ORDER IN COUNCIL APPOINTMENT

TABLING OF CERTIFICATE OF NOMINATION

Hon. Frank Oberle (Minister of Forestry): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour this morning under Standing Order 110(2) to table a certificate of nomination in the Chamber.

PETITIONS

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present, pursuant to Standing Order 36, two petitions this morning. The first one points out that family class and assisted relative immigration has always been an important part of Canadian immigration and that family class and assisted relatives have people in Canada who will assist them with finding employment, housing and learning the Canadian language and customs.

• (1010)

It calls upon this government to reverse its current policy and undertake to make family class and assisted relatives always the priority for immigration.

THE PUNJAB

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, the second petition points out that 75 per cent to 80 per cent of all activity in the New Delhi office in India comes from people applying for immigration or visitors' visas from the Punjab.

It also points out that it is very difficult for people to travel from the Punjab to New Delhi, and calls upon this government to immediately establish a consular service for immigration and visitors' visas in the Punjab.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present three petitions this morning.

In the first one, the petitioners are concerned about the cuts to funding for the RCMP. They ask the government to re-examine the decision to force the province to increase funding for the RCMP as a federal police force.

VIA RAIL

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, the second petition that I have concerns the cuts to the VIA Rail system.

This petition has signatures that are mostly from Saltspring Island, Sidney and Victoria. The petitioners ask the government to maintain VIA Rail's present national network and to upgrade VIA Rail with new equipment.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, the third petition is concerned with Canada's loans to Brazil and the use of that money for destroying the rain forest.

The petitioners ask that the Canadian government develop a policy that will prevent any Canadian capital from being used to damage or destroy a rain forest, including construction of dams, clearing of land for cattle ranching and development of mines, all of which would extinguish species and displace and irreparably harm native people.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, the petitioners in this first instance deplore that the Government of Canada has imposed the goods and services tax on magazines, books and newspapers.

They ask that this be removed. They point out that dissemination of the printed word is a cornerstone of democracy, our cultural heritage and our education. They point out as well that in order to have a productive society, there must be no tax.

STUDENT LOANS

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, in the second instance the petitioners indicate that the 3 per cent tax on student loans is still in operation. It had been promised to have been removed.

The petitioners also indicate that other cuts to transfer payments for health and education are inappropriate and are counterproductive to increased productivity and competitiveness.

BILL C-91

Mr. Ron Fisher (Saskatoon—Dundurn): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition duly authorized under Standing Order 36 concerning Bill C-91 which is coincidentally being debated in the House today.

The petitioners point out that Bill C-91 will, as Bill C-22 its predecessor did, make drugs more costly to the Canadian public. It will be an added financial burden on the provincial and private drug plans. They point out that although it was said that Bill C-22 would not result in increased drug prices, it did. The petitioners have no confidence that Bill C-91 will do any better.

PROUD TO BE CANADIAN

Hon. William Rompkey (Labrador): Mr. Speaker, I have the privilege today of presenting two petitions.

The first is from a group of my constituents in Happy Valley, Goose Bay and Labrador, who are calling upon Parliament and indeed all Canadians to support the Proud to be Canadian project as an opportunity to nurture a positive, life long relationship with our heritage and our flag, to encourage stronger ties among all Canadians for the further advancement of Canada as a leader in world circles and to promote our tremendous pride in being Canadians.

CHILD POVERTY

Hon. William Rompkey (Labrador): Mr. Speaker, the second petition is from a group of people from the island portion of my province who are calling upon Parliament to reaffirm its commitment to seek to eliminate poverty among children in Canada by the year 2000 and to develop a plan for the implementation of this commitment.

NORTH THOMPSON RIVER

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, it is an honour to present a petition on behalf of a number of constituents from the Kamloops constituency, namely the community of Clearwater, who point out their deep concern regarding a plan to divert part of the North Thompson River near Valemont in order to sell one million acre feet of fresh water to California, U.S.A.

They are simply asking the government to announce and take steps to pass legislation ensuring that our Canadian rivers will not be diverted.

INCOME TAX ACT

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, on another issue, the petitioners again from Kamloops point out that selected professional groups now under the Income Tax Act can deduct a write-off for dues, equipment and services necessary for the operation of their profession.

Under the present law, teachers are precluded from receiving such benefits. They are calling upon the government to take action to provide an element of fairness in the tax system and to treat teachers as other professionals are treated.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, again the petitioners from Kamloops are concerned about what they perceive to be increasing levels of lawlessness in some of the rural communities.

They are asking the federal government to take whatever steps are necessary to ensure that the Royal Canadian Mounted Police can fulfil its mandate and role appropriately.

FIRST NATIONS OF CANADA

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, a number of petitioners from the communities of Fort St. James, Simon Fraser University, Nanaimo, Chemainus, Qualicum Bay and Ladysmith, point out that they hope the day of June 21 will be set aside as a day respecting a national solidarity date for the First Nations of Canada.

They unfortunately point out that the Conservatives in the House of Commons would not co-operate and therefore this is not proceeding at the moment.

Mr. Speaker: I hesitate to interrupt, but hon. members know that in presenting petitions, they must stick very closely to what the petition is demanding and not get into debate.

The reason for that is that nobody else can enter into debate if the comments that are made seem in the minds of some others to be rebutted. I know hon. members will want to co-operate on that.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I take pleasure in presenting to the House a petition signed by a number of people of Windsor in Essex county.

The petitioners request that Parliament take all necessary measures to preserve the policies of section 26 of the Unemployment Insurance Act and continue to work in partnership with the province of Ontario to train and retrain the residents of Windsor and Essex County in this time of excessive unemployment.

These petitions have been duly certified according to the rules of the House.

REQUEST FOR ELIMINATION OF VIOLENCE IN OUR SOCIETY

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I would like to table a petition from the area of Lebel-sur-Quévillon. The petitioners state that movies of violence on television and certain news reports on the radio are dangerous and should be prohibited because they encourage more violence.

Therefore, the petitioners humbly pray this Parliament legislate on those points in order to restrain violence in our society, and thus better protect our children and give Canadian citizens a better quality of life.

[English]

YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT

Hon. William Scott (Victoria—Haliburton): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to present a petition duly certified by the clerk of petitions signed by 97 citizens from Lindsay, Omemee, Pontypool, Kirkfield, Little Britain, Beaverton, Dunsford, Oakwood, Newmarket and Oshawa.

They are calling upon Parliament to revise the laws of Canada to replace the Young Offenders Act with an updated juvenile delinquents act and a lowered maximum age of 13 years.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): I ask, Mr. Speaker, that all questions be allowed to stand.

Mr. Speaker: Shall all questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

PRIVILEGE

MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

Hon. William Rompkey (Labrador): Mr. Speaker, my question of privilege arises out of the fact that the Minister of National Defence has consistently refused to appear before the Standing Committee on National Defence and Veterans Affairs.

The minister has given as his excuse the fact that he is too busy and that he cannot put it into his schedule. Yet the minister has seen fit to appear before a Senate committee and another committee of this House.

• (1020)

SPEAKER' RULING

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Labrador feels that the fact the minister has not appeared before the committee is a breach of the member's privileges and not the privileges of the House. I understand perfectly well the grievance that the hon. member brings to the floor of the Chamber but it is not a question of privilege.

Whether a minister appears before a committee or not is not to be debated here unless of course the committee decides to ask the House to compel the minister or any other member to appear and that must be the avenue of relief that I would ask the hon. member to pursue.

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Speaker, on this point—

Mr. Speaker: I have made my ruling. Just a moment, nor have I recognized the member. The member for Victoria rises on this point. I have made my ruling and while I am always very sympathetic and sensitive to those who want clarification of rulings, once the ruling is made that is it. I am sure the hon. member will understand that.

Mr. Brewin: The Speaker read my mind. I was going to seek clarification of the Speaker's ruling so that we might, as members of the defence committee, more clearly understand.

As I understood it, the Speaker was suggesting that it is necessary for—

Mr. Speaker: Just a moment. The hon. member not only read my mind, he listened to what I said. The two do not necessarily always happen in conjunction, one with the other.

The members of the committee are free to discuss among themselves what they wish to do. It is not for the Speaker to tell them what to do or, for that matter, to go beyond the most subtle suggestions. I am sure the hon. member, as he did earlier, has read my mind.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, I have a few questions for the parliamentary secretary concerning House business for today and perhaps even tomorrow.

As the parliamentary secretary knows, the Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs has been reported in the press as saying that the resolution which has been passed in the New Brunswick legislature will be coming before Parliament, and there was some suggestion that it might be here later this day.

I am wondering if the parliamentary secretary would provide us with a copy of the resolution and perhaps provide further information as to when he intends to proceed with it.

Second, on the Notice Paper for Thursday, December 8, 1992, appears a Statutory Order pursuant to section 7, subsection (2) of the Special Economic Measures Act which calls upon the House to have a three-hour debate concerning the subject matter contained therein. I wonder whether the parliamentary secretary is in a position to indicate to the House when we will proceed with that debate.

Mr. Edwards: Mr. Speaker, on my friend's first question of the New Brunswick constitutional resolution, something that I am sure we all welcome, my understanding is that there are consultations going on among the minister and members opposite, the leadership of the parties, and that there well may be potential agreement to have a resolution dealt with today.

I will certainly endeavour to get a copy of the resolution into the hands of my hon. friend.

With reference to the other matter he raises, the amendment that has been proposed, I submit, is ultra vires the Special Economic Measures Act. Motions under section 7 of the act are allowed only in relation to orders and regulations made under section 4 of the act. That is specified in section 7(1).

Section 4 of the act authorizes the adoption of orders and regulations for specified purposes. Matters limited to the relationship between Canada and third states, that is states other than Canada or the states subject to sanctions, are not among the enumerated purposes.

Regulations and orders under section 4 are to be directed at restricting or prohibiting activities that involve the direct relationship between Canada or Canadians on the one hand and the sanctioned state on the other hand. Therefore, the proposed amendment would appear to be beyond the scope of the regulation-making power.

I would ask my hon. friend whether he considers it wise to propose something which is clearly illegal.

Mr. Speaker: Before we get into a discussion of this—as the hon. parliamentary secretary has raised it—if we are going to have a debate on whether or not this matter ought properly to be in front of the House, I would ask both the parliamentary secretary for the government and the leaders of the opposition parties to be in touch with me immediately and we will arrange to hear that debate. I do not think it is appropriate to raise it now.

I am not going to signal what my decision might be, but if there is a serious debate on this, then that is what it should be and it should not necessarily take place at the moment.

I would ask both sides to discuss this matter and to be in touch with the Chair. I will set a time when it can be debated.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I could perhaps get your guidance and elaboration. The parliamentary secretary has made an intervention with regard to this particular subject matter, suggesting that it is ultra vires, unconstitutional, and therefore the House ought not to be seized with it.

I suggest respectfully that it is important that we have an early adjudication of whether or not this is procedurally correct.

Mr. Speaker: Just a moment. I hesitate to interfere—

Mr. Dingwall: If I could be allowed to complete my remarks.

Mr. Speaker: Yes, but I am not asking for debate right now. I agree completely with the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond that if the issue is to be raised, it should be raised very quickly.

I am asking the parliamentary secretary and the leaders of the opposition parties to consult in the next few minutes, to contact me, and I will comply with the very sensible suggestion of the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond and we will hear this matter. The matter has now been raised in answer to a question, not as a formal proposal at all, and I would like to have the thing put on a more formal basis.

I agree completely with the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond that if this is going to be the position of the government, it should be in front of the Chair, and it should be in front of the Chair very quickly. I am asking hon. members to co-operate with me in this regard.

PATENT ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-91, an act to amend the Patent Act, to amend another act in consequence thereof and to provide for other related matters, as reported (with amendment) from a legislative committee.

SPEAKER' RULING—MOTIONS IN AMENDMENT

Mr. Speaker: I am obliged to give a ruling with respect to motions, that is amendments, to Bill C-91.

I want to say something about this. Most of these motions came in yesterday afternoon and up until six o'clock. The Table and the Chair have dealt with them. I have to say to hon. members that this procedure is asking more of the Table than is fair and it is asking more of the Chair than is appropriate.

We are in a position now, because of the way the rules stand, that an almost impossible task is often being asked with respect to these amendments. People worked all night to bring this to my attention this morning and, with the best will in the world, I have to hope that those who were working on these amendments have come to the appropriate decisions. I have gone over them, I have discussed it, but it is a process which I ask hon. members to consider and, hopefully, to reconsider. This is putting a burden on the Table which, in many cases and certainly with the number of amendments that are in front of us right now, goes beyond the bounds of good sense and the operation of this Chamber.

There are 73 motions in amendment on the Notice Paper for the report stage of Bill C-91, an act to amend the Patent Act, to amend another act in consequence thereof, and to provide for other related matters.

Motion No. 2.

That Bill C-91 be amended by deleting Clause 3.

[English]

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, I have a very simple point of order. I know you want to get to the substance of the bill because we have not really had too much chance to debate its substance. Normally is there not a necessity to have two ministers in the House to move the government motion or bill?

Mr. Speaker: The answer to that is no. Of course members may wish to pursue whatever commentary may flow from it.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, before I get into the debate on this particular motion I want to indicate that it has been a very difficult time for members of the opposition in trying to prepare themselves to deal with this particular debate.

I know we may have put some unusual stresses and strain on the staff at the Journals branch, but quite simply we had no choice because the government has proceeded in unholy haste with this bill. It has taken it before the Chamber, let us debate it for three hours and invoked closure on it at second reading. It sent it to committee and, something I have never seen before at committee, forced time allocation in committee.

The government passed a motion with its majority at the committee which indicated clearly that we only had x number of hours of debate. If members of the opposition did not agree it would have passed a motion in the House which would have seen the bill reported back without any witnesses.

Yes, it has been very difficult and I offer my apologies if we have overworked the staff here, but it is not of our doing. When the government decides to barrel through riding shotgun on a bill like this one, we have had to stay up at times 24 hours just getting ready for what the government was trying to perpetrate on the Canadian public. We start off by setting the record straight about who has been doing what on this bill.

The motion that is before us right now, Motion No. 1 which is in my name, is a very key amendment. It is perhaps the most key amendment we will debate all day today. What the government has done on this particular bill is that it has come in with Bill C-91 and decided to dismantle the system of compulsory licensing that we have had in Canada for a number of years, a system of compulsory licensing of drugs which has served Canadian consumers very well. It has served the health care system extremely well. It has served the provincial pharmacare programs extremely well.

However, this government has made the decision that a few billion dollars here or a few billion dollars there coming from provincial pharmacare programs, from those diminishing health care budgets of our provinces, and coming from consumers' pockets is an okay Christmas gift to give the multinational drug companies.

With Bill C-91, the government has deleted provisions in the old act, old Bill C-22. It has deleted the provisions that provided for compulsory licensing of patent medicines in Canada.

The effect of this amendment is to reintroduce into Bill C-91 those provisions which allowed Canada to have a unique system of regulation when it dealt with prescription drugs.

I want to go back a little bit. In the 1960s there were a whole number of reports dealing with drug prices in Canada. It was clear from the reports governments had done and from an examination of the facts that the people of Canada were paying prices which were far too high for prescription drugs. One of the reasons was that there was no competition. Once an individual or a company obtained a patent on a drug it was treated in the same way as a patent on a hockey helmet, which it is not. There is a vast difference. However, that is how it was treated back then.

The Liberal Party at the time, and the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra who was the minister in the late 1960s, introduced the system of compulsory licensing. This instilled competition in the marketplace. It allowed a generic company to make an application to produce a generic drug. The company would pay a royalty back to the patent holder. There was no need to cry big crocodile tears for the multinationals because they still made money. However, in Canada it allowed a unique system where we had competition.

Now what did that do, one might ask. There are all kinds of studies around about what compulsory licensing has done for Canada. Clearly compulsory licensing has made our system of universal health care an affordable one.

During the 1970s and the early part of the 1980s compulsory licensing literally saved Canadian consumers and the health care system billions of dollars. Those dollars would otherwise have been bled out of the system. They would have been taken from hospital care. They would have been taken from all kinds of services we take for granted in Canada. Those dollars would have been transferred out of the country because higher drug prices to multinational drug companies would have been the order of the day. It worked well.

In 1987 my hon. colleague from Cape Breton—East Richmond fought very hard against the government's first attempt to get rid of compulsory licensing. At that point in time he argued, as I and other members of our caucus will today, to preserve a system. In 1987 when the government first decided to try to change the rules of the game, he argued against changing the system because he knew what it would do to health care in Canada. It would make it less affordable and it would take billions of dollars out of the system.

The effect of this amendment is to put things right again. It would reinstate those clauses which had been deleted by the bill and effectively allow us to have a system where compulsory licensing is back in Canada.

Somebody may ask: "What does compulsory licensing do? If you have a generic competitor out there, does it really drop prices?" While we were having truncated committee hearings we had the minister of health from British Columbia appear. In her brief she says very, very keenly that the province of Ontario alone estimated that generic drugs saved its drug plan $80 million to $100 million per year or 15 per cent of the total drug costs of its programs. That is what compulsory licensing does.

In addition to that, we have had expert testimony from a Dr. Schondelmeyer who appeared before the committee. Dr. Schondelmeyer again reinforced it. He made it clear that compulsory licensing in Canada in 1991 alone saved the Canadian health care system in excess of $450 million. These are not peanuts we are dealing with. That is $450 million in 1991 alone. In one year the compulsory licensing system saved the health care system that much money.

There is other evidence. What happens when you get a generic competitor in the marketplace? The government will even agree that on average it drops the price of that particular pharmaceutical product, that chemical entity by anywhere from 25 per cent to 32 per cent because with competition, prices come down.

• (1050)

I am going to refer to a table dealing with the effect of competition on drug prices. If there are two competitors in the marketplace the average cost of the prescription is 76.2 per cent of what it would be if there was no generic competition. If there are three competitors in the marketplace, the cost to consumers for that drug goes down to 61.2 per cent of what it would be. With four competitors in the marketplace, four compulsory licences, it drops down to 45.1 per cent.

When the integrity of Canada's health care system is in question why in the name of goodness would the government ram a bill down the throats of parliamentarians? It has done this by having three hours of debate, closing the debate, sending the bill to committee, refusing to hear the witnesses who wanted to be heard at committee, then bringing the bill back to the House.

If I want to be prophetic, probably at some point in the next few hours it will try to ram both report stage and third reading through the House by using closure. Why are they doing it?

Members of the Liberal Party have made it very clear from the beginning that we are opposed to this type of billion dollar bonus to multinational drug companies. We have heard evidence even at those truncated hearings that the loss of compulsory licensing in Canada will cost the Canadian health care system in the next 12 years between $4 billion and $7 billion. That is the effect of eliminating compulsory licensing.

The government is not just going to eliminate compulsory licensing. It has decided to do something unique. Not only when this bill passes will compulsory licensing be gone, but it is also going back to December 20, 1991. The impact of retroactively getting rid of compulsory licensing in Canada is that it could cost Canadian consumers over $2 billion just for the retroactivity alone.

It is no wonder this government does not want a full airing of the impact of this bill on Canadian consumers. No wonder it wants to hide itself in the rules of Parliament and the tyranny of the majority called closure.

The government knows full well that what it is doing is obscene. It is obscene at the very time that Canada's health care ministers are dealing with reduced transfers by the federal government to maintain quality health care no matter where one lives in this country. This government comes in with a bill effectively giving the biggest bonus Parliament has ever given to anybody or any organization.

If this bill passes by Christmas with the elimination of compulsory licensing there will be a multibillion dollar Christmas bonus to multinational drug companies in Canada.

We are going to have full debate on the floor of this Chamber today, tomorrow, the next day, and the next day, and the next day if we have to so that Canadians understand what this bunch opposite is doing.

By the time we finish on this side of the House I know there will be some Tory backbenchers opposite who will be just a little widgety and squidgety in their chairs. They are going to be getting calls from consumers back home asking why they would ever support a bill like Bill C-91 that gets rid of compulsory licensing and that may damage the integrity of Canada's health care system.

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, I too wish to rise and speak on this amendment.

The amendment I have put forward has the same effect of restoring compulsory licensing on pharmaceuticals in Canada. Before I start speaking on the substance we should look at what has happened in the last two weeks to Canadian democracy as it applies to this bill.

The government introduced the bill on November 16 and after only three hours of debate brought in time allocation which forced closure the following day. On the following Monday we set up the committee to study this bill.

There had already been a great deal of controversy and a lot of contradictory information as to the impact of the bill. At a steering committee, the government informed us that it was not prepared under any circumstances to have full and thorough hearings on the bill. It wanted the committee wrapped up and all witnesses heard by the following Tuesday.

The next day, we went back to the committee and tried to dialogue with government members. We tried to get them to understand the significance of this bill to Canadians, to families, to seniors, to provincial health plans and to get them to agree to a realistic timetable for committee study.

We put forward a clear timetable, to study this bill for three weeks, and then take the Christmas break off. We would have an opportunity in the last two weeks of January to call more witnesses, to debate this bill clause by clause in committee.

We guaranteed this government that we would bring this bill back to the House so that the House could make a proper decision no later than February 15, within two weeks of the House returning from its Christmas recess.

Anybody out there knows that was a fair and equitable position. What did the government do? It said no and it simply adjourned the committee from Tuesday until Thursday. On Thursday the government made clear to us that this bill was going to be reported back to the House and that witnesses were going to be heard no later than the following Tuesday. If we did not agree to a short, truncated committee hearing, the government was perfectly willing to have the committee report with no witnesses being called.

We immediately agreed to start hearing witnesses. Of course, on that type of time schedule it was difficult getting organizations to come forward. On Friday, only two out of the six witnesses appeared.

We had six hours of hearings set aside but only two witnesses appeared. At the end of the first hour I tried to put a question to one of the witnesses and I was ruled out of order by the chair. The government would not let me put additional questions to the Canadian Medical Association.

At the end of the next hour we had not finished properly questioning the witnesses. We had four hours wherein we were going to do nothing. I asked for consent that the witnesses be allowed to stand over so we could ask additional questions. What did I get from the government? It was a denial. We had the witnesses there and the government would not even let us put questions.

It became clear and obvious to everybody on this committee that the government was determined to push this bill through before the Canadian public could understand the consequences. What are the consequences? They have become well-known.

A study in the United States shows that Canadian drug prices are 32 per cent lower than in the United States. We have had expert witnesses testify based on information provided by the ministers of health from across this country and others that the cost is going to be in the billions of dollars.

We have had information that the promises made in former Bill C-22 as to the number of jobs being created in research and development have not materialized. Information has been presented that the investments multinational drug companies make in Canada are mainly because of the tax write-offs, not because of the patent legislation in Canada.

We start thinking, why is the government pushing ahead, why is it trampling on democracy? First of all, it said it was because of GATT. Two things have emerged. GATT has not been agreed to. Even in the drafts of GATT it was clear that there would be long periods of phase-in and there would be opportunities for exemptions. It became obvious that government's excuse around GATT did not hold water.

Then of course it was because of NAFTA, the North American free trade agreement with the United States, Mexico and Canada. It required the government to bring its laws into line with those of the United States in terms of patent protection. However, NAFTA has not been approved. Why the hurry? NAFTA is not going to be approved for several months even in this Parliament, let alone in the United States.

Of course, it became increasingly clear that this whole process was being directed from outside of Canada by the American drug companies, the big multinationals. They were deathly afraid that with the election of President-elect Bill Clinton in the United States, he would take a second look at drug prices in the United States and decide that the only possible way to control drug prices in that country would be to adopt a Canadian system of compulsory licensing and prices review.

Bill Clinton is on the hook. His "read my lips" means two things. He said: "I will bring in a national health insurance program and I will do something to control drug prices". If he cannot deliver on those two things, he will be, like George Bush, toast, and he knows it.

The multinational drug companies are getting anxious because if Bill Clinton comes in and starts looking, he will have to look north. The government said: "Oh, that's not true, that's not true".

Two prominent Democrats, Henry Waxman and David Pryor, have stated clearly that they believe the U.S. should introduce a system of compulsory drug licensing to allow early entry of generics into the marketplace and to create a patent medicines prices review board to lower health care costs in the United States. These are two prominent Democrats who will be advising Clinton.

