person that the tax system:

> —concedes about $12 billion yearly for RRSPs and $2.6 billion for capital gains exemptions yet encourages most single mothers to live in grinding poverty shrieks for reform.

Here is what our wonderful Minister of Finance, this great humanitarian replied on August 31. He explained the system. I think my letter made it clear that his reply would be made public so I do not think I am breaching any confidence by quoting from his letter. He said:

> On the other hand, the disposable income of a recipient of child support payments is increased by reason of the amount received. As you can also appreciate, a child support payment received is disposable income in the same manner as income earned in employment and is appropriately taxable as an income source. It would be unfair, for example, to make child support payments tax exempt while imposing tax on employment income earned by a single mother to support her child.

It goes on further and if you can imagine, it gets even worse:

• (1500)

> It should also be noted that the Courts and the legal practitioners are well aware of the tax status of child support payments and the amount of court ordered or negotiated payments reflect these tax results. Indeed, as a result of the deductibility of these payments, larger maintenance amounts are encouraged.

If I have not convinced you yet, Madam Speaker, I will quote the Minister of Finance of our great country writing this kind of stuff:

> With regard to the status of single parents, the government's assistance to families with children is being restructured as outlined in my February 25, 1992 budget.

I will stop there.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the third time and passed.

BUDGET IMPLEMENTATION (FISCAL MEASURE) ACT, 1992

NOTICE OF ALLOCATION OF TIME TO CONSIDER REPORT AND THIRD READING STAGES OF BILL C-76

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Speaker, agreement could not be reached under the provisions of Standing Order 78(1) or (2) with respect to report stage and third reading of Bill C-76, an act to amend certain statutes to implement certain financial provisions of the budget tabled in Parliament on February 25, 1992.

Under the provision of Standing Order 78(3), I therefore give notice of my intention to move a time allocation motion at the next sitting of the House for the purpose of allotting a specified number of days or hours for the consideration and disposal of proceedings at the said stages.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS

[English]

CITIZENSHIP ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce) moved that Bill C-285, an act to amend the Citizenship Act (oath of allegiance) be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Human Resources envelope.

He said: Madam Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to amend the Canadian Citizenship Act to change the oath of allegiance which is in it.

My proposal is that the oath that is taken by new citizens after they are accepted as such should be as follows: "I swear or affirm that I will be faithful and bear true allegiance to Canada and the Constitution of Canada and that I will faithfully observe the laws of Canada and fulfil my duties as a Canadian citizen".

The oath of allegiance that is in the present Citizenship Act reads as follows: "I swear or affirm that I will be faithful and bear true allegiance to Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth II, Queen of Canada, Her heirs and successors, and that I will faithfully observe the laws of Canada and fulfil my duties as a Canadian citizen".

We have to ask ourselves what is the purpose of oaths of allegiance, especially oaths of allegiance for people that come to Canada as new citizens. These new Canadians come from many lands. They come from Italy, Portugal, Greece, Chile, El Salvador and India. As a matter of fact one-third of our population comes from lands other than Great Britain or France. One-third has origins in Britain and one-third in France. Therefore two-thirds of our population does not have their origins in Britain.

What is the purpose of an oath of allegiance? It is to have some sort of assurance that these people who are becoming new Canadians are pledging allegiance to the country that they are coming to, Canada. These people have chosen Canada among all the countries in the world to immigrate to. Three years after they are landed immigrants they can apply for citizenship. They apply to be citizens of Canada, not Great Britain, Australia, India or any other country.

However, when they read the present oath of allegiance they are not sure to which country they are pledging their allegiance because the principal allegiance given in the present oath under the Citizenship Act is to Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth II, Queen of Canada, her heirs and successors.

This is very confusing for a great number of new Canadians who come to this country, very confusing indeed. If we want to make this oath of allegiance meaningful for those people who commit themselves to this country we will make the commitment clear, precise, open and honest. If we want a clear, open and honest oath of allegiance that oath will be to Canada and to the Constitution of Canada, not to Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth II.

I have nothing against Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth II personally. I will not comment on any of the recent troubles that the monarchy has endured. That is another issue. I am talking about the purpose and reason for an oath of allegiance in our Constitution and the need to ensure that an oath of allegiance is clear for these new Canadians who are committing themselves and swearing this oath to Canada.

I can refer to cases that happened in my own constituency office. One case involved a young Italian American who had come to Canada to do business 20 years previously. He had been in Canada as a landed immigrant for 20 years and finally decided to become a Canadian citizen. He went down to the citizenship office at the Secretary of State and inquired about becoming a Canadian citizen. He was told that everything was in order, that he had been a good person as a landed immigrant, and he proceeded with the documents and papers.

When the day came to swear the oath of allegiance he found he was swearing allegiance to Her Majesty the Queen and not to Canada so he refused. He said he had not chosen to go to Britain. He chose to come to Canada because of its very special qualities, because of the kind of country it is, its people and its way of life. Therefore he refused. I understood his problem but I tried to convince him, because I thought he would be a good elector, to become a Canadian citizen. He eventually took the oath after two years but he did it with reluctance.

During the recent referendum debate we spoke a lot about Canadian unity and patriotism. When I was discussing the distinct society clause for Quebec, and I can recall because I campaigned in this debate outside of Quebec although my constituency is in Montreal, some people told me they could not understand why some Quebecers were more loyal to the fleur-de-lis than to Canadian symbols, why they were more loyal to Quebec than to Canada. I told them that was interesting because I meet Quebecers in my own constituency who feel that Canadians are more loyal to the British monarch and to Britain than to Canadian symbols.

That is true. If we do not have unity in this country and if there is ambiguity with respect to our symbols it is because we still have a large number of symbols and traditions that represent the United Kingdom, Britain and the British monarchy. That is confusing for a lot of people who seek patriotism and unity in this country. It certainly provides an ambiguous situation for them.

If there are Quebecers who seem to favour Quebec and Quebecois symbols over Canadian ones why not also address those Canadians who seem to favour British and monarchal symbols over Canadian ones?

Since World War II there has been a movement in this country in favour of Canadian symbols, Canadian traditions and Canadian institutions. In the immediate post-war period we appointed our first Canadian Governor General. Before that time we always had British subjects as our Governors General.

We abolished appeals to the Privy Council. We made the Canadian Supreme Court the last court of appeal for Canadian cases. Prior to 1948 or 1949 one could go to the Privy Council in Britain.

We adopted the Canadian Citizenship Act. It was only in the late 1940s that we had Canadian citizenship. Before that time we were British subjects and shared citizenship in some weird way with the United Kingdom.

It was only in 1964 that we adopted the Canadian flag. The Canadian anthem, O Canada, was only adopted in the early 1980s.

Even with this government I have seen some progress. A few years ago our mail was referred to as the Royal mail. Now it is Canada Post.

When I was a young person all our paper money had the picture of the monarch on them. Now there are Canadian figures and scenes on our bills but the picture of the monarch is still on a good many others.

I am saying that the practice of leaving one foot in the old country provides a good deal of ambiguity for Canadians who are concerned about patriotism and about national unity. They cannot accuse people in one province, Quebec, of not being totally loyal to Canada when they are not totally loyal to Canada in that they still support British symbols and institutions.

Right now I will deal with the whole question of Her Majesty, Queen of Canada. It is what we call a legal fiction. Everybody knows that the monarch was born in Britain. She is a British subject. She was brought up in British schools, she is English, she is British. She is not a Canadian. It is a legal fiction that she is the Queen of Canada. Why is it a legal fiction?

While I have been in Parliament the Queen in the right of Canada has voted against the Queen in the right of the United Kingdom in the United Nations. The most famous case was in the Suez crisis when there was a very serious difference of opinion between Her Majesty in the right of the United Kingdom and Her Majesty in the right of Canada.

While lawyers might understand the subtleties of these legal fictions the ordinary person does not.

An hon. member: They do so.

Mr. Allmand: Maybe they do in my friend's constituency but they certainly do not in my constituency.

A recent poll was conducted by Angus Reid and published last week in the Montreal and Toronto papers, and throughout Canada. The headline in the paper says: "51 per cent do not want monarchy, poll finds". I am not dealing with that in my bill. However, let me say that this is what Canadians think. The article says: "Although 56 per cent said the monarchy would survive its current troubles a majority of 51 per cent said the time has come for Canada to sever its ties with the monarchy". That is not Quebec, that is Canada.

My bill simply deals with the oath of allegiance for new Canadians swearing allegiance to Canada when they become new citizens under the process set out in the Citizenship Act.

I suggest that they pledge true allegiance to Canada and the Constitution of Canada. I make no suggestion to change the Constitution of Canada.

For the moment the Queen is part of the Constitution of Canada. The Constitution of Canada is made up of the monarchy, the Senate, the House of Commons and all the institutions. Therefore in pledging allegiance to the Constitution of Canada, although it is not mentioned directly and I do not think it should be mentioned directly because I prefer Canadian symbols and Canadian institutions, people are pledging allegiance to the Queen. In no way does this bill abolish the monarchy. We might discuss that on another occasion, but this bill does not do it.

This bill is another step forward in putting in place meaningful Canadian symbols and institutions, just as we did with our flag, our anthem, the Governor General, appeals to the Privy Council, the Supreme Court of Canada and so on. From the Statute of Westminster in 1931 there has been a steady movement to give us in this country Canadian symbols and institutions.

I return again to the question I asked in the first place. We should all ask ourselves what the purpose of an oath of allegiance is. If I ask somebody to be loyal to me or my party I want that person to make it clear when he or she recites that oath of loyalty or allegiance that he or she is pledging loyalty or allegiance to me and not to somebody who might have been a relative of mine 200 years ago and is now dead or to somebody who is still alive in Ireland or some other country. If we want loyalty and people pledge loyalty and allegiance it should be crystal clear. That is the purpose of an oath of allegiance.

The oath of allegiance we have now is not crystal clear. It is ambiguous, misleading and confusing for the many people who come to this country from the many continents and lands throughout the world.

I am suggesting that we amend the Citizenship Act and replace the present oath of allegiance, which is principally an oath of allegiance to Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth II or whoever the monarch might be, with an oath of allegiance in which new Canadians would swear or affirm that they will be faithful and bear true allegiance to Canada and the Constitution of Canada and that they will faithfully observe the laws of Canada and fulfil their duties as Canadian citizens.

I have spoken to many people in my constituency and they think this makes sense. When I tell them what the present oath is, and these are people who were born in Canada, they are surprised that we still have an oath in which we principally pledge allegiance to Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth II. None of them are anti-monarchists but they are surprised that we still have such an oath.

I would hope that the House would agree with me on these points. I was not in Parliament when we had the flag debate. I arrived soon afterwards, but I was here when we debated the anthem and other moves to consolidate Canadian symbols and Canadian institutions. There was support in all parties.

If we are really concerned with unity and want to do things that will promote patriotism in this country we must start doing away with those things which divide us or pull us apart. To maintain, after centuries, these fictional ties, and they are fictional, with monarchs and institutions in other countries, even though they are friendly countries—we have no official constitutional ties with the United States yet we are friendly with the United States. We have no constitutional ties with France but we are friendly with France and belong to special associations with France. It is the same with the United Kingdom. I am not suggesting in this bill that we do away with the monarchy. I am simply saying that when new Canadians come to this country they should pledge allegiance to this country and to no one else and no other country.

Mr. John Reimer (Kitchener): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to respond to the private members' bill that has been put before us today concerning changing our oath. The member has explained the changes that he wishes to make. I want to say in very clear and unequivocal terms that I am totally opposed to what the member is suggesting.

The oath as we have it now is exactly as it should be. I want to explain briefly why I think it is exactly as it should be and why we should retain it that way.

I would like to comment on some of the points raised by the hon. member. I was taking notes as he went through his speech. First he said: "What is the purpose of the oath?"

He then dwelt upon the fact that many immigrants come to Canada from countries other than Britain. That is true, many do. My parents came from the Soviet Union. Many immigrants come from countries other than England. That is simply a statement of the obvious. So what?

Then he went on to say that in an act of citizenship, when a person comes from countries other than England I guess was the point he was trying to make, and then applies to become a citizen of Canada, that somehow our oath of allegiance for citizenship in Canada is confusing to them.

Well if it is confusing to them maybe they should wait a couple of more years and learn the history of Canada and our parliamentary institutions. When they understand Canada and want to assure active citizenship which is the highest right we can give them, then they should take it after they have learned and understood what Canada is all about.

You do not give an act of citizenship because somehow people do not understand. That would be taking our systems and all of the things we value, such as our act of citizenship, and reducing it to the lowest common denominator of ignorance. That would be our new standard.

I cannot believe the hon. member. I know the hon. member loves playing hockey and so do I. We still play in old-timers' hockey leagues and we are pleased that we have them. I wonder if the hon. member has not crossed into the boards too often. Something has gone wrong. I cannot believe this.

He said that it is confusing, that it is not clear and we should make it more meaningful. What he is really saying is that if a person who comes to us from a non-parliamentary system—

Mr. Allmand: No, no. Everybody including the British.

Mr. Reimer: The member had his say before so I will continue now.

I think what the member is saying to us is if a person comes from somewhere other than our traditions, which have evolved out of the British model, and cannot quite comprehend how our system works, that somehow we have to change and accommodate that ignorance of our system.

What we do is bring that person to understand our system. Then the person will say: "Now I understand why Canada is one of the best places in the world to live. I can understand the evolution of Canadian society. I can see the values that you have developed in Canada. Now I really want to become a citizen because now I understand".

That is what we should be doing rather than going in the opposite way. The hon. member talked about a person who came to his office and did not want to swear an oath of allegiance or make an affirmation of allegiance to the Queen of England. Of course, he did stay. We have to be fair. He did say that he corrected the person. It is to the Queen of Canada. That is correct.

He mentioned some of our constitutional debates over the past few years. I want to quote from page 9 of the chairman's foreword in the report The Citizens' Forum on Canada's Future. Keith Spicer said something that is very important and it is important to this debate. He said: "This country is dying of ignorance and of our stubborn refusal to learn. Lazy cynical official minds have for too long dismissed the obvious practical answers to these problems as simplistic and naive: broad travel, exchange opportunities for example and better teaching of at least some shared history".

I think that Keith Spicer hit it right on. This country is dying of ignorance in our stubborn refusal to learn. If only we started to learn some of our history we would then understand what it means when we say Queen of Canada as opposed to Queen of England. Because we would say that as a Canadian we swear allegiance not to the Queen of England but to the Queen of Canada. That is what we do. If we understood our system properly, we would understand exactly what that means.

I think the member has it all backward. You do not swear allegiance to institutions. You swear allegiance to the head of state. The head of the Canadian state is the Queen of Canada.

Look at the structure of the bill itself. What appears right on top of the bill? That this is the third session, 34th Parliament, 40th year of the reign of Elizabeth II. A little further down that it is by Her Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. It is right there all the way through.

When we became members of Parliament we also took an oath or an affirmation of allegiance. To whom? Not to the Queen of England, no, to the Queen of Canada. That is what we did and that is what we are asking every other person to do.

If an immigrant coming into Canada says this is the best place in the world to live and wants to live here and then somehow does not understand our process maybe we have done something wrong by making it too easy for them to become a citizen. Maybe what we should do is change from the three-year requirement we have now back to five years as it used to be in order for these people to be in Canada longer, to understand our institutions and some of our history.

We also have two other requirements for oath of citizenship or for qualifying to take the oath. We say that you should have at least an adequate knowledge of English or French. I think we should change that to a working knowledge of English or French. Now that would be more meaningful. It would not bar anyone from being a landed immigrant. It just might take them a little longer to learn one of our two official languages. That is all.

Instead of having a minimal understanding of Canadian traditions, institutions and geography which really means that they have to know the name of their member of Parliament, the mayor, the Prime Minister, and the premier, maybe we should elevate that to an understanding perhaps comparable to a grade 10 level of Canadian civics. Then we would not have members getting up in the House as we have one now saying that he does not understand or it is not clear about the Queen of Canada. Then they would understand.

These people would still be landed immigrants in Canada but they would then work at their citizenship and it would be more meaningful. Maybe we should consider that type of reform. If the hon. member were getting up on that type of reform I would listen to him.

Mr. Allmand: Never.

Mr. Reimer: Well, you see he says: "Never". He does not want to make the oath of allegiance meaningful and that is what I am trying to get at. I think we should try and make it as meaningful as we can.

There is a good textbook which I recommend to the member, Dawson's The Government of Canada, 6th edition. Maybe he should look at the chapter entitled "The Monarchy and the Governor General". If he were to look at that chapter he would find something very interesting in the second paragraph so he would not have to read very far.

In that second paragraph the Acting Prime Minister of the day, Mr. John L. Ilsley, said the following: "The authority of the government is not delegated to the House of Commons. The authority of the government is received from the Crown. His Majesty's advisors are sworn in as advisors to the Crown. The government is responsible to the Parliament but that is a different thing from the doctrine that the government is a committee of the House of Commons or that it exercises authority delegated by the House of Commons. That is not so. What is the case is the authority of the government is received from the Crown".

That is the key point of a parliamentary system and a constitutional monarchy. The authority of this House is from the Crown. The authority is vested in the Crown and that is why an oath of allegiance is to the Crown, the Queen of Canada.

I think the member would do well to go back to a good book that is used in many of our first year political science classes and learn what Canada is really all about. Then I think he would say that maybe we have to educate new immigrants a little more rather than lowering our standards to a level of ignorance.

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to rise to support this. If I had been lukewarm about supporting this bill I certainly would be very fired up after hearing the previous member speak.

I have never heard anybody get up and insult immigrants, the backbone of this country, as much as the previous speaker. He was talking about going backward to make sure they cannot get citizenship for five years, trying to put impediments in their way to full participation in our democracy by saying that they have to have a working knowledge of English or French, making it more and more difficult for them to participate as full citizens in our democracy.

This is a bill about symbols. Canada is in the process of growing up and maturing. It is deciding that it wants its own symbols, its own institutions. It is learning that it wants to take some of those symbols and institutions not just from Great Britain or France, but from our enriched community and blend them, making them our own.

My father, like the previous speaker's parents, was born in Russia. He came here during the time of tsarist Russia. He was always a little surprised that Canada still reverted to allegiance to a Crown in another country. While he had tremendous respect for the British monarchy he was always a little confused as to why we did not simply say: "We are Canada" and have symbols that were clearly Canadian.

I increasingly take part in citizenship courts. At the last one I attended there were people from 39 different countries. It was held in a high school. The Lieutenant-Governor of British Columbia, Mr. Lam, attended. It was a very moving experience. There were 500 high school students there. Everyone repeatedly said that it was quite amazing that 39 different countries were represented.

Many of the people taking the oath wondered why 100 years later Canada was still asking them to swear an oath of allegiance to Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth II and her heirs and successors, rather than swearing allegiance to Canada and its Constitution and laws.

It is difficult to explain that to them. It is not because, as the previous speaker seemed to indicate, that they are a little slow, that they have not been here long enough, that they have not been indoctrinated well enough, that their English or French is not good enough to understand our culture.

Some of these people already have degrees at the doctoral level. They speak better and more precise English than I do and some people would say that is not too difficult. They are not people who do not understand constitutions. Some of them have been involved in independence movements in countries where to understand the constitutions and the loyalties was much more significant than it was growing up in Canada.

They all say: "Why are you continuing on with this quaint idea of taking an oath of allegiance to a foreign monarch?" Yes, as the mover said, lawyers can make the distinction between Queen Elizabeth, the British monarch and Queen Elizabeth, the Canadian monarch, but it is a distinction made by constitutional lawyers, not made by people who want to be clear and want to have things meaningful.

There is one other thing I want to comment on. I am not an immigrant. I have been here all my life. I do not see the logic in why we would swear allegiance to a queen who is not the symbol of Canada. If I do not see the logic, why are we so insistent that newcomers to this country do so, newcomers who want to truly feel that they are now part of a very strong democracy, who want to stand up proudly and clearly when they take their oath of citizenship and declare "I am a Canadian citizen and I will swear allegiance to Canada and to Canada's Constitution and laws". That is what they want to do. That is what I want them to do and that is why I support this bill.

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound—Muskoka): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity of addressing the House with respect to private member's bill C-285, an act to amend the Citizenship Act (oath of allegiance), sponsored by the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce.

Under the present oath of allegiance the applicant for citizenship swears allegiance to Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth II, her heirs and successors. It is my understanding that it is the intent of Bill C-285 to make the oath more meaningful by having the applicant swear allegiance to Canada and the Canadian Constitution.

The hon. member's amendment would substitute the current citizenship oath with the following declaration:

> I swear or affirm that I will be faithful and bear true allegiance to Canada and the Constitution of Canada and that I will faithfully observe the laws of Canada and fulfil my duties as a Canadian citizen.

To my way of thinking, citizenship does not apply to new Canadians alone. Citizenship affects those who were born here as much as those who recently became Canadians and those individuals who will choose to become Canadians in the future.

Frankly, Canadian citizenship gives everyone, without exception, the same rights and responsibilities. Citizenship is not limited to the ceremony in which the oath of allegiance is taken, nor is it confined to our knowledge of Canadian history and our system of government.

The oath of citizenship reflects the commitment of Canadians to upholding their citizenship and working for a better society. Acceptance of Canadian citizenship as signified by the oath also acknowledges that Canada has a strong and rich history and heritage.

This brings me to the amendment to the oath of citizenship in the Citizenship Act proposed by my colleague. The hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce, as I read it, would remove a strong link with Canada's heritage. The amendment, if accepted, would be an important symbolic change and I believe would not have wide public support.

Some of my colleagues have spoken and will speak to the divisiveness of such an amendment. Others will speak to this proposed amendment as being nothing more than a tinkering with the Citizenship Act when it would be more appropriate to have an open discussion and review of the act.

I wholeheartedly share these points of view and I am sure that on these points I stand in good company with many Canadians who share the same sentiments.

An open review of the Citizenship Act as a whole could be dealt with at the committee level and witnesses could be heard from all regions of Canada and from different groups within Canada.

• (1540)

This would be an infinitely more satisfactory way of dealing with the oath of citizenship rather than following a course set out by a very limited private members' bill, regardless of how well it is intended by its sponsor.

When you get down to brass tacks, citizenship is apparent in what we do every day to enrich our lives and those of others. One thinks for example of the Cubs, the Brownies, the Guides and Scouts who with their leaders come together with their committees and communities to clean up stretches of rivers.

Also coming to mind are the countless parents who selflessly help run recreational sporting leagues. They coach children's teams and drive their children to practices and games. Of course, we cannot overlook those millions of Canadians from all walks of life who volunteer their time to work for organizations that provide much needed services in their communities. These are only a few of the concrete expressions of commitment to Canadian society that represent good citizenship.

Active participation in the life of one's community displays the intent of individual Canadians to make their neighbourhoods and their country a place where everyone can develop and make a contribution as an equal and full partner.

It also makes Canada a place where everyone can express their differences openly. Frankly, such participation in my opinion is what makes us feel more Canadian. Such participation gives us all a sense of belonging to our country.

In very real terms it is like being a member of a family where everyone takes part in helping the household run smoothly. The more committed the family members are the more they feel at home. I believe the same can be said of Canadian citizenship.

Part of the commitment to the family we call Canada is the acceptance of our multicultural heritage, including the heritage that comes from Canada's creation as a constitutional monarchy. Changing the oath of citizenship might be construed as a denial of an important aspect of Canadian heritage, a part of our heritage that I might add of which I am very proud and attached to. I most certainly know that I am not alone.

There are some members of the House who took the oath of citizenship when they became citizens. They accepted the oath for what it is, a symbolic gesture that mirrors part of the rich heritage of our great nation, Canada.

Every member of this Chamber has taken an oath of allegiance. Similarly, every member appointed to the Senate has taken an oath of allegiance. What they all have in common is that they swear or affirm allegiance to Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth.

In Bill C–285 we have the anomaly of a private member seeking to alter the oath of citizenship that now calls on new Canadians to swear or affirm allegiance to Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth II the Queen of Canada.

Mr. Justice Royal of the Federal Court of Appeal stated in a ruling in January 1992 and I quote:

> It is in my view quite proper for Parliament to require persons wishing to become Canadian citizens that they swear and affirm their loyalty to the head of state. That the head of state should be found in the person of Her Majesty the Queen might be a matter of debate but it is nevertheless as much a part of our constitutional framework as are provisions of our charter.

Justice Royal went on further to say and again I quote:

> Furthermore, the personified symbol of Her Majesty as head of state is not, in terms of our long constitutional heritage, a latter–day invention of some imaginative or manipulative spinner of tales but the result of constantly evolving constitutional principles which are cloaked in constitutional conventions in the United Kingdom and partly codified, in Canada, in the Constitution Act, 1982. The head of state as Her Majesty as so defined is the very embodiment of the freedoms and liberties which the applicant has inherited and which he now enjoys in a legal sense. The head of state legitimizes the laws of Canada which in concrete terms provide for the peace, order and the good government of its citizens.

Although I have considerable respect for the hon. member for Notre–Dame–de–Grâce, given the facts as I have previously enumerated and coupled with a learned legal opinion of a well–respected Canadian jurist, I cannot in all conscience support the amendment being sought to the Citizenship Act.

Hon. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint–Denis): Madam Speaker, I think that I will make my main statement and Quebecers will understand that I intend to speak about this subject that concerns us, namely the oath of allegiance for new citizens, and I would prefer to do so today in English, for reasons which are quite obvious, I think, because that is where we must direct all our efforts at convincing.

[English]

I was in my office when I saw my hon. friend and colleague from Notre–Dame–de–Grâce raise this issue. I listened with great care to the sentiments expressed by our colleagues from Surrey North and Kitchener. No one knows how much I respect the views of my very old friend from Parry Sound—Muskoka.

However, the beauty of the British parliamentary tradition is that we can disagree and remain fine gentlemen and friends to each other or a lady colleague without having to fight over this issue.

What we are talking about has to do with Canada. All members know that Canada is my love. It is my blood, my passion, my lifetime devotion.

I remember years ago when I sat here as a young member in 1964. I sat with a member of Parliament who said to me: "I do not need to be a Canadian citizen to be a member of the House of Commons. I am a British subject". Believe it or not young people of Canada, there were here in the House of Commons members of Parliament who were not even Canadian citizens because they fell under that law and they were right.

We changed that. I negotiated with my friend the Right Hon. John Diefenbaker. We gave five years to get on the electoral list as a Canadian. You had to be a Canadian citizen. I wanted it immediately but some people said never. We negotiated and we got a father clause or a mother clause, if you like, of five years. Now you need to be a Canadian citizen to be on the electoral list.

This is what we talk about when we talk about Canada. We talk about evolution. We do not believe in revolution. We went slowly from a French colony to a British colony, semi-autonomous, independent. We fought for almost 100 years to get a Canadian flag. I voted for it. We have a Canadian national anthem composed by a Canadienne francais in 1880 and now it is being sung 100 years later as O Canada, our pride our joy.

Years ago I put a bill before the House, and I would put it again, where I slowly wanted to change the Canadian dollar bill. Why? In order to show new Canadians who had no knowledge of what Canada is all about that together we are building a new identity called Canada.

We do not believe in insulting our monarchy. We do not believe in insulting Canadians who believe strongly in the monarchy. I have already pledged allegiance to our gracious Queen 11 times, nine times as a member of Parliament, once as a cadet officer in the Armed Forces in Shilo, Manitoba, when I was a student and very recently as a member of the Privy Council. I believe in that. However, I believe in the evolution of Canada. I believe that we can have exactly that kind of bill without being disrespectful to the Queen. We did the same thing with the Canadian dollar. We moved slowly on it and finally had a $2 bill. Then we said that we should Canadianize the money and we used the image of Sir Wilfrid Laurier. Who today would oppose a $5 bill showing Sir Wilfrid Laurier?

Then we said: "What about that great Conservative first Prime Minister of Canada, Sir John A. Macdonald?" We kept the Queen on the $20 bill. I am not a Conservative so I do not have a $50 or a $100 bill in my pocket, but I know the $100 bill shows Borden and the $50 bill, Mackenzie King.

I as a Liberal proposed many years ago that the image of Diefenbaker should be on $2 Canadian bill because that is the history of Canada. I proposed that the $20 bill show Mr. Louis St. Laurent and eventually, later, later, later, other Prime Ministers who served Canada well.

This is not to be anti-British, because I would not be part of it. This is not being anti-anything, because I would not be part of it. It is strictly to teach young Canadians what Canada is all about, a country where people's traditions are respected and where we advance slowly in society in Canadianizing our institutions.

It means something when one says: "I pledge allegiance to Canada, to its law and to its legal authority". Who is the legal authority of Canada? It is a constitutional monarchy. Of course it is the Queen. When one pledges allegiance one pledges allegiance to something ones sees, something one understands, something one is proud about.

Some people say that maybe our gracious Queen will be the last Queen of Canada. I say: "Long live the Queen", but she may be the last one. I hope she will lives a long and healthy life, but who knows? What if when she dies Canadians suddenly decide graciously, as we have always done in our evolution, that she will be the last. It would not be like in Australia where they said: "We will abolish Queen Elizabeth II as head of state of Australia", and that was it.

We could start by saying that when the gracious Queen of Canada dies or abdicates, according to the long tradition of the Canadian way of doing things, she could be the last monarch and that all her powers, which are quite limited, could be in the hands of the Governor General until such a day as Canadians have enough maturity and understanding to know what kind of head of state we want. But he or she will be a Canadian.

Are we opposed to having had as the third Canadian Governor General Mr. Vincent Massey who served us so well with distinction? Are we afraid to recall the graciousness of Vanier or the extraordinary good talent of Michener? What about Jules Léger who had a bad heart condition but was a remarkable Canadian ambassador? Then there was his successor, Ed Schreyer; that magnificent couple who we buried in the same year, the Sauvés; and the one we have at the moment who is a Canadian, Ramon Hnatyshyn.

In 1964-65 his gracious father who was a senator opposed the Canadian flag. Today our Governor General is happy to carry the flag of Canada while his father, Senator Hnatyshyn, opposed the Canadian flag. That shows people like me who are getting older that we must respect the past but we must build a new identity. This new identity is called Canada, an institution that is easy to sell to people. We should have pride because as I keep saying Canada is probably one of the last lights of hope.

[Translation]

It is a light of hope, and I say it in French, because what I say in English about Canada I can repeat in French in Quebec and everywhere. If people do not like what Prud'homme says when he talks about Canada, well, there is democracy and they can vote me out.

But I believe that Canada, my dear friend, especially you—and that is the parliamentary system; I can talk as I am doing with the distinguished member for Parry Sound—Muskoka—

[English]

We should try to convince each other that we cannot cry over the past. We must be part of the future—

[Translation]

—because Canada may be the future for suffering humanity, searching for a glimmer of hope. Canada, despite all our problems and divisions, represents that. That is Canada. Part of that is showing new Canadians—

[English]

—new people in school who have come here from all over the world. When they see the Queen on a bill they do not think of the Queen of Canada. They think of the Queen, gracious as she is, but the Queen of Great Britain. When they see a five-dollar bill they have to ask, because they do not teach much history in school, who is Laurier? Who is Borden? Who is Mackenzie King?

In my humble estimation this is the meaning of the bill before all of us by my hon. friend and colleagues for our reflection. It will not pass today, but if we do not debate this issue we will not have a Canada that evolves and becomes an example of acceptance and tolerance of change for the rest of humanity.

I would hope to pursue the discussion, especially with a very distinguished friend of mine, the member for Parry Sound—Muskoka.

Mr. Rob Nicholson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Madam Speaker, on all issues people who believe strongly can come at these things from different points of view.

I can tell the hon. member who brought this matter forward about my experience with citizenship court. I have attended for about eight years and I can say with all honesty that I have not had one complaint about the oath of allegiance. I do not remember one individual complaining.

In fact in my discussions with them there was joy for the people who took the oath of allegiance because it does include not only an oath of allegiance to the head of state but to the laws and to this country. There was complete joy.

On July 1, I am asked as the member of Parliament to go through with people, as I guess most members of Parliament are, the reaffirmation of citizenship. Sometimes there are as many as 5,000 to 6,000 people. I can again say with all honesty that I have not had any complaints. Nobody has come to me and said I object to the wording of it.

I say to the hon. member that once one raises some of these matters they do have the opposite effect. The central premise among other things was that new people to the country do not understand about this. I would disagree with that. I have asked them, because this was introduced a couple of years ago, whether they knew when they came to Canada that we had a history that involved two languages, whether they knew it was French and English. They say: "Yes, we had an idea". I said: "What was your idea about the government?" Most of them had an idea that somehow this country was a new country, that it had evolved from colonial status. They knew of the country's association with Britain, that the country had involvement.

We should give more credit to the new people who come to this country. They are aware of the tradition, and it is a long tradition. It was 1535 that Jacques Cartier claimed this area on behalf of the French Crown. Canada has had more than 450 years continuous association with the institution of monarchy.

It would be an interesting question for the Library of Parliament. I do not know of any other country that has had that long a continuous association with monarchy. Not England; it had the republic under Cromwell. Not France, not Spain, not Russia, not Italy, not any country I can name has had a continuous association. It is a proud association.

The first time I went to Government House one of the things that struck me was the role of le gouverneur, the Governor General. It is unbroken line from Samuel de Champlain to the present occupant. Instead of saying that is something foreign, they are representing another head of state, these are things that I take great pleasure and take great pride in.

As the member was speaking he was in front of the mace. He and I both know that evolved from another parliamentary system, the British parliamentary system. The member for Saint-Denis mentioned it today. We have adapted it to be a Canadian symbol. These are things I take great pride in and I do not mind passing on.

I believe in the British parliamentary system, not because it is British or it devolved somewhere, but because I believe it works so well. We have adapted it. It has become Canadian.

I would have reservations about changing a system that works so well. I believe that in some way I would be breaking faith with the people who fought for Canada. Any of us who have been to the Legions in our ridings, has seen the plaques. They always say "For King and country".

I realize deep down it was for Canada that they fought. It always says that in letters you get from people who were at the war front. They will mention that they fought for King and country. Somehow I feel that I would be letting them down after a couple of generations if somehow I turned away from the institution of the monarchy.

GOVERNOR IN COUNCIL

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants) moved that Bill C-290, an act respecting access to information on Governor in Council appointments be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Departmental envelope.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am happy to be here this morning to speak on Bill C-290, an act respecting access to information on Governor in Council appointments.

As is so often the case, lovely things come in small packages. This is a very small but significant bill I am presenting today. If you cut through the legal language in effect it says that the salaries of all cabinet appointments to bodies of government and quasi-government bodies be public knowledge.

It is an interesting coincidence that almost 10 years ago, on February 19, 1982, the then member of Parliament from Nepean—Carleton, the Hon. Walter Baker, under the rules at that time introduced Bill C-648 respecting the same issue: access to information on governor in council appointments. It summarizes exactly what my bill which is basically just one clause is trying to do.

Ten years ago, Mr. Baker, a very distinguished parliamentarian whose contributions both in opposition and in government some members in this House remember, said in explaining his motion that:

> The officers and directors of Crown corporations, boards, commissions and agencies constitute a parallel public service, and the Canadian public has a right to know the salaries and positions these people enjoy. This is especially important when public bodies are established to carry out policies of government, and even more so where the government or a minister is the shareholder. Since there was evidence yesterday before the Standing Committee on Public Accounts that it was government policy which was prohibiting the promulgation of that information, I think it is doubly important that the public be provided with the means for easy access to such information which should be within the public domain.

In the usual sense of that day and basically what happens to most private members' bills these days, the motion was agreed to, the bill was read the first time and ordered to be printed. From my memory and from a search of the records that was about the last we heard of that motion of the hon. Mr. Baker.

It was interesting that in 1982 Mr. Baker was in opposition. It always seems to be the case that opposition members come forward with interesting policies and suggestions which when they get into government they tend to forget.

I was hoping in the present political climate, looking at the polls over the last couple of years, that the present government would be most sympathetic to my motion. The eventuality of an election in the near future may produce changes in government so that whatever the government is after the next election we could finally cut through and provide the public with the openness that they certainly deserve since they pay the bills.

We all know one of the reasons this Chamber exists is the classic historic fight between the commoner and the king over the power of the purse. That is British history and that is why the mother of Parliaments was created. The commoners would meet behind the bulrushes on the meadows and the commons plotting whether they would send more cattle, more men, more wenches to fight the king's war. The commoners were not the commoners as voters are today; they were the lords and dukes who sometimes got tired of sending their men, their cattle, and their support to fight different wars.

That is when they finally picked a person from behind the bulrushes as the speaker to tell the king they were not going to provide any more help in fighting his battles or carrying out his policies. As we know up until about 1200 every one of the speakers from the commons usually had his head chopped off when he went to tell the king what the commoners of the day, the dukes and lords, wanted to do.

We have come a long way since then. We are now in the 20th century where we do not just have the battle of the purse which always goes on, but not quite in the graphic way it did in bygone days. We now have not just the power of the purse but the people who pay the piper should also be able to call the tune, or at least hear the tune.

This Parliament and other Parliaments will never be fully open to the public until the public finds out what the government is paying the public servants who are carrying out the duties and responsibilities for the public. This is an anomaly I have always been concerned with. I was hoping, in this present political climate, the government might be more amenable to having my bill proceed so that we could bring it to a vote and let the chips fall where they may.

To me there is nothing more basic to democracy. We have the vote. We go through elections. We elect members to Parliament. Then we have a cabinet and cabinet, understandably, has to do a lot of matters by executive order, by orders in council. A lot of people have to be appointed to do many different jobs. It is far beyond the day when it could be said that a range of pay would be given and not tell the public what the actual pay is for the heads of these corporations, be they the CBC, at one time Air Canada, the Canadian National Railway, and on you go.

The answer by government, whether it is Conservative or Liberal, has been traditional government policy. This is one of the reasons I think there is a malaise in the public about this whole system. The government of the day, be it Liberal or Conservative, has said that the public cannot be told what a person is paid because that is an invasion of that person's right of privacy.

My answer to that is wellknown: the very fact they are going into the public domain and getting paid by the public in effect removes that right of privacy. If they want to remain a private person then they should not get involved in the public domain.

Canadians from coast to coast know what members of Parliament get in pay and they know what our expense allowance is. We go through purgatory every time we try to change either the pay or the perk of the member. We all know how the public looked with an odious eye at members' pensions. But we are in the public domain and whether or not we agree with the pension, it is and should be public knowledge.

I think the same rule applies to all these agencies and Crown corporations and appointments by the government of individuals, fine Canadians who are carrying out public duties paid for by the taxpayers of Canada. Until we do that, we are just playing a great political charade by not telling the public what they should know.

What happens if you do not tell the public what the pay is? The privacy doctrine is that you do not have to disclose it. You could perhaps pay too much. The public are not going to rise up and criticize different individual salaries or perks or director fees for some of the Crown corporations, let alone golden handshakes that might be given to public servants who for whatever reason are bought off. There can be movement within the Public Service and they can get out and find another job. That is one of the more odious things about this whole process.

I am not the only one who has raised this from time to time, but I am not optimistic about what might be the fate of my bill. I was hoping the present political climate might have lent a certain air of reality to it so that in a new Parliament we could finally cut through this age-old tradition of not disclosing what the salaries are.

I digress, but I digress to make a point, again illustrating the difference between opposition and government. The very first move of the present government in 1984 was something that we in opposition argued for, supporting the Auditor General not directly on salaries but in trying to find out what Petro-Canada paid to take over Petrofina. We supported then Auditor General Dye's attempt to find out what the taxpayer paid out. Were there any special deals? Did anyone get any special benefits?

As an opposition member I do not think I asked the questions. I think Mr. Walter Baker and other members asked some of the questions. The member for Etobicoke Centre, or whatever his riding is in Toronto, pursued the then government on what happened in the Petro-Canada takeover. What happened with Petrofina? Where was the money made or lost? What did the taxpayer have to pay?

In the very first policy flip-flop of the new government after 1984 we went through the same thing and used the same argument of the government of the day. We said: "Oh, you cannot get that information. That is a file of the previous government. You are not allowed to look at files of previous governments. This is an old British doctrine".

It is the most self-serving doctrine I have ever heard. In a proper way, without getting personal but looking at policy, a succeeding government cannot look at certain files of an old government where perhaps that old government's files would show there were certainly errors in judgment, perhaps negligence, let alone anything else.

Yet we got in government in 1984 and we used the same answers public servants were feeding the previous government, that we could not open Petro-Canada and Petrofina. It still has never been opened up and the public, the taxpayer, does not even know what went on there in terms of taxpayers' dollars and those were big dollars.

I am talking now about salaries and I would like to quote from an interesting columnist, Mr. Allan Fotheringham, who always writes with an acid pen. I do not necessarily agree with all the things he says but he is a colourful writer.

On March 12, 1991 in his column in The Ottawa Sun entitled "No subtlety from this gang" he set out the hypocrisy of the then government restraint program where salaries of public servants were being frozen at a 3 per cent increase for the next three years. Just the day or week before the freeze came out in the budget of the then Minister of Finance, the member for Etobicoke Centre, certain top public servants, about 50, received a 4.3 per cent increase in their very large salaries.

In part of the article Mr. Fotheringham says:

> Because the supine electorate allows it, Ottawa in its mania for secrecy will not even tell us what the governor of the Bank of Canada makes. All we know is that Crow, he who also delivers stern lectures to us, earns somewhere between $168,800 and $253,200. One would go faint with astonishment if it were closer to the lower figure rather than the higher.

Referring to Ron Lawless, he says:

> Lawless, so beloved by VIA fans makes between $314,700 and $365,700.
> The excuse trotted out by the heavy thinkers is that reviewing the exact income of these top executives would somehow be an invasion of privacy. Why? They're public servants, paid with public money. Doesn't the public have the right to know?
> Not if you are a passive Canadian. Americans would be in the streets with pitchforks if Washington ever tried such insulting—and basically undemocratic—"leadership" on them.

He goes on and says other things about some of the specific individuals mentioned but I will not quote that. That is the point I am trying to make with this bill, as Mr. Walter Baker, the then member for Nepean—Carleton, tried to do 10 years ago in February 1982. It is high time we got through this cloak of secrecy which smothers the democratic right to know by the people who pay the piper, who pay the tune, who pay the tax.

It is not good enough that some of these matters have been referred to the commissioner of privacy. There have been various cases cited before the commissioner of privacy trying again to open up this whole question of public salaries.

We all know that many of these salaries are given by range, but there are still many other salaries we do not know because they are done by cabinet. Those in particular are the ones I am concerned about, but frankly I am concerned about all Order in Council appointments.

We are talking about salaries at a very high range. We are not talking about the little clerk in the Unemployment Insurance Commission or the secretary at the House of Commons. We are talking about the people at the top of the heap. When they get a 4.3 per cent increase after the Public Service salaries have been frozen, as we all know from the brouhaha of 1991, it is very insulting to many good public servants who work hard.

I know more about transportation. I will go so far as to say quite frankly that the public has a right to know the total payout. We all know members are under attack for their present pay package. In effect a member can retire, get a pension and get a job and do what is called double-dipping: still get federal money and/or a pension.

We have had some very notable individuals, fine Canadians, in the Public Service who have retired from whatever jobs they had, and who have then taken on something else. The total package has been in the $200,000 to $300,000 range. If the public were aware of that, the government would not be quite so accommodating in having individuals do this double-dipping by taking the second job, again with no reflection on the character or the competence of the individuals.

We have the interesting situation where the chief of defence staff, an honourable Canadian, Ramsey Withers, retired from the army. Then he became deputy minister of transport for several years. With his salary range of $140,000 plus, together with whatever he was getting from his chief of staff pension, I would suggest he was over the $200,000 range.

We also have the most interesting situation of an individual who appeared before the committee along with his co-executive officer. That was Mr. Denis de Belleval who came from the harbours board, a quasi-government agency, and became president of Canada Ports Corporation along with Ron Huntington, an ex-member from Vancouver, who was either the president or the chairman. I am not sure which was which. One was the chairman and one was the president. Then Mr. de Belleval became the president of VIA. He is a very fine Canadian, an interesting witness before the transport committee. For whatever reason some things did not work out and he did not serve his full term in VIA, and I believe that there was a golden handshake to move him along the way.

The public has a right to know what it was paying Mr. de Belleval as chairman or president of Canada Ports Corporation and what the golden handshake cost to move him into another field. Now he is executive officer of Lavalin. So be it. That is all good. He has a salary there too. But the public has a right to know.

I must say it is an irony and a fatal flaw in open government that we are not able to get public disclosure of individual salaries. We have the interesting situation now with Air Canada, albeit a privatized corporation, where we have difficulty getting the pay of some of its top people, let alone directors' fees. If it merges with American Airlines and has interest in American Airlines, as with CN, with a couple of railway companies and a couple of trucking companies in the States, under American law they will have to disclose what they pay that Canadian officer and/or the Canadian director. Their laws are much more open.

In conclusion, I certainly think it is very interesting for either this government and/or a new Government of Canada to look at what President Clinton is trying to do and be aware of what he is doing to try to open up his government. That government is so much more open on this issue right now that it makes us seem as though we are still back in the Dark Ages meeting behind the bulrushes. That is not good enough for Canadians.

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise to say a few words on this legislation brought forward by the hon. member for Annapolis Valley—Hants. In so doing I rise to support his proposal, which I think is a good one. I do not say in so doing that I speak on behalf of my party or the government. I speak as an individual.

In supporting his legislation it does not mean that I necessarily agree with everything he just said in his very interesting remarks. He did make a few comments with which I do not agree, but in principle I agree with the legislation.

As he has done so often, he is reflecting a perspective that is widely held among the general public. I must say I have known the hon. gentleman for a long time. In fact he was the very first member of Parliament I ever actually met. About 25 years ago when I was a graduate student at Dalhousie, I was doing a thesis on election campaigning in Nova Scotia. I wrote to every member of Parliament from Nova Scotia and asked for an interview. Only one of them granted me that interview and that was the hon. member for Annapolis Valley, I guess it was then called. I spent a very interesting day with him and really learned about politics. I have been learning from my hon. friend for many years since. Who knows? Some day I might actually get enough experience in this place that he might learn something from me.

In any event, during the interim it is a pleasure to speak in support of his bill. The public is looking for openness in government these days. As he very eloquently just said, as members of Parliament we certainly put forward our salaries and our benefits for public scrutiny. Perhaps it is a principle that should be followed, not by all individuals employed by the government, because for those who come under contract or Public Service Commission appointments, the information essentially is available, but for the Order in Council appointments to which the hon. member was referring.

He did not mention it, but I presume it is the intention of the legislation to include deputy ministers, ambassadors, people working in the Prime Minister's Office, ministers' staffs and people serving on boards and commissions. The public is looking for this because it wants the government to be open.

There is a danger in this that we should be very up front about, that is the mischief that can and indeed will be made by people with aspirations, whether they be lobby groups like the National Citizens Coalition which grabs on to things like benefits of members of Parliament and tries to use them for its own purposes to whip up public antagonism. It is possible it finds this helpful in its own fund raising. I would not say that is its motivation. That would be to attribute motive that I would not want to do, but one has to wonder from time to time about that sort of thing.

It is important for the public to realize that if we want good people in government, whether they be sitting in the House of Commons or as presidents of Crown corporations, the public has to be prepared to pay relatively competitive wages.

It is interesting to note with respect to Crown corporations that would seem to be somewhat the case, if I can believe what I read in The Globe and Mail this morning about the arrangements for Mr. Hopper. I certainly have nothing against Mr. Hopper, but I would not mind living the rest of my life on the departure benefits that he is purported to be getting. They said it is something like $1.2 million as a severance, plus $280,000 a year. On the other hand, anyone leaving a large corporation of comparable size probably is going out on just as good severance arrangements.

We have to be very conscious that while on the one hand we want to respond to this public aspiration for transparency in government, the public has a right to know what it is paying the people who work for it. At the same time there has to be some way of making sure it does not become a basis for mischief-making by people who want to haul down others in high places.

It always amazes me that people think it is appalling if someone employed by the government makes $100,000 a year. They see that as an outrageous amount, but no one seems to be upset at the idea of paying baseball players $6 million or $7 million a year, whether or not they produce, I might add. Sometimes people say: "Yes, but politicians do not always produce". Baseball players do not always produce but they still get their multimillion dollar salaries.

I think there is a possibility for some mischief.

There are other things that hold us up to disrepute. My hon. friend mentioned the concept of double-dipping with, which I have a serious problem. I thought there used to be a principle that a person could not draw two salaries from the Crown at the same time yet it seems people can draw a pension and then return and get a salary at the same time. I really have a serious problem with that, whether it be members of Parliament who go on to other government service or by anybody else in government service. If people return to government service another way then they should have pension arrangements that allow them to continue to accrue a benefit but they should not be drawing two salaries at the same time.

It is the same with pension arrangements, which obviously have been subject to great discussion here. While the pension scheme for members of Parliament is not the subject of this particular piece of legislation I have believed for a long time, and have a private member's bill being drafted on this subject, that the most objectionable feature of the pension plan for members of Parliament is that it allows people to draw from it at a very young age. Probably 80 per cent of the objections to the pensions for members of Parliament is a result of the fact that members do not have to be of minimum age to draw it. We should change that to an age of about 55. If we also got rid of the double-dipping we would remove a very large part of the problem that the public has with the pensions for members of Parliament.

A lot of the other aspects of that pension can be defended. If we are going to draw people in mid-life and mid-career and ask them to leave a career, perhaps another pension plan or a business or professional practice of some sort, we have to provide them with a basis for recovering their financial security, at least to a limited degree. That is what the short number of years required can do.

However the notion that someone can come here for a brief period of time and leave at a very young age, as was recently done by the member for Shefford—and this is certainly not a criticism of him, this is the system that exists—and then go out and draw a rather substantial annual income for the rest of his life is objectionable to the public. I think the public is quite right in raising some questions about that.

To return to the piece of legislation that my friend from Annapolis Valley—Hants brings forward, the principle inherent in this bill is very good. I congratulate him for bringing this idea before the House. I would like to see something like this in legislation and that is why I rose today to add my support to his legislation.

[Translation]

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to participate this morning in the debate on Bill C-290.

[English]

I have nothing against the bill in question but the worst shortcomings of the process of reviewing Order in Council appointments right now are not addressed in it. This bill is virtually identical to the procedure we have at the moment, save and except the salary component. I will get back to that in a little while.

Standing Order 110 provides at the present time that:

> A Minister of the Crown shall lay upon the Table a certified copy of an Order in Council, stating that a certain individual has been appointed to a certain non-judicial post, not later than five sitting days after the Order in Council is published in the Canada Gazette. The same shall be deemed to have been referred to a standing committee specified at the time of tabling, pursuant to Standing Order 32(6) for its consideration during a period not exceeding thirty sitting days.

Right now we have a process which is virtually identical to what is asked for in the bill. The bill says that within 30 days we will publish in the Canada Gazette the salary that is being paid to the position appointed.

Right now in all of the cases that are tabled in this House we have the salary range table. Say we are talking about a member of the National Parole Board. He would earn $93,000 to $106,000. Frankly, when I see who is appointed whether the person is nominated at minimum or maximum salary, $93,000 or $106,000, will not affect my decision much.

That information is available and that is what I want to see. If we can get a more precise amount, fine. I do not object to having the amount pinpointed even more exactly. I am not sure this is the improvement in the rules that is necessary now, although it is desirable.

The Order in Council review process that we have right now is deficient in a number of ways, first of all in the way it deals with the 64 or so officers of Parliament. The committee reviewing the appointments should have a right of veto. That was recommended by the committee chaired by Mr. McGrath when he was a member of this House.

He had recommended that for some 64 appointments the committee of this House charged with reviewing the appointments should have an outright power of veto. Naturally that would not be used very often and possibly never at all. This would show that Parliament is the master, that Parliament is supreme.

It would be an excellent way of demonstrating that at the very least as it deals with those officers who report to us: the Auditor General, the Sergeant-at-Arms, the Clerk of the House, the Librarian of Parliament, the Commissioner of Official Languages and so on. There are some 64 of these officers. That is a rule which needs to be improved for all hon. members.

The Order in Council review process, the scrutiny of the Order in Council nominees, is deficient at the present time. I was a member of a committee that reviewed the appointment of Dalton Camp when he worked for a while in the Prime Minister's office some years ago.

When we reviewed that appointment there were members who liked the appointment, others who disliked it and so on. When it was attempted at the committee to propose a motion to the House with reference to the appointment that type of motion was deemed to be out of order by the chairman of the committee.

Under Standing Order 110 our rules are structured right now so that we can review an appointment. However the committee chairman ruled that the committee had no power to make a recommendation about the appointee it had just reviewed. Surely that is a deficiency within our rules.

That is something that needs to be improved upon. There should also be a better procedure in terms of how people are referred to the government for the Order in Council review process.

Right now nothing is very formalized, save some judicial appointments for which the local bars provide nominations and so on. In the case of people like citizenship court judges and others there should be a more formal process.

A constituent who has been a mayor of a town, a prominent individual for 25 years, might retire from that office and might like to be nominated as a citizenship court judge. The person may be very qualified. The person may have the disposition so that one knows he or she is an excellent candidate.

As an opposition member I currently have no way of suggesting that person other than writing a letter to the Prime Minister saying: Dear Prime Minister, Mayor Such-and-Such of this town in my constituency is a great Canadian. How about considering him or her.

There is no other way in which to submit names for such a position. That is a deficiency in our rules at the present time. The same applies to a large number of other positions.

I use the citizenship court judge as an example because it is a ceremonial position. It does not involve decisions that are judiciary or quasi-judiciary in nature, or at least it does not generally do so. I suppose there is an ultimate veto power given to that citizenship court judge but it is seldom if ever used. It is a ceremonial role, and a necessary one. I am not questioning the necessity of the job. However, certainly the office would have greater credibility if the method by which the people are chosen was improved.

Those are areas on which I would like to concentrate.

On July 12, 1992 I made public a document entitled Public Sector Ethics and Morals. I gave this to the national media, and many colleagues from all parties contacted me and asked for copies of it. Chapter 3 of that document refers to those amendments I would like to see made to the Order in Council review process.

I have three recommendations which I have just summarized in the House for the Chair and all hon. members.

Those are the areas on which we should concentrate. Those are the areas in which we need to improve the information that is given to Canadians and the power that this House has over Order in Council appointees.

This is a two-edged sword and I want all members to recognize that fact. If we have the power as a House or as a committee to examine Order in Council nominees and then if we later question the government about those appointees the government from time to time will say that the hon. member had the power to interview and review that appointment and if he had no objection then the appointment was all right. That is not so.

The responsibility for nominating someone always rests with the government and it will always rest there, as it should. The point I am making is that just because those safeguard mechanisms are there in no way should we state, nor should the government state, that the government is somehow no longer responsible for the appointment that it made.

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to be able to speak today to the motion of the member for Annapolis Valley—Hants concerning what we usually call Governor in Council appointments and which unfortunately have become known across Canada as patronage appointments.

The first part of the proposed Bill C-290 is already being carried out but I question exactly how it is being carried out. Often Governor in Council appointments are made on Friday, such as the recent appointment of General de Chastelain as our representative in Washington. That draws the focus of the media on Friday and the following Monday in The Gazette the various other appointments, perhaps 30, 40, or 50, are printed listing who has been named and what they have been named to.

The thrust of what is happening is lost to most of the people in Canada because the high-profile ones get into the media and we do not see any of the other appointments.

The other part of this bill is important. Perhaps the bill does not go quite far enough. Subsection 2 of the bill states that the listing should contain the name of the person appointed, the position or office filled, and the salary that is paid to the person appointed.

That is fairly important. It has been pointed out by the member for Annapolis Valley—Hants that the Canadian people are looking for transparency. They want to be able to see exactly who has been appointed and exactly what we are paying for the particular appointment.

We have to go further, as has been suggested by one of the other members speaking, than simply publishing it. I would suggest we have to set up a board made up of perhaps senior federal, provincial and private officials of various walks of life similar to what we have in the provinces with the appointments of provincial court judges. This sort of judicial council would be made up of people of non-political stripes and all political stripes. It would look at and vet the names of people who have been put forward for various positions. I would suggest this is necessary if we are looking at various positions or appointments.

Look at the National Parole Board. There are a number of stories out right now which point out that long-time Tories are being appointed to National Parole Board appointments. Claire Carefoot, for instance, has just received a 10-year appointment. She is going to make probably $95,000 to $100,000 per year over that 10-year period of time. The brother of the member of Parliament for Athabasca has just been appointed to the National Parole Board.

I do not question that possibly these people are well qualified for the positions, but I question the process that has been followed for these appointments. Had those names been put forward to a non-partisan board that spanned Canada, spanned political parties and spanned regions, for approval of the Governor in Council, then I would say yes, definitely yes, there is no problem. This has been done, as I pointed out, in most provinces with judicial appointments.

Even with judicial appointments with respect to federally appointed judges, Supreme Court of Canada, or Queen's Bench appointments in provinces, and the recent appointment in Manitoba of Nathan Nurgitz springs to mind, where in fact there is no necessity to go through a judicial council vetting in order to get these particular appointments.

In fact, I recall approximately 10 years ago an appointment in one of the provinces where a person appointed to a federally appointed judgeship had been turned down by the judicial council in that province. That had been ignored by the prime minister of the day and the person was appointed a judge, even though he did not make it past the judicial council of the province for a provincial court judgeship.

It appears we have to go further, we have to do more toward looking at not just the transparency, the amount we are paying these people, because they are paid by the taxpayers, but we have to look at how they are appointed.

Let me tell the people who may be watching this of some of the things that come up. It is just over the last little while that some of these appointments have been made. The board of directors and the president of the CBC; Northern Pipeline Commission, the Canada Development Investment Corporation, Canada Post, Petro-Can, Air Canada, the National Parole Board, International Joint Commission, St. Lawrence Seaway Authority, the Farm Debt Review Board, the Royal Mint, the Indian Specific Claims Commission, Standards Council of Canada, Advisory Council on the Status of Women, Asia Pacific Foundation, the National Transportation Agency, the National Capital Commission, Security Intelligence Review Commission, Canadian National Railways were all appointed by Governor in Council.

These are just some of the many appointments that must be made by Governor in Council. Citizenship Court judges are another excellent example of those who perhaps should be vetted ahead of time rather than simply being given the plum by the particular party that happens to be in power, depending on the politics of the person involved. Yes, we sometimes get excellent appointments through the method presently in use. However as politicians we would get much better value for our money if these people were vetted very carefully by a selection process that took the politics out of it.

I am not suggesting that the final decision should not be made by the Governor in Council, the cabinet. I am saying that political alliance should not be the only criteria for appointments to some of the boards and commissions that I have named. These appointments have all been in the news just recently, appointments of chairpersons, presidents, directors, vice-chairmen, chairmen of some of these companies and boards over the last couple of months. There are many more.

This is a good bill, but it does not go quite far enough. I would like to see this whole thing investigated further, amendments made and the bill expanded.

Mr. Ross Belsher (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, I want to compliment the hon. member for Annapolis Valley—Hants for putting forward this bill this morning. I have listened carefully to the debate.

The proposed motion would include the name of the person appointed, the position or office filled and the salary that is to be paid to the person appointed. Bill C-290 further provides that the President of the Privy Council table in both Houses of Parliament a report containing the name and salary of every incumbent of an office or position appointed by the Governor in Council.

There were many points put forward by the member opposite which I support, particularly the portion on double-dipping. I am in wholehearted agreement with him.

I find it passing strange, when I listened to the member for Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt talk about how he would like to see it going on, because his party which is now in power in B.C. over the last several months has terminated many of the previous appointments before the terms were fulfilled and put its own appointees in place. Yet this morning this member of that same party is standing here and saying he would like to see a far more open process.

There are some problems with this bill. I would like to discuss some of them in the next few minutes.

The key concern in this bill is the fact that it is proposing something that would be contrary to existing legislation contained in the Privacy Act. Clause 2 of Bill C-290 would require that the exact salary of the Governor in Council appointment be made public. The government at present cannot disclose this type of information without having regard to the Privacy Act which became law on July 1, 1983. The Privacy Act regulates the collection and the use of personal information by the federal government and imposes serious obligations on government institutions. We cannot simply ignore these obligations.

The Privacy Act says that personal information cannot be disclosed unless the individual to whom it relates consents. There is no discretionary element to this provision. It is not a choice we have. This section in the Privacy Act applies regardless of whether the personal information is being released pursuant to a request under the Privacy Act or whether the release is decided upon by the government institution itself.

There are of necessity certain circumstances upon which personal information may be released without consent. They are laid out in section 8(2) of the Privacy Act. Obviously we would not have to get consent if the information was required to comply with a warrant or if the information was going to an investigative body for the purpose of enforcing any law of Canada. This is not the case here. We are not talking about information that is required for investigative purposes. The only other way that personal information can be disclosed without the individual's consent is if the public interest in the disclosure clearly outweighs any invasion of privacy that could result from the disclosure.

Since I came to this House we have already been given the ability to examine appointments. Many people are brought before various standing committees of the House but by and large the vast majority of appointments go ahead unchallenged and unexamined by the members of this House.

The decision whether to disclose information must balance the public's interest in disclosure against the threat of an individual's privacy and any release under this provision is normally reserved for unique one-time cases.

I think that today is not the sort of—

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

BUDGET IMPLEMENTATION (FISCAL MEASURES) ACT, 1992

ALLOCATION OF TIME TO CONSIDER REPORT STAGE AND THIRD READING OF BILL C-76

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, I move pursuant to Standing Order 78(3):

That in relation to Bill C-76, an act to amend certain statutes to implement certain fiscal provisions of the budget tabled in Parliament on February 25, 1992, not more than one further sitting day shall be allotted to the consideration of report stage and one sitting day to the consideration of the third reading stage of the bill; and

That 15 minutes before the expiry of the time provided for government orders of the day allotted to the report stage consideration and on the day allotted to the third reading stage consideration of the said bill, any proceedings before the House shall be interrupted, if required, for the purpose of this order and, in turn, every question necessary to dispose of the stage in the bill then under consideration shall be put forthwith and successfully, without further debate or amendment.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion, which was agreed to on the following division:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I declare the motion carried.

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed from Friday, February 12, consideration of Bill C-76, an act to amend certain statutes to implement certain fiscal provisions of the budget tabled in Parliament on February 25, 1992, as reported (with an amendment) by a legislative committee; and Motions Nos. 1, 3, 6, 9, 12, and 14, 15, 16 and 17.

SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: Last Friday, February 12, 1993, the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell raised a point of order concerning the notice of a report stage motion for Bill C-76, an act to amend certain statutes to implement certain fiscal provisions of the budget tabled in Parliament on February 25, 1992, which he stated had been sent by fax by the hon. member for Ottawa Centre to the Journals Branch prior to the close of the notice period of 6 p.m. on Thursday, February 11. The Deputy Speaker took the matter under consideration and promised to return to the House at the earliest possible opportunity.

[Translation]

The Chair has now had the opportunity to look into the matter. The member raised two issues in his point of order. First, he stated that the motion had been sent prior to the 6 p.m. closing, and second, he argued that an original signed copy of the document should not be necessary and that a signed notice received by fax should be acceptable.

[English]

After carefully reviewing the events, I have determined that the motion submitted in the name of the hon. member for Ottawa Centre was received by fax at the Journals Branch at 6.02 p.m. on Thursday, February 11, as clearly indicated on the fax copy itself.

The member's office was immediately notified that the motions were received after 6 p.m. and that an original signature was required and therefore on two counts was not receivable. In addition, the member's office was also advised that there was some question as to the form of the motions themselves. However, based solely on the late receipt, there is no doubt that the motions did not meet the requirements of the Standing Orders for notice.

There is a long-standing tradition of this House that original signatures by a member are required for all notices and the advent of new technology has not altered this practice. This practice has existed in order to protect members from any unauthorized use of their names.

The House may wish to consider through appropriate channels whether it wishes to amend this practice to meet the demands of new technology. Meanwhile the current practice must prevail and all notices submitted for the Notice Paper and received by fax, which members know are really photocopies, are accepted as advance notice and cannot be considered official unless supported by the member's original signature on the document in question and which must be received shortly thereafter.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I could elicit a very short clarification from the Chair.

In the event that an hon. member sends to the Clerk one of these notices by way of a fax transmission, such fax transmission then to be followed up by an original signature, must that original signature also appear in the Clerk's office before the designated time of six o'clock or can one of those be received afterward? It was not entirely clear to me from the Speaker's ruling as it pertains to the follow-up original signature.

Mr. Speaker: I thank the hon. member. I regret that this confusion has existed. I hope that it will not exist any further. I am very pleased to make it very clear to all hon. members that unless we change the rules, the signed copy must be received prior to the close-off time.

• (1250)

It means that in practice, if hon. members wish to notify the Table early by a fax, it is probably helpful. However, in order to come in within the prescribed time under the rules it will be necessary for a signed copy to be there by six o'clock.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, if I may, I suggest that perhaps it is time for the parliamentary committee to review the rule so that at the very least a written confirmation could be send afterwards as long as the fax copy was sent on time.

I submit that there should be room to accommodate this new technology. It is my hope that Mr. Speaker will bring this to the attention of the appropriate committee to ensure that we reflect those changes in such a way as to modernize our institution to some degree.

Mr. Speaker: I accept the suggestion of the hon. member in the spirit in which it is given. I will consult with members and try to bring about that suggestion.

I remind hon. members that I think some careful thought will have to go into it. We would not want a situation where somebody who has put in a fax early, then a confirmed document and signature after the time, got into conflict with another member who had brought down the signed motion prior to the time.

There are some things that we could think about. I am sure that we can resolve the problem. I thank the hon. members.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Ottawa Centre has four minutes remaining for debate.

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, four minutes and 14 seconds if I recall correctly but we will call it four minutes.

This presentation deals with the question of the government's handling of Canada student loans. The last time I stood in this House to speak against the government proposals I used a number of examples. I made the case that the government should fulfil its promise when it comes to the 3 per cent tax it imposed on student loans.

I want to repeat the same request of the government. It must withdraw the 3 per cent tax on student loans. The Canada Student Loans Program must be a program that helps students in need. As well, the government must keep all of the students' support programs in place and as well, it must establish new programs that would help students who are in need.

It would mean that the government would approach provincial governments that might have some more programs or that might be thinking of introducing assistance programs. Nevertheless, it has always been and continues to be the responsibility of everybody to help students in need who want to move and progress.

The government must deplore the actions of the Ontario NDP government. It abandoned the student grants, it cut funding to students and institutions. As well, the government should deplore the actions of other levels of government, such as the Ontario NDP government when in a matter of two years it increased by over 10 per cent tuition fees imposed on students who want to pursue their education.

We on this side of the House are always called on to provide alternatives and options.

I want to provide an option to the government and it is to immediately strike some sort of an action plan whereby the government will bring together all of the different partners in the educational system, that is to say the provincial governments, representatives of school boards, parent organizations, the voluntary sector, the student population, representatives from the business sector, and so on, in order to deal with this incredible problem of access to education. Not only access to education at the post-secondary level, but access to education at every level.

Only through a proper strategy at the national level, and only through the co-operation and co-ordination of the federal government can we truly deal with the question of education and access to education in our society. That is why we have called on the government to take those actions and to deal with them appropriately. We can no longer afford to do the kinds of things we have been doing in the past without the proper remedies to the difficulties that students are faced with.

I can see that my time is up but I wanted to say that the 3 per cent tax has got to go, as the minister has promised in the past.

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to speak in support of Bill C-76, the budget implementation legislation. I might say in passing that it is important for the House and people to be aware of what is before the House today. It is a matter that was approved in principle when the budget was approved by this House almost a year ago.

I consider it somewhat of an anomaly of our system that a proposal can be approved in the budget, but consequential legislation follows, even if it takes a year before it gets there. When I heard the gnashing of teeth, the grunts and the groans and the talk about jackboots from my hon. friends on the other side of this place about the use of time allocation in this debate, I think it is important to get all the cards on the table and remember that it has been a year since this House approved in principle this legislation. The idea that the debate on it should be dragged out is something that my hon. friends have done not only with this legislation but other bills that this House has considered recently.

It is important that we put it in perspective. The use of time allocation is to ensure that the government which has been given a mandate by the people in an election in actual fact can govern. I would also remind my hon. friends that time allocation was first brought in by a Liberal government some years ago. So we should put all this into perspective.

The purpose of Parliament is to debate legislation, but not to debate it interminably. The issues should be brought forward, both for and against the cause and then vote and get on with the business of the day.

I notice that every single proposal that this government has brought forward to bring the finances of this nation under control has been opposed by our friends on the other side. We have seen recently what their alternative suggestions are, very profound ones like getting rid of the GST but not having any idea whatsoever what it is going to be replaced with. That is the extent of intellectual depth they are offering to the public with respect to restraint.

I have no hesitation at all in standing and supporting the government's use of time allocation in order that this legislation can be proceeded with so that the business of Canadians can be got on with.

The 1992 budget was devoted to deficit reduction and fiscal restraint with a view to sustained economic growth for Canadians. The measures in Bill C-76 are dedicated to these goals, as the name of the bill implies, the 1992 budget implementation act. Here we are, well into 1993, still having our friends on the other side do what they can to drag out this process as long as possible.

Bill C-76 deals with three bills: the Salaries Act, the Canada Student Loans Act and the Lobby Registration Act.

The amendments to the Salaries Act are part of the government's commitment to fiscal restraint, taking a previous salary freeze one step further by reducing the Prime Minister's salary and the salaries of all the cabinet ministers by 5 per cent, showing that this government leads by example, it does not impose situations on others that it is not prepared to impose upon itself. It is necessary as well to update and improve the Canada Student Loans Program to ensure that it continues to provide assistance to needy students. However, I am not going to dwell on that particular amendment, as it was discussed exhaustively in committee and I might say exhaustively in this House during the debate last Friday.

I want to focus on the amendments to the Lobbyists Registration Act. The Minister of Finance indicated in his 1992 budget that the government intended to strengthen its cost recovery performance. Canadians told the government that they want government to be fiscally responsible. That is our perception of what the public wants. That is what we are trying to deliver as a government, even though every single measure for fiscal restraint that this government has brought forward has been opposed by the free spenders on the other side of this place.

Under Bill C-76 the Governor in Council will be able to charge lobbyists a registration fee when registering under the Lobbyists Registration Act. In concert with the government's approach to so many other things, the fee will be established in consultation with the private sector so that those who use the service will be underwriting the cost of it.

Under Bill C-76 as well the Crown will be able to sue in the civil courts to recover unpaid fees because fees owing will now be a debt to the Crown. In addition the current penalty avoidance incentives which exist to encourage compliance with the act will extend to registration fees, a measure which should encourage further compliance. Quite simply, this is what Bill C-76 proposes to do with respect to the Lobbyists Registration Act.

The government is committed to remaining fiscally responsible by implementing cost recovery measures wherever possible. Bill C-76 will help the government reach these goals.

Some members on the other side are raising questions about the Lobbyists Registration Act that go beyond the narrow fiscal intent of this bill. I should remind members that this issue is being taken up by the Standing Committee on Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Government Operations and I expect that it will conduct a very thorough study of this whole subject. It is important to bear in mind that the subject of this legislation before the House today is strictly the narrow fiscal aspect. Broader topics with respect to the program will be looked at by the standing committee.

Members are reminded as well that the new Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs appeared before that committee last week with a very thorough presentation and I might say he shows signs that he is going to be a very excellent Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and a very valued addition to the cabinet. I publicly compliment him on his appointment and congratulate the Prime Minister for making it.

The minister encouraged the committee to use the review process to examine and make recommendations to improve the act that would be in line with the act's basic principles of openness, unimpeded access to government and administrative simplicity.

The minister suggested some ideas for possible improvement, including first of all extending to one year from six months the limitation period before proceedings can be initiated against people who have not complied with the act; second, having tier two in-house lobbyists report the subject matter of their lobbying activity; third, giving tier one professional lobbyists a reduced time period in which to register their activities; fourth, requiring that any change in tier one lobbying be reported; and finally, having registrations filed electronically.

The opportunity exists in that forum, the committee, to raise many questions and concerns about the Lobbyists Registration Act, other than the amendments we are discussing in Bill C-76.

With those few comments, I would encourage the members of the House to use the time available to discuss the issues that are raised in this legislation and for goodness' sake let us get on with the business of the nation, get this year old legislation through the House and get on with other priorities and concerns that Canadians have.

I commend the bill to all members of the House who I know will give it thorough consideration.

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the haste of my friend from South Shore. He is known to be a fairly impatient man. It is not surprising the basic matter that brings us here is called democracy. It is the opportunity for people through their representatives to have some say in what the government is proposing to do, to at least have their say, the people of Canada, the people of Newfoundland and the other nine provinces, and have the opportunity to pass judgment through our voices as members of Parliament. That opportunity, I say to the gentleman from South Shore although he has dismissed it, is an important one.

Yes, we well understand the process to which the gentleman alludes. Yes, the government through the passage of the budget motion has general umbrella approval for its budgetary policies. Nobody argues that point here. We did not vote for them but we understand the numbers game. We understand that the government commands the votes of enough members in this Chamber to get that kind of motion through the Chamber.

I would invite the hon. member for South Shore to reflect on what he is saying. Surely the people of Canada, through us here, must have an opportunity bill by bill, measure by measure to comment on, to give support for or to be opposed to individual measures. Otherwise we could well have the situation in which a member on the government side of the House, or anywhere in this Chamber for that matter, approved of the budgetary policies of the government in general but had some serious misgivings about a particular measure. Indeed, he may have enough misgivings to vote against a particular measure even though that individual member would already have voted to approve the general budgetary policy of the government.

The member for South Shore really ought to reflect a little more on that point before he starts advocating putting the wrecking ball to some of the very well established procedures here. They are well established because they serve a very real purpose for him and for other members of this Chamber and, more important, for the people who we represent here.

The member also speaks fairly eloquently on the subject of fiscal restraint. He says that this bill is in part an example of how the government is leading by example in the matter of fiscal restraint. Maybe he is right, I do not know. I did not look at this bill in that particular light so I would give him the benefit of the doubt. However, while he is parading fiscal restraint as something this government practises he might well look at some other issues. For example, he might want to examine the $4.5 billion being spent on helicopters and tell us whether he thinks that is an example of fiscal restraint and whether that is an example of how money is best being spent in very tough times.

Let me talk specifically about a matter in this bill that affects people who live in all parts of this country, wherever there is a family with a young person going to university, to post-secondary education this year. That family might be in Cape Ray or O'Regan's in my riding or in any one of a thousand communities large and small across this country.

I want to focus on one or two communities in my riding where the aspect of the bill concerning Canada student loans is particularly hurtful. In fairness I do not believe this was very well thought out. In my riding there is a community called Coomb's Cove on the south coast in Fortune Bay and another community in that same bay called Pool's Cove. These are two quite small communities but they are indicative of the communities in Newfoundland. In those communities there are many families who aspire to having their children continue on after finishing high school, secondary school, either in their respective communities or in nearby communities at the central high school to which they are often bussed for their secondary education.

When they have completed that phase of their education those families and those individuals aspire to going on to Memorial University in St. John's or to some of the universities in the maritimes. To a degree they have been able to depend on the Canada Student Loans Program.

Sad to say that program is being dismantled by this government bit by bit. Let me give an example. When this government took office in September 1984 it inherited from the previous Liberal administration a set of rules, a set of Canada Student Loan parameters or guidelines, by which the program was administered at that time, in 1984.

In the nine years, since inflation has taken its toll in many areas and costs have increased appreciably, I am sure that nobody would argue that point. The cost of university education has certainly increased.

We only have to look at the tuition fees of any Canadian university in 1984 and compare them to this particular calendar year to realize that the cost of getting a university education, whether in terms of tuition, text books, or accommodations, has gone up appreciably in that length of time.

Does the House realize that nine years later the guidelines in terms of the floor amount, the basic amount which students may receive, have not changed in nine years? They have not changed. There has been no adjustment. There is no acknowledgement that the cost of getting a university education is considerably more now than it was nine years ago in 1984.

In that way alone the government has seriously undermined the Canada Student Loans Program. On top of that are the two measures in this particular bill. The first is the government's intention to cancel the six-month interest free post-graduation period for students with Canada student loans. That will increase the debt load of poorer students who had to borrow through the loans program in order to receive an education.

The second is the government's intention in this bill to introduce a 3 per cent administrative fee which will effectively tax those students least able to afford an education. In that context, this tax is regressive and unfair.

Taken together these two measures contemplated in this bill plus the government's refusal to change the guidelines over a nine-year period mean that literally thousands of university students in communities across this country, whether they are in communities I mentioned or in Lamaline, Monkstown, Point au Gaul, Point au Mal, any of the 158 communities in my riding or elsewhere across this country, who are being deprived of a university education because of the overt and mean actions of this very mean government.

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Mr. Speaker, the Canada Student Loans Program reminds me of something that actually started at the end of the Second World War. There was a government program to assist students in continuing on with their education.

In part it was recognition that as a result of the war starting in 1939 and running for almost six years a lot of people had their educations interrupted and that the government owed it to them to help them continue with their education and get their university degrees.

There is also little doubt that it was political in the sense that the government did not want a million people suddenly dropped on the streets looking for work, a large number of them being unemployed. They were young adults who might have made it difficult for the government if there was no program of any kind to look after them.

There is no doubt that in part it was recognition that education is important not just to the people who are getting it but to society as a whole. It is important to the development of the whole of Canada that we improve our education delivery system and that we make higher education available to those who are able to make good use of it.

It was recognition at the end of the war which went further than a loan. There were no loans. The government under the Veterans Land Act paid all of the tuition fees and paid an allowance depending upon whether it was a single person or a married person with a family. It paid people an allowance to enable them to live while attending university, I will not say comfortably but they certainly could exist. During the other months they could usually get employment of some kind. It was a good program, it worked, and it provided for a tremendous expansion in our universities from one end of the country to the other. It achieved all of the objectives, whatever the objectives were, and it worked.

Some years later, perhaps it was 20 years later, the government once again recognized that there were a lot of people who were unemployed. People were not able to pursue their education because in many cases they were not able to afford it. The government had to come up with an alternative plan.

It was recognized that it was in the interests of society that these people be educated so that we did not rely on being able to import people from other countries who have had training to come here and show us how to do it. It was more important that we develop our own sources of educated people here in Canada.

There was some recognition of that but the government did not go all the way. It did not go as far as the country was prepared to go at the end of the war. It lent people the money that it would take for fees and accommodation. It was not quite enough but it was enough to help them get by if they were able to get summer employment or even part-time employment while going to university.

The program has worked. There have been complaints about it, certainly. The government taxes back 3 per cent of it before the loan money is even awarded to students. Before students pick it up they lose 3 per cent. They owe the full amount but they collect 97 per cent.

That is something that has bothered people from the beginning. In recognition of that the government made the proposal in advance of this legislation actually being introduced that the proposal before us now would give the government the money it needed to replace that 3 per cent deduction so that the students would actually be getting the money they were borrowing.

I am talking now about the proposal to remove the six-month holiday on interest that has been in the act. If this passes that will be a thing of the past. Students may defer payments for a period of six months after graduation but will still owe the full amount and will owe interest on that amount from the day that they actually received the money.

We are getting further and further away from the principle that it is up to society to provide this kind of educational program, to provide this kind of educational opportunity. It is society as a whole that benefits from having trained people in our community, from training people here in Canada rather than people being trained abroad and coming here to take advantage of all the services we offer to people who are working here and the costs that we levy against them for that. It is all part of our system. Part of our system should be to provide every opportunity, as much as we reasonably can, for students within Canada to pursue their education as long as they are able to make good use of it, mentally rather than financially.