We also have learned, and I think it is significant, that the real push behind this is from the American Pharmaceutical Manufacturers Association. It said clearly that it had two or three goals: One was to get rid of compulsory licensing.

I will quote again from Edgar G. Davis, the former vice-president of Eli Lilly, who said: "Putting the patent provisions in the North American accord was a master stroke—was a master stroke."

Gerald Mossinghoff, president of the Pharmaceutical Manufacturers Association, said that once they get rid of compulsory licensing they have two other goals. Again, I will quote. He said his members "would like to eliminate Canada's government price controls" and that American drug makers would "oppose formularies because they bring down the costs".

What we have here is a classic battle: On the one side, we have seniors who are concerned about their health and escalating drug costs, families, particularly low income families, that have difficulty paying for medications when they are required, and provincial pharmacy programs which see their costs escalating dramatically. For one drug alone, B.C. has estimated it will be $120 million. On the other side we see the Tories fronting for the multinational drug companies, along with Judy Erola, chief spokesperson for the multinational drug companies, the rich and the powerful. They are saying: "We do not care about Canadians, we do not care about the poor, the elderly, the families; our bottom line is we want to maximize our profit".

Myself and the New Democrats will always stand on the side of the seniors, families and the elderly.

Mrs. Dorothy Dobbie (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to speak to every single motion that the opposition put forward today. I do feel that it is important to set the record straight because some of the things that have been said this morning are clearly inaccurate and outrageous.

First of all, the member of the Official Opposition who spoke to begin with would have to admit under pressure that in fact other members of the Official Opposition agree with this bill. It is a member of a previous Liberal government who is leading the lobby forces in favour of this bill for the innovative drug companies. In fact, she was the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs at one time.

I think it is highly inaccurate to say that they all officially oppose the bill because in fact that is not true. I understand of course it is their task and their job to stand up and beat us up today because of this legislation and make it look like they are doing their jobs in opposition.

The Liberals, the NDP and my other hon. friend over here made a great deal of fuss about the fact that there is not enough time to debate the bill. The facts are that the NDP, some Liberals as well, not all, but the NDP particularly, filibustered throughout all stages of the committee, making a mockery of the legislative committee process.

I think they should be ashamed of not just their activities during the committee stage but some of the things they have said since. It is highly unfair to the parliamentary process. It makes a mockery of the very important work that we all try to do here every day and the serious attitude that some members take toward that work.

I would also say that opposition members from both parties brought American so-called experts to Canada which surprised me a little bit considering we have heard a lot of denigration of Americans in general with regard to Bill C-91.

Both of these parties brought to the committee process American experts that they quoted over the facts and figures presented by our own civil service. This surprises me because the opposition is continually telling us how they are the champions of our Public Service and yet they are the ones who refuse to believe what members of our Public Service have told us as to what will be the effects and impacts of this bill on costs.

The facts are, as told to us by our Public Service in which I have a great deal of confidence, that this bill will cost approximately $129 million accumulative over six years; about $1 per person per year, not the billions of dollars suggested by Mr. Schondelmeyer who admitted and confessed in committee that in fact he had pulled these figures together and had come up with these outrageous and outlandish projections on a Thanksgiving weekend.

An hon. member: What does that mean?

Mrs. Dobbie: We can, I think, take from that a pretty good inference that his information was highly unreliable. As for Mr. Nader, I do not know what he knows about the cost of pharmaceuticals; obviously not very much because his prognostications were just as outlandish and ridiculous. To bring two Americans to Canada to tell us how to do our business to me is beyond the pale and an insult to our own Canadian civil service.

The facts are simple. Bill C-91 makes Canada more competitive. It will help us attract investment. Already over $500 million worth of investment and research and development has been promised to Canadians. This is very important at a time when people are looking for jobs, not just jobs slinging hash in some café or perhaps in a repetitive manufacturing atmosphere, but value-added jobs, high technology jobs, information-based jobs.

Bill C-91 creates an atmosphere in this country that will allow us to attract those kinds of jobs to our country. I think that is important. If the opposition members would put aside some of their partisan biases, they would admit that this is the kind of legislation that will help Canadians become more actively employed in very important value-added jobs.

I might also mention that the U.S. study for the government accounting office, which has been broadly and quite frequently inaccurately quoted here in this House, said that there were two reasons that in Canada drug prices were lower than in the United States. They did not talk about compulsory licensing.

I must say as an aside, compulsory licensing is something I never really understood. To provide a licence to someone to break your own patent law makes absolutely no sense. Bill C-91 will remove compulsory licensing but it will not increase prices in the way they are projecting. What the government accounting office found in its report in the United States was that in Canada drug prices were lower for two reasons. One, provincial drug plans and their formularies, which means that everybody knows what drugs cost and provincial drug plans generally choose the cheaper priced drugs or recommend them to their hospitals.

Second, and most important, the Patented Medicine Prices Review Board, the PMPRB, has been effective in Canada in the last five years. It kept patented medicine drug price increases at 2.9 per cent when the CPI was 4.4 per cent. However, it will be even more effective under Bill C-91. If members opposite are concerned about drug prices then they should certainly support the enhanced authorities of the PMPRB. This bill gives the PMPRB the ability and the authority to roll back prices if they are too high. It allows it to impose very heavy fines, up to $100,000 per day. It even allows it to impose jail sentences. Now we have a bill and a Prices Review Board with real teeth, one that can ensure that prices will be kept lower in Canada. If we are to believe the study that was done in the United States, those two reasons alone will keep drug prices down.

As we get into the business of the motions today, I want to just repeat, in spite of all the rhetoric we might hear from the other side from time to time, this bill is in this stage and the government is determined to put it forward because it will make Canada more competitive and it will provide more jobs, more research and development for Canadians and a better future for us all.

[Translation]

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to take part in today's debate and speak to the first motion, the first amendment to the bill. I congratulate the hon. member for Dartmouth who so ably defended the interests of Canadian consumers and all Canadians who will suffer the disastrous effects of this Tory policy.

[English]

The Canadian Medical Association testified before our parliamentary committee and talked about this bill. Members across will say: "Don't worry, be happy. Prescription drugs only form a small part of the total health care bill anyway". That is the Tory argument.

The Canadian Medical Association told us that the amount now spent on drugs exceeds the amount spent on physician care in this country. It is a large component of our health care costs. The CMA should know something about it. It appeared before our committee and said that unless the bill was amended, it could not support it. I challenge any member across to say otherwise. That is exactly what was said. I was at the committee.

Even those who favoured the bill felt that it should be amended, that it should be strengthened to protect the consumer.

[Translation]

For instance, I have a letter here from the Montreal Urban Community, dated December 1, 1992. I will read a few passages. I quote:

> —new powers enabling the Patented Medicine Prices Review Board (PMPRB) to calculate reasonable prices for new drugs and enforce them;

That is one of the amendments they want. They also want the following:

> —a clear definition of what constitutes R & D spending. In our opinion, it should include basic research activities, the development of new products, and clinical research, not marketing research.

So you see that even groups that are in favour of the bill want certain improvements. These are people who happen to like the bill. Imagine what some of us who do not like the bill think.

[English]

I am one who does not think much of all this. My colleague has proposed an amendment with regard to the retroactivity provision.

We asked the members across at committee, the minister and the parliamentary secretary why we have this retroactivity provision. The first thing is they refused to admit it is a retroactive provision. To do something retroactively is not retroactive if you are a Conservative. This needs further explanation, as the House can imagine.

The government says it is a phase-in, it is not retroactive. It is a phase-in in reverse from the date that it is applied, but it is not retroactive. I would like the government to explain that a little better later so that all Canadian consumers can understand that concept.

People had applied, people had been granted something and it is cancelled after it was approved. For me, that is retroactive.

Imagine driving down the Queensway in Ottawa at 100 kilometres an hour, the speed limit, and someone changes the speed limit today to 80 and says you were driving at 100 kilometres last week, therefore you are fined. Imagine that parallel. That is exactly what we are doing. That cannot be right.

I say to the members of the Conservative Party, even if they insist with proceeding with this legislation, there is no way this legislation should come into effect prior to the date of proclamation. They will say it only comes into effect on the day of proclamation, but it is effective a day previous, December 20, 1991, which is retroactive. They are saying that is the fault of Mr. Dunkel and the Dunkel report on the GATT negotiations.

First of all, we have not concluded those discussions yet. We have not agreed to them. Assuming for one minute that we agree to what is in there, which is not at all clear at this moment anyway, and proceed from there, should there not be a phase-in to adopt what is in the Dunkel report?

An hon. member: GATT allows that.

Mr. Boudria: That is the point. My colleague from London says that the GATT allows that and that is exactly the way we should proceed, assuming that we do it at all. Why should we sign a document with other countries notwithstanding the fact that there are provisions in there to phase in something that we would actually adopt retroactively, rather, at a date prior to the passage of the bill? I am sorry, I cannot say retroactively here, it is against the moral principles of the government across.

Clearly this clause needs to be amended. Very clearly there is no way that these kinds of windfall profits should be given to the multinationals.

The other point about all this, about retroactivity, is that the pricing structures of the products produced are already established. If a brand name company established that a particular product would be on the market for whatever, a certain number of years, and it markets it at a price to recover its costs of investment, profit and so on, to go back now and change decisions retroactively, what does it do? Where does that money go? Obviously, it is profit for the companies.

There is nothing wrong with making profits, some members across will say. Perhaps not. What social purpose, what policy purpose is achieved by the retroactive provision? Will it enhance research and development in Canada to do this retroactively on something that was already approved? How does it do that? Is there a guarantee in the bill that as it pertains to the profit generated from the retroactivity provision those moneys will be reinvested in Canada? No, as a matter of fact, there is not such a clause with regard to the profit as a whole.

• (1120)

I want to ask the hon. member opposite who was mouthing something or other: What is the point of having this provision on retroactivity? What else will it do besides taking money out of the pockets of Canadian consumers?

[English]

The members across finally talk about our competitiveness as a nation. I say to the members across that they are missing one point. Many times in labour contracts now we have a competitive advantage as a nation. I am thinking particularly of the large companies, the auto sector, for instance, well represented by my colleague here. The fact is that some of our payroll burdens are lowered in other countries because we have a national health care system. That gives us a competitive advantage.

I turn the argument right around on the members across. Doing something that will damage our health care system in Canada is not going to make us more competitive. It is perhaps one of those things that in the long run and perhaps even in the short run are going to make us less competitive as a nation because it is removing from us one of those useful tools that we have now.

[Translation]

In concluding, I would ask all members on both sides of the House to carefully consider the motion now before the House. I am sure they will realize they can vote only in favour of the amendment moved by the hon. member for Dartmouth.

[English]

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to speak to the amendment by my colleague from Dartmouth to Bill C-91 which is really dealing with compulsory licensing and asking, in a nutshell, that it remain the same.

This is a very important piece of legislation. Over the past several months I have received numerous pieces of correspondence on this issue and have met with concerned individuals to garner their point of view.

In 1969 a Liberal government introduced compulsory licensing, giving generic drug manufacturers the right to produce generic copies of brand name drugs before the expiration of the packed life. This was done to increase competition in the pharmaceutical industry and to reduce the aggregate price of drugs sold in the Canadian market.

Figures from the industry and figures from independent bodies indicate that since compulsory licensing was implemented Canadian consumers have saved approximately $1 billion per year in lowered drug costs.

After closely studying this bill and after listening to numerous Canadians, we on this side of the House believe that Bill C-91 is a flawed piece of legislation which will significantly increase the costs of drugs for Canadians. It will see the end of compulsory licensing or the right of generic pharmaceutical manufacturers to produce generic copies of patented medicines before the expiry of the patent life.

Compulsory licensing in Canada has been extremely effective in lowering the cost of drugs in comparison with other industrialized nations. Therefore, why is this Conservative government once again abandoning a process which has been effective and good for Canadians? Once again it is catering to American interests over Canadian ones.

The Conservative government's decision to eliminate compulsory licensing in this bill represents two major concessions to the United States in both the GATT negotiations and the North American free trade agreement negotiations.

While U.S. firms and other multinationals operating in Canada will gain considerable advantage from this decision, it is still a mystery what, if anything, Canada will receive.

When I engaged in consultations with various groups regarding Bill C-91, the cost of drugs in Canada was a recurring issue. The Canadian Drug Manufacturers Association, consumer groups and senior citizen groups have all indicated their anxiety that this bill will lead to higher drug prices. The Ontario Ministry of Health expects the elimination of compulsory licensing to have a major negative impact on the province of Ontario's drug benefit plan. According to the minister, Ontario could lose as much as $80 million to $100 million per year if compulsory licensing is eliminated. This view has been echoed by other provinces.

The CDMA says that the bill would adversely affect its members. Expansion plans would have to be abandoned and growth would stagnate.

Furthermore, because the legislation would be retroactive to December 20, 1991 and my colleague, the member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, just talked about that, some 22 patented medicines approved since that date would be revoked. Retroactivity is what he was speaking of.

As a result, Canadians will not have the benefit of competition on these 22 products because generic copies are far less costly. It is estimated that if these were granted and generic copies were produced and sold on the market, Canadian consumers would save over $400 million before the year 1996.

The regulating body which is the Patented Medicine Prices Review Board has been ineffective in protecting Canadian consumers. This is not only my opinion but also my colleague's opinion. I would like to tell you what is wrong with the present Patented Medicine Prices Review Board.

This board was created in 1987 and it was the aftermath of the wonderful Shamrock conference in Quebec when the Prime Minister and Ronald Reagan and the heads of two major American corporations got together. Nobody among the pharmacists or public at large understands its reporting mechanisms.

If you want to stop and think about what has happened to the pharmaceutical manufacturers in Canada, none of the board's reports about the increases in cost of drugs corresponds to independent price surveys; reports from insurance companies, the provincial government formularies or drug payment benefits.

You would even stop and think about the chairman of that board. He might be a good economist but he has not the biggest idea about the pharmaceutical industry because he happens to also have a conflict of interest when he sits as an employer of the University of Toronto which is a major recipient of scholarships and research grants from the pharmaceutical interests. The vice-chairman of the board has a direct conflict also. He is a pharmacologist at the University of Montreal and he also accepts research grants.

Have you ever heard of a pharmaceutical manufacturing company going bankrupt or going out of business in the last few years? They just listed this past week the seven or eight companies in the world that are the major profit making industries. The pharmaceutical industry is one of them.

Not a single pharmaceutical industry in 25 years has gone out of business. Very little basic drug development research is done in Canada despite all the promises from the PMAC and the situation will never change. I think the solution to this has to be to establish a new prices review board with more human and financial resources and greater legal powers.

It should be comprised of seven full time members appointed from the certain groups. They should be representative of the consumer groups, the provincial drug benefit formularies, the brand name pharmaceutical manufacturers, the generic pharmaceutical manufacturers, a retail pharmacist, a hospital pharmacist, a physician with background in family medicine and geriatrics.

The calculations for the increase in the cost of drug prices should be made simple and easy by this board, and the cost of any drug should not increase by more than the current rate of inflation. Such increases should only be allowed once a year.

The powers of the Patented Medicines Prices Review Board have to be modified so the board can more effectively control the price of new drugs entering the Canadian market, the increase in the cost of existing drugs in the marketplace and the reconstitution of the drug formulas. A new improved board with powers to control the situation outlined above would be more effective in protecting consumers.

We also believe that these new powers must be clearly outlined in the legislation and not left to future regulations as this Conservative government is proposing. Prior to the 1987 changes to the Patent Act, the brand name pharmaceutical industry made some significant commitments to research and development.

It pledged an eight per cent ratio of R and D expenditures to sales by 1991 and 10 per cent by 1996. However, this time around no commitment has been made whatsoever and there must be a strong commitment from the brand name multinationals to increase R and D in Canada. We hear from them that they will be giving money to R and D but they certainly are not giving all of the money to R and D that the increases will allow.

What the pharmaceutical industry has failed to announce is that it is only investing a small amount of what it projects to amass in windfall profits as a result of the government's decision to give it an additional three years of monopoly protection over products that would have otherwise been subject to strict competition from the generic industry.

The Conservative government could have used this piece of legislation to demonstrate a firm commitment to R and D in Canada. Once again it chose not to, preferring instead to cater to American interests.

This causes me great consternation. I am extremely concerned that the government has bowed to pressure from multinationals and the U.S. government by abandoning its commitment to a vibrant, multifaceted drug industry in Canada and to a regulatory environment that protects Canadian consumers from higher drug prices and the Canadian health care system from ever increasing drug costs.

Since the introduction of compulsory licensing in Canada a balancing has existed in the Canadian pharmaceutical industry. Canadian consumers have had access to pharmaceuticals and competitive prices because of generic competition, while at the same time both brand name companies and generic companies have made extremely healthy profits. I believe the balance should be maintained.

Another danger is that if this bill is passed prior to signing the GATT and the NAFTA, future governments will never be able to change it. It will be there in perpetuity and that is just dreadful.

We as Liberals support a strong and competitive pharmaceutical industry in Canada both generic and patented. What we do not support, however, are policies which endeavour to increase drug prices for Canadian consumers and put added pressure on our health care system.

The only appropriate way to ensure such a balance is maintained is to increase and change the powers of a Patented Medicine Prices Review Board.

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have an opportunity to participate in debate on the motions before the House with respect to Bill C-91.

Having served on the committee I listened to quite a number of very interesting witnesses on both sides of the issue. I listened even more to an extraordinary amount of time that was in my judgment wasted with filibustering. Time was used up that in fact could have been more beneficially used listening to other witnesses who could have contributed to our understanding of the issues involved.

This is one of those issues—I have noticed a number in my short time here—where the government proposes legislation which government members support and opposition members oppose. One wonders whether the exercise is not sometimes a little mindless on both sides.

I must say that when this legislation was first proposed I heard some very simplistic suggestions. As with any complicated issue it is much easier to pick something out and terrorize people about the implications of it than to take the time to understand the depth and the full impact it might have. When I first saw this legislation I reacted the way I think a lot of Canadians are reacting to it. I was scared by the implications of it for drug prices in Canada.

Then I started to study the issue because I ended up on the committee. It was not a committee I chose to be on, but by circumstance I ended up being on it and it turned out to be a very informative experience. Having studied the information presented on both sides of the issue, I find the issue is in fact somewhat more complicated than is being presented by my hon. friends opposite or by their American expert.

It was kind of interesting that last week my friends opposite who seem to have xenophobic anti-Americanism at times brought in a consultant from the United States who could not have come in if it was not for the free trade agreement that allowed business across the border in that way. I thought it was kind of interesting that when they get in trouble they resort to Americans to back them up and support them, yet the last thing we should do is see an American dollar used to create a job for a Canadian; God forbid that this should happen. I digress.

I understand that shortly we are going to have another big PR game downstairs with a press conference. That is fine and dandy but let us talk about the real issue here and try to put a balanced picture on the table of what is involved.

What we have here is a conflict between two industries in Canada. One is the patented medicine industry, the industry that goes out and does the research and finds the drugs that save people a lot of pain and save lives. The other is the copycat industry that comes along and says: "We are going to cherry-pick your really successful things and without investing any of our money we are going to try to profiteer on that". That is basically there.

The upside for the consumer—and there is an upside for the consumer—is that generic companies can put the drugs out cheaper. There is a benefit for the consumer from those particular drugs that the patented medicine companies have already created. That then becomes the issue.

My hon. friend opposite talks about free trade. This is not an issue about trade. This is an issue about the ownership of rights to creators: Do creators have a right to own that which they created and to have an opportunity not only to get a recompense for the time, the energy and the investment but to make sure they recoup the very considerable cost in investment involved?

I have heard a great deal from the opposition trying to turn this into an issue of multinationals versus Canadian companies. We have heard a great deal of talk about that. I have to ask the question: Does the person who is sick and whose life may be made immeasurably better by a drug that was developed by a multinational company that may be based in the United States or anywhere else ask whether or not that drug was developed in Canada? Do they say: "I am not going to take that drug even though it will save my life because it is a drug created by a multinational drug company and I would rather suffer pain or die than put up with taking drugs produced by a multinational"?

It seems to me that is quite a phoney issue. The issue we are concerned about is saving people's lives and saving people pain. That is really what this issue is all about.

We talk more about the whole issue of multinationals. The truth of the matter is that there are very successful Canadian patented medicine companies. We have not heard a lot about them from the opposition. Take a company like Quadra Logics based in Vancouver which is doing some very important cancer research. That is a Canadian company, that is a Canadian owned company.

Yes, there are multinationals. The big players in this industry are multinationals. That is the reality of the situation, but what are the jobs implications? We hear a lot from the opposition saying that the government should do something to create jobs. These patented medicine companies employ over 18,000 people in this country. By comparison, the generics which are dominated by two large companies employ about 2,500 people in this country. Interestingly enough, since Bill C-22 came in to place more new jobs have been created in this country in the patented medicine industry than exist in the entire generic industry.

It is my recollection the generics are now trying to convince Canadians not only that drug prices are going to skyrocket but that they are going to be put out of business. They said the same thing in 1987 and the generic industry in Canada, with all due respect, is stronger than it ever was.

As for the issue I suppose there is an implication on the other that we do not want investment by multinational corporations, that there is something kind of villainous about being employed by a multinational corporation.

I grew up in a very nice household in a modestly affluent family, because my father was employed by a multinational company, an American based multinational company at that. That company enabled us to live in a very nice standard and enables my father to live in retirement in a very nice standard. I might also mention that in my own constituency of South Shore we have a huge multinational that employs 1,600 people, the Michelin Tire Corporation.

I suppose my hon. friends opposite do not think that anybody should be allowed to work for Michelin because it is a multinational company. The 1,600 families in my constituency whose lives and security are based on employment with that company are very glad it is there. A lot of people in my constituency would be delighted to see a second Michelin Tire plant, or they would be delighted to see Merck Frosst or one of the pharmaceutical companies that have made commitments of over $500 billion in newer investment since the government announced that it was bringing in this legislation. We would love to see one of those plants in the South Shore of Nova Scotia. We would love to see those job opportunities created.

On this bogyman fear that my friends opposite have about multinational corporations, I would just like to say that we do not have and we would be delighted to have the investment and job opportunities that are created there.

What does Bill C-91 do? I have only two minutes left. There are more issues to be explore but I will come back to them at a future time.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. McCreath: I see we are having lots of debate. I know my hon. friend from Dartmouth opposite will probably want to talk a lot. I look forward to what he might have to say having listened to him for many hours the other day. I will continue my remarks at another time.

In the interim what I am saying is: let us try not to be partisan in this exercise. Let us try to balance the score and take a look at what the benefits are to Canadians as well as the potential cost: $1 per year per Canadian I understand is the number, not some of the far-fetched numbers I have heard thrown out by some of the vested interests that have been used by my friends opposite to articulate their point of view. Let us look at the benefits to Canadians and what is the value.

I asked the Minister of Health for British Columbia when she appeared before the committee: "What is the value of a human life to the Government of British Columbia?" She did not seem to have an answer because she was too busy articulating the point of view of her party and the movement she represented.

If we are going to talk about cost, let us talk about the cost in pain. Let us talk about the cost in lives that may be saved or would be lost if the research is not done here. Let us talk about whether Canadians are going to participate in this important research or whether Canadians are simply going to be freeloaders as my friends opposite seem to suggest we should be.

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Mr. Speaker, at the outset I wish to put on the record my sincere appreciation for the work of my colleague from Surrey North. He has done an outstanding job in highlighting this issue on behalf of all Canadians.

I also want to say at the outset, since my time is quite brief in this debate, a couple of things that must be put on the record. I want to take this opportunity to do it.

First I want to quote from Edgar G. Davis, a former vice-president of Eli Lilly and Company, one of the multinationals my friends are talking about. Mr. Davis is now at the Kennedy Centre of Business and Government at Harvard University. He is quoted as saying about this particular piece of legislation: "It is a master stroke. It shows what an industry that has its act together can accomplish". He is referring to the fact that this will be enshrined in the North American free trade agreement.

The Canadian people have to understand beyond the specifics of this particular very bad piece of legislation exactly what political scenario is being played out in this country. This particular bill is a focus for that. The government of the day unabashedly represents a right wing, neo-Conservative philosophy that has no flexibility whatsoever, but it is to be admired that it is adherent at least to a philosophy.

I disapprove of the North American free trade agreement. I disapprove of its philosophy. Frankly every Canadian should be shocked and alarmed that after eight years in power this government has turned this country upside down, hopefully not irreparably. It was a course that was set out deliberately by the Prime Minister and we should not be alarmed.

We need to be alarmed about where the Liberal Party sits on this issue. I want to go through step by step what is playing out and what will play out over the next year. Along with the Crow rate this particular legislation once it is passed in this House will be enshrined in perpetuity under the North American free trade agreement. We will have a bill in the House to ratify the North American free trade agreement come spring.

After that bill is passed in opposition by both the Liberals and the New Democrats the next scenario will be a federal election. During that election the Liberal Party will take the position: "Oh, my goodness, the bill is passed; we can do nothing about it". I want to alert the Canadian people to a timetable that the Liberal Party has not reckoned with and is ticking away.

The government is clear. It has taken its position. The Liberal Party opposite is opposed to it. Once it is passed it will say: "We can do nothing about it".

However, the target date for Canadians to focus on is January 1, 1994 when this bill and the impact on the Crow rate to farmers and all the other damage done under the FTA will be folded into the day of reckoning of the implementation of the North American free trade agreement.

It will not be a question of abrogating, it will not be a question of renegotiating. It will be a question of political will of implementing.

I am warning every Canadian to understand that by the time January 1, 1994 rolls around, there will be a new government in Canada. That government will face the question of whether it meant it when it said in this House that it will not go along with this kind of legislation. That government will face the day of reckoning of whether it was telling the truth about its commitment against the North American free trade agreement and that will be during the election campaign.

The people of Canada will ask a simple question. If the Tories are elected this will go ahead. If the Liberals are elected, will they implement the North American free trade agreement that folds this act in on January 1, 1994?

I want to say on the record that the New Democratic Party has said that should it be elected to government before January 1, 1994, it will not ratify the North American free trade agreement. This is not renegotiation. This is not abrogation. This is ratification.

If the Liberal Party is telling the truth, then we insist that its leader stand up today or as soon as possible and let the Canadian people know whether it is playing a charade in this debate or whether it means it. The way to let the Canadian people know if it means it is to pledge here on the floor of this House that should it be elected the next Government of Canada, it will not implement the North American free trade agreement, that way preventing this bill and the loss of the Crow rate to take place.

I want to understand and say very clearly that in my opinion the Liberal Party is hiding behind the Conservatives, talking against this bill, fighting against it, but then when the chips are down on implementation, when it is there in government, it will say it is too late to do something about it.

I want to look into the camera and tell the Canadian people how this can be stopped. The only way this can be stopped is by electing a government that says come January 1, 1994, it will not implement the free trade agreement with the U.S., Mexico and Canada.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Barrett: I hear the nervousness of the Liberal Party. I enjoy the banter of this House. I enjoy the cross-fire and all the pleasure, but the real issue is where does it stand? Will it pledge to the Canadian people, through the mouth of its leader and its trade critic, that should it be elected government in Canada before January 1, 1994, it will not implement the North American free trade agreement?

That is the question of the election. That is the question that every Canadian has a right to know and no duplicity, no dodging, no weaving, no hiding behind the Tories will escape that question. We insist that the Liberals tell the Canadian people that if they get the trust of the Canadian people through the vote, they will not implement NAFTA. Anything less than that is mere puffery, it is mere politics, it is mere denying the Canadian people exactly where the Liberals stand as the Official Opposition.

With all the yap, yap, yap from the Liberals, all the interjections, the reality is where does the Liberal Party stand? Is it with Canadians against this bill or is it really just playing a game with the government? January 1, 1994, will it implement? Let every Canadian know the value of that question.

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I too would like to rise and speak to the report stage of this bill, Bill C-91, an act to amend the Patent Act that has few, if any, redeeming features and an act that government members should be ashamed to defend.

• (1150)

Before I proceed further I would like to seize this opportunity to congratulate and thank my Liberal colleague, the member for Dartmouth, who has provided true leadership in this House and has challenged the conscience of all members of Parliament.

I would also like to seize this opportunity to thank the immediate member from the NDP for recognizing the imminent victory of the Liberal Party of Canada.

I will speak today on Motion No. 1, an amendment to the bill. The motion relates to the retroactivity clause, an amendment setting a doubtful precedent in Canadian legislation and to the restoration of compulsory licensing.

There is a tradition of democracy whereby no one may be penalized for an action taken before the birth or enactment of any law. We know of the truism no ex post facto law shall be enacted. This democratic tradition, specifically this fundamental tenet of our common law, has found itself even in sports, where no one may change the rules of the game midstream. You cannot expect people to plan in a vacuum of uncertainty.

That very thing has been demanded directly of our generic drug industry by this government and indirectly of all Canadians in a despicable display of arrogance and hypocrisy by this federal government.

Generics will be penalized by a government that is a lap-dog to the multinationals, nudging our own home-grown industries into oblivion. This is especially true when the bad medicine of Bill C-91 is swallowed with the hemlock of NAFTA, where the drug industry has made our international trade minister and our own Prime Minister rush to praise and sign.

It becomes even more repugnant to think that this retroactive clause would find itself in this bill, particularly when it is being proposed by this government which has lost the trust of Canadians.

While I am not surprised that the government has spawned retroactivity in legislation, I am embarrassed for the government's lack of honour and integrity.

The minister is not even clear on the intent of the pharmaceutical industry; not specific with respect to drugs for which licences have been granted by December 20, 1991, and for which licences, issued later, should be permitted. Without such clarity, there could be a second class of monopoly among generics themselves. One can only imagine a company issued a licence after December 20, 1991 but filed before that date and which has spent substantial amounts of time and money preparing this product for the market could be severely prejudiced by the proposed legislation.

This is truly a flawed deal.

At this point I would like to indicate to the House why the retroactivity clause is even more alarming and obnoxious. We know that it is a result of lobbying by the U.S. drug companies through their intellectual property committee, as reported in the media. Apparently, in its February 26, 1992 letter to the U.S. trade representative Carla Hills, the committee wrote: "In clear, straightforward language, NAFTA must require Canada to dismantle its discriminatory compulsory generic licensing requirements for pharmaceutical products and to suspend the granting of any compulsory generic licences from December 20, 1991 and onward".

This was not a date chosen by this government after dutiful study. This was a date of retroactivity because it has caved in to that big, big lobby. The said letter apparently was full of commands, such as insist and must.

These brand name companies, in essence, made the rules and had seen to it how those rules could be adopted as international standards.

They wanted to set a precedent for the world, but who is the guinea pig? Canada.

We do not even know if there is ever any intention on the part of the pharmaceutical companies offshore to transfer biomedical research to Canada in exchange for Bill C-91. Why did we not ask for that?

A special assistant to President Bush, Gail Wilensky, said: "Canada does not have to worry about having a biomedical research industry, it can make use of ours. That is what it means to be a small country next to a large country".

What a mocking attitude and what arrogance. This government has chosen to be mocked and has chosen to surrender.

Retroactivity would knock about two dozen generic licences into oblivion. Worse, if Bill C-91 is passed and entrenched in the North American free trade agreement, it will be virtually impossible to change later on.

What does this mean? It means that in future no Canadian government would be able to provide for its citizens without violating the international trade agreement. More seriously, when entrenched with the international trade agreement it would wipe out the sovereign right of this Parliament to allow generic companies to provide cheaper bio-equivalent drugs of brand name drugs to the poor, the elderly and the sick. Are we prepared, as members of Parliament, to truly surrender our right?

I ask all members of Parliament, particularly those from the other side who seem to be defending the position of the government, to come to their consciences. I am really groping for words to define the attitude of this government. This bill is more than unfairness, it is more than arrogance, it is more than lack of sensitivity, it is more than lack of leadership and integrity; it is the sum total of all these.

It is as though low-income and middle-class Canadians no longer matter in our society; no wonder most Canadians are disillusioned with this government.

Bill C-91 is a reflection that this government has lost touch with the pulse of Canadians. Even this government which talks of fairness to business will not allow other businesses to flourish. The saddest truism in Canada is that life is harder now than when this government came into power in 1984. The irony is that it is the same government that promised prosperity and now with Bill C-91 this government would like it to be even harder for the Canadians of tomorrow.

I appeal through the Chair, the ultimate authority in this House, to use its great persuasive powers to change the hearts and hands of this government. Can the Chair tell us of any parliamentary procedure that I can share with my constituents so that we can change the hearts and intention of this government and all its members? I only know of one approach and that is for this Parliament to be dissolved and for the government to call an election. Is there anything within the Chair's power that can invoke this wish of Canadians?

This is about the only retroactivity that we can allow, that we should not have elected this government to begin with in 1984. Surely this government is not blind to the 1.6 million unemployed and blind to the food banks.

As I conclude with the remaining minute allowed to me, we know of the havoc that Bill C-22 has wreaked and four years later in these December days, again we will see the havoc to be wrought by Bill C-91. Is this the Christmas gift the government is prepared to offer Canadians during this holiday season? I trust that its conscience will be stirred.

• (1200)

Hon. Bob Layton (Lachine—Lac-Saint-Louis): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to join in the debate with my colleagues today on the drug patent bill, C-91.

As a member of the legislative committee, I shared in the time spent and wasted to a large degree in the committee that did not give us a chance to express ourselves due to the filibustering from both parties of the opposition.

In January 1992, Canada endorsed the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade proposals to extend patent protection for pharmaceuticals by eliminating compulsory licensing. On June 23, 1992, we introduced Bill C-91, an act to amend the Patent Act, to increase brand name pharmaceutical protection from 17 to 20 years.

Why are we doing this? It will mean more investments, more jobs, more research, better medicines, fairness and reward for innovation—

Mrs. Dobbie: That is right. A future for our children.

Mr. Layton: We are committed to an international trade consensus through GATT which represents 108 countries. We must do it now because investment decisions are being made world-wide. Industry is restructuring globally.

We must create the right environment in Canada to attract investments and by the by to attract back our very fine scientists who were drawn away from Canada to the job opportunities in the United States and around the world. The reverse brain-drain is happening and it will be good for Canada.

Mrs. Dobbie: That is right. More jobs for us.

Mr. Layton: It is because patent protection is a critical factor in any new investment decisions. The current patent regime in Canada is simply non-competitive.

Some claim we are rushing this bill. The government's policy decision was announced a year ago. There has been ample opportunity for input from all stakeholders over the past months. The provinces, generic copiers, innovative companies and many others were consulted. Any further delay will jeopardize $500 million in investment commitments. Announcements are being made nearly every day.

Yesterday it was $170 million by the Eli Lilly Company, earlier it was Merck and beyond that it was Glaxo. They are all looking for an opportunity to invest in Canada.

Mrs. Dobbie: Because of bills like this.

Mr. Layton: Just because of bills like this. The track record is good.

Bill C-22 which preceded Bill C-91 has been a great success. Innovative companies have kept their promises on all fronts. There have been more investments; over $1 billion. There have been more jobs; 2,400 by 1991, on-track for 3,000 in 1996.

There has been more R and D. Canada, its universities and its brilliant scientists are leading the world in a number of areas, well ahead of the promises that were made for 1987, up from 4.9 per cent of sales in 1987 to more than 9.6 per cent in 1991.

Mrs. Dobbie: Real opportunities for Canadians.

Mr. Layton: We have strong price controls, increases that have been held to 2.9 per cent per year, well below the consumer price index of 4.4 per cent.

Finally, Bill C-91 improves price controls. There are new powers being given to the Patented Medicine Prices Review Board. There are better controls on the prices of new drugs and a greater role for provincial and consumer inputs. Nothing in the bill will contribute to increases of individual patent drug prices. These will continue to be regulated by the board.

The Montreal Gazette has not given a lot of support to our government initiatives but in this case it said last Friday in an editorial that went across the country: "Knee-jerk reactions don't help: The bill to extend drug patents is a sensible step".

How could such a sensible, necessary piece of legislation generate so much near hysteria? The bill is simple and fair. It is intended to give pharmaceutical companies the same 20-year patent protection that all other manufacturers get for their invented products. It will bring Canada into line with countries which support the GATT proposal giving drug makers 20-year patent protection.

"The bill also contains protection for consumers by strengthening the powers of the Patented Medicine Prices Review Board", says The Gazette to ensure that prices for all patented drugs remain reasonable. The Canadian pharmaceutical industry will not survive, let alone thrive without some respect for intellectual properties.

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Kenora—Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to be standing here today to talk about a very important issue for all Canadians and for the people of Kenora—Rainy River.

It is a shame that we have to enter this debate in such a hurry, and the hurry that I talk about is that of course we are dealing with the same situation with which we deal with most controversial bills in this place, that is with the threat of closure.

Bill C-91 is an issue that the Conservative government has brought forward to deal with the extension of patent protection for brand name pharmaceutical manufacturers. I might add that it is at the expense of Canadian consumers.

There was a lot of discussion in this place this morning as to what the facts are. Maybe we can just look at some of the facts. There is no doubt that the government has the right and the responsibility to negotiate on behalf of Canadians. It is true that we live in a very global, competitive market and have to be prepared to negotiate agreements with the rest of the world.

The question is: Has this government been a good negotiator? Let us take a look at the facts. Not too long ago, we debated in this place the North American free trade agreement. We debated in the 1988 election and previous to the election the free trade agreement with the U.S.

Those debates were based on whether in fact Canadians were getting a good negotiated deal. Again, the question has to be asked if indeed that is a fact. I want to look at some of the facts just to put on the record what we are getting with Bill C-91. Of course, what we are getting is an extended amount of patent protection for pharmaceutical manufacturers; up to 20 years. A lot of members opposite believe that bringing us in line with other countries is a good thing.

First of all, we have to look at the differences between one country and another. Canada, of course, is a very unique country. There is the fact that we have some large issues that we have to deal with. Of course, there is our geography and our demographic situation. It is because of our distances that health costs are sometimes much higher than in other countries, or potentially can be.

What we have in Canada is a very different system, a national health care system that reflects the unique needs of Canadians. We simply cannot say that we are the same as everyone else because if we were, we would just have one state in the world. We would not be different than another country on the globe.

We would be all the same and have the same kinds of regulations, the same kind of environmental protection. That is not the case at all. It seems though that the ideology and the belief of the Conservative government is that we are all the same and should be treated as such.

Let us take a look at what is going to take place with Bill C-91. The drug products affected by Bill C-91 will average 7.2 years of extended patent protection. Beginning in 1993, Bill C-91 will cost Canadians $7.5 million and by the year 2000, the added cost of Bill C-91 will be $455 million annually.

The cumulative costs of Bill C-91 from 1993 to the year 2000 will be $1.7 billion and by the year 2010, the cumulative cost from 1993 will be $4 billion. The question is in this negotiated system that we are talking about: What are we getting for the $4 billion that we are giving the large pharmaceutical companies? Are we getting more jobs as was suggested in 1987? No, we are not getting more jobs. Are we getting more research and development? Maybe so. The suggested amount of research and development because of this patent protection, the added amount of time that will protect these big pharmaceutical companies which, by the way are 85 per cent foreign owned, is an estimated total of $500 million.

What we hear on the one hand is that Canadians, as consumers, are going to give up roughly $4 billion out of their pockets for higher drug prices because now what we are talking about is going from the Canadian system to a level playing field similar to the American system. It is a fact that Americans pay 62 per cent more for prescription drugs than the average Canadian citizen. If we were to follow that through, that means by the year 2010 we will be on a level playing field with the Americans. Our drugs should rise proportionately to the point where we will be equal to the Americans as far as the price that we pay for drugs.

The question has to be asked in this place. That is why we are debating this, not because we are the loyal opposition and we disagree with the legislation. It is our responsibility as members of Parliament, to put the facts before the Canadian people so that they can decide whether the legislation that the government is presenting today is a good piece of legislation for the good of all Canadians.

On the one hand, we have the minister who was the same minister who negotiated the free trade agreement and now is the Minister of Industry, Trade and Technology. He is also the Minister for International Trade and he is negotiating on our behalf another agreement, which is this particular legislation that we are talking about. His negotiating skills are what we are talking about here today. On the one hand, we are removing roughly $4 billion out of the pockets of Canadians. In essence this money is going to the U.S. because they are all multinationals. On the other hand, it is being suggested that we are getting $500 million in research and development.

Under the research and development process there are also some tax incentives. The Canadian government provides in tax incentives to the large international companies which are into research and development in this country roughly 70 per cent of the bill. That means in essence they are paying 30 per cent out of their own pocket for research and development in this country.

It does not take a rocket scientist to understand that in essence the $500 million that is being quoted is not $500 million at all. It is a much smaller amount than that. It is only $150 million.

We are asking Canadian consumers to pay roughly $4 billion more in drug costs in the next 20 years in exchange for $150 million in research and development. Can you imagine, what kind of negotiator I would have been in my previous life if I came back to the membership that I used to represent and gave them those numbers? That is in my previous life when I used to have a much more enjoyable time. That is because they did not give us 10 minute deadlines to speak in those days. If I did that, I would not last more than five minutes in that room with those people whom I represented.

What we are trying to suggest today to the government is that the minister's negotiating skills can only lead us to one conclusion. That conclusion is that it is his swan song before he goes back to the corporate world to be able to say to the corporate world: "Look what I gave you". He certainly is not giving the Canadian people anything to talk about, anything to be joyous about, any kind of a Christmas present.

What are we going to do?

The NDP is suggesting that we are in bed with the Conservatives. I find that to be the most ludicrous thing I could ever think of, simply because in the last four years I have gone through the kind of NDP rhetoric we are hearing in the House today in Ontario. In Ontario, Bob Rae has said continually, and was elected for it, that he had an agenda for the people. He was going to give all sorts of improvements to Ontario. There were hundreds of promises and they were never fulfilled.

I caution Canadians when they listen to members from the NDP side saying that they are going to do the right thing if they get to be the government come election time. I know for a fact that is not true and I say to people out there be very careful when you accept that kind of rhetoric because we in Ontario know that is not the case.

[Translation]

Mr. Vincent Della Noce (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State of Canada and to Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to speak in this debate on third reading of Bill C-91, an act to amend the Patent Act, 1992.

I have already spoken on this—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. I simply want to point out that we are at report stage, considering the report of the committee that examined Bill C-91.

Mr. Della Noce: Mr.Speaker, we will get there one day, that is for sure, because I believe that this bill is important. As I said in my last speech, it is so important for Quebec now that people are starting to talk only about it. I find it unfortunate that the member who just spoke gives his place to a party that will defend this bill, namely the Bloc Quebecois. We cannot really call it a party, we will just call it the Bloc Quebecois.

This morning, on coming to the House, I read La Presse and, before starting my speech, I would like to quote an article for my colleagues in the Liberal Party. I think it is too bad, because the Liberal Party was in power long enough to know the difference between good and bad. The article, dated December 8, 1992, was written by Mario Fontaine and has the caption, "Ghislain Dufour, president of the Conseil du patronat, together with Bloc Quebecois President Lucien Bouchard".

That is serious and I would like my colleagues to pay close attention. It bothers me because I believe it is up to them to defend this bill, not up to a small group.

The article says: "Ironically, the Conseil du patronat, the actively federalist Quebec employers' council, has had more problems with the Liberals under centralizer Jean Chrétien than with Lucien Bouchard's sovereignists. The reason is that the Liberal Party is reluctant to pass Bill C-91 on drug patents."

I do not know if my colleague opposite could shut up and listen for once. He might learn something, because things are happening in Quebec now. Things are happening there because people want the bill passed, because—

[English]

Mr. Nault: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I know that the member opposite has been in this place long enough to know that we are not supposed to call hon. members by their names in this House. On that side of the House they continually do that on a regular basis. If it is going to be the rule to start doing that, then I would love to change that approach.

If that is the case then I would like to change my speech to reflect that Mr. Wilson is the sell-out artist of all time.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Yes, by tradition, we are not supposed to name a member. I believe the hon. member was quoting something, and of course the issue is more complex then.

Mr. Della Noce: I was just going to ask you that, Mr. Speaker. I quoted from a newspaper article as it was written. I have been here long enough to know that when a Liberal rises to raise this kind of point, it is to prevent us from talking about the bill and making them listen to some good points. I have understood that. If the hon. member opposite does not know what is happening in Quebec, he could perhaps start to read La Presse. He could keep up with things.

• (1220)

When you say such things here, you should look in the mirror. I would be ashamed to be a Liberal this morning, knowing that the CPQ cannot get a hearing from the Liberals or their centralizing leader and is reportedly going to see the Bloc.

Also, as a resident of Laval and for the riding I represent, I must add that this legislation is very important for research and development. Because of the Armand Frappier Centre, people I meet every day say to us that they need Bill C-91. I met the director of Marion and he told me that we would soon be invited to the opening of their expansion. They are doubling the square footage they now have in Laval. What is happening in my riding must certainly be positive.

An hon. member: Tell me about the military college.

Mr. Della Noce: My colleague asks me to tell him about the military college. Like it or not—this may not be the topic today—my colleague must know that Mississauga and Laval are the only two cities in Canada that are growing at a rate over 10 per cent; Montreal is growing at only 1.7 per cent.

Regardless of what my colleague wants to talk about, I can tell him about the military college all he wants. I did not own the land, he can be sure of that. That does not interest me. What interests me is that we have some things in Laval.

I think that Laval and Ville Saint-Laurent are models for research and development in Quebec. If the hon. member wants to hear about it, he could certainly be invited to take a tour. It is wonderful.

Again last week, driving to Ottawa, I saw more buildings going up for research and development, especially Biochem, and that will please my colleague from York. The president, Mr. Bellini, is a wonderful fellow, and not just because he is Italian. They are people who are investing in our area, who believe in Laval and create many jobs as well. We in Laval want to have something extraordinary. We are interested in the environment and things that do not pollute. The mayor is always trying to attract investors and trying to give them the best. He has even provided a park with a special residence for our researchers, because we do not want them to go away; we want to attract them, but some people want to send them away.

What has happened is that we had to go and find them in the United States and tell them: "Come back. You have a chance with us, because all future legislation will protect this investment".

Sure, some people will give figures. I heard some figures just now. Millions and millions and millions. It is easy. If a company could invent a drug one day that could cure 20 or 30 per cent of the patients in hospital, I think that Canada and Quebec and everyone would really come out ahead. That is what we are looking for.

Unfortunately, I had to go to hospital last week. It is frightening. I had priority because I had chest pains. People wait four to five hours. Research is important. If it costs $500 million to save $2 billion, well, that is $2 billion in taxpayers' money we can save.

Why we are doing this? If the hon. member will listen, I will tell him. We are doing this because we want more investment, more jobs, more research and better drugs. We want to reward innovators, we want to reward research, and we want to give our young people a chance. He keeps harping on the negative side. It is going to cost more. Of course, research costs money, but some day we will get a return on that investment.

Research is indeed like a long-term investment. Some of the investments I have made did not seem like much at first, but in the long run they grew and grew, and that is what research and investment are all about.

This morning, when I was listening to the hon. member, I felt he ought to be ashamed to let the Bloc Quebecois defend his party and defend the people who believe in Bill C-91 in Montreal.

His question was: "Why act now, why don't we wait?" This is typical of people who do not want to keep up with new developments. Let us put it off until tomorrow. I was in business for 25 years, and I could never afford to say "we'll wait". People who wait are losers. We cannot wait. We must stay ahead of the pack. We must stay 10 years ahead of everybody else. But no, let us wait.

Mr. Speaker, you are signalling that I only have two minutes left, so in concluding, I will quote, for the benefit of my colleagues, an old saying my Italian grandfather always used: "No money, no candy".

Today in Le Devoir, I noticed someone plagiarised my grandfather's maxim, and I will name her, Mrs. Judy Erola, a former Liberal and former member of cabinet. She is now a lobbyist, like many others of her ilk, whatever their political affiliation. Many have started a new career this way. Mrs. Erola was saying the same thing. I agree. I do not think this is blackmail: "No money, no candy", no investment, no jobs; no research, no jobs.

To the residents of Laval, the city I represent, Bill C-91 is important. I hope my colleagues will stop delaying its passage and avoid losing ground as they did during the consideration of Bill C-22. That particular bill was crucial to them, and this is a new Bill C-22, if you like. My colleague said that I often referred to Bill C-22, but I cannot help it, because that is the bill that brought $500 million to my riding and activated investment there. I am not saying that Quebec or Laval are better, but Laval is my home. It is a young city, barely 25 years old, and we are anxious to attract this kind of investment. Special residences and parks were built for researchers in a special environment, because a city does well to attract researchers and R and D components.