One of the problems Canada has had is that we have been importing too many people from abroad to fill these posts and opportunities. We have been making opportunities for people from other countries.

We can do better than that. We should do better than that. This is a backward step. It is a step that the government introduced by saying it would take care of something else and then it decided to take away what it was taking care of. The government is simply taking money away from students who are graduating, who may or may not find employment within that period and who may or may not find it easy.

• (1320)

If anything, it is probably going to increase the number of delinquent loans that people in government are trying to catch up with. I wonder how much it costs to really collect this money. Is it worth the trouble? Certainly, if those people get work we start collecting income tax, sales tax and GST from them almost immediately. Is it is necessary to pursue them knowing that some of them are going to get away with it anyway? A lot of those who leave the country get away with it.

If the government wants to make a forward step in this legislation rather than trying to get more out of those students in anticipation that they may be able to pay it and may pay it, why not simply say this is part of the Canadian effort to try to improve things here in Canada, not for the individuals so much as for society as a whole.

This legislation should be taken back. The government should take another look and come up with a program that will deliver education in a better way than it has up to this time. It should bring in a better program rather than try to nickel away at the program that we have and make it worse.

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, I am continually amazed that members in the House of Commons, knowing that the funded debt of Canada in bonds traded actively on the marketplace and in Canada Savings Bonds exceeds $370 billion, where the total out of pocket external debt of the country exceeds $300 billion, where the federal government and the provincial governments are in deficit this year by at least $60 billion, where there is sometimes concern whether the government can borrow money or not borrow money in any particular week because of the nature of markets, where our currency is attacked on international markets at a moment's notice as it was attacked twice last fall, should at any time not compliment the government on efforts made by it to conserve, make more efficient and reduce the cost of government.

Day after day in this House we hear from the Liberal Party "spend, spend, spend" and the New Democratic Party says "oh spend it, borrow it, get it somewhere, print it, does it matter". This piece of legislation restricts, cuts back on loans, cuts back on the salary of the Prime Minister, cuts back on the salaries of ministers, requires activities of lobbyists, for example, to carry themselves.

All of these things are efforts made by us to carry the cost of government for the people who use the services of government. Yet, the Liberals cry and say: "Oh, spend more. There is no limit to the debt. Just take more. Borrow more, spend more, run the debt up more". That is the kind of thing we get from the Liberal Party.

Their leader the other day in Toronto talked about being fiscally responsible. Fiscal responsibility, except when we come to this House when they say: "Spend more, borrow more, pay more, do not in any way alter any of the programs of government even though it cannot afford them".

I really wonder where they are and where they are coming from. The contents of this legislation—

Mr. Kilgour: Talk about the helicopters, Don.

Mr. Blenkarn: We will talk about helicopters at another point. The contents of this legislation were set out in the budget of the Minister of Finance in February 1992. That budget was passed by this House. All this bill does is implement that budget. That is all it does.

The fact that this bill should have to go to closure is absolutely ridiculous. We passed the budget and this is a measure implementing the budget. There is no reason in the wide world why this motion and this bill should not go through immediately.

A number of people have complained that students are somehow injured by this bill. May I say this: I think education is certainly the most important priority of this government. We have spoken many times about more technical training, more education and so on. We would like to see more money spent. We are continuing to make money available in this program for a very generous student loan program and organizing that program in compliance with provincial student loan programs. The program is in place.

May I point out, though, that despite the fact that we keep putting up money, students are not any worse off today than they used to be. I remember when I went to school that it took 11 weeks of the summer earnings to pay your university fees. Today the average student can pay his or her university fees in something in the neighbourhood of four to five weeks' work. In other words, students today are twice as well off as I was when I went to university.

They scream because they do not like to have the truth pointed out. Of course education is important and other things are important and they are still able to get these loans.

They now cry. Hear them cry: spend more, spend more. We have finally forced them out. They are now screaming to spend more. They want us to spend more. Now we know where the lines are going to be drawn in the contest to come up shortly this year, the contest of those who believe in responsible government and those who believe in putting Canada into bankruptcy. They are the Liberal Party and the New Democratic Party and that is what they are and that is what they want to carry on.

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, I hope that I can provide a bit more levity to the House than the previous speaker. He talked about a responsible government. The measures put forward in this bill, Bill C-76, the omnibus tax or budget bill, are probably the most irresponsible measures that I have seen for a long time.

The bill is essentially divided into four parts. The first part deals with the Canada Student Loans Act. The second part deals with the Lobbyist Registration Act. The third part relates to salaries of ministers and the Prime Minister and the fourth part increases the Small Businesses Loans Act from $100,000 to $200,000.

Bill C-76 purports to do many things. I listened to the member on the government side with absolute incredulity. I would like to speak to the Student Loans Act first.

When a student gets a Canada student loan it is because he or she needs help. For no other reason do they ask for a student loan. There is no interest charged on the loan while he or she is a full-time student in school. This government now says that as soon as they finish school there is no more interest free period, that from that day on the interest starts accumulating, regardless of whether that person has a job or not.

One of the reasons they do not have jobs, in spite of what the previous Conservative member of Parliament said, is because of the policies that this government has in place today. It talks about investing in our future and investing in our young people, and yet it has cut back on transfer payments for education. Therefore, tuition fees are increasing. How do you expect the poorest of the poor to cope with increased tuition fees, not to mention the GST on books? My colleague from St. Boniface, who is our education critic, has noted, and I agree with him, that the number of students who graduate with a debt load of over $15,000 has increased by 500 per cent over four years. The number of students who graduate with a total debt load of $15,000 has increased to over 10,700 students in 1990 from approximately 2,200 four years earlier.

There is a 3 per cent tax on student loans which should not exist. There is the extra six months of interest which ought to be removed and the criteria for the allocation of moneys must be changed.

The annual report of the Canada Student Loans Program tabled in the House of Commons indicated that there are 215,000 students who rely on the Canada Student Loans Program to help them gain access to post-secondary education.

The Canadian Federation of Students says contempt for the democratic process has become the trademark of the Conservative government. Tory MPs sitting in the House of Commons committee studying Bill C-76 first denied witnesses the right to appear in front of the committee and then proceeded to adopt the bill in less than five minutes.

Members of the Canadian Federation of Students had hoped to appear before the committee to discuss one of the bill's harshest measures, the elimination of a six-month post-graduation interest subsidy on student loans as well as the lobbyists' registration fee, but they were not allowed to appear. I think that is absolutely disgraceful.

With regard to the Small Businesses Loans Act, as mentioned at the outset, the budget proposes the broadening of the scope of the Small Businesses Loans Act by increasing the maximum individual loan amount from $100,000 to $200,000.

This amendment to the SBLA has a limited impact to assist small business because it is not logical to change one parameter without looking at changes to other parameters. It is hard to cover costs under the SBLA. There is a deterrent of its use because it only provides for floating rate loans and not fixed rates as most business customers would prefer. There is a need for more promotion of the SBLA. This should probably be promoted by the banks and not the federal government.

An interesting thing happened to me just recently. I have been promoting this increase from $100,000 to $200,000 to small business people within the community of Nepean and suggesting that they contact their banks. The banks do not like it. Why do the banks not like it? It is because if there is any chance of the person not coming through or not being able to carry through on the loan, the bank has to pick up the loss, not the federal government.

Another interesting thing is that the federal government never consulted with the financial institutions to determine whether or not this was a good measure. It never talked with the banks on that. I think that is disgraceful.

The Canadian Chamber of Commerce is always being mentioned as if it were the be-all and end-all for advice that is given to the federal government. The chamber does not like the small business financial proposal either. What do you say to that? It says that although the federal government recently raised the eligible loan amount under the Small Businesses Loans Act from $100,000 to $200,000 it wants the ceiling raised to $300,000. It believes that $200,000 is not enough. Increasing to $300,000 would attract more financial institutions to lend under the act.

In addition, the chamber strongly urges the federal government to review all of the eligibility criteria and the program terms. It recognizes that the program has some usefulness and urges a review of its structure. That is from the national Canadian Chamber of Commerce.

Under the amendments to the Lobbyists Registration Act these amendments say: "Give the Governor in Council regulation-making power to enact regulations, charging a fee to be paid by lobbyists".

In other words, if lobbyists want to get something from me, they have to pay me a fee. I was always of the impression that when I am elected to this prestigious Parliament, anybody has the right to approach me and ask me anything they wish.

They can do this without me or the Government of Canada charging them a fee. I think that is ridiculous. The introduction of fees represents a radical departure never contemplated by Parliament or the government itself.

The other aspect of the bill relates to the reduction of salaries of cabinet ministers and the Prime Minister. I agree with that one.

It is unfortunate they did not go one step further and start looking at members' pensions. They should start realizing that maybe they should be paid at age 55 or 60 like the rest of Canadians.

Thank you very much for giving me the opportunity to speak to the Draconian measures the government is trying to implement in this House of Commons.

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, it is no wonder the Canadian public is confused when it watches the proceedings of the House of Commons.

We just watched an opposition member stand up in this House and criticize government legislation without knowing what was in it. That is not right. I think it is incumbent upon us on this side of the House to at least put the record on the line so it can be examined for what it is.

The member who just spoke went through the Small Businesses Loans Act. As you know it is part of the economic package we are working on in the House at this very moment. I think it is important to lay the facts out so people can understand them.

The ceiling on those loans is going to be raised to $250,000 and not $200,000 but I cannot imagine members on the other side of the House standing up for the big banks in Canada. In the finance committee last week we heard from every major bank and economic think tank in the country. When they look at the Small Businesses Loans Act they believe we are doing the right thing.

The only unfortunate part of it is that we are providing a little bit of a cushion for the chartered banks so they will do something for small business. We are the only ones who want to do it. Obviously on that side of the House they do not. It looks to me as if those members want to hook their fortunes on the chartered banks and protect them. They want to defend the chartered banks. That is not what we are doing.

We want to make capital available to small businesses across this country. When I go back to my constituency I hear all the time that these small companies are starved for capital. The banks are not doing a whole lot about it but we are with some significant changes to the Small Businesses Loans Act.

Transfers to the provinces is another area that has to be corrected. As a member of Parliament from Atlantic Canada the transfers to the poorer provinces are important to me. We could all argue that all the provinces are poor today and I guess if you look at the balance sheets they are.

The transfers from the federal government to the provincial governments of Atlantic Canada are greater now than they have ever been in the past. There is more money going to my home province of New Brunswick now than ever before. Premier McKenna will admit that.

When the provinces talk about those numbers they say they have not increased as rapidly as they would like. Everyone would love to have a 10, 12 or 15 per cent pay raise. We kept those transfers going to the provinces at a rate higher than the point at which we have controlled our own spending.

In other words they are getting more and not less. I think the other side has to admit that.

Mr. Kilgour: Save us. Save us.

Mr. Thompson: Listen to them holler. Every one of them will have a chance to get on their own two feet and state their position. They are not willing to listen.

Mr. Whittaker: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I hesitate to interrupt the member in full flight in his speech.

He pointed out in the introduction of his speech it appeared the opposition did not know what was in the bill. I want to point out to the House and the member that the part of the Small Businesses Loans Act to which he is referring was withdrawn in committee.

• (1340)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I am sorry but it is not a matter of the rules. I give the floor to the hon. member.

Mr. Thompson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for your generosity. I hope you will add that time to my speaking time.

In the time I have left I want to point out the voting record of those folks across the Chamber who pretend to be working for small businesses in their constituencies.

I want to start with the Liberal voting record. We will get into the economic package a little later but let us take a look at what they have done in regard to justice and some of the things the Liberals have voted against in this House.

The Liberals voted against strengthening the Young Offenders Act to deal more effectively with youths who commit murder, for example. That was Bill C-12 in the third session. They voted against tighter parole for violent offenders.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Edmonton Southeast.

Mr. Kilgour: Mr. Speaker, there is a rule of relevance in this Chamber and I would ask you to enforce it on this member.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I call on members on both sides of the House to co-operate. I would ask the hon. member to continue his statement.

[English]

Mr. Thompson: Thank you again for your generosity. I will continue.

Let us talk about agriculture and some of the support payments to farmers the other side is so famous for criticizing us about. The Liberals voted against Bill C-75, which put $500 million into the hands of Canadian farmers. They did the same thing on Bill C-90, a $52 million package. They did the same thing on Bill C-24 when we committed $428 million to Canadian agriculture. They did it again on Bill C-100 when we committed $40 million to Canadian agriculture.

In terms of economic and regional expansion—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. I think the debate is on the amendments at the report stage.

Mr. Thompson: They have a tendency to move off the bill in question. I think I have to clear the record and clear it I will.

In terms of economic and regional expansion, they voted against Bill C-91, a change in the patent law to encourage more research in this country. They did the same thing in regard to the privatization acts.

It was the same with the NDP members. All they want to do is criticize. If we get back to the bill we are debating, the Canada Student Loans Act, they are again criticizing from a position I cannot understand. We are attempting to eliminate the 3 per cent surcharge on student loans. But they get up on their hind legs and completely distort what we are trying to do.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): A point of order, the hon. member for Windsor—St. Clair.

Mr. McCurdy: Mr. Speaker, I do not want to get into the business of people not knowing the content of the bill they are debating and accusing other members of not understanding what is being debated, but I would like to point out there is nothing in this bill about removing the 3 per cent surcharge.

I would advise the hon. member if he is going to allege that other people are debating something that is not in the bill, he should not do the same thing.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): As you know, no rule is harder for the Chair to apply than the rule of relevance. Since this is a money bill, the Chair is being somewhat indulgent, but I would ask the hon. member not to abuse it.

[English]

Mr. Thompson: It is quite difficult to stand in this place and have a clear debate when one is constantly being interrupted.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member.

Mr. McCurdy: This is report stage and we are debating specific amendments which have been grouped. The subject matter of every one of them changes the student loan, not every issue that this or any other speaker wants to bring into debate.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): When the hon. member interrupted the hon. member for Carleton—Charlotte, the subject was student loans, if I am not mistaken. I again give the floor to the hon. member.

[English]

Mr. Thompson: If the member had been here this morning and paid attention to what was happening he would realize we are on closure debate, a two hour debate.

An hon. member: Time allocation.

Mr. Thompson: Time allocation is what it is called. He has been around this House longer than I have and should know that.

We are talking about proposals that were brought into this House in December with the finance minister's economic statement. When we are into debate with regard to the specific parts of that economic statement the field is wide open. We are really talking about the 1992 budget. We want to get on the record and put the record clearly on the line. I think we should be allowed to do that without constant interruption.

Mr. Simmons: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

The member just speaking said the field is wide open. That is contrary to what you ruled three or four minutes ago. You asked him to be relevant. He is continuing to flaunt your ruling therefore I have much pleasure in moving that the Speaker's ruling be upheld.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I know that all members of this House have a great deal of good will, and I would ask the hon. member to conclude in one minute and to stick to the subject under consideration, report stage.

[English]

Mr. Thompson: It is quite obvious the opposition members do not want government members speaking today because there has been nothing but constant interruption since I have been on my feet.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Windsor—St. Clair on a point of order.

Mr. McCurdy: Evidently members on the government side have no clear idea what they are doing. They may recall that perhaps an hour ago we had a vote on time allocation.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but the time for his speech has now expired.

Mr. Laporte: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member said a moment ago we were on a debate on time allocation. My understanding is that we are at report stage on one of the amendments and have already voted on time allocation. I am wondering if the Speaker could clarify to the House exactly where we are.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): To be quite clear, we are really at consideration of report stage. Now, hon. members must understand that within a speech, reference can be made to what was voted on today and things like that. So I call on all hon. members to be tolerant and show good will. Resuming debate, the hon. member for Sudbury.

[English]

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, just in case the members on the governing side of the House do not recall, it was actually their decision to do away with any kind of two-hour debate on time allocation. I actually have the Standing Orders here. If you look at page 49, procedure in cases to allot time, you will find there is no longer any kind of debate on the subject.

There have been a lot of accusations thrown around. I just wanted to absolutely clarify this is definitely report stage on Bill C-76.

Mr. McCreath: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I would not want the hon. member for Sudbury to offend her colleague from Burin—St. George's so I wonder if you might ask her to speak to the motion which I believe is report stage of Bill C-76.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I again ask both sides to co-operate. I believe that the Chair has been very tolerant in allowing the widest range of expression, but I ask everyone on both sides to come back to the issue being debated. So on the substance of report stage, the hon. member for Sudbury.

• (1350)

Mrs. Marleau: Mr. Speaker, being known to co-operate I was trying to co-operate to my utmost with the members of the government in explaining to them why I was speaking to report stage of Bill C-76 rather than time allotment. I thought it very important that they understand this. We were also speaking to measures that would alter Bill C-76 with respect to student loans and the way they are being treated by this government.

When we speak of students we speak of people, of Canadians, who are very vulnerable. As is to be expected from the members on the governing side the previous speaker before me said he could not understand. I know they do not understand.

We can tell whenever the government deals with any Canadians that it has absolutely no understanding whatsoever of what it is like to be out there in the real world, to be a Canadian, to be someone trying to get an education. Rather than continuously harassing those who have such a hard time right now why does the government not introduce constructive measures such as ways of allowing students who have student loans to pay them back?

The government should find ways to allow students to pay them back in an honourable way with a job, with something that says not only are they able to pay back their loans but they can do it honourably and get on with their lives. They should do that rather than pursuing the kinds of economic policies that make it extremely difficult for students when they complete their degrees to get a job that allows them to honourably pay back the kind of loan they have had to take. It is so difficult to get an education and it is so difficult to get the right kind of education that will lead to the kind of job that is permanent and allows them to get ahead.

In the years that I have been here this government has always shown a total lack of understanding in whatever area it goes. Previously there was a reference to the way that we sometimes vote in this House of Commons. There are many instances in which things are grouped together so that there are good points and bad points.

Then we play our little game. It says that we the opposition always oppose because it always manages to put in things that we might want to support along with things we definitely do not want to support. We cannot win either way. If we vote against it the government brings out the part that we should have supported and we would have supported had it been on its own. If we vote for it the government says that we support all of its policies. How great.

If we were above board and honest with the people of Canada then perhaps we could say yes we support this and no we do not support this. What has shocked me the most about being a member of Parliament is the games that people play with the lives of Canadians.

An hon. member: The government plays games.

Mrs. Marleau: The government plays games. I would hope that when the time comes and we have a chance to right the wrongs of this government we will not fall prey to the game playing that has been going on. It is high time that we start considering who is paying the price for these games. Canadians are paying the price.

There are some members who will pay the price as well come next election.

An hon. member: Most of them.

Mrs. Marleau: Many of them will. Then perhaps they will understand what we are talking about when we say they have been going to the wrong people when they try to hit and convince Canadians that it is those who are most vulnerable who are the ones causing the problems and they are not.

I know very few students who once they complete their education and have a decent job are not willing, even eager, to pay off their loans. However we must give them a way of doing it.

The government says it is bringing forward this bill because we are going to remove the 3 per cent surcharge some time in the future. There is absolutely nothing in this bill that will remove that surcharge now. It is a vague promise.

It is not fair to tell people that we are giving with one hand and we are taking with the other because all we are doing is taking away right now. In past speeches I have spoken to the kind of harassment that students are subjected to when it comes to their Canada student loans.

I will not go into detail about some of the things that have happened except to say that no one should be subjected to this type of harassment.

I would hope that the government would accept some of these amendments that we are now making which would make it easier on everyone. Perhaps in the eyes of Canadians it would make the members of the government seem more human. Not only must they seem more human but they must become more human.

They must remember what it is like to be out there either looking for a job or trying to pay back their loans. They must remember that because very soon they are going to be in that position. Then they will want people to feel warm and giving towards them. I beseech the government to allow some of these amendments.

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, this debate at report stage must be extraordinarily interesting to the electorate watching it on television. The hon. member from Carleton—Charlotte accused another hon. member of being totally ignorant of the bill and said therefore how dare she stand before this House and even debate it. Meanwhile he chose to debate two items which were not covered in the bill.

It is more telling to listen to the interventions of the hon. member from Scarborough south. There is an exponent of democracy. He too did not want to have the debate prolonged. He asked: "Why are we bothering with the debate? It was announced in the budget so why should we bother debating Bill C-76 or the particular amendments we are debating here?"

That statement is totally consistent with the hon. member's behaviour in legislative committee. The amendments with which we are now dealing concern the change in student loans. There are a number of changes but the key change is the elimination of the interest free period for students which lasts six months after graduation. Students in Saskatchewan have already mobilized 3,000 signatures to oppose this legislation and to ask the government to do a number of things. However this hon. member and his colleagues absolutely refuse to even entertain the notion that students should be heard. The hon. member from Scarborough south is so recently a graduate of the university system that he understands better than the students so why bother.

The serious question to be asked in this House is: does this government really regard itself, as apparently does the hon. member from Scarborough south, as an elected dictatorship which does not require that the opposition be involved at all? Does this government not think it necessary that the people be involved at all?

Mr. Kilgour: Mississauga.

Mr. McCurdy: That is right. He would not have known that I was talking about him. I am sorry about that. Mr. Speaker, I hope the record will show that it is Mississauga South. Mississauga South. Have I repeated it frequently enough? Hansard can correct that. I will sit down and have my remaining five minutes after Question Period.

Mr. Speaker: It being two o'clock, the House will now proceed to Statements by Members, pursuant to Standing Order 31.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

LEADER OF THE OPPOSITION

Mr. Dave Worthy (Cariboo—Chilcotin): I would like to congratulate the hon. Leader of the Opposition on finally coming out with policies that Canadians can discuss.

I must admit however that I along with many other Canadians wonder why his vision for the future means returning to the past. We have already spent 10 years formulating the GST. We have already negotiated two major trading agreements with the United States. Canadians do not want another decade of committees to reformulate and renegotiate policies that are already working.

Canadians want to look to the future. Do we see a vision of the emerging new Canada in the statements of the Leader of the Opposition? The answer is no. His policies remind me of the movie Back to the Future. It is unfortunate that his ideas for Canada are not as good as the movie. The party awaits—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Winnipeg Transcona.

CAMECO CORPORATION

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, the battlefields of the Persian Gulf are now quiet, but thanks in part to a Canadian Crown corporation they remain deadly to the Kuwaiti and Iraqi people.

Eldorado Resources Limited, a federal Crown corporation, merged with the Saskatchewan Mining and Development Corporation to form Cameco Corporation, which between 1988 and 1990 shipped uranium yellowcake to the Sequoyah Fuels Uranium Conversion Facility in Oklahoma. From there uranium tetra-fluoride was obtained by Aerojet Ordnance Tennessee and sent back into Canada to a Cameco refinery where it was made into depleted uranium metal. This metal was then sent to AOT to be manufactured into armour-piercing shells.

According to the United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority, 36 tonnes of depleted uranium was left on the battlefields after the gulf war.

Canada's policy states that uranium exports must be for peaceful purposes only. Treaty Series 1980 No. 13 states that no amount of Canadian uranium sold to the U.S. can be used for any military purpose. These shipments, therefore, are violations of this treaty and of Canada's official policy.

If the federal government cannot keep Canadian uranium out of deadly U.S. weaponry, then it should leave the uranium in the ground.

THE MEMBER FOR SKEENA

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I am just back from Abitibi, where the workers are angry about the statement made by the New Democratic Party of Canada's environment critic, the member for Skeena, who in a video broadcast in the United States said that Americans should not buy electricity produced by the Great Whale River project because there is "blood on it".

In the video, this NDP member from British Columbia never once spoke of the caribou blood in the past two years in the United States. He targets Quebec's hydroelectric projects and not those of his home province.

For several years now caribou hunting has been permitted in James Bay and hunters come from Quebec, the United States and British Columbia as well. Moreover, hunting caribou is allowed in the Yukon.

SALMAN RUSHDIE

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, we have just passed the fourth anniversary of Iran's fatwah, the call for the murder of Salman Rushdie for writing the novel, The Satanic Verses.

Yesterday Iran's Ayatollah Ali Khameini ruled out any reversal of the fatwah stating "the verdict must be carried out and will be carried out". In November Iran's chief justice stated that all Muslims were obliged to kill Rushdie. The State of Iran condones this murder call.

Canada, for its part, carries on business with Iran as usual. Canada's diplomatic relations with and scoldings of Iranian authorities do not convey our abhorrence of the fatwah. Our line of credit to Iran, subsidized by Canadian tax dollars, is totally hypocritical and must be suspended.

Surely this absolute rejection of freedom of speech by the Government of Iran is more than just an embarrassment to the Canadian government. Or are we just waiting for Salman Rushdie to die?

YUGOSLAVIA

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): I have just returned from a trip to the former republics of Yugoslavia with a delegation of representatives from the United States, Great Britain, France, Austria, Germany and the Netherlands.

I am pleased and proud to report that of all the countries represented I was the only MP who met others from my own country carrying out peacekeeping and peace-making missions in the area.

I would like to say a special thank you to Mr. Philipp Hahn, a Canadian representative with the Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe. He was an excellent contact and provided objective briefings and assisted me above and beyond the call of duty while in Kosovo.

I would also like to acknowledge a platoon of Canadian peacekeepers led by Master Corporal Charles Ingraham from Baddeck, Nova Scotia, which is stationed at the border between Serbia and Macedonia where the purpose is to monitor the UN sanctions.

Mr. Speaker, it makes you proud to be a Canadian and be over there to see our men at work peacekeeping and peacemaking.

LEADER OF THE OPPOSITION

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, the economy continues to ravage the lives of Canadian workers and their families and regrettably the Conservative government refuses to change course.

In contrast, last week before the Empire Club of Toronto the Leader of the Opposition outlined a comprehensive approach to stimulating economic growth. He proposed ideas on how to create meaningful and lasting jobs. He also emphasized the need for skills training, a sound trade policy and the need for federal and provincial fiscal co-operation.

Our leader reminded the government of pursuing a balanced monetary policy, one that would create growth and not one mired with the sole obsession of fighting inflation.

Finally, he challenged the banks to make it easier, not harder, for businesses to obtain financing so they could once again become risk takers and job creators.

Unlike the Conservative government which is unwilling to abandon a failed and flawed economic agenda, our leader and our party are promoting ideas and generating alternatives so Canadians can once again believe in themselves and in their country and create the confidence and hope we need to revive and sustain a healthy and vibrant economy for Canada.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Mr. Ken Hughes (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, many people of the Crowsnest Pass in the riding of Macleod were put out of work by the closure of the Westar Balmer Mine in southeastern British Columbia last year.

A recent board of referees decision provided full UIC benefits for the employees. At that point rumours began circulating in the affected communities that the Government of Canada would appeal that decision, thus denying employees their full UIC benefits.

I spoke to the minister of state directly and indicated that the only fair course of action would be for the government not to appeal that decision. I now understand that the department will let the decision stand and that employees will receive full benefits.

On behalf of the hundreds of families in the Crowsnest Pass and the Elk Valley, I thank the minister for hearing our concern and responding to the needs of our communities.

THE ECONOMY

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, over the weekend the finance minister called Liberal policies flimflam. The former finance minister says they are baloney.

Well those two, Flim and Flam, should know because for the past eight years they have foisted their flimflam on Canadians: record deficits, 1.5 million without jobs, tax breaks for their wealthy friends.

The rich get their tax-free steaks to eat while the poor can hardly afford baloney because Dracula I and Dracula II have sucked them dry. Flim and Flam have brought this country to its knees and driven hundreds of thousands of people to welfare.

It is no surprise that Flim and Flam blow a gasket every time they hear the Leader of the Opposition talking about getting this country back on track and putting Canadians back to work.

Why do Flim and Flam not wake up to the reality that nobody is listening to their flimflam any more and quit the baloney?

TORONTO ECONOMY

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Mr. Speaker, Canada's employment peaked in June 1990. Since then Toronto has lost nearly 10 per cent of its employment base while Canada as a whole has lost about 3 per cent.

Almost one-half of the jobs lost in Canada were located in the Toronto area. If Toronto is excluded the rest of the Canadian economy has now almost fully recovered. Employment in the rest of Canada today is almost 99 per cent of pre-recession levels, but because of Toronto's size, the Canadian economy will not fully recover until Toronto improves.

This Friday, February 19, metropolitan Toronto is holding an economic summit. Representatives of all levels of government will be there to demonstrate their recognition of the critical role Toronto plays in Canada's economic recovery, but actions will speak louder than words.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE REFORM

Mrs. Pierrette Venne (Saint-Hubert): Mr. Speaker, one of the Conservative government's ministers has decided to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, and we know what an outcry this has provoked.

Before even thinking about changing the act, the Minister of Employment and Immigration should have started by improving it.

• (1410)

Women are discriminated against in the act, and Lucienne Gosselin-Gravel, who worked for her husband for several years and paid into the plan the whole time, is blatant proof. Mrs. Gosselin-Gravel was denied unemployment insurance benefits because she is married to her employer.

The Association des femmes collaboratrices et partenaires en affaires has decided to support Mrs. Gosselin-Gravel in her claim and contest the constitutionality of section 3(2)(c) of the act, which discriminates against women.

I wish them good luck, and I hope the courts give this woman justice, because the act does not.

CROSSBOWS

Mr. Ross Belsher (Fraser Valley East): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to bring to the attention of this House the tragic death of Silvia Leung, a 20-year old college student from Vancouver.

The use of a crossbow in the January 24 murder of Miss Leung is disturbingly similar to the November 1991 murder of an Ottawa resident, Patricia Allen, by her husband, Colin McGregor.

I realize that the use of crossbows and similar weapons in criminal activity is quite limited in Canada. However these two incidents have prompted many of my constituents to ask for stricter controls on the sale, possession and use of crossbows.

Bona fide hunters and target shooters have long used these weapons without difficulty. Most people will say there is a problem with the current regulations when a minor, a mentally unstable individual, or a convicted criminal can enter a sporting goods store and purchase a crossbow without any registration, licence or background checks.

I ask whether the Minister of Justice agrees the time is now to take the necessary steps to address the concerns of so many Canadians.

HERITAGE DAY

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, few Canadians have opportunities to celebrate their heritage or celebrate Canadian unity.

Municipalities and provincial governments across Canada have recently begun to designate the third Monday of February as Heritage Day, an important occasion when we can all celebrate the richness of our heritage.

Today I would like to pay tribute to my colleague, the member for Prince George—Bulkley Valley, who on this date last year spoke out on behalf of all Canadians in his private member's bill proclaiming this a national holiday, our Heritage Day.

Private members' bills rarely come to a vote but my colleague's bill was brought before the House and was shamefully defeated by both the Tories and the Liberals who would deny Canadians the opportunity to take the time to reflect upon their national identity.

I am sure all Canadians would appreciate the pause provided by Heritage Day. I for one will be voting in favour of the bill when the hon. member for Prince George—Bulkley Valley brings it forward again in a new session.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE REFORM

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I rise to encourage the government and in particular the Minister of Employment and Immigration to stand firm with his proposed reform of the unemployment insurance system.

With the exception of paid trade union leaders whose agenda is generally indistinguishable from that of the NDP and who for that matter frequently reflect the views of the NDP leadership rather than the interests of working people, I have found without exception that those people who have raised the subject with me totally endorse the proposed reforms and have urged the government not to back down despite the union and media hysteria over the issue.

Reasonable Canadians believe that people who quit their jobs without just cause should not be eligible for UI.

KATE PACE

Mr. Bob Wood (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, it is with great pride that I rise in the House today to congratulate Kate Pace of North Bay who arrived back in Canada yesterday after a thrilling victory at the World Alpine Ski Championships in Japan.

This victory was the result of years of training which began in North Bay when Kate competed in Inco Cup races establishing herself then as a tremendous athlete with unsurpassed dedication. Kate quickly climbed through the ranks and earned her spot on the Canadian National Women's Ski Team in 1987.

Over the past two seasons, Kate's goal of winning her first major international medal has been sidelined due to injuries. In 1991 Kate severely injured her knee which prematurely ended her season, while in 1992 a broken ankle kept Kate from competing for Canada at the Albertville Olympics.

Despite these setbacks Kate has shown herself and the world that obstacles can be overcome and a dream can be realized through hard work and dedication. Kate never lost sight of her goal and would not let a broken wrist keep her from winning the gold for Canada in the World Championships.

On behalf of the people in my riding of Nipissing, congratulations Kate, and good luck at the Canadian championships next week.

PEARSON INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, over a year ago the environmental assessment hearings were completed in connection with the runway expansion at Pearson International Airport.

Environmental assessment hearings are now required for every major project in the country. The entire development of our country is being held to ransom by the environmental assessment hearing process. The process goes on and on and on, and reports are delayed and delayed and delayed.

This report should have been out no later than April of a year ago. It will soon be April again and there is no excuse for the delay.

I call upon the government to produce the report or go ahead without the environmental assessment report so new facilities can be built in Toronto today when the jobs are needed.

GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, last Friday was the anniversary of a rare all-party consensus in favour of Canada presenting a GATT position on agriculture to seek an end to export subsidies and to maintain article XI(2)(c)(i).

I moved that as an opposition motion last year. The Canadian supply management sector had asked the ministers of trade and agriculture to make a statement under government motions restating the government's commitment to farmers.

Such a statement would also strengthen the understanding of foreign governments about Canada's position which is being reported in various international journals as having shifted toward tariffication.

Unfortunately no government action on the request was taken. My colleague, the member for Brant, raised the issue during members' statements as I am doing today, but a clear signal of the government's commitment to the all-party agreement is still required from the government.

Without it, many foreign governments and trade negotiators will believe that our government has indeed accepted tariffication as an acceptable alternative to article XI.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

SEXUAL HARASSMENT

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

On Friday, when responding to incredibly insensitive comments made by a minister of the Crown on sexual harassment, the Acting Prime Minister said the minister would issue a clarification.

That afternoon the minister did indeed clarify his comments. He denounced the "false hysteria and exaggerations that are raised about these issues". That did not surprise us, but what did surprise us was a defence of the minister mounted by a second minister, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, who stated: "This exploitation of this remark he made is really unfortunate. He has a superb record of action inside and outside the cabinet. On behalf of women in Newfoundland there has been a no stronger advocate than Mr. Crosbie".

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Ms. Copps: What action does the Prime Minister intend to take to send a clear message that every member of his cabinet takes the issue of sexual harassment very seriously?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend is quite right. The issue of sexual harassment is a most serious one and we view it very, very seriously.

I think the legislative record of the government, the attitude of the government, are probably the very best indication of that, for example, be it in violence against women, the panel on the violence against women and new programs; be it action by the government in terms of the appointment of women to key decision-making positions of authority never held before such as in the justice department; the appointment of record numbers, by way of illustration, of women to the federal judiciary: when this government was sworn in there were 37 members of the federal judiciary and there are now 112, an increase of 300 per cent.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mulroney: I should tell my hon. friend in all seriousness that everyone views this matter with the importance that it deserves.

In the ministry over the years, as justice minister by way of illustration, no one has provided stronger leadership and greater commitment to the genuine problems confronting women than the then Minister of Justice who is today the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans for Canada.

My hon. friend knows as well as I do that the minister, along with all of us from time to time, in an attempt to be humourous might say something that somewhat out of context could be misconstrued.

• (1420)

The hon. minister has assured the House this is not the case and his heartfelt commitment to the well-being of women and against any sexual harassment is something I would hope my hon. friend would accept on its merits.

[Translation]

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton-East): Mr. Speaker, the problem of sexual harassment is a very real one, and in this case has a direct bearing on the government's policy on unemployment insurance. Unfortunately harassment is kept going by the silence and the denial that surround it. The Minister of Fisheries and Oceans makes jokes and his colleague the Minister of External Affairs congratulates him.

The Prime Minister's refusal today to disavow categorically his minister's unacceptable remarks contributes, unfortunately, to tolerance of sexual harassment.

Will the Prime Minister today publicly condemn the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans for the degrading remarks he made about victims of sexual harassment?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, sexual harassment deserves to be taken very seriously indeed, but even so I think my hon. friend is going much too far in her remarks about the minister.

I told the House that the minister had throughout his career displayed a serious commitment to promoting the status of women in Canada—appointing women to the federal courts, for example, to ambassadorships, to deputy ministerships. There were seven such women when this government took office, now there are 21, and there are other examples. I believe this is proof of a very deep commitment to the importance of the issue that has been raised.

I would like to draw my hon. friend's attention to an explanation of the viewpoint of two women who attended the minister's speech last Thursday.

[English]

Betty Granter, a provincial government clerk in Lewisporte, said: "It was nothing like what is being said. Mr. Crosbie was just joking as he always does. I think anybody who was offended by it must have a problem".

Then Mrs. Stevens said: "I guess it would be damaging if people thought on the whole that sexual harassment was a joke and people did not take it seriously, but that is not the way it was intended and that is not the way the people at the dinner in Newfoundland took it".

These are two women who were there and heard the minister speak. They have given the press and the hon. member the assurance that having been there the context was such that the minister was not in any way attempting to deride the problem of sexual harassment.

They accept the minister on good faith. Why does the hon. member not accept the minister in the same way?

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, the issue is not at this point a minister of the Crown. The issue is the fact that two ministers of the Crown have publicly spoken of hysteria and one minister has cried exaggeration around the issue of sexual harassment in the work place.

It is not simply a dinner speech that we are speaking about. It is the government's proposed changes to the unemployment insurance which will potentially touch every woman in this country.

Will the Prime Minister not take the opportunity today to clarify the government's intention around unemployment insurance and to specifically denounce the insensitive comments of the minister which leave the impression that the government sees no problem or does not treat the issue of sexual harassment in a serious way?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend knows full well that grounds for sexual harassment in respect of the Unemployment Insurance Commission are well covered. The women involved should and do receive full and proper protection in the law.

I know my hon. friend has been trying to change that, to distort it and to argue that is not the case. It is the case. The jurisprudence constantly supports the position of women who make these kinds of allegations and who quite properly seek the defence of the law. The question of sexual harassment that my hon. friend is trying to tie into the unemployment insurance arguments is wrong.

With regard to the statement made by the hon. minister of fisheries, he indicated in his statement that: "Those who attended the speech that I made in Lewisporte know that nothing offensive was intended". This is a statement by the minister. Women who were in the audience say very clearly not only was nothing offensive intended, nothing offensive was taken or construed by them in regard to the minister's jocular references.

From time to time all members of Parliament, perhaps spontaneously, make a statement, a paragraph or a line or two that we would like to take back because it conveys an impression that we did not really intend. But there is a sense of humour in politics that is sometimes misplaced if misconstrued.

The people in the audience said that John Crosbie was not in any way trying to do anything other than treat himself in a jocular fashion, not the question of sexual harassment. That is the difference between the women in Newfoundland who heard the speech and the position of the hon. member who today is trying to distort it.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the right hon. Prime Minister.

When an Ottawa based magazine last year made grossly inappropriate and insensitive references to a member of the Prime Minister's family, the Prime Minister expressed—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I would remind hon. members that the test for preambles or words is whether or not on balance they create disorder. That is the test that has to be decided as to whether something is acceptable or parliamentary in this place.

Some of what has just been said across this Chamber, and I am not now referring to the preamble of the hon. member, by hon. members to each other is clearly unparliamentary and I wish it had not been said. I am not under any circumstances suggesting it was justified.

I am asking hon. members to remember that whether it is a preamble or words that are very personal that will be taken as offensive by the person to whom they are said, that creates disorder in this Chamber and I ask all hon. members to understand the position the Chair is always in.

I would ask the hon. member to rephrase his question and to ensure that the question goes to the administration of the government.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, when the Prime Minister expressed outrage last year he did so with the full support of this member of Parliament as well as many other members of Parliament.

Let the record be very clear. The Prime Minister knows that the remarks which have been attributed to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans are an insult to many of the women in this country.

Will the Prime Minister not now call upon the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans to do the honourable thing and to apologize for this insensitive type of remark?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have indicated to my hon. friend's colleague that for any kind of remark obviously the context has to be full and complete and that all of us from time to time have to be given the benefit of the doubt. We speak off the cuff. Sometimes the media inadvertently picks up one piece of information and leaves some others out in its reporting, which is understandable.

• (1430)

My hon. friend says that the statement attributed to the minister of fisheries was offensive to women. Perhaps in some of the manner in which it was reported, it might have been. That of course I would regret enormously.

For those women who were in the audience, who listened to the whole speech and who took in the full context of it, perhaps I could remind my hon. friend again what they said. Betty Granter of Newfoundland said: "He was nothing like what is being said. He was just joking as he always does. I think that anybody who is offended by it must have a problem".

Mrs. Stevens said: "I thought it would be damaging if people as a whole thought that sexual harassment was a joke and people did not take it seriously. But that is not the way it was intended and that is not the way the people at the dinner took it".

If the women from Newfoundland who were there and who heard the whole context place the construction on it that I have just conveyed to the House and to my hon. friend, perhaps in fairness to a fellow member of Parliament, he would place an equally appropriate construction on it.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, the right hon. Prime Minister has made references to statements made by one of the woman who attended the gathering.

One of the individuals in question has also said that there has been no sexual harassment in the work place. I want to say to the Prime Minister: that this matter could be rectified quickly and efficiently if the right hon. Prime Minister would reach down and say to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, stand in your place and apologize to the women of Canada for this insensitive remark. Will the Prime Minister do the honourable thing and ask and demand his Minister of Fisheries and Oceans to do that?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the minister of fisheries has already issued a statement of clarification. He has indicated in it very clearly "that those who attended the speech that I made in Lewisporte know that nothing offensive was intended".

He intended to offend no one. The women in his audience agreed with that assessment that no one ought to have been offended by what he said. I understand what my hon. friend is saying. In a hyper-sensitive atmosphere, where vocabulary is very important, my hon. friend will also admit that it is important that the full context be given.

The full context of those remarks indicate that the minister of fisheries, if you will make allowances for his well-known sense of humour about himself, and in this case it was about himself. The context of this sustains the view that he has been throughout his time in public life an ardent and effective defender of the cause of women.

EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, I would like to return to the question of jobs for people in this economy.

Tonight President Bill Clinton is going to announce between $25 billion and $30 billion worth of new infrastructure improvements this year to revive the United States' economic base and make his country more competitive.

Here in Canada, the government has refused to follow the suggestions of the Federation of Canadian Municipalities and launch a major improvement plan for our roads, our sewers, our water systems and our railroads.

Does the government not realize that this failure to move Canada ahead significantly in this area is going to leave us at a massive disadvantage in competing with Americans in the future. Why will the government not forget the new helicopters and use that money to rebuild Canada and put people back to work?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows very well that we took a number of positive initiatives in the December statement. It outlined very specifically proposals to invest in people, to invest in R and D, to invest in infrastructure, to invest in training, to invest in small business.

Quite frankly, the infrastructure program, which is strategically based, will help improve the productivity and the competitiveness of the Canadian economy and is something that will take place right across the country. The negotiations with the provinces are close to being completed.

There will be a number of announcements made with regard to the improvement of roads, the improvement of bridges, the construction of the electronic highway, the MLS system, a whole series of initiatives. In addition to that, there is a tax break of $1.8 billion.

We have put together a $2 billion infrastructure program, plus a $1.8 billion reduction in taxes. Providing the provinces do not take it up, it is perhaps more than equivalent to what my hon. friend is suggesting the Clinton administration is going to come out with.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, the amount of money which was actually put into that budget by the minister was far smaller than anything that has been suggested by the Federation of Canadian Municipalities or anybody else in this country.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, the Japanese government has increased its spending on infrastructure, but the Canadian government continues to reject suggestions from the Federation of Canadian Municipalities to do the same. Even the Minister of the Environment said that $10 billion was needed to improve sewage systems in Canada. Why does the government not act on these suggestions?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I know the hon. member believes that only the public sector can invest and create jobs. We do not share that view in its entirety. We believe that the private sector has a role to play, and in constructing the infrastructure program, a lot of the investment will take place by the private sector. That in turn will create jobs and economic activity and improve our competitiveness.

The hon. member talks a great line about containing the deficit, but he also talks about spending money, and he never really outlines how he would pay for this huge, magnificent, infrastructure program that he talks about.

The infrastructure program we outlined was advanced in a responsible fiscal manner. It is strategically based so that it will improve the highway system, particularly in the Atlantic region. It will remove bottlenecks. It will improve the road system in our national parks. It will provide for the improvement in airports. It will provide for the improvement in grade separations. All of these things will have a positive impact on the economic fortunes of the country. More important, it will create jobs and economic activity and I am sure my hon. friend will welcome that.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, of course we accept the suggestion that the private sector should be involved in these things but the key point is that this government is not taking leadership to get work done in this country and get people back to work.

Our independent analysis for jobs plan, to be released this week, shows over 130,000 new jobs would be established in three years without any increase in the deficit by an infrastructure program following the Federation of Canadian Municipalities approach.

Does it not make sense to put men and women back to work in this economy and rebuild the country at the same time?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Yes, indeed it does, Mr. Speaker, and that is precisely what we are trying to do, not like his friends in the New Democratic government in Ontario that spent a billion bucks on infrastructure and the creation of new jobs and they got 975 jobs created.

We can do better than that, Mr. Speaker.

TRADE

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister.

Last Thursday, the minister responsible for international trade in the United States, Mickey Kantor, said that President Clinton would not go ahead with the North American free trade agreement unless and until he obtained parallel agreements on labour and the environment.

Could the Prime Minister tell this House why the government intends to move ahead very quickly with this agreement in Canada, when Canada could also ask for parallel accords not only on labour and the environment but also for clarification of the meaning of "subsidy" and "dumping" and for the same treatment as Mexico on energy?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as far as energy is concerned, my friend intervened in Western Canada with the National Energy Program. We do not want any more programs like that in Canada so that is not a concern of ours at the international level.

Now, as for Mr. Kantor's statement, I would be prepared to examine it. I can also repeat to my friend what I told him last week in the House, as President Clinton himself said last Friday in a press conference: the Mexico–Canada–U.S. free trade agreement is a stand alone document and supplementary agreements would not go against or weaken the spirit or letter of this document.

Given that, it is definitely in our interest to proceed with ratifying the agreement in a timely fashion.

[English]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, we have an opportunity here. The American administration does not want to proceed. It will not submit the legislation to Congress until it has its side agreements.

I do not understand why the government does not want to take this opportunity and move right away to make some changes to the North American free trade agreement and the FTA so that Canadian interests can be protected. We have an opportunity here. The Americans have created the opportunity for the Canadian government and I do not understand why the government wants to proceed in Canada when the United States is not ready to proceed before the Congress of the United States.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend says that the administration does not want to proceed. That of course is incorrect. The administration is going to proceed with the NAFTA agreement on a stand-alone basis.

The President indicated in the campaign that the supplemental agreements he is seeking are not instruments that would affect the agreement itself.

My hon. friend says that we are protecting the Canadian interest. My hon. friend says he did not say that. He did say that. He said that the President said it very specifically. I produced the transcript last week and I will be happy to send my hon. friend for his own examination a copy of the transcript this afternoon. That is precisely what he said.

In regard to the Canadian interest, we believe that the Canadian interest has been well and amply protected in the North American free trade agreement. In regard to the free trade agreement itself, it is worth noting that trade between Canada and the United States is up 12.9 per cent last year alone and $18 billion since it was signed.

We know that the protectionists are alive and well in the Liberal caucus, but perhaps for once the leader of the Liberal Party on one issue can stand up and say: "I am against" or "I am in favour of the free trade agreement;" "I am against" or "I am in favour of the GST".

Stand up and tell us what you stand for.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question as well for the Prime Minister.

Today Canada and Mexico are meeting in Ottawa at a ministerial meeting. Is the government asking Mexico in this meeting for side agreements supplemental to the NAFTA agreement to deal with the concerns of Canadians on matters like import surges, the environment and labour standards? If Canada is not doing that at the meeting today, what is it waiting for? If President Clinton can do it, why can't our Prime Minister?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we have had a very productive series of meetings with the very impressive delegation of some eight or nine senior ministers from the Government of Mexico which is in town today. There will be meetings going on this afternoon.

I indicated to President Clinton that to the extent there would be any negotiation involving supplemental agreements of any kind, even though they did not impact on the content of NAFTA itself, on the substance of the agreement, that Canada would of course be part and parcel of any of those negotiations.

At that point in time, we would of course advance the Canadian interest. There has been no change on that point.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplemental question for the Prime Minister.

Will the Prime Minister confirm that when Canada is at the table with the United States and Mexico on supplemental agreements, it will raise issues of environmental standards, labour standards, import surges and human rights? Also, will the Prime Minister recognize that President Clinton has made clear that these negotiations have to take place and will be completed before he presents legislation to Congress?

Why will the Prime Minister not do the same and wait until these agreements are completed? Why is there a rush when it comes to Canada's interests?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there is no particular rush.

We want the House of Commons to have ample opportunity to be seized of an important matter and have all the time to consider it fully. We would like enough time to pass so that the Liberal Party caucus could agree on a position. That may take until the fall. We may find out about that the same day they tell us about their GST position.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Mr. Cid Samson (Timmins—Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister of employment.

The minister has expanded the definition of UI abusers to include not just those who commit fraud, but people who have a legitimate claim on unemployment insurance.

The minister plans to weasel out of paying benefits by not accepting any reasons for quitting. Just look at the buts attached to the just cause in the but book. Why is the minister exploiting the unemployed? Is it to satisfy the political right wing, to create a perception of a problem so that it appears necessary to find a solution?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I guess we could do as the hon. member once proposed: We should print more money to pay off the debt.

I said Friday last to the hon. member and his friends that demagoguery will lead nowhere. People in Canada who have just cause to leave employment are entitled to benefits. This government made a decision that a person who, without any valid reason whatsoever, chooses to become unemployed should not ask his neighbour to pay him benefits.

If the socialists have a different position on VQs, tell us what it is.

Mr. Cid Samson (Timmins—Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, I do not think any Canadian is asking any other Canadian to pay his way. I do not think that for a minute.

What this minister is trying to do is create a perception that everybody who quits is committing fraud. That in itself is fraud.

My supplementary question is for the same minister. Why does this government insist on persecuting the unemployed of this country, condemning thousands of innocent victims in order to catch a few alleged abusers while at the same time willingly allowing corporate welfare bums to go after government handouts and tax breaks at public taxpayers' expense?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, not a word of what the hon. member has said is true. Because it is completely false, I cannot answer that. That we treat every claimant in Canada as a fraud is completely ridiculous.

CRUISE MISSILE TESTING

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence.

First the minister confirmed the purchase of $4.4 billion in helicopters to chase phantom subs. Now the minister has agreed to a new ten-year arrangement for the testing of cruise missiles over the Canadian north. Whatever happened to the fresh, new thinking about defence matters since the cold war?

My specific question to the minister is this. Given that many Canadians, particularly citizens of the north as represented by the Northwest Territories government, the Dene nation and the circumpolar council, have strongly opposed any continuation of these tests, why has the minister wilfully proceeded with this agreement contrary to the wishes of these Canadians without any form of public consultation or public parliamentary hearings?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member will know since he signed the first testing and evaluation agreement with the United States—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Some hon. members: Shame.

Ms. Campbell (Vancouver Centre): —this is an arrangement which is important for the two countries involved.

Unlike the government of the hon. member, when we were seeking to renegotiate this agreement we asked first of all what would be in Canada's best interests and how we could maximize Canada's interests in this agreement. I believe we have done that by negotiating an agreement which is significantly more beneficial to Canada than the agreement which lapsed February 10.

It is an agreement that basically provides for Canadians the opportunity to develop defensive capacity against low-flying missiles, but it is much more than that. It is an agreement in terms of its finances, in terms of the opportunities for testing Canadian-made weapons in a world that remains dangerous. I would probably be elbowing the hon. member out of the way at the anvil if it were time to beat swords into ploughshares. It is not.

The world remains a difficult world. This agreement is an appropriate part of Canada's defence strategy. It is a vast improvement over the agreement negotiated by that hon. member's government.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, in my supplementary I would first point out to the hon. minister that it is 1993, not 1983, and a lot of things have changed. It is too bad this minister does not know how to make changes along the way.

I want to ask the minister a very specific question. Given that the agreement allows for either party to cancel, terminate, or change the agreement upon notice, will the minister give a commitment today that there will be no authorization of any specific cruise missile test without having that proposal submitted to Parliament so there can be a parliamentary hearing held where Canadians' voices can be heard, particularly the voices of northern Canadians who oppose this agreement?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, Parliament has ample opportunity to discuss this as well as all other aspects of our defence policy. I welcome the comments of my colleague and I welcome the comments of the Canadian people.

I think most Canadian people recognize that since the agreement was first put in place in 1983 by the government of that hon. member, it has been a positive one for Canada. Concerns about negative aspects of the environment were not realized. It is my observation from the comments I have had from Canadians that they are comfortable with the renewal of this agreement and satisfied with the protections it provides to Canada to cancel if the spirit of the agreement is in any way violated by the other party.

PEACEKEEPING

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, Canada's peacekeeping effort has more than doubled in the past year while at the same time the government is reducing our peacekeeping soldiers by about 4,000. This is causing considerable strain on the Canadian forces at a critical time when Canadian forces' members are operating in situations that are becoming more and more risky.

Since peacekeeping is the major thrust of Canada's defence policy, I would like to ask the minister what the government's plan is to sort out this disturbing conflict and imbalance.

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, first of all I am not sure there is a disturbing conflict and imbalance, nor is peacekeeping the sole thrust of Canada's defence policy.

I would be very pleased to provide the hon. member with the most recent statement of Canada's defence policy which is in fact somewhat more complex than the hon. member's question would suggest. We are committed to maintaining combat ready forces for a whole variety of eventualities. We make available Canadian forces for peacekeeping operations around the world. I am not aware that we are suffering any kind of imbalance or difficulties such as the hon. member is suggesting.

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, I am very surprised that the minister does not understand this because the concern is so intense that two serving general officers with vast experience in peacekeeping operations have taken the unprecedented step to speak out against this in public while in uniform.

The public also has concern. All members have had it expressed to them in one way, shape or form. The public wants to know why our peacekeeping is increasing in effort and scope when we cannot afford to even maintain the soldiers we had for half the effort yet we can afford $4.5 billion on major capital equipment for which much less expensive options are known to exist.

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am not at all convinced that anyone in uniform has made those statements. I think that is a misrepresentation of what has been said.

In fact concern has been expressed about the ability of the United Nations to co-ordinate peacekeeping efforts. Canada has responded to that concern by sending one of our senior members of the military to help make them develop that kind of capacity.

I am delighted to hear that hon. member express his support for peacekeeping and support for proper equipment for our forces. He will recognize that the surveillance capacity of our new helicopters is not only important in a situation of war but also a very valuable asset in monitoring the enforcement of sanctions in these kinds of peacekeeping operations. I am grateful in anticipation for the support he will give to that policy.

PUBLISHING INDUSTRY

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, in 1989 the Canadian book publisher Harper Collins was purchased by Rupert Murdoch's U.S.-based News International.

In a clear violation of the government's Baie Comeau policy, the company at the time refused to divest its acquisition to a Canadian buyer. It simply waited for the government to change the rules of the game and that it did.

I would like to ask the minister of trade if he recognizes that by giving his blessing to the U.S. purchase he has in fact overruled the assurances by his own Minister of Communications regarding restricted foreign ownership? Does he recognize that this decision has thrown open the doors of foreign ownership to a fragile but very vital Canadian cultural industry?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I think my hon. friend wishes to review the position that has been stated by Investment Canada. It has set out very clearly how this decision by Investment Canada supports the principles that we have set out in our cultural policy in the Government of Canada.

We have clearly seen a difference of point of view within the industry, I might say, and within part of the industry relative to the position taken by the government. These different points of view I think can be expected in an industry as complex as the industry involved.

However, I think the position that Investment Canada has taken is quite consistent with the cultural policy of this government.

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, last year the Minister of Communications announced that there would be a tightening of Investment Canada's act to ensure that Canadian-controlled publishers could not be taken over by foreign countries except in "extraordinary circumstances". I submit that this is not an extraordinary circumstance.

What we see instead is that the rules have been changed and simply ignored by the acquisition of Harper Collins and as a result our publishing industry has been let down by this minister of trade and this Minister of Communications.

I would like to ask the minister whether he can explain why the word of the Minister of Communications has been broken. Will he also explain who can speak for the Canadian cultural policy? Is it the Minister of Communications, is it the Minister for International Trade, or is it Rupert Murdoch?

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, I think it is worth while pointing out to the hon. member and to the House that last year I was able to announce some $140 million that this government was committed to putting into the Canadian book publishing industry.

We did indeed announce changes with regard to the policy as it relates to foreign ownership. Investment Canada looks at the benefits that are there for the Canadian economy before approving such takeovers. Our commitment is to have a strong, independent, Canadian book publishing industry. We are going to continue to pursue that.

GREAT WHALE RIVER PROJECT

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of the Environment. The New Democratic Party of Canada's environment critic, the member for Skeena in British Columbia, said in a video aimed at Americans that they should not buy electricity produced by the Great Whale River project in Quebec because it has blood on it.

Can the minister now assure us that a proper environmental assessment procedure has been applied to Quebec's Great Whale River project?

Hon. Jean Charest (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, little more than a year ago the Government of Canada, the Government of Quebec, Hydro-Québec, the Katimik Corporation and the Cree signed an agreement on co-ordinating five environmental assessments of the Great Whale project. In addition, Mr. Speaker, I would like to point out that the governments and Hydro-Québec also set up a fund to assist the other participants in the environmental assessment process.

The International Water Tribunal, which is an independent external body, has compared what is being done here with what is being done elsewhere in the world and it has concluded that our procedure is a very legitimate one that will address the concerns of all stakeholders.

AIRLINE INDUSTRY

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, last November the Minister of Transport challenged the airline industry to reduce capacity. In January his office said that he deplored the fact that the carriers could not be more responsible in their actions.

To this point the minister has taken no action at all to solve this crisis other than to issue these idle threats. The reality is that Canada's airline policy is now being made in the competition tribunal while thousands of jobs are at stake.

When is the minister going to define this government's airline policy for Canadians and explain it to those whose jobs are at risk today?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I believe that all the stakeholders and the employees in the airline industry have demonstrated their satisfaction with the actions taken by this government to give all the players the opportunity to determine what should be their future in the industry.

We are continuing our discussions with the stakeholders to make sure that we come up with some recalibration that will correct the situation without creating a loss of jobs in the country.

HOUSE MANAGEMENT

62ND, 63RD AND 64TH REPORTS

Mr. Jim Edwards (Edmonton Southwest): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present the 62nd, 63rd and 64th reports of the Standing Committee on House Management regarding the membership of the legislative committees on Bills C-99, C-110 and C-95.

Pursuant to Standing Order 113(1), these reports are deemed to be adopted when laid upon the table.

INCOME TAX ACT

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-405, an act to amend the Income Tax Act (tax credits for disabled senior citizens).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to Standing Order 68(2), the motion is deemed adopted.

Mr. Simmons: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to permit a disabled senior citizen or a person who has a disabled senior citizen as a dependent to deduct from tax otherwise payable an amount equal to 75 per cent of the disabled senior citizen's defined medical expenses, home help expenses and transportation expenses.

I have great pleasure in giving notice of the bill.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Mr. Simmons moves that the bill be now read the first time and printed.

Pursuant to Standing Order 69(1), the motion is deemed adopted.

Bill read the first time and printed.

PETITIONS

CHILD POVERTY

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition, certified to be in accordance with the Standing Orders, signed by people in my riding and surrounding areas. It calls upon the House of Commons to reaffirm its goal of eliminating child poverty in Canada by the year 2000, and to produce a plan for achieving this goal.

This declaration is based on the fact that on November 24, 1989, the House unanimously passed a motion, "That this House express its concern for the more than one million Canadian children living in poverty and seek to achieve the goal of eliminating poverty among Canadian children by the year 2000".

I do not believe there is a single member of this House who is indifferent to children or to child poverty. These petitioners should be thanked and congratulated for this initiative.

EMERGENCY FISHERY RESPONSE PROGRAM

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, I have the pleasure under the appropriate Standing Order to present a petition on behalf of about 300 constituents of my riding in the communities of Cape Ray, Port aux Basques, Searston and Gaultois.

These petitioners draw the attention of the House to the fact that as fish plant workers and other concerned citizens of Canada they have a particular grievance with respect to the Emergency Fishery Response Program recently implemented to assist fishermen and plant workers.

My petitioners and I feel that this program is quite inadequate and leaves out a lot of people, including those people who have literally fallen through the cracks. They are appealing to Parliament to urge the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and the Minister of Employment and Immigration to implement a further program or to expand on the existing program so that these people, as much in need as people who are receiving the benefits under the program, are also included in that program or an expansion of that program or a parallel program.

I have great pleasure in presenting and supporting the petition.

PHARMACEUTICALS

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to present two petitions. The first one is a petition with over 800 names from various parts of my riding, including Moose Jaw, Watrous, Colonsay, Parkbeg, Chaplin, Imperial and other points.

The petitioners are concerned about the recent changes the government has made with respect to drugs. They call upon the government to repeal Bill C-91 which will give brand name drug companies up to 20 years to market their drugs without competition.

They also call upon the government to repeal Bill C-22 passed back in 1987 which reduced the role of generic companies as well.

The petitioners are concerned that this bill will cost seniors a lot of money and will put in jeopardy the future of the drug plan in Saskatchewan, one of the best in the country.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I also have a petition to present from a number of people from Moose Jaw.

They say that the imposition of the GST on dance lessons represents both a significant cost for those taking dance lessons and an additional burden for persons or groups operating dance schools, that there have been various inconsistencies in how dance schools in different parts of the country have been treated with respect to the GST, and that people who take music lessons are GST exempt while dance lessons are not.

They therefore call upon the government to clarify this uncertainty by making clear that dance lessons are exempt from the GST.

VIOLENCE IN SOCIETY

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I would like to table a petition from people in Val-d'Or, Val-Senneville and Vassan in Abitibi, who say that violent movies on television are dangerous and therefore unacceptable because they incite more violence. They say that all toys which incite violent games are unacceptable and should not be made. These people say that freedom of the press in reporting acts of violence should be limited and that information on violent acts which is repeated too often on all television stations and on radio can incite others to commit the same acts of violence.

Therefore the petitioners humbly ask Parliament to legislate on the above-mentioned points in order to eliminate violence in our society so as to protect our children more and to give all our fellow citizens a better quality of life.

[English]

KILLER CARDS

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise under Standing Order 36 to present a petition from my constituents in Carleton—Charlotte.

The petitioners support the efforts of Mrs. Debbie Mahaffy in her quest to have killer cards seized at the Canada-U.S. border and to stop their distribution in Canada. The cards published by Eclipse Comic Books, True Crime Trading Cards and other publishers feature the crimes of serial killers, mass murderers and gangsters.

The petitioners say that they do not want these trading cards in their communities and go on to applaud the efforts of the Minister of National Revenue and his statement in the House of Commons on June 10, 1992 when he announced that his officials would seize any shipment at the Canada-U.S. border.

They go on to state that they abhor crimes of violence against persons and believe that killer trading cards offer nothing positive for children or adults to admire or emulate but rather contribute to violence.

To conclude, the petitioners call upon Parliament to amend the laws of Canada, to prohibit the importation, distribution, sale and manufacture of killer cards in law, and to advise producers of killer cards that their products if destined for Canada will be seized and destroyed.

COMMUNICATIONS

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, I have a number of petitions that I wish to table today from residents throughout the province of British Columbia.

The petitioners are concerned about the introduction of long distance telephone competition as well as the passage of Bill C-62 and the consequent deregulation of the telephone system.

They ask that the Minister of Communications engage in substantive consultations with all segments of Canadian society in drawing up new national telephone regulations and ask that Bill C-62 be withdrawn by the minister at this time.

WATER EXPORTS

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure today to present two petitions pursuant to Standing Order 36.

The first is a petition with respect to the proposed North American free trade agreement and article 1401 therein which further permits the export of bulk water through non-energy pipelines.

The people from various spots in British Columbia who signed this petition are concerned about the sovereignty of Canada over our domestic water resource. They urge the Government of Canada to resolve the uncertainty surrounding the issue of water exports through a separate and binding joint diplomatic agreement ratified by both Canada and the United States, stating that nothing in the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement or proposed North American free trade agreement applies to Canada's water resource in other than bottled form.

COMMUNICATIONS

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Mr. Speaker, the second petition is from people throughout the riding just to the north of mine in Kelowna, British Columbia.

The petitioners are very concerned about the deregulation of the telephone industry. They urge the Minister of Communications to oppose the disruptive effect of Bill C-62 and to engage in substantive consultations with all segments of Canadian society in drawing up new telecommunications legislation.

Question No. 313—Mr. Barrett:

For the fiscal year 1992–93, for each department or agency, (a) what is the total budget for shredding of documents (b) how much has been spent on shredding since January 1, 1992 (c) what documents were shredded and for what reasons?

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Parliamentary, Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Most departments and agencies do not have a budget per se for the disposal of classified documents. This service is provided by the National Archives of Canada without charge.

Also, most departments and agencies do have in-house shredders to dispose of classified/sensitive documents, working papers, memos, duplicates, et cetera which have no further historical or archival value. This shredding is done in accordance with the Government Security Policy.

This service is provided by employees of the department who, in most cases, have other duties.

In few cases, the disposal of the latter documents is contracted out at a minimal cost and where possible, it is recycled and sold.

In so far as the National Archives of Canada is concerned:

For the fiscal year 1992–93

(a) the total budget for shredding of documents is $633,766.

(b) $264,000 has been spent on shredding since January 1, 1992.

(c) No record is destroyed unless authorized by the National Archivist and a senior official of the creating department. The reason for destroying the records is the expiry of retention periods. There are no further legal, administrative, financial, privacy or historical constraints.

The eight federal records centres of the National Archives of Canada have provided classified records destruction facilites to 74 departments and agencies. Over 230,00 linear metres of classified records will have been destroyed in 1992-93 after expiration of authorized retention periods. This will produce 7,000 tonnes of shredded wastepaper which will be recycled to paper mills and return $150,000 to the Crown. The timely destruction of these records will also clear 20,000 square metres of records office floor space which at $94 per metre, is valued at $1,880,000 annually. Over 210,000 linear metres of record shelving will also be cleared for reutilization.

The classified records destruction facilities also provide social and environmental benefits. As well as the protection of privacy through the secure destruction of information carried out by the federal records centres, it is estimated that over 120,000 trees are saved each year through recycling of the paper. In addition, almost 100 handicapped workers are employed through contracts with associations for the developmentally challenged.

Question No. 417—Mr. Harvard:

With respect to the Western Economic Diversification Fund, (a) how many corporations have received financial help since the inception of the fund (b) how many of these companies are in default of their payments on loans and what is the value of those loans (c) how many of these companies reported a profit in the last fiscal year?

Hon. Mary Collins (Minister of Western Diversification and Minister of State (Environment) and Minister Responsible for the Status of Women): With respect to the Western Economic Diversification Fund, the response is as follows:

(a) as of November 30, 1992, 2,826 different clients;

(b) 120 clients defaulted payment, totalling $23.3 million, less than 3 per cent of the total approved assistance of $855.7 million;

(c) unaware of any defaulted clients reporting a profit in the last fiscal year, since most are bankrupt, in receivership or have ceased operations. Information as to the profitability of other clients is not available on a cost-effective basis; it would require several months to gather the information.

Mr. Langlois: Mr. Speaker, I suggest that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The questions enumerated have been answered by the hon. parliamentary secretary. Shall the other questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

BUDGET IMPLEMENTATION (FISCAL MEASURES) ACT, 1992

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of Bill C-76, an act to amend certain statutes to implement certain fiscal provisions of the budget tabled in Parliament on February 25, 1992, as reported (with amendment) from a legislative committee; and Motions Nos. 1, 3, 6, 9, 12, 14, 15, 16 and 17.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Windsor—St. Clair has six minutes remaining.

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, when I was interrupted we were commiserating about the embarrassment that the member for Carleton—Charlotte had caused himself. While mistakenly referring to him as the member from Scarborough South, we were discussing how eloquently the member for Mississauga South represents the view that this government holds of democracy.

I pointed out that he and his colleague from Selkirk—Red River colluded to ensure that students affected by this legislation would have no opportunity whatever to express their concerns about legislation which would eliminate the tax forgiveness on their loans for a six-month period after graduation.

• (1520)

We heard earlier from an hon. member of the Liberal Party how dastardly it was for the New Democratic Government of Ontario to eliminate the grant portion of aid to students. He condemned it for the excessive increases in tuition students are experiencing in Ontario and attributed that to the Ontario New Democratic government.

I just want to point out that while the tuition increases in Ontario were generally less than 8 per cent, in Newfoundland which is governed by a Liberal government it was nearly a 15 per cent increase last year. We could go on with this.

We could go on to point out that one of the problems the students have to confront is the huge increase in tuition which really is a reflection of cutbacks in established program funding transfers to provinces. A good deal of that was presaged by the Liberal government actions in 1975 followed by the six and five and other measures in its last government, as well as the actions of the federal government.

What is at issue here is that there have been actions on the part of the federal government in collusion with many of the provincial governments of all stripes in fact to turn back the clock on accessibility. Certainly this attempt by the government to recoup some $35 million from students who are having a difficult time as it is is another example of this.

The hon. member for Carleton—Charlotte said that this bill provided there would be a cancellation of the 3 per cent surcharge on student loans. At least if this government had proceeded as it had promised to do with the elimination of that surcharge then it might even out because that has imposed a burden of some $25 million on students who are borrowing money.

All of this is attributed to a huge increase in the proportion of students defaulting on their loans. Of course this is another example of this government blaming the victims and taking action against the victims, when in fact what we are seeing is a clear result of the fact that so few graduates now are able to get jobs as they were in the past. The real reason they are not paying back their loans by and large is that they are not working.

It would seem to be much more profitable if another approach was taken. That would be to withdraw first of all certainly this section of the legislation having to do with the student loan changes, not all of which are necessarily bad. For example, the new arrangements with respect to the provinces that are opting out could be tolerable and could be accepted and the other portions of the bill having to do with ministerial salaries and all of that could proceed.

As an hon. member indicated earlier we are burdened with the fact that we have a portion of this bill with which we disagree. We would like to have the opportunity to vote for those favourable changes, those supportable changes. That can only be accomplished if the amendments which have been moved to eliminate that section were in fact passed by this House.

It has to be emphasized as much as possible that this government has limited debate once more. It has done so after refusing to hear those who have the greatest interest in this legislation. They have been excluded with utter disdain and with an almost hypocritical stereotyping of the situation of students which if heard by students would certainly lead to a stronger reaction than heretofore has been expressed.

So far all the students have had an opportunity to do or will have an opportunity to do is to present petitions in this House which this government will almost certainly ignore.

All I can do is attempt to appeal to the sense of decency and generosity, understanding and insight to the concerns of students that exist on the other side. That of course is likely to turn out to be an appeal to a vacuum.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to participate in the debate at report stage of this very important piece of legislation. I am also happy to participate in this debate following the very distinguished and learned member of Parliament for Windsor—St. Clair who made the unfortunate, and I want to underline the word unfortunate, analogy between the Government of Ontario and the Government of Newfoundland as it relates to student fees and their increases.

I just want the record to show that the hon. very distinguished and learned person from Windsor—St. Clair like other individuals in this great land of ours is quite capable of making major mistakes. In fact, the people of Ontario have also made a very major mistake in electing the Rae government in the province of Ontario.

I know there would probably be unanimous consent in this House if I were to utilize the time given to me to speak to the issue of the NDP government and its record in the province of Ontario. However, knowing the discretionary powers that you have, Mr. Speaker, I wish to refrain from remarking on that subject matter and allow more capable, distinguished and learned members of the Liberal caucus to take that issue on.

But I do want to say to the hon. member that student loans in this country are in an unmitigated mess. Part of the problem lies way to the corner on the left, which is the New Democratic Party and its government at Queen's Park.

I have spoken on this issue on many occasions. I do want to say that my colleague from St. Boniface has provided a number of recommendations with regard to the report stage of this bill. If followed, I think it would enhance the student loans program we have in this country today, but I do want to make additional remarks relating to the amendments which are on the record.

Never before have we heard federal, provincial and municipal governments or the respective opposition counterparts in each of those levels of government talk about education and providing opportunities for students in this country. What rhetorical nonsense these governments are spewing out all across this country when it comes to the young people. It is not fair. It is not right. It is not appropriate that the Government of Canada would try to get off the hook as it relates to Canada student loans in this country today.

We have a 3 per cent surcharge on student loans. At the very same time the right hon. Prime Minister, the new Minister of National Defence, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and all of those on the front bench travel across the country talking about education and its importance to young people. If it were so important, why would a tax be placed on it?

Why would you say to young people after completing their degrees that they must pay back and within six months interest triggers in on the student loan? It is an aberration from what it used to be. Why as a Parliament can we not seize the opportunity and change the pillars of the Canada Student Loans Program in this country? Why can we not?

I suggested on second reading debate on this particular bill that student loans in this country ought to be restructured. Today, in excess of $800 million is owed to the Crown in accounts owing, defaulted loans. This government is doing very little about it. I say to those students who have completed their degrees and are meaningfully employed that they should pay back the money they received from the state.

What happens to those thousands and thousands of individuals who have no money to pay back to the state? What do they do? What is this government's answer to that? If they are married and get the child tax credit or get some other refund through income tax that would be garnisheed by the Crown in order to pay off the student loan. I suggest that is unfair, it is arbitrary and it is wrong. There are other ways students could pay back that money owed to the Crown. There would clearly and unequivocally be a role for provincial governments.

I make reference to the one referred to by the hon. member for Windsor—St. Clair, the Government of Ontario. It has treated students in such a shabby and insensitive manner and I am sure colleagues on this side of the House will want to place all the details of that treatment on the record.

Why can the Government of Canada not look at the problem and find solutions? For example, perhaps students who cannot pay back the money and still have a debt owing to the Crown could perform some form of community service. The marketing specialty of a business graduate in commerce could be used by the United Appeal. The services of an environmental technologist could be utilized in many of the non-profit organizations particularly in our forest industry. The services of a biology major could be used in the fishing industry. Why not use some of that able talent to rid them of the debt?

We in this Chamber know the debt will not be realized from the student no matter how many actions the Government of Canada takes to get it back. That is not to suggest in any way that those lawyers, doctors and people who are making the money ought not to pay it back. They should, but there are numerous incidents where individuals cannot pay back that money because there is no job and no prospect of a job.

This government, grossly negligent in the administration of the Canada Student Loans Program, is using the tables from 1984-85. Parental income is calculated on that basis. Numerous parents across this country, some single parents, have told me in the confines of my office that with the limited income they have they cannot afford to provide the kind of finances for their son or daughter to pursue an education in this country. Does the government try to assist families in this regard? The answer is an unequivocal no.

The Minister of Transport who sits here in the House today knows. He was one of the mighty few who agreed to plot the course of introducing an additional 40 new taxes since this administration came to power. That is what the government has done for working families in this country: absolutely zero, nothing for families.

No wonder Canadians are saying that the Canada Student Loans Program is in such a mess. There is the interest rate. There is the large number who have defaulted with no reasonable program to try to secure that money. There is a surcharge, which is a tax, and 1984-85 tables are being used.

What about foreign students? This government has not been fair. The Government of Ontario has not been fair. I suggest there are other provincial governments as well that have not been very fair to students.

I urge members opposite to support the amendments of my colleague, the hon. member for St. Boniface, who is attempting to improve this particular piece of legislation. He is trying to delete some of the provisions in the bill which I believe to be Draconian and unfair to students in this country.

In point of fact, as I have said to my constituents and to university students in my district and as I have said to those involved in the administration of that university, I am sick and tired of politicians across the way talking about the need for post-secondary education in this country and the learning curve and all that goes with it. Then they turn around and do the exact opposite. They penalize, they hurt, they focus the big government hand against young people in this country.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I want to thank you and members of my caucus for allowing me this opportunity to speak at this juncture and to assure you and all other members of the House, particularly members of the New Democratic Party that they will hear chapter and verse the wonderful great things the premier of Ontario has done to students in that province.

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond highlighted the very points I wanted to highlight especially with regard to the mess this government has made of the student loans.

This morning, Mr. Speaker, while you were in the Chair, there was controversy and a lot of debate. Just what are we debating? Are we debating the time allocation or the amendments?

I would like to put on the record that we are resuming consideration of report stage of Bill-76, an act to amend certain statutes to implement certain fiscal provisions of the budget tabled in Parliament on February 25, 1992. We are resuming debate on Motions, Nos. 1, 3, 6, 9, 12 and 14 to 17 in the name of the member for St. Boniface.

The four fiscal measures addressed in Bill-76 are: to decrease the expenditures under the Canada Student Loans Act; the creation of fees charged under the Lobbyist Registration Act; the decrease in ministerial and Prime Minister's pay under the Salaries Act and an increase in lending limits under the Small Businesses Loans Act. Let us take a look at these one at a time.

The Canada Student Loans Act would eliminate the 3 per cent administration fee on student loans. I have a letter from one of my constituents who is a student. She is pleased we are debating this today because she wrote to me quite a while ago stating this was one of her big concerns.

It is in reference to the 3 per cent guaranteed fee on student loans that was supposed to be removed some time ago. She asks in her letter: "How is it that the government found the time to cancel the six-month interest free period on student loans after graduation yet has neglected to do the same with the 3 per cent fee? I was fortunate to qualify for assistance but I had to pay $107.10 before I could negotiate my loan. This might not seem to be a great deal of money to you or to the working person, but it covers approximately one month's worth of food for me".

Rising tuition fees, GST on books, increasing basic living expenses and no job is what is facing this student. The government should abolish the GST for students especially on books. It would help students. We recommended that many times but this government has always failed to listen.

The bill is addressing some of the concerns very neatly, but it does not address how the student will repay the loan when he or she is unable to find work. I have students coming to my office who have been out of work for six months and some for even one year. They have had a few part-time jobs but hardly enough to pay off their loans.

What happens? They are then referred to collection agencies. I feel sorry for the kind of harassment students are facing from collection agencies. They are being treated like criminals. The government is cutting back on public service so there is no one to sit down with the students and counsel them on how to restructure their finances to pay off their loans. Like my hon. colleague from Cape Breton—East Richmond, I agree students who find a job after graduating must pay off what they owe the government or the bank.

When a student graduates even with a master's or a Ph.D. and cannot find a job you cannot squeeze water out of a stone. The bill does not address that whole issue.

The other aspect of this bill is bringing amendments to the Lobbyist Registration Act. The purpose is to pay fees when filing a return or in return for a service or the use of a facility provided by the registrar as required by the act.

This is part of the federal government's initiative to improve and streamline its services to the public on a cost recovery basis. Since this government came into power in 1984 why have we needed so many lobbyists in Ottawa? I thought I was elected to serve my constituents, all 100,000 of them. We have 295 members sitting in this Chamber. Are they not getting paid to represent their constituents? If every member is doing this across the country, why are there lobbyists? What is wrong with people coming to their elected representative and making representations to the appropriate minister or to the government? Why must this be done through lobbyists?

This again is the Americanization of Canada. Because it is done south of the border we somehow feel we have to run our country that way. No.

Who is running this country? It is certainly not the government that was given the mandate to run this country. It is not the bureaucrats who are being cut left and right. The Prime Minister boasts how he cut 4,000 people from the Public Service. No wonder there are no public servants available to sit down and counsel someone with an immigration problem, a Revenue Canada problem or a student loan problem.

Do you know who is running this country? It is the lobbyists. That is the sad state to which this government has brought Canada. Now it is the lobbyists who are going to decide what is best for Canada.

As an example, when the gun bill was going through this Chamber if I had listened to the lobbyists I would have thought 80 to 90 per cent of my constituents wanted me to support that bill. That was the perception the lobbyists were giving the public through the media. When I did my own survey through town hall meetings and door knocking it was the other way round. About 80 per cent of my constituents wanted a tougher gun control bill. That was not what the lobbyists were telling us but what the constituents were telling us.

Why the need for such expensive lobbyists? Let us remind ourselves what we were elected to do in this country. There are politicians at three levels. If people do not get satisfaction at the federal level and if it is a provincial matter, surely they can get satisfaction there without having to pay for lobbyists.

The other aspect of this bill that I would like to address is the Salaries Act, reducing the Prime Minister's salary from $73,416 to $69,920 and the ministers' salaries from $48,977 to $46,645. That of course does not include the basic salary, et cetera. It looks great, does it not?

That is not what the taxpayers are concerned about. They are not complaining that the Prime Minister is making too much. With this bill he is saving the taxpayers $3,496 a year. Do you know what the Prime Minister does then? He represents Canada in Japan and Hong Kong and spends $938,464, almost $1 million. If he had cut that expense in half he would not have to reduce his salary by $3,496 a year.

This government and this Prime Minister are masters at deceiving the public. They want the perception out there: "Look at how we are cutting back. Look at how we are belt tightening". I am sure the belt must have squeaked when this Prime Minister travelled to Germany at a cost of almost $.5 million and to Japan and Hong Kong for almost $1 million.

You are signalling me, Mr. Speaker, so I do not have time to go into further detail on how much the Prime Minister has spent. He tries to show restraint and good government with a piddly little $3,000 a year reduction in his salary and then blows millions unnecessarily.

I agree with paying all the expenses of the Prime Minister, ministers and members when they are travelling. They are representing Canada but they have to be reasonable expenses.

The final aspect is the Small Businesses Loans Act and I made my statement in the House the other day on this. Big deal, we have increased the maximum to $200,000 when the two ladies who bought into a Pizza Pizza franchise cannot get $20,000 from the local bank.

That is the issue. People are losing businesses because they cannot get $20,000. Here again the government is saying, "Big deal. We are going to increase the maximum to $200,000".

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to participate in this debate today.

There is a lot of concern being expressed these days in Saskatchewan over what this government is doing with this bill with respect to tuition fees. In fact there is concern right across the country.

The Liberals have been making some disparaging comments about Ontario and I would like to begin by making a few points for the record.

One of the highest costs students have is tuition fees. The province of Ontario last year saw an average increase in tuition fees of 8.1 per cent. If we compare that to increases in some of the Liberal provincial governments across the country the difference is quite glaring.

In Newfoundland the average increase is over 14 per cent and at one university it is 14.9 per cent. In Prince Edward Island it is 15.2 per cent and the province of Quebec had an increase in tuition fees last year of 38 per cent. That says quite a bit. Before Liberals criticize the Ontario government they should look at their provincial colleagues.

I want to make some comments about the proposed change to remove the six-month interest free period for students.

I was recently speaking to the vice-president of academics at the University of Regina, Justin Stoltz. He told me he and Tracy Sletto, one of the vice-presidents at the University of Saskatchewan along with Trevor Davies who is with the Canadian Federation of Students and some members from the SIAST colleges in Saskatchewan got a petition together in just a few short days because they knew the government was going to push this bill through very quickly.

They managed to get over 7,000 names on a petition from students at these various institutions. That represents a significant percentage of all the post-secondary students in Saskatchewan. They are concerned because it is one more burden students will have upon graduation.

They have already been hit with a 3 per cent surtax on their loans. The government said it plans to remove it but there is no indication when or how it will be removed. It is still there.

The cost for a year of education at university is somewhere between $9,000 and $11,000. Students are having a very difficult time getting jobs these days. A high percentage of students are unable to find summer employment. This is contrary to what was said by the member for Mississauga South who said students are much better off today than when he was a student, whenever that was. I do not know but it was some time ago.

Even when I was a student a couple of decades ago it was much easier to find summer employment. It is difficult now. Students who are going to school really have to make a commitment not only to their school work but to be creative and try to find ways to put themselves through school.

The government is cutting a 3 per cent surcharge off the top, but now upon graduation the old interest clock is going to start ticking. People graduate from university these days and a large percentage of them do not have jobs waiting for them.

Students are having difficulty finding work in the summertime. They want an education and we have to agree this country can only progress and develop if Canadians are well educated. We should encourage students to educate themselves. Yet at the same time we are placing burden after burden upon students. When I graduated from university a number of years ago I had a $10,000 student loan. It was very nice to have the six-month period of grace before interest started collecting. I found that a significant payment for me to make at that time.

For a graduating student it is a burden to start that interest clock right away. It is a level of stress the student does not need. It is going to be a worry for students proceeding through university, for those who are in first year—the pages in the House who are in first-year university—for any who have student loans or are going to be getting more student loans. They will be worried that when they graduate unless they have a job there will be someone after them trying to collect money.

In my riding, in my constituency office, we have dealt with a number of situations in which collection agencies have been after former students to collect on student loans. They are not very friendly.

I have had situations in which I have actually had to call a collection agency and ask it to quit harassing my constituent. These constituents are attempting to make their payments but in many cases simply cannot or must make reduced payments. Yet there are collection agencies calling these people up asking for money.

Students will graduate and then the interest clock will start right away. After a period of time the government simply hands them over to a collection agency that earns a fee for the money it collects.

The whole thing makes absolutely no sense. When the objective we should be reaching for in this country is a well educated, well trained society we should be doing what we can to help those students. This is simply not doing that.

We can add other things that students are concerned about. There is the GST on books and even the GST on photocopying. I simply want to state that the 7,000 students in the province of Saskatchewan who are opposed to this legislation are a small fraction of the students across this country who are opposed to this legislation.

Until we have a government that will give real attention to education then this country will not progress in the fashion and with the expediency and speed with which it can.

This is the same government that is cutting back on transfer payments to the provinces. Certainly my home province of Saskatchewan is faced with a real dilemma with respect to transfer cuts. Last year the Saskatchewan government, which inherited a bankrupt province from the Devine Conservative government that had been in power for nine years, actually cut the deficit. If there had not been cuts in funding from this government to the provincial government it would have had a balanced budget. It will have a deficit of some $550 million, which is about equal to what this government cut in transfers to the province of Saskatchewan.

The government of the province of Saskatchewan is faced with a real dilemma. It is trying to keep its tuition costs down. It is trying to encourage its students to go to university yet it is faced with some very difficult situations in trying to provide a balanced budget and a government able to borrow money on the various money-lending markets because it must do that in order to function. What this government has done simply hurts the province, hurts the students and hurts all of Canada.

I hope the government—this is like talking to a wall. Why ask the government to change something if it is not going to change? This government is not going to change its opinion. This is a slap in the face to students and it will do nothing to help the future of these young Canadians or the future of this entire country.

Mr. David Bjornson (Selkirk—Red River): Mr. Speaker, I would like to address some of the comments that have been made across the floor so far in this debate.

First, I would like to make a comment regarding those made by the member for Windsor—St. Clair. He said that there seemed to be some type of fast-track action taken at the legislative committee. Unfortunately the member himself was unable to attend and maybe he had a little misunderstanding about how things should come together.

The complaint brought forward was that there seemed to be a lack of opportunity for the student associations to make representations to the legislative committee.

This piece of legislation has been brought about as a result of the budget of February 1992. It was common knowledge for well over a year that this legislation would be taking place but the application to appear before the legislative committee came only within a week of the February 4 legislative committee meeting at which we dealt with C-76 on a clause by clause basis.

The member for Moose Jaw—Lake Centre said that 6,000 or 7,000 students in Saskatchewan have signed a petition to show their concern about the changes regarding student loans. It is too bad they did not move a little more quickly to notify the legislative committee so that we could have accommodated them. Unfortunately those who represented them did not see fit to bring that to our attention.

The member for Moose Jaw—Lake Centre also mentioned that the average student loan is somewhere between $7,000 and $9,000. He even made the comment that his loan was in the range of about $10,000 when he finished his university training. If we do a little investigation we will find that the average student loan in Canada is approximately $6,000. If we turn around and examine the financing cost for $6,000 on a monthly basis it is approximately $4.50 a month.

We are not asking in this legislation that repayment start immediately upon graduation. This legislation is asking that now that the government has met its responsibility in loaning students the money it is now time for students to meet their responsibility to start paying back and start paying back with interest. I do not believe that $4.50 per month is a significant cost for servicing a $6,000 debt.

The member for Parkdale—High Park made a lengthy comment about how he felt that students were being harassed by those people going about collecting overdue student loans on behalf of the government. I have never heard of anybody who owes the federal government for a student loan in the short term being harassed. I do not think there are loan police working on behalf of the federal government. What the member may find is that there is a determination on behalf of the government to collect the long outstanding loans that a number of people have seen fit not to repay.

It is common knowledge that through the Secretary of State those people who have income tax rebates and have outstanding debts with the federal government as a result of student loans are being asked to pay them back by way of those rebates. All Canadians would accept that if a person has a debt owing to the federal government it is about time that he or she repaid that debt.

There is no doubt in my mind that as a result of this activity—I will discuss not only the student loan but the changes to the Lobbyists Registration Act. What I find unusual at a time when there is a standing committee researching the status of lobbyists is that the opposition seems to be fighting on behalf of lobbyists by not wanting this legislation to go through.

• (1600)

It is about time the opposition stood back, took a realistic look at this legislation and realized that this is the beginning of something that will probably strengthen the roles of parliamentarians and possibly weaken those of lobbyists in the near future.

As for the freezing of salaries of cabinet members, I cannot see why anybody in this House would be against it other than my colleagues on the front row. At a time of restraint the government is doing the proper thing through Bill C-76. I am hoping we can fast-track this debate so we can get to a vote.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, the debate on Bill C-76 today concerns Motions Nos. 1, 3, 6, 9, 12, 14 and 17 at report stage. All these amendments of course concern student loans and I think that any other subject would not be relevant to today's debate, although I too have firm opinions on many of the problems facing us, such as asking lobbyists to register and pay fees to come and talk to me. No one should pay to see me. People who want to see me can see an elected representative of the people when they want to meet me; I am there to meet them and I strongly object to having people pay licences to come and talk to members of Parliament.

That said, I would like to talk about this question of student loans which concerns many members. I have a package of documents, including the most recent annual report for the Canada Student Loans Program, the report for 1989-90. I think that the information in it is quite pertinent and I would ask hon. members to read it and think about it before making off-the-cuff statements on the Student Loans Program.

The public acounts committee of the House of Commons, which I chair, met the deputy minister last June, I think. The deputy minister was the then-Under Secretary of State, Marc Rochon, who was asked many questions about the student loans program. He gave us to understand that the government was interested in this question and had noted the comments made by the Auditor General of Canada. As we know, the student loans program is largely administered by the provinces, but guaranteed by the federal government. The provinces fit the student loans programs in with their own programs, except for Quebec and the Northwest Territories, I believe.

The Auditor General of Canada made some fairly important observations on the program itself. He made some pretty serious recommendations and the Under Secretary of State, Marc Rochon, wrote to me last June 16. I will not read the whole letter, because it mentioned improvements to the program. He wrote: "As for improvements requiring legislative changes, we hope to table suggested amendments to the Canada Student Loans Act and the regulations for implementing it in early 1993."

This means that some departments, or at least the Department of the Secretary of State, were interested in this question and dealing with it. The documents that I obtained from the Secretary of State say that it is urgent to revise the Canada Student Loans Act and to adopt regulations on recovering outstanding loans. This means that millions of dollars are not paid back. Some people are delinquent in meeting their obligations and do not pay back their loans. This is very harmful to the great majority of students. Since some students do not pay back these loans, the others must bear the blame for a program that may seem hard to manage and out of control. I quote from the document: "The administrative agreement with the provinces must be reviewed to specify the provinces' responsibility for locating and recovering overdue amounts related to the program. Thirdly, appropriate control mechanisms should be implemented to ensure compliance with these new measures."

Mr. Speaker, I could go on for pages and pages; there are at least seven or eight pages of recommendations. All members know that this problem exists. All members know that we have a serious problem to solve. Now the government comes with an ad hoc measure to eliminate a small part of the total student aid program, namely the six-month interest free period after a student graduates from a post-secondary institution, a college or a university. This six-month interest free period would be eliminated. That is what the proposal before us today does.

[English]

I submit that it is a haphazard way of doing things. It is a measure which I find difficult to accept today because it has not answered the challenge before Parliament, the challenge of looking after our human resources in our colleges and in our universities and encouraging our young people to get a better education.

It does not look after or care, in my view, about post-secondary education. It attacks students when their cash flow is at the minimum of their life, when they have graduated and are trying to find a job. Eighteen per cent of students who graduate today cannot find a job. The Tories will say "Don't worry, Jean-Robert, there is an interest program they can apply for which gives them 18 months of an interest relief plan". If you are unemployed, sick or unable to work, you can apply for 18 months of interest relief. Big deal.

I just heard some statistics put by the hon. member for Moose Jaw—Lake Centre who said: "Tuition fees, the cost of living for students has gone up". It is true, but it is not a question of percentage. If you want to talk percentage like he did, he said that in Quebec it went up 38 per cent. I guess it did not go up anywhere else. In Quebec from 1985 to 1986, the average tuition fee at McGill University was $570. It went up to $1,397 in 1991-92, which is about $500 below what my people in the province of Ontario pay. It is true that tuition fees went up in Quebec but let us put our figures into perspective. They were $570 in 1985-86 and they are now $1,397. That is an increase of 145 per cent.

With these figures, you can say whatever you like. The fact is that there are students who pay much more than $1,397 in Canada. The University of Ottawa is in my riding. The average for Ontario is $1,770 per year. If you want to play percentage, it has increased over the last five to six years. It is true.

Everything seems to go up these days. For students, the cost of food, the cost of lodging, the cost of dressing themselves and looking after themselves has also increased like it has for everybody else. We should consider that in the last while, three out of four students applied for loans. I want to quote from the annual report of the Canada Student Loans Program. The last year for which we have a report is 1989-90. I quote: "The average indebtedness of Canada Student Loans recipients was $5,553 in 1989-90. Over 1,300 students were authorized to receive loans under the part-time student loans program".

It goes on and on, giving a whole series of statistics dealing with this very important issue. The question I put today is what about those students that cannot afford the loans because through no fault of their own they cannot find a job? We have to be a caring society. Six months relief of interest was not a big deal.

I am sure when people add all this up we will all know that it was not such a big deal. Yet the government in its haphazard way, which is my point, instead of reviewing the whole program, did not ask a committee of this House to look at the program and come up with a really interesting change to the program so that the provinces and the federal government, the students and the colleges and the universities, everybody involved, would be consulted on this scheme and be able to put in their word and their advice.

Ontario abolished its grants to students in November of last year. Ontario college and university students will no longer get provincial grants to pay for their education because the NDP government has decided to move to a loans only system of financial aid.

With regard to our students in this country, tomorrow's citizens, our only hope of being able to compete in this global economy, I find it difficult to accept that this government has absolutely nothing else to do but come in with a haphazard program, something that somebody picked out without having finished the whole review of the program. You and I know, Mr. Speaker, because I have the proof here that there are problems, there are solutions and there are issues that we must discuss that are a lot more important than six months relief to students on interest.

I am going to vote against this because I think it is haphazard. It is not serious. I do not think this government knows what it is doing. I think it is absolutely tired and bankrupt.

[Translation]

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for allowing me to speak about the government's proposed Bill C-76, which would among other things eliminate the six-month interest free borrowing period for students.

During these hard economic times for all Canadians, we hear members of Parliament and of the provincial legislatures talk about an economy that absolutely has to be healed and stimulated, because we are experiencing a catastrophe all across this country due to the lack of jobs.

These members say we need new solutions for creating jobs. We know that the more jobs there are in Canada, the more people will be able to pay taxes, so that the country, the provinces, the municipalities and the regions can provide their citizens with more and more services. But for a number of years now, we have had to cut back the services available to Canadians.

[English]

This bill proposes the removal of a six-month interest free period starting with new loans made for the 1992-93 academic year. The government will cancel the six-month interest free post-graduation period for students with Canada student loans. This regressive measure will increase the debt load of poorer students who had to borrow through the student loan program in order to receive an education.

The Organization of Economic Co-operation and Development recently studied educational standards in 20 countries. In the areas of mathematics and science skills among 13-year-olds, Canada ranked a dismal 10 per cent and was well behind children from China, South Korea and Switzerland. As well, Canada had the second highest high school drop-out rate of the countries surveyed at 33 per cent.

Seventy-eight per cent of 75 Canadian chief executive officers recently surveyed by Canadian Business Magazine said that Canada's school system should be the first area for reform if we are ever to see a return to long-term economic growth.

[Translation]

It is the school system that must be changed, not the method of making student loans. Students have to be encouraged.

[English]

This government has introduced a 3 per cent administrative fee on the Canada Student Loans Program, effectively taxing those students least able to afford an education. This tax is regressive and unfair in that the greater the need, the more the student will be forced to pay.

The government often talks about not mortgaging Canada's best and brightest but makes it even more difficult for students to support their education. When will the government stop its assault on Canada's students?

This government has talked about establishing a learning culture and increasing our competitiveness. This year's budget was witness to the beginning of the privatization of student aid. The 3 per cent fee on student loans will be absorbed into an increased rate of interest on loans by the banks. When realized that this is in combination with the elimination of a six month interest free period for needy students upon graduation, the government is just adding to the growing debt burden of Canada's students.

[Translation]

I am pleased to read part of a letter from the Canadian Federation of Students.

[English]

It says: "The students across the country are furious about the federal government's new move to skim 3 per cent off their Canada student loans. What the feds refer to as a simple cost recovery initiative is going to make them $18 million annually at the expense of students. Students and our supporters argue that such an initiative is inherently unfair by taxing student loans. The government is taxing those who can least afford it and at a time when they need the money the most to pay for things like tuition fees, books, rents and food".

[Translation]

As we are all well aware, this government has even gone so far as to tax books. There are no summer jobs for students; they need to eat; they need somewhere to live. Students are our future, and they should be encouraged. Levying a tax, an additional penalty of 3 per cent, makes me think of certain loan sharks who overcharge: you borrow $10,000 from them and they charge you an additional percentage and it is no longer $10,000 that you owe but $10,000-plus, and you pay the interest on the $10,000-plus.

Students need the government's help. They do not need to be wiped out by the government. I see that some of the government members are making fun of my remarks. I have to say that in so doing, they are making fun of students. Students and their problems should not be a joke; they deserve our help.

I have the pleasure of sitting on the public accounts committee. The Auditor General's report has shown us that there is mismanagement in the federal government. In his 1991 report, the Auditor General says, and I quote:

[English]

Canada Student Loan amounts awarded in 1989-90 could cost taxpayers an estimated $39 million. In any case, as many as 47,000 full-time students receive Canada Student Loans that exceeded by $72 million the amounts to which they were entitled. The lack of legislative and administrative provisions to identify and recover those excess amounts result in a cost to the taxpayer that we estimate could be approximately $39 million.

Under the Canada Students Loans Act the federal government guarantees loans made by the lending institution to students who have been issued a certificate of eligibility by a participating province.

Provinces—

—such as the province of Ontario—

[English]

—assess student applications and approve federal loans according to an official administrative agreement with the Department of Secretary of State. The amount of a loan grant or scholarship depends on student's educational fees, living expenses and financial resources including support from a spouse or parents where applicable.

The students, spouse and parents are required to sign an approval form for release of tax information thereby allowing the province to verify all income data relating to the loan application. Canada student loans are given to approximately one-third of full-time students registered in universities and community colleges throughout Canada except in Quebec and the Northwest Territories which have opted for administrative payments and manage their own programs.

• (1620)

I find it interesting that in the province of Quebec the default rate is minimal. It would seem that the system in the province of Quebec is greatly superior to the system elsewhere.

With respect to Ontario, I listened earlier to my colleagues in the NDP talk very proudly about the programs in different provinces, especially provinces where there are NDP governments. I must say that I was bitterly disappointed and shocked to learn that the New Democratic government in Ontario had cut student grants and subsidies.

Students need encouragement. There are no summer jobs, and graduates are not finding work. Not only are graduates not finding work, but now they will be forced, obligated, to start paying interest as soon as possible.

I implore the government to encourage students, and not to penalize those who cannot find work from the moment they graduate.

[English]

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a few comments about the bill before us. Bill C-76 includes changes to the Canada Student Loans Program as well as changes to the Lobbyists Registration Act, the Salaries Act and the Small Businesses Loans Act.

I would like to focus on the one aspect of this bill that I find so very troubling. It is probably the most contentious piece of the legislation, that is the changes to the student loans program.

What this bill seeks to do is remove the six-month interest free period students currently enjoy once finishing their programs before they have to actually start paying interest on the loans they have accumulated while pursuing their education.

It can amount to a substantial amount of money for students who go through four years of undergraduate work, go into a master's program and carry on into a Ph.D. and even into post-doctoral work. At least the six-month interest free period provided an opportunity for those students until they were actually up and running in the work place to find jobs without being penalized by having these interest payments begin immediately upon finishing their studies.

This change will make it much more difficult for such students because the interest rate clock starts ticking the moment they finish their studies. I do not know how many students out there can go right from a graduate program or an undergraduate program and into the job market. It is very difficult.

It was difficult when I was a student. Things were a heck of a lot better back in the late 1960s and early 1970s in terms of the job market than they are now. Six months is not a long time for students to have the opportunity to secure employment, but the interest rate clock starts ticking and the interest starts compounding immediately, once these changes are put into place.

That puts a lie to the government's commitment to higher education. If this government were truly committed to higher education, it would be committed to assisting students pursuing post-secondary education and post-graduate education and to allowing them the opportunity to obtain that education without having this financial broad-axe over their necks.

The repeal of the six-month deferment will cost some $30 million to $35 million a year, and this comes at a time when our graduates face very high levels of unemployment. For those under 25 years of age the unemployment level exceeds 16 per cent. We are asking students to take on a financial commitment the day after they graduate, to start paying interest on those student loans.

That is not helping our students. That is not helping education. That is not helping our desire to increase the knowledge base in the country so that we can truly become more competitive. This is a hardship the government is imposing upon students across Canada. It is a hardship that should not be borne by those individuals, many of whom will not find jobs even after six months of steadily looking. The job market just does not have the jobs available but we are penalizing them by bringing in changes to this particular legislation.

How many students are already in default? The level of default in Canada already on these student loans exceeds $150 million a year. While it is true there might be an occasional individual who tries to abuse the system, I would suspect the amount of abuse is very small indeed. What we are doing is penalizing those students who have every desire to pay off their student loans as quickly as possible. If they do not have jobs they are not going to be able to do it. Again, that interest rate clock starts ticking the day after they graduate.

This repeal, or this change in the legislation, was originally intended to give the government room so that it could remove its 3 per cent tax on student loans, which I thought was Draconian in the first place. I am glad to see that there is at least consideration of this being lifted. It was also to provide some room so that we would be able to raise the weekly loan rates.

Now it seems this legislation is coming in and these changes have not been brought into this legislation. All we see is that the six-month window has been eliminated and the interest rate clock starts to tick the day after the students graduate.

This should not have been the government's priority. The whole system of student loans has been riddled with some very serious faults. The government has done nothing to correct the serious errors in the student loans program. Students, for example, will be expected to save at least 60 per cent of their summer earnings, regardless of the living expenses those individuals might face during the year.

That mitigates against students from rural or more isolated areas, for example from the interior of my province of British Columbia which students leave to attend universities on the coast. Although we now have universities starting up in the interior of the province, for those students who have to travel and to seek room and board or a residence, it is very costly indeed. There is no flexibility in the program with respect to the increased costs of those individuals.

Parents are expected to bear an even greater and greater percentage of the financial burden of putting children through school.

The loans are administered through the provinces and therefore are not portable. For students like my daughter who graduated from Queen's University in Kingston and went to do her Ph.D. studies at the University of British Columbia, the loan is essentially not portable and they have to go through the whole process of reapplying. There should be portability in those loans throughout Canada to make it easier for students who should be looking to broaden their educational experience by attending various institutions in Canada.

Furthermore the proposed changes will make it impossible for students to combine work and study. The changes will essentially force the student into accepting full course requirements to qualify for the loan. There are many students who simply cannot continue their studies unless they have opportunity to work while taking their courses. This makes it very difficult for those students to do so.

What really disturbs me about this bill is that when it was brought in the government refused to listen to the testimony of students across Canada who wanted to bring to committee their concerns about this particular legislation, their concerns about the difficulties that the changes in this legislation would bring. The government simply refused to listen to them. It refused to acknowledge the fact that students might have a legitimate concern and a legitimate interest in making some changes in this bill. That does not speak very highly of this administration if it is not willing to listen to the students in Canada on a piece of legislation that directly affects their financial and economic future. It is shameful that happened. It is no wonder both opposition parties walked out of those committee hearings.

The government is not interested in listening to the students because it is really not interested in their financial welfare. The government simply does not believe in the concept of equal access to educational opportunity. It is getting more and more difficult to get an opportunity for education in this country. More and more educational opportunity is becoming the domain of the wealthy, for those students who can afford it, for those parents who can afford to put their children through school.

That is not the direction this country should be taking. It is not the direction we want to take if we need to increase the level of educational opportunity, if we want to reduce the level of functional illiteracy in Canada. We in this nation want to become competitive and we need the educational and knowledge based skills to do that.

This legislation mitigates against the opportunity for Canada to become a true competitor in our global economy. It mitigates against the future of our students in Canada.

Mr. Joe Fontana (London East): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to speak this afternoon at report stage of Bill C-76 which deals with certain provisions to implement the budget passed in February 1992. There are a number of provisions in the bill. Some have to do with the changes to the Canada Students Loans Act. Some have to do with the Small Businesses Loans Act. Others have to do with changes to the Lobbyists Registration Act and to the Salaries Act.

I want to touch on two areas I believe are very important to this country and specifically to my riding. They relate to the impact these changes will have on students. I believe most of my colleagues on this side of the House have spoken about the real impact this legislation will have on students and learning.

We hear the Conservative government speaking an awful lot about competitiveness, about making sure that Canada can compete in the world. We have to understand there are global pressures with respect to research and with respect to manufacturing. It says we have to become competitive in this world. One would think it would make sense that if it really wanted to compete in the world it would invest in people's minds, in education, so that people and students for the most part can be educated and trained for those opportunities that hopefully will come down the road. If it wants to build a competitive nation, it would want to invest in people and in students. This bill speaks to penalizing students and makes it much more difficult in a sense for them to become educated.

The hallmark of a great nation is its people and how they are educated. We have tremendous pressures on society. While Canada spends on a per capita basis the highest in education at least at the primary levels, and not enough at the post-secondary level, we do not have a record to boast about especially when 30 per cent of our children are leaving before they graduate from high school. We have to make it more possible not less possible for our youth to go to college and university.

To help our students get there we must make education more relevant and meaningful so they can understand that with an education will come the economic and career opportunities they want for themselves and their families. More important, they must see education as a vehicle toward those personal goals.

A government should be there to assist students in trying to achieve those goals because it is in the country's interest. It is in the individual's interest to make sure they can move forward. Yet this government has seen fit to tell students that if they want an education and if they want to attend college or university their loans are now going to be subject to repayment the day of their graduation and there will not be the transitional period that has been in place for a number of years. Once a student has graduated it will take some time to get a job.

We understand how difficult it is to get jobs these days and how difficult it is for students to get jobs when they graduate. The country is downsizing. Their parents are being thrown out of their jobs because of global competitive forces, trade agreements and this government's economic policies. Their mothers and fathers are having trouble keeping those jobs.

Who do we want to hurt? We want to hurt those people who are just coming into the work place and will need some time to get into the work place. Essentially this government wants to penalize students who have graduated and who are looking forward to moving into new opportunities. They may have a debt of $15,000 or $20,000, which they owe to this country. They understand that, realize it and take it very seriously. They intend to pay it back and most students do; 85 to 90 per cent do. They want to invest in their own education.

What does this government do? It wants to penalize them further by not giving them the six-month opportunity to commence repayment of that loan. Additionally, it wants to start charging a 3 per cent administrative fee on those student loans.

This is a double whammy which does not help us. We want to encourage our students to want to acquire knowledge and hence education because those investments in our students will be paid back to this country 100-fold through their careers and the taxes they will pay back to this country.

These regressive measures in C-76 even run counter to the government's philosophy of building a competitive, more learned and educated population. I believe it is like C-105 in which the government is trying to penalize the unemployed. Here it is trying to penalize the students for the problems that it has created.

I do want to spend a little time discussing the Small Businesses Loans Act. Bill C-76 touches on some changes to the Small Businesses Loans Act. I know there is another bill that has been introduced in this House that further expands on these changes introduced in C-76.

These changes to the Small Businesses Loans Act under C-76 are positive in the sense that they demonstrate an understanding of the reality of business. The threshold of $100,000 needed to be increased to $200,000 and I believe C-93 or C-98, whatever the Small Businesses Loans Act bill is, further increases it.

However the biggest problem for small business is not the Small Businesses Loans Act by itself. It is not well known. Bankers do not promote it. Bankers have not used it as much as we would like. Small businesses are having problems getting loans of $20,000, $25,000, $30,000 and $35,000 not in getting $100,000 and $200,000 loans. They need those loans to create the wealth and the opportunities and so they will be able to hire people.

They need working capital. They need supportive financial institutions. Eighty per cent of the jobs in this country are created by small business, by those men and women who are prepared to invest in their country and their businesses. They are prepared to take the risks and hire people.

Bill C-76 and these amendments to the Small Businesses Loans Act do not go far enough. The government should be supporting those people who are prepared to invest in their own businesses, provide the jobs and create the wealth that makes this country go round.

Government must do much more than just pay lip service to small business and tinker at the edges. It must be much more supportive not only in providing the financial support that small businesses need by forcing banks to loan the entrepreneur the capital required to create wealth and jobs but also to cut the red tape, the taxes and the administrative nightmare that most of these small businesses must put up with.

They are the ones who are creating the jobs. This government likes to say that government's role is not to create the jobs. If it is not government's role then it is the role of small businesses or the private sector. Why not get off the backs of small businesses and get on their side to help them create the wealth and jobs in this country.

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, it is my intention to focus today on what I believe to be the most contentious issue of this legislation, report stage of Bill C-76.

There is a lack of understanding about the financial well-being of students by the current government. If the government for just one moment thinks that education and student loans et cetera are too expensive, just wait until it realizes the cost of ignorance.

When students apply, whether they are at McMaster University in my riding of Hamilton West, Mohawk College or any of the other colleges or learning institutions—

An hon. member: Western.

Mr. Keyes: There is the University of Western Ontario in my colleague's city of London, Ontario. Guelph is just down the road.

Students apply for these loans because they know deep down that they have an opportunity to improve themselves. They know that given the chance they will get their education, they will have their schooling and then they will hopefully embark in the world with their educational background in the field they have chosen to pursue with the education they have received.

From the outset the individual young person must stop and think for a second. Unfortunately many are not in a financial situation to be able to pick and choose which university they choose to go to. Maybe they have to wait to go to school for a year, two years, or three years in order to attend a university or any other post-secondary school or learning institution.

That is not acceptable by any standards, whether mine or those of any of the members opposite. When people finish grade 12, or grade 13 in Ontario, they have the opportunity to go on to university. For some it is out of reach because there is not enough money in their wallet. They can possibly turn to relatives or their parents but they too may not have the money that is necessary to pursue a post-secondary education.

They turn to us for some help. They say: "Listen, if you just advance me some money I know I can make a better life for myself through education. Then I will be able to get into the work force in my chosen field and pay back what I owe".

We are trusting. We say yes. We believe them and we believe that the country will do better because they have chosen to pursue a post-secondary education. However, what are we hearing from this government?

The government talks a very good line. We have heard it say that establishing a learning culture and increasing our competitiveness is the way to go. This year's budget was witness to the beginning of the privatization of student aid. We realize that as a result of the 3 per cent fee on student loans in combination with the elimination of the six-month interest free period for needy students upon graduation. When is the government going to wake up and realize that there is a growing debt burden in our society for those who are not educated and for those who are educated but who cannot find a job?

Mr. Gauthier: Eighteen per cent of the kids.

Mr. Keyes: How many? Eighteen per cent of students cannot find a job upon graduation. That is not just necessarily in the field they have chosen but any job.

The average indebtedness for Canada Student Loans recipients is $5,553. That is according to the Department of the Secretary of State of Canada for 1989-90. Loans in default had an average value of $4,731. About 69 per cent of all defaults occurred on loans of less than $5,000.

Speaking of the Department of the Secretary of State of Canada, in an examination of that government department the Auditor General's report of 1991-92 said: "In our opinion, there is an urgent need without infringing on the rights of individuals who are entitled to loans to; (a) seek revision of the Canada Student Loans Act and provide regulations with respect to the recovery of loans in excess of need; (b) review the administrative agreement with the provinces to clarify provincial responsibility for identifying and recovering excess amounts related to Canada Student Loans; and (c) implement proper mechanisms to monitor compliance with these revisions".

Mr. Gauthier: What is the answer?

Mr. Keyes: Did the government do any of that? Has the government really sat down and assessed the overall situation concerning student loans in this country? No. What we get are namby-pamby approaches by first this government and then the NDP in my good province of Ontario. At the time Richard Allen was the minister of colleges and universities. Of course the Government of Ontario no longer has a minister of that. It is all lumped into a big envelope and he is not there anymore.

Does the House know what the NDP government has said and what it will do? Students will no longer get provincial grants to pay for their education because the NDP government has decided to move to a loans only system of financial aid. Loans only, no more grants. Anyway, I digress.

The answer from the Department of the Secretary of State to the Auditor General's concerns was: "We agree. The department is working with its legal advisers and the provinces to implement the necessary legal and administrative changes and consequently will improve internal control mechanisms".

Has any of that been accomplished? There has been no evidence of that, none whatsoever. What are we stuck with?

An hon. member: Haphazard.

Mr. Keyes: It is a haphazard approach. Look at all these notes I have here. I have so many I do not know where to go next.

This is a haphazard approach to a re-examination and restructuring of the whole Canada Student Loans Program, which requires careful thought. The baby boomers have come of age, and there are many of us in the Liberal Party. A lot of us have new ideas and new thoughts. When I worked in the broadcast industry, in which I worked for so many years, we lived by the kiss method; K-I-S-S. The letters stood for "Keep It Simple, Stupid".

• (1650)

What we are telling to the government today is to keep it simple, stupid. We have got so many different departments to go to. The students do not know whether they are coming or they are going, and if they are coming, they are not going to be going because they have got to pay back the loan which they cannot pay because they cannot get a job, because this government has decided: "Our economic policy is the way to go. We are going to do this. We're going to put on GST". It is doing it in a recessionary period.

If it was not for the social safety net implemented by this party many years ago, we would not be in a recession. We would be in a depression. We would be fighting for nickels and dimes in the streets. There would not be health care for those who need it. We would be in a hell of a mess.

We listen to the government, and I conclude, Mr. Speaker. I see you are giving me the signal. It is a matter of merit. It is a matter of co-ordination. It is a matter of trust.

We must take a look at the system and make the pieces fit and make everything work together. We must rely on the individual to put it all together and to keep it simple. Trust: when that student obtains the loan, do not force them to repay the loan the moment that they graduate when they do not even have a job. They do not even have their résumés out yet or not a return on the résumés before they are asked to pay back the loan. They are not even in the work force yet. Give them that break. Give them that opportunity to spend a little time in the work force because they will pay back in spades. They will pay back the $5,000 loan and they will pay back of course in the taxes we will receive because they will be working and not collecting UI or welfare.

It is a matter of trust. If we do not trust this government, if we do not think it is carrying out the job it should be doing, kick it out.

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, the bill we are discussing today has several aspects. It is one of the multitude of omnibus bills that has come out of financial statements before Christmas.

This one deals with a number of items from changing the fees for lobbyists and talking about rules for lobbyists to some changes for small business in the Small Businesses Loans Act which were originally proposed—I understand there have been some changes to that in committee—to freezing the salaries for cabinet ministers which very few people in Canada will oppose—we are always happy to see politicians freezing their salaries—and finally, more changes proposed to student loans.

The particular change that has precipitated most of the debate today concerns the call for doing away with the interest free period, six months after graduation for the student. I think to begin charging interest immediately upon graduation completely ignores the reality of the labour market that those students are looking at today.

I have children who are in the process of finishing university. This past summer was the first year that my daughter was unable to get a job in the last six. She finally was employed for one month towards the end of the summer. There are no jobs.

Vast parts of the country do not have spaces for a whole summer that will employ a student who is not going to be available for full-time work. All we have to do to find out what the demand is for full-time workers is to talk to anyone slightly older and ask them how they are making out finding a permanent job. We will find that most of them are looking, looking and looking.

In my riding I have talked to numerous people who are in their late twenties who have never been able to get a job that lasted more than six months. Either the company they had joined went broke or they downsized or they did not need the extra workers that they thought they needed when they hired on the younger people. So it is not an easy time for young people to be looking for jobs. The demand on the part of students, the young people of an age out of high school, is very high for education. The recession has probably spurred that along but the understanding of how complex and technical our society is becoming has spurred that on as well.

The demand for educational services is extremely high and this has coincided with a time period when the federal government has decided to reduce the established programs funding which assists the provinces to carry the load on post-secondary education. When we look at some five-year periods we will see that the five years ending in the fiscal year we are about to begin $9 billion will have been cut by the federal government in payments to the provinces to assist with post-secondary funding.

The only way the provinces have had to respond to those kinds of cuts has been to increase the tuition level and to reduce as much as they can the amount of expenditure that the taxpaying part of the provincial jurisdiction makes towards universities.

Tuitions have risen. Just as an example, in the five years previous to the year we are in now, tuitions have risen in McGill by 145 per cent over that five-year period; 82 per cent at the University of Saskatchewan; 90 per cent at Simon Fraser University—just to go across the country and look at some of the increases that have occurred.

At the same time, the universities have responded by increasing the grade averages that the student must have in order to gain admission to university. At the university I graduated from many years ago, the University of Saskatchewan, those levels are now in the 80 percentile range and are so for almost every university, in the very high 80s for universities like commerce and engineering and in the low 80s for almost everything else.

The grade average situation has got to the point of bordering on the ridiculous. During this past fall we had the fall convocation and the student who received the highest marks for the university and for her college and was the outstanding student and won all the prizes was a student whose marks out of high school were such that she would not have been permitted to attend this university had she chosen to attend in the year that she graduated. In other words, the most distinguished scholar of that graduating year would not even have been permitted to attend that university had the rules been the same in the year she graduated as they were in the year she began. Thousands of students are being denied a university education because of this ridiculous adherence to very high grade point averages in order to gain entrance.

In speaking with the previous president of the University of Saskatchewan, he said you would think that with the increase in grade point averages in order to gain entry that they would have more students graduate and fewer Christmas drop outs, people who cannot hack it and have to leave at Christmas because they were not able to keep up. He said that as we go to larger classes and higher grade point averages, the dropout rate actually has increased. Having students come in from high school with higher averages has not been the answer; the real culprit in his mind was the very large classes that those ostensibly better-prepared and better-equipped students were going into. They simply could not provide them with the kind of education they needed on a first-year basis, and a great many more of them were dropping out of the 80 percentile entrants than had been the case in the sixties when entry was in the 60 percentile range.

It is not serving the interest of the students. This piddling effort to save $20 million or $30 million over the course of a year by forcing students to pay interest as soon as they graduate with money from jobs that are not there and will not materialize quickly is the ultimate in stupidity on the part of the government.

In this particular decision it has stooped to collecting pennies to try to resolve problems that are much larger.

We see the Prime Minister saying he will take a cut in salary of $3,000 or $4,000 per year. When I read that I was reminded of a decision by the Americans with regard to their first president, George Washington. He was apparently willing to work for nothing. After he had done so for one term in office, Congress added up the bills for all of his trips and his expenditures to maintain himself. It decided it had enough of a leader who worked for nothing. It would pay him something and would keep track of his expenditures.

I note this because it seems that international junkets have become a very expensive way for the leaders of this country to enjoy themselves. Cited earlier in the debate today was the Hong Kong—China—Japan excursion which cost nearly $1 million. A trip after that to Germany and parts of Europe cost in excess of $500,000.

If the government really is interested in saving money perhaps it could do so by toning down the lavishness of those kinds of trips. The $2,000 or $3,000 it is cutting from salaries pales by comparison.

It is time the government began to be realistic about the expenditures it does have control over and that it not try to pull a few dollars from students who are hard pressed to find jobs in this business climate.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I am of two minds about joining this debate this afternoon. It seems to me that I have risen many times in the past four and one-half years to talk about the abysmal state of government support for post-secondary education in this country.

However, this is the first time it has ever been incumbent upon me to stand up and talk about what I can only call a direct attack by this government on the students of this country.

My riding of Halifax has six universities within its environs and a seventh just outside. We have Dalhousie University, which is the largest university in Atlantic Canada and has its professional schools. St. Mary's University is a very large university as well and is famous for its engineering and business faculties, among others.

There is also the Technical University of Nova Scotia, the Nova Scotia College of Art and Design, the University of King's College, which is the oldest university outside of Britain in the British Commonwealth, and the Atlantic School of Theology. On the outskirts is my own alma mater, Mount St. Vincent University. Halifax has many students.

I happen to live very close to Dalhousie University and I also graduated from Dalhousie law school. I see students in my constituency office and my neighbourhood every single day. What do I hear constantly? I hear about their fears that they will not be able to pay their tuition, their fears that they will not be able to stay in school, their physical fears because in some cases there are too many of them crowded into small classrooms, and their fears because there are too many of them to ever get to see their professors. What are the reasons for this? I will tell the House.

The Atlantic provinces have the dubious distinction of having the highest tuition, the oldest physical plants and the lowest salaries in the entire country. At Dalhousie University the tuition was $1,466 a year in 1985–86. That was the highest in the country. At that same time tuition at the University of Guelph, for example, was $1,180. At McGill it was $570.

Mr. Althouse: I thought Bob Rae had the highest.

Ms. Clancy: This is 1985–86. If the hon. member from Saskatchewan wants to heckle, he should pay better attention.

The University of Ottawa had a tuition of $1,324; Lethbridge, $892; Simon Fraser, $1,290. Even then we were $250 above most universities in the country.

The tuition for 1991–92 is $2,195. That is an increase of 49.7 per cent in the hardest done by region in the country. Dalhousie in particular is famous for its national programs. Its law school, for example, of which I am very proud to be an alumnus, has a national school. We bring students from all over the country, but the majority of students are from Atlantic Canada.

We already know what the unemployment rate is in Atlantic Canada. We know what the unemployment rate is among young people. If you are between the ages of 15 and 24 in this country, this wonderful government that has brought you so many wonderful things has brought you an unemployment rate of 18 per cent.

That is a disgrace. In an industrialized country that is supposed to pride itself on what it does for its citizens, if we do that to our young people we have not really done very much for our country.

Mr. Stevenson: What was the unemployment rate in 1981–82?

Ms. Clancy: Excuse me. There is a voice howling in the wilderness, Mr. Speaker. I wonder if you would ask him to wait his turn, especially since he has probably never been near Atlantic Canada, or they would not let him in. At any rate—

Mr. Stevenson: I have a daughter going to university in Halifax.

Ms. Clancy: Then you do know, if you have a daughter going to university in Halifax—I am sorry I do not know the hon. member's designation—that she is paying the highest rate in the country. You do know that if she is going to university in Halifax that she and her colleagues have been occupying the administration offices of the universities in Halifax because of another 10 per cent raise in tuition fees. You do know if your daughter is going to university in Halifax that if she has a student loan she will have to start paying the interest on her student loan as soon as she graduates from university.

I went to university some 20 years ago. Oh, now he is whispering. Ah-hah. At any rate at least we quietened him down. I put myself through university. I was very lucky that there was a student loan program, a bursary program and summer employment. With those three sources I put myself through three university degrees. I paid back my student loan, as do the vast majority of students who take student loans in the country, religiously every month until it was paid off.

I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, when I finished university and went into my job as an articling student, I was very happy that I had that six months' grace period before I had to start paying my loan. That was when the unemployment rate was a whole lot lower than it is today. That was when the majority of students could walk out of their graduation exercises and find jobs. I hope the daughter of the hon. member who goes to university in Halifax, the member who was so knowledgeable a few minutes ago and was giving his opinion so vociferously, finds a job. I sincerely hope she does because damned few young people find jobs when they finish their university degrees. Everybody in this Chamber, right now, and everybody elected to this Chamber knows that is the truth. To say anything else is nothing but balderdash.

The student loans program is terribly important to students in this country.

My hon. colleague from Saskatchewan talked about the higher grades required to get into university. I have to say I am not certain I agree with him on that point that it is such a bad thing. University is not for everybody. Post-secondary education and training, yes, but not necessarily university. Some people go to university. Some people go to trade schools. Some people go to community colleges, whatever.

• (1710)

What we need to be aware of in this country is that there is a proper educational stream, that everybody does not go into the same cookie cutter factory, into the same educational stream. The university is a specific kind of learning environment just as the community college is another kind of learning environment and the trade school is yet another. They are no better and no worse, just different and diverse.

If you take away from the students of today the chance to get their heads above water, what are you doing to the entire program? What are you doing to the educational future? This government talks about being in favour of education and what does it do? It goes out and it slams students once again. What is going to happen to young people in Atlantic Canada? They are not getting jobs. This recession which the government is so quick to say is over is not yet over and it is particularly not over if you are a university student in Atlantic Canada.

I know because last summer I sat in my office and I saw a stream of young people who had pounded the pavement for days and weeks on end looking for jobs. They wanted jobs. They would have done anything honourable to earn money, but the jobs were just not there. That is heartbreaking.

At the same time that this government offers no assistance and no help for these young people who face an 18 per cent unemployment rate, it turns around and says: "Hey, the instant that you have that diploma and you walk out the door, you are responsible for the tuition". There is only one word for it and the word is mean. There is another word and the word is stupid.

My hon. colleague from Hamilton talked about keeping it simple, stupid, and he is right. What the government is doing here is not keeping it simple for students, it is not keeping it simple for their parents and it is not keeping it simple for the future of this country. It is making it complicated, it is making it difficult and it is creating a situation where bright, young Canadians are losing hope. They are losing a sense that their birthright includes the right to an education. They are losing the sense that their government really encourages them to find their proper educational stream and their proper education niche.

I think it is disgraceful and, more than that, I think it is un-Canadian.

The time has come to put programs in place that assist people. The time has come, not to cut the Canada Student Loans Program so that students are responsible earlier than ever before for their interest payments, but to restore established program funding. The time has come to give universities some much needed assistance. However, I fear that these pleas are falling on deaf ears. Well, soon the deaf ears will be gone.

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, like the speaker before me, the member for Halifax who spoke so eloquently and well on this subject, I have the honour to represent university students as well in my riding at York University.

Before I begin to address the student loan issue, which is the one that I want to talk about mostly, I would like to explain a change that is occurring at York University which is very interesting and which reflects the performance of the Canadian economy.

York University, as I am sure all members would agree, is one of the great universities of Canada. It is a relatively new university that draws students from all across the country. More and more because of the economy, in a very interesting way, the students of York University are being drawn from the region of Toronto and from the area of the university itself. There is a desire on the part of a lot of young people to travel when they attend university in another part of our country. I think it is very enriching for students to be able to do that.

[Translation]

This enables them not only to go on to higher education but also to experience another region of the country. You might say that this strengthens Canadian unity, even if these people are going to English speaking communities. I am not speaking necessarily of being able to study in Canada's other official language, but of being able to learn a little more about the country and to share what they know of their own regions with other students from elsewhere.

[English]

An underlying premise of being able to go away from home for university is being able to pay for it. The adverse circumstances to which more and more Canadians have been driven by the economy makes it harder and harder for young people, either because they cannot get the kinds of jobs they need themselves or because their parents just cannot come across the way they would want to, the way they used to be able to in the more prosperous 1960s and 1970s.

People do not have the choice of going away to university. You find at big city universities more and more big city students. I think it is one of the regrettable developments that have followed from a worse and worse performing economy.

When I look at this measure, a measure which forces graduates to begin paying their university loans the day they graduate, even though it is harder than ever to find a job and the unemployment rate for young people is the highest of any age bracket, this government is imposing a measure on them which my colleague from Halifax put very well. It shows a kind of mean spiritedness that this government has toward the members of society who at various times in their lives need various kinds of assistance.

The bell that rang in my mind when I looked at this measure and thought about it was how it fits in with the most fundamental idea of this government, that the Reagan administration and the George Bush administration in the United States really knew how to do it right, that that is the government and those are the policies from which we should draw our examples.

We in Canada have had medicare for some decades now. It has been put forward as one of the great advantages of being a Canadian. We also have not free universities but compared to the United States, far more accessible universities. When young people made their minds up that they wanted to go to a particular university, it was not the tuition of a university as opposed to others. It was not the particular tuition that would be a deterrent to them.

There was federal government backing and provincial government backing at all universities which made them more or less equally accessible.

I know I probably made a statement that some Atlantic Canadians will find controversial because it is true that they are pushed more to the wall there and students have to pay higher tuition there than they do at York University.

I want to make the point and I think it is a valid point that two of the kind of shining benefits of being a Canadian were that we had health care and that our kids and our grandchildren could pick their university and pretty well be able to get into it with the kind of public support that there was.

These are not values of the American conservative or neo-conservative movement. In fact the values of the American neo-conservative movement are sink or swim. If you are not one of those people who is capable and you are not at the stage of your life where it is possible for you to swim, the other side of the coin in the American value system is that you sink.

I think our Prime Minister likes that. I think the most important cabinet ministers like that. As we had programs in health, university, industrial support or other programs of our government that have digressed from that, that have shown a tendency to share, to support each other, to use our government in a positive role and not just the taxer, the equal playing field and so on but a government that cared for its people, they smelled a rat. The Prime Minister and the powerful ministers of this government have wanted to move more and more every aspect of our lives to harmonizing, a very musical expression but not musical in its impact on Canada, what we do in our country to the way it is done by neo-conservative value politics in the United States.

Why should our young people be able to go to university with the support of their fellow citizens and with the support of their government? They do not do that at Harvard. They do not do that at Yale. They have to pay their own way to get into a university like that. Why should students get support at Canadian universities?

I do not think I am exaggerating a point to say it is as simple as that; that these programs which cost us some money, which involve some commitment, which involve bringing our government into the picture, do not fit in the way the Conservatives want to see our society run. They do not exactly harmonize with the way things happen or have happened under neo-conservative governments in the United States and as fast as they can do it, they are going to be eliminated from the system in Canada.

This is a small measure, small in the over-all picture of multibillion dollar subsidy programs. We are only talking about a couple of dozen million dollars a year, which is big money, but not in terms of the over-all picture. When this is added to the harmonization picture which, if this government had its way, and if this government lasted for another year or two, would make Canada and the United States totally indistinguishable. We would become one of the poorer regions of the North American major economy, like the Appalachians or historically some other parts of the American empire that have been underprivileged, then we would be too.

I know I have run out of time. I want to close by saying I am certainly not meaning to make anti-American statements. I am not anti-American. Our party is not anti-American. However, we are not pro-American either. We are pro-Canadian.

We have developed some pretty good systems and some pretty good institutions in this country. The government opposite has it in its mind to harmonize them with the systems in the United States, to destroy the things we have created that make this society special.

Mr. John Reimer (Kitchener): Mr. Speaker, I do not know where the ideas behind the comments we have just heard about harmonizing things came from. That is not what is happening here at all.

We are streamlining a system, trying to make it less onerous on the student and transfer that burden to a person who has graduated. That is what we are doing.

It has nothing to do with harmonization of anything with any other country. All those comments are trying to do is create fear, as the Liberal opposition has done in the free trade debate and is now trying to do in this debate. It has nothing to do with the issue in this debate. I find it incredible how people can get up and make statements like that.

I had no intention of speaking on this bill, but sitting here in the House today, I am amazed at the rhetoric coming from the other side. It has nothing to do with the truth of what is in this bill. I am amazed at the statements being made over there to emphasize one point to the exclusion of all other factors. Eventually someone has to get up and say: "Wait a minute. Let's look exactly at what we are doing. Let's at least tell the truth about what's happening".

In order to try to do that, and we have 10 minutes to say a few things, let me begin with one question concerning the elimination of the six-month post-graduate interest subsidy. Is the government going to remove the 3 per cent tax on student loans? It is our intention to remove the 3 per cent tax on student loans. It could be called a 3 per cent administration fee on student loans that students take out when they undertake loans and they still are students.

Is not the elimination of the six-month interest subsidy merely the replacement of the 3 per cent tax or administration fee on student loans with an even more onerous charge? No, it is not. The 3 per cent guaranteed fee is charged at the time the student receives the loan. For students receiving maximum levels of assistance, the 3 per cent fee in effect reduces the amount of assistance received, because you deduct that 3 per cent administrative fee or tax.

On the other hand, the elimination of the six-month interest subsidy will affect only students after they have left school and are in a position where they have an opportunity to be working and starting to repay the loan.

Instead of putting the 3 per cent administration fee on to a person who is a student and cannot repay it, we are putting it on to the person at the end once they are not a student any more. That is an important ingredient to look at. We are transferring from a 3 per cent factor here while the person is a student as an administrative fee to eliminating the six-month subsidy once the person is no longer a student. I think that is an important point.

The additional financial burden will be minimal. For an average loan, the monthly payment will be increased by less than $5 a month. This is the net impact, an amount well within the financial capacity of most, if not all, students who have now graduated. In effect, the net effect of two measures, of eliminating the 3 per cent administrative fee or tax on the loan, to reducing the six-month subsidy is to shift the burden from students who are in school to individuals who have graduated and have the financial capacity to repay their loans. On balance, it is beneficial to the students who are in school.

What will be the impact of the elimination of the six-month post-graduation interest subsidy on students? The answer is that Canada student loans will continue to be interest free to students the entire time they are in school. That does not change. They are interest free while they are in school.

Second, borrowers will continue to have up to six months after completing their studies to make repayment arrangements with the lenders. However, during that six-month period they will be responsible for the interest now on their loans. However they have now graduated and they could even be working at this point.

Further, on an average student loan of $6,400—as we have heard because many have mentioned the average loan that a student has is in the neighbourhood of $6,400—with an interest fee, say, of 10 per cent, although today they are less than 10 per cent, borrowers would be responsible for interest of $54 a month for six months.

If this amount is added to the balance outstanding on the loan, it would increase monthly payments on the loan by $4.50 a month, a 5 per cent rise in monthly payments, and the person remember is no longer a student, they have now graduated and they may be working. Therefore the impact on them is minimal. In fact, it is far less than what we did before with the 3 per cent administrative fee or tax when they took out the loan while still a student. The student is further ahead with the streamlining of this program and the change that this program makes.

Further, with the removal of the six-month interest subsidy, does it mean that former students will no longer be able to apply for interest relief programs if they are unable to repay their debts?

We have heard a lot of rhetoric from the other side about that, so let us get at what the truth really is. The truth is that the removal of the six-month interest subsidy will not affect the current interest relief provisions that are there now. It does not change them. Under certain conditions the government assumes the interest charges on Canada student loans for a maximum of 18 months, during which time a former student is not required to make any payments. So for that 18 months the program continues. Former students are eligible to apply for interest relief if they are unemployed or by reason of inability to find employment or because of temporary illness or disability. They can apply for this 18-month period. That does not change because of what we are doing here in this bill. In addition to interest relief, students may also discuss modifications to their repayment schedule with lenders.

This afternoon I have been listening to members from the Liberal and the NDP parties talking about the GST. Every time they say GST it is almost like a swear word to them. They say, is it not awful there is GST on books. I agree with them. I have asked in every budget since we put it on that we remove the GST on books. So I agree with that but I do not treat the GST as some evil phenomenon that exists. It is simply a tax. That is all it is. Nobody likes taxes so I guess to that degree no one likes it.

Let me mention something else which none of them talked about. It is that students receive a GST tax credit. It is about $190 going over $200 depending upon how much money they earned that previous summer. They will get anywhere from $190 to $230 a year GST tax credit. That will more than offset any GST on their text books.

All those crocodile tears from over there are nonsense because students receive the GST tax credit. However no opposition spokesman mentioned that because they love misleading Canadians. That is their intent and that is what they do so well.

Another thing they said is that we have cut transfer payments. That is simply false. We have reduced the increase on Established Programs Financing. We have not cut it, we have reduced the increase. By reducing the rate of increase we are still increasing transfer payments but not at the same rate we used to. That is what they should be saying.

We have reduced the rate of increase but no, they do not say that. They say we have cut it. That is what they keep saying. It is totally false and misleading. There is no cut anywhere. It is a reduction in the rate of increase.

We should also remember that inflation is down. We have to face the fact that we have to share the burden of our national debt. That is also in the interest of the students at school today. If we can come to terms with both federal and provincial debt loads, let alone municipal debt load problems and what that does to the taxpayer, then the students who are in school today will be better off because we have come to terms with our national debt problems and with our deficit problems.

We as a federal government are saying it is time to share the debt problem. One of the ways is by reducing the rate of increase in EPF and having the provinces also pick up part of that share.

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Mr. Speaker, I have looked at this bill and in fact I have spoken on it at second reading but this time around I would like to take a slightly different view because we are speaking on the amendments to the bill, specifically with respect to the Canada Student Loans Program.

I look on this as a two-part thing where the student, whether it be university or any other post-secondary institution, must find funding to be able to go to university. We look at the employment aspect during the school years and then secondarily and equally we must look at the ability of the person, once he or she has completed their university education or their post-secondary education, to find a job to be able to pay off the loans that they have made.

Employment during school dictates how much of a loan the student will have to apply for under the Canada Student Loans Program and then we have the ability or the inability of the student to find employment and pay back the amount that he or she has had to borrow.

Many of the previous speakers have pointed out the increase in cost of tuition, room and board, et cetera.

I refer to the member for Mississauga South when he said that students nowadays are better off than they were back when he was going to university. I would suggest that is just simply not true. It was much easier for our generation to get jobs. There were many more jobs in our days. I lived in the Kootenays in British Columbia. I was able to easily find a job whether it was in a pulp mill, a smelter or a sawmill. I could move from one to the other fairly easily during the summer and always have good solid employment at the top of the wage scale.

Now it appears the jobs have waned with technology, with cutbacks and with the competitiveness of these firms being of the utmost importance as opposed to looking at assisting our upcoming students and the future of our country.

We now have the Summer Employment Experience Development program called SEED. Unfortunately since 1985, over the past seven years, the funding for that program has dropped from $149.3 million in 1985 to $83 million today. So there is a substantial cut.

We also know that the average gross wage last summer for students was $2,261 with the average length of employment being 9.5 weeks, whereas six years ago it was 11 weeks as an average. The average hourly wage during that year was $6.07. For post-secondary students it was not much better. The wage was $2,804 for the period and the length of employment was 10.9 weeks with an average hourly wage of $6.59.

It is very difficult for students to get good, reasonable-paying jobs and they must turn to other sources such as the Canada Student Loans Program.

With that program there are problems. I received a couple of letters late last week from constituents. One was from a mother who spoke about the difficulty her son was having and this is the second part of getting a job once you are out. After having attended BCIT for several years, taking robotics and computer-aided drafting, he has been unable to get a job in these particular fields and unable to get a job that pays more than $600 gross per month. He lives in the Vancouver area now and he has had two jobs and a fairly substantial period of unemployment. He is finding it very difficult trying to pay off his Canada student loan because he cannot get employment.

We have the problem of trying to get employment for these people once they have training. On the other side is the difficulty with people that have to be streamlined through the system.

I had a fairly substantial letter from a constituent in Penticton. He set out some of the difficulties he had. Because of health problems he had to put off his education and it started the clock running on this six-month interest period. He ended up having major problems with the Canada Student Loans Program. He made some suggestions which I would like to read into the record.

First, he feels that we should develop procedures to allow students in their final semester to be eligible for interest free status even if they are registered for fewer than the required number of credits under existing student loan regulations if this smaller number of credits fulfils the required amount needed in order to graduate in that semester and if the student took a full course load the prior semester.

To be eligible, the student would have to present the educational institute with a form to be completed by the institution stating the student's needs only to complete the reduced number of credits in order to graduate. If a student fails to graduate at the end of that semester he loses interest-free status for that semester.

Second, he suggests that we develop procedures to allow students who find themselves in situations such as he suffered with his health to be eligible for interest free status if they are completing previous incompleted classes even though they are not technically registered that semester. To control possible abuse of this benefit the student must be completing a course load amount which would be considered full time if he was registered. This could also be applied to students who are registered for less than full-time course loads and are completing additional uncompleted classes.

To be eligible, a student would be required to present a form to the educational institute which could verify the student is actually completing classes. If the student does not complete the uncompleted courses in one semester then he loses the interest free status for that semester.

Third, he suggests developing procedures to allow a loan holder a larger window period when he or she is filing a schedule 1 for a first or second time with the example to allow the holder to file up to two weeks before his interest free period or previous schedule 1 period is to expire, not only after it has expired.

He believes that banks are willing to default the loan knowing the government will cover any defaults. The longer window period would allow the loan holder a longer period of time to alleviate problems that may arise, for example, an uncompleted form or improperly completed form and therefore avoid defaulting the loan.

Fourth and finally, he suggests that we develop procedures for quicker response from the Canadian government once the loan has been defaulted and turned over to the ministry in charge of collection of student loans. This would allow an individual such as himself to arrange payments and avoid large interest charges. It would also assist the collection agency in contacting or locating defaulting loan holders before they change location. The longer a loan goes unpaid, the more difficult it is to collect.

This person has actually come through the system and has used it because he needed it. He thanks both the federal and provincial governments for his ability to tap into a pool of funds that he could not otherwise have tapped into. It is important that we pay attention to the people who have used the program and the problems they have had in order to try and improve it.

What has happened in this particular case is that once again, the government has looked at the bottom line. It has ignored people once again. I pointed this out in speeches time and time again. It has to pay attention to the people it is trying or supposed to be serving.

Once the government learns that simple lesson, perhaps we will have a government that is a little more up to date and a little more in tune with what the students of this country actually require.

BUDGET IMPLEMENTATION (GOVERNMENT ORGANIZATIONS) ACT, 1992

NOTICE OF ALLOCATION OF TIME TO CONSIDER SECOND READING STAGE OF BILL C-93

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister for Science and Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, I do not rise to question my hon. friend. I have a point of order.

I am told an agreement could not be reached under the provisions of Standing Order 78(1) or (2) with respect to second reading of Bill C-93, entitled an act to implement certain government organization provisions of the budget tabled in the House of Commons on February 25, 1992.

Under the provision of Standing Order 78(3), I give notice of my intention to move a time allocation motion at the next sitting of the House for the purpose of allotting a specified number of days or hours for the consideration and disposal of proceedings at the second reading stage.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, I find the remarks by the hon. minister to be rather inappropriate. Nevertheless, he believes strongly that the government should proceed in this way when in fact today, we are operating under the guillotine of a previous motion pursuant to Standing Order 78(3). Here again, we have another one with regard to another piece of legislation.

For the benefit of the Chair, if I could conclude—

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I am sorry, but the hon. opposition House leader knows that this is only a notice and that it is possible the government will not follow through. I think it is premature to comment on a notice—which is nothing but a notice.

[English]

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, in concluding my remarks, I just want to say through the Chair that we wish to serve notice on the government with regard to these particular bills which will now be going before the appropriate committees. I suggest to the hon. members that perhaps the co-operation which has been usually forthcoming from members of this side will certainly have to be reflected upon in view of these Draconian measures that the minister has taken in here today.

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of Bill C-76, an act to amend certain statutes to implement certain fiscal provisions of the budget tabled in Parliament on February 25, 1992, as reported (with amendment) from a legislative committee; and Motions Nos. 1, 3, 6, 9, 12, 14, 15, 16 and 17.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): It being 5:45 p.m., pursuant to an order adopted earlier today and pursuant to Standing Order 78(3), it is my duty to interrupt the proceedings and to put forthwith every question necessary to dispose of report stage of the bill now before the House.

The first question is on Motion No. 1, standing in the name of Mr. Duhamel. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: No.

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion, which was negatived on the following division:

Mr. Speaker: I declare the motion negatived. I therefore declare Motions Nos. 3, 6, 9, 12, 14, 15, 16 and 17 negatived.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, I think you would find that there would be consent to apply the same vote at concurrence. I would imagine that the government would probably want them in reverse though. In an effort to save time, you would probably want to ask for unanimous consent.

Mr. Edwards: Mr. Speaker, I think my friend's surmise is correct; the government would prefer that the result be applied in reverse.

Mr. Speaker: It has been suggested that the House accept the vote on the past vote to be applied in reverse on the next motion.

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance) moved that the bill be concurred in.

The House divided on the motion, which was agreed to on the following division:

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

INTERPARLIAMENTARY DELEGATION

COMMONWEALTH PARLIAMENTARY ASSOCIATION

Mr. Girve Fretz (Erie): Mr. Speaker, I have two reports to table, in both official languages, on behalf of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association.

The first one is with regard to the CPA conference held in Nassau from October 7 to October 14. I would like to read into the record the titles of the debates which took place: democracy and the electoral process, democracy and the current trend to multi-party parliaments, the responsibility of democratically elected parliaments to ensure that governments practise sound financial management and promote stable economic development, the constant threat to democracy posed by poverty, environmental degradation and the population explosion, and removing the institutional, cultural and financial barriers to increase participation by women in the political process, and the final debate was on current political developments.

The second report was the CPA conference to mark the 40th anniversary of the Queen's accession to the throne held in London and Swansea from November 8 to November 14, 1992.

The topics dealt with were as follows: conservation of the environment in a world of interdependence, the management of resources with the GATT round, the CPA contribution to developing links with former and future CPA member countries, Commonwealth experience in combating threats to democracy, the relationship between Parliament and the civil service, and the CPA contribution to the encouragement of democratic development including election monitoring.

PETITIONS

REQUEST FOR ELIMINATION OF VIOLENCE IN OUR SOCIETY

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I would like to table a petition from people in Val-d'Or and Malartic in Abitibi, who say that violent movies on television are dangerous and therefore unacceptable, because they incite more violence.

They say that all toys that incite violent games are unacceptable and should not be made. They also say that freedom of the press in reporting acts of violence should be limited and that information on violent acts which is repeated too often on all television stations and on radio can incite others to commit the same acts of violence.

Therefore the petitioners humbly ask Parliament to legislate on the above-mentioned points in order to eliminate violence in our society, so as to protect our children more and to give all our fellow citizens a better quality of life.

[English]

CHILD POVERTY

Mr. Gilbert Parent (Welland—St. Catharines—Thorold): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition to present from members of my constituency of Welland—St. Catharines—Thorold concerning the more than one million Canadian children currently living in poverty.

I would encourage this House to seek to achieve the goal of eliminating poverty among our Canadian children by the year 2000. It is a known fact that poor children will cause ever increasing cost to the administration of health care, justice and social welfare. Even more important, it will inhibit children from learning and in that way they will not be prepared for employment as useful productive citizens.

I would urge this House to turn its full attention to eliminating poverty among our Canadian children by the year 2000.

YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, I rise today, in memory of Rosalynn Dupuis, to present a large number of petitions again asking that we draw the attention of Parliament to the fact that young offenders, especially offenders convicted of serious crimes, should be treated very seriously, that they should not be granted any form of parole without having some treatment objectives followed, that this is a serious problem with the Young Offenders Act, and that the government should reconsider and bring forward amendments to that effect.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Mr. Speaker, it is my privilege to rise today pursuant to Standing Order 36 to present a petition on behalf of a number of people throughout Canada who state that Immigration Canada has applied changes to section 6 of the Immigration Act, part of which includes the family class, and that the above changes affect those persons who wish to sponsor their parents and their parents' dependants.

The changes are as follows: dependants must be, first, under age 19 and unmarried; second, if under 19 years of age, in full-time attendance in college or university; and, third, children with a disability.

They state that this legislation will set up barriers to family reunification. Many parents and their children over 19 years of age will be separated. This will apply particularly to young women in India who traditionally remain dependent on their parents until they marry.

NORTH THOMPSON RIVER

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Mr. Speaker, I have a further petition to present with respect to Multinational Water and Power Incorporated. A private company has indicated its intention to the B.C. government to divert the North Thompson River near Valemount in order to sell one million acre feet of fresh water to California in the United States of America. This would amount to a 35 per cent reduction in the river flow at the point of diversion.

They are petitioning Parliament to urge the federal government to take whatever steps are necessary to ensure that our fresh water rivers will not be diverted into the United States of America and to pass legislation declaring that no Canadian rivers are for sale.

CHILD POVERTY

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, on November 24, 1989 the House of Commons unanimously passed the motion stating that this House express its concern for the more than one million Canadian children currently living in poverty and seek to achieve the goal of eliminating poverty among Canadian children by the year 2000. The elimination of child poverty in Canada requires just that, a commitment and an initiative among broad sectors of the Canadian public.

The petitioners from my riding and other parts of Nova Scotia want Parliament to reaffirm its commitment to seek the elimination of poverty among children in Canada by the year 2000 and to develop a plan for the implementation of this commitment.

PHARMACEUTICALS

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to present petitions on behalf of a number of people who express concern about the effects of Bill C-91 and further ask for Bill C-22, which was passed in 1987, to be repealed.

They are concerned about the effect on the cost of drugs and on the cost of private plans, but more particularly provincial plans which might have to either increase premiums or reduce the benefits. They are asking that these actions be taken promptly.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, if Questions Nos. 203 and 204 could be made orders for returns, those returns would be tabled immediately.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is it the pleasure of the House that Questions Nos. 203 and 204 be deemed to have been made orders for returns?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

STARRED QUESTION

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, would you be so kind as to call starred Question No. 207?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is it the pleasure of the House to proceed to starred Question No. 207?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Langlois: Mr. Speaker, given the length of the reply, I ask that it be printed in Hansard without being read.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is it agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

[Text]

*Question No. 207—Mr. Duhamel:

1. What is the total amount of revenue collected by the government from the goods and services tax since January 1, 1991 and what has been the total amount spent on (a) advertising (b) tax credits (c) GST rebates (d) set-up costs (e) other expenses associated with the implementation of this tax?

2. What is the total of GST revenue placed in the debt service reduction Account and what is the current balance of the account?

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Parliamentary Secretary to the Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): I am informed as follows:

1. The total amount of net revenue collected by National Revenue, Customs and Excise from the goods and services tax since January 1, 1991 to November 30, 1991 is $12.176 billion.

(a) Advertising (Year 1991)
GST Consumer Information Office	$6,967,475
Department of Finance	$4,122,739
Revenue Canada, Taxation	$907,000
Customs and Excise	Minimal advertising after December 31, 1990 as the last major campaign was immediately after Royal Assent on December 17, 1990.

For more information, see replies to Questions Nos. 203 and 204 tabled this day.

(b) Tax credits	$2.370 billion
(c) GST refunds and rebates	$7.090 billion
(d) Set-up costs
GST Consumer Information Office	Included in Part (e) below (Records cannot be separated)
Department of Finance	Nil
Revenue Canada, Taxation	Not applicable
Customs and Excise	$272.7 million (Total planning and preparation costs since inception)
(e) Other implementation expenses
GST Consumer Information Office 1991-92 (to Dec. 31, 1991)	$3,736,289 including set-up costs
Department of Finance Since 1991	$3,119,898
Revenue Canada, Taxation Since 1991	$60,598,000
Customs and Excise	included in (d) above

For more information, see replies to Questions Nos. 203 and 204 tabled this day.

2. As of November 30, 1991 the government has transferred $9.6 billion to the Debt Servicing and Reduction Fund. These moneys represent total revenues received from the GST since January 1, 1991 net of repayments and credits.

BUDGET IMPLEMENTATION (GOVERNMENT ORGANIZATIONS) ACT, 1992

ALLOCATION OF TIME TO CONSIDER SECOND READING STAGE OF BILL C-93

Hon. Paul Dick (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, I move, pursuant to Standing Order 78(3):

That, in relation to Bill C-93, an act to implement certain government organization provisions of the budget tabled in the House of Commons on February 25, 1992 not more than one further sitting day shall be allotted to the consideration of second reading stage of this bill; and

That, fifteen minutes before the expiry of the time provided for government orders on the day allotted to the second reading stage consideration of the said bill, any proceedings before the House shall be interrupted, if required, for the purpose of this order and, in turn, every question necessary to dispose of the second reading stage of the bill shall be put forthwith and successively, without further debate or amendment.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The House has heard the terms of the motion. All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion, which was agreed to on the following division:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I declare the motion carried.

[English]

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed from Friday, February 5, consideration of the motion of Mr. Mazankowski that Bill C-93, an act to implement certain government organization provisions of the budget tabled in the House of Commons on February 25, 1992 be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Economics envelope.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I wish to bring to the attention of the House a matter arising out of the debate on Friday, February 5, 1993 on Bill C-93, an act to implement certain government organization provisions of the budget tabled in the House of Commons on February 25, 1992.

[Translation]

On rereading Hansard, the Chair was made aware that in the debate on second reading, the hon. member for Cariboo—Chilcotin had moved that the question be now put, as reported on page 15483. Unfortunately, the Chair inadvertently overlooked this motion, which as a result was not formally put to the House.

[English]

Therefore I will now propose to the House the motion duly moved on Friday, February 5, 1993 by Mr. Worthy that the question be now put.

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to have this opportunity to speak on Bill C-93, wherein the government is saying it is going to do away with organizations it really does not feel have any further use.

I would like to say that is not the case. Of the organizations listed in Bill C-93 I want to concentrate on the changes to ACOA, the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency, and Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation.

It was not very long ago when Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation was set up by this government. Set up can be used in any way you choose. You can say that it was formed or put into existence as a transient measure.

When this government took office in 1984 regional development in Cape Breton was through the Department of Regional Industrial Expansion and through Cape Breton Development Corporation. The Cape Breton Development Corporation had two different parts. One was the coal division which looked after the coal-mining industry and the other was the industrial development division. Funding was given to the industrial development division for industrial development on Cape Breton Island.

This government decided it wanted to shut down the industrial development division of Devco and would set up a corporation it would call ECBC, the Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation. This was supposedly to take over the operations of the industrial development division of the Cape Breton Development Corporation. Already in existence at that particular time was Enterprise Cape Breton which was put into place when DRIE, the Department of Regional Industrial Expansion, was done away with. We had Enterprise Cape Breton and now the government was setting up Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation.

It was not very difficult to see that the idea was to try to merge the two, get rid of one or both of them. The government got rid of Enterprise Cape Breton. Now it is getting rid of Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation. The regional development initiative, except for ACOA on Cape Breton Island, is going to disappear.

The fact of the matter is the government's statement that there is no need for this organization is absolutely false. Nothing could be farther from the truth. I do not know how the government can say this when the rate of unemployment on Cape Breton Island is worse now than when the corporation was set up initially. How can it possibly be said there is no further use for it when it is obvious, as people, the statistics and the people in government will tell you, that the need is greater?

What we are getting here is a sleight of hand against and at the expense of the people of Cape Breton Island.

This does not seem to be the attention that the people of Cape Breton or indeed any part of Canada should be receiving from their own federal government. To say that the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency is going to be able to pick up the activities of this organization is absolutely false. There is going to be a reduction of activity in industrial development on Cape Breton Island at a time when it is tremendously important to the region.

One example which is of significant importance is that under the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency Act the agency is not allowed to own land. Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation is allowed to own land and it has two important facilities: one is Sydport Industrial Park in Point Edward just outside of Sydney; the other is the experimental farm on Cape Breton Island.

The industrial park is of tremendous importance. It is on tide water on Sydney Harbour offering rail siding and a particular access road. It also offers wharf space and a large area of land.

What in the name of Heaven is going to become of this park? Is it going to be turned over to the municipalities? We do not know for what use. We also have to recognize that the municipalities, being in the financial condition they are at the present time, are not in a very solid state to be able to take over this facility.

Even more important is the experimental farm. There is a provincial demonstration farm on the mainland in Kentville. This farm, operated by Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation, deals with agriculture in its specific unique state in Cape Breton Island.

It has been proven that what is applicable in agriculture either through crops or animals is not necessarily applicable on Cape Breton Island. The climates are different, as well as the topography, the soils and the terrain.

The fact of the matter is there was no way of determining how to best attract agricultural activity to Cape Breton Island until this demonstration farm was put into effect. Now it has shown to be a tremendous success. It has increased the agricultural activity on Cape Breton Island tremendously and the government is saying it may have to close because ACOA cannot own land.

There has been discussion with the minister responsible for ACOA, who is also minister of fisheries. I think he is sympathetic to the continuation of this farm because of the success the farm has had. The fact of the matter is: Where is the initiative and the acceptance of Agriculture Canada to take over the operation of this farm? We have not seen it at all. The budget last year discussed the closure of ECBC and the fate of the farm, and the fact is we still do not have any initiative from Agriculture Canada.

It is not right that the people of Cape Breton Island should be treated in this cavalier fashion, particularly since the economic problems are so daunting. We have never had the fishery in a worse condition. Tourism is down because of the GST and gasoline prices and the very nature of tourism now in the United States. People are taking shorter vacations rather than the long family vacations they once were. The forestry industry has its difficulties. The steel industry is drastically reduced. The coal industry is reduced.

Now the government is saying it is going to take away the initiatives and the stimuli that Cape Breton should have in order to attract new industry. It is counterproductive to the best interests of the people of Cape Breton Island.

The government was told this when it did away with the industrial development division of Devco. It has been told repeatedly of the consequences, yet it is steamrolling ahead with this conceived idea that the people do not matter.

The people do matter. If the government would recognize that the people matter and recognize what is good for Cape Breton Island, it would not do away with Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation.

Hon. Paul Dick (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, I enjoy the opportunity of entering into this debate dealing with Bill C–93 and only regret that it had not gone to committee before Christmas. However, after a couple of days debate it is time now to move ahead and get it to committee so it can be dealt with in detail.

I rise to enlist the support of members of this House to ensure swift passage through second reading of the legislation which is before us. I am particularly interested in part (e) of the bill, the merger of the Procurement Review Board of Canada with the Canadian International Trade Tribunal.

This merger streamlines government administration through the creation of a new entity called the international trade and procurement tribunal, or ITPT, which will combine the strengths of the CITT and the PRB and report to Parliament through the Minister of Finance.

The merger also paves the way for an improved bid challenge mechanism that more suppliers of government procurement need that can be used to appeal contracts they feel have not been awarded fairly. In fact, the legislation positions the ITPT to meet all of the government's current and future bid challenge responsibilities.

For the short time that the free trade agreement has been in place and considering the limited scope imposed upon the PRB under the free trade agreement, the PRB has under the guidance of the former chairman, Gerry Berger, and the present chairman proved to be an inexpensive, speedy and even–handed alternative to the court system.

Indeed, they have set up an impressive set of laws, regulations and policies which ensure that suppliers will be dealt with fairly. Now suppliers seeking recourse when they feel they have been denied a fair opportunity to bid have found the PRB to be an extremely responsive vehicle.