I rise in the House today to speak to Bill C-91, as I promised the people I represent. This bill must be passed, and we will try to convince our friends opposite—even if they want to be stubborn and quote all kinds of figures—by quoting back to them what my grandfather said: "No money, no candy".

[English]

Mrs. Dobbie: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I think you will find there is unanimous consent in the House to extend through the mid-day interruption.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Hon. members have heard the terms of the motion. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Joseph Volpe (Eglinton—Lawrence): Mr. Speaker, I would like to follow up on what the member for Laval was indicating; namely, no money, no candy.

I want to refresh the memory of this House and all Canadians who listen to the promises of candy when Canadians put their hands into their pockets and put out literally hundreds of millions of dollars with Bill C-22.

The drug companies, the patent drug companies, the multinationals, promised 3,000 high-skill, high-paying jobs in Canada if Bill C-22 would pass these Chambers.

So far, five years into that mandate—my hon. colleague opposite wants to hear this—there have been a grand total of 700 lay-offs in the industry; not job creation, lay-offs. If the truth is out and if the members opposite can read one of those multinationals, Eli Lilly in Scarborough, Ontario, which promises to spend another $150 million on R and D even though the Canadian taxpayer is going to pick up 70 per cent of that in tax write-offs, has reported since Bill C-22 profits to its parent in the United States in excess of 100 per cent return on investment per annum over the course of the last five years.

Good Lord in heaven, what are we going to do? What more incentive do the multinationals need in order to put back some candy in the pockets of Canadians who have been footing the bill, one hundred per cent return on investment each of the last five years?

Now what is it asking for? It is asking for continued protection for an additional three years because it needs it. The government needs it desperately. I do not know why because it has not delivered on jobs. It has been getting tremendous return on its investment and if any corporation, be it multinational, local or parochial got one third of that kind of return on its investment it would think it was running a super duper profitable franchise.

No, we are not talking about that at all. We are talking about the biggest mind boggling rip-off Canadians have yet to see and are going to witness to their chagrin over the course of the next while if this bill actually passes this House. Lord forbid that happens. Many of us are going to turn very religious because we will have to invoke our faith in the divine in order to prevent this travesty from being visited upon Canadians. It is a travesty.

We have to take a look at the kinds of claims being made and the truth that is evidenced by action. We are talking about investment that is going to be made, but over the course of the last several years R and D spending, for example, in the United States has exceeded the R and D spending in Canada by 50 per cent.

With a return on investment of 100 per cent, why is there that kind of a discrepancy? Where are the jobs for our young chemists, our young bio-researchers? Where are our investments in the universities? Where are our investments in Canadian industry?

When compulsory licensing was put in place, as Canadians will well remember, it was to develop a critical mass in expertise at our universities, academic institutions, and bio-medical research facilities. It was designed so we could create the kind of financial base for our industries, our naissant industries in bio-medical research, in the drug research if you will, in order to allow Canadians to develop an industrial base and a pattern that would encourage industry that was going to accrue benefits to our medical research and medical system.

Colleagues on both sides of this House will have to admit compulsory licensing is an integral part of the Canadian medicare system. Without it, the system cannot function and in fact will not function. The member opposite is so fond of saying: "Ooh, I see these buildings go up and you know we are going to create jobs". Those jobs are going to disappear tomorrow.

The profits are being transferred back across the border. Canadian companies are investing every single penny of profits in this country because they pay taxes in this country. They do not transfer their taxes via expenses to some tax-free haven like Puerto Rico.

The integral component of our medicare system is the affordability of drugs. That affordability is being eroded by this legislation and just think how nefarious this legislation is.

My colleague from Dartmouth who has argued so valiantly on this bill has pointed out on more than one occasion the retroactivity component of this particular amendment that we are dealing with now. It is so bad that not only does it reach into our pockets to pay more, it is pulling our pants right off our bodies. It is saying it is not enough that it is going to get an additional three years. In fact, it is going to be much more than three years of patent protection.

It is going to be much more.

Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth): Up to 14 years.

Mr. Volpe: Up to 14 years, my colleague from Dartmouth says and in fact the average is about 9.5 years. Not only is it going to reach forward, it will also reach backward. I have not seen anything so inane. On a moral basis, it just does not make any sense. On a legislative basis, it is an affront to liberal democratic principles that you would pass legislation that reaches further back and makes criminals of those who have abided by the laws of this country and made investment decisions on the basis of the laws of this country as unjust as they might have been.

No, no. The members of the government opposite are not happy to have pilfered Canadians and pillaged our political system. They want to make sure they burn and raze to the ground any vestiges of Canadian industry, Canadian bio-medical research and Canadian achievement through a medical system that is the paragon of example the world wide. They want to erode for all time the basis of a social policy that might in fact give credence to the claims, to our boasts in fact, we are a truly progressive society and we are doing it on the basis of investment decisions. The members opposite have the courage, the temerity, the effrontery to suggest this bill is necessary so companies can make their investment decisions and bring us money.

One of the reasons we have a crisis of confidence in our political system today among our citizens is we essentially tell all Canadians: "You're fools", and we are if we believe those kinds of claims.

Can you imagine, and this is not a partisan statement, on a very conservative estimate we are going to give, through this amendment, a gift of an additional $500 million to the brand name companies, the multinationals. That $500 million has to come out of our medicare system. It is not going to finance better doctors, better nurses or better facilities. It is $500 million that is going to be taken out of our tax system to give to companies that are already earning 100 per cent return on their investments.

We are going to do all that and we are going to tell Canadians: "Go ahead, give us that $500 million per annum over the course of the life of this contract. Do you know what we will do in return? We will throw away $500 million over the course of the next 10 years and that is $50 million a year in investments". Good Lord in heaven, there is not a member in this House, even from the NDP, who would not say: "Give me but a tenth of that money and I will gladly throw it back into the pockets of all Canadians through whatever kind of investment, because after all, we are dealing with your money".

This is an insane way to do business. It is a crazy way to run a government. It is an absolutely idiotic way of putting together legislation. If my colleagues on the NDP side are really honest like we are, this needs to be defeated. If passed, it should be rescinded when we get into government.

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to have a chance to speak against Bill C-91. The more truthful title for this bill would be "a bill to increase the prices of prescription drugs and the profits of the multinational prescription drug manufacturers".

The bill does not of course say that openly and directly. It does it indirectly with all kinds of diverting and irrelevant propaganda, including promises of jobs. We have heard this for eight years now: jobs, jobs, jobs. With all this government has done for jobs, we now have 1.5 million Canadians officially unemployed. There are many more unemployed unofficially and another couple of million Canadians who have to depend in whole or in part on government aid. That is the result of eight years of the Prime Minister's promise of jobs, jobs jobs.

That is what the government is promising here: jobs, jobs, jobs. The facts do not support it even on the prescription drug industry, as my colleagues have already pointed out. The fact is we have lost 700 jobs in this very industry, including lay-offs by companies promising to make more jobs.

There was a time when the multinational corporations got the highest price in the world for prescription drugs from Canadians. Our prices were higher than any others. That was before 1969.

• (1240)

At that time an amendment was passed to the Patent Act which limited the patent monopoly of these foreign monopolies and limited the application in Canada to five years. After that an entrepreneur in Canada could establish a manufacturing corporation, apply for a licence from the multinational monopolies and by law get that licence.

By paying a fee to the multinational corporations, the entrepreneur in Canada could produce what we call generic drugs. Sulpha is sulpha no matter what company produces it. Penicillin is penicillin no matter what company produces it. That was the basis of the generic drug industry which has grown and produced a good many jobs in Canada. More importantly, it has lowered the price we would otherwise be paying for these prescription drugs.

The government's own office in 1983 estimated the generic drug industry had saved Canadians $200 million on the prices of drugs in the previous year. It is done very simply. The government's commission estimated when one generic drug company competes, the price the monopolies can charge becomes 20 per cent cheaper because of the competition. When five companies compete the prices average 45 per cent cheaper. When 10 versions of a generic drug compete, the prices average 70 per cent cheaper. That is not surprising considering some of the foreign multinational corporations make 100 per cent profit every year on their investment. They can well afford to let some of that go for a necessity and this is a necessity.

The health of Canadians is far more important as an obligation to this government than the super profits of a foreign multinational, even when the foreign multinational promises to make jobs. We know the record of those companies in the last four years has been the destruction of jobs in Canada, not just in the drug industry but in all kinds of manufacturing. They have destroyed hundreds of thousands of jobs in Canada because they find it cheaper to produce in places like Mexico where they can hold people down to $1 to $2 per hour wages.

The health of Canadians is more important than the profits of these foreign multinationals.

The amendments to the Patent Act brought their monopoly time in Canada down to five years, but the multinationals have now campaigned to get those unlimited profits back. First they pressured this government to extend the monopoly power by the 1986 law to 10 years. That is 10 years before anybody can compete with them in Canada by producing basically the same drug under a generic title. They are now demanding 20 years of monopoly time and this government is giving it to them through its majority vote.

I want to repeat, the question basically at issue is what is fair, not just between individuals or nations, but to the whole nation. The Canadian health system developed from small beginnings to a national system that is the envy of many people in the world including more and more people in the United States of America, and I will come back to that.

Part of that envious system is the moderate price of prescription drugs which Canadian law so far has enforced; enforced not by price fixing, but by allowing competition which this government claims to admire.

The people of Canada have a moral right and a moral obligation to do this through their government and through their representatives in this House to allow that competition to keep the prices down so that they are reasonably possible for Canadians to pay, including poor people, including seniors who need more and more drugs as they grow older and including children whose lives can be stopped suddenly when they have need of these drugs.

When drugs can cost as much as $19 per pill, the companies that force such a high price are killing people for a profit. They do not need a gun to do it. They do not necessarily have to do it by industrial carelessness like the accident in Bhophal, India a few years ago, when they killed thousands of their neighbours by a careless explosion. They do it by putting the prices beyond the reach of the people.

I am glad that some American brothers and sisters have come up to Canada, not just now but through the years, to let us know what is going on in the United States with this prescription drug racket. I am glad that they and we are making common cause now because they have to pay 62 per cent more than we do on average for prescription drugs. They know what these multinational corporations cost because it is primarily from them that the multinational corporations are making those 100 per cent profits.

In the last few years, the people in the United States have been demanding a health system more like the one we have in Canada. It has now reached the point at which President-elect Clinton in his election campaign felt it necessary and appropriate to promise them an improved health insurance system partly to cover the $35 million people in the United States who have no health coverage whatsoever. More people than the population of Canada go without any medical health protection in the United States because of the rule of corporations like Eli Lilly and the other drug companies.

If the corporations can kill the generic drug industry in Canada and further undermine Canada's health system, they may be able to block President-elect Clinton from legislating a decent health system for the American people. I hope the Canadian people will stand up, first for ourselves, and defend our present health system and the generic drug system against Bill C-91. I hope we will defend it against the North American free trade agreement which would like to lock us into Bill C-91 for ever and ever in the future.

Second, if we do that, we will be helping the American people to gain the very same benefit.

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants): Mr. Speaker, in the short 10 minutes that we have under this procedure to speak, I want to talk about Bill C-91 in two aspects. I think these are the two basic issues.

One is the perversion of Parliament that this whole process involves and the second issue is obviously the substance of the bill.

Having been a member for a few years who still does believe, sometimes I wonder about the efficiency, the efficacy or the supremacy of Parliament. This bill, Bill C-91, is a contradiction to everything that Parliament involves.

Bill C-91 was introduced on June 23 of this year, the day we adjourned for the summer. We all know that we were very involved in constitutional discussions. There were also free trade discussions, NAFTA discussions, but the preoccupation of the country was definitely shifting to the Constitution and that is the day this bill came in.

Then the debate started on second reading on September 17, 1992, when we came back after the summer when the focus was very much on the Constitution because that is the session that passed the referendum bill.

I want these things on the record because I cannot understand any member opposite and/or certainly opposition members who do believe that Parliament does have a part to play in certain fundamental issues who can agree with the short timeframe and the jackboot allocation of time and closure that was involved with this bill. The debate started on September 17. It started at 10.25 in the morning and went untill 12.15, an hour and 50 minutes for that first day. Then we had the referendum and the House adjourned. Then October 26 came and the House came back after the referendum and that is when second reading debate continued, on November 16 when the debate started at 3.35 in the afternoon and went to six o'clock, a total of two hours and 25 minutes. Then closure came in, so the debate was going to be cut off the next day. It started on November 17 at 10.20 in the morning, went to two o'clock in the afternoon, for a total of three hours and 40 minutes, and then the resuming period of the afternoon, before the hammer of closure fell, it went from 3.20 p.m. to 4.45 p.m.

There were three days, parts of three days, for a total of eight hours and 40 minutes on a bill affecting the very health of Canada and Canadians. Anyone on the opposite side who pretends that this was Parliament at its best does not understand the whole essence of Parliament.

As I listened to some of the government speakers today talking about the merits of the bill, I can understand some members' talking about the pluses of this bill because there is definitely a very real argument on intellectual property and the fact that an inventor should be able to keep his invention. If you are a book writer you are supposed to have your copyright or if you are a painter you are supposed to have certain rights on that painting. That is fine for many of these areas where patent law applies across the board.

When you are talking about the health of Canadians, and something fundamental like drugs, you have to have the balance between the private interests of the developer and the public interest of the people you are supposed to serve. It pains me to say that the preoccupation of jobs, jobs, jobs that we have heard across the way has put in the back seat people, people, people and the health of the people that the government is supposed to represent.

In terms of the time we have had to debate this bill, it should be enough to in effect see if all the good things that government spokespeople say are attributable to this bill, to let the public have a chance to hear a debate. This country is large and it takes time to build a groundswell from coast to coast on any issue.

I can talk conservatively and certainly independently about a three-day debate, parts of three days, and a grand total of eight hours and 40 minutes, and then an allocation order sending it to committee, where in effect it was parts of three days for committee witnesses and great disagreements, understandably, between opposition parties and the government as to how many witnesses. A very few witnesses came before the committee. Here we have it back today for report stage, and 71 amendments on the Order Paper, pointing out that this is a complex bill, a complicated bill affecting all Canadians. It has not thoroughly got the scrutiny of Parliament.

I am the first to say that too often in this House we debate ad nauseum too many matters that frankly do not matter that much. I understand the government's using closure and allocation of time when the debate has gone on for days and days and perhaps the opposition is running the clock rather than really debating the merits of a bill.

Never has there been a bill in my memory with so much potential to debate both sides of the issue. To have the ramrod of allocation of time and closure on this bill is a travesty of Parliament, which is one of the reasons this institution is in such low esteem with the public which knows and senses something is wrong. This is the best example.

Before I go on to the other matters of the substance of the bill, I want to take time to pay justified credit to the member from Surrey North and especially to the member for Dartmouth of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition who is a fellow colleague from my province of Nova Scotia and who has been the spokesperson for the opposition, really leading the questions and the objections to this bill in a proper way.

I give him full credit because I certainly know from the constituency that he comes from in metro Halifax, where there is a great university community and other interests that affect his party, that he has had cross-currents to compete with as all members have cross-currents to compete with from time to time when you get such an important bill.

The other perversion of problem, and I am not going to take long on this since other members have spoken about it and there are several amendments that are supposed to cure it, is a retroactivity feature.

Retroactive legislation in Parliament is odious. It does away with rights that were there in the law, then you pass a law like today and you take back rights that were already given. You have changed the rules of the game in midstream and that is very wrong. Hopefully it may be corrected in an amendment but I am not naive enough to believe that amendment may carry.

Those are some of the points in terms of the perversion of Parliament that some of us still believe in although it is getting difficult to believe in it when you see this type of example.

The other element of Bill C-91 is the substance of the bill. We have heard much today, we are going to hear more in the afternoon or whenever this debate terminates on all the aspects of the bill. It does not take all the graphs, facts and figures to tell the people here and the people outside that generic drugs are cheaper and keep under control the cost of prescription drugs.

When you have all the provincial ministers of health, other than the minister of health from Quebec, raising questions about this bill, writing to the Minister of National Health and Welfare, suggesting certain amendments which have not been incorporated by the government to help some of the deficiencies of this bill, then all Canadians, especially those Canadians who believe in our universal health care, should stand on guard and be concerned.

I can understand the member for Laval. If you have a lot of pharmaceutical drug companies in your backyard, of course you are going to be in favour of this bill.

If it is so great then there should be time for people to get involved in the debate so that the government could justify this hurried action rather than to have it come on to the floor of the House the way it has come on with the hope that it is going to get through before our Christmas recess.

In terms of the substance, we do not have to go too far; just two examples of how generic drugs keep in check the cost of pharmaceuticals. One is a very popular one called Valium which is a brand name drug manufactured by Roche which sells 1,000 2mg tablets for $63.50 and 1,000 10 mg tablets for $144.50.

Diazepam, the generic equivalent, sells for much cheaper; 1,000 2mg tablets costs $5.50 while 1,000 10 mg tablets only cost $6.95. I could give many other examples of the type of comparison which is one of the reasons why I have introduced an amendment which is on the floor of the House.

This price monitoring board unfortunately I still feel is a tame tiger, a tabby cat without sharp teeth. The amendment if it carries is going to make sure that when that monitoring board comes through with a comparison of pharmaceutical prices it is also going to have to compare what has happened with the wholesale price of drugs and what happens at the retail level.

I believe you could go on and on in terms of comparing other generics with pharmaceuticals. I am all for intellectual property and the fact it has to be protected to a certain degree but I believe Bill C-22 was a happy compromise and frankly there has been growth in pharmaceuticals and generics. We talk about the jobs in pharmaceuticals. There are going to be jobs affected by the generics.

In conclusion, as I know other members want to speak, everyone has talked about this, saying conform to NAFTA and GATT. If we are going to be the Boy Scouts of the world, penalizing the Canadians we are supposed to serve—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order please.

Mr. Terry Clifford (London—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I always enjoy listening to the member from Annapolis Valley—Hants speak in this House. He makes from time to time some very good points.

I think in this case he has forgotten some of the work in Parliament that one does not see in this House. He forgets about the hours that are spent in committees. I would like to listen to his timetable and agenda for what has happened in this very House with regard to this bill. He has forgotten the problem in the institution of committees. Maybe when he was chairman he would remember these things. He knows the hours that members of Parliament put in on committee work. One has to recognize that many aspects of this bill were covered in committee, a lot of good points were made and a lot of the views of Canadians were heard.

• (1300)

He did say there are some good things in this bill and we are certainly glad to hear him make that point. He talks about the rights of invention and the fact that creative people should be rewarded. This is something that Canadians should be proud of, that their government is taking steps to protect and encourage individual achievement and development, particularly in a field that spans the world. Everyone knows we have gone to a global marketplace today. Everyone knows that we have to be competitive as individuals, as institutions, in order that our society can survive in this day and age.

He recognizes, as does this bill, that one of the most important features is the right to invent and the right to protection for your invention. Therefore the stimulation of that will give and the reports on this bill have said that from insulin to medical lasers Canada has a long history of medical discoveries. The most important factor in keeping discoveries in Canada is the will to do so.

Canadians must be prepared to make the necessary investments and trade-offs to focus on long-term rather than short-term benefits. We are trying to focus on something long term, something of which Canadians can be proud and can see long-term benefits. We are all talking in this House about the development of our economy, not just for today but for the next millennium. We need to have entrenched in the laws that we pass things that are going to make that happen. Clearly this bill does that in this field.

The development of better medicines has the potential to ultimately save on health care costs by reducing the need for more expensive treatment such as hospitalization and surgery.

Bill C-91 will encourage the search for new cures, new treatments, and new medicines by rewarding those who assume the risks of pharmaceutical research and development. It will promote the establishment of a strong, innovative and creative pharmaceutical industry in Canada. That industry in turn will generate cures and treatments for the diseases that afflict our senior citizens as well as other Canadians.

Again, we cannot motivate Canadians if there is no protection for those who are going to invest their careers to do this sort of thing. It is one of the strongest features in this particular bill.

The strength in the Patented Medicine Prices Review Board will have a key role in ensuring that patented drug prices remain reasonable for all.

An effective balance has been sought and I believe can be seen in this bill between the need to keep prices reasonable and the need to encourage new pharmaceutical research.

In doing so it offers a solution that will serve the best interests of all Canadian consumers and especially all those in need of this service, and how it will improve their lives.

I am happy that the member opposite sees the pivotal importance of Bill C-91. He sees the most important element in it, the fact that it rewards individual Canadian intuitiveness and creativity in a field that Canadians have been known in, in a field that Canadians now will get international rewards for and cause even more Canadians in the future to be involved.

I hear the member opposite who represents a university in his home city calling this rubbish. I do not think he is going to say that to the faculty of medicine or the faculty of science at Queen's University. I do not think they want to hear that at Queen's. Queen's says it is one of Canada's top universities. I do not believe their member does not support research and development. I do not believe they have elected a member to this House to represent a university city, a city which prides itself on its medical research who does not support research and development, who does not support the right of an author to creativity. I just cannot believe that this would be true in Kingston.

It is not true in London, Ontario. We know that the tests that are done on the drugs in our community to benefit our fellow Canadians are landmarks. Our community supports this kind of endeavour.

I am shocked that some other community that prides itself on academic development, on being a world centre in medical research, could have a member of Parliament who does not support this legislation. I just do not understand it.

I really appreciate the opportunity to put these views on the record today and find out from the members opposite that they are not prepared to listen to their constituents on this matter.

Mr. Joe Fontana (London East): Mr. Speaker, as usual the member for London—Middlesex does not know what he is talking about. For him to suggest that this side of the House and my colleague from Kingston and the Islands are against research and development is absolutely ridiculous and rubbish. This is the heart of the bill.

First, it would be absolutely irresponsible of me not to spend at least a few moments talking about the process. It tells a big story about what this government is all about and what it has been doing for the past eight years. Canadians have become cynical about this institution and cynical about governments. The government continually perpetrates upon the Canadian people the view that democracy does not mean anything any more. It has abused closure more often than previous governments over the past 125 years in the short period of time that it has been in power.

It has done it again on one of the most important pieces of legislation that has come before this House. It has done exactly the same thing, eight hours of debate before we broke for the summer and then the referendum. We came back and had a good five hours and the Conservative member for Manitoba says that is enough. The bill goes to committee. We cannot even hear 89 witnesses who want to be heard, including the Canadian Hospital Association.

Mrs. Dobbie continues to want to say no to everyone.

Mrs. Dobbie: Mr. Speaker, I am fed up with the opposition refusing to obey the rules. Yesterday in debate and again today they used my name. We know that is against the traditions of this House. Mr. Speaker, I would ask that you impose the rules on the members opposite.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Perhaps I may recall once more that members shall not be identified by name in the House.

[English]

Mr. Fontana: Mr. Speaker, I am sorry for mentioning the member's name, but perhaps I can mention the member's riding, Winnipeg South.

She is right. People are fed up with the hon. member and fed up with her government. There is absolutely no doubt about that. However, they will have their opportunity finally at election time to pay their respects or non-respects to this government by throwing it out of office. It will not be a day too soon, I can tell you that.

The process has been flawed. The Conservatives have no respect for democratic process. They did not want to hear from people who have a vested interest in this bill, the stakeholders; people in hospitals, the doctors, the consumers, the generic industry. All they allowed was three and a half or four hours. I was part of that process and I must say that it was embarrassing for me as a parliamentarian to have been part of that because it was absolutely disgusting. I do not blame people for being cynical about this whole process.

Second, I want to talk about the process of the bill. In 1987 a similar bill came before this House and it was fought long and hard by the Liberals not only here but in the Senate. The government moved toward changing the Patent Act as it relates to drugs. Some compromises were made. The government said it had to change things because the world is changing. We accepted that, reluctantly. Everybody was told that we had to move forward. What has happened?

Bill C-22 was supposed to be reviewed in 1996, after nine years, so that we could really find out the true consequences of it and its impact on Canada. We know what has happened, prices have gone up. We know that for a fact.