In fact about 5,000 Supply and Service Canada procurements out of almost 300,000—about 2 per cent of our procurements each year—fall within the scope of the FTA. These are all potentially subject to the PRB and the PRB has handled some 95 complaints since its inception in January 1989. The majority of these were raised by Canadian suppliers who felt they had been unfairly treated.

Indeed, as a result of the decisions, if read, you will find that about one-third of those have been sustained to the point that they felt the procurement had not followed the rules laid down by government legislation and regulation. This gives a good opportunity for the suppliers to bring their complaints and indeed for procurement officers in various federal government departments to be more aware of how they should handle their procurements in a level playing field.

Suppliers tell us they are pleased with the transparency of this quasi-judicial review authority. It brings a good bit of honesty to the federal procurement system. They have also appreciated the board's informal and expedient approach. Complainants have felt that the PRB dealt with them fairly and they have appreciated not having to incur the time and expense of court hearings.

The board has given short shrift to frivolous complainants. It has not been used as a delaying or leveraging tactic, nor has it been used to distort the competitive market.

Similar to the Procurement Review Board, the guiding principles of the ITPT will be to promote an open, fair, impartial and transparent procurement process. The new tribunal will function in a timely and effective manner with the powers to receive complaints, conduct inquiries and to make determinations.

Naturally the ITPT would first assume the PRB's former role so that the merger does not disrupt the service to suppliers and Canada will continue to fulfil its obligation under the FTA.

However, many companies in industry associations have suggested that a similar form for redress should be available to suppliers on a broader range of federal procurements, indeed federal procurements which we make just within the government and are open to only Canadian suppliers. The legislation before us opens the way to such a forum.

If we are truly committed to ensuring the integrity of fairness of government procurement then we must also be committed to ensuring that it is capable of withstanding independent third party scrutiny.

At the federal level we have already taken a number of steps, for example through the open bidding policy to achieve greater access, fairness and openness for all potential suppliers. Open bidding was an important and welcome development for suppliers. Simply put, more businesses can now access the federal market. There was nowhere to go to complain if one of them thought there was something wrong with the way the contract had been awarded.

• (1120)

The only avenues were through the departments, first of all to the procurement officer who perhaps awarded a competitor the contract, then to the deputy minister and then to the minister. With this new system the people will be able to direct it to an arm's length, third party tribunal, which will give them a fair hearing.

As I mentioned earlier, the first obligation under the FTA will be continued and then the broadened bid challenge mechanism would be introduced, which would encompass purchases covered by Supply and Services Canada's open bidding policy.

That is all the contracts which Supply and Services Canada puts out to tender of over $25,000. Generally speaking, that is good and makes sure that the playing field will be level for all suppliers. That amounts now to more than $4 billion annually that we opened up for challenge under this new mechanism.

We will set up this broadened bid challenge mechanism by establishing regulations that will allow appeals of these contract awards to the ITPT.

The introduction of such an appeal mechanism will be a landmark event for Canadian companies that supply goods and services to the federal government. It would challenge the whole federal procurement system to be squeaky clean.

Suppliers of commodities covered by the open bidding policy would then have recourse to the type of independent bid challenge mechanism that suppliers of federal government requirements covered under the FTA now enjoy.

Later if Canada, the U.S. and Mexico ratify the North American free trade agreement or when the GATT introduces perhaps a wider scope and insists on an independent third party mechanism, the ITPT will be in a position to serve as a required bid challenge mechanism for contracts covered under the FTA, GATT, or any other international agreement.

In the case of NAFTA that chapter covers virtually all government contracts for goods and services with a value of more than $50,000.

Eventually most federal procurements, not just the portion carried out by my department but also that portion carried out by other federal departments, will be subject to ITPT scrutiny.

The new tribunal will retain the PRB's rapid response and informal hearings. I envision that for all but the biggest cases decisions will be made by one member rather than a panel. The preference will be for file hearings consisting of tribunal members' review of the government files. In other cases hearings could be conducted by telephone or through an exchange of letters. In fact in-person hearings would only be held when necessary, not as a matter of course.

The PRB approach of minimizing the need for lawyers will also be retained. Sorry about that. There will be no prerequisite to have legal representation before filing or proceeding with a complaint.

The experience with the PRB under the free trade agreement was the first for a Canadian bid challenge mechanism. It has taught us a lot. For one thing we saw that we did not have to follow the U.S. model which was complicated and adversarial, more closely resembling a court proceeding.

Instead we came up with a uniquely Canadian solution. We set up an informal tribunal with the power to investigate, to obtain relevant facts from the government and to conduct hearings in a non-adversarial climate that featured a refreshing absence of red tape. Suppliers and buyers have both gained from the PRB experience.

This does not mean that we cannot make mistakes. I have 1,600 procurement officers in Supply and Services. We do over 1,000 contracts every working day. We in the department are very encouraged by this new process of open bidding and by the openness of the appeal mechanism which this legislation is going to put in place.

I encourage all members of the House to give speedy passage to this so that we can get it into committee and out of committee and in place so that the suppliers of Canada, the taxpayers of Canada, the industries in this country will have a way of making sure that there is a level playing field when they want to bid on federal government contracts.

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, each day, each week, each year that passes the credibility of this government becomes more strained. Each budget the government brings before this House makes it more difficult for the people to believe that the government has any plan to get Canada out of the deficit-debt syndrome in which we find ourselves.

Each year for the last eight or nine years the government has told the people of Canada that it is raising taxes and cutting expenditures so that it can get rid of the deficit and start working on the debt. What has happened? Each year we have been promised that it would get the deficit under control but the level has stayed the same. We have had more taxes, we have had the GST, we have had a variety of taxes foisted on us. We have had cuts in every part of every department. It has had no impact on the deficit and the debt. In fact, the debt of Canada has increased to something over $400 billion from less than $200 billion eight years ago.

None of the policies, none of the cuts, none of the tax increases that the government has indicated as part of their policy, part of their planning, has made any difference to the level of debt. As economic predictors, as economic controllers, the government has been a total failure.

We come to Bill C-93. This bill is cited as budget implementation, as government organization. Among those changes are a number: Agricultural Products Co-operative Marketing Act, Agricultural Commodities Marketing Act, Agricultural Canada Opportunities Agency, the Canadian Council for the Arts has been changed to the Canadian Council for the Arts and for Research in Social Sciences and Humanities. It also changes things like the Intellectual Properties Act.

It is an omnibus bill which does a lot of little things but does nothing to improve the economy of Canada, nothing for the people of Canada and nothing to create more jobs. It does nothing to increase the agricultural funding that is necessary. Not one of the changes in this bill has anything to do with improving the economy of Canada; not one of these changes is aimed at increasing the effectiveness of the economy of Canada.

This is a case, as a former speaker said when speaking to this bill, of Nero fiddling while Rome burns. It is wide-ranging legislation which makes changes in the structure of a number of organizations that have given this government and previous governments good advice and made the people of Canada knowledgeable about why changes were being made, why the government was doing certain things, and putting before the government good reasonable kinds of changes which would improve the structure of economic development.

The wide-ranging changes that are being suggested now are not being suggested to increase the quality of economic decisions made by this government. It is not being recognized for economic reasons. The organizations that are being cut, pressed together, eliminated in this bill are being messed around with to the point where their basic thrusts in advising the government cannot be focused on the area where they have the most control. In fact, the intention seems to be exactly the opposite, to give the organizations which are being kept and added to such a broad focus that they will not be effective in any of their advice. While the debt keeps growing, while the deficit remains the same and while the economy continues to decrease, the number of jobless increases.

This bill will change the Canada Council for the arts to the Canada Council for the Arts and for Research, Social Sciences and Humanities. None of the communities involved by the agencies being affected have been consulted on this change. None of them were consulted when these changes were suggested initially by the Minister of Finance. If they had been consulted, the action would probably have been quite different.

Approximately 14 years ago, these two organizations, arts and humanities and social sciences, were separated because it was recognized that one organization representing about 250,000 artists did not fit within the same area as an organization representing social sciences and humanitarian research in 100 or so universities and colleges across the country. The change to split the two organizations was carried out 14 years ago in consultation with the people involved, with the universities and with the artists of Canada. It was supported by both communities.

What has the government done now? It will tell you it is making this change to save money. However, its record is not good. The quality of previous organizations could have been kept and the cost reduced with the focus of those organizations kept upon the areas most concerned about advice being given to the government. The record of the government is not good because as it has made these cuts across the board with organizations of this type. The effective results of those cuts has not reduced the deficit but has reduced the effectiveness of the organizations. These two communities will not be well served by this division and possibly by the dilution of funding.

I suspect and so do both the arts and humanities and social sciences communities that the real aim of this amalgamation is to reduce the funding for both groups. Research funding has already taken major cuts. It is likely that this action and this bill will further cut research funding to the social sciences and humanities.

If the government's past record on effectiveness in reducing the deficit stays the same, we cannot expect anything but reduction in the effectiveness of the organizations and less value for the money that we do spend. Fourteen years ago there was no clear link between these two organizations. There is no clear link now.

It is time to get down to job creation, to effective agricultural policy funding. Now is not the time for doubtful and thoughtless changes with no real aim in improving the life of Canadians.

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, I would like to add a few words to this debate and start with the general thrust of this bill.

[English]

I would like to borrow a parallel from the environment and reflect for a moment on how this government is beginning to act. Actually it has acted for some time like a dinosaur. This dinosaur is in a particular frame of mind, if it has any. The dinosaur is in the throes of death and is becoming dangerous to those it purports to govern, is in a demolition mood and in that mood is more and more voracious.

As you may recall, from when we debated Bill C-63, the dinosaur had already destroyed through that measure a number of very fine Canadian institutions. Among them was the Economic Council of Canada which was a very valuable tool to the government in providing policy alternatives in economic planning and development.

The dinosaur destroyed the Science Council of Canada. I do not need to describe its merits. I am sure everyone is well aware of what it did to inform Canadians about scientific thought and its development. It took some very valid initiatives.

At that time, and I am referring to November 30, 1992 when that bill was passed by the House of Commons, the Law Reform Commission was not spared by the dinosaur. Again I do not need to describe the merits of the Law Reform Commission, they were self-evident. It was providing the cutting edge of thought in penal reform.

The Canadian Institute for International Peace and Security was also a victim of that particular misbehaviour. I might add that the Centre for Ocean Development did not escape the rage of this particular government.

It was not enough for the dinosaur. The bill we are discussing today is the expression of its desire to demolish more. Today we are debating a measure which among other things would remove or abolish the Canada Council for Arts. Actually it would compress into one council the existing but separate Canada Council and the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council. In other words, it would make one body out of two.

We have received a number of letters on the part of people who are in charge of universities, people of academic background, in fact the entire academic community who have reacted very strongly in opposition to this measure. Unfortunately, the dinosaur does not have ears and its memory is very short as I will point out briefly.

Another measure being proposed in this bill is the elimination of Emergency Preparedness Canada which on the whole had the potential to become a very useful instrument for the protection of the public in case of emergency. One has only to think of what happened in Manitoba in the town of Oakville at Christmas. Imagine accidents of that kind, particularly those related to derailments of trains which are carrying dangerous goods, something that requires the existence and the active work of an agency that would be continuously ready for the protection of the population. Unfortunately part V of Bill C-93 proposes the elimination of Emergency Preparedness Canada.

I would also like to bring to your attention the proposed elimination of the Petroleum Monitoring Agency which had an important mandate to the Canadian consumer to provide the government and the public with comprehensive and objective information on the performance of the petroleum industry in Canada.

While this obsession on the part of this dinosaur, whose main political agenda seems to retreat from governments and do less and less in its role as the protector of the public interest goes on, we notice another phenomenon arising. This dinosaur in its death throes is also showing signs of amnesia. It is forgetting promises it made to Canadians through some highly publicized documents some two, three or four years ago. In the limited time available I will only be able to cover a couple of those promises.

Let me draw your attention to the promises made by the government in the field of water policy. Here we discover the promise of a drinking water safety act which was a component of the federal water strategy the government produced in 1987. It has been six years since that promise was made and nothing has happened. The drinking water safety act was mentioned again in the green plan in 1990 which the government promised it would introduce in 1991. Canadians are still waiting for that promise to be kept. Obviously amnesia is creeping and galloping in the brain of this enormous dinosaur called the present Government of Canada.

The other matter I would like to bring to your attention is the promised control of toxic chemicals. Here we find some very disturbing facts. When it comes to the priority list of substances to be assessed for the purposes of the Canadian Environmental Protection Act only 5 out of 33 chemicals have been studied as they ought to have been studied.

On the issue of toxins entering Lake Ontario and the Niagara River we find another very disturbing matter. Of the 18 toxins persistently entering the waters of the Niagara River, 8 are still being regulated. Yet the government has promised to reduce the flow of toxic chemicals into the Niagara River by 50 per cent by the year 1996. This amounts, among other things, to some 1,500 kilograms of toxic substances entering the river every day. I understand you are anxious to bring an end to this litany of unkept promises, but I have to abide by your rules and I hope to have another opportunity to continue.

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, it is unfortunate that we have to go through closure and time limitation restraints on this because I think the time would be better spent in committee reviewing these changes in more detail. I would like to discuss aspects of Bill C-93 and will start with the Agricultural Products Board.

Bill C-93 provides for the winding up of the Agricultural Products Board. Over the years the board has provided the important service of stabilizing markets for agricultural commodities. We believe that function can be exercised more efficiently on the basis of an amended Agricultural Products Co-operative Marketing Act with the support of the Department of Agriculture.

The Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency will now bring under its roof the ECBC which is Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation, the Cape Breton Development Corporation. The corporation will be dissolved and all of its rights, property and obligations will be assumed by ACOA. The ECBC programs will continue but there will be no duplication or overlap through the competing agency, ACOA. Those changes were tabled in the budget speech February 25, 1992.

Bill C-93 will also result in the creation of a new single cultural agency by combining the Canada Council and the Social Services and Humanities Research Council. I want to emphasize that despite fiscal pressures on our government we have continued to provide significant levels of funding for the arts and humanities. We believe that Canadian culture has a vital role in fostering a vigorous and united nation, so those changes will be good.

The new council will deal with the full range of cultural matters including international cultural programs and international academic relations under the auspices of the Department of External Affairs. Under the provisions of the act the new council will be required to take Canada's foreign policy into account in fulfilling its mandate.

Also under Bill C-93 we propose to fold the Canadian Commercial Corporation, otherwise known as the CCC, into the Department of Supply and Services. The minister has just spoken on that so there is not much more to be said.

We are proposing an incremental dissolution of the CCC which would not be finalized until the Minister of Supply and Services is satisfied, as he mentioned this morning, that there will be no detrimental effects upon our exports or trade relations with other countries. In the interim the CCC will continue or remain a corporate entity.

Also under Bill C-93 we are taking a look at Emergency Preparedness Canada which began as a civil defence organization in 1948 with the Department of National Defence. Its title, mandate and structure changed a number of times during the first 40 years and EPC became a separate agency with the passage of the Emergency Preparedness Act in 1988 which replaced the War Measures Act.

As part of this initiative the government also proposes in part V of this bill that Emergency Preparedness Canada be folded back into the Department of National Defence. This is an appropriate action given the fact that EPC was housed with DND prior to 1988 and still reports to the Minister of National Defence.

Part VI of Bill C-93 provides for the amalgamation of the RCMP External Review Committee and the RCMP Public Complaints Commission into a single body entitled the Independent Review Commission for the RCMP. As was the case with the ERC and PCC, the new commission will be independent of the RCMP and will deal with public complaints concerning the conduct of RCMP officers and review appeals and grievances from members of the RCMP.

Consolidating these two similar agencies will achieve savings in administrative overhead, eliminate duplication of services and allow for increased efficiency in program delivery, both to the public and to members of the force. I encourage members of the House to support this bill and facilitate its speedy passage.

Part VII of Bill C-93 deals with the Intellectual Property Tribunal. Bill C-93 will encourage efficiency gains to be realized by merging the Copyright Board, the Trademarks Opposition Board and the Patent Appeal Board to form the new Intellectual Property Tribunal, otherwise known as IPT. Its duties will include the fixing of royalties which the performing rights societies may collect in return for granting licences for the performance of dramatic or musical works. The tribunal will also decide how royalties should be divided, including those generated by the retransmission of television and radio signals. The IPT will also arbitrate disputes and copyright royalties and decide opposition and cancellation proceedings arising under the Trademarks Act.

Part VIII of Bill C-93 deals with the International Trade and Procurement Tribunal. The bill provides for the merger of the Procurement Review Board and the Canadian International Trade Tribunal, otherwise known as CITT. Following the merger the new organization will be named the International Trade and Procurement Tribunal or ITPT and will report to Parliament through the Minister of Finance.

The Procurement Review Board was established under part II of the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement Implementation Act in 1988.

Part IX of Bill C-93 deals with the Petroleum and Monitoring Agency. The government intends to wind up the Petroleum Monitoring Agency known as PMA. For those who are unfamiliar with the PMA, the agency publishes semi-annual and annual ownership surveys of the petroleum industry, as well as other reports as requested by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources to whom it currently reports.

The Veterans' Land Administration is part X and the final chapter on this re-administration. It provides that the Veterans' Land Administration Act be wound up and its functions and responsibilities transferred directly to the Department of Veterans Affairs. This merging of VLA operations with those of the department will allow greater economies while ensuring that the interests of veterans are fully protected.

In summary, these are administrative changes which will have a net saving for the taxpayers of Canada. That is something we all have to be conscious of because the cost of running government seems to be escalating when it should be shrinking. That is what we are now doing but not at the expense of the delivery of services; we are doing it to enhance the delivery of services.

I think most members in this House can take encouragement from that. If we look at the cost of government services in relation to our gross domestic product, it has grown dramatically in the last 15 to 20 years. It has to be curtailed, and I think part of that curtailment goes down to the efficiency and delivery of those services.

I am encouraged by what I see and I support Bill C-93 as will most members when they have a chance to examine the bill for what it really is.

[Translation]

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, before I start, I know that the Minister of Supply and Services spoke just now of merging and creating an international tribunal. I would simply like it to be on the record that we find this a valuable initiative on the government's part, and we hope to hear details of this new organization and learn how it will operate.

We would also like to obtain a report from the minister about free trade as it has affected his department in the four years Canada has had free trade with the United States. He told us recently that he would be presenting a report on this subject, but we have not seen any signs of it so far. I hope he is making a note of this.

Now I would like to say something about the government's proposal to set up a new organization that would combine the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council of Canada and the Canada Council.

As we know, this is an old idea. In 1978 the two councils did form one body, and after a great deal of discussion and consultation the decision was made to have two separate bodies, one to look after the arts and the other to look after research in the social sciences and humanities.

It is surprising to see that the government is making this proposal. There are a great many objections to it. It is not only our caucus that objects but the educational and cultural communities also have numerous objections, especially as regards the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council, which has done a great deal of work in the area of research. It is one of the best institutions of its kind not only in North America but anywhere in the world. It functions well, and academics connected with it have written to us to say that everything is going smoothly. Why is the government trying to break something that works? As they say in English, "If it ain't broke, don't fix it".

The council says the government's proposal has not taken its views into account. There has been no consultation at all.

In addition, as we know, the government has decided to cut the budgets of these two organizations by 10 per cent. It is incredible to see the government on the one hand cutting funding to both councils and on the other trying to get rid of them by setting up a third.

We do not support this proposal, because the evidence suggests that amalgamation would affect the integrity of the research done and of the two existing organizations.

Furthermore, the government's proposal does not take into consideration the question of representation for the two councils. What does the government propose? Is it going to appoint one representative for the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council side and one for the arts side? How would that work?

• (1200)

I find it truly bizarre that this proposal should be brought before the House of Commons without any consideration being given to the opinions of those who will be affected by the merger. We therefore suggest to the government that it at least set aside this part of the legislation, or that it agree to hold broad consultations with these bodies and especially with the most interested parties.

I do not think there is any need to push ahead so rapidly with this proposal. We have heard from a great many representatives of universities, student groups and professors, and I do not see how the government can go ahead with a proposal that everyone is against. The government should be asked: Who came up with this proposal? Who had the idea of merging, without consultations? What would the advantages be? Personally I do not think either of the organizations targeted by the proposal would derive the slightest benefit.

That being said, we have an obligation to be very clear about this subject. As a government, as politicians, we have a duty to take Canadians' views into account before we make decisions that concern them. The government has gone ahead with this proposal without consultations. For example, the government has to devote more effort to the research and development sectors and the councils working in the social sciences sector. It also has to do more in the area of social sciences research, because we have in this country a model council, one that can serve as an example not only in Canada but in all of North America and in other countries as well.

We should undertake consultations in a positive manner and to do this we should call upon the bodies that are affected by the proposal, ask them to participate and encourage colleges and universities to get involved. We should also consult the Canadian Association of University Teachers and the various Canadian federations active in the humanities and in the social sciences. These are the groups that are particularly affected by the proposal, and the government has an obligation to consult them.

I have a letter from the Canadian Graduate Council, addressed to the Prime Minister. In it, the Council asks the Prime Minister to undertake just such consultations.

[English]

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to take part in the debate today. However I am unhappy the debate is going on because I think it is entirely unnecessary. I think this is something long overdue.

Many people tell me that there are too many different branches of government, too much duplication of services and that is what this bill is really all about. It is eliminating a lot of the duplication, overlap and division of decision making that is seen. As the hon. member for Carleton—Charlotte just stated, he would much rather see this bill moved along, go to committee and then brought back to the House.

This morning I would like to deal with a couple of areas of the bill, particularly parts V and VII. The hon. member for Carleton—Charlotte did deal a little bit with emergency preparedness in Canada and the fact that today perhaps it has become a little bit redundant. Certainly most of the changes that have been recommended by the government are very worth while.

Emergency Preparedness Canada began as a civil defence organization in 1948 within the Department of National Defence. Its title, mandate and structure changed a number of times during the next 40 years. The EPC became a separate agency with the passage of the Emergency Preparedness Act in 1988 which replaced the War Measures Act.

Many people today are asking why do we need such a thing. The cold war is over. Yet as we consider the unstable nature of the world in which we live, the problems that develop periodically across the country, it is obvious that we still need such an organization.

As my colleagues have already indicated, we would like to take 15 of these separate bodies and consolidate them into 10 separate organizations. As part of this initiative, the government proposes in part V of this bill that Emergency Preparedness Canada be folded back into the Department of National Defence. This is very appropriate action, given that the EPC was housed within the DND prior to 1988 and still reports to the Minister of National Defence. I can see no reason at all for this to be a separate entity and this is an excellent move.

Some people are wondering what the function of the EPC is. It co-ordinates the development of civil emergency preparedness among federal government organizations, provincial governments and international organizations. In other words, it deals with all the various government bodies. It maintains a 24-hour a day nation-wide watch of potential and actual emergencies. That is the key; not only will it deal with emergencies but it will attempt to anticipate anything that does develop.

This would be under the auspices of the Government Emergency Operations Co-Ordination Centre in Ottawa. The EPC would be headed by an executive director who is a public servant. Its head office is in Ottawa with regional directors in most of the provincial capitals and a permanent representative on the Canadian delegation to NATO in Brussels. Its annual budget is $20 million and approximately 100 people are employed by it.

The budget papers noted that EPC's function in relation to planning and co-ordinating civil defence preparedness remains essential. I agree 100 per cent.

However, its separate organizational status is not necessary for the effective fulfilment of its mandate. Moreover, folding the EPC back into the DND will allow for its function to be continued just as adequately at a much lower cost than administrative overhead. We all agree that having the decision making and the ability to carry out those decisions without consulting other organizations is essential and makes good sense.

Like a number of other measures in this bill, the action proposed for EPC is a modest one if considered in isolation. Yet by taking them together with the other proposals of Bill C-93, it represents the sustained efforts on the part of this government to streamline its operations wherever it makes sense to do so.

This is what my constituents have been telling me. Let us see you streamline government wherever you can. Let us cut out the redundant waste. This is an excellent part of this bill.

The other area of the bill that I would like to talk about briefly this morning is the Intellectual Property Tribunal. This is an international concern. Many nations are concerned about the use and control of intellectual property. This is where the big advances are being made and it is of concern to people when they develop ideas that they want some kind of protection. They want to receive the benefits not just from manufacturing automobiles, et cetera. When they come up with ideas I believe they should have support and receive the benefits obtained from their intellectual pursuits.

Bill C-93 would encourage efficiency gains to be realized by merging the Copyright Board, the Trademark Opposition Board and the Patent Appeal Board to form the Intellectual Property Tribunal or the IPT.

Its duties will include the fixing of royalties which the Performing Rights Society may collect in return for granting licences for the performance of dramatic or musical works. The tribunal will also decide how royalties should be divided including those granted by the retransmissions of television and radio signals.

The IPT will also arbitrate disputes and copyright royalties and decide opposition and cancellation proceedings arising from the Trademark Act. The establishment of an Intellectual Property Tribunal was recommended by the Henderson report many years ago, which was commissioned by Consumer and Corporate Affairs Canada to study areas of concern about aspects of the intellectual property litigation system.

Some of the benefits as highlighted in the report include greater perceived and actual independence for the IPT from the government—and I think we all agree that is essential—an organization encompassing a greater wealth of expertise and experience in intellectual property law, and an operation better capable of balancing and co-ordinating varying workloads. The tribunal will bring together an expanded wealth of expertise on intellectual property law into one organization.

Industry sectors are significant and involved. The use of intellectual property will benefit through improved service such as a significant reduction of the time consumed in exchanging evidence in the Federal Court. It will short-circuit a lot of these very prolonged procedures that are necessary at the present time.

It will also benefit from an expanded expertise among board members. Given that the tribunal will at times rule on government decisions, it will and it is absolutely necessary that it remain independent of the government.

The proposed Intellectual Property Tribunal Act set out in part VII of Bill C-93 includes provisions for the charging of user fees to recover the full costs of the IPT operations, in other words user pay. These fees will be prescribed by regulation and on the recommendation of the Treasury Board. There will be full consultation with all stakeholders in the process prior to enacting these regulations.

The IPT will be comprised of a chairperson, a vice-chairperson, and up to a maximum of six members appointed by the Governor in Council. While these positions will be full time there are provisions for adding part-time members should they be required. To assist and support the board there will be a small complement of experienced public servants.

In conclusion, this new organization will bring greater efficiency to the government's role in a sector of growing importance to the Canadian economy: intellectual property with its attendant rights, responsibilities and balanced regulatory overview.

These are just a couple of the areas of this bill that I support very strongly. I know all members of the House want to see a better, more efficient government. This is a major step in that direction.

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak briefly on Bill C-93, an act that comes out of the budget papers of a year ago. Almost one year later we are debating what was discussed in the budget.

The budget indicated that a number of agencies of the government would be amalgamated. Members are within their rights and responsibility to spend a bit of time familiarizing themselves with the proposals as put before us by the government.

On the surface, a number of these proposals appear to make sense. Some raise some questions which have yet to be answered by the government. I guess that is part of the process that will occur when it goes to a legislative committee. At this stage, second reading stage when we discuss the principles involved, there are a few things that I would like to say about some of the proposals.

There are 10 agencies and groupings being proposed in this bill. There is a proposal to combine in the RCMP the External Review Committee with the Public Complaints Commission so that both the public and members of the force appeal to the same body. It seems on the surface to make some sense. The Petroleum Monitoring Agency is being wound up with its functions to be undertaken by the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources which it says will continue to analyse confidential reports from the industry on the state of petroleum supplies and pricing.

We will have to find out whether those reports are still published in a way that provides the public and members of the House with an idea of what is going on in the industry with regard to supply and pricing. At the moment I guess we will have to wait to see whether the reports are in fact in a form that will be of some use to us in performing our duties and to the public at large.

Emergency Preparedness Canada is being folded back into DND. This is a rather interesting one, because in 1988 one of the great initiatives was to make it a separate entity. Now the government has decided to fold it back into the Department of National Defence. Whether National Defence will be more able to respond to chemical spills, as have happened a few times in the last number of years in memory, to earthquakes, to cyclones or to other such natural disasters, remains to be seen. Hopefully the military will be able to respond quickly and well. Again the proposal seems to make a bit of sense.

It is probably time to put the Veterans' Land Act in with Veterans Affairs. There are not a lot of files still outstanding and the Veterans Affairs Department is shrinking all the time so it makes some sense to do it.

Where it becomes a little more controversial is the proposal to throw under the aegis of the Canada Council the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council and the International Cultural Program. They are all to be put under the one Canada Council. There may be an effort on the part of the government to try to combine too many things that have differing mandates and differing directions.

The mandate of the social scientist is not the same as the artist. The direction and the goals of the two groups are quite different. They will probably have a difficult time operating under the same organization, namely the Canada Council.

Social scientists have written to the government since the budget proposals came out and have put some proposals which they thought would help to mitigate that, but so far the government does not seem to have responded.

Some of the rules should be reiterated here when we are discussing this amalgamation in principle. Some basic ground rules to make the arrangement work better would include parity at all times with the representatives from the arts community and social scientists.

Since the new council has a mandate to respond to research, artistic and international concerns, it will be easier for it to respond effectively to the particular needs of each of those communities if there is an established advisory committee or panel to provide advice to the council on the particular matter. A particular panel on research, for instance, makes some sense.

With regard to research funds, members of the research community are concerned that the funds the government had assured them would be increased for all research councils may have difficulty coming through in the form of research under this arrangement. It is imperative, they say, that the funding for social science research continues to come from the science envelope through which the other research councils are funded. Research in the social sciences must continue to be part of the national science policy and funded as such.

The mandate of the council is also questioned by the social research community. It points out that it has done reasonably well through the tri-council committee which monitored the funding of various scientific research groupings, but if the social sciences are to be an integral part of the Canadian science policy a similar rule must be attributed to the new agency.

In light of the recent abolition of such important bodies as the Economic Council and the Science Council, the advisory role takes on added importance. This too frightens the people who work in the Social Sciences and Humanities Council. The demise of their sister councils has made them wonder just what is the priority of this government in the whole area of social scientific research. That is an area where questions are raised.

Another area is the Procurement Review Board. It has been discussed a bit this morning that it is now going to be part of the international trade tribunal, as has the Canadian Commercial Corporation which is going to be administratively merged with the Department of Supply and Services.

There is some rather strange wording in the bill as it affects Canadian Commercial Corporation. It says very clearly in clause 79 of the bill:

> The Canadian Commercial Corporation Act is repealed on such day as the Governor in Council, on the recommendation of the Minister designated for the purposes of the Act, may fix by order.

They immediately follow that by saying:

> The minister shall not recommend the making of an order under subsection (1) unless the minister is satisfied that the dissolution of the corporation will have no significant detrimental effect on Canadian exports or on trade relations with other countries.

Are we closing the corporation down and merging it or are we not? It is not very clear but it is up to the minister.

This is the kind of so-called cost saving that the government has been engaging in quite a lot since the emergence of the Reform Party. It tried to appear to be doing away with agencies which have very little effect on the cost to the government. The changes to the Agricultural Products Board is a case in point. The board members were all public officials who are paid and will continue to be paid. The Agricultural Products Board being merged will not reduce the cost of government one iota. Neither I suspect will the effects on the Canadian Commercial Corporation, because the way this bill is written reminds me of the cash advance legislation of some years ago wherein the government tried to get out of the cash advance business but has been in it ever since. It could not get out of it.

While it may make the government feel better about changing the make-up and the facial expressions with the paint and the powder, I do not see any effective change in the cost of government with these changes.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, I am joining in the debate today at this particular stage of the bill to voice my objection about a specific clause of Bill C-93. That objection is to the part II of the bill which would effectively dismantle the ECBC, the agency in Atlantic Canada in Cape Breton Island which has been primarily responsible for economic diversification on that particular island.

As a Cape Bretoner I certainly understand better than most in this Chamber the difficult time Cape Bretoners and indeed people in eastern Nova Scotia have had for most of the second half of the century in dealing with economic and industrial diversification.

Cape Breton Island held great promise in the past and I hope in the future will hold great promise again. The island was developed primarily for its mineral resources and its location. It is very close to the European markets. We had—and I underline had—rich fishing grounds. We had a vibrant steel industry at the turn of the century. We did not have one steel mill; we had more than one, we had two steel mills. We had one in Sydney and one over on the north side.

In the early part of the century we also had enormous exploitation of a valuable energy resource: the coal resource.

The island has been populated by a whole hodge-podge of individuals who have come from other places looking for a better life. Many of them have come from Scotland and moved over here in a number of different migrations. A lot of people of Acadian descent live on the island up in Chéticamp and down in Isle Madam. We have the Irish.

We have almost every mix of individual that late in the last century and early in this century came over to take advantage of the jobs that were being created in industrial Cape Breton down in the coal fields, in the steel mills and also on the seas fishing.

Cape Breton has been in decline perhaps longer than any other industrialized part of this country. Cape Breton held such promise. Going way back, the fortress of Louisbourg was established and is still down there and has been re-created. It was one of the first areas of Canada that was populated because it held great promise. For many centuries new Canadians have found their fortune in Canada by working the resources of that great island.

The people are a strong people. They come from strong stock. They do not seek to take from society; they just seek to work. That is all they want to do. They want to make a living, contribute, raise their families and they want their families to perhaps have better opportunities than they had.

My father was a coal miner. He is retired now. We grew up in the town of New Waterford where I guess everybody was equally as poor. We did not realize we were poor until we grew up and moved away and said that gee, by anybody else's standards we were poor. However, we were pretty rich because we had the right value system. We had a value system that had evolved down on that island because of economic hardship, because of adversity.

It was a mentality that said individuals living down there had to rely on each other. If you did not rely on each other you were not going to survive. That is because in the early part of the century the Nova Scotia provincial governments and the federal government allowed the resources on Cape Breton Island to be exploited.

British firms came in and set themselves up. They bought the coal industry down there. They had the rights to the coal and kept the people in collar as they would say in Newfoundland. We had the company store, the only place you could get credit. They owned the houses, the public utilities and the water system. They owned everything. In short, to try to get enough money to raise your family you were literally owned by the coal company.

The strikes came in the early part of this century and blood was spilled on the streets down in New Waterford during one of the strikes. Bill Davis was shot during a strike and killed by the army which had been called in to quell the disturbance and put people back where they wanted to put them.

Cape Bretoners have grown to be a strong people. We do not want welfare. We do not seek to have anything other than the ability to eke out a living on that island.

In the sixties the coal industry was in great difficulty. The markets were gone. The British companies that owned the coal industry had squeezed every last penny out of it to ship somewhere else. It was not reinvested in that island and the industry was shutting down.

The Hon. Allan MacEachen, who used to be a member of this place and is now a senator in the other place, introduced a bill in this House. The bill was the Cape Breton Development Corporation Act. At that point in time there were two reasons for it.

One was to try to rehabilitate what was left of the coal industry on Cape Breton Island. Liberals of that time felt they had a fundamental responsibility through policy and through legislation to try to equalize the wealth of this country. It is a principle we still believe in.

• (1230)

One part of it was the coal division which was to either phase out or rehabilitate what we could and the second division, which was the one that held most promise I would have thought, was the industrial development division.

The industrial development division was going to attempt to diversify industry on the island so that we would not rely just on king coal for our economic life line. The Cape Breton Development Corporation worked well. There was a lot of federal investment and I underline investment—it was not money that was thrown away—that was put into the coal industry.

Outside of my home town of New Waterford we had the Lingan mine open, the first new mine opened there in decades. Then we had the Prince mine on the north side and the Lingan-Phalen mine. We had development into the Duncan-Morien coal seam, about $55 million to $60 million in developmental work went into that particular coal seam and again it held great promise.

Times have changed and Cape Breton seems to have been born under a cloud. The cloud is continued economic uncertainty. It seems that almost everyone who tries to go in and to do it right just adds to the problem. I suspect perhaps that is one of the prices we pay for living on that piece of real estate. It is a beautiful piece of property by anyone's standards and has probably some of the finest people that one would ever meet anywhere in the world. We are used to the adversity.

Instead of allowing the Cape Breton Development Corporation the resources so that it could continue the diversification of industry on that island, the government sought to destroy it after it came to power. In 1986 it announced that it was going to create this thing called the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency. I remember it well. I was back in Nova Scotia at that time. The government said this was going to be the panacea. The Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency was going to be new money. It was not going to take from anything that had already been put in place. It was $1.05 billion in new money. It was going to be a new future for the people of Atlantic Canada and would take away nothing from the other commitments that the government already had made.

No less than the Prime Minister himself said that in Halifax when the announcement of this new dawn for Atlantic industrial development came about. However the government was starting down a slippery slope. The slippery slope was the dismantling of every agency of special economic development in Atlantic Canada. Quite frankly ACOA has been a disaster.

When I was critic for that agency I used to try to temper my criticisms, hoping that the basic structure could be saved. I am of the opinion now that it is probably not the case. ACOA has been prone to more disasters economically than anything we have seen in eastern Canada ever. Political interference has been alleged in many of these spectacular collapses that we have in Atlantic Canada.

After years of this government dismantling systems that we had in place, what do we have? We have Cape Breton Island with 21 per cent unemployment. We have Sysco with about 450 employees. We have the Lingan colliery about to close down. We have problems with Lingan–Phalen. We have fish plants in Cape Breton that are closing. We have an island in despair.

This bill seeks to take it even further. The government was not content to do away with the industrial development division of Devco and put it under the ECBC. Now it is completing the circle in this bill. It is completing the loop that it set out on a few years ago and it is destroying this special agency to deliver special assistance for a special problem in the place that I come from and that is Cape Breton Island.

If the government was going to do away with this agency and it was putting proposals on the table to try to do things better so that the good people of Cape Breton Island, my fellow Cape Bretoners, could have some hope from these economic policies, then I would sit down, I would debate and I would listen. What the government has done is complete the loop. It has done something that I did not think was ever possible and that is, after eight years of government policy, try to break the spirit of the great people of Cape Breton Island. Therefore, I will not be supporting this bill.

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, I congratulate my colleague from Dartmouth who was talking about the Cape Breton Development Corporation. I thought as he spoke, what an excellent example of how a government is out of touch. If you read the bill before us, you will find that the explanatory note indicates the reason the Cape Breton Development Corporation is being folded into ACOA is that the purposes of the development corporation have been served.

If you go back to what those purposes were at the time of the inception of that corporation, you will find that they try to address the very substantial unemployment situation in Cape Breton. The unemployment rate at the time the corporation was established by the government was of the order of 16 per cent. Now I understand it is of the order of 23 to 25 per cent.

I use this by way of example because members will be aware that Cape Breton is not exactly in my bailiwick in terms of constituency, but it is in my area of interest in the sense that those people, like the people whom I directly represent here, are hurting because of the unfair measures of this government. I use this as just the latest example of that.

Here is a case where a region of the country with an unemployment rate of 23 to 25 per cent is being told, in print, by the government that there is no longer any need for the agency that was set up initially to address the unemployment situation.

It is worth looking at the title of this particular bill, Bill C–93, an act to implement certain government organization provisions of the budget tabled in the House of Commons on February 25, 1992. February 25, 1992 is almost a year to the day.

We are here a year later discussing the measures that were announced by the Minister of Finance at that time. That admission is itself a fairly revealing commentary on this government, on the mind set of this government. It is the latest proof, I say to the minister, that this administration holds Parliament itself in contempt, in much the same way that it holds the people of Canada in contempt.

We now know that the much repeated example of the 85 per cent of Canadians who said in every way possible, through letters, through petitions, through public protests, in every way available to them, they were unalterably opposed to the goods and services tax. Yet the government proceeded to implement that very unfair and very unpopular tax. It is another indication that this government holds people in contempt, holds the electorate in contempt, has no respect for the concerns, for the opinions, for the views of Canadians across this country.

Here we are, a year later, about to get yet another budget from this administration, I suppose, though what that will do I do not know. It has already had eight or so of them and we are still in pretty much of a stew, indeed I think the stew is bigger and worse than ever before. We are about to get another budget from this administration, and still we find ourselves wading through the measures of the last.

Why is that? The answer is simple. You know the answer, Mr. Speaker. The answer is because this Parliament has not sat as it should have, because of the long periods when we have been out of this Chamber.

• (1240)

The government, because of its contempt for this Chamber, has not even seen fit to do the housekeeping and get its legislation through the House. We find ourselves a full year later trying to do what ought to have been done many months before.

Since it has been so long since this budget was brought down, almost a full year, it is worth reminding ourselves of some of the things that are in this budget. One of them is the tax measure whereby the government would reduce the personal income surtax. Nobody can knock a reduction in taxes.

With this government there is always a but. Even with this reduction the government managed to get it wrong. The government managed to show its hand. The government managed to treat unfairly the people who needed a reduction most.

Look at the table which is included in the budget documents entitled "Impact of Surtax Reduction". A family of four with two adults and two children and an income is $15,000 a year will get a reduction of $2 in the budget year.

For the full year 1993 the income tax deduction, because of this measure, is $8 for a family of four with an income of $15,000.

A family of four with an income of $100,000 will get an income tax reduction of $442. That one example is an indication of where this government's commitment, thinking and bias is. It is not with the ordinary people of this country.

The budget which we have now had for just about a year has failed most miserably on the issue of job creation. There is a crying need in this country right now for an administration, a government worthy of the name to address the number one issue. The number one issue identified in the polls as recently as last week is the need for employment generation.

While this government's policies are driving jobs out of the country and causing the permanent closure of plants right, left and centre we see nothing whatsoever that would replace those jobs. We do not see this government taking any serious initiatives or efforts to replace some of those jobs to get some of the 1.5 million jobless Canadians back to work.

I recall when this administration was in opposition its members made a great big fuss in 1982 because the unemployment numbers across the country had hit the 1 million mark. They launched a great campaign. The Minister of Forestry was part of that campaign. They launched a great campaign saying how scandalous it was that a full million people were without jobs across the country.

I say to him that 10 years later the figure is up to 1.5 million.

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Mr. Speaker, as we have heard many times this morning, Bill C–93 is 84 pages long. You would think it was an economic program for the 1990s. In the 10 minutes I have I would like to suggest that it does exceedingly little in terms of making the Government of Canada more efficient and more protective of Canadian taxpayers' money.

For example, as you know there are dozens of departments. There are still something like 350 federal Crown corporations and agencies. The whole federal government shrieks to be streamlined; shrieks to be more efficient and more sensitive to Canadians. This bill will do very little to streamline the Government of Canada and save much needed money, scarce tax dollars for better purposes.

Part I of the bill talks about, and I quote from the note in the government's bill: "The purpose of this part is to wind up the Agricultural Products Board and transfer its function to the Minister of Agriculture and to the Agricultural Products Co-operative Marketing Act". That is part 1 of the bill.

Part II says and I quote: "The purpose of this part is to wind up the Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation and transfer its function to the staff of the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency" and so on throughout the bill.

In other words, the government will take what appear to be stand alone agencies now and push them under the umbrella of some other existing agency.

I would like to deal with part III in the few minutes I have which purports to: " wind up the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council and transfer its functions and its staff to the Canada Council, and transfer certain functions and staff to the Department of External Affairs concerned with the promotion of Canadian culture abroad to the Canada Council. Canada Council will be renamed the Canada Council for the Arts and for Research in the Social Sciences and Humanities to reflect its expanded functions".

There are six parts in the bill and they all do similar things. There has been a uniform outrage from people across the country about what the part I just referred to would do: the merger of the Canada Council and the academic funding boards.

I would like to quote from a letter although I will not name the person because I do not have permission. The person is at the University of Alberta and I am sure that she speaks for academics right across Canada. A part of her letter to the Prime Minister reads as follows: "I write with regard to the legislation affecting the merger of that council with programs from external affairs and with the Canada Council. The proposed merger of these three organizations has been effected without consultation with the communities of artists and scholars involved, nearly all of whom are opposed to it.

They are opposed for good practical reasons that are historically borne out. The scholarly and the artistic communities shared the first Canada Council when it was initially established and learned how inoperative that arrangement was. This legislation proposes to reverse the separation of the councils that was initially proposed to solve a problem.

It represents a step backward into the problems we had previously stepped out of; problems created by the very basic differences between the work of cultural production in the performing of visual arts and scholarly research in the humanities and social sciences".

Finally she says: "Concerns of the research community about this merger are many. They include the failure of the present legislation to guarantee continued separate funding for the research and performing arts divisions of the new council. The failure of the legislators to consult the community of council users and the possibility—even likelihood given the description of the new council—the council's governing board will include significant members of patronage appointments with little knowledge of the arts or of scholarly research".

She asks for a reply from the Prime Minister. We will all wait with interest to see what the Prime Minister says particularly with respect to what his government has done to the academic community, to the teaching community and to equip young Canadians to compete in an emerging new world economy.

I do not have the time to go into it in detail, but I would just like to make three points that university teachers have made about post-secondary educational funding and federal research and development.

As my colleague said, this is what this group of dinosaurs opposite has done to the Canadian economy and young people in Canada since 1986. First of all, between 1986 and 1993 the established programs funding cutbacks will amount to $4.7 billion. That affects a lot of young people. That affects a lot of daughters and sons of a lot of members of Parliament and of course many other Canadians who are seeing post-secondary education suffer deeply at the hands of the members opposite. While they cut back $4.7 billion for post-secondary education and other programs including social programs, they have $4.4 billion available to purchase 50 submarine chasing helicopters.

What kind of priorities do these people opposite in this House have? Somebody pointed out that by not spending $4.4 billion on the submarines about 75 times as many jobs would be created if used in other more rational, more sane and more twentieth century methods.

Second, for the Tories to say that there is no money for post-secondary education when they almost instantly find the $4.4 billion I referred to for the submarine chasing helicopters is self-evident nonsense.

Third, why not institute tax credits to encourage our private sector to invest in basic research?

These people present themselves as bringing this bill before us to save taxpayers' money and make government more efficient but they have done no such thing since they took office. Canada's public debt is now about $665 billion and our foreign debt is about $300 billion. Not all of it has been hoisted on the backs of Canadians by this unloved government opposite. It is true that provincial governments have done it and the private sector has incurred debts.

A point was made recently by somebody in the private sector about the rapid deterioration in the deficit and debt to GDP ratios. In 1975 the total debt of the federal and provincial governments was 29 per cent of GDP. For those opposite, GDP means gross domestic product. In 1993 it has been estimated that the total debt in Canada will be at 96 per cent of GDP.

When will the IMF arrive in Canada? When will Japanese or Swiss investors stop buying our bonds? When will those opposite stop increasing the debt on the backs of Canadians by approximately $80 million to $100 million a day. Every 24 hours that go by, Mr. Speaker, you, your children and my children become further indebted by these people who constantly present themselves as being paragons of fiscal orthodoxy and fiscal concern.

It is like President Reagan who came into office saying he was going to fight the deficit and stop spending and borrowing money. I believe when he came into office the United States national debt was in the order of $700 billion. Today, at the end of the Reagan-Bush period of spend and borrow the U.S. federal debt is now in the order of about $4 trillion. Similarly these people opposite came into office saying they were going to fight the deficit and fight the debt. They have more than doubled the national debt of this government; $30 billion deficits through year after year after year. I will bet that if there is anybody on the other side who is prepared to get up to try to defend this bill, they will get up and say that they have been fighting the deficit and trying to protect the Canadian taxpayer. It is all a lot of nonsense, as is this bill.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I see that I only have about five minutes. I would just like to continue where my colleague left off on this particular bill.

As we know, this is primarily a machinery of a government piece of legislation. That means that the officials, under the name of efficiency, are trying to reorganize and make these government units more efficient. From that particular point, I support any effort by the government to try to make service to the public more efficient. I think it is incumbent upon all of us in this House to encourage the government to try to review various agencies, departments of government and Crown corporations to make sure that they are in fact meeting the public policy objective they were originally targeted to achieve.

The problem I have when we bring forward bills like this to the House of Commons is that they seem to take away from the real problem that is happening in our country out there. That is the deep pain that people are going through right now. We need legislation in this House that deals with putting people back to work.

I want to refer specifically to a bill we had in here last week, the Small Businesses Loans Act, where we on this side of the House co-operated with the government, put the bill through the House in one day and urged the government to bring it to committee so we can bring in some witnesses. We can then return that bill to the House and get it into third reading and pass it so that the 900,000 small businesses in this country that could or might be eligible to use the Small Businesses Loans Act can use it. That is where the real source and hope for new job creation lies in this country.

Overall, this is an omnibus bill in which we are putting all these various agencies of government together and transforming them and reorganizing them. Obviously, even if we did have some amendments here, the government probably would not accept them. It very rarely does. However, I am hoping that when we get through this particular piece of legislation we will get something back on the table that is more relevant in terms of the economy.

This is the kind of debate in this House today that really causes a lack of respect for the institution. Most Canadians do not even understand the purpose of these agencies and to exacerbate or prolong the debate is really not productive when it does not seem relevant to the real priorities which most Canadians feel we should be addressing at this point.

I wanted to mention, for example, part III of this particular bill where the government is winding up the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council and transferring its functions and staff to the Canada Council. There was really no need for the government to make that machinery of government change.

This really was not going to improve the efficiency. One of the things that happens when you make all of these machinery of government changes or when you move these various divisions around is that quite often the effect it has on morale in a negative way outweighs the benefit that the government may attempt to achieve.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): It being one o'clock I do now leave the chair until two o'clock pursuant to Standing Order 24(2).

The House took recess at 1 p.m.

NORTH AMERICAN FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, Quebec supports the federal government on the North American free trade agreement.

"The Government of Quebec is on the whole favorable to NAFTA," said the Liberal minister for international affairs, John Ciaccia, as he made public a 90-page study entitled Quebec and the North American Free Trade Agreement.

The authors of the study say that Mexico's inclusion in the free trade area will not fundamentally upset the economic parameters that Quebec producers, exporters and investors must consider.

As far as agriculture is concerned, Quebec is pleased that NAFTA will not affect the Canadian supply management system for eggs, dairy products and poultry. The study also points out that Mexico offers attractive possibilities for producers of dairy cattle and bovine genetic material.

The new trade agreement respects Quebec legislation on the professions, consumer protection and financial services. Also, Quebec's language policy is not affected.

THE DISABLED

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, last week the NDP premier of Ontario was handing out hundreds of billions of dollars for roads, sewers and subways. This is the same premier, the same NDP government that says it has no money for a program to train 100 people with disabilities for skilled employment as electronic technicians.

This cost-shared program of training, job placement and follow-up would repay its costs in just 30 months. Yet it keeps getting bounced from minister to minister in Toronto while people with disabilities willing and anxious to work are kept poor and dependent.

Perhaps NDP colleagues from Thunder Bay, Beaches—Woodbine, Spadina and Nickel Belt think it is just fine that the NDP government has money for pavement and pipes but not for people. Or maybe they can explain why Bob Rae and his government do not seem to believe that Canadians with disabilities deserve the same chance as anyone else to have their own job and earn their own income.

SOFTWOOD LUMBER

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, beginning June 1, 1993 the European Community will require that all exports of softwood lumber to the European Community be either pasteurised or kiln dried.

This action will dramatically affect exports of coniferous material including our manufacture of lumber and also all our manufactured products shipped in packing crates, packing cases, drums and any kind of lumber.

The industry believes that the reasons for this restriction are not legitimate and amount to technical trade barriers which will impact a great deal of our exports to Europe including lumber and other products.

This initiative is a foreign government initiative and not supported by the industry in related European countries.

The industry is calling on the Minister for International Trade, the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Minister of Forestry to give this issue the highest priority. It is asking for an extension of the deadline to allow its arguments to be heard in the short term and a total removal of these restrictions in the long term.

WINNIPEG WATER SUPPLY

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, many Manitobans are concerned and disappointed that new exploration for gold is being allowed in Shoal Lake, Ontario, Winnipeg's drinking water supply.

The commitment to do an environmental assessment of any future mine development should the exploration prove positive is not good enough. Personally, I take the view that the time has long passed when mining in the water supply of 600,000 people should be considered at all.

The conflict between Manitoba and Ontario on this issue points out the crying need for a national safe drinking water act, something the federal government has promised for years but never delivered, despite numerous attempts by individual members such as myself, the member for Skeena and the member from Beaches to encourage such action through private members' bills.

I call on the government to bring forward draft legislation in this area and in the meantime to look at whatever other ways might exist for it to intervene in this interprovincial dispute that is pitting short-term economic goals in one province against the long-term health of another.

TOBACCO SMUGGLING

Mr. Gilles Bernier (Beauce): Mr. Speaker, tobacco smuggling has taken on huge proportions in Canada. Over the years, the provincial and federal governments have dramatically increased taxes, which makes Quebecers and Canadians obtain their supplies on the black market and thus break the law.

I ask the Government of Canada to take the initiative of meeting representatives of the Quebec government to reassess the whole tobacco taxation system and recover the governments' revenue shortfall, because the public rightly feels exploited.

The governments know that some native bands are responsible for smuggling tobacco, liquor and drugs. Astronomical amounts of money are involved. It seems that organized crime which provides some outlaw groups with millions of dollars is tolerated. When will these people pay their taxes like any other citizen of Canada and Quebec?

Smuggling is in federal jurisdiction. The authorities and RCMP should thoroughly investigate these illegal activities. Ending all this illegal traffic on certain reserves may remove their opportunity for investing in the Charlevoix casino. Is that the way to launder dirty money?

JUSTICE

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I rise today in support of the 11th report of the Standing Committee on Justice and the Solicitor General.

The committee recommended that the definition of serious harm be extended from severe physical injury or severe psychological damage to include any permanent or long-term disability, disfigurement or significant reduction in the quality of life.

These changes would reflect the serious harm done to victims of violent crimes under the age of 18 who must be protected from dangerous offenders. I urge the Solicitor General to accept these recommendations and to bring forth appropriate amendments.

I also urge the Solicitor General to bring forth amendments to make the current system of dangerous offender applications less complicated and less likely to be plea bargained away.

Such amendments would include allowing a judge to bring forth an application and allowing Crown counsel to introduce such applications for persons convicted of violent crimes who are known to be high risk or repeat offenders.

To the Solicitor General I say, enough talk. Canadians and their families demand action.

SMALL BUSINESSES LOANS ACT

Mr. Ken James (Sarnia—Lambton): Mr. Speaker, few in this House have doubted the need for reform of the Small Businesses Loans Act.

Growth of our small businesses is being hindered by limited access to loan capital. Last week the suspicion was reinforced by the comments of the director general of the small business office of the Department of Industry, Science and Technology. Mr. Ian Donald was reported in The Globe and Mail as saying that the banks are still hesitant to lend to small firms.

This statement reaffirms that today's entrepreneurs are indeed being squeezed by a reluctance to provide start-up cash and operating and expansion capital. It also points to the necessity of extensive changes to the Small Businesses Loans Act.

What concerns me is that the amendments to the SBLA in Bill C-99 do not yet address the problem of capital access while still leaving the program affordable to its applicants. Further changes must be made to this bill at committee or report stage.

We cannot lose sight of the fact that the growth of a number of our small businesses and the creation of new jobs for a number of Canadians in this sector are counting on these changes.

CN RAIL

Mr. Réginald Bélair (Cochrane—Superior): Mr. Speaker, on February 5 The Thunder Bay Times-News published an article predicting the eventual closure of CN's north line in northern Ontario.

It is totally irresponsible for the Thunder Bay—Atikokan NDP MP to fuel such speculation and to spread such gloom and doom. Has he thought for just one moment of the tremendous negative impact such a statement has had on the lives of the workers, the citizens and the communities along that line?

Hornepayne is a railroad town totally dependent on CN for its survival. Haavaldsrud's Lumber used the CN line to transport 12,000 tons of wood chips to Thorold last year as well as one-third of its lumber production. Weldwood of Longlac ships 80 per cent of its products on this north line.

Those affected demand that CN categorically deny the closure of this line and dissipate any uncertainty surrounding the issue. Further isolating these communities spells despair and disaster.

SOFTWOOD LUMBER

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, the European Community is at it again, this time using technical barriers to keep our softwood lumber in any form out of its markets.

If left unchecked, this provision would become effective June 1, 1993 and would result in the loss of $1.4 billion in trade. I urge the Minister for International Trade and the Minister of Forestry to continue strong representation on behalf of the softwood lumber exporters to derail this very restrictive practice. It cannot be allowed to succeed at the expense of our own Canadian industry.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Nic Leblanc (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, several labour groups, as well as the farmers represented by the UPA, have been working for a long time to set up an ethanol plant in Varennes, in the labour minister's riding.

This project is very important for the region's economic development. It could create more than 300 jobs directly and indirectly and increase the market for corn growers in the region south and east of Montreal by 10 to 15 per cent.

• (1410)

In addition, ethanol is a product with a good future. It reduces environmental pressures and ethanol production is growing very rapidly in Ontario and Western Canada with the federal government's help.

I ask the Minister of Labour and member for Verchères to act quickly so that this project can be carried out as soon as possible.

CANADA SCHOLARSHIPS PROGRAM

Mr. Scott Thorkelson (Edmonton—Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, the Canada Scholarships Program has been a tremendous success. Thousands have received scholarships which are divided equally between men and women. One must have exceptional marks to qualify and maintain high grades to continue to receive the scholarships every year.

We have an opportunity through this program to measure educational results across the country by requiring applicants to take a standardized test.

I urge the minister of science of technology to consider holding tests for applicants. This will give us as Canadians an indication of how well our educational systems are performing across the country.

GUATEMALA

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, 1,600 Canadians asked me to present a petition to the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

The petition asked her first to urge the Government of Guatemala to negotiate in good faith with the real representatives of the Guatemalan people, including the Maya, to end the civil war.

Second, it asked that Canada tell all Latin American governments that we insist on having Guatemala registered under item 12, grave and systematic human rights violations, at the next meeting of the United Nations Human Rights Commission.

On January 20 I saw 2,500 Guatemalan refugees returning from Mexico in peace, the first of 45,000 yet to come. This happened partly through the pressure of the Guatemalan people and partly through negotiations by the Governments of Canada, France, Sweden and Mexico.

I commend Canada's Secretary of State for External Affairs for Canada's part in this good beginning. I urge her to continue support for the refugee return peace negotiations with the URNG and United Nations monitoring under item 12.

HUNGER

Mr. Joe McGuire (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, there is something radically wrong when we have people suffering from hunger in this country and we do not have a delivery system to get free food to them when it becomes available.

It is even worse when we have people actually dying of starvation in other countries and we cannot come up with a delivery system to take free food from Canada and put it into the hands and stomachs of these people.

The case in point involves 2 million hundredweight of P.E.I. and New Brunswick potatoes being diverted from the tablestock market through a federal-provincial agreement. These potatoes must be removed from the regular market.

Farmers in P.E.I. and New Brunswick do not want these potatoes to go to waste. They would very much like to see them used to alleviate hunger in Canada and abroad. Twenty million 10-pound bags of potatoes is a lot of potatoes and would feed a large number of people.

I would ask the federal government to use the resources at its disposal to make sure that as many of these potatoes as possible find their way into the plates of the hungry and starving in Canada and abroad rather than simply being allowed to rot and to be ploughed down in the fields.

POLITICS

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, clearly concerns about racism, sexism and anti-Semitism can be relative in politics.

Everyone knows that the member for St. John's West has a history of thoughtless, even tasteless loquaciousness masquerading as humour. He is an easy target even for arrows from within glass houses.

Within such a house resides Jean Pelletier who, uncondemned, counsels racial exclusion. Also there now is his friend Camil Samson who accused Jewish abortionists of trying to destroy the people of Quebec while elevating Hitler's economic policies.

Meanwhile in the Victoria men's room of the same glass house the defender of a rapist is in while two female executive members are out in the sexist cold.

The Liberal house is the house of glass; it is silent within, with an interesting cast.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, this month the government missed an important deadline. By February the government had promised to complete studies of the first 33 chemicals on the priority list of the Canadian Environmental Protection Act.

Only 5 of the 33 chemicals have been assessed. In other words, the majority of chemicals have not been assessed for their toxicity as planned.

Every day 1.5 tonnes of persistent toxic chemicals enter Lake Ontario. Therefore, the fact that many of these chemicals are still to be assessed and regulated is of extreme urgency. The government will not meet its own goal in the green plan where it promises to virtually eliminate discharges of persistent toxics in the Great Lakes and the St. Lawrence River. Environment and human health are endangered because this government fails to keep its promises.

DANGEROUS OFFENDERS

Mr. Lee Richardson (Calgary Southeast): Police forces across Canada are to be commended for publishing the names and photographs of dangerous offenders who are scheduled to re-enter the community. Canadians are entitled to learn the identities of those individuals who are considered to pose an extraordinary risk to public safety. My constituents are urging the government to take action in ensuring that the public is made aware of the identities of violent criminals and of young offenders.

I am encouraged by the initiative taken by local law enforcement bodies and urge the government to provide whatever co-operation is necessary to help protect our neighbourhoods.

NORTH AMERICAN FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Prime Minister a question. Yesterday, the Minister for International Trade met with his Mexican counterparts and after the meeting, he did not say clearly what the government's position is and suggested that the government might proceed with the North American Free Trade Agreement without waiting for the results of negotiations with the Americans on labour, the environment and even agricultural problems.

Would the Prime Minister not agree to tell his minister that we should not proceed with the agreement in this House unless and until we know the results of the negotiations with the United States on the parallel accords that President Clinton wants?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, President Clinton already said, as I repeated yesterday, that the free trade agreement was a stand-alone document and that supplementary agreements would not in any way change the substance of the primary agreement. Supplementary agreements will be negotiated with Canada and Mexico in due course without affecting the accord itself. This means that we can proceed without compromising anyone's principles.

As for my friend's question, I would point out the position stated yesterday by Quebec's minister for international affairs, the Hon. John Ciaccia. He warned those like the federal Liberal leader who want to renegotiate portions of the agreement or include new chapters in it. Mr. Ciaccia thinks that this might endanger this agreement which Quebec needs. Not only Quebec but Canada needs it. I think that Mr. Ciaccia, a former deputy minister of the opposition leader, was right and it would be time for him to listen to him again.

[English]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the minister of external affairs for Mexico said that this accord is perfect, that they will never look at reopening any element of it and more or less said that they did not take seriously the problems that President Clinton and Vice-President Gore mentioned on the environment.

Does the Prime Minister not realize at this time that this take it or leave it attitude will lead to a big problem and that it would be wise for this government not to rush into the House of Commons with a proposition? We should know exactly what the position of the American administration will be before taking the time of Canadians on this subject.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we do know the position of the American administration. The position of the American administration was given in a statement by the President of the United States on Friday, February 5. In response to a question I indicated, and I quote: "The President has indicated many times that he is going to sign the NAFTA agreement as it is. But he proposes to bring in supplemental agreements with Mexico, particularly in regard to some of the points that he has mentioned that do not impact on the NAFTA agreement as concluded. President Clinton said: "That's right".

• (1420)

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, President Clinton said very clearly at the end of his intervention that he believes he can do that. He also said that he has to have included some parallel accord. It was exactly what was said last week by Mr. Kantor, who said that the administration will not present the deal to the American congress until it has these parallel accords.

Would it not be wise for this government to know what will happen in the United States before forcing a vote in this House, subject perhaps to coming back later to amend the legislation because there will be some supplementary agreements and the House will have to vote yes or no on them as well.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition says that President Clinton went on to say something—

Ms. Copps: No, you don't.

Mr. Mulroney: Of course he said no such thing. I will read the transcript for my hon. friend. After, President Clinton said: "That is right". He then said: "And I might add that the Prime Minister's administration in Canada has had a strong record on the environment".

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

An hon. member: It makes sense to me.

Mr. Mulroney: Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition asks a question suggesting that the answer is there and indeed it is. I did not mean to offend the opposition, but it gets better.

Then President Clinton said: "Something that we want to try to beef up in the supplemental agreement, and that Canada would be, more or less in line with the United States in terms of its impact on any supplemental labour accord we might reach. We certainly intend to work with them. After all, this is a three way agreement, not a two way agreement". Then the President said: "But I still believe, as I said many weeks ago, that we can negotiate agreements without reopening the NAFTA itself".

PEACEKEEPING

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence.

About one hour ago, the minister announced that Canadian troops would be redeployed into Sarajevo. She added that there would be no new mandate, no air cover, no new equipment and no contingency plans. Yet she maintained that: "All possible measures had been taken to ensure the safety of the Canadian peacekeepers".

Considering that in the last few months 28 UN peacekeepers have been killed in Bosnia-Hercegovina, can the minister explain what kind of measures will be taken to ensure that our troops are not being put at undue risk?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, in making a very serious decision such as the one we made today to deploy the 2nd battalion of the Royal Canadian Regiment to an area just west of Sarajevo, we consulted and were advised by the senior members of the Canadian military as to the level of risk and its acceptability.

That is a technical question which requires a very high level of expertise. The Chief of the Defence Staff and those who work with him have advised the government that the level of risk in this new deployment is somewhat less than it was in Sarajevo, but it is considerable. We are pleased to say that the 2nd battalion of the Royal Canadian Regiment is perhaps one of the best equipped and able forces in that area of Yugoslavia at the time.

There will be a technical briefing on this deployment at 3.30 p.m. in conference room D at the Department of National Defence. I invite any members of this House who would wish to have more in depth information about the question, I think quite rightly raised by the hon. member, to attend that briefing and satisfy themselves as to the great care that went into making that decision.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, considering what the minister said and all the due consultations that have been taken, I want to quote to her a statement made by her colleague, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, on Sunday when she said: "I would like to see our troops take a more active role in terms of keeping the peace or peacemaking. I think it is important that we have clear roles of engagement and those would have to be further discussed with military people at the United Nations".

It appears that has not been done. If cabinet itself cannot speak with one voice on this issue, and there seems to be a confusion about the mandate, is it not about time that the government ensured that there is a full parliamentary debate and approval before committing our troops into these dangerous situations?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, what my colleague the hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs was referring to was that she would like to see the international community take those steps.

She and I had the opportunity to attend a very useful and interesting conference on these matters in Munich a week and a half ago where all of our colleagues in Europe in particular and our American counterparts were addressing themselves to the question of what the future would be of the international community in addressing aggression and in trying to make sure the situation such as that in Yugoslavia did not spread and did not destabilize the rest of the world.

This is all being done through the United Nations. There is absolute consensus on the part of the government, and I think probably all members of this House, that the challenge we face now as members of the international community is to define the rules and principles by which we will join with other countries in trying to stop aggression and trying to prevent the development of a world where no country feels safe on its own, where all countries feel they have to arm themselves to the teeth because the international community cannot act to protect them.

This is the challenge we face today and this government is committed to addressing that challenge.

NORTH AMERICAN FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

This government is well aware of the concerns of Canadians with regard to environmental sustainability yet the NAFTA contains no guarantees to ensure that market forces cannot erode environmental standards, standards that are designed to protect the health and safety of workers as well as protecting the environment.

It contains no guarantees with regard to a country which fails to establish and enforce such reasonable environmental standards, which has in essence a trade subsidy.

I ask this government how it can continue to give assurance to Canadians that the interest of multinational companies will not override the democratic rights of Canadians.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, much of the information conveyed to the House by my hon. friend is of course inaccurate in regard to the proposed treaty as it affects the environment. In fact NAFTA was the first international trade treaty to deal with the environment and there is much to commend it to my hon. friend.

The members of the NDP are complaining. The NDP minister for development from Saskatchewan, Mr. Dwain Lingenfelter, said: "Western Canada and agriculture probably have more to gain from NAFTA than any other part of Canada".

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, that was an interesting non-answer. The minister he is referring to came back, in fact, more determined to oppose NAFTA than he was before.

An hon. member: That is right. And he said so publicly.

Ms. Hunter: Will the Prime Minister give us his assurance of a parallel environmental accord? No parallel environmental accord can adequately address the concerns. Minimum acceptable environmental standards must be negotiated within NAFTA, not alongside it. We British Columbians have learned this to our sorrow.

Under the current trade deal, a conservation program that protected dwindling B.C. salmon stock was struck down as unfair to American trade.

My question is: If the government agrees to negotiate with the U.S. and Mexico a parallel accord, will it be negotiated in secret like NAFTA? Will it be a secret dispute settlement mechanism like NAFTA or will it be toothless, like it is now?

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I think it is important to challenge the assumptions on which the hon. member is basing her questions with which we have a fundamental difference.

I think it is important to stress to the hon. member that when the Americans talk about a parallel accord they are mostly focusing on border issues between Mexico and the United States. That is the perspective in which they examine this parallel accord.

Already in Canada we have an important number of similar agreements with the United States.

• (1430)

Furthermore, NAFTA is the greenest trade agreement ever signed. It is the first one after Rio, the first one to commit to sustainable development, the first one to recognize that international environmental agreements have precedence over the NAFTA agreement itself, the first environmental agreement to also recognize that countries will not lower their standards for the purposes of attracting investment. It is the first trade agreement that has successfully leveraged the creation of a North American commission on the environment, something that this government is very proud of.

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, Liberal and Tory economic priorities have already crippled the Canadian economy, causing massive unemployment and astronomical growth of the national debt.

This government is condemning Canada to an environmental deficit. What we have had so far is an in-house, secret environmental assessment.

I ask the minister. Where is the environmental assessment of NAFTA? When can Canadians trust this government to bring in real environmental concerns to this debate?

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I am glad the hon. member brought that issue up because it is the first time the federal government undertook to do an environmental assessment of a trade agreement, which was a precedent. This environmental assessment has already been made public.

Frankly, I do not know where the hon. member has been in so far as that issue is concerned because the environmental assessment has been made public.

I want to make another point that is extremely important in regard to this debate. The member is making the argument that a developing country should have tariffs imposed upon it if it does not meet certain environmental standards.

If the member chooses to pursue that argument, which I also understand is the line of argument of the Government of Ontario, Canada would then be breaking off trade with Bangladesh, Somalia and all the other developing countries in the world. I do not think that is in the interests of Canada, which is a trading nation.

PEACEKEEPING

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence.

The minister is aware that 25,000 people in eastern Bosnia are cut off in the town of Cerska while a UN convoy of food and medical supplies is parked on the side of the road just 20 miles away.

In Somalia we learned it was necessary to use force against the warlords to deliver supplies to the people most in need.

On Sunday the Secretary of State for External Affairs suggested that Canadian peacekeepers should take a more active role in the region.

Does the redeployment of the second battalion which she announced today mean that the government is considering military intervention as a possible solution to the standstill of humanitarian relief efforts?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the short answer to that question is no. The 2nd battalion of the Royal Canadian Regiment is being deployed on the basis of what we call a permissible environment, which means it will perform its task of attempting to deliver humanitarian aid only with the acquiescence and co-operation of the other forces that are there. We see no reason at this time to change that mandate.

I think the hon. member would agree that the circumstances in Bosnia-Hercegovina are very different from those in Somalia. We are hopeful, as a result of the clarification of the American position with respect to Bosnia-Hercegovina, that co-operation will be found. We will be able to fulfil our task of delivering much-needed aid to starving people in that region of the world.

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): My supplemental is for the same minister.

On Sunday the Secretary of State for External Affairs announced that she wanted our Canadian troops to take a more active role in peacekeeping and peacemaking and that the rules of the engagement be absolutely clear.

Today the Minister of National Defence makes a confusing commitment for an additional 1,200 troops without consulting Canadians through a debate in this House. Troops cannot do their job properly if they are not given a clear mandate and a clear mission. There is a confusing mandate coming from the secretary of state, the Prime Minister and the present minister.

Will the Minister of National Defence stand up in this House today and give the troops going there a clear mandate and a clear mission as to exactly what they are to do?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the only confusion appears to be in the mind of the hon. member.

The troops that have been redeployed today have been in that region since last November.

The original request from the United Nations to have them deployed in the Banja Luka area was not able to be fulfilled because our people were not able to get into that region. The United Nations has now asked us to redeploy in an area west of Sarajevo. We have accepted that engagement and our people are now on their way to fulfil that engagement.

Their mandate is very clear. There is not time in the context of Question Period to go into the details of it, but I would invite that hon. member to attend a technical briefing at the Department of National Defence at 3.30 p.m. today in which he could be advised of all of the specific aspects of that mission.

It is very explicit and I assure the House there is no confusion in the minds of the Canadian men and women who will be carrying it out.

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, a newspaper headline on November 3 reads: "Canada wrong to send troops to former Yugoslavia says general". In this article two generals serving in the Canadian forces questioned the manner in which we commit our troops to peacekeeping operations. Later, serious questions on command and control of peacekeepers were raised.

Can the minister still deny, as she did in Question Period yesterday, that serving generals are so concerned about this government's handling of peacekeeping commitments that they have seen fit to speak out in public?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am only aware of one general who has made a comment of that sort and that was the general from whom we took advice on the acceptability of the risk to our people who were serving in Sarajevo at the time.

I think it is important to point out that the assessment of risk, the assessment of the appropriateness of the deployment of our forces and their ability to carry out the missions is an assessment that is undertaken not by politicians, but by expert military advisers.

The government then decides on the basis of that expert military assessment whether it is consistent with our foreign policy objectives to deploy troops in that particular way.

We have always been extremely respectful of the advice of our military advisers. I am not aware of anyone wearing a uniform of the Department of National Defence who is not supportive of the decisions that we have made because they know that they are based on the very best military advice.

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, I think the minister has completely missed the point.

Clearly there is a problem with the way we commit Canadian troops operationally. Last fall the Chief of Defence Staff said that Canadian forces were stretched to the limit and that we could not sustain the current peacekeeping mission without additional resources. Two months later the new CDS said that reducing manpower was a defence priority. You cannot have it both ways. You cannot do more with less.

Will the minister recognize the reality of the serious situation and debate on the floor of the House of Commons Canada's involvement in peacekeeping and the manner in which we commit our troops?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I welcome not only a discussion of that very important issue in this House of Commons, but in Canada as a whole.

As I have indicated since I became Minister of National Defence, peacekeeping requires the participation of a highly-trained, well-equipped professional military. It is not simply a question of boy scouts with guns. It is an extremely serious enterprise.

We deploy in this particular enterprise the resources that are available to us. Canada now participates in peacekeeping operations in 15 locations around the world.

It is quite true that we cannot continue to accept engagements and I think that with the growing capability of the United Nations we will be asked to accept more engagements. Therefore, I would ask all members of this House to think very seriously about what is an appropriate level of the Canadian military, what is an appropriate level of the defence budget, how many of these kinds of engagements we can undertake, consistent with what Canadians are prepared to pay to support their defence establishment.

Those are the questions we have to address. They are questions for all Canadians to consider because I think all Canadians support the need to contribute to creating a stable world order. How big a role Canada should be playing is one which we all have to address.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Mr. Cid Samson (Timmins—Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister of employment.

The Canadian human rights commissioner has said that he is troubled by the possibility that Bill C-105 could put women who face sexual harassment at risk of losing their UI. Max Yalden is asking for the assurance that persons facing discrimination in the work place will not be disadvantaged in any way should they feel obliged on that account to leave their jobs.

The minister knows very well the problems caused by the lengthy appeal process which exists now. It is going to get worse with more appeals as a result of this bill.

How can the minister assure Mr. Yalden that claimants facing discrimination will not be disadvantaged in any way when the claimants are forced to live without income? Also they have the burden of having to prove that their case is real.

• (1440)

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, in my answer to Mr. Yalden I intend to say that Employment and Immigration Canada has a long history of dealing with such cases in a fair and sensitive manner.

The government and I will continue to deal fairly and sensitively with these important issues of sexual or other harassment. In the legislative process that lies ahead we will ensure that the legislation is demonstrably responsive to the concerns that are being raised.

Mr. Cid Samson (Timmins—Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate very much what the minister has said.

However I question his consultation process. We do not know who he is consulting and he does not seem to be listening to anybody during that consultation process.

In another article in The Ottawa Citizen today, we find another case where a woman wanted to leave her employment to be with her spouse in Ottawa. This woman is now in UI limbo because it has been over a year and her case has still not been heard.

How can the minister explain to us that the benefit of doubt will go to the claimant when clearly this is yet another case of someone wanting to join her spouse and is being denied benefits. Under the old system she lost a few weeks. Now she is going to lose everything. Is that fair?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, in the case to which the hon. member refers that person has sought a further review in the Federal Court of Appeal. Therefore it would be inappropriate for me to comment on it.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

Yesterday in responding to questions, the Prime Minister reminded the House of the government's record in appointing women to key government positions to advise this government on important matters of the day.

One of those women, a woman who all members of the House would acknowledge as an outstanding Canadian, has said of the proposed changes to the Unemployment Insurance Act: "I am very concerned. I am concerned about the consequences of the law and by the minister's stubbornness in not seeing those consequences".

Would the Prime Minister agree to listen to and act on the concerns of his own appointee, Senator Solange Chaput-Rolland and put an end to this act?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have the greatest of respect for the opinions of Senator Solange Chaput-Rolland.

She is a very distinguished member of the Senate. She has well developed opinions on matters of public policy, some of which I endorse and few of which I do not. That will not surprise my hon. friend.

The reforms being proposed by the Minister of Employment and Immigration deal fundamentally with a very simple matter. In this society with the fiscal problems this country has, is it appropriate that someone who quits his or her job without reason, without excuse and without provocation, continues to draw unemployment insurance benefits paid for by his or her fellow Canadians? That is the issue.

That action is not insurance against unemployment. That action might fall under some other social program that my hon. friend would want to propose but it does not follow that every person who quits his or her job is entitled to payment by his or her fellow Canadians. That is the issue before the House and I think we have made the proper and intelligent decision under the circumstances.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, Senator Chaput-Rolland, members of the government backbenches, certainly the opposition parties and many concerned Canadians understand something the Prime Minister does not, obviously.

Any Canadian who quits his or her job without just cause is already subject to a severe penalty today in this country. The real question the Prime Minister ought to address is: Is it appropriate in a country that has 1.6 million Canadians unemployed, and all the consequent misery for men, women and children in Canadian households, to battle unemployment by declaring war on unemployed Canadians?

Is that appropriate, or is it more appropriate to take measures to put Canadians back to work? Will the Prime Minister come to his better senses?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this is an astonishingly misleading statement by my hon. friend, a very misleading statement.

The fact of the matter is that Canada treats its unemployed citizens more generously than any other G-7 country. Now my hon. friend might wave.

An hon. member: Talk about the penalty.

Mr. Mulroney: Talk about the penalty. The penalty is the same, for example, as exists in New Zealand and as exists in France.

An hon. member: What penalty?

Mr. Mulroney: This is a self-inflicted difficulty of someone who without reason, without justification, decides he is going to quit his job.

An hon. member: It does not cost him a cent.

Mr. Mulroney: My hon. friend should be aware that in Canada, for example, we spend four times as much per capita on our unemployment insurance scheme as in the United States of America. It is so generous that there are some experts, including the House royal commission in Newfoundland, that suggested the present unemployment insurance scheme, as argued in Newfoundland, has distorted the ethic of the people of Newfoundland and Labrador and has added 2 percentage points—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Mulroney: That is an argument that has been made. It has added two full percentage points to the unemployment rate in Canada.

This country treats the unemployed with a level of generosity unmatched anywhere in the OECD, but we do not have an obligation in this country to provide someone who quits his job without reason, without provocation and without excuse with unemployment insurance paid for by fellow citizens. I think the decision of the Government of Canada has been an appropriate one.

[Translation]

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. Yesterday the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans said that it was only the four horsewomen of the Apocalypse who cared about the unemployment insurance issue but today we see that it is not only the four horsewomen who care. Even a senator appointed by the Prime Minister has said that she is truly concerned about the minister's proposals, worried about the legislation's consequences and by the minister's stubborn refusal to see those consequences.