Expert witnesses have talked about the impact of Bill C-22. What does this government do? It says that it has to introduce Bill C-91 to change Bill C-22 because that was not enough. Why does it say it has to do that? Because it was thrust upon them by GATT, NAFTA or by global restructuring. What a bunch of hogwash that is.

Even GATT recognizes that countries have sovereignty and will allow a period of transition. Therefore, it is not because of GATT that we have to change our legislation, not tomorrow but retroactively to December 20, 1991. Is it because of NAFTA? We have provisions in NAFTA, as do the Mexicans and Americans, that allow a transition period of 10 years to change laws to comply with the North American free trade agreement. Why do we not seek that?

We on this side do not agree with NAFTA. We will fight it until we defeat it. You would think this government would take advantage of some opportunities it put in its own agreement.

With reference to the global restructuring in the pharmaceutical industry around the world, let us face it: even Mr. Eastman said that foreign owned companies, multinationals will, in fact, do the bulk of the research and development in their home countries. Sure Canada does research and development.

My friend from London—Middlesex said that universities do research. The University of Western Ontario does research. Let us be clear about the kind of research that is done in Canada. Not enough basic research is done. Twenty-six per cent of the research is only basic, the creative part, developing a new product. We do clinical research. That is great, but it is not the core of what Canada should be all about and that is innovation, creativity, developing our own drugs, not doing clinical trials for the pharmaceutical industries that are based outside this country. We want the positive aspects of this.

Let us review what Canada has managed to do. Canada, in many ways, always finds an accommodation or a compromise between competing interests and Canada has a unique solution. Canada has developed the compulsory licensing system. It is the only country in the world that has it. It has worked and it has worked marvellously. The President-elect of the United States wants to take a look at it. Consumer groups in the United States are taking a look at the Canadian model which, in fact, works. It balances the requirements and needs of patent protection, but at the same time the requirements for competition and new innovations that the generic industries bring forward. We have a unique Canadian solution that could be used as a model around the world, much like our supply management system in agriculture.

Some multinationals tell us we have a bad system because it does not cater to them. They cannot make as much profit as they would like but why should we abandon what works for Canada. Surely we can stand for what is good for us as opposed to always having to march to the tune of the foreign nationals or the Americans. We should be able to do that.

We have developed a Canadian generic industry that has only 8 per cent of the market, employs some 3,000 people and has 22 per cent of all the assets of the pharmaceutical industry in this country. Do you know what? They are doing basic research and clinical research. They are doing the kinds of things we want Canadian home-grown industries to do.

Do you know what else has happened since the Liberals put compulsory licensing in place in 1969? We have been able to develop our own fine chemical industry in this country. Without our own fine chemical industry, we would not be able to have our own drugs.

Another aspect of this bill will seriously impact on people, not only the drug companies but the fine chemical industries that came about because of generic industry and our compulsory licensing system.

I know I do not have too much time, but I want to cover two or three other aspects. One has to do with the question of retroactivity and the amount of extra cost this bill will bear on consumers.

Consumers and experts have indicated the cost of this Bill C-91 to them, the Canadian system, small businesses that pay for group insurance and the health care system will be something between $4 billion and $7 billion in the next 12 years. That is what is going to come out of the pockets of Canadians in one way, shape or form.

What have we asked for in return? At least with Bill C-22, we asked the pharmaceutical industry to put its money where its mouth was and create some good quality research jobs and not cheap ones. In this bill, we have not asked that of them. Why is that? In the United States and Europe, 20 per cent of their sales are reinvested in R and D.

In this country we have asked for only 10 per cent under Bill C-22 and in this bill we have not asked for anything. If we are going to give them a windfall profit, surely to God the government has an obligation and a responsibility to Canadian society to put something back. That means R and D should be at 16 per cent or 20 per cent at least. Why are Canadians not deserving of that?

I see my time is up. I would love to talk more, but unfortunately I cannot.

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, I too join my colleagues in the Liberal Party and caucus in condemning a piece of legislation which incorporates Bill C-91 that is very detrimental and threatening to the medicare system of Canada.

It is a one-sided piece of legislation that would essentially cripple the generic, Canadian pharmaceutical industry. That industry is entirely Canadian owned and home grown thanks to the system we have had in place since the late 1960s called the Compulsory Drug Licensing System.

That system will dissolve with the implementation of Bill C-91. That system will essentially be done away with. If we do away with the Compulsory Drug Licensing System we will first have increased prices for prescription drugs used by Canadians. That is a fact. The brand name companies have said so. The government members who have spoken on it have said so.

One of the reasons the right hon. member for Vancouver Quadra, when he was consumer and corporate affairs minister in the 1960s introduced this Canadian system was to moderate the cost of prescription drugs for Canadians. What is wrong with that objective? The system in fact, did that.

If the system is also done away with, it means we are not going to have any more companies like Apotex and Novopharm, which are state of the art Canadian companies operating in the pharmaceutical world. It will mean no more incentives to encourage Canadian high-tech firms operating in this domain. It will mean less diversification. It will mean a monopoly.

These are things I thought were part of the Conservative dogma of diversifying for healthy competition. The government wants to stay away from monopolies whether they are in the air or in a pharmaceutical industry. That is what is at stake, not some phony argument that if you are against Bill C-91, you are against the province of Quebec. That is phony. It is divisive and that is the "real enemy" of Canada which the Prime Minister talked about in the referendum.

He tried to pit the loyalty of one region against another. That is a phoney argument and neither we on this side of the House nor Canadians will fall for that phoney argument. We are also not saying we should run the brand name companies out of town. No one is suggesting that for one moment on this side of the House, nor is anyone suggesting the brand name companies should not get a return on their investment and make a profit after spending a lot of capital on R and D. No one is suggesting that.

The fact of the matter is, as other speakers have pointed out, the brand name companies in Canada enjoy a 92 per cent market share. They have not done that badly. We are suggesting to keep the status quo, for goodness sake. We are saying to leave the system intact, which allows generics right now, as we speak, an 8 per cent window. Any company or industry in Canada that enjoys a 92 per cent market share for most Canadian companies in this recession is dreaming. Yet we want to change a system because the brand name companies think 92 per cent of the market share is not good enough.

We know how strongly and passionately Canadians feel about our medicare system. It is good and different from others. It defines who we are in a certain sense. We travel across the globe, particularly at Christmas time and find ourselves in various parts of the world, whether on business or on holiday. People always marvel at the system we have in Canada if they get sick in those countries. Even some Conservatives are courageous enough to say so.

If they are proud that our medicare system is fairly unique in the world, why are they not proud at being very unique in the pharmaceutical industry? We have a made-in-Canada, for Canadians, by Canadians system that is working well for the health care system, for our consumers and for our Canadian pharmaceutical companies. Why should we not be proud of leaving intact and further enhancing its foundation rather than trying to dismantle it?

The government comes across saying: "Well, it is a question of research money and the universities are going to get some dollars from the brand name companies and it is a question of jobs." Sure, but we can also say the same for the generic firms because 100 per cent of R and D, 100 per cent of taxes paid by those companies, 100 per cent of profits and 100 per cent of all the jobs are here in Canada. You cannot say that for the brand names. A lot of profits, a lot of jobs, a lot of stimulus and a lot of R and D flow back to the parent company wherever it may be located. We can also talk about jobs and stimulus.

Members opposite talked about Eli Lilly Canada investing $170 million this week in the city the member for Broadview—Greenwood and I have the honour of representing. However, they fail to talk about the quote in The Financial Post by the president of Eli Lilly, Canada that invested $170 million in a brand name plant in Toronto. This is what he said: "The bill, C-91, currently being debated in the House of Commons did not help to bring the investment to Toronto." I repeat: "The bill, C-91," which we are debating today, "did not help to bring the investment here."

That was an honest, candid remark. If we also look at that $170 million figure, and I compliment this company for doing so at this particular juncture of our economy, we have to keep in mind $40 million is for wages. Are wages an investment or are they part of the parcel? Also, the plant expansion will cost $50 million.

I do not want members to mislead by saying it is $170 million in R and D.

The president has the honesty to say "You know, we planned this long before Bill C-91 came along. The system was fine. We were getting more return on our system".

It is going to cost taxpayers. Just the retroactivity component to last December is going to provide a windfall of $2 billion to brand name companies. Over $1.3 billion of that $2 billion windfall is going to one brand name company. Is that right? Is that fair when Canadians are reduced to worrying about job security and affordable health care in case they get sick? Is this the right message to be sending to Canadians at this moment rather than stimulating the economy and getting people back to work? We are talking about dissolving a system so our prescription drug costs will go up.

The American election proved how disconnected George Bush was with small town America. George Bush was a prisoner of the White House. He had no idea what was going on in America. This Prime Minister lives in the cocoon at 24 Sussex. When he finds the courage to venture out of that cocoon, it is only in the confidence and pleasure of $500 a plate dinners for the PC Canada fund. When is the Prime Minister going to see the reality that faces every Canadian every working day in this country? When is he going to see Bill C-91 is not in the interest of Canada? It is not in the interest of the Canadian consumer or our Canadian health care system. It is in the interest of the multinationals. Who does the Prime Minister represent because it is pay-back time?

Mr. René Soetens (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I rise to participate in this report stage of Bill C-91. I am pleased to do so.

The reasons I am rising are many. Hopefully during third reading stage I will have some additional comments on why this bill is good for Canada. I have been listening to the debate that has been going on today about how the government has behaved; how it has truncated the hearing process; how it has restricted members of Parliament from participating fully in the process.

I would just like to give some information which may be of interest. I was chairman of the committee during the entire process. Although my appointment did not officially take place until Friday, two weeks ago, it was talked about on the Wednesday. I participated very fully with the clerk of the committee to see if we could line up some witnesses in advance of the actual committee stage, because numerous witnesses had requested the opportunity to appear before the committee.

In my role as chairman trying to help the committee delve into its responsibilities, I asked if we could line up some witnesses in case the committee could very quickly do its work and get the process started. I received confirmation from the clerk that if we were ready and willing, there were members of the public and interest groups who wanted to appear, and could make their cases known to the committee and members of Parliament.

Unfortunately the committee process did not work. Members of the opposition in particular spent a considerable period of time talking and in fact, prevented things from happening on that Friday. They prevented things from happening on Monday. We debated for probably three days in which order we would allow members to speak. After finally deciding on that order, on many occasions they took the opportunity to rise on points of order in committee to say: "Just a minute, we do not agree with this order, we do not agree with this order, we challenge the Chair". That is the process of committee and that is the way it works.

In the last four years that I have been here, it has been my experience the committee process is where we, the members of Parliament can do our most valuable work. It is where we can review, research and understand the views of witnesses and amend and change the legislation.

Unfortunately, that did not work.

Where we could have had five, six or seven days of hearings, where we could have heard up to eight or nine witnesses a day, we did not have the opportunity to do so because there was a filibuster.

I acknowledge that on the government side there had been a clear indication that it wanted the bill back to the House of Commons quickly. We could have, even with the government's timetable, heard some 40 to 50 witnesses without any hesitation. On the other side the government could have met its agenda as well. We members of Parliament in committee could have done work that was necessary to do.

Mr. Karpoff: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, my understanding of parliamentary protocol is that the chair of the committee is supposed to be neutral. Again we are now seeing a demonstration as to why this committee ran into difficulty. The chair was not neutral. The chair was not even properly sworn in by the House before he was trying to bring forward the government's agenda of what was happening, saying it was going to decide that it was going to get this through by a certain date.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. I may remind hon. members that the parliamentary committee has submitted its report and thus no longer exists, which also means there is no chair at this time.

I realize this is a technicality, but it is important to make this distinction in the circumstances.

[English]

Mr. Soetens: Mr. Speaker, I think you have just had an excellent example of the way that member and other members went through in committee. This chairman, and I, honoured all of the requirements of representing you, as Speaker. This member, the member who just rose, and others like him on the opposition side used every tactic in the book, rose on points of order, like they did this time, that were not points of order when we could have spent all of that valuable time dealing with very important subject matter of the bill. That opportunity was denied.

Mr. Mills: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, if I understood you correctly, you just mentioned a few seconds ago that it was not proper to talk about what was going on in the committee and now we have the chairman standing and totally ignoring what you just said to the New Democratic Party.

I think we should get some balance back into this and get some guidance.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I believe the point of order raised by the hon. member for Surrey North was about the impartiality of the chair of this now defunct committee. Once the committee has submitted its report, any member of that committee, including the chair, can comment in the House at a subsequent stage, after the committee's report is tabled.

The chair would be ill-advised to ignore the freedom of speech enjoyed by every member in this House, especially if the function of the hon. member in question no longer exists and he has, so to speak, recovered his freedom of speech.

I shall again recognize the hon. member for Ontario.

[English]

Mr. Young (Beaches—Woodbine): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. I appreciate your ruling and the reason behind it but I do not think that was the point of order that the hon. member was raising.

Surely in the past there has been at least a tradition in this House that when someone agrees to participate in the panel of legislative chairs, they undertake not only to be non-partisan in the sense that they represent the Speaker's office, but that following that committee's work, the chair of that committee even undertakes not to vote on the bill at any stage in order to show clear non-partisanship.

I think that was the point that the hon. member was raising.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): There may be a tradition, but there is no formal obligation that would apply once the member's mandate has expired.

Once again, I very well understand the objection raised by the hon. member. I think that it is not up to the Chair to decide this question. It is up to each member to decide whether or not, in view of his responsibilities, he should speak on a particular bill. The hon. member for Ontario has the floor.

[English]

Mr. Karpoff: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. I honour the Speaker's ruling and there is a tradition. I think it might be interesting if the Speaker would ask the hon. member if he would follow the tradition of the House and refrain from speaking and voting on this bill.

That is a tradition that has served this House well and certainly would serve the chair of committees in the future well. I think the Speaker might find the member would be quite willing to stand down and not participate in this very partisan, one-sided tirade that he is going through.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Once again, I think that it would be going too far for the Chair. If the hon. member wishes to speak, I do not see why the Speaker would not recognize a member who takes the floor. It is up to the member to decide and to live with it. In this regard, the hon. member for Ontario has risen again and I will recognize him.

[English]

Mr. Soetens: Mr. Speaker, as you can see I think we have had now four or five requests for rulings on your part on points of order that have not been points of order.

I might point out, Mr. Speaker, for your benefit as I advised you during the committee process, regarding this sanctimonious bunch opposite, demanding my neutrality, tradition has it in the House of Commons that when the Speaker is acting in his role as Speaker, this bunch does not go back to his riding and start attacking, challenging and saying all kinds of things about the Speaker.

I should point out that the Liberal Party, this group opposite, which is so sanctimonious in its presentation here in the House, while I was doing the job impartially as I could, was busy attacking me.

Mr. Volpe: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. On behalf of all Canadians who elected me and other members in this House who are very interested, in pursuing the debate at hand, I think this is an affront to all members of this House and to all Canadians who elected them that we engage in this kind of a debate where we are talking about simple partisanship in one's own riding. It does not stand the chairman of the committee well to engage in this kind of claptrap.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): It is not a point of order, it is a matter of debate.

Mr. Soetens: Mr. Speaker, you are certainly assisting very well in my making the point about just the way this group opposite behaved in the committee process. It used any excuse it could to prevent the committee from hearing witnesses.

I have to say there were a number of witnesses I would have loved to hear even though I had to sit there as a neutral chairperson. I think there were people out there who would have been able to give us some very valuable insights, some very good additional information that would have been useful to the committee, and we could have done that in the five, six or seven days of hearings that we could have had in the timeframe that we spent debating all kinds of things other than the legislation that was before us.

I think that is important because during the whole process, because of the fact that we had to restrict the list of witnesses, we were not able to bring before the committee a balance of witnesses.

For example, the opposition presented a witness from the United States, which was possible for all kinds of reasons. Professor Schondelmeyer was there. He presented I think a very well documented report. There were things in the report that others would clearly liked to have challenged, refuted, maybe presented an alternative opinion on but because of the process that the opposition forced on the committee we were only in many cases to hear very one-sided presentations; whether they be one-sided on behalf of the Liberal Party, one-sided on behalf of the New Democratic Party, or one-sided on behalf of the Conservative Party.

Unfortunately, the traditional roles that committees would normally have were truncated because of what was going on by the opposition members on the committee.

I stand here, understanding fully the traditions under which this House operates, and have to suggest that, yes, maybe I am straying from those traditions, not because I wanted to, but because the members opposite did their darndest, did their utmost, to stray from the traditions as I perceive them of the way a committee ought to operate.

I am sorry that they did that and sorry that the government had to respond the way it did. We could have had far more beneficial hearings.

What is happening in debate today? I have listened to some members opposite speak and they use some examples that come out of the committee process. I reference the cost of the drug plan. Whether it is $4 billion or $7 billion over the next 10 years or 20 years, it is just one of those examples.

There is clear evidence to refute much of what was presented by Dr. Schondelmeyer, simply because on the list of drugs that he had there were already quite a number, I believe 14 or 15, that already had compulsory licences issued against them. There was another group of 16 or 17 where the dates of the patent expiries were wrong. When presented with that information, the witness said: "I would be happy to correct that if I have an opportunity to study it". Unfortunately, the opportunity was not there because people opposite made it very difficult in the time frame for us to proceed with the legislation.

I just give that as one example. Another example talks about the success of the generic drug companies. It was mentioned by one of the persons during the committee process that the generic drug industry, this industry that would be suffering tremendously under the old Bill C-22 or I guess the current Bill C-22, which established the original compulsory licensing and patent legislation, had grown by some 180 per cent over the last four years. We would have liked to delve into that a little further so that we can understand the future.

Finally, I should point out that I thought it was appropriate that maybe there should be some amendments to the legislation. When we got to that day when we were to make the amendments, there was a member there who was prepared to speak to some of the amendments that I thought were appropriate based on my review of the legislation. Unfortunately he as well was denied the opportunity to speak because of the way the opposition decided to stop on one clause for an entire day to ask questions.

That concludes my comments. I will be back on third reading and I will give all kinds of good reasons why I think this bill should go forward. Today I wanted to talk simply about the process of those people opposite.

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I must say that having heard about that process I have nothing but sympathy for the people who were sitting on that committee and those who were watching TV.

I think it is very important that we get back to the meat of this bill and the effects that it will have on Canada; effects not just on drug prices, which are bad enough, or on the undermining of our medicare system, which is terrible, but also there is no doubt in our minds that it will have an effect eventually on Canadian sovereignty.

Bill C-91 means the end of compulsory licensing of prescription drugs under the Patent Act. It means the end of the Canadian generic drug industry. It also establishes permanent control by foreign multinationals with the entrenchment of protections under the NAFTA agreement.

I think it is important, before talking about the specifics of the bill and the future implications, to go back a little bit in history. My colleagues who were here at the time will recall what had happened in the early 1980s. Generic drug manufacturing was allowed, companies were allowed to copy brand names drugs during that period and the price of drugs to consumers and to provincial medicare plans was reasonable.

This system increased competition and it reduced prices of patented drugs. There were studies done in Ontario in 1986 which proved this.

It also reduced medical costs for provincial governments which provide pharmaceutical plans as part of their medicare coverage, and I think particularly of the three provinces that have universal pharma-care programs which were introduced by past NDP governments. Access to cheaper generic drugs is especially important for seniors, for persons with chronic illnesses and for society in general.

During that period not only were savings significant but a significant Canadian drug industry was created. This did not last long. Nefarious capitalistic evil forces were at work. We found the brand name industry began to organize and to react. They wanted a monopoly under their control where they could raise prices and control the industry.

Multinational drug companies had parent companies located in the United States which also meant the undermining of Canadian industries. They started a very strong lobby. It was no surprise to us that the former consumer affairs minister of the Liberal administration in the early 1980s was hired by the pharmaceutical industry to lobby for it, to lobby for a strong monopoly for brand name drug companies.

By 1986 we had Bill C-22. This was bad enough but the bill we are talking about today, Bill C-91, adds a whole new dimension which will entrench and enshrine pharmaceutical or drug patent protection under the NAFTA.

We have found that Conservatives began to cave in even though public opinion was very strong in 1985-1986 against this kind of giveaway monopoly to pharmaceutical companies. However, Bill C-22 was introduced in 1986. The minister of consumer affairs in that Conservative government, I recall very clearly, denied there was any connection with the U.S.-Canada free trade deal that was being negotiated at the time. They deceived the public in this respect because documents now show that there certainly was a connection.

I recall the very strong tactics used by the drug companies at that time, the whole pharmaceutical movement, bribery tactics that continue to be used. They promised there would be extensive research and development based in Canada which would create many more jobs. They refused to advise that the monopoly would definitely restrict generic drugs from competing, which was what they wanted. They used certain kinds of blackmail tactics.

The blackmail tactic, I must say, was very evident in the committee hearings. I recall viewing the proceeding on TV when the B.C. minister of health was a witness. Soon after there was what seemed to me to be a threat that companies might not locate in B.C. if this kind of opposition continued.

Bill C-22 meant that the drug companies were given patent protection for 10 years. Under Bill C-91 this will be extended to 20 years. There is no question this in effect means the end of the generic drug industry for Canada.

In 1986 the Tory government tried to reassure people that things would be okay. It had set up this nice Patented Medicine Prices Review Board to monitor the prices. Price increases were to be kept at the cost of living, below inflation rates. Some 3,000 research jobs in pharmaceuticals were promised to us.

Despite these promises and the bribery we know that drug prices jumped immediately. In fact they were made retroactive before the bill was in place. They were eventually increased by 11.4 per cent, far beyond the rate of inflation at the time, and prices of new drugs have doubled.

The review board in effect had no power and the promised 300 new jobs resulted in about 700 jobs being lost in the manufacturing industry. There was no talk about this.

• (1350)

I go back in history because it is very important for viewers, for Canadian consumers, to realize we are not talking about something that might happen in the future. We have proof and evidence that there has been a deliberate monopoly and undermining of the whole medicare system in Canada.

However, Bill C-91 makes the situation far worse. It ends compulsory licensing for drugs completely in Canada. It prevents the generic drug manufacturing industry—it will be surprising if it is even in existence—for 20 years from using any of the drugs after patents expire. It is a complete giveaway of intellectual properties under the NAFTA. I will go back to that in a few minutes. In effect this is government capitulation to the drug companies and beyond the drug companies to the U.S. government which has been behind it all along.

There will be no real development of a Canadian research industry. We know that. The centre of the industry is in the host countries which in this case is the United States. We have no major research centre created in Canada as was projected.

Prices of drugs, as I have said, are now 12 per cent higher in Canada than in the United States where they are exorbitant. To avoid limits suggested by the review board, the companies are just going ahead and overpricing new drugs. Consumers are also being affected even though in some provinces their drugs are covered by medicare plans. Many drug plans are now having to de-list certain expensive drugs. We see user fees and so on coming in.

Provincial governments, with I believe the exception of Quebec, oppose Bill C-91. The provincial minister from B.C. said that pharmacare prices in B.C. were increasing at the rate of 15 per cent per year. This was over the last four or five years. At the same time grants from the federal government have been frozen. She is faced with actually taking dollars from the needed therapies to pay for drug costs. This will get worse.

Section 1709 of the NAFTA prohibits compulsory licensing. I have a document entitled "Pharmaceutical drug patent protection demanded under NAFTA" which shows that drug concessions have been tied to the trade deal. This is very serious. My colleague from Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca dealt with this very eloquently this morning.

It locks us into the NAFTA and takes away Canada's ability to control its own destiny. It means that since it is entrenched no succeeding government can change it. When NAFTA is implemented, as it will be if the Conservatives and the Liberals have their way, this will be something that cannot be changed.

Bill C-91 is not just a bill about exorbitant drug prices. It is actually an abrogation of Canada's autonomy. It is very serious for the future of medicare and for the future of our own economy and our own autonomy. I call on all Canadians to join us in demanding an end to this bill and an end to this government.

[Translation]

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): Mr. Speaker, since Bill C-91 was presented to the House, it was studied by a committee which heard many witnesses. The witnesses were experts in this field from all across Canada; some of them represented the health ministers of nine provinces, except Quebec. I will return to the subject of Quebec later.

We are faced with a bill that according to all experts will undoubtedly make drug prices go up. Comparing costs with those in the United States, we know that the average American pays 62 per cent more for pharmaceuticals than Canadians do. This is only an indication. Once we have to follow the multinationals' increases in lock step, we will certainly pay the same prices. If we rationalize the drug system, we will not be able to go on paying the same price as now when all the other countries that signed an agreement pay more.

Considering what we have heard so far, common sense tells us there seems to be a major problem with this bill, when 14 amendments presented by our colleague, the hon. member for Dartmouth, in Nova Scotia, are rejected. By the way, I applaud the hon. member's perseverance. It is uncommon to see the kind of defence that was conducted by the hon. member for Dartmouth, Three cheers.

In Quebec, the Department of Health did not bother to appear before the committee or submit a brief, let alone defend the bill, because it did not have a case, but we can assume the department hopes to see some spin-offs in R and D.

This is another myth that is going around. They want us to believe that R and D spin-offs will be extraordinary, but all we have to go by are statistics. There is no indication on the basis of past experience that this will happen. Fortunately, we were able to hear testimony by people in the industry, and they pointed out that our procedure did not make sense, since no amendments were accepted. The government insists that there will be price controls. How can we believe that, considering pressure from all parts of the United States, for instance, to give up our present policy on pharmaceutical products in Canada? They want us to give it up. There is a reason, obviously. We know the kind of prices they pay in the United States, and they want us to pay the same prices in this country.

We table amendments to protect us against abuse, but the amendments are turned down. How can you expect us to take this seriously or believe in the government's good faith when it will not accept amendments that would help and protect Canadians?

Could members on the government side explain why the government will not accept safeguards—in other words, amendments—that will protect us against abuse? New products coming on the market are very expensive, right from the start. Once the bill is passed, companies will be able to say after x number of months: "Look, there were no increases". Of course not. The increase was included when the product came on the market.

Despite all the figures quoted before the committee and all the testimony on this issue, they still insist that we are acting against the best interests of Canadians. I would ask my colleagues on the government side who represent ridings in Quebec how they expect to explain future increases in the cost of pharmaceutical products. They know perfectly well that many witnesses testified the cost of our health care system would soar as a result of increases in the price of drugs.

I wonder how they expect to explain that to the people of this country. I think this is one of the worst examples of the government's betrayal of Canadians, and I am referring to what it is doing about pharmaceutical products and Bill C-91. However, the devastating impact of these increases will only be felt over time.

Some of you may no longer be here. You will not have to stand up and defend these issues, but there is no doubt in my mind that the bill before the House today was literally dictated from the outside.

Before I finish, I have a brief submitted by the Fédération de l'âge d'or du Québec which I would like to table.

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry, but the hon. member's time has expired.

It being two o'clock p.m., the House will now proceed to Statements by Members, pursuant to Standing Order 31.

CANADA POST CORPORATION

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott-Russell): Mr. Speaker, the residents of Saint-Clément, Rivière-du-Loup, have taken over their post office, due to be closed on December 14. Why did the government let Canada Post get away with the kind of actions that have soured relations with the people it serves?

The residents of Saint-Clément, Rivière-du-Loup, and of Martintown—which happens to be in my riding—and residents of hundreds of other communities in Canada which have been affected by similar cutbacks, want the government to put an end to Canada Post's policy of closing down post offices.

Speaking on behalf of the residents of Saint-Clément, Glengarry—Prescott—Russell and other rural communities in this country, I demand that the government take steps to deal with this issue.

THE SENATE

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, today, the Journal de Montréal printed an article under the heading: "Clark believes abolition of the Senate possible". The article goes on to say: "Outright abolition of the Senate may be the next step in institutional reform, according to Joe Clark, Minister of Constitutional Affairs. For months before the Charlottetown Accord was concluded last August, there were frequent references to the possibility of abolishing the Senate. On some occasions, most people around the table preferred abolition but did not insist on it, realizing a compromise would have to be struck with those who were in favour of a Triple-E Senate".

As I said in the House on June 3, 1992: The Senate must be abolished.

PEARSON INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, the decision by the federal government to go ahead with the redevelopment of Pearson airport terminals 1 and 2 is a case of terminal madness.

Rather than make a meaningful investment in Canada's transportation infrastructure, the Minister of Transport is pushing a costly scheme that the airline industry neither wants nor can afford.

The Tories are pretending to create jobs with the Pearson project after they clearly failed to do so in the finance minister's economic statement last week. Any job creation resulting from this project is years away.

The Pearson terminal project is opposed by Canadian Airlines, Air Canada, by the government of Ontario and reportedly even by senior staff at Transport Canada.

The airline industry is in a critical condition right now. The last thing it needs is a project that will raise costs to the airlines and fares to the travelling public.

It is truly ironic that this government which claims to be the party of business is taking this position in the face of opposition from the marketplace itself.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Fernand Jourdenais (La Prairie): Mr. Speaker, a few weeks ago, sixth grade students from Jean-Leman School in Candiac, in my riding, came to visit Parliament and told me about their serious concerns about air pollution and the depletion of the ozone layer which protects our planet.

These young people begged me to ask Canadians and those responsible for protecting the quality of life on this earth to be more aware and more concerned about the serious consequences of what we may do unthinkingly, because if we are not careful, we will destroy our own future and that of subsequent generations.

We must remain vigilant in order to preserve and purify the air on our planet. That is the message these young people asked me to pass on to you, urging us to act to prevent heedless and irresponsible attacks on the environment which in the end will destroy our present way of life.

TRANS-LABRADOR HIGHWAY

Hon. William Rompkey (Labrador): Mr. Speaker, people in my riding are pleased to see the federal government finally demonstrating the will to fulfil the long-term goal of many Labradorians, the completion of the Trans-Labrador Highway.

In his budget statement of December 2, the Minister of Finance announced that his government would set aside certain funds for work on the Trans-Labrador Highway. At that time, he did not specify exactly how much money would be involved nor did he indicate when work would begin.

However, the people of Labrador hope that it will be a sufficient amount soon enough to make substantial progress on improving and extending the road system in Labrador. I trust that the minister will soon make a specific commitment both in terms of money and in terms of time.

With its enormous social and economic potential, Labradorians are anxious to see the completion of the Trans-Labrador Highway from Labrador west through to the straits.

I call upon the government to see the value of this project and commit itself to a budget and a timetable as soon as possible.

BILL C-333

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, private member's Bill C-333 will be debated in the House of Commons this week. This is a bill that fire-fighters and police officers want because it would establish uniform protocols for infectious diseases notification.

In the course of saving lives, police and fire-fighters are often exposed to individuals with infectious diseases. Notification about possible exposure to an infectious disease would allow emergency response personnel to obtain early treatment and reduce the possibility of further transmission.

Bill C-333 would ensure that the provinces establish these lines of communication while maintaining the confidentiality of the patient.

On behalf of the NDP caucus, I call on government members to support referral of this bill to the standing committee on health and welfare for study and recommendations.

Police and fire-fighters should be supported on a matter of such fundamental personal and public safety.

SMALL BUSINESS

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Mr. Speaker, last week, as a result of the determination, persistence and commitment of the Minister of State for Small Businesses, the government announced that the ceiling under the Small Businesses Loans Act would be increased to $250,000, that it would work to broaden the application of the act to include some forms of working capital, that the Small Business Financing Program would be extended to the end of 1994 and that it would expect Canada's banks to make a special effort to play a constructive role in ensuring the success of the program.

Now that is terrific news, but remember that the measures to assist small business which were announced in the February budget still have not been enacted into law. The minister tells me he hopes to pass enabling legislation at all stages this Friday.

It is time for all members of this House to show the same commitment as the minister to help small business. The actions of this House on Friday will speak much louder than any words.

HON. MEMBER FOR SKEENA

Mr. Jerry Pickard (Essex—Kent): Mr. Speaker, last week I was made aware of a visit to my riding by the hon. member for Skeena. Residents of Essex—Kent expect truth and honesty from MPs. The MP from Skeena failed to meet these standards. Instead, he offered his unfounded—

Mr. Speaker: Wait a minute. We have a past Speaker's ruling that statements by members are not to be used to make a personal attack on another member. I am sure the hon. member would understand that and perhaps revise his comments and use them at another time.

PEACEKEEPING

Mr. Girve Fretz (Erie): Mr. Speaker, I want to refer to Canada's commitment to peacekeeping.

Over the years Canada has dedicated itself to the principle of resolving disputes peacefully. Through the process of mediation and compromise Canada has repeatedly avoided armed conflict, not only between our country and others, but also between foreign nations.

More than 91,000 Canadians have served in peacekeeping missions since our first initiative during the India–Pakistan war in 1948. Today, with a population which represents a mere one-half of one per cent of the world's total population, Canada provides 10 per cent of the world's peacekeepers.

In the former Yugoslavia 19 Canadian peacekeepers have been injured and one has been killed. These numbers represent the sacrifices made by others over the last 50 years in the process of keeping the peace.

Nations around the world respect the example Canada has set for the peaceful resolution of disputes. Through their dedication to the ideals of peace and diplomacy, Canadian peacekeepers have brought integrity and honour to themselves, to our country and to the cause of peaceful international relations.

On behalf of all Canadians, I salute them.

CYPRUS

Hon. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): Mr. Speaker, Canada, through its government, will very soon announce its decision on whether or not it is renewing its commitment to the United Nations peacekeeping force in Cyprus.

Everyone recognizes the wonderful work done by our service people in the Canadian Armed Forces and I wish to thank the Chief of the Armed Forces, General de Chastelain, most sincerely and ask him kindly to pass these thanks on to his troops.

The troubling thing in this affair is that Canada may now end its participation after 28 years in Cyprus.

• (1410)

Why leave to other countries this obligation that all Canadians support with pride, especially at a time when very important developments are expected next March?

I wonder why they would announce ending our commitments there. Canada should instead renew its efforts with Turkey so that the Turkish authorities withdraw their tens of thousands of soldiers who occupy 40 per cent of the island of Cyprus and the Cypriot authorities negotiate the future status of Cyprus in good faith and understand that in the new world order that is mentioned so often, all United Nations Security Council resolutions must be respected.

INTERNATIONAL HUMAN RIGHTS DAY

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches—Woodbine): Mr. Speaker, Thursday, December 10 marks International Human Rights Day.

Some 10 or 12 years ago, the House of Commons set up a special committee to examine the status of disabled persons in Canada. That committee produced Obstacles report. It contained some 130 recommendations that all levels of governments could undertake to alleviate some of the crises that many disabled Canadians found themselves in.

Some 12 or 13 years later, the same committee has found that while governments seldom say the wrong thing, very often and more often than not, governments seldom do the right thing.

Therefore, disabled Canadians not only in Canada but internationally as well will find themselves continually at the low end of the income scale and with deprived access to services that most other Canadians and able-bodied persons have a right to.

It is time this came to an end. The way to do it is to celebrate International Human Rights Day with action.

THE BOYS OF ST. VINCENT

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton—Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, the decision by the Ontario Court of Appeal to ban the CBC's mini-series on sex abuse, The Boys of St. Vincent, was astonishingly stupid and a dangerous precedent toward censorship.

Moreover, the ban in Ontario and Montreal was ludicrous in this age of satellite technology. Anyone who saw it from British Columbia to Newfoundland has told those they know who wanted to see it what this fictionalized series was all about. My mother said from Vancouver: "You did not miss much". Newfoundland commentators in St. John's claimed reactions were supportive and positive.

I am speaking as a former and I hope soon to be born-again broadcast journalist. There is a very serious constitutional issue involved here. We are trying to balance free speech and freedom of the press on the one hand and the very sensitive legal aspects of this most sensitive case on the other.

I hope the matter is appealed to the Supreme Court and that the mini-series is aired everywhere.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Essex—Kent on a revised statement.

HON. MEMBER FOR SKEENA

Mr. Jerry Pickard (Essex—Kent): Mr. Speaker, last week I was made aware of a visit to my riding by the hon. member for Skeena.

At that time, he left unfounded and inaccurate information about my activities representing my constituents. These accusations were quite unethical and unfair.

In the past 12 months, I have undergone quadruple bypass surgery and recuperation. Since the end of June, the government has limited debate in this House. My recovery is now complete. I am proud to serve the residents of Essex—Kent here and everywhere at national, regional and local levels.

I appreciate literally the thousands of times I have had the opportunity to represent the people of my riding. I feel that I was attacked unfairly in my riding last week by the statements that I do not come to the House and speak enough. That was very unfair and very unfounded.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

PHARMACEUTICAL INDUSTRY

Mr. Jacques Tétreault (Laval-Centre): Mr. Speaker, next Monday, December 14, I am invited to attend, as the member of Parliament for Laval-Centre, a function at which the pharmaceutical company Marion Merrel Dow of Canada will announce a $9 million investment to expand its plant in Laval. The work is to be completed by May 1993.

In the letter of invitation, the director of the company, Jean-Paul Marsan, mentioned this: "Of course, the positive attitude of the Quebec government toward our company as well as the impending adoption of Bill C-91 by the Parliament of Canada is not unrelated to this decision".

The purpose of this bill, which enjoys unqualified support from the caucus of federal members from Laval-Rive Nord, is to have the Canadian patent protection legislation match that of our trade partners, while allowing better control on the price of both new and existing drugs.

Our government is committed to giving the Canadian pharmaceutical industry a good lead in terms of competitiveness and standards. Bill C-91 is a concrete expression of this commitment and is aimed at improving all sectors of our economy.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, yesterday in this House members opposite said that a Liberal government would increase spending and put in place job-creation programs, even if that increased the deficit.

This spend-more course of action is completely at odds with the finance minister's recent economic statement and his valiant attempt to hold federal spending down.

Which is the right approach? My constituents are in the process of returning a detailed survey on economic alternatives and early results are unequivocally clear. Citizens of Halton—Peel are stressing that deficit reduction should be Ottawa's number one priority, and that good jobs which last are not likely to be created until we get our House in order.

Further, my constituents are overwhelmingly in support of some mechanism to ensure Canada has a balanced budget and not more deficit spending.

In other words, the people I represent are saying clearly and loudly, no to the Liberal strategy of spend, spend, spend, and tax, tax, tax, and yes to the vision of the Minister of Finance of less government, lower taxes, and a less indebted future.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

SALMAN RUSHDIE

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister.

This morning I had the occasion to meet Salman Rushdie, an author who is under death sentence because he wrote a book that was not liked by the Government of Iran.

I would like to ask the Prime Minister if this government intends to raise this matter at the UN Commission on Human Rights and try to gather some support among countries of the G-7 and the Commonwealth so that this completely unfair situation and threat to freedom of writing around the world be stopped immediately.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I thank my hon. friend for what is a very important question.

At the time of the imposition of the penalty against Mr. Rushdie, Canada condemned it as a direct challenge to freedom of expression. I indicated publicly at the time, on behalf of the government and on behalf of all members of the House, that Canada cannot and will not back away from principles such as freedom of expression, especially not in the face of such threats.

We have continued to make representations in this case. In November, following the announcement of an increase in the reward for his murder, we raised his case with the Iranians once again. We maintain a very active dialogue with Iran on human rights to encourage a more moderate approach.

Last week we co-sponsored a resolution at the General Assembly expressing our concern on human rights violations in Iran. At each opportunity that is given to us, the Secretary of State for External Affairs or myself, raise this matter vigorously and effectively, we think, on behalf of all members of the House of Commons.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): I have a supplementary for the Prime Minister.

All political formations represented in the German Parliament have passed a resolution in which they agree to hold the government of Iran accountable for any attempt on Mr. Rushdie's life or that of any of the 12 000 people who have helped publish or distribute his book. Were something to happen to any of them, the German government would impose very severe economic sanctions against Iran.

• (1420)

I would like to ask the Prime Minister if the Canadian Parliament would be willing to adopt such a resolution as soon as possible.

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, this resolution passed in Germany was initiated by members of Parliament as opposed to the German government.

However, we, as Canadians, fully support several international actions by the United Nations and other international groups and multilateral organizations. It is always possible for members of the Canadian Parliament to initiate the same kind of thing.

[English]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the Prime Minister.

This morning I met with Mr. Rushdie and the group of Canadian authors who are extremely preoccupied by this problem. They think Canada could make another gesture and I would like to know if it would not be possible for the Prime Minister to make some time available today to receive these Canadian authors and Mr. Rushdie?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Secretary of State for External Affairs has already met on behalf of the government with Mr. Rushdie, who I understand conveyed publicly his gratitude to me on behalf of the government for the actions we have taken in his defence over the years.

The government has facilitated his trip here and is taking every precaution that we can on his behalf. As I say, the secretary of state had an excellent meeting with him this morning and hopefully there will be other occasions in the near future.

PEACEKEEPING

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

During the almost two months that the House will be in recess thousands of Canadian troops will be serving in very risky circumstances in Somalia, Bosnia and other peacekeeping missions around the world.

Given the many unanswered questions and many unanticipated circumstances that these troops will face, I think the minister would agree that Canadians would want Parliament to be in a position to monitor these operations and to make sure there is a clear accountability for any decisions taken.

I would ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs if she would commit to putting into place a regular system of reporting similar to that which was introduced during the gulf war so that reports can be received by a joint committee of the external affairs and defence committees of this House. In this way any decisions, any changes, will be clearly reported to the Canadian people and Parliament will exercise its proper function of being responsible for the troops in these situations.

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, one of the things I find really interesting about this request for a democratic process in this House is that in all the months I have been making public statements concerning the situation in Somalia, the first question asked by a member of the opposition was last week. It seems to me that if there was parliamentary interest, there was certainly means of raising this earlier.

Having said that, let me say we have spoken to the military and there will be public briefings on the situation with our troops. There will be briefings on the situation once it is determined when our troops are to be deployed and throughout that process.

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the same minister and I remind her that this House was closed most of the time since last June so this is no time for sarcasm.

Yesterday the Secretary of State for External Affairs indicated that a decision is imminent concerning Canada's future peacekeeping role in Cyprus. Today media reports are rife with announcements that Canada will pull out half of our forces by next March and the remaining troops by December 1993.

Is the minister prepared to settle this question of Cyprus with proper debate in the House of Commons or must Canadians consult Newsworld as our forum for foreign policy?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, clearly it is the responsibility of the government to take these decisions on the advice of the military and on where Canada can most effectively deploy its military, whether it is through peacemaking or peacekeeping.

I am sure that the hon. member will be glad to know that his curiosity will be satisfied some time this week. We will say publicly what is our intention in Cyprus.

Hon. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. The hon. minister has opened new territory when she said we will ask for political advice from the military.

It is not for the military to decide whether or not we stay in Cyprus. It is a political decision. We would like to be consulted in that kind of political decision. It is our belief that we should not withdraw at this time.

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I very much appreciate the advice of the hon. member. It is a government responsibility to take that decision. He is right. It is a political decision which we take after consultation and upon discussion with our military people who advise us on the most effective use of our peacekeeping force. Then we, as a government, take a political decision.

FISHERIES

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, fishers, shore workers, and tenders will suffer hardship this winter because of the lack of fishing and work opportunities. The United Fishers and Allied Workers Union has pleaded for the reinstatement of the variable entrance program so these workers could collect unemployment insurance.

The Minister of Fisheries and Oceans has written to me and said he and the Minister of Employment and Immigration decided not to top up UI for the west coast fishers.

I would like to ask the minister if he could tell this House how he expects these workers to survive this winter.

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, I answered this question in the House a week or 10 days ago. The emergency response program is used to respond to catch failures. There have not been, thank heaven, any catch failures on the west coast of Canada this year. Therefore it is not appropriate to bring in the emergency response program.

Unfortunately you have to work for 17 weeks to be eligible for unemployment insurance benefits in the lower mainland of British Columbia. It is unfortunate in one sense, but it shows that there is a lower rate of unemployment in that area than in most other areas. That is the problem.

I would remind the hon. member that there was a strike during the summer which had some effect on the situation, as well with respect to time spent in fish processing.

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, it is important for this minister to understand that when fish fail to appear and those depending upon the availability of those fish can no longer work, that is catch failure.

I would like to know why three years ago we had the variable entrance program for the same industry, that I guess did not have a catch failure then either.

I would like to ask the minister this. As a result of the Pearse-Larkin report yesterday, which clearly spelled out government mismanagement of the west coast fishery, the government still refuses to assist those workers who are victims of that incompetence. Does the minister not believe he has an obligation to those workers displaced by that mismanagement and will he urge the minister of employment to put in a variable entrance program for those workers?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Madam Speaker, if the hon. member could tell where the fishery failure was in British Columbia this year, I would appreciate knowing it. As a matter of fact, at this low year in the salmon cycle, there was the best salmon fishery, the second highest number of salmon return in 80 years at this particular period of the four-year cycle. There has been no fishery failure in British Columbia.

Therefore, it is not appropriate to apply this particular program because the circumstances for its application are not there.

Ms. Langan: People have no jobs.

Mr. Crosbie: Interjections from the hon. member will not change that situation. The fish came back. The fish were there.

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the same minister. It relates to other questions of mismanagement in his department.

I have obtained a May 1991 memo from legal counsel in the minister's department from the west coast commenting on an RCMP investigation into his department regarding the controversial Kemano project in northern B.C. The memo raises questions about the department, the RCMP inquiry, its purpose and the manner in which it began.

• (1430)

Will the minister tell the House the nature of the RCMP investigation on the Alcan project in his department? When will Parliament have a report on this matter and when will he clean up the mess in his department?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, these are ferocious questions the hon. member is asking.

In the first place I can tell the hon. gentleman that I cannot report to him on any investigation that the RCMP may or may not have conducted. That would be within the purview of the Solicitor General and it is not his custom to report to the House of Commons or to the public on what the RCMP reports to him after it has instituted an investigation.

The hon. gentleman has some kind of fetish about the Kemano project. There is no peculiar set of circumstances under way in connection with that project. There was an agreement entered into after very careful consideration of all conservation aspects that related to it, and that agreement is in effect now.

PEARSON INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport who yesterday in announcing that the government was proceeding with terminal redevelopment at Pearson airport said that he wanted assurances "that changing financial realities are addressed fully before any construction begins".

The minister knows that the airline industry is in a state of turmoil. Why did the government not show some progress on the problem of overcapacity in that industry before contributing to the problem by creating additional capacity at Pearson airport?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, do I understand from the hon. member that his party has been asking the government for a number of weeks to invest an unspecified amount of money in unspecified infrastructure work?

We now have two proposers who have accepted to invest their own money in a defined, very useful and very important infrastructure of this country. It seems that this does not satisfy the member on the opposite side.

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, what I am not satisfied about is whether this government has any idea of what to do with the airline industry given its performance over past weeks.

Yesterday the minister in his announcement downgraded his estimate for capacity needs at Pearson by two to three years. We also know that his announcement comes on the heels of the Auditor General talking about revenues bleeding at terminal 3. This announcement had more to do with political posturing than with the needs of building the economy.

Air Canada said that the winning bidder would not be given the go-ahead until an agreement was reached on the air carriers' rent. Is that true? Will the minister tell us who is going to make that decision on the appropriate rent?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member and other so-called experts were predicting when we issued the RFP that nobody would present proposals for this undertaking. Now we have two very serious proposals from very serious firms.

We did not hide anything. When we issued the request for proposals we said that investment decisions would be complicated by uncertainties in traffic patterns and growth rates, composition of the airline industry, and the air side capacity at the airport. We told the eventual proponents that this would present all kinds of challenges.

These people have responded in kind to this request for proposals. It seems the private sector has more faith in the future of this country than the Liberal Party.

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister for International Trade.

The minister stated that Paxport Inc. was selected to receive the $750 million contract to renovate and manage terminals 1 and 2 at Pearson based on merit. It had nothing to do with the fact that Paxport founder Don Matthews is a close friend of the party and was co-chairman of the Prime Minister's leadership campaign in 1983.

Will the minister table in this House all the tenders to the contract today?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I would invite the hon. member to repeat outside the House of Commons any allegations of wrongdoing in this.

We have put together an evaluation process that has never been seen anywhere in the world. We have constituted five separate committees to examine the proponents' qualifications, the management and operations, the transfer plan, the development plan and the business plan.

Each of these committees worked in isolation and then reported its findings to the proposal evaluation committee. This was supervised by Price Waterhouse and then a process auditor from the private sector examined all of this. There were almost 80 persons involved in this evaluation process. Two-thirds were senior officers in the government and one-third was from the private sector.