If the minister will not listen to the opposition, is he ready today to listen to his colleague, Senator Chaput-Rolland?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have already answered that question. I have every respect for Senator Chaput-Rolland. Incidentally she once said that the Liberal Party's systematic obstruction of the GST in the House of Commons verged on imbecility. Would you go along with me on that?

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, if the Prime Minister rejects Senator Chaput-Rolland's concerns, is he ready to accept the very disturbing remarks of the Chief Commissioner of the Canadian Human Rights Commission, who said in connection with the proposed changes that he too was worried about the consequences for women who left their jobs because they were harassed?

If the Prime Minister denies the remarks of his colleague, Senator Chaput-Rolland, is he ready to endorse the concerns of Canada's chief commissioner for human rights?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated earlier in the other official language, I received a letter from Mr. Yalden, which I am answering today. In it, he asks for my reassurance that we are going to continue to make sure that we treat with sensitivity cases involving harassment or discrimination. My department has 40 years experience in dealing with such cases, we have always done so fairly and justly and we will continue to do so.

BILL C–43

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the government House leader.

He will note that some time ago a committee of the House and the Senate unanimously reported on an inquiry concerning Bill C–43 on the Order Paper and recommended that the Parliament of Canada Act be amended to deal with the conflict of interest of members of Parliament, the conflict of interest of ministers and others.

Is that report to be buried forever, or is the government going to follow that unanimous report and do something about the matter?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): No, Mr. Speaker, it is not going to be buried. Yes, we are going to bring it forward.

I am told by Department of Justice draft persons that it will be ready very soon. I think we will find that the bill reflects the consensus view of the all-party committee, and I hope that will be reflected in a willingness on the part of the opposition to treat the legislation expeditiously when it comes forward so we can get this important legislation in place.

TOBACCO SMUGGLING

Mrs. Lise Bourgault (Argenteuil—Papineau): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Revenue. The minister is well aware that cigarette smuggling in Canada has become a plague and a disgrace which profits organized crime with the complicity of thousands of citizens who act against their conscience to save a few dollars on a pack of cigarettes.

Can the minister confirm that a national conference on this issue was convened with his provincial counterparts and can he say what concrete measures have been taken so far by the federal government to end this scourge which tarnishes our reputation and weakens our ability as a country to enforce our laws?

[English]

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member will know that government's underlying policy as far as tobacco use is concerned is to try in every way, shape or form to reduce and eventually eliminate the use of tobacco products in this country.

We have taken cigarette smuggling, as a very serious issue. We have put in place numerous projects already, including joint efforts with the RCMP. We have increased personnel both at customs and RCMP. We have got tobacco manufacturers to put markings on tobacco products so that they can be tracked as they go through the distribution system in the United States.

Progress is being made, but we still have a long way to go. As far as the hon. member's question is concerned regarding a national conference, there are continuing discussions between the federal government and all the provinces. I know the Minister of Finance and his colleagues are going to be reviewing this matter in the very near future.

FISHERIES

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans.

Last month during the fishery committee meetings in Vancouver most partners agreed that for the aboriginal fishery strategy to succeed there must be river-wide agreement. On December 7 the minister announced that he would not proceed with the strategy unless he had river-wide agreement for a particular river system.

I ask the question I asked last week: Is the minister ready to announce that he has a river-wide agreement for any of B.C.'s major salmon rivers?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. gentleman should know, discussions are under way now with various aboriginal groups and others in British Columbia.

In connection with this issue I myself met about 10 or 12 days ago with all or most of the chiefs of aboriginal bands who live along the Fraser River. I intend to visit British Columbia again next week to meet with representatives of the commercial industry, the aboriginal groups, and the sport-fishing industry.

I intend to continue these meetings to have the stakeholders meeting together and trying to understand or understanding just what the aboriginal fisheries strategy is, that it is in the interest of everyone in the B.C. fishing industry that there should be stability, and that the issue should be dealt with calmly and rationally.

That is what I intend to do. I hope that before the fishing season opens we will indeed have a watershed agreement with reference to the Fraser River, but we do not have one yet.

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Mr. Speaker, one of the points made at the hearings was that there should be multi-party negotiations; all the users should be involved in these negotiations and discussions. Is the minister consulting with anyone other than the people he has mentioned?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, I have mentioned the commercial industry, which means the people representing the various gear types, the trollers, the seiners, the gill-netters. We have met with the representatives of the processing industry.

We are meeting with representatives of the aboriginal peoples. We are meeting with all kinds of representatives of the sport fishery. From time to time I have even met with representatives of the British Columbia government. We are setting up a process in which all these stakeholders will meet together on a regular basis.

I intend to write to the B.C. government to invite it to have a representative present so that we can find out exactly what its position is on these issues, just as we would like to know what the position of the NDP is on these issues. Is it supporting this policy or is it not? Is it going to continue—

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. He will know that Atlantic fishermen and plant workers are literally on the ropes because of the catch failures and quota cutbacks.

If I may say so, his handling of the problem has been haphazard. It has been unfair and in some cases it has been downright callous. For example, he blatantly excludes pockets of communities along Newfoundland's south and southwest coast and across the maritimes.

Will he now come up with an assistance package to help those who he has been neglecting for so long so that they can be properly compensated for their losses in income?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, surely the hon. gentleman is somewhat exaggerated in his criticism when he suggests that we have taken a haphazard or a callous approach.

Is it a callous approach of the government that we are spending in excess of $800 million on a compensation program in the northern cod area? Is it callous on the part of the government that we have come up with employment projects for people who do not come under the northern cod program at all? Was it callous on the part of the government when we came up with an ice compensation program costing $57 million a year or two ago when ice was the problem? Was it callous when we came up with the $500 million for the Atlantic fisheries adjustment program? Is that evidence—

Mr. Speaker: We are going to have to move on.

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, yes, I would say it is haphazard that he has paid out thousands of fishermen who now have to refund because of the haphazard nature of his policy and, yes, it is callous when he gave the ice compensation to somebody who got $60,000 in income on the fisheries last year.

On that ludicrous policy of licence cancellations I hear he has seen the light a bit, but why is he still being evasive and letting those people twist in the wind as it were? Why does he not tell us now that he is not after those people—

Mr. Speaker: Given the time, the questions and the answers do have to be co-operative.

Point of Order

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, the only people twisting in the wind are those who listen to the hon. gentleman and the jet stream that he is offering in these matters.

With respect to the licensing situation, I will be issuing a release today or tomorrow, certainly this week, which will explain exactly what we are attempting to do.

We are tackling problems in the Atlantic fishery that were left untackled by the hon. gentlemen opposite. In all their years in government they never have tackled these problems. We are tackling them.

Mr. Speaker: We will move on.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment.

There is a controversial project near Brookfield, Nova Scotia, concerning burning toxic waste in a cement plant. It will be the first time this has been done in Canada. People in the area are very concerned about their environment. I wonder what part the federal Department of Environment will play, and can the residents of Brookfield be confident their environment will not be damaged by this new process?

• (1500)

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I can report to the hon. member there is no disposition that presently allows the federal government to intervene directly in this process, but I do understand the provincial government has a process that has gone forward, that recommendations have been made to the provincial minister and that he will be following up on such recommendations soon.

I may add though that the federal government, through the Canadian Council of Ministers of the Environment and through Environment Canada, works in very close co-operation with the provinces in establishing minimum standards that apply throughout Canada for the disposition of similar toxic waste, which is exactly what Canadian people expect from us in terms of co-operation among all jurisdictions in the country in the area of the environment.

STEPHENSON INQUEST

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister of Canada and concerns the Stephenson inquest.

The Prime Minister will know that ordinary Canadians are flooding the Solicitor General's office with calls that he drop his hard line position with respect to the Stephensons' costs.

The coroner's jury, which represents a cross-section of independent ordinary Canadians, has recommended that the government pay at least a portion of the Stephensons' legal costs. This is no longer an issue of law alone but also one of compassion.

Will the Prime Minister intervene on behalf of the Stephensons, whose little boy was so brutally murdered, and instruct the Solicitor General to implement the jury's recommendation?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Justice, Attorney General of Canada and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, the Solicitor General, who is not here today, recognizes the seriousness of the situation in the Stephenson case. However, one must understand that particular problems are raised when people not legally involved in the case are represented by lawyers in court.

Requests have been considered by the provincial government. The Government of Canada has made an offer to the family and I believe that discussions are going on between the parties. While my colleague and I recognized the seriousness of such a situation, it must be understood that there are dozens, indeed hundreds, of coroner's inquests in Canada. We must therefore make sure that our involvement is fair and equitable for all cases throughout the country.

QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order, During Question

Period the Prime Minister in responding to my question made reference to the House report and I believe made reference to a distorted work ethic in Newfoundland.

I have to believe, in fact I am confident, that the Prime Minister did not mean to cast any aspersion on Newfoundland workers. As a former president of IOCC, the Iron Ore Company of Canada, and someone who employed hundreds if not thousands of Newfoundlanders, I am sure the Prime Minister would want to express his confidence that when Newfoundlanders have jobs they tackle those jobs with enthusiasm and energy. I would ask the Prime Minister to make very clear, so that nothing is misunderstood, that was his intention during his remarks in Question Period.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend says that statement is not what I meant. He is quite right. It is not what I meant and it is not what I said in response.

In light of his constructive intervention I can say as former president of the Iron Ore Company of Canada that we had major and significant operations in Newfoundland and Newfoundlanders have an excellent work ethic.

The House royal commission expressed very serious concern, as did the Forget royal commission, that in Canada that work ethic could be distorted by unemployment insurance programs that are counterproductive and that foster dependence as opposed to independence and a commitment to new jobs.

This is what I said, and what we are trying to do with the amendments to the unemployment insurance programs is to keep them generous, to keep them the most generous in the world, but to ensure that all Newfoundlanders who wish to work have an opportunity to work. This is why we have committed billions of dollars to help Hibernia get off the ground in Newfoundland and Labrador.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Mazankowski that Bill C-93, an act to implement certain government organization provisions of the budget tabled in the House of Commons on February 25, 1992, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Economics envelope; and the motion of Mr. Worthy (p. 15483).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood has four minutes remaining.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, that is about all I need on this particular bill because it is pretty basic material.

There are very few recommendations that we have in this government reorganization bill concerning these various agencies, boards and commissions.

The one point I wanted to make to the government is that at a time when confidence and morale is very low in our country, a lot of this reorganization has an adverse effect on the Public Service in total.

Because our Public Service touches the people of Canada in so many different ways, during a period of deep depression in the economy I believe it is incumbent upon the government to be sensitive to the morale of the Public Service. A low morale ultimately affects the quality of service to the public.

In my community there are examples day in and day out. I hear from constituents that the quality of service they have been getting from the Government of Canada through the Public Service in the last few years does not seem to be as good as it used to be. When I check some of these complaints out I constantly hear that because of the cutbacks in various departments the public servants are working incredible hours under incredible pressure and just cannot get the work done.

At times this government is just too quick with the knife in terms of its cutbacks and reorganizations. I realize that this bill is going through and realistically I know that not much change is going to happen.

As the government is making these changes it should be ever mindful that the morale of the Public Service if it is functioning in a positive way can go a long way to affect the service to the public in this country.

The converse of that is also important. When those members are making these machinery of government changes in the name of efficiency, I would ask them to do so in a manner in which the morale and dignity of those public servants concerned are properly attended to.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to participate again in the debate regarding Bill C-93 and in particular some of the effects that this bill will have on different agencies and different structures of the Government of Canada.

On an earlier occasion I took the time to spell out for the House the ways in which I believe this bill has been inappropriately laid before the House. At that time I indicated clearly that I thought this bill, which affects numerous departments and agencies of the Government of Canada, ought to have been split. However, the Chair in its normal wisdom did not see the validity of my arguments and of course ruled otherwise.

Notwithstanding the aforesaid I do wish to reiterate for members of this House that there is one section of the bill in particular which is of great concern to my constituents. It has to do with the gutting of what has become known as Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation.

I know my colleagues from Nova Scotia, particularly the hon. member for Annapolis Valley—Hants, will want to support me in my endeavours in this particular debate. That hon. member was a part of a government on an earlier occasion which brought in legislation to create Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation. I am certain that the hon. member in question would not want to be classified or referred to in the political world of Nova Scotia as a person who does not support the principles for which he voted only a year or two ago and now would change because of the political winds a certain minister or a couple of ministers would have on the situation.

Now that I have the support of my colleague from Annapolis Valley—Hants I am wondering if perhaps we could get the support of the hon. member for South Shore who has been very studious in his representations on behalf of his constituents. I am sure that even though his political persuasion is different from mine he can readily see the merits of the proposals which I will lay before the House in a moment or two.

Years ago under the auspices of the Cape Breton Development Corporation two divisions were designated. One was a coal division, which is self-explanatory. The other was an industrial development division, the sole purpose of which was to try to expand upon the economic base in industrial and rural Cape Breton.

In 1988 the government of the day, to which members opposite are privy to, passed a piece of legislation, namely Bill C-103. In effect it did away with the industrial development division of the Cape Breton Development Corporation.

In its place members opposite, and in particular the Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency, that other famous person in the upper house, Senator Murray said in no uncertain terms that this particular enterprise would assume the role of the industrial development division of the Cape Breton Development Corporation.

Now just a little anecdote about the great, famous Senator Lowell Murray. He comes from New Waterford, an area in my district of Cape Breton—East Richmond, but he is a senator from Ontario.

However back in 1988 when the good senator, supported by those left-wing pinkos of the New Democratic Party, passed Bill C-103 he said the following, which is from page 3656 of the Senate debates of June 14, 1988:

> Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation will be a Crown corporation. It has a mandate almost identical to that of the industrial development division of Devco. As a Crown corporation, it will have a board of directors which—and I make this as a general statement—will have the same mandate and powers in respect to the ECBC as the board of directors of Devco has in respect of the IDD.

That was the great senator in 1988 when he travelled in Nova Scotia and in particular the three federal constituencies in Cape Breton and talked about this new wonderful identity called Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation.

However, now we have on the floor of the House of Commons the Government of Canada under the auspices of the Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency placing before the House a bill which will do away with Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation. It is the same argument the Liberal Party made during the entire debate on Bill C-103, which it opposed at that time for the very fear that this would be done away with within a short period of time.

I am sad to say to my colleagues opposite that they did have the support of the New Democratic Party with regard to Bill C-103. Perhaps not knowing the area or not understanding the complexities of the economic situation there, that is their rationale for supporting it, but I hope the New Democratic Party will come alive with its so-called common sense and support the provisions we are trying to put forward in that we ought not to destroy Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation. We ought to keep it in place.

What is even more devastating in recent weeks is that the Government of Canada, not the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond, not hon. members in our caucus, but the Government of Canada through the auspices of Statistics Canada has said to the people of Canada that the unemployment rate in industrial Cape Breton is 27.6 per cent. Is there any more justification for a federally owned Crown corporation to disperse economic development in that region? What other facts would hon. members need to affirm my conviction?

The action of this government in doing away with this Crown corporation will be met in the next federal election. It will be met in the next provincial election, whenever it is called. The premier of the province, just to show how bent, unfocused and removed the premier of Nova Scotia is with regard to economic development in Cape Breton, has said very little if anything with regard to restoring this agency and thereby putting pressure on the Government of Canada.

We know the track record of one Donald Cameron, premier of Nova Scotia. He set a precedent which is being followed by the private sector throughout Cape Breton. The example I share with the House is that not less than two weeks ago Premium Automotive Tanks in Port Hawkesbury tried to lock its doors in the middle of the night and to escape into the darkness. It was following the actions of Premier Don Cameron, who did the same thing when he removed the toll booth from the Canso causeway a year prior to that.

I urge members of this House to stand in opposition to this particular bill. I give notice to the Chair and I give notice to the Table that we intend as an opposition party to seek witnesses at the committee stage of this bill to examine in its entirety the consequences not only on Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation, but also on all of the agencies which have been named therein. I seek the guidance, the support and the fairness of the Chair in making certain that particular operation is given a full hearing at the committee stage.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, in the limited time at my disposal I will try to clarify the proposals before us in this bill, which might perhaps be called an omnibus bill since it deals with a number of familiar agencies: the Agricultural Products Board, the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency, the Canada Council, the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council, the Canadian Commercial Corporation, Emergency Preparedness Canada, the Independent Review Commission for the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, the Intellectual Property Tribunal, et cetera.

• (1520)

I would like to focus on the proposal to abolish the independence of one of the most dynamic bodies we have in the area of research, the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council. It is not a Johnny-come-lately. It was founded in 1978 by a Liberal government. The research it has funded in the social sciences has contributed greatly to understanding the importance of research in Canada, truly Canadian research, in very complex and difficult areas.

The bill before us provides for the dissolution of the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council and the transfer of its functions, and of course its staff, to the Canada Council. The responsibilities of the Department of External Affairs for culture and education in the sphere of international relations would also be transferred to this new agency, which would be called the Canada Council for the Arts and for Research in the Social Sciences and Humanities.

The Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council of Canada is of course a funding body, which administers funds allocated to research, and awards bursaries. Created in 1977 to administer programs that were previously the responsibility of the Canada Council, it is directed by a 22-member council. Its budget for the 1991-92 fiscal year was $97,635,000, and it had 101 employees.

At the Department of External Affairs, about 25 people work international cultural and educational programs. The budget allocated to those programs for 1993-94 was in the neighbourhood of $27 million. The Canada Council, which was created in 1957, makes grants and services available to creative and performing artists and arts bodies. It has a staff of 248. Its programs are funded through revenue from an endowment fund, gifts, and parliamentary appropriations. Its budget for the 1991-92 fiscal year was $114 million. I wanted to situate all these important national bodies in their context.

The government has decided to put an end to the independence of the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council, to amalgamate it, so to speak, with the Canada Council. Has the government taken the trouble to explain the reasons for its decision to the members of this House?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I apologize for interrupting the hon. member, but I would urge members to find a quieter spot for their conversation, because it must be very distracting, both for the Chair and for the person who has the floor.

Mr. Gauthier: I am grateful for your intervention, Mr. Speaker, especially as I was myself on the verge of alluding to the chattering coming from my caucus, who are still chattering with members of the Liberal Party.

As I was saying, the government has not taken the trouble to explain the reasons for its decision to us, and still less to the immediately interested parties, that is to say the Canada Council and the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council. It is a political decision which stems from this great program of fiscal restraint brought forward by the government in its February 25 budget which, as we know, was followed on December 2 by an additional statement announcing further decisions.

Included in those decisions was the winding up of the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council and a 10 per cent cut in the budget of many agencies and councils, including the Canada Council.

I have been unable so far to ascertain whether or not the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council will be affected by this new 10 per cent cut. I know that all the groups, all the non-governmental organizations, councils and agencies will be affected by this 10 per cent cut this year and the next. I know that grants and awards will be affected. I know that the operations of many groups will have to adjust to these new fiscal restraints.

I have some difficulty in understanding, when we as a country are trying to be more competitive in this global market, we are unable to understand and to explain to Canadians why we are sending confusing signals on social sciences research.

I am quite puzzled, knowing full well that the Canada Council is barely alive. Budget cuts have been so severe that the Canada Council itself is on the verge of disappearing and now they graft onto it the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council. Is it to strengthen it? I would say, since they are two very distinct bodies, so very different from each other, that it will weaken the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council and it will weaken this agency's contribution to Canada.

I refer to an article published by Robert Nadeau, the president of the Canadian Federation for the Humanities and a professor in the philosophy department of UQAM. I quote Professor Nadeau:

> Unwarranted decision while it is certainly legitimate for a responsible government to want to reduce as much as possible the administration costs of the many programs and agencies it supports, it is not legitimate to proceed arbitrarily and without any explanation, as if the announced measure was self-evident and the people affected by such a measure had no right to be heard. It is unacceptable that this bill winds up the SSHRC, the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council, and creates something as an appendage to the existing Canada Council, by somehow grafting to it the SSHRC and the International Cultural Program.

I am not the one who said that. It was someone in the field, who is familiar with the issue, who is president of this Canadian Federation for the Humanities and a professor in the philosophy department at UQAM.

I was talking today with one of my good friends at the University of Ottawa who is also interested in this issue. She told me quite candidly: "It is a disaster to make such a big cut in the funding of this organization without any explanation or reason and to leave its future status in some doubt".

I know that my time is up, but I just wanted to say in closing that the government has a lot of explaining to do. This budget of February 25, 1992 is full of such bad news that it is high time for this government to explain itself to Canadians. It is high time for this government to put its mandate to the Canadian people and to call an election to clarify this issue.

• (1530)

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to join in this debate.

I am not even certain how many times I have talked about this issue before. A number of my colleagues have spoken on different aspects of this bill. The aspect that most concerns me is the closure of the International Centre for Ocean Development in Halifax. It was not only in Halifax but in my own neighbourhood around the corner from my house.

It is interesting because a very well-known member of the government party from the other place, Senator Finlay MacDonald, feels every bit as strongly about this as I do. He thinks it is a disgrace that the government has decided to lay waste to ICOD and close it down in this day and age. I must say that although there are many other things that Senator MacDonald and I do not agree on, we certainly agree on this.

It is a very sad thing that Canada is losing its edge in research and development. It is losing its edge in areas where it should be leading the world. We have three oceans in this country. We have universities with oceanographic departments. We have marine biologists, marine engineers, marine geologists and on and on.

We have people in numerous disciplines who could come together through organizations such as ICOD and do wonderful things in the area of research and development for the world at large. They could add lustre and burnish to the reputation that Canada has internationally. However, what are we doing? We are closing it. We have closed it. It is gone. It is over.

We have thrown people out of jobs. We have sent off people who came to Canada because of the International Centre for Ocean Development. They came here just because of that. We have sent them off to Indonesia, Wales, various African and European countries and to the United States. Why?

It is because Canada, a country with three oceans and a long-time reputation for being a leader in this area, clearly no longer cares. Its government no longer has any interest in this kind of research and development. I call that a shame.

It is interesting, too, that this bill takes two hits at the province of Nova Scotia in the beleaguered region of Atlantic Canada. The first from my point of view is ICOD and the second is the carnage in Cape Breton, which has been dealt with very eloquently by my colleague who is the member for Cape Breton—East Richmond. It will be equally eloquently dealt with by my colleague the member for Cape Breton—The Sydneys.

It really gives one pause to think that this government is so short-sighted.

Mr. Milliken: I am not surprised.

Ms. Clancy: No, it is not a surprise. I agree with my friend who is the member for Kingston and the Islands.

What we want to know, as we stand here opposing this bill down to the wire, is what the government thinks it is doing by eviscerating all of these organizations, many of which have a mandate to look at research and development. It has a mandate to add, not only to Canada's general lore in establishing certain standards in our own country in science, technology and research, but to add to our contribution to better standards world-wide.

We are proud of a number of things that we do as Canadians. We are proud, and justly so, of our history and our present as peacekeepers. We are proud and justly so of our contributions in a thousand different ways, whether we talk about the invention of the telephone, the developments in northern Canada or the developments in fisheries and oceans and on and on. There are so many.

Yet with the sweep of a pen and a few hours of debate in this Chamber most of the institutions that have added to Canada's reputation in this area have been wiped out. They made us a part of the international world community in the area of research and development and have been a part of our heritage as citizens of the world. I would be very interested—I think it is unfortunate that there is obviously nobody here to tell me—to know how the government sees the small amount of dollars it might save benefiting Canadians by passing this bill. None of us on this side know. We have no idea. We have asked the question repeatedly and we have received no answer.

How does the government benefit by destroying all these institutions and taking away jobs? Admittedly it is not a huge number of jobs but it has other pieces of legislation on other projects to take away huge numbers of jobs. It is taking away important jobs that add a great deal to the communities in which the institutions are located. I am curious. I pose this question, and I gather it is going to be rhetorical at this stage of the game.

Mr. Milliken: There is nobody here to answer.

Ms. Clancy: Exactly. As my hon. colleague from Kingston and the Islands says there is nobody here to answer my question. Possibly the former hon. minister from Manitoba might answer it, I do not know. He is happy not to respond.

In all seriousness, those of us on this side of the House pose the question and it is very simple. Why has the government decided to kill all these institutions? Is it because in some of these institutions there was more criticism of government policies than the Prime Minister and his cohorts might have liked? I cannot believe that. Even I find that hard to believe. I have to believe there is a method in what otherwise appears to be madness but I would like to know. More important, my constituents would like to know.

We have a proud heritage in the area of marine studies and ocean development in Nova Scotia. While ICOD is not a major contributor to our economy it was certainly a major contributor and a major potential contributor to the reputation and the general betterment of life for all countries that border on oceans and go down to the sea in ships.

We would like to know, as Nova Scotians and Canadians, what the government's reason is for this bill. It has never been explained.

My question is very simple. I would like to know what benefit this will bring to Canadians, as opposed to the great detriment it will bring to the world at large.

I think it is unfortunate but at the same time it is only what we have come to expect from this government and that too is unfortunate. We are seeing another breaking down of our infrastructure, heritage and those unique things about this country that make us Canadian.

There is only one word to say to all of that and that word is shame.

Mr. Gilbert Parent (Welland—St. Catharines—Thorold): I thank you, Mr. Speaker. I do not have a complete answer of course for the member from Halifax who just spoke. She was asking why the government is doing this. I do not have the answer but I do have a general idea of what is being done in this act. It is the result of the budget tabled February 25, 1992. The purpose of the bill is to implement certain changes made by the budget.

This legislation predominantly winds up a number of agencies, boards and commissions and moves their responsibilities to other offices. Generally speaking, I have no quarrel with that. While listening to my colleague, the member for Cape Breton—East Richmond, speak earlier I was taken by the similarities that exist between Cape Breton and my own riding of Welland—St. Catharines—Thorold and the Niagara peninsula in general.

• (1540)

This piece of legislation is in 10 parts and I want to deal with the second and tenth parts. The second one deals with the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency. You might wonder why someone from southern Ontario would be talking about this particular aspect.

The government wants to close down the Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation and move its function and staff to the Atlantic Canada Opportunities agency. I question how many jobs will be cut because of this and whether it will really be more efficient.

For this reason and on that basis I am opposed to this move to kill the ECBC, the Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation.

The government stated in its budget speech that this and other organizations were being eliminated because: "They served their purpose and were no longer needed". I believe this is wrong. I believe the Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation is still needed today.

Witness some of these facts. The Cape Breton economy is still extremely troubled and special programs to address it are urgently needed now more than ever. The official unemployment rate reached almost 25 per cent earlier this year and now hovers around 23 per cent. The UI rate was only 16 per cent when the ECBC was created and Cape Breton's economy faces great challenges today just as it did in 1985.

The groundfishery is on the verge of collapse with huge quota cuts and job losses expected in 1993. Employment in the coal and steel industries is down. In my view the ECBC's job is not nearly complete.

Let us put that into juxtaposition with what is going on in the Niagara peninsula with regard to the unemployment patterns that have emerged in the last 18 to 24 months.

We in the Niagara peninsula have suffered the losses of well over 8,000 jobs in the last 18 months and if things go as they are projected to go, in the next 12 months we will be hovering around a loss of 10,000 jobs in the Niagara peninsula.

Last Saturday there was a demonstration by the members of the CAW of the Niagara peninsula who wanted to bring the plight of the people in our area to the attention of the governments of the day. I do not claim that our unemployment rate has reached 23 per cent but imagine an area where traditionally unemployment has been in single digits: 7 per cent, 8 per cent, and 9 per cent. Now we have an increase of almost 70 per cent in unemployment in the area.

Surely new programs are needed for the retraining of these people who incidentally are very highly skilled in the automotive industry, the steel industry and the abrasives industry. All these people are being affected. It is not to say that these people want charity. They want recognition as there was in Cape Breton by the foundation of the Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation. If something like that could be established in the Niagara Peninsula and offer money for training, our people too would have a chance to rebound more successfully from the depression they are in right now.

The UI bill that came up in conjunction with this is going to hit many of our people because I would say of the 8,000 who are now unemployed as of the last 18 months, 2,000 to 2,500 have taken early retirement. They are very worried at this point that their severance pay will be lumped in before they can get UI benefits.

I think about what is going on in Cape Breton with regard to the downsizing—another word for firing people—of one commission and rolling it into the other and I wonder if the job loss is worth it.

Just so we will not always be labelled as being in opposition and never looking at the good side, I agree wholeheartedly with the very practical area of the Veterans' Land Act, part X.

To put it into perspective, this part of the legislation transfers the office of the director, Veterans' Land Act, to the office of the Deputy Minister of Veterans Affairs. Part X also provides for an amendment to the provisions of the Veterans' Land Act representing review committees. It is common sense to do this.

In 1975 I was the parliamentary secretary to the then Minister of Veterans Affairs, Mr. Daniel MacDonald from Prince Edward Island.

My party and I are in favour of this because the last sitting of the board of the Veterans' Land Act was 16 years ago and all its members have been released from their responsibilities. The Liberal government in 1975 created the sunset clause on the act. Therefore since 1975 no one has been eligible to apply to the government for any loans to purchase land under the Veterans' Land Act. That is an eminently sensible thing to have done.

I would address myself to one more thing and that is the international trade and procurement tribunal. Part VIII merges the Canadian International Trade Tribunal and the Procurement Review Board into a new board to be called the international trade and procurement tribunal.

Not much concern has been expressed over this merger and it has been suggested that it may be quite positive. The individuals directly affected are awaiting more information on how it will operate and so are we, as members of this House. This is going to directly affect trade not only inside but outside Canada.

In synopsis I understand the need for this type of bill and I understand that we are going to have to take some steps to streamline. I only hope that by streamlining and downsizing not too many people will be affected. It is to that end I hope the government will address its thoughts.

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the constituents of Hamilton West I consider it a privilege to rise on second reading debate of Bill C-93, an act to implement certain provisions of last year's budget, or as it is also known, an act to exterminate certain Crown agencies and appeal to disenfranchised Conservative supporters.

Like all eight budgets brought down by this government which slashed spending, cut away necessary resources and suppressed economic growth, the budget of February 25, 1992 was indeed no exception.

Since the government failed in those eight budgets to bring down the deficit which it promised to do when first elected, it decided to appear to be cost conscious and give the axe to several important Crown agencies.

With the government low in the polls and unable to control the deficit, as it has so prudently demonstrated, it decided to cut important public bodies and appealed to the notion that Canada had an over-bloated Public Service. By doing so it dealt Canada and important research and development a heavy blow.

• (1550)

Of course, this government has been fond of taking the Public Service to task and making a scapegoat out of it for years. Just ask the federal public servants in my riding of Hamilton West. Just ask members of the Canadian Centre for Occupational Health and Safety who are looking over their collective shoulders and expecting this government to terminate the centre. They fear that it might happen at any time.

When announcing the closures in this House, the Minister of Finance boasted of clearing the Public Service deck of over 500 public servants. He can boast that a large part of the department of immigration is going to relocate to Alberta. In fact, I stand to be corrected. It is going right into the riding of the Deputy Prime Minister who is the Minister of Finance is it not? I think it is.

Just ask the federal public servants in Hamilton West or in any riding what the workload is like at the immigration office in their particular ridings. I challenge any one of the members opposite. Have they ever taken a moment to go into the immigration office in their particular riding to see the paperwork that is stacked about a foot and a half high on the 14 desks that line the area inside that office? There are only seven, if you are lucky, federal public servants who are sitting and attempting and trying as best they can to keep ahead of the incredible workload at immigration while the cuts continue to happen.

Along the floor there are boxes of files. Heaven forbid that someone has called before you, fellow member, to inquire about that particular case. It has been pulled out of that particular box number 26 on the floor and set down on a desk somewhere. Your question has been responded to and then we have to call that immigration office on behalf of the constituent who is a little frustrated at the very least. Of course, they cannot find the file because it is out of box number 26 now and on someone's desk.

What about the savings from eliminating 46 public bodies or $22 million? Is it a lot of money? No, it is not a lot when Canada benefits so much from the work that the civil servants have done. It is not a lot when compared to the tens of millions of dollars the government paid out in consulting and advertising contracts. It is not a lot when compared to the $4.4 billion for the new Cadillac version of helicopters. We could have taken some pretty good advice to upgrade the existing ones.

The Law Reform Commission, which played a non-partisan role—as all of these agencies have done—in providing information and research to the government and to Canadians, made several recommendations to the federal government on reforms to criminal law. Instead, it chose to refer research to the Department of Justice where, practically speaking, it is vetted of contentious issues before it reaches the minister.

The Science Council of Canada is to be wound up. Since 1966 the federal government has relied upon valuable information and research on many areas of public policy.

The Economic Council of Canada, created in 1963, served Canada for three decades. It is closed. It is another important agency and contributor of important information that was given the axe.

In a report entitled Pulling Together the council explains how Canada's share of world trade has fallen. The prices of Canada's natural resources have been weak. Canada has higher manufacturing costs due to inflation and slower productivity.

In another report entitled A Lot to Learn the Economic Council of Canada noted that education is the key to the kind of jobs and the economic base that Canada will require in the future. Some of the recommendations include: by the year 2000 all 16-year old Canadians will be functionally literate; the proportion of high school graduates will be increased; science will be emphasized in high schools and the quality and quantity of high-tech training will be increased.

To learn some of the exact things that the Economic Council of Canada recommended in one report it cost taxpayers the same amount the government will save by closing more than over 30 agencies when it used more than $20 million of taxpayers' money to fund the so-called prosperity initiative.

Mr. Boudria: It was $21 million for ads.

Mr. Keyes: It was $21 million for ads says my colleague, the member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell.

Mr. Boudria: Untendered.

Mr. Keyes: Untendered ads.

Mr. Boudria: A very tender subject.

Mr. Keyes: My colleague from Glengarry—Prescott—Russell says it is a tender subject. This is all to tell us that we need to be more competitive.

I have had friends at the dinner table who tell me we all need to be more competitive. It is how we go about being more competitive and the tools that were available to us—the operative word here is were—to point out to the government the best way in which to achieve that competitiveness. Otherwise it is just a big guessing game, is it not?

As the title of the Economic Council of Canada's report suggests, the government itself has a lot to learn about the way our federal government should deal with public agencies that provide comprehensive scientific, medical and sociological research that has served Canada and should continue to serve Canada in the years to come.

[Translation]

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to take part in this debate on Bill C-93 and I would like to begin my remarks by congratulating the hon. member for Hamilton West.

[English]

The member for Hamilton West really put it the way it is. Mr. Speaker, I am sure you noted that as well. He really got to the centre of the issue. The centre of the issue is that this government has its priorities messed up. I am putting it kindly here because I am not sure that the word I want to use is parliamentary.

The member for Hamilton West pointed out that the government wants to save money—so it says—but it has provided no proof at all that the merging of the Canada Council and the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council is going to save any money. It has not proven that the collapsing of the Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation with the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency is going to save any money. There are no studies to back it up either. Also, it has not shown that that the effective closure of yet another government organization, Emergency Preparedness Canada, is going to save any money either.

Emergency Preparedness Canada is a rather interesting case. The member for Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke brought to our attention only a few weeks ago that the government actually announced the construction of a new facility in his riding in the election campaign of 1988 to house Emergency Preparedness Canada. It was around the community of Arnprior if my memory serves me right.

Then the government allowed this thing to drag on and on. If my memory serves me right, it announced the construction of the building twice. Now you might think there are in fact two buildings there, but no. There is in fact no building at all or no new structure as was initially proposed. Nothing is there. Now the government is collapsing this particular organization, Emergency Preparedness Canada, and is merging it with the Department of National Defence. My colleague from Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke, as I indicated, has been fighting valiantly to keep this particular organization in his riding.

• (1600)

I want to get back to the Canada Council and the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council merger because there is an alleged saving of money unspecified and unsubstantiated on the part of the government. It says that it wants to save money. I have a few ideas for the government across the way. Recently Canadians to their shock and dismay found out that the government had given no less than $21 million worth of advertising contracts for Canada's 125th anniversary.

Well, Mr. Speaker, perhaps you and some of our viewers out there are thinking that it was a special celebration and it warranted ads on television. Maybe so, but $21 million is an awful lot of money.

Even if one recognizes that some advertisements may have been in order, what is the reason those ads were untendered? As I indicated earlier, it is a rather tender subject on the government side. There were no tenders. Not even a bidding process was entertained.

Do you know what the government did, Mr. Speaker? It had a meeting in a restaurant in Hull, the Cafe Henry Burger, with six invitees. The six invitees had lunch with government officials and made their pitch, as the minister put it, for the advertising contracts. No minutes were kept of the meeting, no records exist, and no written bids were submitted. Two of the six firms won the so–called successful bid, the successful oral bid made in a restaurant with no minutes. Between the two they shared the spoils: $21 million worth of advertising contracts.

Think of all the people in the riding of Algoma who could have benefited from that $21 million. Think of all the people in the riding of Edmonton Southeast who could have received assistance, or the people of Hawkesbury in the great riding of Glengarry—Prescott—Russell who are suffering right now as a result of the policies of this government. Did they get advertising contracts? Did they get untendered jobs of any kind from the Conservatives across the way?

An hon. member: They got Bill C–105.

Mr. Boudria: No, they did not. They got Bill C–105, as my colleague has just said so eloquently. It was thrown at them.

The Prime Minister said today in the House of Commons that it is the fault of the unemployment system if people in Newfoundland, as he put it, have lost their work ethic.

Get a hold of this stuff. The Prime Minister, during Question Period, alleges that unemployed Canadians who have lost their jobs as a result of this government's economic policy have lost their work ethic because the unemployment insurance system, according to the Prime Minister, is too generous. That is the Prime Minister's version of the truth.

No, that is not what Canadians expect of the government. They expect a more ethical behaviour as it pertains to the awarding of government contracts, to the way it administers dollars, and more particularly to claiming there are alleged savings that are necessary in Bill C–93.

The government has not proven to me at all that these savings will be made. Even if the savings were there, why did it not cut out some of those generous untendered contracts it is giving to friends of the government instead? Why is the government not attacking the issue that way? Even if the government had exhausted all of those, even if the government had totally cleaned up its act, which it has not done, there is still the fundamental question. Even if we did want to, and I do not think we do, merge the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council with another agency, why merge it with the arts council? Why not merge it with another council?

What studies were done to determine if that is the best merger that could occur versus another one? None.

[Translation]

My party, my colleagues and I intend to vote against this bill. Of course, we still have a lot to say and we do not intend to let things go ahead so quickly. We here in this House all intend to try once again to make the Conservatives opposite, the Minister of Employment and Immigration, all his colleagues, the hon. member for Argenteuil—Papineau, understand that this bill is wrong, particularly the clauses affecting the Canada Council as well as other agencies, especially Emergency Preparedness Canada and a number of other agencies.

[English]

This government better start cleaning up its act, and when I say cleaning up its act I do not mean with things like Bill C-93. I mean by changing its code of ethical conduct in the awarding of government contracts and in the way that it administers taxpayers' dollars.

My colleagues and I intend to speak further on this issue of ethics in government. Let the government be warned that we are not finished talking about this issue. It will come up again, very soon. Canadians want this government to be accountable. They do not want this government to spend taxpayers' dollars lightly. They want it to be invested appropriately and for the betterment of all.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): It is my duty pursuant to Standing Order 38 to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Moncton—Transportation; the hon. member for Nanaimo—Cowichan—Salmon Fishery; the hon. member for Mississauga South—Veterans; the hon. member for Scarborough West—Justice; the hon. member for Don Valley East—Municipal Infrastructure.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise again to speak on this bill because I think Canadians are getting the impression very strongly that this government does not know what it is doing.

I do not know if it is devoid of ideas or if it has so little belief in the role of government in a civilized society that it really does not want to govern and does not believe that government can or should function for the common good of all citizens.

We have ample evidence of the incompetence of this government, its lack of direction, its lack of understanding of what needs to be done to pull the country together and to set a clear course for the future. It is totally missing.

We have a bill that dismantles 10 agencies with no rationale, no analysis of how the functions of these agencies will be fulfilled in the future, or whether they should be abandoned, whether they can be done in a different way, or whether abandoning these agencies is going to cost money or save money. This is only one in a series of measures by government to destroy a number of agencies that have served this country well, to in fact carry on a mission based purely on ideology, not on common sense and good budgeting, to carry on an agenda of tearing down those things which Canadians regard as part of their heritage and as part of the foundation of this country.

We have seen it with the destruction of VIA Rail, the cutbacks to the CBC, with a number of actions geared more to simply getting rid of this and getting rid of that, with no sense of strengthening, no sense of serving Canadians better, no sense of ensuring that there is the objective qualified advice that a government needs to make sure that it is doing what is best for this country.

We have seen the loss of the Economic Council of Canada, the Science Council and the Pay Research Bureau which helped make for smoother labour negotiations in both the public and private sector. We have seen the transfer of patent development away from a corporation that was doing a fine job in that field into departments all across government at much greater cost and at much less benefit to the country.

If we have been insistent in our speeches, good. This is a bad bill when it comes forward with absolutely no justification based on the functions these agencies perform, absolutely no justification based on cost. It is because we have seen the results when this government has dismantled organizations with no clear sense of their purpose, no clear sense of the public importance of the work they do and no clear sense of how they are going to replace that work.

We see as well this trend in the kind of budgeting we have had and the absolutely stupid determination to tax Canadians more, to provide them with a lesser level of services, to live budget after budget for eight years on the pretence that somehow this is going to put us in a sounder economic situation when in fact it has done exactly the opposite.

Canadians can add. They know that the debt this country was carrying eight years ago was barely one-third of what it is today. They know that the deficit they were carrying was much smaller than they are carrying today. They know that money was being spent then to provide services that Canadians needed, not being spent as it is now just to pay the interest on the debt.

I could address the individual agencies in this bill. Some of it we happen to agree with. We feel that some agencies outlive their purpose and function, but one does not simply say cut 10 per cent across government, cut staff to serve Canadians, cut agencies. One brings forward reasonable, sensible, well founded arguments as to why an agency has outlived its purpose and what cost savings there will be in replacing it with something else, or just simply abandoning it altogether.

The kind of blanket panic of just cutting here and cutting there shows an absolute lack of any sense of management, any sense of direction, any sense of responsibility to the taxpayers for public policy or for the management of their financial resources.

We see the results. We see the results when we read today that Canada may very well have trouble borrowing on the international markets in a very short period of time. This is the kind of legacy that this government has left us.

It is the result not of what is in this bill but of the fact that this bill is so typical of how this government has operated.

There is no sense of direction for the future. There is no sense of the purpose of government and the role it plays in the national life. There is no sense that we need a good and solid public sector in this country to work in partnership with the private sector, labour, educators, the provinces and people in their own communities if we want to address the problems of Canada and create the best possible future.

We oppose this bill. We oppose it because it is so typical of the running hither and yon, the crying about the sky is falling in, the total failure of the government to take its responsibilities as a government seriously and to provide the leadership that this country so desperately needs.

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to participate in this debate today.

The bill that is before the House now is intended, according to the government, to streamline the government, the efficiencies of the government. It is to make the running of government more efficient and to make the spending of the government go further.

That is a laudable goal and it is very commendable. The problem is that the government oftentimes has gone around with these bills and these proposals in a fashion that quite frankly is not beneficial to the people of this country.

I point out, for example, in this particular bill that the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council has been merged with Canada Council, which has caused no end of concern to these groups which are saying that this body was doing a very good job on its own. Merging them is only going to hurt the work that these people are doing.

This has happened in other areas. Last year the government in its same effort to streamline and cut costs cut the Law Reform Commission. It cut the Court Challenges Program. Both were very effective. Both made large contributions to this society. The Law Reform Commission in its work attempted to provide answers and suggestions as to the way we can better govern ourselves in this country.

That commission was cut at a time when we are facing an issue in this country of law and order. The media is carrying stories of crimes that are taking place in this country. They are of concern to people. There is the release of inmates who are considered to be dangerous criminals. There is a whole host of areas that the Canadian public is concerned about and is demanding answers to.

It is certainly going to be an issue in the next election. In fact, it is an issue right now. The Law Reform Commission was there to provide answers and did provide a lot of answers and suggestions. It is no longer there.

This whole area of crime prevention, reform of the Criminal Code and so on demands to be addressed right now. I think one of the things we have to look at is crime prevention. Certainly groups like the Law Reform Commission made comments on that. The justice committee right now is going to report on this.

It is very clear that Canada desperately needs a crime prevention strategy that is going to battle the social causes of crime right across this country. That is not a New Democratic position though. It sounds like one and it is one but that is not what the New Democrats alone are saying.

This is going to be the recommendation of the justice committee and the justice committee is made up of members from all sides of the House. The majority will be Tories, then Liberals and then New Democrats. That committee has heard evidence from so many areas and from such a wide range of witnesses that its members have been forced to come to that conclusion. I want to quote from one of the witnesses who came to this committee from Saskatoon, Sergeant Don Evers who stated: "Just as cancer eats away at people, crime eats away at our communities and societies. If we do nothing about it, it will continue to grow and erode everything".

Canada is the second most violent country of the Group of Seven nations, right behind the United States. Yet we have people in this country talking about building more jails, making tougher laws and becoming more confrontational.

There are areas where we do need tougher laws. That is true. This idea of having a confrontational approach simply does not work. The fact that we are starting to realize that is quite clear from the comments of the chair of that committee who, quoting from the newspaper, said: "If anyone had told me when I became an MP nine years ago that I'd be looking at the social causes of crime, I'd have told them they were nuts", said the P.C. member for Mississauga West who by the way is a former mountie. "I would have said lock them up for life and throw away the key, but not any more".

What about some of the Liberal members? The Liberal justice critic and member for Scarborough West said in an interview: "There are definitely people who will continue to commit crimes no matter what you did for them, but there are many others who turn to crime because they have low self-esteem brought about by not having a job, the breakdown of their family or some other social condition".

It is very clear a whole new approach to the way we deal with the justice system is needed and in order to deal with that we need all the tools we can possibly avail ourselves of. Certainly the Law Reform Commission was a very important tool. That commission no longer exists. We simply have to look to other areas and there are other areas.

If a government is going to be committed to reforming the justice system, it makes very little sense to cut the Law Reform Commission and the Court Challenges Program. To take a case to the Supreme Court of Canada is extremely expensive. Unless there is a fund available for Canadians they are going to be unable to access the highest court in the land, even though they may have a very good issue.

This all-party committee is going to look at "Fighting Crime By Getting Through to the Social Causes", which is a very worthwhile document. I am very much looking forward to reading it. As a member of a subcommittee of justice which is looking at recodification of the Criminal Code, we will be tabling a report next week in the House as well.

I am glad to see that through this bill and other legislation the government is attempting to reorganize the way we do business in this country and save money. The problem is it is doing it in a fashion that is not beneficial to Canadians, particularly those in the lower income brackets or from certain social classes.

I hope that we as Canadians and parliamentarians can come to deal with some of these issues in a more logical fashion. This bill deals with a whole host of groups that are going to be cut and I wanted to focus on the area of justice because I think it demands attention right now. Certainly voters in the next election are going to be asking where the particular parties and candidates stand with respect to justice and law reform.

I think the answer is very clear, certainly from this member. If we are going to have law reform, its objective has to be to provide as safe a community as possible for all Canadians.

We can do that without building more jails and without being more confrontational. We also have to be sympathetic to the causes of crime and look at crime prevention as the main goal in creating a justice system in this country that is going to benefit all.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have an opportunity to say a few words on Bill C-93 as it goes to third reading because this bill implements the parts of the 1992 federal budget.

Many of the sections of this bill are really designed for political purposes in the province of Alberta where the Reform Party last year at this time was doing quite well in the Gallup polls. The government was keen to show to the electorate in Alberta, where the Reform Party was doing very well, that it could cut and slash.

It is doing away with a lot of agencies here. In fact, most of them are just sort of moving over so the civil servants who were working before under the authority of an agency or board are taken back into the department. For instance, in the Department of Agriculture, products aboard is being done by the same government officials who are now acting within the Department of Agriculture, rather the Agriculture Products Marketing Board.

The Petroleum Monitoring Agency is useful because it tells Canadians how much they are paying in terms of excise tax and sales tax on petroleum products; how much is being charged by the retailer; how much is being charged by the various upstream sectors; the value of crude oil; the value of refining; the cost of distribution and so on.

Those sectors of the Petroleum Monitoring Agency are being taken back into the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources. It is mostly political matters that are being looked after in this whole bill rather than anything of any real substance.

The Prime Minister is concerned that when he goes to Alberta he can say he slashed and cut out government agencies. That is supposed to impress the electorate so it will vote for the Tories rather than the Reform Party which is doing quite well.

What has happened of course is that the Reform Party has gone into a complete decline. The question is whether the government would even have bothered with this legislation if it had known how much the Reform Party was going to slip in the most recent Gallup polls or in the polls that were done for Angus Reid.

I really want to talk about the budget, the government's general fiscal and monetary policy and its attitude toward the regions of this country. One of the sections for instance deals with the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency and the changes being proposed there.

Many areas of the country have similar agencies. Southern Ontario and Quebec have the Ministry of Science, Technology and Trade. Northern Ontario has FEDNOR, the western provinces have their little agency while southern Ontario and the province of Quebec have the full department.

Those departments were designed to create economic opportunity and diversification. They have been singularly unsuccessful in diversifying the economy, not because of the agencies themselves doing their assigned tasks, which in the case of FEDNOR is really designed for quite small projects, at least in rural areas, but because of the government's over-all fiscal and monetary policy and general policy toward the regions of the country. Of course that is identified in the budget of 1992.

If we look at the Algoma district we see economic carnage because the government has essentially withdrawn from the problems.

If we look at the free trade deal of 1988, the government was saying it would solve the problems of the steel industry in cities like Sault Ste. Marie. Algoma Steel would not have to worry any more about countervail duties or dumping duties. The marketplace of the whole of North America would be open and the trade problems and restrictions that had been proposed in 1982 and 1986 would be over.

If you look at that community today Algoma Steel has essentially gone into ownership by the employees. It is a kind of receivership situation. How do we see the government's trade policy? It would be hard to describe it as anything but a disaster. After the 1988 free trade agreement was put in place the screws were put on by the Governor of the Bank of Canada and the monetary policy was very restrictive.

In 1989 and the first part of 1990 the Governor of the Bank of Canada imposed interest rates that were at least 5 to 6 percentage points above those in the United States. This drove the value of the Canadian dollar from 70 cents to 85 cents and even higher. We had the worst of all worlds. We had a very high dollar.

Companies like Algoma Steel were trying to produce steel with interest rates at 14 or 15 per cent while their American counterparts were paying 7 or 8 per cent interest. At the same time the dollar had appreciated by 12 or 14 percent. It was the worst of all worlds in a supposedly free trade area of North America.

If that was not bad enough, that kind of monetary policy gave the American producers a great opportunity. They immediately started to increase their exports to Canada by some 25 per cent, taking away markets for the Canadian steel industry. That industry was in total torment because of that.

It is not only those policies that have driven companies like Algoma Steel into receivership and employee ownership hoping to recover from that. In the past few weeks the United States government has imposed a dumping duty on the Canadian steel industry right across the board along with other countries.

Supposedly the free trade deal was going to resolve those problems. In fact it is much worse. The Americans have not backed down one iota and are not only imposing dumping duties, they are taking up a larger share of the Canadian market. The industry is in the most difficult time in its history.

This budget bill, Bill C-93, an implementation act that we are debating today is being brought in at a time when the government's fiscal and monetary policies are extremely Draconian for the Canadian steel industry. That industry today is in a terrible turmoil. It is during a time when there should have been an agreement.

We talked back in the 1960s, 1970s and early 1980s of a North American steel agreement, something like the Canada-U.S. automobile agreement. That agreement is being proposed again in spite of the fact that we have a FTA, but the Americans are not agreeing to it. We are in a free trade area where there is really no free trade. All you get is countervail duties, anti-dumping duties and a demand for more and more of the Canadian marketplace which just ultimately costs more and more Canadian jobs. That really came out of that budget.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I would just like to designate tomorrow as an allotted day.

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, I stand here today to speak on Bill C-93, which is a budget implementation bill and in effect dissolves many agencies and merges others.

In some of the cases the agencies should be dissolved. They have not been used. They have not been of use for some time. Indeed, one would wonder why it has not been considered before.

However, in other cases we wonder why the government is behaving in this fashion. It appears there was absolutely no consultation. In some cases the government may say it was due to fiscal restraint. We acknowledge this is a terribly difficult time economically for all of us. Perhaps there is reason to consider fiscal restraints. However, after looking deeper into some of these mergers it is realized that perhaps in some cases it will not only not save dollars but may also cost even more.

One of the things we would like to see when this bill goes to committee is that there be extensive consultation with some of the agencies that are suggested to be merged.

Perhaps when I was first elected I was quite naive in thinking that there was a lot of co-operation and consultation before a budget measure was implemented. However, shortly after I was elected I was made an associate critic in one of the fields and had been closely following the speeches made by the minister in charge of the particular department. If I can recall this was in February of 1989, but in any case it was the first budget I was here for.

It just so happened that approximately one week before the budget was read the minister in question went out west and gave a speech. He told the people concerned that if there were to be any way that the particular program would be discontinued they would be given ample opportunity, ample notice but that it would not be discontinued at the time.

Lo and behold, one week later in the budget the program was cut off as of midnight that night. It surprised me somewhat. I thought: Well is the gentleman not a minister? Is he not a part of what happens with the pre-budget deliberations? How could he make a speech out west guaranteeing consultation and plenty of advance warning and have one week or so later the Minister of Finance actually make him look like a bit of a fool because the program was cut off with no grace period of six months and so on.

I asked the minister: "Did they not speak to you before?" He just shrugged his shoulders and walked away. I thought that was not the way to do budgeting. When doing a budget, the departments are brought in to try to find the best way to utilize the dollars available. Yes, cutbacks are extremely difficult and sometimes are necessary.

I have worked as an accountant. I know how easy it is to look at an amount and think that it can be done without. But many times there would be easier ways and perhaps ways of saving even more money while doing the work that we are doing. Sometimes just looking at a sheet of paper and knocking off numbers is costlier than the amount of money it saves.

I ask this government to please reconsider and when the legislative committee is formed and studies this bill that we allow extensive consultations, especially when we deal with part II and part III of this bill which deal with the Canada Council for the Arts and Research in the Social Sciences and Humanities.

Part III of the legislation winds up the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council and transfers its functions and staff to the Canada Council. Certain functions and staff of the Department of External Affairs and International Trade that deal with the promotion of Canadian culture abroad would also be transferred to the Canada Council. I am sure there will be some very good suggestions made by people who are involved in these councils who know the good that is being done and the ways by which the councils could be used more advantageously without costing the government a great deal of money. It is absolutely essential when we streamline that we do not, contrary to the spirit of the legislation, cause more cost for the taxpayer.

The new Canada Council would have to develop a whole new international division and network quite apart from its domestic concerns if it is to administer the various cultural programs effectively. That has not been part of its mandate at this time. We are asking that the Canada Council perform this function. Maybe the Canada Council would like to have this function. Perhaps we could allow that function to be carried on by external affairs as it has been up until now.

As well, staff in various posts abroad would now be accountable to two masters, that is, the Canada Council and the heads of the posts. How would that save money? It is far better to have them answerable to only one boss. Again, we ask that amendments which would facilitate this be considered.

It is a matter of being humane in the cutbacks. It is a matter of using your head and as well as cutting back, doing the best that you can do. The only way we can properly run this country and offer the kinds of programs we need and at the same time manage to better spend taxpayers' dollars is to have all people work together. We cannot have only one person unilaterally cut back at one level just perhaps to cost more at another level. That is not the way we will address the deficit position we are in, or for that matter the deficit positions of other levels of government and other departments.

We are asking that this government stop this unilateral decree in terms of budgets. I do want to stress it is extremely important we allow every due consideration. Those agencies that should be closed down by all means if they are not in use now let us get it over with and close them down. Those agencies that are performing very valuable functions should be separated and allowed to continue to provide the kinds of services that they have in the past so that they can continue to make us a great and wonderful country. It is absolutely essential and I beseech this government not to continue in decreeing budget cuts but to consult and together we can make it work.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): It being 4.45 p.m., pursuant to order made earlier today under Standing Order 78(3), it is my duty to interrupt the proceedings and put forthwith every question necessary to complete the second reading stage of the bill now before the House.

The first vote will be on Mr. Worthy's motion.

[English]

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion, which was agreed to on the following division:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I declare the motion carried.

Pursuant to Standing Order 61(2) the next question is on the main motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Angus: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Perhaps you might seek consent to apply the vote we just took to this motion.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): There is no unanimous consent.

The House divided on the motion, which was agreed to on the following division:

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

PUBLIC COMPLAINTS COMMISSION

Mr. Raymond Skelly (North Island—Powell River) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should cancel the proposal to amalgamate the RCMP Public Complaints Commission with the RCMP External Review Committee, and furthermore the government should implement the recommendations contained in the 1990–91 RCMP Public Complaints Commission Annual Report.

He said: Mr. Speaker, today I would like to propose that we change the direction in which the government is moving in one particular case. This is the case of amalgamating two very worth-while agencies: the RCMP External Review Committee and the RCMP Public Complaints Commission.

The concerns I have involve an incident that happened in Gibsons, British Columbia, on September 30, 1988. On that particular night an individual happened to be under the influence of alcohol and sleeping in a local pub. The owners asked that the individual be removed. The individual was then subsequently taken to the RCMP station and throughout the night an altercation resulted.

The individual was taken out of the RCMP cells during the night. He was subjected to the exercise of force by a police officer involved. There had been an altercation in the cells as well. Later on in the course of the night the individuals who were in the cell began to ask that the person be dealt with by a physician. It was clear that the person was badly injured. It was not exactly clear how those injuries came about, but very definitely throughout the night the individual did not have access to medical attention.

The next morning there were no charges taken and suddenly all the other individuals in the cell were asked to leave. This individual was held back to account for a parking ticket in Sechelt, British Columbia. Then, once his brother dealt with the parking ticket in another community, he was released out into the street where he promptly could not function because of his physical condition.

A taxicab picked him up and took him to the hospital. The hospital examined him and my understanding of the injuries were that his face had been stoved in, his ribs broken and his spleen had been ruptured. He was in fact in danger of dying. The hospital picked him up by helicopter and took him to North Vancouver to deal with the injuries.

The two points the commission findings dealt with were an improper procedure on the part of the RCMP officers involved and failure to provide medical attention. Had it not been for the RCMP Public Complaints Commission, this would never have seen the light of day.

There were definitely attempts by RCMP officers involved to obstruct the process of this complaint. It was extremely difficult to deal with it. In any other agency, such as the provincial ombudsman, nobody would have essentially picked this complaint up. It is ironic that the RCMP Public Complaints Commission came into force at midnight, October 1. Even though this had occurred on September 30, I gather the RCMP took the commission to court arguing that since the event had commenced prior to the proclamation and imposition of this legislation it did not have jurisdiction.

The Federal Court upheld that jurisdiction and the case went ahead. It took years. Eventually the RCMP admitted wrongdoing, apologized for the event and then wound up in an out of court settlement resolving it years later.

The point is not to criticize the RCMP. The RCMP is the finest police force that one can point to in Canada if not in the world. It is absolutely critical that the force maintain high morale and that the complaints commission not be used as an instrument to harass the police force when it is carrying out the will of the public so that fair, even-handed and effective law enforcement takes place.

• (1730)

We are concerned about the odd incident, the odd individual who is not suited to the rigours of police work. There must be a mechanism by which the complaints of the public can be brought before a commission or an agency that handles these fairly.

I would like to read the mandate of the External Review Committee. It says: "The RCMP External Review Committee was created to provide an independent, impartial recommendation to the commissioner on grievances, formal discipline, discharge and demotion under the provisions of the RCMP Act. Any case resulting in a formal discipline, discharge and demotion is referred to the committee by the Commissioner of the RCMP unless the member requests that it proceeds otherwise".

This is a totally different matter. It is almost a committee that handles labour grievances within the police force. I think it is an extremely valuable, useful and productive arrangement where officers within the police force can ask that these complaints be dealt with within a more impartial purview than with members of the RCMP.

On the other hand, the principles laid out in the RCMP Public Complaints Commission are different. It talks about two important functions: that the mandate of the Public Complaints Commission is to provide individual members of the public with an effective mechanism that they can make complaints in. The public also, in laying complaints, must not interfere with the public's interest in the fair and proper enforcement of the law. It is a very delicate balance. It is not there to disrupt the process of fair and even-handed law enforcement, but it is also there to deal in a fair and equitable way with the complaints of the public.

A number of important principles have to be looked at. We cannot allow these two agencies to be melded together. It is a blurring of their purposes.

The public is already sceptical enough, when you say RCMP public complaints, that it is an agency of the RCMP and that it works hand in glove with the people against whom they have a complaint. That is not true.

The first principle we should be looking at is that police forces have strict accountability in the use of force, especially the use of deadly force, which we have been encountering lately in a great many public complaints, not against the RCMP but other police forces. There is a strict accountability of the use of force against members of the public.

The second principle is that the complaints have a fair and impartial investigation mechanism to ensure the public that they are fully investigated and they know the consequences and outcome.

The third principle is that the public be aware of the process. When you talk to members of the general public it is ironic that they do not have any idea that this organization exists. Many people who have complaints against the RCMP say: "There is nothing you can do. This is the force of the state and if you wind up complaining against them the force will come down on you even harder". There is an element of truth in this.

I think there have been at least a dozen complaints against police actions in the community of Gibsons. It is interesting, when individuals were charged and the use of force was involved in the laying of that charge, the individuals who laid the complaint about what they felt was the inappropriate use of force, usually a month later or some time later, even further charges emerged. So there was a real deterrent against the individual making a complaint and it was recommended often by friends not to complain because they would make it even worse.

However, the public must be aware that there is a process by which they can get to an agency that will investigate their complaints.

When we went to the hospital in this community and asked if the records showed that when individuals were brought into this hospital that they complained about the excessive use of force or injury because of excessive force of the RCMP. It never appeared in the hospital emergency records and it was not traceable back through hospital records, so it is extremely difficult.

It is my understanding that this is now changed. If an individual comes in and says how he or she has been injured, the hospital will at least record that the injury was as a result of police force action and the use of force in the law enforcement process.

The public is not aware of this organization. I think it is important that all referral agencies and hospitals should make it clear where one can get a fair and equitable hearing of one's complaint, a thorough investigation.

The RCMP must co-operate with an investigatory commission and that co-operation must be seen to get to the bottom of a complaint. In many cases the RCMP officer has been found to be completely justified in the use of force for the protection of himself, protection of others and for the public good of enforcing the law.

In other cases, there was a misunderstanding and an explanation to the complainant about what the procedures are has often satisfied people. There has often been a simple apology that in the heat of the moment measures might have been used that were precautionary. Then in a very small number of cases there is in fact a legitimate concern and a good thorough investigation is useful in clearing the air and resolving the matter for future police operations procedure.

This procedure, with RCMP co-operation, gets to the bottom of what its members are doing. Getting to the bottom of what its members are doing can change police operations and make our police force a more effective agency, more highly regarded in the eyes of the public for doing the work of the public.

It is absolutely critical that this process be transparent. If in those small number of cases where an individual requires discipline, where changes are made as a result of a complaint of improper procedure, then it is incumbent upon the RCMP to let the complainant know what the outcome was.

At this time, there is no indication of what occurs. The commissioner of the RCMP in responding to the report and recommendations of the commission in a finding is not required to produce that information to the complainant.

I do not know how we got to the point of talking about the recommendations in the 1990-91 report. I believe what we are talking about is the recommendations in the 1989-90 report. Substantial recommendations were put forward for changes in the RCMP legislation. Not only do these agencies have to be held apart in order to keep and encourage the public confidence in an organization that is there to handle complaints, but the legislation has to be strengthened to make it more effective.

It is interesting that in asking to be able to distribute interim reports and final reports of the agency, they are asking for the authority to make these matters of the public record and that the public can refer to previous actions taken by the commission in the event of certain kinds of activities. There is no reason that this should not be a matter of public record. There is no reason that this recommendation should not be implemented.

Another thing is that the commissioner within 60 days should be required to provide notice to the commission and to the complainant of the commissioner's response to the report and recommendation of the commission. The complainant, as I mentioned before, is entitled to know what kind of action is to be taken in a case where there was inappropriate use of force or inappropriate action on the part of the police force and its members. That should be reported. Any disciplinary action, any changes taken, should be reported back to the complainant and the commission.

The commission asks for the ability to share information that it has gathered, even personal information with the provinces who are responsible for contracting for those police forces. It is important that the attorneys general of the various provinces have access to the kinds of information that may in future affect important police operation matters. It would allow them to co-ordinate and to change actions of other police forces where it is important. This kind of change to the legislation would certainly help and be effective.

• (1740)

An interesting problem arose if the complaint is made against the police force in its entirety as well as against a member of the police force. It is suggested in the recommendation that if it is simply against a member, the discipline falls on the member. The member becomes a scapegoat and the force is held blameless. The entire operation of the police force is not up for consideration. It is absolutely important that this recommendation be implemented as well.

The commission in its recommendations in the 1989–90 report asked for a mechanism to be provided to permit mediation of complaints where the police force and the complainant could sit down in a mediated situation rather than going to court and rather than being placed in a continuous adversarial, confrontational type of arrangement that that environment provides. Mediation as an opportunity should be provided.

In summation, it is important that those recommendations be considered seriously. There should be ongoing dialogue between the office of the Solicitor General and the chairperson of this commission for the implementation of those recommendations. We could have an improved legislative base from which this commission could operate. It would be an agency that is more effective in resolving the complaints of the public.

In fact in the long run this will enhance the credibility of Canada's police force and will improve the law enforcement activities in Canada.

One of the requirements that we should be looking for in this House is a statement from the Solicitor General. That will probably be the subject of the next private member's motion. The subject of the next private members' motion is probably that the Solicitor General report to this House the progress on the implementation of these particular recommendations.

It is important that this agency not be rolled into the External Review Committee, that its mandate and its responsibility be blurred by an activity which is not in any way related.

The suggestion is that the government will save money in this process. By the time the moves are all made and the two agencies move into their new facilities, expand the number of floors they take up and rearrange things no money will be saved. In the long run, it is likely that RCMP Public Complaints Commission will be harmed in its ability to carry out its absolutely critical tasks.

Hopefully the government is in a position to reconsider what I think is a strategic error in the law enforcement policy of Canada. To reiterate, the RCMP is literally the finest police force in the country, if not in the entire world. It is respected from coast to coast to coast by all Canadians as having done an enormously good job. When there have been complaints, we have seen those complaints addressed and we have moved on.

At this point there has to be serious consideration by the government to complaints from the public, that those complaints be moved on quickly and effectively, without harming law enforcement and to the satisfaction of the complainant. At least they got a fair hearing.

The RCMP sets a standard for law enforcement in this country. The handling of complaints in an effective, fair, even-handed manner where the complainant gets to know the reasons a situation occurred, for better or for worse does not harm this police force. It does not harm the cause of law enforcement. At least it lays to rest the often serious concerns of complainants.

It also sets an example to other police forces in this country that there is strict accountability, that the RCMP has the courage and the integrity to answer. It has full accountability to the citizens' confidence in it of delegating the right to use force in the enforcement of the laws. That example would go a long way to resolving many of the complaints that we are faced with each day.

Mrs. Monique B. Tardif (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, it is with pleasure that I rise today to address the House on a motion sponsored by the hon. member for North Island—Powell River, which reads as follows:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government should cancel the proposal to amalgamate the RCMP Public Complaints Commission with the RCMP External Review Committee, and furthermore the government should implement the recommendations contained in the 1990–91—

Or rather the 1989–90, as my colleague corrected in his presentation

> —RCMP Public Complaints Commission Annual Report.

From the outset, it must be understood that the issue of the consolidation of the RCMP Public Complaints Commission and the RCMP External Review Committee is separate from the proposal to consider amending the RCMP Act for the purpose of improving the complaints process.

The former action is structural, a streamlining of the system to improve efficiency.

The latter pertains to a substantive review of the effectiveness of the accountability mechanism, and is in no way precluded by a merger of the two agencies.

To better explain this distinction, let me first provide a brief history of the creation of the Public Complaints Commission and the External Review Committee.

Many significant amendments to the RCMP Act were passed in 1986. Within this package of amendments, a substantial number, including the creation of the RCMP Public Complaints Commission and the RCMP External Review Committee, were in direct response to the findings and recommendations of the Marin commission of inquiry, embodied in the commission's report of 1976.

The Marin commission was established in 1974 to inquire into public complaints, internal discipline and grievance procedure within the RCMP.

The Marin commission recommended that within the RCMP, the public complaint system operate separately from the disciplinary system. However, at the independent review stage, the commission recommended the appointment of a sole authority, referred to in the report as the federal police ombudsman, to review and make recommendations on matters of public accountability, internal discipline and grievances.

Notwithstanding the recommendation for a single review authority, two separate agencies were formed through amendments to the RCMP Act in 1986: the RCMP Public Complaints Commission to review RCMP handling of complaints made against individual members of the force by the public and the RCMP External Review Committee to review and make recommendations on certain types of grievances initiated by members and appeals of formal discipline and discharge or demotion actions initiated by management.

The committee became operational in 1986 and the commission in 1988.

It is important to keep in mind that ten years passed from the time the Marin commission submitted its report of recommendations in 1976 until the RCMP Act was amended.

In that period of time successive governments researched, consulted on, and refined the issues that resulted in significant amendments to the RCMP Act and the creation of two civilian oversight bodies. Compare this deliberate and extensive process of consideration with the fact that, after only two years of the commission's being operational, the then Chairman proposed in the 1989–90 annual report 30 recommendations for improvement necessitating further substantial amendments to the RCMP Act.

As I have stated, the first study was an extensive process that evolved during a period of more than 12 years, which included the two–year inquiry by the Marin Commission. The Public Complaints commission recommendations were based on a review of only two years of operational experience.

The recommendations in the 1989–90 Public Complaints Commission annual report touch on the scope and nature of the complaint process, post–complaint discipline and the monitoring of the complaint process.

As I indicated, changes to the RCMP public complaint process would necessitate further amendments to the RCMP Act.

• (1750)

Because the commission had only been in operation for two years, it was believed premature to consider amendments to the RCMP Act at that time.

As part of the streamlining measures contained in the government's February 1992 budget, it was announced that a number of agencies would be consolidated, including the RCMP Public Complaints Commission and the RCMP External Review Committee. This was done to provide a more efficient management process to handle complaint investigations and grievances.

The purpose of the amalgamation is to reduce administrative costs, increase efficiencies in program delivery and avoid duplication.

Bill C–93, an act to implement certain government organization provisions of the budget tabled in the House of Commons on February 25, 1992, would create the new independent review commission for the RCMP. This bill was tabled in the House on February 5, 1993 and has just been passed on second reading and referred to a legislative committee. With the bill now before the House, my colleague from North Island—Powell River has the opportunity to propose amendments during the committee's clause-by-clause proceedings or at report stage in the House of Commons.

The return to the original Marin commission recommendation of a single review authority does not detract from the distinctiveness of these two functions or impugn the impartiality of either process.

In practice, all the major activities of these two agencies will be assumed by the single agency. Moreover, as many of the administrative functions of the commission and the committee are analogous, the integration of these two agencies will result in greater efficiency and administrative savings. As well, once the new commission is established, there will be a reduction to one chairperson, one vice-chairperson and one deputy chairperson from the current configuration of, in total, two chairmen and two vice-chairmen.

With respect to the potential for conflict of interest, or real or apparent bias arising from one agency handling both public complaints and internal grievances and discipline, Bill C-93 deals with these issues. For example, one particular provision ensures that the deputy chairperson review any matter previously reviewed by the chairperson in the other context, and the legislation provides that the chairperson cannot use information that he or she has obtained from a discipline case to initiate a complaint in the public interest.

The legislation which will give effect to the new agency was drafted after a series of extensive consultations among officials of the Public Complaints Commission, the External Review Committee, the Privy Council Office, the RCMP and the Secretariat of the Ministry of the Solicitor General to ensure that all issues and potential difficulties were fully addressed.

In the end, we are maintaining an independent review system, resembling more closely the single authority envisaged by the Marin commission, with legislative safeguards that protect against possible conflict of interest situations and streamlined to increase efficiency and reduce administrative costs. The new body will continue to provide the same high quality of complaints investigation and grievance review.

I have explained why the recommendations of the 1989-90 Public Complaints Commission annual report were not pursued. Once the independent review commission of the RCMP is established and running and there has been a sufficient period of experience with it, improvements might suggest themselves.

As the system has matured since the 1989 recommendations and because of the amalgamation, it would not be appropriate to base future recommendations on the 1989-90 review. After a sufficient time of operation, we will be able to consider whether it is necessary to take a fresh look at the system with the participation of the independent review commission, ministry officials, the RCMP, both rank and file and management, the Department of Justice and the central agencies.

The consolidation of the commission and the committee does not preclude a subsequent review of the efficacy of the legislation. This is not a situation where a choice has to be made to amalgamate or conversely to implement the recommendations embodied in the 1989-90 annual report.

The decision to amalgamate is premised on this government's commitment to implement streamlining measures. This consolidation in no way jeopardizes the integrity of the oversight mechanism which is ultimately established. If there are any problems or issues that arise after a reasonable period of operation, they can be addressed at the appropriate time.

[English]

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I am delighted to take part this evening in making some comments on this motion by the member for North Island—Powell River. May I begin by saying that the parliamentary secretary gives a very interesting and accurate historical perspective on what happened.

May I comment briefly on what I consider to be an incredible Dickensian coincidence in connection with this motion. I notice that the member has a motion dated March 30, 1992. It concerns the proposed amalgamation of the two bodies. He happens to have it on the Order Paper today, of all days. What a fluke, since we happen to be speaking today, of all days, on Bill C-93. One portion of Bill C-93 happens to be precisely the exact same subject matter that the hon. member brought up March 30, 1992. It has taken this long to get here.

I guess in effect he has had an extra kick at the can to criticize at least a portion of Bill C–93 after we just voted to have no further debate on Bill C–93 and to proceed to committee. By the way, I voted against that because we should not be stopping debate in this House of Commons.

However, having said that, let us take a look at what that portion of Bill C–93 attempts to accomplish and why the hon. member moved his motion. It is an attempt to consolidate the External Review Committee and the RCMP Public Complaints Commission. The plain and simple reason is to save money. We are told that if these two bodies are amalgamated, there will be a saving of approximately $1 million a year. In government language there will be a reduction of seven person–years in the operation of this new commission.

The hon. member who spoke just before me also indicated that there would only be one chairperson instead of two and one vice–chairperson instead of two, with the usual support mechanisms.

Contrary to popular belief and to the unfortunate slurs that have been foisted upon the Liberal Party by the government, we are not averse to saving money where that makes sense. We support saving money where it makes sense. We think in this particular instance that it makes some sense to amalgamate the two agencies.

It is interesting that the Conservative member opposite reminded us that at one time there was a feeling that these two commissions should be one. Notwithstanding that feeling, they became two. Now, for budgetary constraints it has been decided that they become one again.

Is there something wrong with that? The member for North Island—Powell River pointed to three specifics. I wrote them down. He wanted a fair and impartial investigation mechanism. That is reasonable. He did not, however, cite any evidence in his remarks as to why this proposed amalgamated commission would be anything but fair and impartial in its investigations. He said that the RCMP must co–operate with the commission. Who could disagree? However, is there any evidence that the RCMP would not co–operate with this proposed commission? Is there any evidence that as a matter of policy the RCMP has not been co–operating with both the External Review Committee and the RCMP Public Complaints Commission? I would suggest that there is no such evidence.

He said that that process must be transparent. By that of course he means that the public should be able to judge what is going on. That is something that is not going to be changed by amalgamating.

• (1800)

Am I almost out of time, Mr. Speaker? Let me finish. I want to bring to the attention of those who are listening who have followed this one specific clause of Bill C–93 as it deals with this independent complaint commission. I cite it specifically. Clause 25(6) reads:

> No member of the force is eligible to be appointed or to continue as a member of the commission.

There can be no question of independence since there cannot be a member of the force on the commission.

Unfortunately I do not have time to comment on the recommendations in the RCMP Public Complaints Commission annual report, particularly since the wrong date was given.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The time provided for consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired. Pursuant to Standing Order 96(1), the order is dropped from the Order Paper.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 deemed to have been moved.

TRANSPORTATION

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to speak about transportation. It arises out of a question that I put to the Minister of Transport on November 20, 1992. It was a question that was very pertinent to what is going on in Atlantic Canada and the lack of a transportation policy by this government.

We were dealing with the situation in which CP had requested the abandonment of portions of the line from Saint John to Montreal. The effect of the abandonment of that line would mean the end of VIA Rail service three out of six days of the week.

We are seeing more and more pressure being put on the highway systems of Atlantic Canada. We realize, of course, that the railway has been abandoned in Newfoundland. It has been abandoned in Prince Edward Island. The government is in the process of abandoning the line from Truro to Sydney, all of which puts major burdens on our highway network. We are clearly facing a major problem in New Brunswick as well as in other provinces in Atlantic Canada, but the unique thing about Atlantic Canada is that all roads eventually go through New Brunswick if you are trying to travel from anywhere in Atlantic Canada to Upper Canada, as we call it, to Ontario or Quebec.

That means that when you tamper with a rail line and abandon that then that brings about greater pressure on our highways. Anybody who has been in New Brunswick realizes the major problem with truck transportation on a two-lane Trans-Canada Highway.

I asked the minister to tell us what the policy is. What is the transportation policy of this government as it relates to Atlantic Canada?

The answer comes back that they are looking at it, they are not sure, that all the lines have not yet really been abandoned, they will study it and they will get back to us.

Clearly there has to be a transportation policy which is going to be supportive of the three major elements of transportation in Atlantic Canada which are air, highway and rail.

If this government has its way there will be only one rail line that runs from Halifax to Montreal and if this government takes the next step, it will probably try to sell off that line to another private concern so that there will not be a national rail line that runs from Halifax to Vancouver. That is a shocking and callous display by this government.

My speaking time is limited and I have much on my mind and many concerns about this government's lack of policy in the area of transportation. Mr. Speaker, I can tell by the look on your face that you are concerned about it as well. It is a concern for all citizens of this country. We have to link this country together from east to west. If we are going to have a disjointed transportation policy that puts danger on our highways and destroys the steel linkage across this nation, then in effect we have started the dismemberment of this country.

I ask the government to come forward with a policy, stop rail line abandonment until that policy is in place and do something about the Trans-Canada Highway in New Brunswick and all of Atlantic Canada. It needs an upgrading, it needs something done. Let us see some action from this government.

Mr. Lee Richardson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I want to respond to the hon. member for Moncton who raised these issues of concern.

First, I would like to deal with the question of the rails because of course by issuing notices of intent, CP Limited has initiated the rail line abandonment regulatory process available under law.

There are certain real opportunities that should be considered by those interested in the continuation of rail service on these lines. The National Transportation Agency hearings will provide a perfect forum for all parties to raise their concerns.

With respect to highways, the federal government has certainly recognized that the road system in New Brunswick is in bad condition. A study of the national highway system identified that while only 961 kilometres or 4 per cent of the national highway system is in New Brunswick, over $2.2 billion or 16 per cent of the total required to upgrade the whole system is located in that province.

The government does not have to apologize for its commitment to highway spending in maritime Canada. New Brunswick is benefiting now from a cost-shared agreement which provided $131 million of federal funds over eight years to upgrade the highway system. For that matter since 1984 the federal government has contributed over $650 million in highway programs in Atlantic Canada alone, which represents a higher investment in this region than in any other region in Canada.

New Brunswick and Newfoundland have been the largest recipients of federal highway funds with over $240 million and $250 million contributed respectively.

In addition, the Minister of Finance announced in his December economic statement the national infrastructure program which will result in more than $2 billion during the next five years. Federal assistance will be provided on priority highway projects in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia in order that significant work can be commenced on development of an Atlantic expressway.

We too are sorry that details have not yet been ironed out. I know that the Minister of Transport has made this a very real priority and that the message is clearly understood by the negotiators who are determined to strike the best deal possible for all parties concerned.

SALMON FISHERY

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Mr. Speaker, this discussion started with a question that I asked of the minister of fisheries five months ago yesterday.

In response to a question I put to him, he said that because he entered into agreements with aboriginals for conservation purposes, for management of fish resources and for the sale of fish that there are tensions in the industry in B.C.

Those are not the reasons. Had they been agreements for conservation, everybody would have supported them. Agreements for management would have had the same degree of support. The only question with sale is how many? If the aboriginals were selling the number of fish that they were allotted, there would have been no problem with that either.

The problem is there is no policing of the regulations and to the extent that there was supervision, the supervision was not even-handed. Everyone knows and admits that now. DFO officials will admit they were told to observe, record and report but not to do anything further than that if they were dealing with aboriginals. With respect to others, they were to arrest them on the spot if they liked.

As a result of these tensions the minister said a great deal is being made of a situation of the alleged disappearance. It is much more than alleged. A DFO official told me that 1.2 million sockeye had gone missing. When Dr. Pearse did his study he came up with a figure closer to 500,000 but whatever, it is a lot of sockeye. It is not a little thing. It is something pretty important.

The minister said it was a great success, a great year for B.C., because so many more spawners returned in this low cycle year than were expected. With respect to the Stuart Lake run, perhaps the most important of all, while we were hoping and expecting and counting on getting 200,000 spawners, according to Dr. Pearse we got 64,000, less than one-third of what we anticipated. We knew they were in the river, but they did not get to the spawning ground.

• (1810)

It is not just that they did not get there. The ones that arrived, according to Dr. Pearse, were all net scarred. They had fought a tough fight to get through the many nets that were in the Fraser River picking up these fish. The question remains, and we will not know for another four years, whether or not the spawning of even one-third of the expected number was successful. We will just have to wait and see.

It was a bad year in British Columbia. It is not because of the new strategy that there have been troubles. It is because the strategy was not applied even-handedly. It goes against both. We know that Indians were taking advantage of the situation and we know that whites were taking advantage as well.

Stories were related and not denied by anyone that white fishing boats would take a single Indian on board and put that person on deck where he or she could be seen. They then could do almost anything they wanted without fear of being picked up by DFO officials.

That is what makes it wrong. It was not even-handed. There was not the supervision that was needed to guarantee the resource. Those are the problems in the industry, not the fact that a new strategy has been introduced.

Mr. Ross Belsher (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, in reply to the hon. member opposite, who has shown real concern about what happened last summer in the fisheries on the west coast, yes there were problems. I will be the first to admit that. Also, as the summer unfolded, corrective action was taken to make sure that the fish that we wanted to get to the spawning grounds would get there.

We had estimated that there would be 6.4 million fish, which exceeded the pre-season estimates and the largest run of a low-cycle year in 80 years. Salmon every four years return to their birthplace, spawn and die. The cycle then starts all over again.

The number of early Stuart sockeye which returned to spawn, some 65,000—I have seen 66,000, I have seen 64,000, and I have seen 65,000, but within 1,000 of each other—has only once been surpassed since 1960. That I believe was four years previous.

Over all the British Columbia commercial fishing fleet had a very successful fishing season this year. In fact, it has been estimated that it had over 400,000 fish, more than what the total allotment should have been, but that is not the problem that the hon. member was alluding to. He is alluding to the problem of what took place on the lower Fraser River of the early Stuart runs.

When the problem was identified, and the member opposite will have to agree with this, on August 6 all native fishing was disallowed in the river and the nets were taken out. This was watched by helicopter surveillance so that all of the spawners, all the fish that were in the river to spawn, would get back to their grounds. A very successful season of spawners has been there, so we can look forward four years from now to a very successful fishing season.

VETERANS

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, on September 17 I directed a question in the House to the acting Minister of Communications. It was with respect to the drama documentary The Valour and the Horror, produced by the National Film Board and shown on the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

This piece of work is now being distributed by the National Film Board to schools and other institutions. The problem is that anyone can rent it and anyone who wants to rent it, gets it.

The film series is billed as a drama documentary, a documentary. Dramatized truth is what it is supposed to be.

The drama documentary that runs three parts is anything but truth. The level of historical rightness contained in the series is totally and completely false. There is a complete lack of balance and it pays no attention to the allied situation in World War II. It has an emphasis on the negative. It demonstrates Canadians as inept, murderers and horror creators. It is a shameful expression by our National Film Board and by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

Veterans right across Canada have risen up. They have written and complained but that does not matter. The McKenna brothers were out to get Sir Arthur Harris, chief of bomber command. He was shown as ruthless, a murderer and someone who would bomb and kill women and children.

The Normandy—Dieppe activity was shown as a case where Canadians were badly led. They were incompetent troops and untrained troops. They were troops that did not know what they were doing. In Hong Kong, where our troops held off the Japanese invaders for 18 days, one of our men received the Victoria Cross.

This documentary shows our troops as incompetent. This is the invention of the McKennas. They have decided to rewrite history. Forget about the truth. Forget about Adolf Hitler. Forget about the fact that the German war machine had taken over all of Europe, all of the European part of the Soviet Union and that it occupied North Africa.

Forget about the fact that the Japanese, who brutally treated people, had occupied all of southeast Asia. Forget about the damage done and say our people murdered a few people. They killed a few people. A few of the enemy civilians were bombed. That is the spirit that the McKennas want to give to national television.

I know you signalled me, Mr. Speaker, that my time is almost up but I must give you a feeling for a very good veteran who served as a justice in the Supreme Court—

[Translation]

Mrs. Nicole Roy-Arcelin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to answer the hon. member for Mississauga South.

The communications minister has always respected the autonomy principle regarding the activities of the National Film Board and does not interfere with the creativity aspect of its decisions. As a producer and distributor of films and video material, the NFB is entirely autonomous in creating and marketing its productions.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, The Valour and the Horror is a three-part documentary on Canada's participation in World War II produced by Galafilm Inc., of Montreal, in collaboration with the NFB and the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. This project was the brain-child of an independent producer. This program has raised controversy about Canada's participation in World War II.

This film was reviewed in minute detail during the public hearings conducted by the Senate sub-committee on veterans affairs following numerous complaints from some veterans and military historians who claimed that this film gave a distorted account of World War II events.

Mr. Speaker, you certainly know that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation ombudsman indicated in his report that the show might contain historical inaccuracies. However, the CRTC reviewed the complaints concerning this production and found no irregularities in the way the matter was handled by the CBC.

The Senate committee has now released its report and recommendations regarding the series.

The NFB holds all the non-commercial Canadian rights for the distribution of The Valour and the Horror whereas Radio-Canada and the CBC hold all broadcasting rights for Canada. The usual distribution policy was followed. This production can be rented or purchased from all the NFB distribution centres in Canada. In response to concerns expressed by some members of the public, the NFB is preparing a document to be distributed to those who either buy or rent the series in order to put the events into their historical context. Therefore, anyone who—

JUSTICE

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, in the brief four minutes I have allotted to me I wish to expand on a question that I asked one week ago.

On that day, February 9, an event occurred in the legal history of Canada which is unprecedented. The coroner's jury investigating the tragic murder of 11-year old Christopher Stephenson reconvened and issued a statement at a press conference.

I think it is important to read the statement verbatim into the record of this House of Commons:

> We spent four and one-half months listening to the testimony of approximately 90 witnesses before making our verdict and recommendations. We feel strongly that our 71 recommendations, if adopted, will preclude a tragedy of this nature from happening again.
>
> Crucial and indispensable to these recommendations was the cross-examination of these witnesses by Mr. Tim Danson who represented Jim and Anna Stephenson. His consistent pursuit of the truth, from all witnesses, greatly benefited our decisions. Indeed, we cannot conceive of an inquest of this depth and nature proceeding without the perspective provided by Mr. Danson on behalf of the Stephensons who are the parents of Christopher, the victim.
> The Solicitor General of Canada, the Honourable Doug Lewis, has publicly stated that Jim and Anna Stephenson did not need independent legal counsel and that had they come to him for legal advice he would have told the Stephensons this. Mr. Lewis also said that his decision to deny funding to the Stephensons was sensitive, sound and just. We disagree with both points. We think he is wrong. We therefore urge the minister to reconsider his position and we hope that he will consider our opinion in the positive and constructive way in which it has been given.
> We therefore strongly recommend and urge the federal government and the provincial government to compensate Jim and Anna Stephenson for all legal costs incurred in this inquest, the results, if acted upon, will benefit all Canadian families.
> We remind everyone that on June 17, 1988, Christopher Stephenson, age 11, went shopping with his mother at a local mall. They had every right in the world to be there. Joseph Fredericks who had spent 34 years in either mental or correctional institutions should not have been there. Mr. Danson made all this very clear to us.

The Solicitor General is obfuscating. The Solicitor General is stalling. He is talking about consulting with the bar association. He is talking about consulting with the Law Society of Upper Canada.

He does not need to consult because an independent jury of ordinary Canadians has already told him what to do. I quote the foreman:

> We are the ones that were asked as citizens of this country to attend the inquest. I think we are probably the only ones who have the insight to recognize that the government should pick up the legal expenses for the Stephensons.

To suggest first of all that the taxpayer should not be paying the cost is a specious argument. All legal bills can be examined by the court to determine that they are fair and reasonable. To say that this will create a precedent is also nonsense. To make the payment and simply announce this is not a precedent ends it. There is precedent in legal history for this, and I cite it for the Canadian public now.

Susan Nelles was paid an amount of money by the province of Ontario some time after her preliminary inquiry on a no-precedent basis. There is absolutely no reason why the Solicitor General cannot accept this recommendation by this jury.

The Toronto Sun said it best in an editorial:

> Well, it is time to look after the interests of the victims. Federal Solicitor General Doug Lewis and the provincial government can start with the Stephensons.

I ask the Solicitor General to please pay the reasonable legal bill.

[Translation]

Mrs. Monique B. Tardif (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I believe that the Solicitor General, like my hon. colleague, is sympathetic to the tragic loss experienced by the Stephensons and the efforts they have made to participate in the recent inquest in order to get the best possible results.

Consequently, on compassionate grounds, the government offered what it believed to be a reasonable settlement of their outstanding civil action against the Crown. That offer remains on the table.

With regard to the legal fees, the government has no idea what they amount to, because no final bill or account has been submitted by the family or their counsel. Let me be clear that the offer the government made to settle the law suit was not specifically to pay the legal fees, although the family would be free to use it for that purpose.

On the matter of the inquest itself, it should be noted that inquests are provincial mechanisms established at considerable cost, to protect the interests of citizens by ensuring that the causes of deaths are known and corrective action, where required, is recommended.

The federal government co-operated fully in this process, also at considerable expense. I believe my hon. colleague will understand that the offers, which are still on the table, should receive an answer at the earliest opportunity.

MUNICIPAL INFRASTRUCTURE

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Mr. Speaker, last week I had 11 constituents come into my riding office in Toronto. Seven out of those 11 constituents had lost their jobs. They were out of work. These were not habitual receivers of unemployment insurance or welfare. Each of them in fact had worked all their adult life. All of them wanted to work.

The problem is that there is no work available for them. There is no work as an architect. There is no work as an optometrist's assistant. There is no work as a sales manager. There is no work in the hospitality industry. There is no work in computers. It goes on and on.

At the same time I walked out the front door of my office and looked across the street at the East York, North York O'Connor-Bermondsey industrial district. What did I see there? I saw the McBride Group plant for sale. I saw the CCL Industries plant for sale with a sign on the front "Job Search Assistance Committee-Action Centre". I saw the McLellan and Stewart plant for sale. I saw Halls Canada Paper closed. I saw Long Packaging closed and for sale. I saw Block Drug for sale or for lease. I saw Rockwell International for sale. The list goes on and on because one-third of all of the plants in that industrial area are closed.

This is the industrial heartland of Canada. These plants were used to generate wealth for Canada and used to generate federal tax dollars. What, if anything, is there that we can do? If there is something we can do where is the money going to come from?

It is interesting to note that about one-third of all of the green plan budget, which is about $1 billion, has not as yet been publicly committed. Rather than spending that money on more and more studies, why do we not use that money not only to clean up the environment but also to stimulate the economy and to create jobs at the same time?

This Friday metropolitan Toronto is holding an economic summit to try to find ways to get the economy going again. I am going to be there. Will the minister come and will he bring with him a handful of that green plan money?

Mr. Jack Shields (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the green plan makes an important contribution to both the environment and the economic future of this country by investing substantial resources in science, education, technology and other programs which will help us meet our environmental goals in ways that promote economic prosperity. There are many examples of how green plan funding will contribute to Canadian competitiveness.

For instance, in the forest sector the green plan commits the government to accelerate and intensify its efforts to develop and deploy environmentally sound solutions to the forest management for insects and disease. Reducing loss or damage will yield benefits to Canadians to enhance economic and recreational use of our forests.

The green plan also recognizes that private sector research and development of environmental technologies promises new investment opportunities and the creation of jobs in Canada's environmental industries.

The environmental technology industry is among the fastest growing sectors in the Canadian economy and it will play an increasing role in positioning Canada favourably in a highly competitive world market. That is why the green plan has initiated a program to accelerate the development and demonstration of commercially viable environmental technologies. That is also why additional green plan funds have been made available to assist Canadian firms in locating, assessing, transferring and promoting environmental technologies.

This government recognizes the important contribution of infrastructure projects to both job creation and to Canada's competitive position in the global economy. In its December economic statement, the government announced a strategic investment program which will encompass investments in all regions to strengthen our national transportation system and communications network.

Investments will include upgrade of federally owned highways, bridges, ports and airports, as well as development of a high-speed, high-capacity information network across the country.

Over the next five years these initiatives will result in investments in national infrastructure of more than $2 billion and are expected to generate 6,000 to 8,000 direct jobs each year.

JAPAN'S ECONOMY

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, the effects of the recession are being felt in Japan, where businesses are limiting overtime and cutting staff. Bankruptcies are at the highest level in six years: there were 14,167 in 1992, compared to 10,723 in 1991.

According to some economists, Japan's economy has never been worse since the 1973 oil shock and businessmen are calling for lower taxes and a recovery budget.

Hundreds of firms have laid off contract, term or part-time workers hired in boom times. Other companies are encouraging employees to leave by taking early retirement.

These staff cuts subsequently affect small retailers and small and medium sized businesses, which are the backbone of the Japanese economy.

INTERNATIONAL YEAR OF INDIGENOUS PEOPLES

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, on December 10, the beginning of the International Year of Indigenous Peoples, the Australian Prime Minister apologized to aboriginal Australians for the damage caused to them by colonization.

A few days ago Bill Clinton drew attention to the fact that many American children experience conditions like those found in Third World countries such as Haiti and Bolivia.

In Canada, we have witnessed incidents such as substance abuse at Davis Inlet, high suicide rates at Big Cove, a rash of sexual assault charges at Sandy Bay and racist taunts of young Micmac hockey players.

When is our Prime Minister going to follow the lead of U.S. President Clinton and recognize that many aboriginal children in Canada live in Third World conditions?

LITERACY DAY

Mr. Ken James (Sarnia—Lambton): Mr. Speaker, as all members have been made aware, today is Love Literacy Day. With the support of the Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship, Frontier College, the Canadian Alliance for Literacy and the Movement for Canadian Literacy, we are focusing attention on this day.

It is a most appropriate time to pay tribute to the literacy organizations and the many volunteers who are active on this vital issue. The Canadian Alliance for Literacy, composed of national organizations working for literacy, brings together advocates for the promotion of literacy in Canada.

It is partnerships among funders such as the National Literacy Secretariat within the Department of Multiculturalism and Citizenship as well as provincial governments. It is partnerships between the non-governmental organizations, business, labour and governments.

Canadians and the organizations which support the literacy movement are the front line champions of literacy. On behalf of the Government of Canada and all Canadians, I offer my sincere gratitude for their efforts to achieve full literacy for all Canadians.

Love Literacy Day is an opportune time for recognizing the indispensable importance of literacy volunteers and their organizations to Canadian society.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, constituents have brought to the attention of some members of the House that the Department of External Affairs circulated a data input form inviting Canadians to document breaches of humanitarian law in the former Yugoslavia.

The form states that: "Canada will draw on information gathered by this process in preparing a report to the UN Secretary-General" and should be mailed to an Ottawa post office box.

The form asks for the name of the person filling out the form, a description of events such as "rape, torture, execution, unfair trials and so on". It also calls for names and commentary on individuals who have allegedly committed breaches of law under the heading "Perpetrators".

How has Canada become involved in this witch-hunt which smacks of McCarthyism. Imagine someone in Canada who knows someone or some people in the former Yugoslavia they do not like. They attribute all sorts of atrocities to them and get others to do likewise.

How is this information verifiable? Is Canada to be party to this potential kangaroo court? More important, how can this Draconian measure be condoned by this government? I ask the Prime Minister to direct his ministers to put a stop to this shameful exercise.

TOBACCO SMUGGLING

Mrs. Lise Bourgault (Argenteuil—Papineau): Mr. Speaker, ridicule will finally kill society.

Rich tobacco smugglers can buy real estate and other property with complete peace of mind, owing to a defect in the Criminal Code that does not provide for the seizure of goods acquired from the sale of smuggled cigarettes.

The warehouses of flue cured tobacco producers are robbed in broad daylight by criminals who sell the contraband in our famous flea markets. Distributors and retailers lost over $150 million in 1992 because of this illegal trade.

The governments in Quebec and Ottawa lost almost $1 billion in 1992, $450 million for Quebec and $500 million for Ottawa as its share of the tax that would have been collected in Quebec. Imagine the disaster for all of Canada.

Crime has increased 100 per cent and Canadian smokers have become the accomplices of organized crime, something which has not been seen since Prohibition. This has been going on since July 1991 and it is time to stop it.

Quebec and Ottawa must drastically cut taxes in order to kill the black market. The Criminal Code must be amended to prevent these criminals from laundering money obtained from smuggling, the exits from the Indian reserves must be controlled and above all, Quebecers and Canadians must stop buying contraband cigarettes; otherwise, the governments alone will be unable to wipe out this evil.

MEMBERS FOR SKEENA AND CHAMBLY

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): Mr. Speaker, the French define politics as war in peacetime.

Indeed the member for Chambly and the member for Skeena seemed to be at war with each other. But upon checking, we found out that the member for Skeena was misquoted and so was the member for Chambly.

What I make of that is that people were misquoted. At least they agree that they disagree. I would ask both hon. members, the one for Skeena and the one for Chambly, to realize that this is not a battlefield but a place of peace.

PETITIONS

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey—White Rock—South Langley): Mr. Speaker, last fall the member for Surrey North filed a petition with the House containing the names of people who purportedly were objecting to the provisions of Bill C-86.

I thought it would be a good idea for the people who had signed the petition to get information from a government member too. I wrote to them and gave the government position on Bill C-86. Lo and behold, 15 per cent of the letters were returned to me by the post office, saying no such person or no such address.

It may be the post office did not look far enough. It may be the post office should have looked at the tombstones in the local cemetery for some of the names. After all, some elections have been won that way. I am sure the member for Surrey North would not do a thing like that but I do think, Mr. Speaker, you have a problem with some of the petitions.

METRO TORONTO

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, the government continues to say the recession is over but as we know few Canadians believe them. Certainly not those Canadians living in metropolitan Toronto.

Despite these very proud Tory declarations, the economic malaise in the metropolitan Toronto region, an indispensable part of the national economic fabric, continues virtually unabated.

This Friday the metro chairman, Mr. Alan Tonks, will be convening an economic summit of all three levels of government, business, labour and the Canadian public.

• (1410)

The Conservative government is sending four ministers to the conference. I would suggest the time for empty words is over, the time for inaction is over, the time for staying a course that is clearly not working for Canadians in Toronto and across the country is over.

Torontonians want change. They want action. They want a proud government that is prepared to intervene, to stimulate the economy and to get this indispensable part of the Canadian machinery going again.

Between the Tory government in Ottawa and the NDP government at Queen's Park, Toronto is being sold out.

LABOUR

Mr. Barry Moore (Pontiac—Gatineau—Labelle): Mr. Speaker, the Conference Board of Canada has predicted a year of relative labour peace in the Canadian work place.

Low inflation and the leadership of the federal government in exercising fiscal restraint has meant that bargaining priorities have shifted to such important work place improvements as access to job training and other non-monetary benefits.

Flying in the face of these positive developments is the president of the Public Service Alliance of Canada, Mr. Daryl Bean, who has vowed to take money from a $1.25 million collective bargaining account to target certain candidates for defeat in the upcoming election.

I wonder if PSAC members are aware of Daryl Bean's intention to endorse and to work for the election of Bloc Quebecois candidates.

It strains all credulity to see PSAC's endorsement of a party that is committed to the demise of Canada and with it the disappearance of some 45,000 federal jobs in Quebec. If I were a member of PSAC, I would demand my money back.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Mr. Cid Samson (Timmins—Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, I would like to recognize the members of Mouvement Action—Chômage, some of whom are here today, for the role they have played in raising the public profile of the sweeping and destructive changes planned for the UI Act.

Mouvement Action Chômage can tell many horror stories of their experiences with the UI system, problems which will escalate under the new legislation.

Mouvement Action-Chômage has done an excellent job of informing the public about the proposed amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act and Bill C-105. I urge them to keep on fighting with the same enthusiasm and determination they have shown so far.

BOSNIA

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): Mr. Speaker, for the past several weeks, Canadians from all areas and walks of life have been outraged by the systematic rape of women in Bosnia to create as much social and racial disruption as possible.

The degradation of women has been one of the most sickening atrocities of this conflict that has had more than its share of new lows in human behaviour.

Many people from Delta have called or written demanding that the Canadian government do more to stop this type of outrage in the former Yugoslavia.

The Government of Canada would be delighted to stop this senseless conflict but there has to be some initiative on the part of the combatants themselves. Therefore I appreciate the fact that Canada is sending 1,200 more troops to the area to try and help the helpless and to use their well-honed skills in peacekeeping to restore some sanity and humanity to this sick country.

MUNICIPALITIES

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur): Mr. Speaker, municipalities across this country are being faced with a new problem.

The government has frozen federal grants in lieu of taxes.

[Translation]

Furthermore, to avoid paying any tax increases on government property, the government has frozen the federal grants it has been paying in lieu of taxes.

Once again this Tory government is asking Canadian taxpayers to bear the brunt of its financial mismanagement. This government refuses to take the responsibility for its own mistakes and has failed to keep its promises.

[English]

The time has come for the government to stand up and take responsibility for its mismanagement of the economy. It is time for the government to stop asking others to pay for its mistakes, to live up to its commitments and provide fair and just grants in lieu of taxes to Canadian municipalities.

LITERACY DAY

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, a single mother in Saskatchewan who is raising three of her own children and two foster children went back to school when her pre-schooler caught her pretending to read. She is determined to learn to read but she should not have to do it alone.

In 1991 the government made a commitment to five million Canadians who have low literacy skills, promising to cut illiteracy rates in half by the year 2000. Today we are no closer to that goal.

Illiteracy is one of the greatest barriers to productivity and full employment in Canada. Some 38 per cent of Canadians have difficulty with everyday reading and are likely to be unemployed or underemployed. The resulting poverty has huge social costs.

Illiteracy costs Canada over $14 billion annually. Today is Love Literacy Day. It is time the government made literacy a top priority. It is time it invested in literacy programs as part of Canada's job strategy.

STOUFFERS

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, one year ago an important Trenton employer, Stouffers, announced the permanent layoff of 171 employees, a severe blow to a community already devastated by other plant closures and layoffs.

Special assistance was requested from federal departments in order to assure that the unemployed, the affected community businesses and the community at large would have every advantage to successfully adjust to the harsh economic reality.

Pursuant to this request an employment and immigration officer from the regional office visited Stouffers on April 6 and April 9, 1992 met with management and employees and provided misinformation which has cost 85 employees two to five weeks of unemployment insurance.

The case was appealed last month, but the board of referees refused to take any responsibility for the department's error. This is grossly unfair. I have asked the employment minister on many occasions to address this injustice. There has been no response.

Citizens cannot be made to pay for government bungling. We demand that the minister respond with fairness and compensation. How can we ever have confidence in proposed unemployment insurance changes without justice now?

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE REFORM

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. We heard that the chairman of the Quebec Tory caucus claimed a victory on Bill C–105, saying that they had obtained major concessions on a bill that is highly controversial in this country. However, the government House leader said these were only minor changes which did not in any way alter the substance of the bill.

My question to the Prime Minister is: Whom are we to believe? Who is telling the truth: André Harvey or Harvie Andre?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Another profound question.

Mr. Speaker, for the information of the Leader of the Opposition, we said before that we were prepared to make some improvements in the bill because we do not agree with the Liberals' position that unemployment insurance benefits should be paid to people who quit their jobs without just cause. However, we want to ensure that people who do have valid grounds to leave a job are protected. That has always been my position.

In fact, if the hon. member remains in the House this afternoon he will witness the tabling of a bill proposing certain amendments to improve the situation for Canadian workers.

[English]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, for two months the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Employment and Immigration have claimed that this bill was perfect and that the Liberal Party, the NDP and even the Bloc Quebecois were completely wrong. Now they have changed their minds and the government is showing that it does not support the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

If this bill is changed substantially will the Prime Minister inform this House that the Minister of Finance will come forward soon with a budget in order to rectify the situation? Will he tell Canadians exactly about the Canadian economic situation? Or, will the Prime Minister in the fifth year of his mandate, well into the fifth year of his mandate and with all the confusion that exists in the government, go to the Canadian people in an election and let the Canadian people decide?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we cannot call an election because the Leader of the Liberal Party has said there cannot be an election until he makes up his mind on the GST.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

• (1420)

Mr. Mulroney: Let us know. Make up your mind. Tell us where you stand on the GST. Tell us where you stand on free trade, yes or no, and you will get your election. You will not like the results but you will get it.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, if the Prime Minister would dare to call an election, if he would not chicken out, we would be very happy.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Chrétien: In 1983 the Prime Minister said: "The fundamental British tradition in this country calls for an election not in five years but within four years so that the people can judge the actions of this government".

When will the Prime Minister do what he was preaching in 1983 and again in 1988 when he said it has been the Canadian tradition to call an election after a government has completed four years of a mandate? When will the Prime Minister read his own words, not chicken out and call an election?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I said he will get an election just as quickly as he stands up on the floor of the House of Commons and tells us once and for all what he is going to do about the GST.

Where are you going to get the $18 billion without the GST? Where do you stand on free trade? Have the guts to stand up and tell the Canadians the truth and then—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Hamilton East.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister of employment and it concerns the changes to the unemployment insurance legislation.

Why is the government saying one thing in the French language and another thing in the English language vis-à-vis changes to the unemployment insurance? Why is the change called minor?

[Translation]

We know the hon. member for Jonquière has already said these are substantial and important changes. However, the government House leader has said they are very minor changes. Whom are we to believe: André Harvey or Harvie Andre?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, as a resident of the only officially bilingual province in Canada, I can assure the hon. member that the message is the same in English and in French: a person who without just cause, without provocation, without justification, quits his or her job will no longer be entitled to ask Canadian workers and employers to pay for his or her benefits.

[English]

Translated into the other official language of this country that is the same thing. A person in Canada who without reason, without justification, without provocation leaves a job cannot expect other hard working Canadians to pay him unemployment insurance benefits.

[Translation]

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, the government's backtracking on Bill C-105 proves the minister was wrong about sexual harassment.

Some hon. members: No, no.

Ms. Copps: He was wrong to accuse unemployed workers of spending their winters in Florida.

I would therefore like to ask the minister a straight question: Does he consider these new changes to be major or minor?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, no measure the government takes is ever taken lightly. It is always a serious matter because at the end of the day Canadian taxpayers will always have to foot the bill one way or another.

I hope the hon. member is prepared to support the measures we have taken and the measures we are about to take this afternoon to amend the legislation because they will benefit people who are subject to harassment, either sexual or otherwise. The purpose of these measures is to ensure that this legislation is implemented fairly and squarely for the benefit of Canadians and that contrary to what the Liberals would allow, unless they change their position, a person who quits voluntarily, without just cause, will not receive unemployment insurance benefits paid for by other taxpayers.

[English]

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

The Minister of Employment and Immigration has indicated that he will be bringing in new proposals on unemployment insurance, but it seems to me Canadians have made it very clear that they want a denunciation of the Draconian measures the minister has formally proposed. In fact members of his own caucus have not agreed with these. The Canadian Human Rights Commissioner has expressed concerns about women and other vulnerable groups in our society and how they might be affected.

Rather than trying to just eliminate terminator one to bring in terminator two, will the Prime Minister simply withdraw the changes to UI and bring in a real job plan to address unemployment? That is the issue in Canada, the rate of unemployment.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think all members of the House are waiting with bated breath for the announcement of deficit reduction programs that my hon. friend is going to announce. I want to make sure that I do not miss that.

What is being done in the House today is perfectly consistent with appropriate parliamentary procedure where the members of caucus, members of the Liberal Party and members of the NDP put forward their points of view and the minister seeks as reasonably as he can to accommodate those.

However there will be no change in the fundamental principle that I have enunciated from the very beginning in respect of the nature of this bill. It is what the minister has just stated, namely that someone who leaves his or her job without reason, without justification and without provocation ought not to expect that ordinary workers and men and women in Canada would continue to pay unemployment insurance benefits for them.

[Translation]

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary for the minister. Canadians will not be satisfied with minor changes. This bill is unacceptable and it is flawed. The problems this bill will create are quite obvious.

That is why I would like to put this question to the minister. As the minister is aware, people who quit their jobs without just cause are now penalized by a waiting period of up to three months.

Can the minister give the House the assurance that the bill he will table today will not include the same Draconian measures under another name?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I repeat. If we accept the NDP's proposal the only alternative is to increase unemployment insurance premiums and slow down economic recovery in this country by increasing the deficit.

Canadians, whether they are employed or unfortunately unemployed, know that we must take steps to control the deficit. The underlying principle of the government's proposal is that although a person who quits his job without just cause has the right to do so, and I respect that decision, that person should not expect other workers, other Canadian taxpayers to pay him unemployment insurance benefits.

Perhaps, as has already been suggested, there should be another social program for these people, but definitely not the Unemployment Insurance Program.

[English]

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker. The minister is simply saying he is going to bring in basically the same measures and force people on to social assistance at provincial and territorial expense. That is hardly dealing with the basic problem.

If the government wants to save money under the unemployment insurance system I would suggest that the Prime Minister bring forward a plan to get Canadians back to work. When does the Prime Minister propose to bring in such a plan to put Canadians back to work and address unemployment instead of attacking the unemployed?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the employment rates have improved quite appreciably. The news has been good on the employment front in the last number of months.

There have been some 161,000 full-time new jobs created in the last five or six months, particularly some 57,000 in December. Manufacturing sales are up. Our exports are up. More important, our unit costs compared with the United States in the first six months of this year are down by 5.2 per cent ensuring the competitive nature of what is taking place. Our industries are on a better footing. We have much better opportunities for selling abroad, thereby creating jobs at home.

• (1430)

If my hon. friend looks at the numbers available I think she will see there is reason for even the NDP to take some encouragement in what is taking place. The last thing I think she would want us to do would be to follow the example of the Ontario government which put forward a billion dollar job creation program and created 675 jobs.

HEALTH CARE

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister of health. In 11 days the minister in a secret deal will hand over to a private corporation the administration of non-insured health services for our First Nations people, ignoring their advice, their treaty rights to quality health care and their right to self-government.

Will the minister explain to Canadians why he has refused to take the advice of our First Nations' people and why was the whole tendering process conducted behind a curtain of secrecy?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, first I have to say that the member is wrong. We have consulted about what has been implemented following the report by the Auditor General in 1987 on the lack of adequate management and control of the non-insured health benefits for aboriginal people.

We implemented a national program directive and administrative procedure coupled with implementation of an health information claims processing system under contract with Ontario Blue Cross. It is already being done in Ontario, Saskatchewan, and Quebec and moving in Manitoba and phased in in other provinces.

Everything has been done normally. There is more resistance in Manitoba. We have had consultations and we will again. However, we will proceed.

Mrs. Ethel Blondin-Andrew (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the same minister. He may have listened but I do not think the people were consulted. The contract for non-insured native health services was given to Blue Cross by selected tender. I am sure that was not the advice given. First Nations were not even offered a chance to bid.

In the last round of constitutional discussions the minister and his government claimed to have endorsed the inherent right to self-government. Can the minister explain how this new health policy furthers the cause of self-government?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I believe the government is always committed to self-government. That operation is not basically directed to applying that principle or not. This operation has been necessary because once again there was a lack of control in the way payments were made and information was given. Therefore, based on tenders provided, when Ontario Blue Cross won the contract we decided to move.

The aboriginal peoples have been involved. In Saskatchewan, Ontario and Quebec it is working normally. I believe that it should work normally in Manitoba where I admit we have more problems today. We are continuing to work with the leadership in the province.

My colleague will understand that to provide a better administration of what represents $100 million for aboriginal people, the best way is the one we are presently using. We intend to continue to do that with the collaboration of the aboriginal people.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I would like to raise a question with the Prime Minister. Five years ago a federally funded report warned of an epidemic of child sexual abuse breaking out on the reserves in Manitoba. That report was ignored.

Today, sadly, on the Sandy Bay reserve there are over 50 cases of child sexual abuse pending. There is a continuing pattern of suicide among young people and the breakdown of families continues at an atrocious rate. The minister still refuses to respond to the pleas for help.

I want to appeal to the Prime Minister this afternoon to instruct the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development to pay attention to these calls for help for better counselling, better treatment and better housing conditions so that we can break this vicious cycle of poverty affecting this native community and native communities right across Canada.

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I have been informed of the problem raised by my colleague. I know the department of Indian affairs has been sensitive to the problem.

However, my hon. colleague knows that in the Department of National Health and Welfare the government recently decided to put up $160 million in order to deal with the social problems in Indian communities particularly. Some of our targets relate particularly to family violence, child abuse and sexual abuse.

We are now working with the leadership of the aboriginal people and in that case I would like to assure my colleague that we will act very quickly.

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur): Mr. Speaker, recent events at Big Cove, at Davis Inlet and at numerous other communities across the country illustrate that aboriginal Canadians are crying out for our help, yet this cry is falling on deaf ears.

In the case of Big Cove the federal government has yet to take any action on a coroner's inquest recommendation calling on the federal government to develop community-based mental health programs.

Will the Prime Minister give the residents of Big Cove his assurance today that he will personally take this file under his consideration and that the tragic crisis facing this community and others will receive his government's immediate action?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, it is very sad what happened in Big Cove yesterday. I am sure the whole House will join with me when I offer our condolences to the tribe or the band itself.

Two proposals were submitted by the band in January that were not given to the federal level, my own level. They were turned down by officials at the maritimes office. I called the chief last night and said I would personally look after the proposals made.

This afternoon I can say I have instructed the official on the two proposals turned down last month and they were accepted this morning.

TRADE

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

A Mexican government-supported development bank is openly supporting an operation to buy up U.S. companies and move them to Mexico in order to make big profits using cheap labour. Canada will be next.

Are members of the government going to sit on their collective butts while a Mexican government gang of carpetbaggers comes into this country to take jobs and move them down to Mexico, or will this government take action to protect Canadian jobs under NAFTA?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, possibly my friend should cool his rhetoric before he gets the facts.

The fact is that the Mexican government is not going to be involved in that bank.

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Well, Mr. Speaker, the fact is that the prospectus of the company involved indicates clearly that the Mexican bank will be involved in it.

About this there is no doubt: the Mexican Minister of Commerce has been in Montreal selling cheap Mexican labour. In the meantime the president of ACOA-supported Canadian Helicopters Ltd. says he is very much attracted by the cheap labour in Mexico, the lax labour standards and the lax environmental standards in the Mexican work place.

Does the government—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. McCurdy: I have all day, Mr. Speaker.

An hon. member: No you do not.

Mr. Speaker: That is sometimes a pious hope here. The hon. member will put his question, please.

• (1440)

Mr. McCurdy: My question for the Prime Minister is: Does this government not realize that NAFTA is going to launch a tremendous Mexican sting operation, which is already evidenced, to come up to Canada to sell cheap labour in Mexico even at the expense of some of the poorest parts of this country?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the next time my friend, the Secretary of Trade from Mexico, comes to Canada I am going to ask my friend to join us. The hon. member has just taken what was said totally out of context. What we did do yesterday was visit Canadair Challenger operations, SR Telecom and the AMF operation which re-manufactures rail cars and diesel engines.

In each case these companies are actively selling successfully into Mexico, generating jobs back here, generating work for people who are paid Canadian salaries and able to compete against what my hon. friend refers to as low salaries in Mexico.

The point of the matter is that my friend should get his facts straight and should put out a balanced position as to what the attitudes and policies of the Mexican government are. I think we were very successful yesterday in helping create jobs for Canadians in Mexico who will take advantage of the North American free trade agreement.

PUBLIC DEBT

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

In 1984, when this government took office, the net public debt was 46 per cent of the Gross Domestic product. Today it is more than 62 per cent. Yesterday, the C. D. Howe Institute told us that we are on the verge of a financial crisis. For example, the European Community has set a threshold of 50 per cent for its new members.

Given that this debt is the result of its policies, what exactly is this government's objective and when does it think it will reach this objective?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the plain fact of the matter is that this government has been operating in the black since 1987. What has been the drag is the inherited debt we took over from the Liberal government. If there had not been a debt inherited, today we would have a surplus of $20 billion.

We have cut the deficit from $38 billion. As a percentage of GDP we have cut it from 8.7 per cent to about 4.8 per cent. We are on a fiscal track which will bring the budget into balance as soon as we can get some growth into the economy.

The fact of the matter is the problems with Canada today result from the inherited debt that was left by the Liberal government. When the Liberal Party suggests that it has a plan for deficit control, its record was an average increase of program spending of 14 per cent over the last 15 years. We have cut it to below the rate of inflation.

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, the problem is not the inherited debt of a decade ago. It is the nine years this country has lost under this government.

This government loves to cite the C. D. Howe Institute. Let me cite from the C. D. Howe report referring to this government: "When the economy was booming in 1988, they increased spending and cut taxes; when we went into a recession, they increased taxes and cut spending. They have made the booms worse and the busts worse".

What will it take for this government to stop blaming others? What will it take for this government to realize that we are indeed in a crisis and it is a direct result of eight to nine years of gross economic mismanagement by this front bench?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member wants to quote from the C.D. Howe report, I can do that too.

Ed Neufeld said: "I was listening to the year-end speech of one of our political leaders," and that happened to be the Leader of the Opposition. "Very gently, he was saying: 'Let's just accept more inflation'. 'Accept more inflation'—there are a lot of people who are—ready to hear that message". As a matter of fact, he wants to abandon Canadian monetary policy. He wants the Americans to run our monetary policy.

I ask the hon. member where has he been on the 12 or 13 bills that we have brought in to contain expenditures? He has voted with his party against every single solitary measure.

It is rather interesting that the Leader of the Opposition did not raise this question. When he was in charge of the cash register as President of the Treasury Board, he increased program spending at the rate of 16 per cent per year.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I also have a question for the Minister of Finance.

Yesterday on television he said that his government had not added five cents to the public debt since it was in office. In 1984, when the government took office, the public debt was $168 billion. Now, almost nine years later, it is over $423 billion.

As far as I am aware, we have only had his Conservative government in office in those nine years. So I ask the minister: When is he going to stop trying to fool Canadians and the truth of what has been happening since his government has been in office? That is that it has created an economic mess for Canadians. Canadians simply do not believe him when he tries to blame all this mess on others than himself.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, let me try to explain to the hon. member. The debt that we inherited was something in the vicinity of $200 billion. The member knows that you have to pay interest on that debt. He knows that interest compounds upon interest and that it accumulated to $400 billion plus.

We have been operating in an operational surplus since 1987. As a matter of fact, I repeat, we have not added one red cent to Canada's national debt. As a matter of fact, we have reduced it by $20 billion plus.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the minister.

Surely the minister will not try and hide the fact that he and his government have supported the interest rate policy of the Bank of Canada and that interest rates are a cost of government along with all the other costs.

Why does he try to hide the fact that the public debt has moved from $168 billion to more than $423 billion since his government has taken office? Why does he not recognize that and also recognize that a major way of dealing with it is to create more economic growth and jobs for Canadians?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member suggests that we should have lower interest rates. That is true.

When he was occupying the government benches, we saw interest rates go up to 22 per cent and 23 per cent. We have tried to do two things. We have tried to contain government expenditures against the wishes of the opposition parties. We have tried to contain inflation. The key to bringing interest rates down is to bring down inflation.

The hon. member is suggesting that we should have higher inflation and that we should spend more. That is not a recipe for lower interest rates. That is a recipe for higher interest rates.

TOBACCO SMUGGLING

Mrs. Lise Bourgault (Argenteuil—Papineau): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada. The Criminal Code does not provide for the seizure of goods acquired through profits generated by the illegal sale of smuggled tobacco products because this activity is not recognized as a form of organized crime. In practice, this means that some Mohawks could buy the Manoir Richelieu with the money made from the lucrative black market for cigarettes and open a nice casino which Quebec would otherwise not allow them to own.

So as not to make fools of us all in this House, will the minister urgently introduce a retroactive amendment to the Criminal Code and eliminate this unacceptable loophole which enables criminals to launder the money made by smuggling cigarettes?

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Justice, Attorney General of Canada and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, my colleague raises the important issue of smuggling. I must remind all members of this House that the Minister of Finance has tabled Bill C-102, which reinforces the legislation on smuggling.

However, it might also be appropriate to remind Canadians who are listening that smuggling is a crime. It is difficult to fight smuggling because people who buy cigarettes, among other contraband items, do not complain. I believe that if all of us in this House made Canadians aware of the danger to society of giving in and buying smuggled goods—and I am speaking to members on both sides of this House—we would probably increase their awareness of the issue. It is quite serious that Canadians snap up smuggled goods so easily.

I thank my colleague for her question and I must tell her—

Some hon. members: Order, order.

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, look at what goes on on the other side when we discuss serious issues. We are giving a great deal of attention to this matter and we hope that our colleagues will co-operate by supporting Bill C-102.

[English]

NATIONAL DEBT

Hon. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. It concerns the C.D. Howe document.

One of the comments made in the document is that the debt crisis is now a federal–provincial crisis and that in this country we have only one taxpayer, whether federal or provincial. The transfer of federal debt to the provinces through cutbacks and transfer payments does not help.

In light of the fact that the federal government has cut back by billions of dollars in transfers to the provinces over the last number of years, is the federal government planning in its next budget to reverse that policy and keep its commitments to the provinces rather than transferring its debt to the provinces of this country?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I agree with the observation that there is only one taxpayer. I have been saying that for quite some time. I am glad that the opposition members across the way have picked it up, thanks to the C.D. Howe Institute.

The hon. member says that we have cut transfer payments. That is wrong. It is absolutely wrong. Transfer payments continue to grow. As a matter of fact in the last "Fiscal Monitor" which was just issued for the third quarter of 1992–93, he will see that major transfers to other levels of government have grown by 7 per cent this year and major transfers to persons, 4.8 per cent.

That does not sound like a cutback to me. That is a substantial increase, much larger than the over–all growth in program expenditures.

Hon. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, the House knows that the rate of increase in transfers to the provinces has been cut back by billions of dollars. In Saskatchewan alone this year, offloading will cost my province some $538 million. That is more than the provincial deficit.

In light of those facts, and this is information that I have from the federal government department, is the federal government willing to reverse its policy and keep its commitments to the provinces rather than jeopardize the credit ratings of the provinces of this country? This is happening not only to Saskatchewan but to many of our provinces.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased that the hon. member clarified his question when he in fact admitted that there were not cutbacks to provincial transfers.

As a matter of fact, there has been some reduction in the over–all growth of program expenses commensurate with the other disciplinary measures that we have had to take upon ourselves in terms of reducing federal government expenditures.

Just for the record in terms of cash payments, transfers to the provinces, in 1984–85 it was cash plus tax transfers something in the order of $25 billion. That is now about $39 billion. That does not sound like much of a cutback.

Of course I understand that the provinces, and particularly his home province of Saskatchewan, are facing some very serious financial difficulties. I have met with the Minister of Finance, we have talked and we are attempting to work and co–operate with him.

I would ask the hon. member to go back to his provincial colleagues and ask them to reconsider the harmonization of the GST which would have provided a major benefit to the people of Saskatchewan and provided revenues to the Government of Saskatchewan. It may have been able to capitalize on some of these jobs that are being created through NAFTA and through the free trade agreement.

PICKERING AIRPORT LANDS

Mr. René Soetens (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, in the 1992 budget the government announced it would proceed with selling some of the surplus airport lands in Pickering. Recently the government held an information session in the riding to explain to the people the process, but lacking from that was a time frame.

Can the Minister of Transport tell the constituents of Ontario riding when they will be able to buy back their farms and homes?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for putting this question. As he knows, over 200 million square feet of land has to be disposed of as a result of this decision by the Government of Canada.

As he aptly said, we did consult with the people at the site a couple of weeks ago. It is part of the process in order that we can present a proper submission to Treasury Board. As soon as this is done, which should be within the next few weeks, the process will be finalized.

PROPERTY TAXES

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint–Léonard): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. When we met with the mayor of Montreal, we learned that the government had promised that no change would be made to the system of paying grants in lieu of taxes to municipalities for services provided to federal facilities.

Why did the government not keep its promise to Canadian municipalities? Why did it make this announcement when most municipalities had already adopted their budget for 1993?

[English]

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, my colleague knows that the grants in lieu of taxes expenditure for our government has been rising at an unacceptable level. The Minister of Finance has indicated the necessity for a little bit of restraint.

As a matter of fact, I met with the Federation of Canadian Municipalities. We are very sympathetic to the difficulties that they are undergoing and we intend to work with them as closely as we can.

I want to point out that with respect to the city of Montreal, last year the account that we had to pay was around $8 million. This year it is about $13 million. Under its new system, the present system of taxation, the mill rate has gone from about 52 cents to $2.06. The member can understand, I am sure, that something had to be done to bring a reconstruction and a more equitable means of assessing the federal government for some of these facilities.

[Translation]

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint–Léonard): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Minister of Public Works, then. The freeze on grants to municipalities in the Montreal region involves cuts totalling some $15 million. How can the minister impose these cuts totalling nearly $15 million on taxpayers in a region with over 225,000 unemployed? These Montrealers are unemployed or on welfare. Is that not enough? Why should they also have to pay higher municipal taxes?

[English]

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I have tried to explain to my colleague opposite that we are prepared to do everything we can to accommodate the municipalities within the constraints that the Minister of Finance has been obliged to put on us.

To compare a reasonable assessment for grants in lieu of taxes with the unemployment rate of a city, I think he would agree, is rather like comparing apples and oranges.

TRADE

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Lac–Saint–Jean): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister for International Trade.

I understand that the government recognizes the need to negotiate supplementary agreements which would add guarantees on minimum standards, wages and the environment to the main North American free trade agreement. If that is so, I commend him for it.

The minister must have felt the need for these guarantees even more yesterday when he heard his Mexican colleague boast in Montreal, where unemployment is 14 per cent, about the merits of Mexico's plentiful labour supply.

Can the minister assure us that the Government of Canada will not sign the main treaty until the parallel agreements have been negotiated?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend has distorted what the minister of trade from Mexico said in Montreal yesterday and I would ask him to reconsider what he has just said.

Regarding the supplementary agreements, we will be starting the discussions on these agreements in the middle of March. This has been agreed among the United States, Mexico and ourselves just today. At the same time, we will be considering the legislation in this House, as will they be in the United States Congress and the Mexican Congress.

These will all move together at around the same pace and we will be able to consider the implications of each as that process continues.

[Translation]

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, I quoted an article from the daily Le Devoir on what the Mexican secretary allegedly said in his speech.

As for the supplementary accord, the minister knows very well that the process can easily be derailed and that the expected deadlines might not be met, in which case he must consider the possibility that the government will have to decide whether or not to sign the treaty alone. The minister has enough experience to know that if he wants to win from the Mexicans the kind of concessions we need for the environment and minimum labour standards, he must not give them what they want right away but rather negotiate on both items with them at the same time.

The Americans are doing that, as Mr. Kantor said recently. I ask the minister why he leaves it up to the Americans alone to fight for environmental protection and Canadian workers.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I said this morning that we had agreed with the Americans and the Mexicans to continue discussions on the environment and on labour as well.

We made some proposals on these accords a year ago and I think that now, with the new American administration, it is possible to have a discussion on these accords.

As I said, these discussions will begin in the second week of March.

POINT OF ORDER

COMMENTS DURING QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, in response to a question in the House yesterday on the North American free trade agreement, the Minister of the Environment characterized an internal environmental review as an environmental assessment. I invite him to correct that impression.

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry, the invitation may or may not be accepted, but that is not a point of order. That is a continuation of debate.

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, for the sake of clarification, it should be made very clear that the government undertook to do a federal environmental assessment of the NAFTA. It was public and it was known by all the members in this House who are interested in that issue.

I was surprised by the comment of the member yesterday, because when I commented on this environmental assessment that had been made public, she was in the room at that time or I thought she was. At least, it was somebody who looked a lot like her.

Mr. Speaker: The difficulty with this is that it is another way of extending debate. It is getting around the rules and I do not think we can do that.

GOVERNMENT RESPONSE TO PETITIONS

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36(8), I have the honour to table, in both official languages, the government's response to 11 petitions.

ENVIRONMENT

SIXTH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Hon. David MacDonald (Rosedale): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to present the sixth report of the Standing Committee on Environment, in both official languages, in relation to the appointment by the United Nations of Elizabeth Dowdeswell to the position of Executive Director of the United Nations Environment Program, UNEP. Elizabeth Dowdeswell is the third person and the second Canadian to hold this prestigious position, succeeding Dr. Mostafa D. Tolba from Egypt who in turn replaced the original director, Maurice Strong.

The challenges facing Ms. Dowdeswell are daunting. The problems facing humanity can no longer be categorized as simply environment or economical or only affecting a country or a single continent. The solutions are complex and transgress international borders and cultures, ultimately affecting every human being.

It is a tribute to Canada that of the three UNEP executive directors two have been Canadians.

Our committee has worked closely with Ms. Dowdeswell during the course of its series entitled "Our Changing Atmosphere" as well as in the activities leading up to and including the earth summit. Members have been impressed by her thoroughness, determination and judgment, qualities which will serve her well in her new position.

We therefore wish to congratulate Ms. Dowdeswell on her election to this most senior international position in the environmental field. We wish her, on behalf of all Canadians, courage and success in what might very well be the most challenging times facing our global environment.

Routine Proceedings

GOVERNMENT EXPENDITURES RESTRAINT ACT, 1993 NO. 2

MEASURE TO ENACT

Hon. John McDermid (for Minister of Finance) moved for leave to introduce Bill C–113, an act to provide for government expenditure restraint.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 68(2), the motion is deemed adopted.

Mr. McDermid (for Minister of Finance) moves that the bill be now read the first time and printed.

Pursuant to Standing Order 69(1), the motion is deemed adopted.

Bill read the first time and printed.

MEAT IMPORT ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Ken Hughes (Macleod) moved for leave to introduce Bill C–406, an act to amend the Meat Import Act.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 68(2), the motion is deemed adopted.

Mr. Hughes: Madam Speaker, this bill proposes that Canada amend its Meat Import Act to increase our control over offshore imports and consequently defend our industry against possible U.S. trade sanctions.

I am introducing this bill after speaking with many beef producers who want the government to defend our industry against this potential threat. It is really a defensive measure. By doing so this bill recognizes that the Canadian and American beef market is becoming a single market. Harmonization of certain standards, procedures and import regimes will reduce the risk of trade conflict between our two nations and the industries of those two nations.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Mr. Hughes moves that the bill be now read the first time and printed.

Pursuant to Standing Order 69(1), the motion is deemed adopted.

Bill read the first time and printed.

JUSTICE AND THE SOLICITOR GENERAL

SUBCOMMITTEE ON RECODIFICATION

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Parliamentary Secretary to the Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, I think you will find that there is consent for the following motion. I move:

That the subcommittee on the recodification of the general part of the Criminal Code of the Standing Committee on Justice and the Solicitor General be authorized to report directly to the House.

Motion agreed to.

PETITIONS

JAMES BAY II

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to table dozens of petitions from thousands of Canadians that have been certified pursuant to Standing Order 36 regarding the James Bay II project.

The petitioners say that whereas the boreal and Arctic ecosystems of the James Bay area consist of fragile ecosystems which are home to a rich variety of wildlife, including endangered and rare species such as the threatened eastern Hudson Bay population of the beluga whale, the endangered eastern populations of both the wolverine and peregrine falcon, and numerous migrating birds and large mammals extinct in most parts of the world, such as the lynx, the river otter, and the fresh water seal.

Therefore the petitioners humbly request that Parliament take any and all actions to halt the construction on James Bay II at least until a thorough global environmental impact study on James Bay II and other hydroelectric projects draining into the Hudson Bay watershed has been done.

This was kindly co-ordinated by Diane Murray from OPIRG Carleton.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Madam Speaker, I would like to present a petition on behalf of two Canadians, Christine Lamont and David Spencer, who have been sentenced to 28 years each in a Brazilian prison, suffered miscarriages of justice, cruel and unusual treatment in Brazilian prisons, and discrimination in sentencing and parole.

Therefore the petitioners call upon Parliament to ensure the Prime Minister requests the Government of Brazil to expel Christine Lamont and David Spencer and return them to Canada in accordance with Brazilian law.

It is signed by hundreds of people.

JAMES BAY II

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Madam Speaker, I am honoured to present a petition on behalf of 500 people from all across Canada. The lead signature is that of David Suzuki.

This petition concerns James Bay II. It says that whereas hydroelectric dams built in increased concentrations of mercury, methyl mercury and other dangerous substances in aquatic systems, mercury is a neurotoxin known to bioaccumulate and bioconcentrate in plant and animal tissues up the food chain, and is even in minute amounts very dangerous to long lived animals such as humans and belugas.

These petitioners ask Parliament to halt all construction on James Bay II, at least until a thorough global environmental impact study on James Bay II and other hydroelectric projects draining into the Hudson Bay watershed has been done, and to protect the unique Canadian ecosystems found in the James Bay area.

SERIAL KILLER BOARD GAMES

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton): Madam Speaker, it is my pleasure to present a petition pursuant to Standing Order 36 concerning serial killer board games. People in my riding are petitioning Parliament to consider amending the Criminal Code of Canada so that violent and degrading material such as serial killer board games can be kept from being distributed in Canada.

YOUNG OFFENDERS

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Madam Speaker, I have a number of petitions representing literally a ton of signatures but only a small part of the petitions signed by 140,000 Canadians. These petitions were initiated by Stu and Margaret Garrioch of Calgary in memory of their son, Ryan, who was stabbed to death by a young offender.

These petitioners call upon Parliament to replace the Young Offenders Act with an updated Juvenile Delinquents Act and to lower the minimum age to 13 years.

JUSTICE

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Madam Speaker, I have a petition from several hundred people on central Vancouver Island in memory of Dawn Shaw, a little girl who was raped and murdered in my constituency. They note that the present justice system fails to protect children in our communities who are increasingly becoming victims of sexual assault.

They ask that a number of things be done by Parliament: That sentences for sexual assault offenders be lengthened, that the law be changed to permit DNA samples to be taken from suspects of sexual assault, and that those imprints be kept in a national data base. They also call for the names of released sexual offenders to be registered with the police and the community of residents and that those names be distributed to those people having responsibility for children in the community.

This petition from several hundred people in my constituency is submitted to the House of Commons to request that those changes be made.

BILL C-91

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Madam Speaker, I have a second petition, again from hundreds of people across the country who note that the Conservative government, through Bill C-91, seeks to end the licensing of further no name generic drugs in Canada. This will result in tremendous costs to provincial and private drug programs.

The petitioners call on Parliament not to proceed with Bill C-91 and to repeal Bill C-22 passed in 1987. In this way Canadians would have the benefit of lower priced generic drugs and provincial and private drug plans could serve Canadians without being forced to charge higher fees or to provide less coverage.

REQUEST FOR ELIMINATION OF VIOLENCE IN OUR SOCIETY

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I would like to table a petition from residents of Val-d'Or, Sullivan, Senneterre, Saint-Edmond and Rivière-Héva, in the riding of Abitibi, who say that films depicting violence on television are dangerous and therefore unacceptable because they act as a stimulus for violent behaviour.

The petition also says that all toys that incite children to play violent games are unacceptable and their manufacture should be banned. It is also pointed out that the repeated broadcasting of news about acts of violence on television, on all channels, and on radio may act as a stimulus for further identical violent behaviour.

Therefore your petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to pass the appropriate legislation in order to eliminate violence in our society and thus protect our children and give all citizens a better quality of life.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): Madam Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 427 and 434.

[Text]

Question No. 427—Ms. Copps:

Regarding the purchase of new frigates for the Canadian Armed Forces, how much steel is being purchased for the program, and from which companies is it being purchased?

Mr. Patrick Boyer (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): The prime contractor for the Canadian Patrol Frigate Project, Saint John Shipbuilding Ltd. of New Brunswick, will have purchased approximately 30,000 tonnes of steel by the end of the program. The two suppliers are Algoma Steel Corporation Ltd. and Marshall Drummond McCall Inc.

Question No. 434—Mr. Peterson:

Regarding television advertising by National Defence for ads aired in Canada (a) between January 1 and September 15, 1992 (b) between September 15 and October 26, 1992 in each case (i) what was the total cost of these ads (ii) of that amount what was paid for out of the National Defence budget?

Mr. Patrick Boyer (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): (a) (i) $86,334; (ii) all.

(b) (i) $3,681,600, including "Keeping the peace" campaign $3.572 million; (ii) all.

[Translation]

Madam Deputy Speaker: The questions as enumerated by the parliamentary secretary have been answered.

Mr. Langlois: Madam Speaker, I ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is it agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): Madam Speaker, I ask that all notices of motions for the production of papers be allowed to stand.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Shall all notices of motions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S. O. 81—ETHICS

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell) moved:

That this House condemns the government for its continued failure to establish and to adhere to a clear and high standard of public sector ethics, for its incessant inability to function within the framework of existing legislation, guidelines and standards and for its reluctance to bring forward strict new codes and legislation with regard to conflicts and other public ethics matters.

He said: Madam Speaker, it gives me pleasure to participate in this debate. It has to do with holding the government accountable for its behaviour now and for the last eight and a half years.

Let me read the following quote. It comes to us from an article by Jack Cahill written in The Toronto Star.

I must have another ten thousand. Will be the last time of calling. Do not fail me. Answer today.

This was the telegram sent in 1873 by Canada's first prime minister, Sir John A. Macdonald, to the solicitor for Canada's foremost businessman, Sir Hugh Allan of Montreal.

[Translation]

Nothing really changes. On May 24, 1986, Pierre O'Neill wrote the following in an editorial in Le Devoir: "After being out of power for generations, the Tories have always failed to exercise moderation in their use of it. Between the defeat of John Diefenbaker in 1962 and Brian Mulroney's victory in 1984, they only had a taste during the short reign of Joe Clark in 1979. Today, the urge to dispense political favours is so great that after only 20 months in power, we can say they have definitely overindulged. Never in political memory has a party been rocked by so many scandals and resignations in so short a time". That was a quote from Pierre O'Neill in Le Devoir.

• (1520)

The article also says, and I quote: "The Conservatives led by the Prime Minister [across the floor] also have an obsession: they live in fear of losing power in the next election. And that fear is not unfounded. Consequently, they tell themselves that they must go all out and take advantage of what little time they have left. Bypassing the bidding procedure in order to take advantage of those who get contracts worth less than $30,000 is lucrative but insufficient.

Therefore, they decided to apply the system to the winners of major contracts. It is from this list that party solicitors can now identify their victims. They pay them a visit and demand a kickback of 5 per cent of the value of the contract awarded to them. Those who refuse to pay kickbacks are blacklisted and can forget about any new contracts. This is what Mr. O'Neill wrote in 1986.

You know, Madam Speaker, if some members do not believe Mr. O'Neill, I can tell them that he was not the only one to raise this issue. Let me refer to a statement made by the member for Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead, who was a Conservative member of Parliament in 1991. He said, and I quote: "Companies interested in contracts must contribute money to the Conservative Party fund. Then, there are the declarations made by Suzanne Blais-Grenier, who was also a Conservative minister at one time and confirmed the existence of such a kickback system.

Let me also quote another source. This time I am referring to something Marcel Adam wrote in La Presse: "Since they came to power five years ago, the Conservatives have constantly confirmed their deplorable lack of public morality and parliamentary ethics. With their weak moral standards, they are becoming one of the most corrupt parties to head a federal government and taking us back to a time that we thought had ended decades ago.

As far back as I can remember as a professional observer of public life, which is about 30 years, I cannot think of a regime showing signs of corruption so early and being so unscrupulous about the rules of ethics and the parliamentary system". This is what Marcel Adam wrote on May 27, 1989.

[English]

I want to turn to what Don McGillivray, Southam News columnist, said on February 2, 1990. He said the following about the Brian Gallery affair. We remember that conflict of interest case and the subsequent resignation of one Brian Gallery. Mr. McGillivray said:

> Is there no end to the parade of cabinet ministers, members of Parliament and appointed officials who use positions of public trust to advance their private interests?

He said further:

> And until Gallery's resignation as Canadian National director and vice-chairman was announced Thursday in the Commons—

And he used the Prime Minister's name:

> —was in his usual posture of stalling for time while he tried a political counter-attack: "The Liberals are not seeking justice. They want a lynching. They're not going to get it in the House of Commons".

Referring to the member for Roberval who was the transport minister at that time, he said:

> And Transport Minister—backed this play by indicating scepticism about the letters signed by Gallery and produced in the Commons by the opposition parties: "The honourable member says he has a letter. They always have letters".

Eventually the gentleman resigned, a close friend of the Prime Minister.

I have another story. This one was written in The Gazette of Montreal on December 16, 1989. It has the pictures of six prominent Conservatives. Because some of them are still sitting in the House I will not refer to them. I will only refer to the others who are no longer with us. It identifies the following:

> Edouard Desrosiers, the former Tory MP for Hochelaga—Maisonneuve, faces eight charges, including a corruption charge relating to $2,000 the Crown alleges he received from a company doing business with the federal government.

It continues:

> Richard Grisé, the Tory MP for Chambly, was sentenced to one day in prison, three years' probation and fined $20,000 in May.
> He admitted operating a complex kickback deal that put the employees of a friend's company on the government payroll. He also admitted taking kickbacks from builders.
> Michel Côté was fired as supply and services minister in 1988 after failing to report a $256,000 loan from a friend who was a government contractor.
> Roch LaSalle quit the cabinet in 1987 following reports of influence peddling—
> André Bissonnette was dumped as junior minister of transport in January 1987 for alleged involvement in a series of questionable land flips in Quebec—
> Suzanne Blais-Grenier, the minister of state for transport, stepped down in December 1985 at Mulroney's urging after press reports of her lavish spending abroad.
> Sinclair Stevens quit as a minister of regional industrial expansion in May 1986 after reports that his wife, Noreen, had negotiated a $2.6 million loan for his family companies from Magna International, an auto parts company that had received grants from Stevens' department.
> A royal commission found that Stevens had violated conflict of interest guidelines 14 times while in cabinet.

He is trying to overturn the decision. It continues:

> Robert Coates quits as defence minister in February 1985—

It goes on and on. The next story is by Geoffrey Stevens, national affairs correspondent with The Gazette, dated February 25, 1990. He said:

> Brian Gallery, a personal friend of the Prime Minister Mulroney, resigns as vice-chairman of Canadian National Railways following reports that he tried to influence CN to keep buying ads in publications that he owns.
> What's going on? Hardly a week passes, it seems, that someone in the Mulroney ambit—MP, minister or patronage appointee—is not being investigated for something or charged with something or being forced to resign from something.

This is what was said at the time by Mr. Geoffrey Stevens.

You will recall, I am sure, Madam Speaker, some years back the Prime Minister made promises to the Canadian people about patronage and about what he considered to be the moral thing to do with regard to appointments. Those promises were made during the 1984 election campaign. I kept a log of those promises along with the patronage appointments after the election of 1984 and put them in this booklet which was then known as The Black Paper on Tory Patronage.

Let me quote the following from the person who today is the Prime Minister. On May 24, 1983 he said:

> There'll be jobs for Liberals and NDPs too, after I've been Prime Minister for 15 years and I can't find a living, breathing Tory in the country.

That was from The Globe and Mail. It quoted the person who today is the Prime Minister. On July 9, 1984 the same person is quoted as saying:

> I commit myself to setting up criteria for quality which will impress the Canadian people.

That was his commitment about patronage. On July 16, 1984 he talked about patronage again and again I am referring to the man who is now Prime Minister. He said:

> The method of making appointments could be corrected by dramatic measures—We are going to bring in a brand new dimension to them of objectivity and representation and fairness for all Canadians.

I want to refer to what The Toronto Sun said on March 22, 1985 after the original orgy of patronage that all Canadians were subjected to by the Prime Minister. Referring to the Prime Minister he said that he "is a sincere man—from the teeth on out. Take his solemn pledge late in the election campaign when he devastated" the member for Vancouver Quadra "over patronage". The Prime Minister's promise to end it all played a major part in his massive victory".

• (1530)

The next sentence he uses is unparliamentary. I cannot quote it. He says: "The Prime Minister has been simply shameless in dispensing patronage. Hardly a day passes without news of yet another fresh batch of Tory hacks being rewarded for their partisan inclinations". That is from The Toronto Sun story at the time. Again, the things they say about the Prime Minister in some of the quotes in there I cannot repeat on the floor of the House because Madam Speaker would not allow them and I do not blame her. They are simply not parliamentary.

I want to talk about the next thing here. It is a story from La Presse on November 21, 1984: "The Prime Minister created 10 provincial committees and a national committee to consult cabinet on political nominations. That is after promising that something would be done to make things better; he appointed a committee of Conservatives in each province".

Let me tell you, Madam Speaker, how one of those committees work. Again, this is from the same story: "The Quebec committee will be presided over by Fernand Roberge, manager of the Ritz Carleton in Montreal and a close friend of the Prime Minister". Listen, Madam Speaker, to who the members are: "Other members include ministers Roch LaSalle", the member for Frontenac, "and Marcel Tremblay", the member for Quebec-Est. "As well, PC party militants Michel Cogger, Jean Bazin, Marc Dorion—all three lawyers— also Mario Beaulieu, a Clark supporter and former Union Nationale member, and Gisèle Morgan sit on the committee. The national committee consists of Norman Atkins, organizer of the big blue Ontario machine and who led the election campaign last summer. Bernard Roy, chief organizer of the Quebec campaign, has since become principal secretary to the Prime Minister. He will also act as chief of staff in the Prime Minister's Office".

Those were allegations that were made at the time by La Presse.

Madam Speaker, you may think that the Tories were bad and they were. You may think they have reformed their ways. Unfortunately, they have not. Very regrettably, they are still the same.

I want to quote what Stevie Cameron, a well known journalist, said on January 31, 1987: "If the Prime Minister has a single friend who hasn't been appointed to a board, commission or agency or who hasn't been awarded the title of Queen's Counsel or hasn't been given a fat contract or a Senate appointment, that friend deserves to be annoyed". That is what she said at the time.

Mr. Andre: Wow, Stevie Cameron.

Mr. Boudria: It goes on and on. The minister across the way says that is Stevie Cameron. If it came to believing Stevie Cameron versus the hon. government House leader across the floor, I know who I would believe. I would believe Stevie Cameron.

Mr. Andre: You two have fun swimming around in the mud together.

Mr. Boudria: Madam Speaker, I do not think I have said anything unparliamentary and perhaps the minister could do the same. He may not like what I am saying, but it does not mean that it is untrue. I have not accused him personally of anything wrong.

Mr. Andre: I haven't heard any truths yet.

Mr. Boudria: Madam Speaker, I will go on here with quotes from other newspaper articles. From March 24, 1989: Claude Levasseur, campaign manager in the riding of Trois-Rivières was convicted in Quebec provincial court of influence peddling. The court was told that Mr. Levasseur appointed land surveyer Jean-Marie Chastenay of Cap-de-la-Madelaine and requested a $2,500 kickback for a $50,000 contract accorded to Chastenay. Chastenay taped the conversation with Levasseur and turned it over to the police. That person entered a plea of guilty and was sentenced.

The Prime Minister is going to say it is not true, I suppose.

Mr. Andre: What constituency was he from?

Mr. Boudria: What constituency? I am glad the minister asked. He is the campaign manager and partner even today of a cabinet minister across the way. He is still a partner with him or was as late as three weeks ago. The minister across the way wonders what he does.

[Translation]

Mr. Michel Champagne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Forestry): Madam Speaker, I have been listening very closely to my colleague for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell and I find the connection he is trying to make between a case which was adjudicated and the present case involving a minister of the Crown to be far-fetched.

Knowing my colleague for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, I am sure he does not mean to insinuate that there might be something more to it since he could say it outside of this House. However, for the time being, I think that he should stick to what was said and avoid inuendos concerning the implication of a minister of the Crown in a case that was heard and adjudicated without the said minister or ordinary citizen at the time being called to testify in any way whatever as there was no indictment at the time. I think that the member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell should be extremely careful when he makes such remarks.

Madam Deputy Speaker: In view of the subject matter of the motion brought forward today by the hon. member, I think that the latter part of the observations by the hon. member for Champlain is filled with wisdom and that it would be desirable at all times for everyone, on either side of the House and from all three parties, to be extremely careful not to make accusations which cannot be substantiated.

Mr. Boudria: Madam Speaker, I agree with the point raised by my colleague for Champlain. I did not say that in that case the minister had been charged. But, granted, his point is well taken.

[English]

As it pertains to that particular person and I agree.

I now wish to turn to the broad question of public sector ethics and morals. At the request of the hon. member for Beauséjour, I have prepared a platform document on what our party proposes to do on that issue and I want to share it with the House of Commons.

Here are some of the recommendations and I will read some of them into the record. It is my view and the view of my colleagues, that the recommendations on the special joint committee on conflict of interest should be adopted. That has been on the Order Paper now for close to four years and it has gone through two different times of dying on the Order Paper. It has been reintroduced and it was the subject of a special committee and has been left lying there for six months.

I also believe that the spouse of a member of Parliament ought to be required to disclose assets on his or her own part. I believe that a special committee should be struck to study and report on the salaries and benefits of legislators. I believe that the Department of Supply and Services and Public Works should be merged to form a federal department of government services in an effort to reduce cost.

The agency of record ought to be eliminated. A government advertising bureau should be established within the government to handle government advertising contracts and to end the kind of despicable practices that we have been subjected to in recent weeks on the issue of the unity advertising.

I think the advertising bureau that I have just suggested should be placed under the auspices of the newly created department of government services. I believe that a new system for government advertising needs to be established to ensure non-partisanship and fairness.

The next point. An independent commission of inquiry should be established to mandate the present awarding procedures of contracts and tendering thresholds as outlined in the Treasury Board guidelines.

There are a number of things that should be changed, not the least of which is that we must increase the amount of control that we have right now over lobbyists in Canada. That is an issue that I will address in committee in a few moments from now.

• (1540)

Those are some of my and my colleagues' recommendations toward improving public sector ethics in this country. My colleagues will read more of these recommendations into the record in a few minutes.

[Translation]

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Parliamentary Secretary to the Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, I listened to most of the speech of the member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell and I would have thought he would have expanded more on the motion before us today. It is an opposition motion. After all, it was presented by his party, but his speech contained mostly references to rather old newspaper articles. He mentioned names liberally and I think that is unfortunate.

I would also like to mention before asking my question that the opposition has the opportunity to hold a debate in the House about motions that it considers important ones. I am a young parliamentarian, but I think that we should use the time of the House to discuss subjects that are important for the country, for the nation, for taxpayers and for government itself. I realize this is not what will happen today since between now and eight o'clock tonight, if the debate keeps going in the direction set by the member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, I fear the time of the House will be spent very uselessly.

I would like to put a question to the member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell: Could he tell me if he agrees with the methods used before 1988 by the party of which he is now a member, the party which formed government at that time? Does he agree with the methods used by the leader of the Liberal Party, which was the ruling party during those years, for nominating senators and various other officials to public functions?

[English]

Mr. Boudria: Madam Speaker, I am glad to hear the question of the hon. member. He referred to 1988. I think he meant 1984.

He is asking me if the system for Order in Council appointments in 1984 and prior was better to the one established since. No, of course not.

Mr. Blenkarn: So it is better now.

Mr. Boudria: No, it is the same. It has not changed.

The point is in 1984 the person who is now Prime Minister promised radical new measures to change those. He has done nothing of the sort.

The only thing we have had is an Order in Council review process that gives no power to a committee, not even the power to make a recommendation to the House of Commons under the Order in Council that happened.

If the minister across the way disagrees with that, I challenge him to go to the transcript of the Standing Committee on Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Government Operations where he will see the motion that I proposed at the time to recommend to this House that Dalton Camp not be hired to work in the Privy Council Office. The motion was ruled out of order because there was no mechanism by which the committee could make that recommendation to the House.

Mr. Andre: You are talking about different things. It was a totally different thing.

Mr. Boudria: It was an Order in Council review.

Mr. Andre: No it was not. Be honest now.

Mr. Boudria: That is under the authority for which we reviewed.

The member for Manicouagan asked questions about the tone of the debate today and what else we would do. I see that as a perfect opportunity to continue giving some of the recommendations of my party to improve public sector ethics and morals. I want to share these thoughts.

The rational system of awarding government contracts ought to be further implemented in all ministries in order to allow small business a greater opportunity to receive government contracts.

I believe the government should establish a central registry of awarded contracts subject to security requirements. The detail of any contract awarded by the government should be open to public scrutiny.

My policy and that of my colleagues is we want to ensure that federal government contracts are awarded on an equal basis and that members of Parliament be excluded from the involvement of the awarding of contracts, that political exempt staff not be stationed in regional offices of departments as they were at one period with the Department of Public Works.

There should be established within the House of Commons non-partisan nomination and confirmation procedures for Order in Council appointments such as the officers of the House, and that the committee reviewing those should have a veto power.

That the members of the House of Commons should be able to scrutinize deputy ministers and other individuals such as heads of Crown corporations and regulatory agencies. The House ought to be able to give recommendations in regard to those appointments which it cannot do right now.

A nomination procedure ought to be developed for the appointments of Citizenship Court judges. That does not exist right now.

There should be no registration fees imposed on tier 1 or tier 2 lobbyists. I believe that professional lobbyists should be required to disclose in a public register major expenses and fees with a description of the lobbying activity.

The Lobbyists Registration Act should be amended to ban contingency fees.

Professional lobbyists should be obliged to declare all of their lobbying efforts whether a fee was charged or not. It should be compulsory that lobbyists disclose fees charged to a client along with the amount and the form of any payment made.

I could continue and elaborate further if you wish for me to do so, Madam Speaker.

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Madam Speaker, as usual we learn a lot from my colleague from Glengarry—Prescott—Russell.

I would just like to say that if a government violates ethics, it makes Canadians lose faith in our political system. That will be the end of our nation.

My colleague was talking about the need for a central registry for the awarding of contracts. Would the member briefly comment on the 23 contracts awarded by the department of health as audited by the Auditor General that 22 of those 23 contracts were illegal and cost Canadians millions of dollars?

Mr. Boudria: Madam Speaker, that is actually a very good case in point of some of the things I have been advocating.

The Auditor General indicated in his annual report and since then we have seen case after case of government contracts awarded with no regard to the tendering procedure, not even any due regard for a proper invitational procedure where such is the procedure to be used right now.

In some of those cases that procedure should not be in existence anyway. The procedures have been breached. In the cases at the department of health it was flagged right in the Auditor General's report.

Surely members across the way cannot accuse me of innuendo, of creating those circumstances. The Auditor General of Canada is the person who has said so. These are not figments of my imagination nor the imagination of the member across the way.

This is wrong, dead wrong. The government has to reform those practices. It must do so even if it is at the 11th hour of the dying days of this administration.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, the contracts in question were, according to the Auditor General, not done by the bureaucratic procedure set down. Did the Auditor General suggest that in fact this money was illegally or fraudulently obtained and abused? If so, why would the hon. member suggest that charges were not laid against these people who fraudulently obtained these funds and misused them, wasted these millions of dollars as alleged by the member for Winnipeg North?

Or, was it in fact that the Auditor General was merely pointing out that the bureaucratic procedures were not properly followed? Did the Auditor General say that there was fraud, theft and millions of dollars of taxpayers' money abused? If so, who are the people who did it? Why were they not charged?

Mr. Pagtakhan: The RCMP—

Mr. Andre: It is not concluded yet. No one has been charged and there is no proof of theft.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Pagtakhan: Read the report.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Winnipeg North was recognized earlier. I am sure that he could have the floor later on some time today.

It would be appreciated for law and order and for respect for this House if he would refrain from screaming across the floor and making accusations at this time.

Mr. Pagtakhan: On a point of order, Madam Speaker.

Madam Deputy Speaker: If there is a point of order I will listen to it.

• (1550)

Mr. Pagtakhan: Madam Speaker, the government House leader alluded to the question that I posed and indicated my riding. He knew that there were only two—

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member is engaging in debate when he does not have the floor. I have just asked him to please wait until it is his time to debate to rise and make his views known.

There is a minute left for the hon. member for Glengarry— Prescott—Russell.

Mr. Boudria: Madam Speaker, the Auditor General did indicate in his reports that the procedures had not been used. The minister may categorize those as merely bureaucratic. I do not believe that such is the case. That is actually a criticism of his own colleague, the President of the Treasury Board, who sets down those rules which are necessary for the good and proper awarding of the contract.

When I asked the question in the House some months ago, the government refused to answer the question that I raised on this very topic. If my memory serves me right, it was the government House leader himself who told me he could not answer because the whole issue was the subject of a police investigation.

I rest my case.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, I would just make the point that there is a far cry between that and the blatant statement that millions of dollars of taxpayers' money were wasted in some fraudulent manner. That is an accusation of malfeasance which I do not think should stand unchallenged. We have a tradition in this House: When you charge somebody with violating the law you put your seat on the line. If that charge turns out to be untrue, you resign.

It is instructive, I think, that on this supply day—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member should know that a point of order refers to the rules of this House. I would like to know which rule of the House the hon. member is now invoking.

Mr. Pagtakhan: I cannot cite a specific rule. I beg your indulgence, but I will tell you, Madam Speaker, that I was alluding to the report which indicated that there were illegal violations, violations of several laws. I can show you the page later on, Madam Speaker.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member is debating. The hon. minister has the floor.

Mr. Andre: I think it is instructive on this supply day, which is a day provided under the rules for the opposition to deal with the question of supply, i.e. the spending of public funds, that it should decide to raise this subject. I checked the record and over the last two years not once, not on one occasion has the opposition used a supply day to talk about what is intended for that purpose, namely to talk about government spending, how they would do it better and so on. But that is not surprising.