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, for the people who are watching at home, from the minister's own press release it says:

> The evaluation was carried out by—private sector financial, technical and business authorities.

What authorities? It continues:

> The method and criteria of evaluation were themselves audited by an outside, independent expert.

Who is the expert? If we listen carefully we can hear the election clock ticking on this one.

With the minister's unwillingness to let the facts speak for themselves, will he now admit that the $750 million contract is intended as a job creation program as he states, or is this a last ditch effort to repay supporters of the Prime Minister and the Conservative Party of Canada?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, quite frankly I am astonished that my hon. friend would talk that way about Don Matthews who is the father-in-law of former Liberal Premier David Peterson.

SALMAN RUSHDIE

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

Today British author Salman Rushdie, in Ottawa with representatives of International Pen, called upon Canada and other nations to end their silence on the terrorism of the Government of Iran and urged Canada to call for the lifting of the fatwah on his life. Salman Rushdie also asked to meet with the Prime Minister of Canada.

Why will the Prime Minister not agree to meet with Salman Rushdie, as the premier of Ontario did last night, in an act of solidarity and support for this courageous author and to stand up for the fundamental principle of freedom of expression for all authors? Why is the Prime Minister refusing to meet with Salman Rushdie?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, whereas there were some preliminary inquiries made about various visits, the important point about this is twofold.

First, Salman Rushdie was welcomed to Canada by myself. He said this morning that there were very few foreign ministers in the world who have chosen to meet with him. He also expressed his thanks to myself, to the Prime Minister and to the government for that.

Mr. McLean: And to the committee.

Mrs. McDougall: And to the committee as well. To put the question that way is unfortunate, given our willingness and the forthcoming nature of our response to his situation right from the time it first developed in 1989.

We will continue to speak publicly about the human rights violations in Iran, about the importance of Salman Rushdie and his position as a symbol for the freedom of expression in the world. We will pursue it in any number of forums in which we find ourselves in the future as we have up until now.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, my question was for the Prime Minister. I think Canadians are asking why a Prime Minister who has time to meet with Chief Buthelezi will not meet with Rigoberta Menchu or Salman Rushdie? I think that is a fair question to ask the Prime Minister.

My supplementary question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. The secretary of state indicated that Canada will speak out at any opportunity.

• (1440)

When we had an opportunity last week at the United Nations during the speech on human rights in Iran by Canadian Ambassador Louise Frechette, why did the Canadian Ambassador not say one word about the lifting of the fatwah on Salman Rushdie?

Why is our government continuing to offer a $1 billion line of credit to Iran, to a terrorist government which allows a fatwah on a British author? Why will this government not break the silence at the United Nations and suspend that line of credit?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is way out of line. This government in terms of its support for Mr. Rushdie and for human rights in Iran has been in the forefront. I am really sorry the hon. member is not prepared to commend the government for the kind of work it has been doing in this area.

Let me say as well that in terms of the line of credit our sales to Iran are very limited. Our sales to Iran consist largely of wheat and other agricultural products. We always very carefully monitor the kinds of sales we make to countries where there are human rights violations, particularly in the arms area and particularly in areas that are sensitive and important for Canadians.

SEXUAL HARASSMENT

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister of employment.

The majority of the so-called voluntary quitters, according to UIC's own statistics, are low income, non-unionized women who are the most vulnerable to sexual harassment. Will the minister at the very least admit this and establish today clear guidelines for his government on sexual harassment?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the unemployment insurance program is not for people who choose unemployment for no just cause.

Those who have a just cause have the full protection of section 28 of the Immigration Act. It would be unfair to the hard working Canadians who paid premiums into the UI fund if it paid benefits to a person who chose to leave his or her job without just cause. Canadians support this.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, what is unfair and what is scandalous is that this minister does not understand the extent of the sexual harassment problem. There is no effective policy on sexual harassment in his department or in any other government department.

Why will this minister not establish with clarity, with consistency and with some time sensitivity, a workable, rationale sexual harassment policy? It is time.

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has the gall to stand and try to teach this government about giving protection to sexually harassed women.

This is the government that introduced in section 28 protection for sexually harassed women. Bill C-21 was opposed by the Liberal Party.

WESTRAY MINE

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the minister of state for small businesses who told the House two weeks after the Westray disaster: "The federal government's role was a very limited one".

Now we know that the federal government was into this one up to its ears. Within two days of that terrible tragedy, the government had set up a task force and has since spent $300,000 to put its spin on the issue.

Why the need for the spin doctors? Why the stonewalling on this one?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, if this government had not assembled all the documents, produced all the information as the hon. member's party asked us to do, he would be criticizing us.

We did that. It cost us something less than $300,000 because we used a number of public servants who would have been paid anyway to do it, in order to get full disclosure to this House and to the hon. member.

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is for the Prime Minister who will know that contrary to what the minister just implied, the government has budgeted $400,000 to the end of this fiscal year to deal with the Westray fallout.

Contracts have been let, including one to find loopholes in the Access to Information Act. I ask the Prime Minister: Will he now agree that only a federal inquiry can get to the bottom of this sorry mess? Why does he not admit that while 26 grieving families have been groping for the truth on this one, the government has been spending, blowing taxpayers' money to see that they never get that truth?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, just the opposite is the case. In fact, this government has responded to countless questions already. We have produced thousands of pages of documents and responded fully to the access to information requests as well as to the provisions under the Secrecy Act.

What happened is that the government set aside $398,000 for the expense of doing this and it turned out that we did not have to spend that much.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance has been asking for ideas on how to help restore health to Canada's economy and get people back to work. The Liberal leader has stated publicly and in this House that the government should spend billions of dollars on job creation programs even if it inflates the deficit.

Can the minister tell my constituents why he has chosen to ignore that option and pursue the kind of policies that were in his economic statement last Wednesday?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member's question gives me an opportunity to advise him and other members of the House of the broad based support which the economic plan is generating from Labrador to the Yukon territory.

I think all members would be encouraged by a further reduction in interest rates today.

An hon. member: That is a bit of a comical act.

Mr. Mazankowski: A 51 basis point reduction in interest rates is not an act of comedy, nor the act of a comedian. It is real.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mazankowski: I would say that is a reflection of sound policy.

The hon. member refers to the infrastructure program that is advanced by my friend opposite. The Leader of the Opposition talks about spending $15 billion on infrastructure but he does not tell Canadians how he would fund it.

He says: "We will put up $5 billion, the provinces will put up $5 billion and the municipalities will put up $5 billion". They have deficit and fiscal problems as well, just like the federal government. It is almost being irresponsible to suggest something or to recommend something without saying how you are going to pay for it.

TRANSPORTATION

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

In last week's financial statement, he referred to a cut of $73 million to transportation expenditures. Since this is 10 per cent of last year's budgeted Crow benefit of $729 million, will he affirm clearly that this is where the cut will come. Will it come from that so-called Crow benefit?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the economic plan put forward by the Minister of Finance last week is a plan to protect Canadians from the difficult times that we have and to protect agriculture.

It is difficult when you enter into reductions. Yes, I can confirm that the reductions that the hon. member talked about on WGTA, those payments that go forward and have from the past the same as the other subsidies and the other grants and contributions in agriculture and throughout government, will be reduced by 10 per cent.

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, since this will have the effect of reducing incomes of farmers, does this mean that the minister will be looking at these actions as triggering a third line of defence, since the policies have now changed and farm incomes will be reduced by a similar amount?

Is he content to continue with the current policies which permit a declining coverage under GRIP and NISA each year?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member concluded his question by referring to GRIP and NISA. The income safety nets that have been established jointly with the producers, with the provincial governments and the federal government remain. The hon. member talks about declining income. I would like the hon. member to take note that for 1992 the total program payments in the province of Saskatchewan are expected to be from $1.3 billion to $1.6 billion. I want the hon. member to understand that over 70 per cent of that comes from federal programs.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Bill Attewell (Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. I feel too many people with criminal records enter Canada before we discover their sordid past. Robert Blackwood, an alleged drug gang leader who was thrown out of the U.S. and Great Britain, is one example. He was finally ordered deported from Canada for criminal activities. His expensive two-year appeal process cost Canadian taxpayers well over $100,000.

What measures will the minister take to ensure that criminals who enter Canada illegally are deported quickly to protect society and to minimize costs to taxpayers?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member raises a very important question that concerns many Canadians. That is why the measures in Bill C-86, an act to amend the Immigration Act, go a long way toward protecting Canadian society against individuals whose admission would be contrary to the best interests of Canada or any community in Canada.

The amendments to the act will go a long way to deal with the problem of admissibility. Those provisions have been expanded to better protect Canadians. Thanks to his caucus colleagues and to the other place, that should become law in the next two days, I hope—unfortunately without the support of the Liberal Party.

WESTERN GRAIN TRANSPORTATION ACT

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture.

Western farmers felt betrayed by the minister when he slashed the Western Grain Transportation Act by some $73 million for next year alone. This will increase their shipping costs by over 20 per cent.

Why is the government slashing this statutory program which has a direct impact on farm income? Why is he doing this at a time when many farmers have had poor crops and are already facing a bleak cold winter? Why?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member was here when the Minister of Finance presented his economic plan. That economic plan called for reductions in expenditures of the Government of Canada over the period of that plan of some $8-plus billions. Agriculture and other sectors of Canadian society are making a contribution to the stability of this country. The hon. member knows that when you look at the debt held by agriculture of over $20 billion, at least when you reduce the interest costs to agriculture you save producers over $100 million. Every 1 per cent reduction in the interest rate saves $100 million.

Yes, it was difficult. Grants and contributions, not only from the Department of Agriculture, but other departments have been reduced by 10 per cent, in a deficit reduction of some $8 billion.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, western farmers feel not only betrayed but devastated. Charlie Swanson, the president of the Manitoba Wheat Pool, described the cuts as "devastating news for prairie grain farmers".

In view of the terrible impact that this is going to have on these producers—this is a statutory program, the minister cannot change it without changing the legislation—will he rescind this decision right now and show some consideration for the desperate situation that many producers are facing this fall and coming winter?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I think in my reply to my colleague's first question I outlined the necessity.

No. The Department of Agriculture is making a contribution to the stability of this country for the benefit of every citizen, including farmers. The hon. member will know that the safety nets of GRIP and NISA, the cash flow enhancement, cash advance, all have been maintained for the benefit of agriculture.

The hon. member also recognizes that interest costs for the producers are very high. By lowering interest rates by the action taken by the Minister of Finance and this government, we are benefiting producers in their day-to-day operations and their interest costs. It is a benefit for farmers as it is a benefit to all Canadians to have a sound, stable, economic plan in place.

Mr. Speaker: We must move on.

EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Gilbert Parent (Welland—St. Catharines—Thorold): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the right hon. Prime Minister. It is a question I had hoped never to have to put in this House. The Prime Minister will be aware that in the last few days another 800 men and women have been laid off from General Motors in St. Catharines and the area. This is a total of over 5,000 people who have been laid off.

I was wondering what specific action his government is prepared to take to alleviate the circumstances for our men and women who, after all, live in the heartland of industrial Canada.

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member indeed points to a situation that is tough for the people in that community. That is why under the current programming of employment and immigration, officials of the department have been in touch with the company in question, the union and the workers in order to put in place the adjustment measures that are contained in the programming of the Canadian Jobs Strategy.

Every effort will be devoted by the department to work in co-operation with the owner, the union and the workers in order to try to have in place these adjustment measures in order to help those people.

Mr. Gilbert Parent (Welland—St. Catharines—Thorold): Mr. Speaker, I thank the minister for the information.

A statement was made by the premier of Ontario that he will do everything that he can. I was wondering if the minister would give his undertaking today that his officials will be working with the provincial officials as well as the union members in order to try to rectify the situation as soon as we possibly can.

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I have no hesitation whatsoever in extending the full co-operation of my department to the ministry of labour of Ontario.

It is important indeed that all stakeholders work together in trying to address the problem caused by that decision. Again I can assure the hon. member of our co-operation in that regard.

NEW BRUNSWICK YOUTH STRATEGY

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of State for Youth.

There has been a very successful program called the New Brunswick Youth Strategy in place for five years now on an experimental basis. That program has had a federal-provincial contribution of $120 million.

I would like to ask the minister if a comprehensive and definitive report has yet been prepared on the results of that pilot program and whether or not the program will be continued in New Brunswick in the coming year and extended to other provinces.

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Minister of State (Youth) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I would like to inform the hon. member, as he probably already knows, that a definite report has not been submitted yet. There is an interim report that is being looked at right now. Decisions will be made accordingly in the near future.

PUBLIC WORKS

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Public Works.

In view of the controversy and dubious value of the P.E.I. fixed link and the Lester Pearson International Airport upgrade, both announced yesterday, will the minister advise the House if these projects are merely political pump-priming or if they fulfil a national need.

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, obviously they fulfil a national need.

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants): Mr. Speaker, I have a short supplementary.

I thank the minister for his short answer but at this time of frugality, freeze, and financial cut and slice, does the minister believe these projects send the proper signal to a hard-pressed and sceptical public and can he guarantee that the taxpayer will not pick up any part of the tab in any way?

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I am surprised that the hon. member opposite, who is an experienced member of this House., does not realize that this is not only an investment in Canada's future, but it is largely private money.

• (1500)

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Public Works. The minister will know that he has promised up to $40.5 million a year in annual subsidies for the private operator of the fixed link.

Could he explain to the taxpayers of Canada how that equates to the current $22 million a year subsidy that provides 600 permanent jobs for ferry workers between P.E.I. and the mainland? Can he explain his mathematics to taxpayers?

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, what my colleague opposite is conveniently ignoring is that there are many expenses other than just the subsidy to Marine Atlantic such as for example the replacement of these very expensive vessels which will have to be done in the next few years.

CANADA POST CORPORATION

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister responsible for Canada Post. The minister is aware that residents of Saint-Clément de Rimouski have barricaded themselves, taking over their post office, which could be closed as of December 14, 1992.

Is the minister prepared to announce today that he is giving up any attempt to close the post office in Saint-Clément de Rimouski?

[English]

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, when Canada Post was made a Crown corporation in 1981 there was unanimous agreement on all sides of the House that it should operate at arm's length without political interference. We have been operating in that fashion with great success for the last six years.

With respect to the conversion of post office run outlets to private sector outlets, post-change surveys show that the customers are pleased to the tune of 90 per cent. I think with that kind of approval reading even the hon. member would agree it is a good policy.

Mr. Speaker: I have a question of privilege, the hon. member for Parkdale—High Park.

PRIVILEGE

CANADA POST

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 48(2), I wish to raise a question of privilege arising from an incident which occurred during the October 26, 1992 referendum.

Failing to resolve the issue with Canada Post, I feel I have no recourse but to raise the matter in the House of Commons, since my duties to serve my constituents as a member of Parliament have been seriously hampered.

This is the first opportunity that I have had to raise this question in the House.

I issued a special flyer on the referendum which was delivered to Canada Post, L/C Depot No. 3, 772 Dovercourt Road, Toronto, Ontario, on October 20, 1992.

Of the 20,837 flyers delivered to the above depot, 9,072 were delivered and 11,765 were held back. Someone at Canada Post made the decision that these flyers should not be delivered. This was confirmed by Mr. McBean, LIC supervisor.

My constituents still had six days in which to obtain information about the referendum prior to polling day.

I sent to you, Mr. Speaker, a copy of the flyer and pertinent information which I will not repeat here.

Point of Order

My question of privilege is: What right did a Canada Post employee have to make the decision as to whether or not my flyers should have been delivered? As indicated, I have been unable to obtain a satisfactory response from Canada Post regarding who made this erroneous decision, why it was made and what action has been taken to ensure that such an incident does not recur since this action did seriously hamper my ability to service my constituents properly.

If you deem that I do have a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I will make the appropriate motion.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, first I have to indicate that I have not had any prior information from the hon. member with respect to this matter. Therefore, I cannot respond in detail and I would certainly welcome the opportunity to look into the matter before giving that response.

I should indicate a couple of things. The Board of Internal Economy, in co-operation with the post office, with respect to the referendum campaign did indicate to all members that there were certain time constraints. Any brochures to be delivered had to be in the hands of the post office so many days in advance of expected delivery because of the fact that under the labour contracts there is a limit as to how much each letter carrier can take with him or her at any particular time and it takes time to put them out.

Bear in mind there are possible rational explanations that do not, as the hon. member suggests, deal with the notion that somebody at the post office deliberately tried to obstruct the hon. member. That is an accusation I find hard to believe. I certainly want to have an opportunity to look into it before accepting the facts the hon. member alleges.

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, I use the same question of privilege raised by my colleague from Parkdale—High Park who mentioned to me at the close of Question Period his intention to rise on a question of privilege.

I am not sure about the circumstances in my riding. I wish to simply let the House leader and the Chair know that when looking into that matter I also had approximately 5,000 flyers that were not delivered during the referendum campaign.

It may have been a case of the system being overwhelmed or a situation perhaps where something was overlooked. One would hope so but I simply wish to provide that information to the Chair. We looked into the situation and we are not sure what the answer was. There were 5,000 flyers which were not delivered to a number of public forums held in the riding.

I also believe that that service is a very important one to our citizens. Perhaps it should be looked into so that we can avoid these mishaps in the future.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Parkdale—High Park and the hon. member for York West have advised the House of a certain situation in Canada Post.

The hon. government House leader has indicated he would like a chance to consider the matter further. For now I am going to leave it at that and I am sure the hon. government House leader will get back to the Chair if that is appropriate. I do not think I should make any further comment until I hear a little more.

STATUTORY ORDER—SPECIAL ECONOMIC MEASURES ACT

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, earlier this day I asked guidance of the Chair with regard to the statutory order, consideration of a motion made pursuant to subsection 7(2) of the Special Economic Measures Act.

At that time, the parliamentary secretary made an intervention to the effect that he believed it to be ultra vires. We did have some discussions thereafter but there was no clear understanding of his viewpoint from my perspective or vice versa.

I wish to seek the guidance of the Chair as to the procedural acceptability of the statutory order. The parliamentary secretary was not arguing procedure. In my view he was arguing a position in law concerning the constitutionality of the issue at question.

I suggest and respectfully submit to the Chair it is not the role of the Chair to decide on the constitutionality or the substance of the particular matter. All that the Chair must do pursuant to the Standing Orders is to look at the procedural aspects.

Very briefly section 7 of the act in question provides that when regulations are tabled 50 MPs may sign a notice calling for revocation or of amendment to the regulations and for the timely debate and disposal of such a motion.

I suggest that all the Speaker may rule on is whether such notice has been properly prepared and received and therefore must be disposed of by the House according to the law.

In terms of the procedural aspects I think the Chair would have to take into consideration whether the regulations were properly tabled, whether the notice was properly given and how the House must proceed for lawful disposal of the matter.

If in fact the procedure is correct I do not believe the Chair is in a position in accordance with my understanding of the Standing Orders to rule on the substance of the motion in question.

What the parliamentary secretary has alluded to is that the motion itself is ultra vires, meaning unconstitutional. I suggest that very argument goes to the substance and not to the procedural acceptance. I would hope the Chair could make a quick ruling on this as time is running out as Parliament is to close on December 11.

Mr. Speaker: This matter was raised earlier today and the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond has put his position clearly. It may or may not be the wish of the parliamentary secretary to follow the matter further but I will certainly hear him.

• (1510)

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, it is true that I did have a discussion with the hon. opposition House leader after he raised this point earlier today and there was no meeting of the minds.

As I pointed out in my comments this morning, the Liberal amendment to the regulations tabled on September 18 of this year under the provision of the Special Economic Measures Act is clearly beyond the scope intended by the bill.

The Liberal amendment deals with section 4 of the act which authorizes the government to make very specific regulations dealing with relations between Canada and a sanctioned state. It does not give the government authority to commit Canada to a particular position on matters of foreign policy concerning third party states.

The Liberal amendment is not within the scope of this authorizing power and is ultra vires of the bill.

The wording of the Liberal amendment has no relevance to the regulations that were tabled. Instead, the opposition has used this provision in the act, I submit to you Sir with respect, as a vehicle for partisan, not legitimate, purposes.

I recognize, Mr. Speaker, that it is not your role to decide on legal matters. However, I would submit that by allowing the debate on the Liberal amendment to proceed, you are implicitly giving a legal opinion that the amendment falls within the scope of the act. This is a patently obvious dilatory tactic which has put you in an untenable position.

I would ask the opposition to do the responsible thing and remove the Chair from this legal quandary by withdrawing this illegal amendment.

SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: I thank both the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond and the hon. parliamentary secretary.

I am going to remove the Chair from the position in which the Chair finds itself by reminding hon. members that the Speaker has traditionally never been granted the authority to rule on whether or not a bill introduced into the House of Commons or an amendment introduced into the House of Commons is ultra vires. That is a matter for the courts. As a consequence, I must stay with that position.

I listened carefully to the hon. parliamentary secretary who I think with some ingenuity was suggesting that if I ruled otherwise I was implicitly supporting an amendment which might or might not be ultra vires. I certainly respect the hon. parliamentary secretary's ingenuity in putting it that way.

However, I think I must remain with the long tradition which has been supported by many rulings that it is not the place of the Chair to rule on whether or not a bill or as I said earlier, an amendment to a bill, is ultra vires or otherwise.

I would point out that if I were to rule otherwise we could be in the position where any bill that the government introduces could be challenged by the opposition or by members of the government as to whether or not it is ultra vires and that would put the Speaker really in the position of the court and beyond the jurisdiction that was ever envisaged for the Speaker.

The consequence of that is that we are in a position where a motion has been filed. We are bound by a statute which says: "Where a motion for the consideration of a House of Parliament is filed in accordance with subsection 2, that House"—in this case that is this House—"shall not later than the sixth sitting day of that House following the filing of the motion take up and consider the motion unless a motion of the like effect has earlier been taken up and is being considered in the other House", which is not the case.

That is the position we are in. It is up to the House to decide what it is going to do between now and the expiry of the six days which is mentioned in the bill. We are, of course, bound by that.

I think that is the best I can do to assist the House at this time on this matter.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I hesitate to draw this to the attention of my hon. friend the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader, but in his commentary on the appropriateness of this action I think his remarks will show that he very clearly was impugning motive by my hon. friend in terms of what was motivating his initiative.

I wonder if it would not be the appropriate thing for him to withdraw those remarks in the good order that he normally conducts himself.

Mr. Speaker: The parliamentary secretary might want to rise and assist the House. It is a pretty fine line, but I will hear the hon. parliamentary secretary.

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I did not hear the Official Opposition taking umbrage at this, but I know that my friend from Kamloops is totally vigilant about the decorum, the manners and the proprieties of this place to a point of punctiliousness.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Edwards: If my hon. friend from Cape Breton—East Richmond felt that I impugned any motive, I certainly want to withdraw any such stigma and any such shadow from the House. I think that I will leave it at that and let the rest of my remarks stand on the record.

Mr. Speaker: Just for the record, I want to point out that under the circumstances, the use of the word punctilious by the parliamentary secretary is of course from a point of view of literacy. It is astonishing but it is in order.

SPECIAL DEBATE

SOMALIA

The House resumed, from December 7, 1992, consideration of the motion of Mrs. McDougall (St. Paul's) (p. 14771), and on the amendment of Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre) (p. 14778).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): It being 3 p.m., in connection with item No. 14 under Government Business on today's order paper and pursuant to order adopted Monday, December 7, 1992, the House will now proceed with the deferred division on the amendment of Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre). The question on the main motion, standing in the name of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, will be put immediately afterward.

Call in the members.

CUSTOMS TARIFF

Hon. Pierre Blais (for Minister of State for Finance and Privatization) moved that a Ways and Means motion to amend the Customs Tariff, the Excise Act, the Excise Tax Act, the Customs Act, the Criminal Code and a related act, laid upon the table Thursday, December 3, 1992, be concurred in.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: On division.

The House resumed consideration of Bill C-91, an act to amend the Patent Act, to amend another act in consequence thereof and to provide for other related matters, as reported with an amendment by a legislative committee, and of Motions Nos. 1 and 2.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): When the debate was suspended at two o'clock, we were considering Motions Nos. 1 and 2. The hon. member for Gatineau—La Lièvre had the floor and he has up to three minutes left.