The hon. member stood up and listed alleged illegal activities, improper activities by various people. He managed to slander and libel several people, listed them from newspaper articles. Some had been charged, some had been found innocent. In our system once you are found innocent, you are found innocent. However that did not prevent the hon. member from again accusing them of being corrupt and rotten. Even though a court of law in this country had found them innocent that did not prevent the hon. member from standing up and again slandering them because they had once been charged. Once charged, in that hon. member's mind, they are guilty.

Then he talked about, and I will get to the advertising in a moment, patronage appointments. He talked about the Prime Minister's commitment. The first thing the Prime Minister did was to establish a parliamentary committee headed by Jim McGrath which established that all GIC appointments are reviewable by committees of the House, a major innovation.

Then he said: "Ah, but he talked about Dalton Camp". Dalton Camp was a contract employee for the Prime Minister's Office in the same way as I have employees in my office and he has employees in his office. Is he suggesting that all our employees, including his employees, must be approved first by a committee of the House? What an absurd suggestion. The hon. member enjoys slandering, libelling, maliciously condeming people who are not here to defend themselves, using this institution with its privileges and its immunities to unfairly slander people and to suggest that if anybody had the temerity to be involved in partisan politics for the Progressive Conservative Party, they are unfit for public office.

It is funny that he did not complain about the appointment of Aideen Nicholson to the Immigration Appeal Board or George Henderson to the Veterans Appeal Board because they are former Liberals, or Ian Deans. It is only if you have been involved with the Progressive Conservative Party that you are corrupt. Otherwise you are okay.

Mr. Kilgour: Like 99 per cent of your appointments. Tell me what the word sophistry means.

Mr. Andre: The hon. member should write another book that nobody can read rather than sitting there.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Edmonton Southeast will be seeking the floor shortly, I imagine. He may want to be able to make his case without being interrupted all the time. I think it would be wise and generous of him to extend the same courtesy to the hon. minister when he has the floor.

Mr. Andre: Madam Speaker, the hon. member when quoting these various authors quoted Stevie Cameron. Stevie Cameron once wrote—

Mr. Kilgour: Now he is going to slander Stevie Cameron who happens to come from a Tory family.

An hon. member: The minister does not even know her.

Mr. Andre: Madam Speaker, you have to resort to a gag soon for that hon. member. Stevie Cameron dealt with an interior decorator, Giovanni Mowinkle, who said: "Do you know what size the closets are at 24 Sussex Drive?" There was this great two full page piece in The Globe and Mail about the size of the closets, the number of pairs of shoes and how this was such an outrage.

After the article came out, a couple of things happened. One thing was that Giovanni Mowinkle skipped the country with the RCMP hot on his trail. The second thing was the the editor of The Globe and Mail, the same Geoff Stevens who was quoted by the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, was fired as editor.

Mr. Kilgour: Just say something substantive, Harvie.

Mr. Andre: Madam Speaker, I do welcome the opportunity of this debate to deal with a subject that the hon. member alluded to at the end and that was advertising and the alleged, in his mind, his words and his accusation of impropriety, illegality, patronage and whatever of the advertising contracts. Let me deal with that for a moment.

Prior to 1979 advertising was done by individual departments that selected an agency and ran their own campaigns however they saw fit. Not suprisingly, in those days Liberal governments chose Liberal agencies. They wanted to pick people they had confidence in. That is understandable.

In 1979 the Clark government brought in the advertising management group, something that it is apparently in the Liberal platform to do after the next election. Well, it exists. That advertising management group co-ordinates all the various advertising campaigns by the various departments to make sure that we do a media buy that gets the best price for the government, to ensure that it hits the right audiences, that the contracts are honoured properly and so on. It was a scheme that the Liberals carried on in 1980 after they were returned to office and is in place today. They of course appointed somebody they had confidence in to head up the group on contracts and we did the same thing. The individual is Mr. Bob Byron, with 35 years experience. I quote a civil servant: "Civil servants who deal with him say that he will have forgotten more about advertising than I have learned in my lifetime. He is an expert and full value according to civil servants for all he does".

• (1600)

In addition, what the government did in 1984 was establish a process for selecting agencies. It is notoriously difficult for government, and I was supply and services minister at the time, to contract for professional services. You cannot ask for closed tenders from lawyers, engineers, architects, accountants or advertising agencies because it does not work that way. You do that if you are having somebody build a building. You give them the plans and say: "Give us a tender; we'll cut the envelope". You cannot do that for professional services because there is something called quality that goes into it.

What industry does in terms of advertising is ask several agencies to come forward and make a pitch, to come forward with suggestions as to how they would handle the advertising campaign the client has in mind.

We put in a process where a department wants to run a campaign. We will have a committee of civil servants hear the pitches and make a recommendation. It is as fair a system as we know how to devise. It has been working pretty well, a lot better than the system before it.

The Citizen with its intrepid reporters, Kennedy and Cobb, wrote a piece in regard to the major contracting on national unity and the 125th anniversary. The headline is: "Ad contracts given without bids, sources". Sources say without bids.

What in fact happened was that the minister responsible, who happens to be a senator, sent a letter to the editor saying the article was wrong. As a matter of fact there was a committee of five public servants, Gagnier, Guité, Parkins, Uteck and Cardinal, who listened to pitches from six agencies, Académie, Burghardt, Wolowich, Crunkhorn, Camp Associates, La Boîte à Idées, Palmer Jarvis and Publitel and in fact awarded two of them, Palmer Jarvis from Vancouver and I think it was Publitel from Montreal with the contracts.

Did that satisfy the reporters that they were wrong? Absolutely not. They went on. The first thing was they went to Daryl Bean and asked what he thought of the contracting. He was outraged that there was no competition.

You can forgive Daryl Bean because he was given the same false information from those reporters. Not resisting an opportunity to scream in outrage, he reacted. We know Daryl Bean. I see that he is committed to helping the Bloc Quebecois in the next election, which is interesting too.

What really did happen? After being given these names, these reporters phoned and talked to some of the civil servants. I want to relate a little bit of the conversation they had with one civil servant who is a 30-year veteran. He says that he worked for the Diefenbaker government, the Pearson government, the Trudeau government, the Clark government, the Trudeau government again, the Mulroney government, and if the next government is the Rhinoceros Party he will work for them. He says that nobody knows how he votes. He has no partisan leanings.

In answer to this intrepid reporter, he said that he had no colours and that tomorrow nobody would know if he voted pink, blue, yellow or any different. He said: "All I am saying to you is that the system that is in place now, and I speak strictly as a public servant, is a helluva lot better than it was 10 years ago. It is a helluva lot more honest than than it was 10 years ago". That was the testimony of a 30-year public servant.

Did that turn off our intrepid reporters, Messrs. Bernstein and Woodward, who are digging in? Not at all. After this they wrote another piece saying: "Ah, but they didn't file a report". The policy statement says that they did it over lunch at Henri Burger's. "Jeez, my goodness, a business lunch. Oh, horrors".

What absolute nonsense.

The hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell stands and refers again today to evidence of corruption in advertising and says that this government has no interest in being fair and having competition. We have had the testimony of five public servants, the one in particular who said: "The system in place is a hell of a lot better than it was 10 years ago and a hell of a lot more honest"; I underline more honest than it was 10 years ago. Does that make a difference? No.

Why possibly could these reporters not have reflected that in their story? Why would Messrs. Kennedy and Cobb not reflect this truth?

Yesterday we had a deuce before the consumer and corporate affairs committee. The committee is looking at the Lobbyists Registration Act. One of the lobbyist, a fellow by the name of Michael Robinson, a well-known Liberal activist, said and I am quoting from the minutes:

> There's some evidence that the partisanship may have been part of the motivation.

He was speaking of the motivation of the reporters. He continued:

> After two or three stories that appeared in The Ottawa Citizen I received a phone call from Gord Ashworth who, as many of you will know, is campaign director for the Liberal Party but also was very active with many of us in the referendum campaign and the nature of the conversation was that it was a phone call to say that he had just finished talking with Mark Kennedy, who is one of the journalists for The Ottawa Citizen, who was asking him questions about advertising during the referendum campaign with a view, I assume, to write more stories for The Citizen and, in the course of that conversation, asked Gordon if I, personally, was upset at the stories that had appeared in The Ottawa Citizen. And when Gordon suggested that yes, indeed, I was less than happy with the coverage, was reassured by Kennedy that I shouldn't be upset because the purpose of these stories was not to get to the Liberal Party but in fact to embarrass the Tory government.

He went on to say:

> And I find that a strange commentary from a journalist and it certainly makes me suspicious about at least what part of their motivation may have been.

The Ottawa Citizen writes an editorial saying that what it is looking into is government ethics. I humbly suggest it should do a little consideration of journalistic ethics if that is not an oxymoron when applied to these people. They think they have Bernstein and Woodward here. What they have is researchers for the NBC program Dateline.

He said the purpose of these stories was not to seek out the journalistic goals of who, what, where, when and why, but to embarrass the Tory government. On the front page of this great national newspaper are stories by these two reporters who seek not the truth, who seek not to inform the public, but who seek by their own words to embarrass the government. Is that not wonderful? Are we not wonderfully served by such an institution?

This brought back to my mind a conversation I had with the late Marjorie Nichols. Speaking to me in some desolation one day—she had written an article that was actually complimentary about something the government had done—she said she was heckled and abused by her own colleagues in The Citizen. To write an article that actually said something good about the government was considered intolerable to her colleagues like Don McGillivray who has never had anything good to say ever about anything, even if he has to contradict himself. Then she also went on to say, in some disgust at the quality of the journalism around here: "You know, Harvie, this country has the strength to survive its politicians. It may not have the strength to survive its media". If this is the kind of standards we are going to get, these words are so true.

Perhaps a less pejorative interpretation could be put on those remarks which gets to another bigger problem. I was reading a review of the book: Reinventing Government: How the Entrepreneurial Spirit is Transforming the Public Service by R. I. G. MacLean who at the time was working with the Ontario government on a two-year assignment. He was talking about bureaucracy and how bureaucracy stifles because bureaucracy is after process, process, process, process. It is not about results; it is process and how stifling it is. He made the following observation:

> Each part of a bureaucratic organization has a mandate and operates within a set of rules. Lacking an objective assessment of outcomes, conformity becomes the measure of performance. This is what bureaucrats call accountability. The typical response to suggestions that we might get more done with fewer rules is that the rules are necessary for accountability to the public. This is a complete fallacy. The rules are all about accountability for inputs—the approvals required for spending. There is no accountability for outputs—what that spending achieves.

One bureaucrat was not following that procedure at least, Mr. Guité who was talking to Mr. Kennedy. He said: "Look, we followed a competitive process here. It is more honest than anything we did 10 years ago and The Ottawa Citizen is saying you did not provide a written report", i.e. the process. That was enough for them to conclude that the thing is corrupt and enough for them to continue in their ongoing efforts to embarrass the Conservative government.

Is that not a nice job to have? "What did you do today?"

"I embarrassed the government today".

"Wow, what an accomplishment. How are you serving the people, your readers and so on? Did you supply them with truth today?"

"No, not necessarily, but I embarrassed the government".

"Were you honest today? Did you give them the five ws: who, what, why, when and where?"

"No, but I embarrassed the government. By cracky, I got them".

"Wonderful".

For example, Stevie Cameron, wonderful. She must feel proud: "Hey, God, I got three reputations; I've destroyed three people this week. Alleluia, what a week". Shakespeare said: "Steal my purse, you steal trash. Steal my reputation you steal my life". She and too many like her think it is honourable to go around stealing reputations.

The hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, by naming off people in this place who have been found innocent and implying they are still guilty because they have been charged, is engaging in the same kind of behaviour. Then they wonder why this place does not get the respect it deserves from the public. Well, you get it by being fair, by being honest; you do not tolerate corruption but you do not accuse people of corrupt practices because they did not follow the interpretation of the rules that you put to them.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North is right. This place will come apart if we continue to engage in this kind of uncontrolled, irresponsible mud-slinging that is too often a part of what happens here.

If we treat each other with respect and if we do not assume that everybody on the other side is a crook and a thief; if we make sure that our accusations are based in fact, not suspicion; and if we do not immediately yell hurrah when we have reporters like Kennedy and Cobb out maligning people, we have a chance of regaining some of the respect we have lost. If we do not do it, unfortunately this institution and this country are the losers.

I regret that we would spend a valuable day on such a subject, but in a sense I am grateful to the hon. member for giving me a chance to put these facts on the record.

Mr. Lyle Kristiansen (Kootenay West—Revelstoke): Madam Speaker, I would like to pose a couple of questions to the government House leader and to make a couple of comments.

I have a hunch that I do not represent many of the official views of most political parties in Canada by the position I am enunciating, but personally I have been disturbed over the last number of years at the call for strict, legislated regulatory guidelines making law out of standards of practice and ethics in government.

There are problems, one of which was evidenced to a large degree in the province of British Columbia in the last few years. We had a premier who had difficulty, it appeared, understanding the difference between standards of public conduct and standards of private business conduct and how we ought to keep them apart.

That is something elected politicians surely have to make a determination about for themselves, with their own standards and what they think are good standards. Ultimately it is up to the electorate to make a judgment whether any given government has stood the test of a generally held view of what is acceptable public conduct among politicians.

I can recall a discussion I had with a previous minister between 1980 and 1984. He is now a senator from the province of New Brunswick. We were discussing something outside this area. He said: "Every time any one of us is in opposition and we see what we think is an abuse, we say there has to be a law, there has to be a regulation, and we have to tighten things up. All it ends up doing in the long run is having cabinet ministers who cannot sometimes yield to common sense appeals because they are bound up in red tape, regulations and laws".

Personally, and I suspect I speak on behalf of a lot more people in the body politic out there than we sometimes care to recognize, I wish that more politicians would simply say: "Look, I have done what I have done. Here is my record. Judge me on it. It is up to you to decide what our standards of conduct should be".

As an individual member of the House of Commons there are some things in the record of this government, in its earlier years particularly, I find profoundly disturbing. There seems to be an extraordinary number of people, more than ever before in our history, who have ended up before the courts. I suspect that sort of thing is likely to happen to any party that gains a huge influx of new members with no previous political and public life experience. They do not understand when they come here in those kinds of numbers the difference between standards of conduct acceptable in the public realm and those in the private sector.

Those are comments more than they are questions. I suspect we will have some agreement. I hope it is not simply because the government House leader is sitting on that side. It is a view which I think is important to express. I would like to hear a response of the government House leader on it.

Mr. Andre: Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his comments because I absolutely agree. I think he is dead on. We do have that tendency. The moment it appears a rule is broken the outcry is for tougher rules.

If we were to use the analogy of traffic by-laws, that every time someone breaks a speeding by-law we get tougher speeding laws, soon no one would be able to drive. We would soon constrict things and make it impossible to get about. We do that, the member is right, and the outcome is disturbing.

One reality in all this is that the message is very clear. The way to stay out of trouble is to follow each and every rule to the absolute nth degree. No matter that doing so produces bad value for the government, produces something that is awkward and is not responsive to the real situation or that the rules may not be appropriate in the real situation. We cannot get into trouble for sticking to the rules rigidly but we can sure waste a lot of money.

I mentioned in my speech a quote from that fellow MacLean who reviewed the book Reinventing Government. He really talked about it. He said that we should concentrate on outputs, not inputs, and that rather than say all the processes must be followed to the nth degree we ask what happened. I can be a tad partisan. Some of the malfeasance we have been accused of on this side is that we have done things contrary to the rules.

The fact of the matter is a better test to me for fraudulent activity is: "Did you personally enrich yourself or your friends at the expense of the taxpayer?" If one breaks the rules to provide better value for the taxpayer in terms of the program or whatnot, if it goes out to whomever, make it immigrants or whomever, surely it is almost something to be applauded.

• (1620)

Around here, this is all that needs to occur. It is what Kennedy and Cobb were talking about. They feel there was a technical breaking of the rules. That to them is equivalent to corruption. That is what I found despicable about that whole string of articles. They had the testimony of public servants who said it is a more honest system than what we had 10 years ago. I know that when I was over there I struggled with the system.

How does one contract for services? How does one find a fair way to decide which engineer to hire, which accountants or which lawyers? It is very tough.

For advertising, we have come up with this scheme which duplicates the private sector. To have these guys say that we are all corrupt because in their view we should have provided a written report—that is how they read the rules and therefore that is evidence of corruption—is a misstatement.

If this thing were to blow up and become a fact, we would have to write a new set of rules which would be the kind of bureaucratic imposition you are talking about. It serves nobody's purpose.

I would agree with you. Maybe the member and I could talk some time about how we could bring about that attitude and that result.

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Madam Speaker, yesterday in Question Period the minister indicated that the government would be bringing in a bill dealing with the report of the special joint committee of the Senate and the House dealing with conflict of interest.

I was wondering if that bill would contain the amendments that were recommended to the government in the conflict of interest report as an amendment to the Parliament of Canada Act. I was wondering whether he would also be accepting the amendments to the Criminal Code that were suggested in that report.

Mr. Andre: Madam Speaker, we certainly do intend to bring the bill forward.

I understand that the final draft is literally hours away. I am expecting to receive it and I will table it as soon as possible.

On the specifics, I can give you this general answer. I cannot give you the specifics but I can give you this general answer. The bill will reflect the recommendations of the committee of the House which the hon. member chaired and which was as a unanimous result.

There are one or two things where our legal advisers said we might have difficulty doing this or that. There was no dispute among cabinet colleagues with respect to the fundamental recommendations of the hon. member's committee.

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Nunatsiaq): Madam Speaker, it was a very moving speech by the hon. House leader of the government.

With all the signs of being angry at our daring to question the antics of the government and his comment about more people refraining from those kinds of antics, it just strikes me that I do not have the ability to do all that and look very mad.

If that is what he wants in the House, would he be prepared to be the first to refrain from having those kinds of antics?

Mr. Andre: Madam Speaker, I will accept the hon. member's criticism if he will agree to talk to his colleagues from Newfoundland in particular—including the mustachioed one from Newfoundland—I think he knows who I am talking about. Some of the others have damaged my eardrums over the years.

I do get angry about the subject. Frankly, the false accusation of malfeasance is one of the things that offends me most about public life. Argue over policy. Argue over issues. Argue over approach. However, false accusations of malfeasance and impropriety is to me going at a person's reputation and I consider that dirty pool.

The hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell the day I was in the House asked about the post office. He said: "You aren't closing all your rural post offices. You left a couple open in the Prime Minister's riding. That's evidence of patronage". Then he went out and repeated it to the press. He knows—I believe he knows and I could have told him—that he left six of them open in his riding.

An hon. member: He forgot that.

Mr. Andre: He forgot that. It is so easy to stand up here and say, "patronage". As a matter of fact there are five open in the Prime Minister's riding, but six in the hon. member's riding of Glengarry—Prescott—Russell. It is this easy flinging of the accusation of patronage, of illegality, of malfeasance, of corruption that I think destroys the reputation of all of us, damages this institution and damages the country. Yes I do get angry when people do that.

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Madam Speaker, I would put it to the House that the minister who just left does not get it.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member was just given the floor and in the first 20 seconds figured out a way to do something that, as a veteran member of this House, he knows he should not do and that is to mention the presence or absence of any one person on the House. I would appreciate the hon. member being a little more careful. I will give him the extra 20 seconds.

Mr. Kilgour: They told me that the minister might return if I coaxed him that way.

I would like to start if I may with a quote from somebody whom I think a lot of us have a lot of respect for, the late Adlai Stevenson. He said: "Public confidence in the integrity of the government is indispensable to faith and democracy. When we lose faith in the system we have lost faith in everything we fight and spend for".

Every member in this House and everybody who is sitting in the gallery or sitting around the House knows that this House of Commons and members of Parliament have never been held in lower esteem in the history of our country than right now. I think I saw a poll recently that pointed out that 9 per cent of Canadians have a great deal of respect or considerable respect—some such term—for members of Parliament.

Why is it that we have reached a new low in all parties with having good men and women run for their parties in the election? We seem to be having fewer problems than the others but I think it is a problem all parties are having.

Let me suggest that those opposite look on the public trust—and have shown this since 1984—much the way a vulture looks on a sick cow. Has there been a single government in our entire national history that has earned the opprobrium of Canadians more than this one opposite now.

Let me just pick up a few examples of the kinds of things that Canadians are concerned about. Here is article from The Globe and Mail on February 21, 1990: "$670,000 for trip by MP to Costa Rica".

It states: "The government spent $296,000 for the military aircraft and crew used to transport the entourage and equipment which included flying two armour-plated Oldsmobile limousines from Ottawa to Costa Rica, and $136,000 more or less for travel expenses of officials accompanying Mr. Mulroney".

Here is one from The Toronto Star of December 6, 1989. It states: "External Affairs Minister Joe Clark spent $165,438 for a pair of trips to Paris and London. Clark and three officials could not get a commercial flight to Paris in August because the minister had to attend a late session of the Progressive Conservative Party annual meeting. The Challenger dropped them off in time to attend a conference in Cambodia and return to Ottawa. On return to Ottawa, it was empty. The cost was $85,000.

There are so many stories, Madam Speaker, it is hard to know where to stop. Here is one en français.

[Translation]

It is another article in French by Marcel Adam, published in La Presse on May 27, 1989, and I quote: "Since they came to power five years ago, the Tories have continued to display a deplorable lack of public morality and parliamentary ethics. They are morally so lax that they are acquiring a reputation as one of the most corrupt government parties to sully federal politics, at a time when we thought such practices were no longer tolerated".

[English]

Here is one dated February 2, 1990 from The Ottawa Citizen written by Don McGillivray, whom the government House leader does not seem to like. I will not name any names. We will just keep this general.

> Is there no end to the parade of cabinet ministers, members of Parliament and appointed officials who use the position of public trust to advance their private interests?

Here is another one from La Presse.

[Translation]

It is dated November 8, 1990, under the heading: "Two out of three Canadians believe favouritism and corruption are on the increase in Ottawa", and I quote: "Nearly two-thirds of Canadians, 65 per cent, state that favouritism and political corruption are increasing in Ottawa, while only 6 per cent claim the tendency is less widespread than it was in the past."

[English]

Here is one from The Gazette of May 24, 1991. One could pick up the paper almost any week and find a similar story. The headline read:

> Company founded by Mulroney aide got $700,000 job.
> Just two months after the $700,000 'strategic management review' of the Canadian International Development Agency was given to Secor Inc. of Montreal, company founder Marcel Côté quit the Prime Minister's office and rejoined the firm.

There has been a steady stream of scandals, blatant patronage appointments and questionable ethical behaviour on behalf of cabinet ministers since 1984. Let me quote from the former leader of this party, John Turner, who spoke in Montreal in March 1987 about what he called a crisis of confidence in the political system itself:

> By confusing personal, party and public interest, the Mulroney government has undermined the very foundation of the state. In today's system there is a clear distinction made between the state, the Prime Minister and the party with the majority. Despite the strength of their 1984 victory, the Conservatives do not have the right to use their position, which should be above partisan interests, for personal gains. The state exists for the common good and not for the personal interests of a few. We cannot remain passive in the light of this situation for I am certain that no one can run a country without the confidence of the people. This confidence must be earned.

He went on to talk about the people here being the trustees of the democratic institutions: "We must strengthen them, not undermine them". He talked about the need for a code of conduct to dictate honest behaviour and so on.

It is a big file. I might though, on the subject of conflicts of interest, ask those opposite to tell us what happened to the proposed conflict of interest code that was brought in September 5, 1985, when our Prime Minister said: "We have taken great pains to ensure that the new code leaves no doubt that the ultimate responsibility for the ethical standards of the federal government rests with the cabinet, and more particularly with me".

Wow. That is reassuring, is it not? It is 1993 now. Where is the code? Where do you start? Here is a quote from May 4, 1985: "Following the example set by Michael Wilson, it has been learned that the External Affairs minister Joe Clark's brother, Peter Clark, has been given all outside legal work awarded by the federal government's Calgary Olympic office".

> Not to be outdone by the Wilson family, it has been revealed that External Affairs Minister Joe Clark's sister-in-law, Marcia Clark, was appointed as a temporary member of the National Parole Board.

She is now a full-time member.

The head of the riding association of the Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs and/or his campaign manager now sits on the National Parole Board. The brother of the member for Athabasca sits on the Parole Board. What qualifications do any of these three, or virtually any of the Parole Board appointees made by this bunch opposite, have to make decisions on what amounts to a life and death situation for the 14 Albertans who were killed needlessly because of bad decisions by the National Parole Board since 1986? It is a trough for the boys and girls.

Here is another one from June 4, 1985:

> Justice Minister John Crosbie continued the Conservative government's nepotism with appointments for his sons, Michael Crosbie and Chesley Crosbie, via the law firms—

And so on. Those boys need work. Here is another one from October 11, 1985:

> Secretary of State Walter McLean has managed to spend more than $100,000 on a trip to Africa with his wife.

The list gets so long and boring, but they just do not get it.

I would suggest that three-quarters of this bunch opposite are going to lose their seats because they just do not understand that Canadians are not back in the Duplessis era. They are not back in the 1950s in Quebec, Manitoba or British Columbia. Canadians have moved on. They would like to have some respect for the people who get elected to this House.

There are exceptions. I can see one or two here. There are many people in this House on that side who are honest. However, the leadership comes from the top and there is no leadership on this issue. There is misleadership at the top on this issue.

What are we going to do about it? As a new government it is becoming increasingly evident that we are going to have to do a lot of things. I hope we will start with an ethics in government act, akin to what the American Congress introduced after Watergate. I hope we will do the kinds of things that President Clinton has done by having pre-employment contracts with appointees that prevent lobbying and influence peddling after people leave those positions.

The Canadian public is so mad at us collectively because of these acts, which I would say come from the leadership at the top of this government, that it is going to take us years and years to regain the confidence of our fellow citizens.

I do not know why we cannot have an ethics in government act or why we cannot have a conflict code that has some teeth to it. We simply must do this before this place will have the respect of Canadians again.

I would like to state some things I would like to see done, and I am speaking personally. I would like to see the recommendations of the Special Joint Committee on Conflict of Interest enacted. I know this is a controversial issue but I think that the spouses of members of Parliament, given the unique position we have, should have to disclose their assets.

The Departments of Supply and Services and Public Works should be merged to form the department of government services with absolute honesty and transparency in the way it does business with the public.

The Agency of Records should be eliminated. A government advertising bureau should be established to handle all government advertising contracts.

There must be a more rational system of wording government contracts in all ministries in order to allow small businesses a greater opportunity for access to them. There should be a central registry for all awarded contracts. Subject to security requirements the details of any contract awarded by the government should be open to public scrutiny.

Surely members of Parliament must be excluded from any involvement in the contract awarding process.

There should be established within the House of Commons a non-partisan nominating and confirmation procedure for Order in Council and other appointments.

• (1640)

Right now if an Order in Council appointment is referred to the energy committee, of which I am a member, we have no right to stop the appointment. We can have a little hearing. We can ask questions. My understanding is that whether we like it or not once the Order in Council is signed that man or woman is appointed and it is, in effect, just window-dressing for these committees to pretend to review these appointments.

If this Parliament is going to regain a meaningful place in society we should be able to scrutinize the appointments of deputy ministers and of appointments to Crown corporations and certain regulatory agencies.

We should also have the right to veto appointments as we saw happen recently south of here in the case of the proposed attorney general, Ms. Baird.

There should be no registration fees imposed on Tier I and Tier II lobbyists. Individuals should be free to petition and give feedback to public officials. Professional lobbyists should be required to disclose in a public registry their major expenses and fees along with a description of their lobbying activities. Contingency fees are simply unacceptable for lobbyists.

I think I have probably said enough. If I made one point I hope it is that Canadians are very, very angry. Any of us who goes door knocking in our ridings knows how angry Canadians are at us about our pensions and perks. There is a constant stream of newspaper articles describing abuse of office or worse.

The only way we are going to regain the public trust is by introducing very tough ethics in a government act which will basically do what the United States Congress did after Watergate.

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Madam Speaker, the member recited a great number of articles alleging all sorts of nastiness.

I noticed that all of those articles were in the period prior to 1988 when the member ran for the Progressive Conservative Party in the last general election, and he certainly knew about them at the time. Having known about all these terrible revelations why did he put his name up and accept the letter from the Prime Minister to make him a candidate in that election on behalf of the Progressive Conservative Party?

If he was really concerned about these terrible ethical matters that he has revealed today he would not have run for the party that allegedly made these terrible errors, would he? Maybe he can explain to this House why he accepted the Prime Minister's nomination in 1988.

Mr. Kilgour: Madam Speaker, when I was expelled from the caucus after the GST vote the Prime Minister was quoted as saying that he would not sign my nomination paper if I attempted to run for the party again.

I assured him that he would never have that problem because as long as he was leader of the party I would never have anything to do with the Conservative Party.

I would remind the member for Mississauga South that in 1986 when I "left the caucus" for a period of nine months two reasons were given. They were the abuse of office by the government of the day and the lack of attention to the problems in the west.

I have some affection for the member. He may not want me to say that in public but if there were more members on that side of the House who had the candour and the outspokenness of the member who just spoke this place would be held in more esteem than it is at present.

One of the troubles with his caucus is that there are too few people like the member who are prepared to say what is on their minds either in here, in the caucus or anywhere else. The member for Abitibi is a member of Parliament who everybody in the House can and should admire. He is an example to all of us. The members of the House should try to be more like him.

The trouble with the system is that the way to get ahead in it is by "apple polishing" the right hon. gentleman who sits there.

Until members of Parliament take pride in being members of Parliament instead of being aspiring ministers, parliamentary secretaries or ambassadors, our system will not be the kind of House that the member for Mississauga South and I would both like it to be.

[Translation]

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Parliamentary Secretary to the Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, I again listened very carefully to what the member for Edmonton Southeast said. I noted in his comments to the House, especially at the very beginning, that he gave a detailed list of spending by Cabinet ministers on official trips. Of course if ministers of the Crown, representing the Government of Canada, go outside the country, it costs money. According to the member for Edmonton Southeast, we would have to conclude that this type of spending is unethical, a form of misconduct and contrary to the interests of Canada and of this House.

If that is what the member for Edmonton Southeast thinks of the value of the representations made by representatives of the government and of Canada when they travel abroad to defend our interests, pursue our foreign policy, strengthen our ties with our allies and open new trade opportunities, if that is unethical and misconduct on the part of government members, I have serious doubts about the judgment of the member for Edmonton Southeast.

If he has such a keen sense of integrity and is so scrupulous, I have a question for him. He accuses members of this caucus of lacking integrity because they do not speak up to denounce abuses. Could I ask him whether he was so scrupulous when he decided to quit the Conservative Party, even though he was elected under that banner in 1984 and 1988? Did he have the decency and the integrity to obtain his constituents' agreement for changing to a party other than the one they elected him for?

Mr. Kilgour: Madam Speaker, very briefly, I would say that it is a question of judgment, a question of respect for the public and for the federal government's lack of money.

I gave Mr. Clark as an example. He has to take a government plane to attend a Conservative Party meeting. As a Canadian of Scottish origin, I think that it is very easy to make such trips on regular flights. I do not have the article on hand, but I think that he spent something like $67,000. To me that is an abuse of power.

As for running in a by-election, I said when I was expelled from the party by the member and his colleagues that if the Prime Minister would sign a contract to call a by-election within three months or less, I would be very glad to run. Knowing the Prime Minister very well, I knew full well that if I resigned my seat, he would make me wait a year, maybe more. Since I have four children, I really like to get paid at the end of the month.

Mr. Langlois: Oh, that's it.

[English]

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Madam Speaker, let me first of all say that this motion, which is a Liberal opposition day motion, would not find itself naturally within the context of my critic area. Let me say more about it. It is not the kind of debate that I find great pleasure participating in at all.

• (1650)

I just do not like and never have liked mud slinging and scandal mongering. In all the time I have been in this House I have not jumped to the conclusion that what the press prints about a member is necessarily true. All of us in this place are human and all of us are going to make mistakes. By and large the newspaper reports put into the record today constitute a record of human error, the perpetrators of which to one degree or another have been punished.

We talk about corruption in Canadian politics. It is time that this be put into the proper context. Much of what has been said and the impression of Canadian politicians has been created to a very large degree by the reports of what happens on the other side of the river. I know that some will look askance at that remark, but the fact is a culture has grown which says that politicians are corrupt and are never to be trusted because they are always putting money into their own pockets.

The average Canadian is absolutely convinced that most of us are here because it is going to make us rich and famous and when we get through here we are going to be not quite so famous but infinitely richer. It just is not so.

I live in Windsor, Ontario. Every Sunday when I look at the Detroit Free Press News I see reports of crime and criminal activity, the corruption of one politician or another, whether it be a mayor, a member of council, a police commissioner, or whomever. Corruption is as American as apple pie .You can see it every day, day in and day out. When talking about corruption, we are in the minor leagues of the minor leagues.

Consider for example the savings and loan scandal. Consider the number of reports of congressmen and senators lining their own pockets. Think of the reality of members of the U.S. Senate or Congress raising money for a campaign and when they resign they put the money in their pockets. Look at the kind of situation that creates.

It is true that kind of image of politicians affects how Canadians think of us. I think it is far more important to consider how Canadians weigh us in terms of our functions here to the extent to which we represent principle, to the extent to which we represent the people who elect us and to the extent to which we act consistent with principles that have been identified with us and with our parties.

The hon. member for Edmonton Southeast who has been so passionate in his condemnation of the Conservatives and what he sees as so much corruption better weigh the impression he has created about politics by his own acts. I am not talking about corrupt acts or anything of the sort. I am not talking about patronage. I am not talking about lining his own pocket. But what are we going to say about the principles of conservatism if you are a Conservative for many years and you get into a pique and you cross the aisle? What does that say about what he stands for? Is he a Conservative or is he a Liberal?

If a tragedy should beset this country such as the election of a Liberal government, the moment his government acts just like any other government and his colleagues are found to be just as human as the Conservatives will he then become a New Democrat?

I will tell you the answer to that. No. No, because we will not accept him. We will not accept him because politics and belonging to a party is something other than being merely comfortable. If he were so upset about the behaviour of Conservatives he should have stayed there and changed things if he was a Conservative. But of course he is not a Conservative, he is not a Liberal, he is not anything. He is what he chooses to be. When he was thinking about all of this corruption—

An hon. member: Madam Butterfly.

Mr. Volpe: I rise on a point of order, Madam Speaker. I think it is traditional in these debates that we try to stay off the personal as much as possible. We are getting to a point here where, without naming the member, we are making some rather personal references. I think that goes beyond the requirements of debate.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member might have wanted to listen to one of his colleagues a bit earlier today. We will be careful.

Mr. McCurdy: Thank you for that, Madam Speaker. What can be more personal than standing in this House and categorizing the innocent and the guilty alike as political criminals of one sort or another. That is what is wrong with this.

I wonder whether the hon. member for Edmonton Southeast was altogether conscious of the past of his own party and how his former leader ended up losing an election. Remember what the penultimate Leader of the Official Opposition had to say. "I had no choice". Do you remember, Madam Speaker, the wave of patronage appointments of the kind that the member for Edmonton Southeast dislikes so much being made as a dying government tried to pay off all who had supported it.

Do you remember a Liberal senator who faced charges of fraud? If the hon. member really believes what he said about public trust, private benefits and condemnation of people who leave this place to go out into the outside world and take advantage of their political standing, what about Judy Erola.

Let us talk about public trust. What about the Leader of the Official Opposition? What about the member for Vancouver Quadra who sits as a member of the board of directors of Curragh Resources, a member who is supposed to consider what happened at Westray like all of the others in an objective fashion?

We could go on with this, but as I said yesterday, that House is a Liberal house and a house of glass, silence within. They have a curious cast willing and able to condemn others but not to see the wrongs that they have perpetrated themselves. I do not condemn them for having within their number people who are going to make mistakes and people who we would prefer not to have here.

Just in case the hon. member thinks that I am not being completely fair and non-partisan in this, yes the Ontario government has had its difficulties and we have had a circus of condemnation of that entire government on the basis of the errors of a few. Even as I stand here, in the province of Saskatchewan, some MLAs are being accused of improper use of government funds. This transcends a party but it should be put in proper perspective.

I see where Henry Kissinger said that 90 per cent of politicians give the other 10 per cent a bad name. That is the kind of stereotype we hear about. It is less than 10 per cent of politicians who give 90 per cent a bad name. Most people in this place are here because they believe they have something to contribute to the country. We should not engage in a game that tarnishes the whole endeavour of politics in the way this kind of debate does. We are collaborating with those who, to their own advantage, would like to take politics down to the lowest level. I submit that the hon. minister was correct. All too often the press gives itself the power to run a country by words and condemn those who really have the responsibility all too much.

Unless I be misunderstood, I am disappointed and I think hon. members on all sides should be disappointed that the rules and the ethical guidelines that the Prime Minister introduced in 1985 were not followed by proper legislation governing conflict of interest and that we have not yet adopted a set of ethical guidelines for all of us in here. If you have any doubts about where my party stands, we support it.

I have to agree with my colleague sitting here that it is not rules, regulations and bureaucracy that will do it. It is to have a commitment that this life we live is not a life to advantage ourselves. I mean in the sense of lining our pockets, but I also mean in terms of making others on the slimmest of suspicions be the object of punishment and calumny for political advantage. That is wrong.

The highest form of ethical behaviour is to come to this place and behave in a fashion that reflects well on the people of this country, but more than anything else we are here to act for the welfare of a nation of which we must be proud or we would not be here.

I think it would be the preference of most Canadians that we stop the name calling. Oh, no, that does not mean to disregard the wrong that we do, but it is about time we put more emphasis on those things that matter most to people. We must engage, as we were elected to do, in the process of governance and representing those who sent us here.

I hope that I do not have to get into a debate ever again which is reflected in name calling, scandal mongering and accusations of guilt of those who have not been proven guilty. If there is wrong-doing, let us root it out, but let us root it out on the basis of fair definitions of appropriate conduct in this place. The best way to do that is if the government were to introduce Bill C-43 and get it adopted in this House as soon as possible.

Mr. Joseph Volpe (Eglinton—Lawrence): Madam Speaker, I am so happy to hear the member finally get to the points at issue in the debate. If he was really sincere about talking about conflict of interest guidelines or about those practices and regulations that are going to bring honour to members in this House, then he might have followed his own advice and turned his oratorical skills in that direction at the very beginning.

It is unfortunate that we engaged in cheap, partisan shots that have a very selective view of the history of this House, of all three parties and of individuals who have served in this House.

I am not going to descend to the same kind of name calling by innuendo practised by members of his own party, but if he cares to learn some of those names, I will be happy to give him a list. I must say that if the road to Heaven and to propriety is paved with self-righteous indignation, the hon. member on this issue at least would probably be behind the wheels of a Lamborghini.

Mr. McCurdy: Madam Speaker, I do not know whether the hon. member was here when the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell was here and listed name after name, read from newspaper article after newspaper article as if every one of those articles reflected the truth.

I simply felt that it was appropriate to point out, to even it up, one or two examples of actions or involvements of members from his party just as, and I am afraid he must have missed it, I cited members of my own party.

At the core of it all this has nothing to do with whether members are Liberals, New Democrats or Conservatives. As my hon. colleague indicated, in the human character of this place there is the inevitability that human weaknesses will be exhibited.

There can be no higher plane than to stop this nonsense. There would have been a higher plane if the Liberals had come into this place and said something about what they are going to do about unemployment or what they are going to do about integrity in government. What I mean by integrity of government is telling people what they stand for and then pursuing what they stand for.

This is a party that in government or out cannot make up its mind about what it stands for. It has no other way of behaving than to engage in an almost constant parade of name calling.

It must stop because it hurts us all.

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Madam Speaker, it is with a great deal of sadness that I stand on this side of the House to answer one of the most spurious resolutions ever put before this House.

When I worked with the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell on the special committee this House established with the Senate in connection with the review of Bill C-43, and a conflict of interest report that we filed, I thought that he had given up being the chief honcho of the rat pack. He apparently has not. Apparently he decided today to dig deep, dig it out, spill it out and swirl it out in his usual old fashioned slimy way. I sometimes wonder why he does not go out of this House and say some of the things he says in this House. I suspect he would be sued on many occasions.

The kind of thing that the member was saying today, the kind of detail of this debate, does us no good.

In today's Quorum there is an article about Senator Nurgitz, who was speaking to a reporter about leaving the Senate. He said in an interview that he resigned from the upper chamber. The article says:

> He was not driven from political life but he admitted that he was tired of the politics and public scorn. He said he would have quit even if he hadn't received a judicial appointment.

Further on in the article it says:

> Prominent Quebec businessman Claude Castonguay,— who was a Senator in this place—

> —who recently gave up his seat, also complained it was difficult getting respect from people once they realized he sat in the Senate.

The article then goes on to say:

> Dr. Wilbert Keon, a world renowned heart surgeon, recently lamented he no longer enjoys the public admiration or respect he once did because he is now Senator Keon.

What has happened? What we have done in this place, what the rat pack has done, and what this kind of resolution before this House does is defame members of Parliament. In so doing, it defames all of us. It hurts all of us. It tears our reputation down. That was the finding of the joint committee of which the member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell was a member.

The introduction of that report says on page 1:

> Service to the Canadian public has always been the highest calling of a Canadian citizen. Traditionally, Parliament has attracted dedicated men and women, from diverse sectors of Canadian life, to serve their country and fellow citizens with integrity and commitment. As intimate observers, as well as participants in the political realm, we can affirm with confidence the honesty, integrity and commitment of the vast majority of Canadians who represent Canada in Parliament. But we know that it is no longer sufficient to state this fact, however emphatically. The cases wherein a few individuals have abused their positions of public trust have bred scepticism and, worse still, resignation to dishonesty and unethical behaviour as an attribute of politicians and political life.
> We believe this does a disservice to all those who are dedicated to public service, who believe that it can still be the highest calling of the democratic citizen. The tradition of political philosophy from Plato to today has sought the parallel between the city and the citizen. The integrity and justice of the political life of the nation both mirrors and is mirrored in the integrity and justice of the inner lives of its citizens; the moral health of one is reflective of that of the other.

• (1710)

Our committee sat from the middle of December through until June 1992 when we filed a report with this House. That report was a unanimous report representing all of the parties in this House and the parties in the Senate. The committee had 21 members. That is a lot of members on a committee and that is a lot of members from whom to get a unanimous report. We recommended that we amend the Parliament of Canada Act by creating the concept of a jurisconsult. I want to quote from an article about the jurisconsult written by Barbara Kagedan, who was our chief researcher on the committee. It is from the Canadian Parliamentary Review winter 1992-93 issue, Volume 15, No. 4 on page 21. It says:

> Once a member has made the required disclosure to the jurisconsult, has taken any further steps recommended by the jurisconsult to ensure that the obligations under the act can be fulfilled, and filed the public disclosure statement, then the jurisconsult will provide a written certificate to the member, confirming that the disclosure obligations have been satisfied. If subsequently an issue is raised whether a particular asset or interest was properly disposed of, or appropriately placed in a trust, and those steps were taken at the direction of and in accordance with recommendations by the jurisconsult, then the member can rely on the certificate to demonstrate his or her compliance with the act.
> The second advisory role of the jurisconsult is to assist members as issues of possible conflicts of interest arise during their term in Parliament, or their tenure as minister or parliamentary secretary.

I am going to stop there for a moment. The concept is that when a member is elected he will make a disclosure of all his assets and all the assets his wife has if he knows what she has. Obviously there is no way we can insist that because a person marries someone we can force a disclosure. If they are not married we cannot force a disclosure, that is impossible to do. The member's disclosure is of all the assets he owns and all the assets he knows his wife owns.

The disclosure is of two kinds. There are personal assets, like a house, a cottage and so on, and there are business assets which are listed in detail. If it comes to shares in a company it may be a significant interest or an insignificant interest. It is a question of disclosure, and that disclosure is made public.

Once the disclosure of probable conflicts is made the jurisconsult can give members a letter saying that as long as they behave themselves in this fashion anything they do is fine. We are not going to be insisting, as is presently in the current rules for parliamentary secretaries and ministers, that they report to Georges Tsaï, the Deputy Registrar General. Mr. Tsai is a good fellow, but he has a lot of specific rules. Anybody who is appointed to cabinet or to be a parliamentary secretary has to fill in this great application. I looked at it and said: "Oh my gosh, could I ever fill that in? I do not know". I had Georges Tsaï do an application for me in blank and it was interesting. All my private business activities were apparently okay because I was not a director.

I go to director meetings by invitation and I make decisions. I may help make the decisions but I was a shareholder so that was okay. I have 200 shares in the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce. By George, I have to sell those. Do you know something? I even belong to a golf club and they give me my membership free. "You cannot do that," says Georges Tsaï. Why not?

These silly regulations in the current rules that cabinet ministers and parliamentary secretaries must comply with are crazy. They make no public sense. The new jurisconsult proceeding will enable members to make a declaration to the jurisconsult and he can determine if there is really a conflict of interest.

If I belong to the Mississauga Golf and Country Club because my neighbours would like me to belong to that club—I do not play golf anyway, I just eat occasionally—then surely there is no conflict of interest in my membership in that club with my duty as a parliamentarian. It would not matter if I was a minister either. It does not affect the Government of Canada.

Conflicts of interest or possible ownership or possible membership does not affect the way you operate in an honest, straightforward way as a member and it should not be a matter of disclosure, disclaimer or divestment. That is the general tenor of this whole report.

The government has said that it approves the report. The minister said today that it is in the final stages of drafting and he hopes to be able to introduce new legislation on this issue almost immediately. People will sit back and ask: "Why was it not done earlier? After all you received the report in June". Members must appreciate that this House was involved in a very protracted debate and consultation with the country on the referendum debate all fall. Really, we have not had much time.

I suspect the bill will be produced well before Easter. I hope, because the report had the unanimous backing of all parties, that it and the legislation that comes from it will be approved and put through possibly on a Friday with one speaker from each side. It is the kind of thing we all want and need. It has a lot of flexibility and it does not make a series of rules that are impossible to comply with.

We looked at the American situation and felt that was the case there. We looked at the British situation where they do not have any rules and felt that we could not really go along with what they had. What we have proposed is a take-off from what is available for members of the Quebec legislature, the Ontario legislature and in British Columbia. What we have is a system that we think will work far better than anything to date.

The jurisconsult will be appointed for a seven-year period. He will be responsible to Parliament. He will report annually to Parliament. He will publish in a fair way the assets of members so we may take a look at them. They might not be in detail. It may say that you own shares in a certain company but it will not tell you exactly how many. It will only be disclosed as a significant interest or an insignificant interest or a minor interest. It will be a fair, complete disclosure with no hiding.

Members are not elected to get rich here. Nobody gets rich being a member of Parliament. People think it is a grand job but vice-principals in public schools earn what we earn. This is not a job to get rich on. One is not going to line one's pockets being a member of Parliament. One cannot make money in the job. You do it because you want to do something for your country. That is what you are here for.

I find it disgraceful when members of Parliament stand up in this place and accuse members of some action or the rumour of some action for no reason at all. Take the Sinclair Stevens case. There was no crime committed. There was no charge that could be laid on Stevens but he was convicted in the press and by this House. I think that issue was deplorable and disgraceful. I say that not because of any great, long friendship or anything, although he is a friend.

I want to say that those rabid attacks by the rat pack with the allegations and insinuations drove a good person out of politics. Perhaps the judgment of Mr. Justice Parker is correct but I must say that there were no rules. There was an anticipation or possibility of a conflict and the anticipation and possibility of conflict created a conflict.

We had before the committee another member of this House who has a great deal of commercial experience and background, the hon. member for LaSalle—Émard. He ran for the leadership of the Liberal Party. He has a great deal of business experience and his family is heavily involved in a number of activities through Canada Steamship Lines. He owns certain preferred shares—voting shares are with his sons in a voting trust and so on—but the fact of the matter is that he does not take part in that company at all.

However, under the current rules of Georges Tsaï, he could not be a member of cabinet. Why? Canada Steamship Lines is a public company, so he would have to divest.

Under the current system, many people who could be attracted to public life and who could offer Canada a great deal would be denied the right. Canada would be denied the right to have them.

Our proposal under our conflict of interest suggestion by our unanimous committee report will make it possible for the member for LaSalle—Émard to be a cabinet minister and possibly even something better than that at some stage in his career. I wish him luck. My colleague says that it will be many years from now. Perhaps it will be many years from now.

I want to conclude by saying that we have come to grips in this Parliament with this issue. The Prime Minister has come to grips with this issue. To have this debate today on a matter that I think we have come to grips with in a unanimous fashion, that the member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell knows will be brought before this House in legislation before Easter, is an absolute disgrace.

I want to know something from the resolution. Where is the incessant inability to function within the framework of existing legislation guidelines and standards? I do not know of any item ever brought to this House and to this debate with the incessant inability to function within the framework of existing legislation, guidelines and standards. I do not know where the reluctance is to bring forward strict new codes and legislation with regard to conflict of interest. I do not know where we have the continued failure to establish and adhere to clear and high standards of public sector service.

The resolution is a crock. The resolution does Parliament no favour. This is despicable. It is the kind of resolution that the Liberal Party ought now to stand with their next speakers and denounce. It is not a resolution that does any of us as parliamentarians any good. It hurts all of us. It is the old story of dig out the laundry, spread it out, cough it up and slime it out.

I say to the members of the Official Opposition that I think they ought to recant right now. I think they ought to withdraw this resolution.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I listened to the member attentively. He knows I have a tremendous amount of respect for him. Quite frankly, I thought a lot of his remarks and ideas on how we could improve the existing rules concerning conflict of interest and lobbying guidelines, et cetera, were right on the money.

If I remember correctly, it was either yesterday or today that the member stood up in this House during Question Period and put a question to his own government House leader urging his government to move forward on the issue of ethics in government, which is the conflict of interest package. I wonder how that question that you put forward to your government House leader is any different from today when we are basically assisting the question the member advanced to the government House leader yesterday by saying that it is a matter of urgency and it is pressing.

I certainly support the view that there should not be any personal name calling. I think my record in this House on that issue stands by itself, but I do believe that the issue of trust in government and the fact that the current systems are not working—this is acknowledged by the member—is something we must address. The House is about to adjourn and once again another four-year period will have lapsed and some of the very concerns that the member has mentioned repeatedly in this House over the last eight years will not have been addressed.

I think to try to bring it to a head is a constructive exercise.

Mr. Blenkarn: Mr. Speaker, I want to remind the member that the government House leader made a pretty clear declaration as to what would happen. It is not perhaps unknown to him that I might even have checked as to what was happening with the legislation before I asked the question.

I make no apologies for that because sometimes the way to get something across in this House is to do it that way.

I want to say this to the member. We are going to have a bill that was approved by this House unanimously. I do not think it does the system of Parliament any favour to have someone stand here and read old press clippings naming, slurring, slandering, gouging up and burping up accusations against individuals whether they are correct or incorrect or proven or not proven.

I think we have to understand this as members of Parliament. If we want to have public respect then we have to act in a respectable fashion one to each other.

I do not believe there is any merit in accusing someone of something unless it can be proven.

• (1730)

The minister earlier today on this issue said to a member: "If you are going to make the accusation, make it. Remember the rule around here. If you cannot prove your allegation, you resign. You put your seat on the line".

That was always the rule around here, but people slither around it. The slithering around hurts us all. It tears away at our reputation.

The member for Broadview—Greenwood did pretty well. He can do it very well. He does not have to be here to earn $64,000 a year. As far as he is concerned that is probably penny ante. He does not make a big thing out of being a member of Parliament but he works darned hard at it. He does not want his reputation slandered by people saying: "Parliamentarians did this. Parliamentarians did that. This member did that. That member did this".

Everybody sits back and says: "What did you do, Broadview—Greenwood? How much did you get in your pocket? If you did not, the other guys got some. What is wrong with you?" That is the kind of thing they say. That is what hurts us all.

I think this is a disgraceful debate. It should never have been brought forward. It does not do any of us any good. It does not accomplish anything and it does nothing for the development of a better Canada.

Mr. Lyle Kristiansen (Kootenay West—Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the member from Mississauga a question. He understandably seems to be placing a lot of faith in what appears to be an all-party agreement to set up a code or new standard of ethics. He hopes it will be settled by just one speaker from each party.

I want to repeat some of the reservations I had earlier. Part of my experience with recent events in British Columbia is if you have a written legislated code of ethics and standards all you end up doing is providing a certain list and as long as someone in public life does not fall within the definition of those things that are listed in that code, they think they are free and clear.

I am not at all sure that we would be much better off, whether the public would accept it or not, to adopt the British system. I think within parliamentary democracies, its standard of public conduct among government officials and ministers is to almost immediately step aside when any kind of legitimate accusation is made until the matter is settled. The perception in Britain is much greater.

Maybe I am just too far away from its press. It has a pretty active press and we hear about a lot of the rest of it. My hunch is that its standards are perceived to be much higher than those in the United States which are going further and further toward codifying, regulating and listing all the shalls and shall nots.

I am worried about selling the public and ourselves a false bill of goods simply because we cannot come to an agreement to put this issue on the shelf and put it behind us by unanimously agreeing to some grand thing called a code of ethics.

We must be willing to look at the public at election time and between elections and let them have it right between the eyes, and say: "If you are fed up with the standards that you think exist in public life, then you are the people who are responsible for it. You make sure that apart from the issues of the economy and others, it is one that you take seriously when you judge the kind of people who individually you want to elect regardless of party when you come to cast your ballot".

We have to place the responsibility with them in as open a way as possible and in a way as unregulated as possible. Unless we have a standard of ethics of public office and public conduct, I do not think we are going to solve our problems.

I would like to get some response. I know we have some agreement.

Mr. Blenkarn: Mr. Speaker, in the committee we analysed the British system.

The British system, as the member may know, is indeed quite free. There are no written rules really. The trouble is that members are permitted to serve on boards of directors of corporations dealing with the government, to be actively involved lobbying for a particular activity. They do not need a lobbyist registration act, the members of Parliament act as lobbyists.

I do not think that we would want to do that. I have real grave concerns about the British system.

What we have with the jurisconsult approach is a much more flexible arrangement. It is really a well respected person who becomes jurisconsult who really runs the show. To some extent it is like the British Columbia system, though quite a bit more restricted than that. We had some difficulty with some of the ways things could happen in British Columbia, some of the ownership arrangements, selling arrangements, dealing arrangements and so on.

We analysed British Columbia thoroughly. We analysed Ontario and Quebec thoroughly. We had the former premier of Ontario and other members of the Ontario legislature from all parties as witnesses to our hearings. They seemed to have developed in Ontario and in Quebec a system of controlling these matters in a far more civilized and sane fashion than we have to date.

In Ontario they have a commissioner who is a former judge. You disclose to him and if you are accused of something, you are tried by him. He operates as judge, jury and executioner, so to speak.

Our jurisconsult will essentially have the same type of powers. That may seem a bit strange. Former Mr. Justice Evans operates on a part-time basis. He does not have to be there full time. It is a pretty easy one-man show.

We looked at the situation in Canada right now with the current office that Georges Tsai runs. He has 20 bureaucrats there. They look after—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret the hon. member's time has expired. The next two speakers will divide their time 10 minutes each.

Ms. Albina Guarnieri (Mississauga East): "There will be jobs for Liberals and NDPs too after I have been Prime Minister for 15 years and I can't find a living, breathing Tory in the country". Those were the boastful words, Mr. Speaker, of the Prime Minister in 1983. Mind you, if you look at the polls after only nine years, the Prime Minister may already be having trouble finding living, breathing Tories in Canada.

Of course, when it comes to hand-outs for cronies and backers, this government is flush with jobs and contracts. We in opposition shudder every time we hear that someone is leaving the Prime Minister's Office. It cannot be long we say before we find the government contracts headed in the same direction.

We remember the Prime Minister's former director of strategic planning who was in the PMO just long enough for a $700,000 contract to be given to the firm he once founded. Once this was achieved, this Tory friend was quick to quit the PMO and repurchase his interest in his old firm. I suppose he was one of the living, breathing Tories the Prime Minister was looking for.

Last year was a time of great suffering for many Canadians, particularly the 1.5 million unemployed and the thousands upon thousands of small business people who were forced into bankruptcy. People lost their homes, sometimes for lack of only a few thousand dollars.

Perhaps the Minister of Employment and Immigration should have made a revision of his definition of just cause for quitting a job.

• (1740)

He should have included contracts being awarded to an employee's firm as reason to pull out of the Tory well on the next slush bucket.

It must have been quite disorienting for unemployed Canadians to hear one TV ad after another saying that Canada was number one.

Canada must indeed be number one in taxpayer funded political advertising. We are told $21 million was spent to confuse the unemployed into believing that the policies of this government were not the cause of their misery. They repeatedly heard the slogan: "Yes, we can". It should have said: "Yes, we can give contracts to our Tory friends. Yes, we can cut welfare".

There is no money for health care and education, but we can spend millions on feel-good TV ads. Yes, this government can spend millions on nothing while spending nothing on millions, the millions of Canadians on social assistance.

We cannot remove from our consciences that during the life of this government an organization gave a giant donation to the Conservative Party. A questionable loan guarantee worth millions was reciprocated and ordinary hard-working coal miners lost their lives.

The question is whether the interests of Canadians are served by the expenditures sanctioned by this government. There can always be mistakes if circumstances are misinterpreted. However when expenditures are driven by the interest of Tory supporters and their individual businesses, the interests of Canadians are indeed ill served.

We cannot possibly keep track of all Tory friends, associates and donors. Recent history should teach us to wonder about Tory blunders. Premium Automotive is one such blunder.

Ministers stood one upon the next to denounce the scoundrels they had trusted with such a handsome dip into the public purse; loan guarantees and five years of tax breaks not to mention $1.2 million that Canadians will have to repay. Their Tory sanctioned investment vanished in the night or so we were told.

Can Canadians be sure that Premium Automotive was funded for its products and not its contacts? Perhaps we will never know.

The Prime Minister once said that Canada is open for business. We have to wonder if open for business meant up for sale.

Whether it is a public ad contract given to a Tory firm or jobs critical to the public interest, handed to organizations, the interests of taxpayers are not being served but sold. What is most disturbing is not that firms are favoured by their Tory connections but that the cash they receive serves no valuable purpose for Canadians.

Earlier this month this House debated a bill asking Parliament to borrow another $8.2 billion to be flushed down the Tory drain. The only certainty is that taxpayers will have to pay this money back at some considerable premium in the years to come. What is also certain is that these funds will be squandered away in the usual Tory way.

What new treasures can we expect from a new round of borrowing? Of course we can never be sure how this government will end up spending its new cash. Scarcely two years ago, we were told about the wonders of this government's green plan. Environment is a priority we were told.

This December the same government continued the defoliation of the green plan by cutting another $172 million of proposed spending. But can we find $21 million for useless TV ads? The Prime Minister's answer: "Yes, we can". Rather than use money it borrows to help extinguish the recession, this government continues to allow business after business to be engulfed in bankruptcy.

The most puzzling spending choice of all surrounds the refusal of the government to pay the $250,000 legal bill for the Stevenson family, whose efforts and personal expense have caused all Canadians to be aware of how little this government has done to protect society against criminals who prey on children.

How can we understand that the Stevenson inquest was not worth government funds but millions can be fluttered away on self-promotion? We wonder how this can be. How can we have unprecedented dependence on welfare, the need for every government dollar so great, and yet millions squandered for ads?

This is a government that pleads poverty to the poor and the needy by asking where it can find the money, but when it comes to its political friends the only question is where does it send the cheque.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest to the excellent discourse of our colleague, the member from Mississauga.

She will know of another member for Mississauga who made a speech a little earlier today. I will be generous and call it a speech. Probably she will have listened attentively to those remarks.

I want to ask my colleague if she will give her comments on the government's so-called dedication or interest in bringing in new conflict of interest rules. I ask her to bear the following in mind: that in 1987, after the then minister, Sinclair Stevens, was found in breach of the conflict of interest code on 14 separate counts—by the way he had his legal bills paid for by the government—the government produced a bill called C-46, then C-112 and now it is called C-43. The bill died on the Order Paper twice and another one will probably die on the Order Paper when this session adjourns in a few weeks.

Does she agrees with the other member for Mississauga that the government is all gung-ho about new conflict of interest rules or does she agree with me that six years of waiting for conflict of interest rules is long enough, that it shows a complete lack of interest on the part of this government and if it ever moves ahead with the issue it will be a form of deathbed repentance because we will be only weeks away from an election?

Ms. Guarnieri: Mr. Speaker, my hon. colleague has a talent for making excellent points in the questions he asks.

There is a great deal of public scepticism about the integrity of this administration. The member for Mississauga South earlier made the comment that it does no good to point to the countless number of newspaper articles which delineate the fraud and put this administration into ill-repute. He is quite right, it does denigrate this entire establishment.

As a first-time member I value the privilege of serving in this House. It really does not serve anyone well to have members of ill repute being singled out. However, there is a great deal of scepticism about the honesty and integrity of this government to proceed with any worthwhile measures which will curtail future colleagues from behaving in a fashion that is not worthy of this House.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, quite frankly I have a difficult time participating in this debate because it is a tough issue. There is not a party in this House of Commons or a party anywhere in the country, in any legislature for that matter, that does not have its difficulties with the issue of trust.

• (1750)

I have been part of a government where we have had problems with scandals, nothing to the extent that we have seen in the last few years, but the bottom line is today we have reached such a level of distrust in our system that we must address the issue.

I was reading an article by Sissela Bok, who is a professor of ethics at the John F. Kennedy School of Government at Harvard University. At one point in her remarks she makes the following statement: "Public officials and candidates for public office bear special responsibility for the damage". She was referring to the damage related to the lack of trust.

The topic of her essay was today's "school for scandal". She is talking about everyone in business, government and all walks of life. Studies show that high school students claim they have this natural tendency. Sixty-six and two-thirds per cent of students in a study at a particular university said when the temptation for cheating was put to them, many said they would take it.

This is a problem not just in government, this is a problem within our whole society. Ms. Bok writes: "In a democracy it is not enough for citizens to respond by voicing their distrust of government and the press. Their categorical and often unthinking dismissal of all politicians contributes greatly to the problem. By opting out of serious participation in the political process they help corrupt the process".

This is the point I would like to make during the few minutes I have. I think one of the problems we have in this country related to trust is the fact that there are so many Canadians today who just do not get involved in the process.

I speak for members on all sides of this House. I worked on the Hill from 1980 to 1984 and I would watch members of Parliament debate in this House until 10 o'clock at night.

I was elected in 1988. I see members of Parliament on all sides of this House work their guts out for their constituents. I know of hundreds of examples of members of Parliament trying to put forward issues at town hall meetings in their communities and the public just does not get involved. They do not get out and work with their members of Parliament. We are only as good as the interchange we have with the people that are part and parcel of our community.

It is all well and good for the public and the press who are as much a part of this issue of distrust as any politician is. In fact it is the interaction of the press with the political culture that can quite often create a sense of distrust in the nation that is in fact 50 times greater than the actual reality.

I realize in this life perception is reality, but we have to go right back to the very root of this problem. The very root of this problem is the fact that the Canadian people have to get involved in the political process.

I am not necessarily pitching today that they get involved with the Liberal Party. Get involved with any party. Just get involved with the process. That is the one thing that irritates me.

We have all these people who are constantly criticizing politicians and constantly blaming everything on politicians but they have to realize they are part of the process too. We are only the agents or witnesses for our constituents in this House of Commons and we need their interaction and support. I think the Canadian people should get more involved.

I know hundreds of people, including businessmen, in the city of Toronto who have the time and resources to get involved in the debate on public policy. However, the closest they ever get to participating in public policy is when they make a donation. Because they make a donation or send a cheque to their local MP or the party, or they attend a fancy dinner they think that wow, they are participating in the political process.

Well, that is really not enough. We have to get the situation going in this country today where people of all ages are involved. I appeal especially to our teachers. I see many educators who do in fact get involved in the process. Students are brought to Parliament Hill day in and day out, but there are still tens of thousands of teachers who probably never even thought of busing their students to Ottawa or to a provincial legislature. It is only when the kids, the parents and the whole business community are involved that this situation is going to improve.

I support the member for Mississauga South. I certainly support my colleague from Glengarry—Prescott—Russell who has developed a beautiful substantial paper on ethics in government where we finally get at the lobbying system in this country. There cannot be a member of Parliament in this House who does not support the fact that we need some renewal on the Lobbyists Registration Act. Well, let us get it done. Let us get it done before we go to the street.

I am sure many members on all sides agree it is time to bite the bullet because the issue of trust in this country has reached a crisis proportion. However, it is not just a job for those of us working in this Chamber; it is also a job for the Canadian people to get involved in the political process.

[Translation]

Mr. Michel Champagne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Forestry): Mr. Speaker, I listened very carefully to what the hon. member said in his concluding remarks about this having gone on long enough and that it was time to do something this year and make some changes. He may wish to recall that in 1973, the government at the time published a green paper on conflict of interest. The President of the Privy Council was Allan MacEachen. The green paper gave a definition of conflict of interest that was not included when Bill C–62, an act respecting the independence of Parliament, was tabled in June 1978. The bill lapsed when the session ended on October 10, 1978.

On October 16, 1978 the government came back with another bill, Bill C–6. This bill died on the Order Paper on March 26, 1979 upon the dissolution of Parliament. It was not until May 1, 1980 that the new Liberal government, elected in 1980, tabled rules of conduct similar to those tabled on August 1, 1979. However they did not apply explicitly to spouses and dependent children. Until 1985 we had a code of ethics drawn up by the Liberal government in power at the time. In 1985 the government, through the Prime Minister, tabled a code of ethics for ministers and parliamentary secretaries.

I would like the hon. member to understand that the committee of which I was a member worked extremely hard to improve the existing code of ethics. Bill C–43 was referred to us after first reading. We heard a number of witnesses, but my point is—and that is what I would like the hon. member to understand—that we did not point an accusing finger at anyone. We made a fundamental distinction. As the hon. member said, and I know he was not referring to anyone in particular, perception is extremely important. There is a tremendous difference between breach of trust and fraud which are covered by the Criminal Code, and a potential conflict of interest, whether real or apparent. That is covered by the code of ethics. Our experience has been that, except in one case, conflict of interest cases did not get beyond the initial stage and in other cases, charges were dropped. As for criminal charges—this is a comment, and if the hon. member would care to listen I will be brief—in some cases these were dismissed because of lack of evidence.

Perhaps the hon. member would like to consider the following in connection with the report by the joint committee. If the government decides to go ahead and table a bill is the hon. member prepared to work together with members of all three political parties on introducing a new code of ethics that reflects the current issues and the needs of all members?

• (1800)

[English]

Mr. Mills: Mr. Speaker, the short answer to that question is absolutely yes. All of us on this side of the House will work with the government on this particular issue. I also want to say, going back to the 1970s and before, that I am not condoning that period. We probably could have and should have done a better job.

However, there is something totally different going on today. There is a lobby industry in this country that we all know is now in excess of $100 million a year, which is more than the total of the incomes of all of us in this place. They are working on public policy in and around us. Many of us do not even know what is going on.

As we approach this reform we are talking about we have to make sure we get it right once and for all.

Mr. Jim Jordan (Leeds—Grenville): Mr. Speaker, it has been suggested here this afternoon that this motion should never have come forward. It has to do with integrity in government. The last NDP speaker suggested it was very painful for him to get up and talk about this, but he seemed to enjoy it very much once he got going, if there was anyone here to witness it. All afternoon the Tories have been suggesting that this motion should never have come forward.

I want to ask my colleague from Broadview—Greenwood, if it should not come forward then in what forum would it be decided to discuss integrity in government? If this is not the forum, what is? Would this not be the appropriate place to discuss it if the wording of it was not just right? That is something we could discuss. Talking about integrity in government when there is so much cynicism today about politicians I would think there is no more appropriate forum to discuss it than here in the House of Commons.

Mr. Mills: Mr. Speaker, I do not think the government is really reviewing the commitments of the Prime Minister. Let us forget the fact that we condemn the government because that is part of the interaction. Let us talk about the substance of the motion which reads in part: "That this House condemn the government for its continued failure to establish and to adhere to a clear and high standard of public sector ethics". It was the Prime Minister who in 1985 made this one of his priority issues. Without the condemnation words, the rest of these words are pure Brian Mulroney.

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Mr. Speaker, I want to address the subject brought forward by this motion which is public sector ethics. First I want to make a comment on the bringing of this motion before the House of Commons this very day.

As most members I am sure are aware, and I hope the public is aware, we have a process in the House of Commons known as supply. Supply is the voting of funds to the government. It is what the taxpayers will be required to turn into the public coffers out of their pockets to support the services and programs, that we through the Parliament of Canada provide to the people of Canada at their expense.

Everybody in Canada knows the difficulties we are facing financially, the burden of our national debt, the difficulties caused by our annual deficit. In fact I am sure if members opposite asked Canadians one by one what was the major concern or the number one issue, each one would say it was the economy. In fact in the presidential election there was a phrase: It is the economy, stupid. The concern about the economy is on the mind of every Canadian.

Supply days provide the opposition with the perfect opportunity to bring these economic issues and concerns to the floor of the House of Commons. Unemployment across Canada which is of great concern to all Canadians and presumably to the members of the opposition, the state of the national debt as I have said, job opportunities, employment opportunities for Canadians, programs to create employment opportunities, could all be debated in this House this very day. However the opposition chooses to bring before this House for a day-long debate the question of public sector ethics.

Nobody is saying that public sector ethics is not important. Nobody is saying that it is not important for Canadians to have confidence in their parliamentarians, in their government, but surely members of the opposition recognize and realize that the number one issue out there among our fellow Canadians is the state of the economy, the concern for employment and that sort of thing.

While I am prepared to debate and consider ethical problems I would rather be addressing the subject of concern to all Canadians, that is the state of the economy and the opportunities for employment for our young Canadians. However since members of the opposition choose to bring to this House of Commons the subject of public sector ethics let me debate that point.

I was asked by the government House leader to participate in this debate and I understand why. I have a long-standing interest in the subject. In years past I have brought before this House of Commons legislation on the subject of conflict of interest and ethics. I have debated the issue on several occasions.

I should have known that was the least concern for members of the opposition, that is to say the establishment of a code of conduct for members of Parliament, for government officers and officials. All they wanted to do was rehash cases of the past, cases that the government might find embarrassing, cases that are of concern today, cases of mismanagement and cases of mischief.

If we were to catalogue cases of mischief let me say the opposition has no monopoly on them. We have a few over here and we do not have to go very far back. We can pin them right on present members. As a matter of fact, interestingly enough in this very House of Commons when I was debating my own private member's bill to establish a code of conduct for members of the government and others, I had occasion myself to refer to some of these situations. My great friend the former member for Winnipeg—Assiniboia, Mr. Dan McKenzie, participated in that same debate and I would like to refer to the Hansard for that day, March 20, 1984.

In the debate on ethics Mr. McKenzie wanted to give an example of conflicts and he referred to the Minister of Transport. Now it may not be known who the Minister of Transport was at that time but the name of Mr. Axworthy appears in brackets. He is a current member for the Winnipeg area. He was then the member for Winnipeg—Fort Garry. The Minister of Transport transferred the auditing of Canada Ports Corporation from the Auditor General of Canada to, guess who, a friend of his in Winnipeg, a Liberal hack. Ethics? Was there a concern on the part of the Liberal members for ethics in 1984? Apparently not.

• (1810)

As a matter of fact in that same debate we raised the subject of Mr. Coutts, a former executive assistant to Pierre Elliott Trudeau. He gave an interview to a reporter for a national newspaper. The inference of the interview was that if people had immigration problems they should call Jim Coutts and he would call the immigration minister, the member for Winnipeg South Centre. When Jim calls people like the then immigration minister they listen.

If we want to talk about mischief, if we want to talk about ethics, we can talk about many people. However, that is not going to solve any problems. That is not going to restore the confidence of the Canadian public in Parliament or in government.

The only thing that will restore the confidence of the Canadian people is a recognition by elected officials that they have a responsibility to the public and that they are willing to live by an ethical code of conduct. They will only demonstrate that by continued service in observance of that code of ethics.

It may well be, and I and many other persons in this place have wrestled with this problem in the past, that there is a real need to codify a set of rules as guidelines for members of Parliament, members of government and government officials. Many attempts have been made to do that.

However, there was never an attempt made to put those rules, those regulations and those governing principles into legislation prior to 1988 when the Prime Minister of Canada introduced a bill in this House attempting to codify rules of conduct as a guideline for members of government and other government officials.

That bill was introduced in February 1988 so that all of those involved and interested would have an opportunity to see a statutory code of the kind that I have described. That was the first time that anyone ever brought to the floor of the House of Commons an actual piece of legislation dealing with matters of public ethics.

Unfortunately, time ran out in that particular Parliament and Bill C–114 lapsed. However, it was subsequently introduced again. Through Bill C–43 we had the opportunity to view, examine, debate and discuss a further statutory code of conduct.

An hon. member: Bill C–43 was never debated.

Mr. Crosby: We had the opportunity. It was brought forward for debate.

An hon. member: No.

Mr. Crosby: I am sure if all members were in agreement that the provisions of Bill C–43 were exactly the kinds of provisions that would solve the difficulties that we now realize exist in terms of public trust—but that was not the case. People immediately gave indication that there were flaws in Bill C–43.

I myself was very concerned with the definition of dependent. I happen to believe that in the 1990s women have a very special place and position in our society, and that includes spouses of members of Parliament or any other person or official. I am not prepared to accept as part of the code of conduct that my or anyone's spouse has to accept any particular rules simply because of the office or position that I or anyone else holds. I realize that is a very debatable point and that other people have other views. I respect those other views.

I take the position, and it is my honest belief, that a spouse does not have to accept a set of rules or a code of conduct merely because of the marriage to a person upon whom those rules of conduct are imposed.

I could go on with Bill C–43 and point out other areas of difficulty. However, it is like all legislation that is brought before any legislative chamber. It has to be debated, considered and if there is agreement and concurrence to the subject matter of the bill then it can pass. I have never known any member of the opposition to stand in his or her place and say that this bill can be passed at any particular point in time. It can be brought forward for debate. If it was, I would have objections to the bill and I am sure other members would have objections. I am sure members of the opposition would say that it does not go far enough. The mere fact that it has not been processed and passed by this House is no reflection on the good will that is involved in the preparation of the bill and the codifying of those rules of conduct.

An hon. member: I cannot believe that.

Mr. Crosby: The member says he cannot believe it, yet he is a member of a party that held office for years and never made any attempt to codify the rules that govern public officials or government members in the form of a statute. Nobody has told me that Bill C–43, its predecessor, Bill C–114, or the private member's bill that I introduced had such universal acceptance that it could be brought forward and passed.

There are codes of conduct that have been established, that have been written down, that could be brought forward, that could be passed and that could be made law. Any one of them is going to have a measure of defects and a measure of merit, but if it does not accomplish the purpose of satisfying the public concern about the trust they place in elected officials then it will not accomplish the goal for which it was established.

That is the point that I want to make. Unless the members of Parliament can agree that all of us and all members of government should be governed by a code, unless we all agree on what is the proper and appropriate code to govern us, it will not be successful because people will simply fail to observe it and will find ways around it and will use their ingenuity to avoid the provisions.

There is no magic to enacting, as a code of conduct, as a set of public principles or public ethics, a statute that will then not be observed, will not be effective and will not create trust among members of the public.

I have never directed my mind to the question of whether the legislation before the House in the form of Bill C–43 would accomplish those purposes. However, nobody in the opposition has ever asked me to bring the bill forward and nobody has ever said that if the bill is brought forward it will be passed. Nobody has ever agreed to make the kinds of changes that I would want to see made.

It is just like any other legislative measure. If it does not have obvious support, if it is going to run into difficulties, if it is going to be debated, if it is not going to be given second reading, if it is not going to be brought before a committee and if it is just going to cause more strife, then it is understandable why it would remain on the Order Paper.

Let us look at what is needed to restore the confidence of the public in our political leadership and in our elected representatives, not just at the national level but right across the country. Certainly the people of Canada have a right to expect that their elected representatives will not involve themselves in any business affairs of any kind that will affect their judgment on the issues brought before them. That is what we call conflict of interest and that is the first thing to cover in any kind of ethics legislation. We must have clear provisions that would prevent any elected person, any member of government or any official from becoming involved in a matter in which their own interests affect their decision making.

I have tried many times to construct that kind of provision and it is difficult if not impossible. The most we can do is indicate the obvious situations, such as an interest in a contract, a personal interest in a transaction involving the sale or acquisition of property and that sort of thing. However there are all kinds of subtle ways in which a person can have an interest in a matter and yet not violate statutory conflict of interest provisions.

The best way to deal with the matter is to simply spell out what the offensive acts are and then impose a penalty. When that is done it simply becomes another penal statute and the code of conduct ends up competing with the Criminal Code, the Parliament of Canada Act and all the provisions that prohibit a certain conduct and make it an offence.

• (1820)

In areas of trust in which we are not dealing with specifics, like the illicit taking of funds or other clearly criminal acts, it is very difficult to draw that line between what is acceptable and what is not acceptable.

What happens, and what has happened in Bill C–43 and every other piece of legislation that I have ever seen, is that you end up turning it over to some person to make a judgment, and maybe the member can enlighten me if he knows differently. That would be permissible in many cases but if we are going to maintain the independence of elected representatives, if we are going to maintain their ability to stand up for their constituents, for the oppressed and for people all over the country who have problems then the last thing we want to do is place them under the control and supervision of a panel or individual that can make judgments with respect to their conduct. That would put an independent elected person into a kind of servitude.

Frankly, if that is what is necessary to restore public confidence in elected representatives then we are in serious trouble. If the public is going to elect somebody and then say: "But in your day–to–day activities, in the way you handle the affairs that are brought to your attention, you must answer to some official who is appointed to preside and monitor your activities" it will make members totally subservient to the judgment of that official. They will have to say to themselves: "Before I take this action I had better confer with the board of control and decide whether it thinks this is right or wrong".

We are grappling with a difficult problem. When we talk about codes of ethics and public ethics we are talking about a subject that has created havoc for centuries, from the days of Caesar and the Roman senate. There is no magic way to assure the public that it can have total reliance on those whom it elects. But the public does have the right—

Now we hear from the NDP. For years we thought it was the Conservatives and the Liberals who were the bad persons. We thought the NDP were pristine and pure. The difference was that it never got into government. We did not know what it was doing.

Then it forms the government in Ontario, Saskatchewan and British Columbia. Then we find out what is going on with the NDP. Then we find out about hiring friends as executive officials. Then we find out about giving contracts and about firing public officials and replacing them with political friends. What else do we find? The only problem with the NDP was that it did not have the opportunity to perform these unethical acts. Now that it has the opportunity it is performing them in spades. When members of the NDP stand up and give us lectures on ethics we can ask: "Hey, but does that apply to Bob Rae and his staff? Does that apply to the premier of Saskatchewan and his political appointees and contractors? Does that apply in British Columbia?"

Now they are not so clear about these ethical standards. Now that they are involved in a few little mischief making activities they are not so quick to debate this subject. What they will learn is what we have learned, which is that honesty and integrity come from within. They come from the people and from the persona of each individual. If they do not have it inside them then there is no any legislation that will legislate it for them or for the people of Canada.

The answer is that we should work toward some code of ethics. We should continue the task of writing a code that is acceptable and effective. I think that is what the Prime Minister wants and that is what he intended by introducing the bill for discussion.

Mr. René Soetens (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I rise not to participate in this debate, though I have listened to it for a long time. Following the comment of the hon. gentleman my concern is that this debate is serving no useful purpose.

What bothers me more is that we do not even seem to have a quorum in the House to have it happen. I would point that out. It is in my opinion, according to Standing Order 29(1), that there is a lack of quorum in the House.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I will ask the Clerk Assistant to count the members present.

And the count having been taken:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): There being 20 members present, not including the occupant of the chair, debate shall accordingly continue.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I have listened attentively to the comments of the member for Halifax West. They were quite good comments. He indicated in his remarks that rules regarding conflict of interest in themselves are insufficient to make people behave properly. I think he is right.

Rules are not a substitute for good behaviour. Rules are there in addition to the first prerequisite, which is of course to have a disposition to obey whatever rules exist and whatever moral code one should have. One cannot be confused with the other. I agree with the member. Just the same, even if he is an hon. member, which he is, it does not mean that we should not have conflict of interest rules.

I want to ask the member a very specific question. He indicated that no member had asked for this conflict of interest bill to be brought before the House. I point to page 15047 of the current session Debates in which I asked the following question:

> Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister and it concerns the government's so-called commitment to ethics in government.
> In February 1988 the government introduced a conflict of interest bill and has allowed it to die twice on the Order Paper.
> Given that nearly five years has passed since then, is the government in its dying days in office ready to commit itself again to conflict of interest legislation?

That was as late as December 10, the second last day before Parliament adjourned at Christmas. I say to the member, and I give him the opportunity to correct the record, that what he indicated earlier is not factually correct. He will know that.

In terms of the government's commitment to adopting conflict of interest rules, as I just indicated the government first introduced a bill in 1988. It was Bill C-46 which died on the Order Paper. In the new session the government introduced another bill that was identical to the first one, Bill C-114. It died on the Order Paper. A year later the government introduced yet another bill, Bill C-43—it is still on the Order Paper—the subject of which has now received the unanimous agreement of all parties in a report. That happened in June of last year.

Does the member honestly think it is reasonable after five and a half years of delay to have had nothing happen yet? It has been six months since a unanimous report of a committee and nothing has happened yet. There has not even been a debate in the House. None of the three bills I have mentioned including Bill C-43 has ever been debated in the House of Commons, contrary to what the member said a while ago. Does he honestly think that is reasonable?

Mr. Crosby: Mr. Speaker, perhaps I did not choose my words carefully enough. I do not know if I used a plural or a singular. I agree with the member that there have been efforts made to bring a bill forward, possibly by him and possibly by other members.

He knows as I do the process and procedure in the House of Commons, that the House leaders of all parties get together and agree on a matter being processed in the House of Commons. It is that kind of undertaking I am talking about.

• (1830)

If his House leader confers with the New Democratic Party House leader, gets the consent of independent members, gets the consent of other interested parties, presents that to the government leader and says we are ready to go ahead, and that is refused, I would consider that a matter of real complaint.

As long as members stand in their places or committee members get together in a committee and make a recommendation, I think the member knows that is not necessarily going to advance the bill, or any bill or any measure in the House of Commons. There has to be agreement through the appropriate channels. I was referring to that kind of initiative.

Mr. Lyle Kristiansen (Kootenay West—Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, I would like to draw to the attention of the member for Halifax West that maybe he was not present in the House during some earlier parts of this debate. There was an attempt on the part of some of us, particularly myself and the member for Essex—Windsor, to try to stop this debate from degenerating to the lower levels where it had a propensity to go earlier.

In doing that my colleague for Essex—Windsor in particular pointed out that one of the problems we have had in the province of Ontario is the election of a provincial government with a very large crop of inexperienced political people. There are particular problems when it comes to what we might loosely regard as standards of conduct or a singular lack of appreciation of some of the things done and not done in public life as opposed to those done in the private sector.

In my earlier remarks I pointed out that I thought it was what caused the deluge of court cases on the government's backbenches in the earlier years of its mandate from 1984 onward. It had a large influx of members, particularly from one province, with no previous political experience.

Rather than rules and regulations maybe we ought to be asking members of political parties across Canada to take care when they are nominating candidates for public office to nominate people with some level of experience either in elected office or in political activities so that we nominate people and elect people who have some appreciation of the standards of conduct that ought to be expected within political bodies.

Until we are ready to address the voters, hit them right between the eyes and say it is their responsibility in terms of the conduct of public officials, particularly the people they elect, we are not going to solve the problem.

According to my experience, if we draw up a lot of rules, regulations and codes of conduct, we provide a list of specific offences, and as long they do not come within those narrow definitions they think they are free and can take advantage of it.

That is the kind of situation we had a few years ago in the province of British Columbia with a premier who did not understand the difference between good conduct and bad conduct.

An hon. member: Dave Barrett.

Mr. Kristiansen: No, it was not then. Until we address those kinds of problems and not just the legalities of specific codes of conduct, we will not solve the problems we have been faced with during the last few years.

I hope the member will appreciate that we have tried to raise the level of this debate and keep it away from the list of names that were unfortunately read into the record earlier by the Official Opposition. We have tried to lift it out of the gutter and get it into some kind of discussion of principles.

I am afraid, because of his not paying attention to that, we might degenerate into a name calling affair again which would not be in the best interest of democracy or of this House.

Mr. Crosby: Mr. Speaker, at the outset of my presentation I specifically said that I had come here hoping to debate the merits of conflict of interest and code of conduct legislation but I knew that other people had other reasons. I agree with virtually everything the member has said.

Let me take this opportunity to talk about Bill C–43. It is not by any means perfect legislation. It contains very much the kinds of problems that the member just articulated. If we make a series of rules and somebody falls between them they think they have escaped any ethical damnation when in fact in the eyes of the public they have done something wrong. In the case of Bill C–43, I would support it except for the provision about spouses because I do not think it is consistent with the modern theory of married couples and their respective rights. Some statements in Bill C–43 are less than onerous: "Members will refrain from accepting any benefit, the acceptance of which might erode public confidence and trust in the integrity, objectivity or impartiality of a member". Does that mean we can accept benefits that do not do that? Give me a break. It is not an easy subject and I do not think it will ever come up with any kind of legislation.

Getting back to my friend in the Liberal Party and his statement that members want to go ahead with legislation, I do not really think that is the case. I think individuals in the House can study a piece of legislation and say it is better to enact it than not to do so. However, I find it hard to believe that there is anything close to unanimous consent on Bill C–43 or any other code of conduct for the very reasons members articulated.

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to participate in this debate on a motion put by the Official Opposition:

That this House condemns the government for its continued failure to establish and to adhere to a clear and high standard of public sector ethics, for its incessant inability to function within the framework of existing legislation, guidelines and standards and for its reluctance to bring forward strict new codes and legislation with regard to conflicts and other public ethics matters.

I want to deal with the last part of the motion, "other public ethics matters", and participate in the debate. Before I begin I should take up where the member for Halifax West left off.

Mr. Crosby: I am leaving.

Mr. Rodriguez: He says he is leaving. That is fine. It seems to me that when the government wants to show leadership it has a responsibility to prosecute its legislation. The fact of the matter is that it did bring in Bill C-43, the subject matter was referred to an all-party committee and that all-party committee reported last June.

If the government wants to show leadership and it indicates very clearly that it means business, it should bring forward the legislation and so indicate to the House leaders of the opposition parties.

That is not the concern I have. I want to talk about family business. The folks are watching. It is 6.35 p.m. and therefore this is a family show. Folks, the kids can stay up and watch and listen because we are talking here about family business. They will see it unfold as I talk about the family business.

For any government to establish ethics in government and restore the confidence of the people in the process, not just in this government but in the process of Parliament, three pieces of legislation are necessary. First, an Election Expenses Act, which we have. Second, a conflict of interest law, which we do not have. We all remember the Sinclair Stevens affair. Have we forgotten it? How quickly we forget. Third and by no means least, effective lobby legislation. That is the family business I want to talk about today.

Along with that is the great existential question of our time: Is it better to know the Prime Minister or to be the Prime Minister? That is the question, dear friends. The government was elected in 1984. I saw the picture; I saw the movie. We saw the greatest insurgency of lobbying going on on the Hill.

Frank Moores who had helped the Prime Minister get here, a good buddy of the Prime Minister; Mr. Gary Ouellet, who shared lodgings with the finance minister, in fact helped the Prime Minister in his struggle against the former Prime Minister and leader of the Conservative Party.

Suddenly all sorts of stories started to break. Mr. Moores was reported to have obtained somebody a lobster fishing licence for $2,000 when the licences were no longer being issued. He told us today in committee it was $500 a month for four months. I figure that is $2,000 for a fishing licence. He was to arrange a meeting with the minister so that he could get the licence. The same Mr. Moores was appointed to the board of directors of Air Canada. There he was acting as a lobbyist for an airbus manufacturer and lobbying Air Canada to sell them airbuses.

We only have to put on the record the Prime Minister's own words about lobbying. In 1985 he said in this House:

The fifth component of this comprehensive approach to public sector ethics is the undertaking of this Government to introduce into the House of Commons, at an early date, legislation to monitor lobbying activity and to control the lobbying process by providing a reliable and accurate source of information on the activities of lobbyists.

We did have the Cooper committee in 1986. We studied the question and made recommendations. We recommended what we thought was a good start to lobbying control. We said that we should note the specific issue on which the lobbyist was lobbying the public office holders.

We believe that a lobbyist is a lobbyist is a lobbyist and that tiers are not enough. We did not envisage Tier I and Tier II lobbyists. They did. We recommended that the registrar of the lobby registry have the power on a random basis to verify the information on the lobby registry. We were interested in knowing what they were spending on a campaign to obtain the item for which they were lobbying and how much money they spent on it.

We did not get any of those things. What we got in Bill C-82 is now the law of the land. It is the business card. The only information that is on the registry you can get on the business card. That is what it is known as in the lobby industry.

However the proliferation continued. The GCI, Government Consultants Inc.—have you noticed how they always have these very fancy names and government is always mentioned—is part of the family. It was Gary Ouellet, Fred Doucet and his brother. The only thing that I have a problem with is with Gary Ouellet today. I said to him: "You got Maz a doctorate. I want you to get me a doctorate. I want a hat like the one you got for Maz that says: "Doctor Maz". I want a hat for me that says: "Doctor John".

He had Fred Doucet and his brother and like amoeba they just split. Fred has gone off and formed his own company with his brother Gerry.

Another great lobbyist in Ottawa, Jon Johnson, who is a great Tory as well, helped the government as a consultant on the free trade agreement. The Prime Minister appointed Mr. Johnson's sister a senator. He called Fred Doucet the eighth wonder of the world. He started a lobbying firm and within the space of about four years made it into the top ten largest lobbying companies in Canada.

Then of course came 1989 and who starts the lobbying first? Among others was one Hughie Segal. He started a firm called Earnscliffe. That has some sort of gothic resonance to it. Like Heathcliffe, Earnscliffe has some gothic resonance. In that firm is Harry Near. He is one of the principal's of the firm and is on the national campaign committee of the Conservative government. Billy-the-kid Fox, who used to be press secretary to the Prime Minister, is in this firm and he too is on the national campaign committee of the federal Conservative Party. He appears every Thursday morning on Canada AM. He is defending the government's position and appears along with Michael Kirby and Gerry Caplan, one the Liberal, one the NDP. This guy, Mr. Fox, is coming up here and lobbying public office holders.

Mr. Doucet is lobbying public office holders. Mr. Ouellet who is hoping to get placed on the national campaign committee of the Conservative Party is up here lobbying public office holders.

When I raised this I said, is the optics on this not bad? They do not see anything wrong with this. I cannot understand why any person who is prosecuting a private interest would then turn around and approach his political friends, his political colleagues, public office holders, to get a contract or to get a procurement, or to get legislation changed, or whatever.

Today Mr. Ouellet and his colleagues came before the committee and said we had it all wrong. He said the public did not care about those things. It is only a few people up here in Ottawa and the press.

Mr. Speaker, you have been in politics a long time and you know that the people care, just as the people care through every one of us here. We represent the public interest and not only must the public interest be separate from private interest, not only must it seem to be separate, it must in fact be separate.

This company that came before us today, GCI, one of its members is a retired general. He was a deputy minister of transport and the provincial governments and the federal government hired him to co-ordinate some policy for transportation in Canada. Within two weeks of having finished that contract, he had as a client one of the interests in the shipowners association. Does anybody see anything wrong with that or is it just me? I do not think so.

• (1850)

The perception of the public is that these lobbyists were here in Ottawa, proliferated like rabbits and are nothing but escort services for clients. That is what I think.

I can just see it. I am sure if an aeronautics company hires Billy Fox to be their consultant it is not because he knows all the intricacies of aeronautical engineering. He does not. What he does know are important people in high places. That is the perception.

When we were dealing with conflict of interest, one of the things that came out was that even if there is an appearance of conflict, then there is conflict. That is the argument that Sinc Stevens never understood.

In spite of the fact that there may not have been any communication between him and his wife at night in the sanctity of their room bordered by a space six feet by four feet, even when they talked on a Saturday evening about the Christian gold coin and other ways of making money, even if that did not happen and I will accept his word that it did not happen, the perception was that his spouse was going off to a client of the department of which her husband was minister to get an interest-free loan.

The perception was there. Where there is perception, there is reality. Mr. Speaker, you have been here a long time. I am sorry to hear you are not going to run again.

You are one of the finest quarterbacks the government ever had. Mr. Speaker, you know that in politics perception is reality.

I cannot for the life of me understand that these people would say: "Oh well, we do not do these things". That might be so. That might very well be so but there is the perception. In the New Testament there is a saying: "No person can serve two masters".

When Bill Fox goes on that Thursday television show in the morning defending the government, who is he representing? Whose interest is being represented? Is it the party's interest, his client's interest or the public's interest? When that same person comes to a public office holder and makes a pitch, whose interest is represented?

He has to choose. If he wants to be a lobbyist, then he must be squeaky clean and give up trying to help this government defeat itself. He has to choose. They should recognize they do not need his help. They are doing fine, thank you.

I understand as if by some unexplained extrasensory perception word has gone out in the lobbying circles. Government is not going to give any procurement contract unless you have people on the opposition side in the lobbying firm.

What do you think they have been doing? Ask the member. What do you think any self-respecting lobby firm headed by a bunch of Tories would go out and do? What do you think they would do? I ask you. I hear the answer you have given me. Of course, you have to get Liberals on board, Every single one of them has a Liberal in their stable. Okay.

We had, for example, and I may as well put it in print, Fred Doucet, who just signed up, and J.J. Blais, who used to be a minister here. He is now a lobbyist for them. They signed up Judd Buchanan. Then we have Earnscliffe. They have signed up Michael Robinson. Then we had a group, I think it was Jon Johnson's group, GCL. They signed up David Collenette. He is a candidate for the Liberals now. He is a candidate, a lobbyist, a former cabinet minister and he is a honcho in the Liberal Party in southern Ontario appointing candidates left, right and centre.

The point is that they are covering the waterfront. When they notice the Titanic going down, the rats start swimming toward the Titanic. It is the first time I have ever seen a rat swim toward a sinking ship. Mr. Speaker, you have to see something wrong with that and we have to do something about it. We have to clean up the act. We have to know specificity. We have to know who is doing what to whom, for how much and how they are doing it.

This is a family show. I did not say anything wrong. Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member did not say anything wrong. It is just that his time has expired.

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Nunatsiaq): Mr. Speaker, I just have one short question for the hon. member who just spoke on the issue of ethics in the government. It may be considered more a hypothetical question than anything else.

The question is does he believe that ministers of the Crown should not lie to the public and then take a lie detector test to prove that they lied?

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Speaker, I certainly think that ethics in government is absolutely important. It is not just for the backbenchers; it is for the frontbenchers as well. It is for the bureaucracy we direct. It must be reflected in the rules we have. I think it is important that those of us who hold office recognize that and we march to that drummer.

We are in a field that is very different from running a corporation in the private sector. We are dealing with the public's business. I think we have to demand the highest ethical behaviour of members of Parliament, whether you are in the cabinet or whether you are a lowly backbencher, all of us. I make no apologies for anybody. I think we have to conduct ourselves in the long run.

I know what the member is getting at. It will be the constituents of that minister or of that member who will have to decide if they want that minister or that member representing them.

On the question of lobbying, I want to point out that lobbying is not like any business. It is dealing with the public interest.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I had almost forgotten about Shelly over here until my colleague reminded me.

I asked a question of our friend from Nickel Belt. I noted his remarks about Gothic residence and the name Earnscliffe. I am not going to ask him what that means because I am not sure anyone could define it, other than it sounds like it comes from a grand place with a pointed ceiling. I wonder if the member could perhaps give us his opinion on certain aspects of the lobbyist legislation because it is that sector which after all he has referred to.

• (1900)

I am one of those who believe that contingency fees should be disallowed. In Ontario lawyers cannot charge contingency fees. My learned colleague from Kingston and the Islands is here immediately beside me. He knows that that is the case, although perhaps that will change shortly. In any case, I think that these fees should be banned.

I also think that the fees and disbursements of lobbyists as well as the exact subject matter should be made public. It should be the exact subject matter because if someone is lobbying for a helicopter, it is important for the competing interest to know that they are not lobbying about snow removal contracts or something. The competing interest has a right to know that someone is trying to convince the government to buy a helicopter or to buy some other product or to repeal Bill C–91 or to enact Bill C–91, whatever.

It is important that we have the precise information and in addition that we know how much is spent in the process of achieving that goal.

I want to ask our colleague if he would be so kind as to react to those suggestions. I think I know already how he feels about them, but I would like him to put it on the record for us.

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague for the question. I have no problem, first of all, with the specificity of the issue. That is absolutely paramount. It is not enough to know that the lobbyist was up here talking about the environment and not knowing what the specific item is and that it had to do with meeting the minister. I think it is important to know what the specific issue is. We recommended that.

Second, we also recommended that there be no contingency fees allowed. I agree with my colleague there should be no contingency fees whatsoever. I think it offers the greatest enticement to walk the line very closely.

Third, the hon. member asked about disbursements and fees. That is absolutely essential. There is no little cushy deal like one of the witnesses said today. They do not want to disperse that. They do not want to put that on the record. They do not want to disclose it because they do not want their competitors to know what it is they are going after or whatever. I think that is the whole purpose of the lobbyist registry, so that there is a transparency that is not just apparent but is in fact real.

I may also say to my colleague, and I will share it with him, that the lobbyist registry ought to be taken out from under the auspices of a minister of the Crown and put under someone who has reporting abilities to the House, possibly the Chief Elector Officer, the Auditor General or the Clerk of the House of Commons. That I think is also important. It must not be seen to be under the control of a politically elected minister of the Crown.

There were other issues. I think, and I am sure my colleague agrees, that the most important one is to have a rule that forbids close relationships in terms of the political parties and at the same time coming back and lobbying the government. I think we have that for public servants. They have to be out of the Public Service for a period of time before they can actually come back and lobby their departments.

I think we should make it off–side for any person who is coming to see public officer holders on the Hill to hold any active political office. If we are talking about creating an environment where nothing less than the highest standards are expected, then in fact we can go down that path and it does not matter.

I outlined some of the family connections that are going on here. I did the family business. I think Willy Loman in Death of a Salesman is the best model for this lobby activity right now.

In Death of a Salesman, Willy keeps talking about how great a salesman he is. When his son asks him how he does it, Willy says he has connections. That is the motto of the lobbyists: I have connections. Hire me and I will get you the fishing licence, I will get you the airbus sale, I will get you whatever, whatever, whatever.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Madam Speaker, I will just ask one last question of our colleague. On the last point that he made about whether or not lobbyists should have a legal right to be involved in political parties, I am just wondering how one would stop it.

First of all, if they choose to get involved in political parties, if that is what they want to do, they will still be volunteers without having offices or titles but they will still be there. As much as I agree in the spirit of what the member wants to do, I am not sure how we could achieve it.

I want to ask about another issue and that is this whole business of intermediaries because this is a loophole in the lobbying registration system, at least as I see it.

Right now if I want to hire a lobbyist or if company x wants to hire a lobbyist and company x does not want it to be known that the lobbyist was hired, all it has to do of course is hire a lawyer or an accounting firm and then have the accounting firm hire the lobbyist. In that way the only person who is registered is the intermediary as opposed to the end user, if I can put it that way.

Does my colleague agree with me that is an insufficient registry, that the actual person who is to be the beneficiary of the lobbying is the one that should be registered?

Mr. Rodriguez: Madam Speaker, I thank my colleague and I remind him what I suggested about people who are actively involved in terms of a political party.

We have this problem with respect to banks and financial institutions. We pass laws regarding governance of those institutions and what kinds of relationships they can have. A term they use all the time is arm's length. I think it is important that we strive to establish that we parliamentarians and the people of Canada do not think highly of people who on the one hand go out and work for their political parties. There is nothing wrong with them having a party card in their back pocket but in this lobbying business you have got to make a choice because lobbying is not like any other business. It is not like school teaching. It is bordering on influence peddling.

It is a fact. One of the lobbyists coming before our committee said that in fact we made influence peddling a legal activity under the Lobbyists Registration Act. We have to be very careful.

On the question of intermediaries, of course, you are right. You have got to have who the beneficiary is going to be of the lobbying activity. I might also add that we should make sure that we do not allow coalitions. Often time you could have the coalition for clean air as the client of the lobbyist but we do not know who is in that and they are lobbying for a change in legislation.

You do not know who is in that coalition. It could be the worst air polluters going in the country, but they are all hidden under the clean air coalition. I think it is important to have the specific beneficiary of the lobbying activity and we should know and there should be full disclosure of who are members of the coalition.

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Madam Speaker, I would like to make a comment with respect to the whole matter of lobbying.

The member has pointed out the term influence peddling. There is a provision of the Criminal Code making influence peddling an offence and that is the difficulty of articulating an offence like that. If you can get paid for exercising influence and avoid the provision of the Criminal Code, you are apparently in a legitimate enterprise. I do not agree with that at all.

I would like to ask the member in relation to lobbyists and experience that he has had with them, should we not be focusing more on the people who are hiring lobbyists? Frankly I think in many cases they are not getting legitimate services from lobbyists. They know they are not getting any legitimate services from lobbyists and yet they are willing to pay large amounts of money for whatever services they are getting which could very easily fall into that category of so-called legitimate influence peddling.

• (1910)

Therefore, I hope that when he is examining lobbyists and the lobbyist legislation he pays a little attention to what the persons who are hiring lobbyists are doing. What role are they playing? If they are actually providing funds to lobbyists knowing that they are not getting any legitimate service for that then I think that they should be called to account.

Mr. Rodriguez: Madam Speaker, I think the point the member has made is an excellent one.

We are attempting to get the clients of lobbyists before our committee. One of the reasons that clients may very well be going to lobbyists is because they think the lobbyist has got some connection. Maybe that is why they might keep paying out—like a tithe—the money to the lobbyist. They think that he has some magic elixir.

What adds to that is when the person is seen Thursday morning on television across the country on CTV and he is defending the government's position. This is the same person who is the lobbyist. Right away, in his mind, the client wants success for his project. He wants the contract. He wants the procurement. He wants the change in the act. Therefore, if he has to pick, he will pick someone he thinks has influence or a pipeline to the Prime Minister's office or to a cabinet minister. He thinks that and that is why he will do that.

What if we can level the playing field? We heard from Sam Hughes with the Corporation House lobbyists who came before us this afternoon. I consider Sam to be a fine gentleman and probably the epitome of what a professional lobbyist is. He derided this connection because, from what you have said, people will go on paying for somebody if they think he can buy access for them so that they can get to the minister.

I think that when we do the things that I suggested about separating the activities on behalf of a political party, whether it is the NDP, Liberals or Conservatives, then we are making the playing field more level and putting some professionalism back into lobbying.

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Madam Speaker, this is to the member for Nickel Belt to whom I have listened intently. He made reference to a former deputy minister who had worked for I think the Canadian Shipowners Association. I was struck by the facts of that case because it shows how incestuous the relationship can be.

I was just wondering how the member would comment on this where that particular former deputy minister was retained by the Canadian Shipowners Association in 1991 to lobby the government. However, before the end of his contract he went to work for the government. He was retained by the government to do work for the government and did not even bother telling the Canadian Shipowners Association. Ultimately his contract expired or was terminated.

Could the member comment on that incestuous relation aspect of lobbyists that we are trying to get a handle on here?

Mr. Rodriguez: Madam Speaker, I thank my colleague for the question.

What happened was that former General Ramsey Withers was given a contract by the federal and provincial governments to be a consultant and to co-ordinate a transportation review. That ended because he registered with the Canadian Shipowners Association as a client on December 12. Two weeks prior to that, the contracts with the governments had ended. He then took the contract two weeks after with CSA.

He recognized when he was a deputy minister—he left the government in 1988 as a deputy minister—that he should wait a full year before joining this consulting firm GCI. He went from government to GCI in one year.

When he had the contract and was working for the government he had a client within two weeks. What is striking about the client is that the client was one of those who was an interested party. I am not saying that Ramsey Withers in any way did anything dishonest. I am making that crystal clear, but it is perception that we have to deal with.

In politics, perception is reality. When dealing with lobbying, one is actually walking that very fine line—my colleague from Halifax West pointed this out—between making a representation, advocacy and influence peddling. It is a very fine line.

In lobbying the line is very fine indeed. These people, for a price, have to go and convince somebody to change a law or make a tax change or get a contract. You have to understand the sensitivity of that. There has to be a lot of transparency.

As someone said, sunlight is the best disinfectant in the business of lobbying.

[Translation]

Mr. Michel Champagne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Forestry): Madam Speaker, I am very interested to speak on the motion of my colleague from Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, which reads as follows:

> That this House condemns the government for its continued failure to establish and to adhere to a clear and high standard of public sector ethics, for its incessant inability to function within the framework of existing legislation, guidelines and standards and for its reluctance to bring forward strict new codes and legislation with regard to conflicts and other public ethics matters.

I will come back later to the wording used by my colleague to show that, in some respects, he may have gone a little too far in his assertions.

I believe it is important to take part in this debate which gives an opportunity to government members and to all members of this House to correct the impression that politicians are usually corrupt. I believe that, unless proven otherwise, no member of this House was elected with the intention of defrauding the government or pursuing his own personal interest or those of his friends.

I will not speak for other members, but personally, when I ran for office in 1984, it was primarily because I was convinced that I could do important things to improve the quality of life of Canadians and of my constituents. I was convinced then, and I still am, that I was going to Ottawa, to my riding and to all Canadian provinces, to serve and promote the collective interests of the people, and not my personal interests, not the interests of my party or those of my party's friends, but first and foremost the interests of every Canadian.

I came here to work with a great national party and I came with the deep conviction that we could implement policies for the short, medium and long term which would enable the public to benefit more from the initiatives taken by the government.

Of course we could argue about the value of those policies because ours is a multi-party system. We could discuss certain issues, but that is not the purpose of this evening's debate. Rather, I want to say that I do not consider myself a corrupt politician and I do not think that my colleagues are corrupt either. When I work for my constituents I do not think that I am working for my personal interests or for interests which will benefit me personally, and I believe the same is true for my colleagues.

Again, Madam Speaker, when you look at the work done by every committee and every member of this House, I believe that unless proven otherwise, they are all basically honest and work to the best of their knowledge, first and foremost to serve the interests of the people who elected them, as well as the interests of the people of Canada or their province, depending on whether they work at the federal or provincial level. I want to stress that particular point today because people are inclined to believe—at least that is what we have heard since the beginning of this debate—there is no legislation regulating the conduct of members or public servants or people who work in government. I think they are greatly mistaken. In the course of this debate, there has been no reference to the fact that the Criminal Code of Canada applies to members of Parliament.

Madam Speaker, if you will allow me, section 122 of the Criminal Code provides: "Every official"—and according to a Supreme Court judgment official also includes members of Parliament—who in connection with the duties of his office commits fraud or breach of trust is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to imprisonment for a term not exceeding five years, whether or not the fraud or breach of trust would be an offence if it were committed in relation to a private person.

In one of the papers submitted to the joint committee on Bill C-43, a bill dealing with conflict of interest, our researcher wrote, with respect to breach of trust and fraud under Section 122: "Whether or not the fraud or breach of trust would be an offence if it were committed in relation to a private person. The Criminal Code explicitly applies stricter standards of conduct to a holder of public office than it does to a private person".

This makes it quite clear that members of Parliament in general and those elected to this House in particular do not assume, as some opposition members have done, that they are above the law or that their position gives them the power to avoid the provisions of any laws that may apply, such as the Criminal Code. They do not, because it says in section 122 and in the working papers we received that politicians, that members of Parliament are subject to stricter rules than a private person where fraud, abuse of power and breach of trust are concerned. I do not think that point was made today.

Often the perception we have of the work of members of Parliament is based on certain assumptions. People assume or wonder about the relationship between so-and-so and a member of Parliament or a minister. The seeds of doubts are sown and people often forget there are a number of very strict and very clear-cut laws that apply to everyone, including members of Parliament, and that there is also a code of conduct.

As far as the code of conduct is concerned, I will report on this later on, because the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell said in his motion that so far nothing had been done. I will show that something has been done. Often people fail to make a distinction between criminal offences and offences related to the performance of one's duties. The committee on conflict of interest has been concerned with the code of ethics. Our purpose was to help politicians avoid any potential conflict of interest, either apparent or real, in the course of their daily work.

In committee we all agreed we must ensure that no member, whether he is a senator, minister or parliamentary secretary, is above the law because of any legislation that may be passed subsequently. He is a citizen like any other, and by drawing up a conflict of interest code, by drawing up a code of ethics, we demand that his behaviour shall be as irreproachable as that of anyone else. The general public should be able to look at his record and say that the hon. member for x has performed his task with honour and dedication.

We were unanimous. Fortunately in committee—and I want to stress this today—we have always been very careful not to mention specific cases not to name names because just as in society at large people do make mistakes, even serious ones. I think that the courts have ruled in some cases. In other cases the code of ethics or the conflict of interest code was brought out. In other cases there was no prosecution at any level for lack of evidence. Our legal system is based on evidence and the presumption of innocence.

We never mentioned names because when a member of any party is suspected of doing something unethical unbecoming of our profession, all members suffer and all members of this group bear the consequences. In the conflict of interest committee we wanted to find the essential points for legislation that would give members the leeway they needed to work with peace of mind, knowing that there are rules to protect them but which they must obey in order to keep an image intact and serve their constituents with dedication.

My colleague from Glengarry—Prescott—Russell says in his motion which I will quote: condemns the government for its continued failure to establish. He refers to a code of ethics. In 1985 the government and my Prime Minister put in place a code of ethics instead of guidelines. Now a code of ethics is much stricter and must be obeyed. A document from the registrar's office says that the conflict of interest and post-employment code for public office holders requires them to comply with nine principles.

According to the speeches this afternoon and the terms of the motion of the member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, the government has not brought forward clear and strict guidelines for public office holders. The code which has existed since 1985 stipulates nine points, which I will take the time to quote, first of all for members of this House, but especially for the Canadians who are listening to us and have the impression that there are no rules. The code says that any public office holder, be it a member of Parliament, a parliamentary secretary, a minister or a senator.

Mr. Boudria: Not a member of Parliament.

Mr. Champagne (Champlain): My colleague from Glengarry—Prescott—Russell says "not a member of Parliament". He is right. We want to include it in the recommendation that was submitted whereby this code would henceforth apply to all members of Parliament without distinction. Of course this would include parliamentary secretaries, ministers and senators.

I will continue my quotation: "They shall perform their official duties and arrange their private affairs in such a manner that public confidence and trust in the integrity, objectivity and impartiality of government are conserved and enhanced. They have an obligation to act in a manner that will bear the closest public scrutiny, an obligation that is not fully discharged by simply acting within the law. They shall not have private interests, other than those permitted pursuant to this code, that would be affected particularly or significantly by government actions in which they participate. On appointment to office, and thereafter, they shall arrange their private affairs in a manner that will prevent real, potential or apparent conflicts of interest from arising, but if such a conflict does arise between their private interests and their official duties and responsibilities, the conflict shall be resolved in favour of the public interest. They shall not solicit or accept transfers of economic benefit, other than incidental gifts, customary hospitality, or other benefits of nominal value, unless the transfer is pursuant to an enforceable contract or property right of theirs. They shall not step out of their official roles to assist private entities or persons in their dealings with the government where this would result in preferential treatment to any person. They shall not knowingly take advantage of, or benefit from, information that is obtained in the course of their official duties and responsibilities and that is not generally available to the public. Public office holders shall not directly or indirectly use, or allow the use of, government property of any kind, including property leased to the government, for anything other than officially approved activities; and they shall not act, after they leave public office, in such a manner as to take improper advantage of their previous office".

These are the nine principles of the Conflict of Interest and Post-Employment Code for Public Office Holders. In contrast with the motion of my friend, which is neither clear nor strict, this is something which is extremely clear and extremely strict. All parliamentarians are subject to this code and must submit a report annually to the Office of the Registrar to make sure that we abide by the nine principles while performing our duties.

I think we also forgot that during these last few months, all three political parties have been working very hard. It is strange how much difference there is between what is said in committee and what is said in the House. We worked hard to clarify what constitutes a conflict of interest and to try and propose something which would be in keeping with the desire of parliamentarians to give a better image of the situation. The conflict of interest committee even thought that spouses and children of parliamentarians should be subject to full public disclosure. Everybody would have the right to see what they own.

We received a representation, as my colleague for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell will recall, from the Parliamentary Spouses Association and they were fairly divided on this matter, quite divided, as a matter of fact. We were told, and that is what I was getting at, that even if we imposed stricter rules and set penalties more severe than the ones already provided under section 122 of the Criminal Code in cases of fraud, if the individual's perception of our position did not change, we would have solved nothing. In this respect, I very sincerely think as a government member and as a member who simply likes his job, that in the last few years, and I do not want to make a value judgment, there has been a tendency to lead people to believe that there was favouritism going on and that it was a crime.

Some individuals who worked on some issues rather than on others were suspected of being dishonest. In the last few years there have been attempts at introducing the notion of criminal wrongdoings in what might only have been a conflict of interest, with all that it implies under the conflict of interest guidelines. A conflict of interest is not a criminal act, depending on its nature. Obviously I would never support defending a member of this House or a parliamentarian who would have received money for his own benefit for services rendered. The legislation is clear about this, I do not have to defend this point. It is mentioned in the Parliament of Canada Act, the Canada Elections Act and the Criminal Code.

We are governed by many laws and, contrary to what some might think, that we have no rules and are above all laws, I will repeat, because I did not name all of them before. We must abide by the Standing Orders of the House of Commons, the Criminal Code, the Parliament of Canada Act, the rules of the Senate and the Canada Elections Act. All those laws dictate our conduct.

Over the years for partisan reasons I would say those motives could turn against us eventually. We let Canadians believe that conflict of interest was a criminal act. There is no solution until we implement a system or until we reach an agreement concerning our own conduct. Of course we have immunity on both sides of this House, so I am not judging one party more than the other. Everyone is aware that some of the things we hear could not be said outside the House, as we have seen in the past.

Finally, I feel it is important to mention in this House that since 1984 our government has endeavoured to establish a clear and high standard of ethics and to make sure hon. members, especially those with special functions, abide by them. We have introduced Bill C–43, created a joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons, worked hard and tabled a report, and now we hope to be able, in the coming months, to pass conflict of interest legislation which will raise the level of debate in this House so that the intentions of any parliamentarian making allegations are crystal clear.

This afternoon several allegations were made. I think that a shame because most of the people referred to were not here to defend themselves. Of course, in most cases, with very few exceptions, no proceedings or actions were taken. As far as conflicts of interest are concerned, I would say that two people were directly affected by the Conflict of Interests Act. A lot of names were mentioned by both opposition parties and some of us. If we want to enhance the quality of parliamentary proceedings, we must, first and foremost, make a distinction between criminal activities and conflicts of interest. Thanks to the Prime Minister, we have worked hard to improve parliamentary proceedings and project a better image to the Canadian public.

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Parliamentary Secretary to the Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, I think the last 20 minutes during which the hon. member for Champlain spoke were certainly the best 20 minutes in this debate. From listening to him closely, I must say that I found it refreshing to hear the comments of the member who has been in this House since 1984 and been a parliamentary secretary for several years now. He is recognized as a member who does his job very well and honestly. He is at work regularly and defends the interests not only of his constituents but also of all Canadians.

As I was listening to the member for Champlain, I had the opportunity to refer to a document that I have here, written some time ago by Barbara Kagedan who did some research and published this document on public duties and private interests which can of course give rise to comments on conflict of interest.

Earlier in the day, opposition members tried to show that our government has done nothing in the area of conflict of interest and ethics, nothing to implement measures that would put members above all suspicion. On reading this document I realized that the Liberal Party's record when it was in government was not very enviable. The first reference in the document I have in my hand is to July 1973.

At that time the Hon. Allan MacEachen, then President of Treasury Board, tabled a green paper entitled "Members of Parliament and Conflict of Interest". This document was studied in a committee of the House of Commons and in a Senate committee but was never debated in the House. It was only studied in committee. In 1978 legislation was tabled but it died on the Order Paper.

• (1940)

In 1983, five years later, then Prime Minister Trudeau set up a task force that studied the subject, but again nothing came of it. Only in 1985 did we see some action, which was initiated by the Prime Minister of Canada.

Therefore I find it rather far–fetched to say that our government has done nothing. Our record should be compared with that of the party that preceded us.

I would now like to ask my colleague from Champlain a question. For the benefit of the House and the public record, since he has been a parliamentary secretary for some time already, could he briefly state the rules that he must obey from the time he is sworn in as a parliamentary secretary?

Mr. Champagne (Champlain): Madam Speaker, I will provide a very brief answer to my colleague by saying that those nine rules which must be followed by parliamentary secretaries and ministers are very strict.

I also want to remind the hon. member and my colleagues—I will not read all those rules again because it would take too much time in this House—that the second of those rules states that he has "an obligation to act in a manner that will bear the closest public scrutiny, an obligation that is not fully discharged by simply acting within the law".

I believe that says it all and in our mind, at least in mine, as soon as we have a law which provides more, we will be able to tell ourselves, as politicians and government members, that we have kept our promise and that the Prime Minister, through his bill—because Bill C–43 is the Prime Minister's bill—fulfilled his promise to establish a code of ethics which would be much more precise and more closely followed by all politicians in this House.

[English]

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Madam Speaker, before I get into my remarks I want to take note of the subject of the debate tonight. This is an opposition motion which states:

> That this House condemns the government for its continued failure to establish and to adhere to a clear and high standard of public sector ethics, for its incessant inability to function within the framework of existing legislation, guidelines and standards and for its reluctance to bring forward strict new codes and legislation with regard to conflicts and other public ethics matters.

That is a mouthful. I am going to try to touch on each of the areas referred to in the motion.

This grouping of topics is not the first choice on everyone's list. Some of these issues are sometimes difficult to talk about in the House. Usually they are raised by opposition. I sit in opposition. We now embark on an exercise where the opposition has to raise certain matters. It really is our duty to because often government members are not prone to dealing with them. I want to divide my remarks into four categories.

The first one is public ethics matters. When I came to the House in 1988 in my first or second week here I asked a question during Question Period about a conviction of a previous member of Parliament in a breach of trust situation.

Frankly, I was surprised at the non-answer. The government was virtually unable to reply in any reasonable fashion to the questions: What was the government going to do? What kind of a standard was it holding out, how did it propose to account to the public for that kind of situation, that kind of an offence where a member of Parliament had seriously transgressed. I must admit to my naivety at that time?

Since that year the list has grown to two and a half pages. I have to read the list so the public has a sense of what we are trying to grapple with. There is one issue involving an MP for fraud, conspiracy and breach of trust. That MP was acquitted. There is a second MP convicted for charges of corruption. There is another MP guilty of fraud and breach of trust. There is another MP charged with fraud and breach of trust. That process is not completed. Another MP was convicted of conversion of $7,000 or $8,000 in cash. Another MP was charged with fraud, breach of trust and forgery. That MP was acquitted. With another MP it was fraud, breach of trust and conspiracy. For another MP it was investigation for fraud and conspiracy. Another MP was guilty of tax evasion. Another MP faced three charges of fraud and related charges. Two assistants to MPs were charged with fraud and influence peddling.

There are several charges involving matters of personal failings which I do not refer to here. I am thinking more in terms of failures in the realm of drinking and driving, which are very serious but that is not the kind of charge I am talking about here. This list looks more like a rap sheet in a police station than it does a list of MPs. I am concerned about that.

Right off the bat I have to say I am very familiar with the biblical exhortation that he who is without sin should cast the first stone. I am not going to comment on my own situation. I do not believe I have committed a criminal offence yet and I hope that I never will.

However, what is happening here is the government is failing, and the Prime Minister perhaps is failing, to set a standard that Canadians can see prevails within the House of Commons. I think their failure to do that has been conspicuous throughout the four years I have been here. I do not recall him standing in this House and dealing with these kinds of issues and setting a standard.

It seems to me the standard which is held out and was referred to by the member opposite who spoke prior to me is the Criminal Code. Now surely the standards in this House and in the other place are higher than the standards of the Criminal Code. When government members speak in this debate they have from time to time simply pulled out the Criminal Code and said: "This type of activity happens to be a breach of the Criminal Code. There it is in section x, y, z. Go ahead and charge them and convict them". I think the issue is more serious than that and we can do better than that. I am urging the government through the Prime Minister to tell Canadians what those standards are.

As I sit in this House now I have a sense of my own personal view of what this standard should be, but I think we want to look to the Prime Minister for leadership.

We cannot do anything about these events after they happen. Once the crimes are committed that is it. We are not going to go back into the early education of people. We cannot do that in this House, in the formative years of MPs or anyone else in the country. We have to deal with these realities as they are now.

Therefore, I call upon the Prime Minister to articulate in this House the standard that he is setting for all of us in this House, not just government members but all of us.

The second item I want to address is patronage. This is covered by this opposition motion today. I can deal with it fairly succinctly. I am disappointed the promise that was held out to Canadians back in 1984 has never been fulfilled. I have two quotes. One was made by the Prime Minister in May 1983 and it has been referred to in the debate today. He did say there would be jobs for Liberals and the NDP too, after he had been Prime Minister for 15 years and could not find a living breathing Tory in the country. That was in May 1983. Later he did in a manner retract that and say he had been speaking to Tories at a convention. That may be true but it is on the public record.

Then he did make a fairly decent promise to the electorate in July 1984 when he said: "The method of making appointments could be corrected by dramatic measures. We are going to bring in a brand new dimension to them of objectivity, representation and fairness for all Canadians".

My goodness, that is just about exactly what he did do. He did do it in a dramatic fashion. These are not my words but several years later, in 1987 it was written in The Globe and Mail that: "If Brian Mulroney has a single friend who has not been appointed to a board, commission, or agency, or has not been awarded the title of Queen's Counsel, or has not been given a fat contract or Senate appointment, that friend deserves to be annoyed".

The promise of rectitude, the promise of reform, the promise of doing things differently, the promise of making appointments, always quality appointments have never been fulfilled in this place. I will be honest. I am less concerned about patronage appointments that are quality appointments. Just because a person is of the same political stripe as the government it should never disentitle somebody from being appointed. I and all Canadians want appointments to be quality appointments.

About three years ago one of my colleagues tried to measure the balance in the appointments. At the time the reference was roughly one in 100 appointments that was not a Tory. I cannot personally verify that. That is second-hand information, but somebody made a reasonable attempt to measure that and that is not good enough. Canadians expect there to be more quality appointments available outside the realm of the Progressive Conservative Party.

I know from time to time the Prime Minister makes a big deal about the odd appointment that is not Tory. There have been some of those and I accept that. I do not think he has ever fulfilled the promise he held out to Canadians seven or eight years ago.

As I see it there are two bottom lines in the way these appointments should be made. The first is that we demand quality. The second is that we require accountability in the appointment process. We need to ensure that when appointments are made they are reviewed by the House in some mechanism, by committee. Appointments can be reviewed to a great extent by committee but most committees do not have enough time to get around to them. We have the job to improve on that. There is no mechanism to set aside the appointment but just to review it. So there they are: quality, we insist on it; accountability and review of the appointment, we insist on that.

I do not think people are going to believe the Prime Minister any more when he talks about his promise of accountability and fairness in the appointment system.

The third area I want to talk about is that of the lobbyists. Today several speakers from both sides of the House have discussed what is becoming a very serious public interest issue for Canadians. Many Canadians frankly are not aware of how serious it is.

We need to know who is dealing with whom on public policy issues and on government business and contract issues. We do not know that well enough now. There is a need to regulate further the lobbying efforts that affect government decisions.

I have to think that Canadian taxpayers are very frustrated now. If they are not I think they would be if they knew they paid good money to send a member of Parliament to Ottawa to monitor government, to make propositions on public policy to government and to speak for them in government as government deals with public policy and spends the taxpayers' dollars.

Now the public finds out that lobbyists, which is now a $50 million to $100 million per year industry in this town, are doing as much or more to influence government decisions on policy and contracts than MPs do. That guestimate of $50 million to $100 million is almost more than the public is spending on Parliament itself. We are not able to track that money or that influence peddling, all of which is said to be above board. It is not illegal. It is being paid for by lobby interest groups that want their piece of the pie in Ottawa.

I want to make some constructive suggestions. I have only a couple but I feel very strongly about them. The first is that our current registration provisions are inadequate. Registration requirements are minimal and we need registrations that show the lobbying agencies. Where they have more than one client we need to know who the clients are.

Where the lobbying group is a public interest group such as the Dairy Council, a farmers' public interest group or lobby group, it does not mind registering. We still do require them to register. We want to know they are there. We want to know what they are doing. Of greater concern is the professional lobbying groups, the agencies that will work for anybody, for any purpose, for a dollar. Sometimes it is for lots of dollars.

This brings me to the issue of the contingency fee. Ordinarily I would hope the lobbying firm would have an hourly rate when it is hired to work for someone. It might be 50 bucks an hour. It might be 100 bucks an hour. It might be 1,000 bucks an hour. Whatever it is I think the public wants to know how much it is.

The problem we have now is that we have lobbying firms operating on a contingency fee basis. This means if a person says to the lobbying firm "I want that $10 million contract, go and get it for me", the lobbyist says: "I will get it for you but you have to pay me 10 per cent". If the lobbyist and the applicant are successful, the lobbyist will take 10 per cent off the top. That is $1 million out of a $10 million contract.

That is a heck of a way for government to spend its money. If to spend 10 million bucks it has to peel off the first million and give it to a lobbyist, there is something wrong about it. My point is that a contingency fee that is payable only if they got the contract and made a big, fat percentage must end. Contingency piggy-backs on the taxpayers' dollar is inappropriate. It adds to the price of the contract. It makes the lobbyist simply a hired gun who does not give a damn about public policy and distorts the orderly process of the government decision making when there is $1 million in fees to throw around.

The contingency fee should be banned. We would have a strict regime of hourly rates. Most firms would not mind showing what their hourly rates are. In every case the client knows where there is an hourly rate.

Last, I want to deal with appointments. I want to point out a failure in one area of appointments. The Prime Minister has the right to appoint members to the Security Intelligence Review Committee. Those particular appointees are this Parliament's watch-dog in our security intelligence service. The act requires the Prime Minister to consult with each leader of the parties in the House before an appointment is made. What is the Prime Minister doing? He is sending a letter one or two days before the appointment is made in which he says to the leaders of the other parties whom he is appointing. In at least two cases the letter did not arrive before the appointment was made. That is not consultation. That is not following the spirit or the letter of the law in relation to appointments to positions of public trust and positions representing this Parliament.

I make note of that on the public record. I am not going to let the Prime Minister get away with it much longer. I am going to make him account legally if I have to for those appointments. I have warned him once. He has had one warning. It is not just a breach of the law. It is a breach of the spirit of the law. I call upon him to do it the right way next time. It is only in that way the system will work.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It being eight o'clock p.m. it is my duty to inform the House that pursuant to Standing Order 81(17) proceedings of the motion have expired.

Pursuant to Standing Order 30(6), the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

EUTHANASIA

TERMINALLY ILL PATIENTS

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of introducing legislation on the subject of euthanasia and, in particular, of ensuring that those assisting terminally ill patients who wish to die not be subject to criminal liability.

He said: Mr. Speaker, those of us who enjoy good health have difficulty contemplating life as an incurable invalid. In pain perhaps and worried that we might be a burden on family and on society, without hope and even without dignity. We say when and if we reach that stage they will pull the plug, won't they?

But who are they? How will they know how to do it? How will they do it? What if one's family or someone else objects? What is it: withholding food and water, withholding treatment, withdrawing treatment, administering poison?

In medical ethics and bio-ethics classes, in legislatures just last week, for example in the Dutch Parliament, in editorials and letters to the editor columns, in hospitals and in hospices, these questions are being asked more than ever before. The reason is the ability of modern medicine to extend life.

People used to die at home mainly of communicable diseases. They received good palliative care from concerned family and friends. Now people die in hospitals surrounded by batteries of life saving equipment. Seventy-five per cent of deaths are caused by chronic, degenerative diseases such as cancer, heart disease, AIDS, strokes and Alzheimer's disease.

These illnesses are different from the killers of the past in part because they cause extensive physical and emotional suffering prior to death. Also new technology gives us the ability to extend life well beyond the point when death was confined to the home.

Most people know of some family member, neighbour or friend who has died after battling, with the help of the latest technology, a long illness. We are beginning to ask ourselves: I hope to God that I do not have to go through all that. The question is whether the quality of life in these last days is worth the effort to keep the patient alive.

Canadians just over a year ago saw Nancy B go to court and successfully assert her right to refuse life sustaining treatment. Perhaps members recall the case on the news. This is often called passive euthanasia.

As I speak, Sue Rodriguez, a woman from North Saanich, British Columbia, with ALS, amyotrophic lateral sclerosis, which is also called Lou Gehrig's disease after the great baseball player who died of it, is now in court seeking the right to have another person assist her in ending her life. This is called active euthanasia.

Suicide is no longer illegal in Canada, although I remember when it was illegal to take one's own life. It is still a crime in Canada to assist a suicide. In section 241 of the Canadian Criminal Code it says: "Every person who (a) counsels a person to commit suicide or (b) aids or abets a person to commit suicide, whether suicide ensues or not, is guilty of an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for a term not exceeding 14 years". It is illegal to assist a person to commit suicide. If one actually administers a fatal injection, for instance, with the intent of killing a person, one could be liable to a charge of first degree murder.

Last week by a vote of 91 to 45 the Dutch Parliament guaranteed physicians immunity from prosecution if those doctors follow strict guidelines for mercy killings. In Holland however euthanasia is still punishable by up to 12 years in prison. The Dutch guidelines specify that euthanasia can be applied only to a patient suffering a "perpetual unbearable and hopeless" condition who requests it repeatedly and while lucid. A second medical opinion must be obtained. The doctor must document the entire decision-making process including why euthanasia was chosen and how it was carried out and submit it to the district coroner's office after death.

I am not advocating the Dutch system. I am just pointing out there is a system in place in law in a western European country by a vote of the Dutch Parliament last week.

I want to remind the House that in a videotaped statement sent to a parliamentary committee of this House back in November, Sue Rodriguez had this to say:

> I want to ask you gentlemen, if I cannot give consent to my own death, then whose body is this? Who owns my life?

ALS is a particularly horrible disease. Phil Bissell, president of the Victoria Chapter of the ALS Society of B.C., recently described the disease as follows:

> One woman is now at the stage where she cannot move a muscle. Every day she gets propped up in front of a television at the foot of her bed.

Bissell said, according to a newspaper article, that he saw her eyes move once at a meeting but that is the only time he has ever seen her move. He also said:

> When some people lose the ability to swallow, they refuse to be fitted with a stomach tube and die in about 10 days. That means starving to death.

Later Sue Rodriguez had this to say:

> Despite my losses, I do not want pity. All I ask of my fellow Canadians is understanding and compassion. Understanding that they too may some day be in a position similar to mine.

I believe this subject raises complex legal, ethical and moral questions. I also believe that this matter ultimately belongs here for debate, here for decision, here in the House of Commons. Lately the House has fallen into the situation of reacting or responding to issues that are decided in the courts. A good example is abortion. I say Parliament should not be afraid to deal with these matters.

[Translation]

Why do we need an act of Parliament? Because until now, many patients have had to turn to the courts in order to get the permission to die with dignity. I already mentioned the case of Nancy B., in Quebec City. Nancy B. had asked the court to have the life-support system that was keeping her alive unplugged. Those kinds of procedures require a lot of energy, time, effort and even money on the part of patients. We have to pass a law that would eliminate all those problems and protect physicians as well. Right now, in this kind of situation, physicians can be accused of murder under the Criminal Code. We have to change that.

[English]

There are already a number of private members' bills before the House. Bill C-203 of the hon. member for Fraser Valley West—and I see him in the House tonight—has already been debated. It made it to a committee after the House. Unfortunately it was blocked coming out of the committee by some members and it never got back to the House for a vote.

• (2010)

That bill is restricted to the withdrawal and cessation of treatment and the provision for palliative care. It would have allowed physicians to follow patient directives without fear of legal repercussions. That could be called a more passive euthanasia.

Bill C-261, standing in the name of the member for Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing, would have gone further and made provision for doctor-assisted suicide. It was debated in this House for one hour and that debate is now finished.

Both bills were very specific in restricting any life-ending procedures to voluntary circumstances. The patient must be making the request of his or her own accord.

Both members, and I want to congratulate them, have done much work on this matter. They have carried the debate at a very high standard.

The member for Burnaby—Kingsway has also quite recently tabled a private member's bill.

I believe that my motion is unique because not only has it won the draw to be debated but an all-party committee of the House made it a votable motion. We could have a vote before the summer recess, but it depends on whether the House is prorogued or what happens.

We are now in the first hour of the debate and after another hour and 40 minutes we are to have the vote.

I worded the motion very carefully so that the government, this one or a future one, would get a clear sense of the House and hence of the Canadian people on this issue. I anticipate some good debate on the motion. Indeed I can anticipate some of the arguments against it: The possibility of abuse, a slippery slope, the Hippocratic oath, and so on. Needless to say, I think these arguments can and will be rebuffed.

I would draw to members' attention a good book on the matter, for those who still read books. It is called The Right to Die: Understanding Euthanasia by Derek Humphry and Ann Wickett.

An hon. member: There is nothing like an objective opinion.

Mr. Waddell: I will just read part of the book at page 313 to show what it talks about. It says:

> The right-to-life movement argues: If euthanasia is permitted in limited ways today, however tightly controlled by law, what is to stop groups and/or governments in the future from taking things a step further and introducing compulsory death for, say, the burdensome, the poor, the handicapped, the sick, and the elderly? Also, they argue, the availability of euthanasia as a lawfully and socially acceptable release will inevitably make it a duty for those old people who have "served their purpose" to die. The right to die becomes an obligation to die. Lastly, euthanasia laws could be manipulated by unscrupulous individuals to eliminate the sick/elderly who are a burden, especially if they have money to bequeath.

Then it continues:

> Countering this, right-to-die advocates claim that the rule of the law has no purpose if society cannot, by and large, enforce it. Those who misuse euthanasia laws will merit punishment as for any other crime. Where is the sense, they argue, in telling a person dying of throat cancer that euthanasia cannot be made available because Nazi Germany murdered thousands of people in the 1940s using a method labelled "euthanasia"? The lessons of history are there to be learned, and the Nazi experience has taught society how not to let government slip into the hands of an irresponsible minority.

I am not going to go into all of this tonight because I do not have the time. I anticipate that the debate will discuss the pros and the cons. However, I am trying to set the tone of the debate. The status quo is unacceptable. I suspect that physician and other-assisted suicide is going on in the country right now. This question should not be dealt with by the courts on a case-to-case basis. Just think of the poor patients. Not only are they terminally ill but they must find the energy to raise the money, instruct the lawyers, face the questions and so on. That is a pretty awful situation.

This is essentially a non-partisan issue in terms of the tone of the debate, although partisan in that people have many different viewpoints. I hope that all members of the House will be free to vote following their own beliefs and understandings of the issue. In other words, I hope there is a free vote on the issue.

The World Health Organization uses a holistic definition of health which includes its spiritual, emotional, family, environmental and physical aspects.

Canadians want to be active participants in their own health care so the issue of quality of life has come to the forefront of Canadian consciousness. The flip side is the quality of our death, which makes us face the issue of euthanasia. These are hard issues to face.

Surely someone who wants to end their life with dignity and cannot do so because of the nature of their illness, as in the Rodriguez case, should have the right to make that choice. Of course there must be controls to make sure that the choice is not taken advantage of. Legislation, if written, must be carefully crafted to prevent abuse but the principle stands.

This motion says that if there is a clear reasoned choice then in law that should be respected and those who assist the person in carrying out that choice should be protected. This is a very important debate in the House. Yes, there are other issues such as unemployment and all kinds of other issues. Yes, as a Parliament we have to pursue them.

David Suzuki, from Vancouver, said that politicians in the future will be measured in terms of their ability to deal with the more complex questions and the public wants us to do that. That is why it should ultimately be done here and not ultimately in the courts.

I also feel on reading the material on this matter and hearing other debate that the public is concerned about this issue because it is well aware that medical technology has changed. In their own lives people are well aware of some family member, some relative, some neighbour, or some friend who has been terminally ill, has suffered for a long time and has been kept alive by the new technology. Perhaps dignity was not there in their death. They are afraid. We are all afraid of death. We are all afraid that we might have to face the same situation. That is why it is important to clarify the matter.

My motion states, and I repeat it:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of introducing legislation on the subject of euthanasia—

I worded that very carefully, "should consider the advisability"— > —and, in particular, of ensuring that those assisting terminally-ill patients who wish to die not be subject to criminal liability.

That directs the government. That is not the status quo, and that is probably what the vote will be on in the House if the vote comes to the House. Members will have to search their own consciences to decide on that matter.

This is a debate that's time has come. We must deal with this issue as a country. I am very pleased because I anticipate that we are going to deal with it in a fair minded, high-level debate in this House of Commons.

Mr. Robert Wenman (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, who will choose for you? Who will choose for me?

When I was conceived it was a choice by my father and mother, or perhaps an accident, but it certainly was not my choice. When I was a child I was cared for by my parents. I was protected by my parents. I was protected by the state. I was given the support of teachers, doctors, pastors and a full range of community services because I grew up in this great and wonderful country. My community nurtured me so well and added to my family values. My country has protected me ever since.

• (2020)

As a man I began to make my own choices and then learned to live by the consequence of those choices. Surely the ultimate freedom in a free and democratic society is when an educated rational man or woman has become self-actualized in creating, making and living with the results of their own free choice. Is that not what we are trying to create by law here? The capacity to make free and rational choices and the stage that we can make these free and rational choices and then we become mature. When we are mature should we not have the right of free choice to make our own decisions in what might well be our own end times?

Why should our right to free choice as rational men and women be stolen from us just because we have become terminally ill? That does not mean we lose our capacity to think, to feel, to suffer. I resent that this right is not my right before the laws of Canada. Why should the doctors of Canada, the medical profession and medical technology make the decision for me?

An hon. member: They do not. They refuse to.

Mr. Wenman: But they do. Well you should have joined us through the whole of those committee hearings.

An hon. member: I was there. It is a legal fact. I was there.

Mr. Wenman: Why should the state, if not the medical profession or the government, decide for me? That is even more threatening. I want to protect myself through law from the medical profession. I want to protect myself through law from well-meaning state and government laws.

Most of us in this room and everyone listening will become terminally ill because as technology improves the occurrence of terminal illnesses as opposed to sudden illnesses becomes more and more probable.

For those who do not understand I will try again. Terminal illness is when you are diagnosed with a disease there is no cure for. There are more and more curable diseases. More often now, more and more people are dying of terminal illnesses.

I want to preserve my right that should I become terminally ill I might at one point in the suffering process of my death say that enough is enough. Let me go. Leave the final decision between me and my God. Make me comfortable and let me go.

I must shout right now in this House because of the great fear I have of lying powerless and helpless in an extended terminal care bed somewhere and not being able to shout. Instead the decision would be made for me by well-meaning doctors, by the state, or even a well-meaning family.

That is why I brought in Bill C-203. I wanted that right of protection from the state against the state and against the medical profession and against the technology so that I could make a decision between myself and my God.

Even at some point in the life and death process it seems science and technology and the state are fighting against death but prolonging suffering. I do not think that was the intention of God when He gave us medical science. He gave it to save our lives, yes, and He gave it to give our lives comfort and He gave it to give us comfort as we pass from death to life again.

We, the political representatives in this House of Commons, or at least too many of us, are filled and paralyzed with fear, fear for our own, our family's and our friends' deaths, fear of change, fearful even of discussion. Those of us who are here tonight will discuss death, but I can tell you that this is one of those great unmentionables. The only time we talk about death is when we have to face it. We face it in the hospital corridors and in the quiet whisperings in the funeral parlours. It has to be faced now while we are in good health and while we have the capacity to act with compassion.

It is time to put fear aside. It is time for courage. This is not an easy decision for Parliament to make. It is not an easy decision for us to frame. I know it is hard. I know my bill may not be quite the right answer or quite the right motion, but let us make a decision about whether we have the right to withdraw surely and truly from treatment if we are terminally ill? Does a doctor have the right to be protected if, in fact, he gives us maximum comfort from pain and suffering? This is common practice in Canada today. We must either charge the doctors or change the law, but let us not live in this grey, middle area or we will be, as some of the others say, on that slippery slope.

This is the inevitable life and death question for all of us and all those we love and care for. Since I first raised this in the House of Commons I have had members of Parliament from all sides come and tell me: "I want to get up and speak on this but I will cry because I went through it with my parents" or "I went through it with a friend and I saw them suffer more than they needed to suffer when they were begging to be let go." It does not occur too often, but if it occurs one time it is too many and I know it occurs many times in many people's lives.

This motion may not be quite right but I urge a free vote. If this is the method to get the discussion going, let us at least get the discussion going in this Parliament. Let us resolve to act in this Parliament and, if not in this Parliament, to ready ourselves to do what the majority of Canadians want, which is to die in peace.

[Translation]

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I must say that I never thought, until not long ago, that we would be having this debate tonight in this Parliament. I think I can say that I have some knowledge of the issue, having lost my father and my mother-in-law, my wife's mother, in the past 18 months, both from a cancer. I had to suffer the loss of beloved family members who both died from very serious diseases. They were not the first, but they were recent cases.

[English]

What we are discussing today is not whether a doctor has to provide treatment against the will of a patient. That is not so. That is not what we are debating tonight. It is not even in the motion. What we are not debating either is whether or not a patient has the right to refuse medical treatment. Clearly a patient has that right and is protected by the Criminal Code of Canada. A patient has that right, Mr. Speaker.

What we are, however, debating is whether we will give the right to any human being to kill another human being. That is the debate that we are having right now.

We can say: Yes, but it is not just any ordinary human being, it is a human being who is going to die anyway. Perhaps that is so. It is a human being in the case of what is happening in Holland now whose life is not worth living. I am not exaggerating the point when I read this headline entitled, "Euthanasia for newborns who face 'poor quality of life' gaining acceptability". That is what we are dealing with and that is what we are debating tonight.

• (2030)

Why are we debating this? We are debating this because of an unfortunate person who is very ill in British Columbia and who I believe has been used by others in a propaganda campaign on this issue. That is sad for all of us as a society, and it is particularly sad for that woman. Of course I am referring to Mrs. Sue Rodriguez.

Last week it came to our attention that the so-called protector of Mrs. Rodriguez who came here to testify on her behalf admitted to newspapers that he had forged the signature of Mrs. Rodriguez on certain documents. Yet that person is the one who asks us to trust him or others like him with the life of an individual when he was not even trustworthy enough not to forge the signature of someone else. That is why we are here, because of that. It is sad, but let us bear it in mind when we are having the discussion.

I see an hon. member who is a medical doctor. He will no doubt have other concerns as well, such as the trust between the patient and the medical practitioner. What does it do to the medical practitioner when we have a situation such as the one that exists in Holland where people will decide whether or not to enter a hospital based on their chances of escaping euthanasia if they go there. What does that do to the trust that exists between the medical profession and the patient? I do not think it does it much good. I do not think the doctors who sit in this Chamber, or elsewhere, would think it does much good either.

In Holland there are some 10,000 cases of active euthanasia per year. In Holland there is a virtual absence of hospices and palliative care, and the two are linked. In Great Britain where there is a good level of palliative care, and there is never enough of course, there is a virtual absence of euthanasia. In other words, euthanasia has been the quick fix for the lack of care provided for the dying. That is what this is all about.

We had before the committee that studied Bill C-203 Dr. John Scott who directs what I believe to be the largest palliative care hospital in Canada, le Centre Elizabeth-Bruyère, here in Ottawa, who talked to us about that issue.

Dr. Scott told us what he thought of euthanasia. He is not in favour of it. He has assisted people in the last stages of their lives more than any one of us has or probably ever will. He said: "Unrelieved suffering in Canada urgently needs to be addressed by palliative care strategy which includes widespread education, research and bedside services. The fear and the pain of dying can and must be relieved in Canada".

Dr. John Scott totally rejected euthanasia, mercy killing, assisted suicide, or anything like that as a solution.

At the same time, we should all pray for Mrs. Rodriguez. We should think of others who are suffering from this disease. I am thinking of Judge Sam Filer, an Ontario court judge, who is also suffering from Lou Gehrig's disease.

From a report that I have, in 1989 Judge Filer suffered a respiratory failure. The medical profession asked his wife: "What do we do with him? Do we revive him?" His wife allegedly said: "I will take care of his quality of life, thank you very much. You take care of saving his life". They revived him. Today, even with the difficulties that the judge has in communicating, he says that he is glad to be living. Do you know what he also says? He says that eight or ten years ago when he became sick, had someone asked him at that time: "Would you want to live like this 10 years from now?" he would have said: "No".

Who will change Mrs. Rodriguez' mind if she could sign a document like that and if there were no criminal law to protect her? Who would save her? Is it John Hofsess? I hardly think so.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, it is true that this is a difficult issue. It is for me as it is for all members of this House, and I do not take it lightly. I must also say that it is much easier not to talk about it than to talk about it. It is difficult for all of us, even for those who claim that they have the courage to talk about it. However, we must voice our opinions. Whether we are afraid of the issue or not, we must do everything to protect the human life.

I would like to conclude with a quote from a Law Reform Commission report concerning the need for legislation protecting the dignity of human life. The quote reads as follows: "The repression of unlawful actions is neither the only mission of the law, nor even its main mission. The law is the expression, in the fullest meaning of the word, of the type of society to which we belong".

[English]

That is quite true. That is the purpose of law, to state where we stand as a society.

Mr. Waddell: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I did not want to interrupt my friend during his very interesting speech.

I know he did not want to make allegations to the contrary, but with respect to using Mrs. Rodriguez, I know he will note that my motion has been on the Order Paper since May 15, 1991.

Mr. Ross Belsher (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, tonight this House is considering the motion put forward by the hon. member for Port Moody—Coquitlam.

The last half of that motion reads:

> —of ensuring that those assisting terminally ill patients who wish to die not be subject to criminal liability.

This is an extremely sensitive issue that does not easily fit into political positions based on ideology. Supporters for and against this motion can be found in all parties and across the social and political spectrum in our Canadian society.

There is much discussion in Canadian politics and society about individual rights and freedoms. The public and politicians are bombarded with messages which remind us of this. However, within the past, current and I suspect future political discourse, there has rarely been acceptance of an absolute supremacy of individual rights.

Notwithstanding the distinction between passive euthanasia which involved the cessation of treatment and active euthanasia which involves positive, contributing actions leading to death, the people supporting the acceptance of euthanasia and mercy killing would like our society to set aside the principle that intentionally taking the life of another is wrong. They want us to set that principle aside.

• (2040)

I would like to quote from a thoughtful article in The Ottawa Citizen of January 18 written by Susan Zimmerman, a lawyer who has been involved with the McGill University Centre for Medicine, Ethics and the Law. She wrote:

> If euthanasia is an acceptable option for the terminally ill, should it also be offered to the chronically ill, the severely disabled and the elderly? Should the physicians routinely offer death as an alternative to treatment? Should they be the ones to decide when to raise death as an option?
> Acceptance of euthanasia in any form means that death becomes an option where currently it is not. How will we measure the insidious shift this will entail in social attitudes toward the weak, the infirm, the elderly and the dependent?

This article suggested that an acceptance of euthanasia might lead to a change in what society considers a life worth living and what is an impairment which would justify actively ending a life.

Another article in The Ottawa Citizen today suggests that in the Netherlands—the Netherlands has been quoted here this evening already—these decisions are not just being considered for the terminally or chronically ill, but also for newborns. When a child is born with a severe physical or mental disability, parents and doctors consult and make a hypothetical determination about that child's quality of life. Based on that decision they can proceed through a number of steps to put the child to death.

I realize that a single story in a newspaper cannot give the full story, but the idea in itself is extremely disturbing and something to be feared.

The issues which physicians and medical ethics experts deal with when discussing euthanasia are admittedly complex and often lacking in clear definitions. There is active and passive, voluntary and involuntary euthanasia, as well as doctor-assisted euthanasia. Even more confusing is determining acceptable and unacceptable levels of suffering and whether these assessments can be made on behalf of those people who are unable to indicate their situation to caregivers and to loved ones.

Reviews of the law covering euthanasia have been carried out in the recent past. In 1983 the then Law Reform Commission of Canada recommended against decriminalizing voluntary euthanasia. The commission recommended that the offence of counselling, aiding or abetting suicide should not be removed from the Criminal Code or revised.

In the past years there have been a number of developments in relation to terminally ill persons, chronically ill persons and persons who are unconscious and in what physicians call a persistent vegetative state. Public consensus is continuing to develop regarding issues relating to cessation of treatment but no consensus has developed on issues involving euthanasia and aiding suicide.

The Quebec case of Nancy B. involved an incurably, but not terminally, ill woman who had failed to respond to treatment and who wished to have the hospital disconnect the respirator which was keeping her alive. The court found that under the civil law of Quebec the patient had the right to refuse treatment and that this did not conflict with the provisions of the Criminal Code.

Although surveys in the United States and Canada have found people sympathetic to the situation in which some incurably or terminally ill persons find themselves, when referendums were held in the United States that specifically allowed voters to decide whether they wished to decriminalize euthanasia and aided suicide, the voters were unwilling to take this step. They may have remained unpersuaded of the need for such action and they may have also been concerned about the effect it could have.

Neither has the case been made for decriminalization. Court decisions have made it increasingly clear that generally approved medical practices such as administering palliative care for pain relief even when it may also have the effect of hastening the death of terminally ill patients is not murder. Removing a respirator at the request of a patient is seen by most as an accepted practice. Withdrawing drugs and food from patients in a persistent vegetative state at the request of a patient's family has been recognized as an extension of the patient's own right to refuse treatment. In all these situations, treatment has not been successful and all that remains is to make the patient as comfortable as possible or to grant the request of the patient or his or her family to cease any further attempt to treat. Most people involved in the medical profession suggest more importance should be placed on palliative care for the relief of pain instead of forcing people to look at the issue as a choice between a quick painless death and a slow painful death. Palliative care to relieve pain is intended to relieve symptoms, not to sedate patients and hasten death.

There is a need in Canada and that need is to consider how best to promote a palliative care strategy which includes widespread education, research and bedside services to relieve Canadians of the fear of pain and dying.

The danger is that where physicians decide to practice euthanasia or aid in suicide, their patients might not be aware of the option of appropriate and effective palliative care. Similarly, there is little incentive for the health care systems to promote and support palliative care. Where doctors are known to assist suicide or provide euthanasia services, in this sense there is a danger that euthanasia may then be regarded as a cheap substitute for palliative care.

In conclusion, with this motion before us we have a challenge facing us as parliamentarians and citizens. It is an ethical question which forces us to look at ourselves, and I for one, as the representative for Fraser Valley East, cannot bring myself to support the motion or the sentiment surrounding it. I do not want to set aside the principle that intentionally taking the life of another is no longer wrong. Therefore, if I have the opportunity of voting on this, I will be voting against this motion.

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, this is a very emotional subject, one that is going to bring out deep beliefs and deeply held feelings. I think we can discuss this matter on the level of the legalities involved.

I want to spend a few minutes looking at the wording of the motion and talk about some definitions. The motion says: "That in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of introducing legislation on the subject of euthanasia". That is the first part of the motion. What does euthanasia mean? How can we consider the advisability of bringing forward legislation on a subject unless we know precisely what we are talking about? Let us have a look at some of these definitions.

In a recent article in a newspaper, the author tried to put forward some definitions. The definition for active euthanasia was put forward. Note the adjective. There is not just euthanasia, but it would appear that there are different types of euthanasia. "Active euthanasia—the deliberate termination of the life of a human being who is ill, usually by injection or overdose of medication by a physician or surgeon at the patient's request". Let us look at that definition for a moment.

The deliberate termination of the life of a human being. That is a sanitized way of saying the deliberate execution of a human being, the deliberate killing of a human being. Let us make no mistake about it, that is exactly what it is. The termination of a life is its execution or its killing, usually by injection or overdose of medication, but not necessarily.

Then the author assumes that it will be by a physician or a surgeon as if execution or killing is somehow justified because it is performed by a physician or surgeon. Yet, if we look at this motion we will see that the words physician and surgeon do not even appear.

In the second portion of the motion it says: "and, in particular, of ensuring that those assisting terminally ill patients who wish to die not be subject to criminal liability". It does not even mention that physicians and surgeons assisting terminally ill patients not be subject to criminal liability. Just "those". It could be anybody. It could be a nurse assisting a doctor. It could be a brother.

It could be an aunt or an uncle. It could be anyone under the terms of the very wording of this motion.

Is that what we want to do? Do we want to have just anyone terminate, execute, kill an ill person? The third part of the definition states: "at the patient's request".

We talk about Holland and the experience that the Dutch have had. Recently there were headlines in the newspapers trumpeting the great news for humanity that the Dutch Parliament approves law sanctioning euthanasia.

Here are the guidelines to protect us from ourselves apparently: The request for euthanasia must be made entirely of the patient's own free will and not under pressure from others. The patient must be spoken to alone to ensure the decision is voluntary. These are patients who are dying, who in many cases are in agony. Are they going to be thinking straight? Are they going to have the ability to determine this on their own? Of course not.

The patient must be well informed about his or her situation and must have been able to consider the alternatives. Oh yes, because of course in the throes of a terminal illness they are going to be sitting there rationally listening and adding up the ledgers a and b and the debits and the credits columns to make a rational decision.

The patient should have a lasting longing for death. Requests made on impulse or based on a temporary depression cannot be considered. What is a temporary depression? What is a lasting longing for death? Who is going to decide? There is no answer in the Dutch legislation.

The patient must experience his or her suffering as perpetual, unbearable and hopeless. Virtually any doctor will tell you that there is virtually no disease known to man where the pain cannot be controlled. If there is a disease where the pain cannot be controlled, I say doctors should be looking for ways to control the pain, not to execute the patient.

Another guideline: The physician must consult at least one colleague on the patient's request. In other words, if the patient has the wherewithal to say: "Hey, by the way do you mind checking with a colleague", then the doctor has to check with a colleague.

A well documented written report must be done stating the history of the patient's illness and meeting the carefulness requirements. Note the code words, the carefulness requirements. This is in the Dutch legislation. This is the dramatic jurisdiction that we should be considering as our model.

What happened in Holland? In 1990, 1,030 Dutch patients' lives were terminated. They were killed without their consent under these guidelines. Of 22,500 deaths due to withdrawal of life support, 63 per cent of them, 14,175 living patients, were denied medical treatment without their consent and 12 per cent of them, 1,701, were mentally competent but were not consulted. They were killed without consultation. They were executed without consultation.

The common law provides very clearly that absolutely no one has to accept treatment. If treatment is forced on you against your consent that is an assault against your person and the doctor can be charged criminally or face a civil suit. No one has to accept treatment. The argument that my friend, the member for Fraser Valley West, put forward that we are inflicting life on people is specious to say the least.

We do not have to get into religion. Of course if we mention religion there are those who will say, "You are imposing your religious views on others".

All we have to do is look at the medical facts and we have to listen to some doctors. This is what Dr. Gordon Dickey, President of the Ontario College of Family Physicians says: "Doctors are in the business of caring for patients. Euthanasia as I understand it is killing people and killing people is morally wrong and not something that physicians should be involved in".

The member for Fraser Valley West however did mention the word "God", something that we do not often mention in our society today. He mentioned his God and I know his God because He is the Christian God. I remind him and people listening of precisely what his God has already said in one of His 10 very simple rules: "Thou shalt not kill".

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): Mr. Speaker, I do appreciate the opportunity of at least starting a little speech here tonight to talk on this very fascinating subject.

I think the fact that many members stayed at this hour of the night to listen to the debate indicates the interest that there is in it.

We recognize also that there is a Gallup poll that has been done which shows that 75 per cent of all Canadians favour euthanasia but when you look at that poll more closely you will find that euthanasia is not very well defined.

When we were holding hearings on the bill, from the member for Fraser Valley West we discovered that there are many different aspects of euthanasia and many different definitions. I think when we look at this bill that a motion should be made for the government to initiate legislation to discuss euthanasia.

Immediately we would have to ask what the need is. What are the manifest needs for such legislation in this House at this particular time? I have not had any great numbers of letters or phone calls or anything from my constituents. We have not seen any great outcry from the newspaper and the popular press.

What we do have is a couple of very significant court cases that have occurred in the past and are occurring at the present time, particularly Sue Rodriguez. I appreciate the clarification of the sponsor of this motion that the motion was put in prior to the time that Sue Rodriguez went to court.

What concerns me when I watch the television proceedings of the Rodriguez case in Vancouver is that I see a very ill woman who we all must sympathize with. All around her I see lawyers, politicians and various activists who all have some particular benefit to be gained or have some agenda that they want to see served. The real question on my mind is whether this woman is being manipulated. She has expressed a desire to end her life when the time comes. I have a real concern for this woman in that area.

I think there is some evidence for that in the headlines of The Vancouver Sun on February 2. The head of the Right to Die Society admitted that he had forged Sue's initials on a letter. In it he said that the Saanich woman said the letter does not represent her viewpoint and was sent without her knowledge. The fellow that did that is the executive director of the Right to Die Society that is backing Rodriguez court challenge to have the law prohibiting assisted suicide struck down. He admitted: "My actions were both inappropriate and unethical. I think we need to look at that with care.

The member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell mentioned a judge in his area. I have a constituent, a Mr. Roy Slater, from Ladner, the founder of the ALS society who was told 12 years ago that he only had a year or two to live. Yet in that time he has founded the ALS Society. As head of the retired civil servants, he has been active in Indian missions and he has been active in his church.

About one year and a half ago, I went to the Willow Chest Centre at Vancouver General Hospital for what I thought was my last visit with him. Just about six months ago we went to a dinner in his honour put on by the ALS Society. One and a half years ago, he could have been terminated but he chose not to and he is continuing on.

I will continue this speech at the next hour.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member will have six minutes remaining in his speech.

The time provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired. Pursuant to Standing Order 93, the order is dropped to the bottom of the list from the order of precedence on the Order Paper.

It being nine o'clock p.m., this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 10 a.m., pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

The House adjourned at 9 p.m.