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): Mr. Speaker, when I was interrupted before the vote, I had asked for permission to table briefs from the Quebec federation of golden age clubs in the House. Do I have unanimous consent to table them?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Does the House agree to let the hon. member present his motion for tabling?

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): There is not unanimous consent. I again give the floor to the hon. member.

Mr. Assad: Mr. Speaker, they were simply statements from the Quebec federation of golden age clubs on Bill C-91. There was nothing radical in them. They just summarized the situation. Anyway, this shows the government's completely negative attitude.

With the little time remaining to me, I would ask organizations like the Quebec consumers' association and the Quebec association of golden age clubs to be vigilant in the coming months.

After the testimonies heard in committee, we are convinced that Canadians will have to pay very high prices for pharmaceutical products. Therefore, it is in the interest of the various associations to check the increases, because in a few months, as you know, there will be an uproar when they find out about the jump in prices. It is important that they keep track of these increases. They will have confirmation that the testimonies heard in committee were true and very justified.

In concluding, I hope that these organizations, throughout Quebec and Canada, will be very vigilant. In a little while, the situation could be very different in this House and we will then have an opportunity to correct the flaws contained in Bill C-91.

[English]

Mr. Bill Attewell (Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville): Mr. Speaker, earlier today the member for Ontario who chaired the legislative committee on Bill C-91 stated that he was approached by some members who wanted to appear before the committee. I was one of the members who wanted to appear. However, because of the extended gridlock discussions by the opposition members of Parliament and other witnesses we were precluded from the opportunity to appear.

One of the main points I want to make today is that although I agree with the main thrust of Bill C-91, I do believe we have been too harsh on the generic drug firms, particularly in so far as the retroactivity conditions are concerned.

As I said, I agree with the thrust of Bill C-91. We are doing it for a number of reasons such as more investments, more jobs, more research and we do have to get on with it now. There is some $500 million at stake for new investment opportunities. I do want to say that the track record of the international companies has been favourable. We can look back to Bill C-22 with some great success, particularly on price controls where the average increase was 2.9 per cent a year, well below the CPI of 4.4 per cent.

Next, the cost issue must be kept in perspective. Of drugs consumed in Canada, 80 per cent are not affected by Bill C-91. Bill C-91 affects three per cent of the total health care costs in Canada.

Another aspect of this is how some seniors have been concerned about this through some of the information they have received. I want to state that seniors are covered by drug plans in all provinces. Under current provincial plans at least 71 per cent of seniors will not pay one penny more as a result of Bill C-91. Of the remaining 29 per cent, three quarters or more of their drug bill is covered by the provincial plans. More research will bring better medicine, enabling Canadians to live healthier and longer lives.

Another issue of concern, and again I think there has been some misinformation out there, is Mexico and the NAFTA. The claims made by the opposition that in NAFTA Mexico gets an eight-year delay in having to comply with drug patent protection requirements are completely erroneous. The NAFTA contains the same provisions and time frame as the GATT-Dunkel text and applies to all three NAFTA parties on the same basis.

I would like to briefly outline some of the amendments I have put forth and they concern the exception regarding regulatory approval of exports. On clause 4, the purpose of that amendment of mine is to ensure that patent monopolies are not extended beyond 20 years from the time a patent is filed as a result of regulatory approval and production delays.

In clause 6, concerning offences, the purpose of this amendment is to extend the limitation period to two years from the time the subject matter of proceedings becomes known to ensure that multinational corporate secrecy does not prevent the effective enforcement of pharmaceutical price controls in Canada.

The next one concerns excessive prices in clause 7, where the purpose of my amendment is to ensure that introductory pharmaceutical prices in Canada are competitive rather than monopolistic.

The next one, concerning excessive price hearings, dealt with in the amendment in clause 7, means that the above amendment will ensure that pharmaceutical costs are effectively controlled by competitive prices and that Canada's universal health care system is preserved.

Mrs. Catterall: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. I appreciate what the member is trying to do. He is trying to speak to amendments which he intends to put but which have not yet been put to the House, and he is aware that there will be a limit on the debate in this House and that he may not have the opportunity to speak to his amendments. There are others in this House who are in the same position.

I wonder if it is in order for him to speak to amendments that have not been put to the House.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I must simply remind hon. members that, following the intervention of the hon. member for Ottawa West, the debate is on Motions Nos. 1 and 2.

As the hon. member knows very well, the rule of relevance is one of the most difficult to interpret. Since the Chair has been rather tolerant so far, because the debate is just beginning—members even talked about what went on in a parliamentary committee—I am still ready to show tolerance toward the hon. member for Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville.

Once again, I recognize the hon. member.

[English]

Mr. Attewell: Under clause 12, just to continue, this amendment in conjunction with the amendments to section 15 will ensure that Bill C-91 is not applied retroactively.

In clause 13, if notwithstanding the position of the CDMA and the provinces, the federal government proceeds retroactively, this amendment will permit CDMA companies to be compensated for the expenditures they made in reliance on existing Canadian law.

Last, concerning clause 15, this amendment in conjunction with the amendment to section 12 will ensure that Bill C-91 is not applied retroactively. That is an issue that I discussed with my colleagues as much as six months ago.

In closing, I want to thank the Speaker for letting me continue getting on record my points about these amendments and also my support of the main thrust of Bill C-91.

The bottom line is that I want to be able to try to see if we can get a little more fairness and pass these amendments so that we can minimize this issue of retroactivity for the CDMA members.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to have the opportunity to stand up and speak against this piece of legislation.

I want to begin by quoting from a journalist who I think most members around here would respect as having a fairly good insight as to what happens when policy or legislation comes before this House. It is from Carol Goar's article in The Toronto Star December 1, 1992. In this article she basically talked about the history of the drug policy in this country and talked about the fact that Canadians enjoyed the lowest prescription drug prices in the industrialized world. Now that we have this bill this policy is basically gone because we are handing a free rein over to the multinationals.

She talked about some of the promises the pharmaceutical companies made coming true. She states: "They increased their Canadian-based research, but most of it was clinical testing, checking the side effects of drugs developed elsewhere as opposed to pure research, finding a cure for AIDS, for example. They created close to 1,300 jobs but most were in sales and marketing and not in research".

This is one of the things that has been bothering me about this legislation and I mentioned it to a couple of members on the opposite side over the last two weeks. I had seen so many situations in this city over the last few years in which companies will come in to lobby members of Parliament for their legislation and they will make all these commitments in terms of job creation. Often we are lured into supporting this legislation because we are determined to grab on to anything that is going to create jobs, especially when they talk about creating jobs that are more skilled, high-tech or extra sensitive to research.

The thing that bothers me about this particular piece of legislation, and it has been stated by many members on this side of the House before, is the fact that there is no real strict accountability as to whether these jobs are going to be taking place. We know of so many instances not just in relation to this particular sector of our economy but in the manufacturing sector in which foreign multinationals will come here and negotiate support on the commitment of jobs and so often the commitment of fulfilling that particular assignment does not get done.

I have known situations in the past in which we would actually go to particular regions of this country to inspect where these so-called high-tech or high level, highly skilled manufacturing jobs take place and they are not taking place. Often we just create warehouses and when we look at the track record in the last little while in this particular instance with the pharmaceutical manufacturers, we know that they did not live up to all the commitments in terms of those superior jobs.

As stated in this article today, many of these jobs were in sales and marketing and that really is not what we have been looking for. That was one of the reasons we have been so supportive on this side of the House for the generic industry. These people have been creating a different quality of job, a higher skilled job, creating a whole new sector within our economy.

When there is any kind of retraction in the economy or corporations cutback, with the new global system right now, and the head office decides with the flick of a pen to close a plant in a particular part of the world, we have absolutely no say or protection. There is no guarantee that these jobs are going to stay in Canada.

We have given up something that has been very unique and very precious and I know the government is making a mistake. It is once again an example in which the lobby system that has surrounded this entire piece of legislation is one of the reasons we have to review the whole system of lobbying in this city, in this country. It is practically making members of Parliament redundant. It is not just in terms of this particular piece of legislation, Bill C-91. It goes for a lot of other pieces of legislation as well.

I urge the government in the short time left to put in some system of guarantees that these jobs that are being committed by these pharmaceutical manufacturers cannot be vague. They have to be guaranteed.

Mr. Felix Holtmann (Portage—Interlake): Mr. Speaker, I too would like to offer a few comments on the Bill C-91 legislation we are debating today.

I note with interest that my colleague from Broadview—Greenwood closed his few remarks talking about lobbyists. In fact I want to address that subject at the end of my remarks on Bill C-91 because he brought up a most interesting facet to what goes on here in Ottawa with respect to legislation, with respect to policy and sometimes contracts. I can tell him that the committee I chair has been charged with that responsibility, so I will mention that a little bit later.

I have some difficulty with Bill C-91. It is no secret in this House because I have made some mention of it in the past and I want to do that again today as thoughtfully and as concisely as I can, bringing a point of view to this House.

I certainly am not opposed to intellectual property rights. I think most people in this House have great respect for people and corporations creative enough to produce products not only in Canada but around the world that benefit mankind.

Certainly Canada has had its share of historic developments, some in the drug industry and others such as the great Canadarm on the space shuttle that continues to fly around from time to time. I do respect intellectual property rights.

The first thrust of my remarks on Bill C-91 is simply this. When Canada entered the free trade agreement, it allowed 10 years for the reduction of tariffs to bring Canada and the United States on the same playing field. This legislation at the date it was signed to make it official, bang, adds three years in one fell swoop to the patent protection of the large drug manufacturing companies.

It has been argued rightly or wrongly in the last while that those three years may even be more than three years. I am not in a position to say whether those who said it would be seven years are correct, or those who said it would be less are correct but clearly there is going to be a tremendous added cost to all Canadians in our haste to pass this legislation.

This represents, as the government has indicated, billions of dollars worth of revenue to those big companies. While we gave 10 years to implement the free trade agreement with a gradual change to tariffs, now for some reason there is an almighty rush to push this through. I object to that. It would have made no difference to those in GATT had we done it on a more gradual basis and it probably would have been fairer to all Canadians. That was my first objection.

I want to say this concerning the retroactivity of this legislation. As was put forward by my colleague, we have very good generic companies in Canada. They have made some great inroads in the production of generic drugs. Going back to retroactivity on this to me is a slap in the face for Canadian companies. There was absolutely no need and would not have stopped the investment of those major drug companies, as is pointed out by even some of the headlines: "Greater patent protection opens drug firms' wallets".

It opens more than their wallets to come to Canada. It fills their wallets as they come to Canada. The drug business is a very lucrative business. Everybody understands how lucrative it is, so why the need for retroactivity? I believe it would have made no difference had we really studied this legislation and its ramifications to the public and given it three more years, rather than worry about its retroactivity.

Yet I had no indication from this side that it was prepared to revisit that issue right up to today. That is not being flexible and we want to be a flexible nation. I have some real difficulty with that aspect of it. What is the rush? Therefore, my question to the member for Broadview—Greenwood: Who lobbied who and for how much, so that this had to be put through in this fashion. That is a question I will ask when we address this issue in the committee of consumer and corporate affairs when we investigate lobbyists. I hope we come up with some answers because I think this issue is important to everyone in this House.

Let us look at one other part that I am interested in too. Should this investment take place as is indicated by the headlines, that is the drug companies are going to invest in Canada in a major way and they are going to create jobs. I do not think anyone in this Chamber denies that new and more jobs for Canadians everywhere are needed, but my fear is that if you look at this whole drug pie you will see that 10 per cent is research and development. However, I can tell you that 80 per cent of that research and development is going to take place in central Canada only.

I am not suggesting that the manufacturers pull up their factories and move them to Manitoba, Saskatchewan or Prince Edward Island, but at least give those parts of Canada, whether it is Atlantic Canada or western Canada where some of my colleagues come from, a commitment to their fair share of the R and D. Out of the hundreds of millions of dollars, the drug companies should at least give a commitment to put this R and D in different parts of Canada. This is not ripping up a factory or denying the big name companies their investment in Ontario and in Quebec, not at all. It is only saying to give us a fair share of the investment which comes from all Canadians.

These new charges, because of the retroactivity and because of the three year increase in patent protection creates, no doubt about it, new charges that are paid by all Canadians who use drugs.

Neither my colleagues in Atlantic Canada nor I in western Canada, which represents 28 per cent of the population, have assurances that those R and D bucks would be spent there. There is tokenism by these big companies. We heard Judy Erola say: "We are going to give you a commitment. We want to find ways of investing in your universities."

I can assure you there have been no commitments solid enough for my satisfaction that anywhere near 20 per cent of these new dollars will be spent in western Canada. What about Atlantic Canada?

This is certainly something that I do not think we should be satisfied with and, as I indicated, I do not mind that a new factory would be established in Montreal or somewhere else. I have no problem with that, but please do not disgrace me as a westerner or my Atlantic colleagues by saying we do not have the ability to do some of this work. This is real hard money. The wallets of the large companies will be full. I am asking only that they spend a fair share should this legislation go through.

I see your indication, Mr. Speaker, that my time is up. Let me just talk about the lobbyists because the committee that I chair wants to look at that very aspect even on Bill C-91. What lobby took place? What was the pay-off really and to whom? Should the people of Canada not know this? I can assure the House it shall be a most interesting review starting in February and I hope we get participation from everyone in the House.

Mr. McCreath: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I know it was certainly not the intention of my hon. friend from Portage—Interlake to mislead the House, but clearly he forgot about the very major multibillion dollar announcement made last week with respect to medical research at Dalhousie University in Halifax.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): That is a question of debate.

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to participate in this very important debate this afternoon.

This debate gives an image of the very differing views of the role of government in our society. It is obvious that the current government—the Progressive Conservative Party view of the role of government—is to get out of the way and let competition and the free market take control. What that means is that it does not feel that regulation or the best interests of the citizens of the country should be put first, but the multinational interests should be put first.

I also want to point out very early in my remarks that the motivation of this bill is not a Canadian motivation but it is an American inspired agenda; in fact, a Bush administration agenda. It is fuelled both by the North American free trade agreement and by comments made by President-elect Bill Clinton's campaign promise, to place limits on the prescription drug prices.

As can be understood, that made the multinational drug companies rather twitchy. They have decided that the way to ensure their profits will go up instead of down is to move their operations and make sure that their profits come from Canadian consumers rather than American consumers.

I would like to cite a very interesting article from The New York Times of November 16, 1992. This article says a great deal. It talks about the motivation of the bill and how we will be discussing this. It talks about how the Progressive Conservative government wants to repeal the drug patent legislation from 7 to 10 years and to bring Canadian patent protection in line with that of the United States and other industrialized countries.

It points out that Canada's success at delivering drugs at lower cost, as opposed to the United States, is an important feature of our medical system.

As you know, much of the focus of the recent presidential campaign in the United States was on the very inadequate, sorry state of the health care system. It is generous to call it a health care system in the United States. It is a non-system.

We in Canada know how important our health care system is. That is what we are here to protect. My colleague, the hon. member for Surrey North has worked diligently in committee. He has worked tirelessly to oppose this legislation, and I urge all thinking members of this House to vote against Bill C-91. It is bad legislation. As an opposition party, we have the responsibility to oppose bad legislation. It is not going to bring in the much needed jobs, the much touted jobs that this government says it is going to do.

It is going to cost Canadians more for drugs and that is frightening. That is frightening because we are not talking just statistics here. We are not just talking numbers. We are talking people and people's lives.

I have a very sorry story to tell of a constituent of mine who has suffered from epilepsy. This man had finally had his condition stabilized through a particular drug. This was after years and years of frightening occurrences of epileptic attacks.

All of a sudden, the drug company removed the drug that was able to assist him from the market. His parents came to me and said: "You have no idea how this is going to affect our lives". This is a man in his 20s who for the first time had a job. He was contributing to society. Previous to this drug, he was not able to contribute. He was a dependent on his parents. He was now contributing, paying taxes, contributing to society, having an independent life as a young man. With the removal of this drug, we went to the Patented Medicine Prices Review Board and asked them to intercede.

As my children say, the Patented Medicine Prices Review Board had an attitude problem. Their attitude reflects much of the attitude of this government. It is not our problem. We cannot do anything. It is the multinationals that are running things and we will just get out of the way.

We have a different view of the role of government. When somebody has a problem, it is our problem. We take it on. We tried find a solution and fortunately, we were able to find a solution through the orphan drug program and assure that that young man would get those required drugs.

That is what the role of government is. It is to help the citizens of Canada—not to help the multinationals make more money. I want to know how a government can give an unrestricted monopoly on pricing for drugs at a time when federal financing for medicare is frozen.

• (1620)

I know that my provincial counterpart, my colleague in riding, the Hon. Elizabeth Cull, minister of health for British Columbia, came before the committee and gave some very telling statistics on what would be the increase in the costs to our provincial system if this bill was introduced.

We hear a lot about federal government off-loading. This is an example. This legislation would increase the costs to the health care system in British Columbia, a health care system that is already under attack.

I think that it is a callous bill, that it has to be opposed. All of the provincial health ministers unanimously disagree with this bill aside from Quebec. There is only one provincial minister who agrees with this bill; 9 of the 10 ministers of health disagree. I think that says a great deal when you are talking about the kind of philosophical approach.

It is we who are on the right side and the government that is on the wrong side. This kind of legislation shows a short-sighted view. As my colleague from Kamloops says: "the tinkle-down, trickle-down economics of the Tory government have to be stopped". We have to defeat Bill C-91. We have to defeat the Tory government. We have to get a new vision for Canada so that we can get on with building the economy of Canada and ensuring health care for Canadians.

Mr. Benoît Tremblay (Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, the primary purpose of the bill before us today, Bill C-91, is to make sure that Canada's, and therefore Quebec's, legislation regarding patents on pharmaceuticals is absolutely identical to that of other developed countries.

This bill is introduced after experimenting for five years with Bill C-22 which had partly corrected the mistakes made by the Liberals by significantly limiting the scope of patents on pharmaceuticals. Obviously, we were asking companies and researchers to invest without getting patent protection in return or the protection afforded being so weak as to make investing pointless.

What happened? In spite of our history of pharmaceutical research in the Montreal area, activity in that field has decreased dramatically. What happened after Bill C-22 was passed in 1987? Research enjoyed a real boom. Why is that? It is because it is impossible to ask people to invest in research for 10 years or more in order to develop a product without ensuring in advance that the patent will be protected for a reasonable length of time at least.

All other developed countries have legislation that we are now agreeing to align ourselves on. If Canada is looking to innovate, it should be promoting research through tax incentives instead. There would be major things to change there. As far as patents are concerned, how can we ask companies which are in fact multinationals that can set up wherever they please in the world to come and invest here when the protection they get elsewhere is for much longer?

As a matter of fact, all the speeches on the price of pharmaceutical products and the threat to the health system we are hearing now we have heard before, in 1987. I remember them clearly. I was working for the City of Montreal, the Montreal urban community, at the time, and was sitting on the regional consultation committee which in fact was promoting Bill C-22 on pharmaceutical patents.

That bill was delayed for months by a Senate controlled by the Liberal Party. We debated it for months on end and a slew of arguments were put forward by dozens of witnesses and organizations from across the country. All the fears expressed then were later shown to be false.

What do we see now? We see a strange phenomenon concerning the Montreal region. Since this debate began in the House and in committee, I would like to know where the member for Papineau—Saint-Michel was to defend Montreal's interests? Where was the member for Saint-Denis? Where was the member for Saint-Henri—Westmount? Above all, where was the member for LaSalle—Émard, who writes nice articles on Montreal's development in the newspapers? He has a good opportunity to speak now. We have a law that is important for Montreal and no one spoke up, no one appeared in the committee. They let people from the rest of the country speak against the bill.

An amazing thing this morning was the member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell using the letter sent with the Montreal Urban Community's brief to speak against the bill. That is amazing. No Liberal member except one from Ontario spoke. He misused the letter because it begins, "We are for Bill C-91—". The letter does indeed say that to promote real basic and applied research, some restrictions should be made, not in Bill C-91—that is not what it is about—but in the Income Tax Act, on the kinds of expenses that are eligible for R and D tax breaks and in particular spending on commercial research. That is a correction that could have been made. Keep in mind that a partial correction was already made to the previous law, where any management expense was eligible.

What we see is the hypocrisy of a national party. When Montreal's interests are at stake but it bothers Liberals in other parts of Canada, all these people from Montreal say nothing, do not go to the committee and stay out of sight. People from other parts of the country speak against, but none of the members I just named, who claim to defend Montreal's interests, got up. We will see how they vote tomorrow. We see this kind of situation all the time when Montreal's interests are at stake. Those people hide, as they hid in 1987.

Why is it important for Montreal? It is important because we have very broad experience in clinical research. We also have basic research institutions like the biotechnology institute and the new pharmacology research institute. We have faculties of medicine and university research centres that are recognized throughout the world. All those people asked to pass patent legislation similar to what exists in other developed countries so that they could be as competitive and attract investments. In fact, we have had substantial investment projects and this is a rapidly growing sector despite the economic crisis.

I can tell you that I will vote for Bill C-91, as will all Bloc Quebecois members. In future, we can remind all the public of how the Liberal members from the Montreal area voted. If they vote against Bill C-91, they will have shown once again that when Montreal's interests are at stake, they hide behind the curtain or vote against.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I think you would find there is unanimous consent in the House to adjourn this debate to accommodate a debate on the Special Economic Measures Act order. If that consent exists, I would then move:

That, notwithstanding any Standing Order, upon the calling of the Special Economic Measures Act order, the Speaker shall put all questions necessary to dispose of the order at no later than 5.30 p.m. on Tuesday, December 8, 1992 and that if a recorded division is requested, it shall be deferred until 3 p.m. on Wednesday, December 9, 1992;

That, the time provided for Private Members' Business be from 5.30 to 6.30 p.m. on Tuesday, December 8, 1992, after which the Speaker shall adjourn the House until Wednesday, December 9, 1992.

• (1630)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

SPECIAL ECONOMIC MEASURES ACT

REGULATIONS

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre) moved:

That, pursuant to subsection 7(2) of the Special Economic Measures Act (Chapter 17, Statutes of Canada, 1992), the Special Economic Measures (Haïti) Ships Regulations, tabled in this House on September 8, 1992, be amended by adding the following new section:

"6. The government of Canada shall urge every member of the Organization of the American States and the United Nations that has adopted measures similar to those set out in the Regulations to implement and enforce those measures.";

That, pursuant to subsection 7(7) of the same Act, the said amendment to the Regulations be effective on the second day following the day of the vote of concurrence by the Senate; and

That a message be sent to the Senate to inform that House accordingly and to request their concurrence in the same.

He said: The Special Economic Measures Act was passed last year as a way of ensuring that Parliament will have an opportunity from time to time to examine the crucial issue of how economic sanctions programs are affecting the various countries upon which they are being imposed.

An act such as that is only as good as how this Parliament uses it. For that reason, members of our caucus felt it important, especially at this time when there is such major debate in the country concerning our involvement in Somalia and Bosnia, that we use the measures under that act to reopen the question of Haiti and what is happening and, perhaps more important, what is not happening in that poor, desperate country and to ask Canadians and the government to review and re-examine what is happening to the people of Haiti and what Canada might do.

[Translation]

We are very concerned about the crisis in Haiti. Even though the government and the Organization of American States were very active at the beginning of the crisis, it seems we have now forgotten all about Haiti. Human rights are still being violated, the embargo is not respected by all members of the OAS and negotiations between the OAS Commission and the puppet government in Haiti are at a standstill. No progress has been made toward the reinstatement of president Aristide's constitutional government.

[English]

There were certainly without question a number of statements, declarations and resolutions passed about the importance of recognizing and supporting the restoration of constitutional democracy in Haiti. It has been over a year now and the dictatorship continues. In the meantime, the economic embargo was introduced with great fanfare and strong declarations by the Prime Minister, the Secretary of State and other members of the OAS, saying peace would be the measure that would start the return of democracy. Unfortunately, the end result has been the poor people of Haiti are the ones who suffer and the wealthy, the elite, the establishment prosper. If there is an embargo full of holes it is sanctions without effective enforcement. It has become a charade and a total and complete fabrication.

I do not think it is a wise and proper move for the people of Canada, through their government, to be associated with a measure that continues to enforce the most tragic group of people in the western hemisphere, the people of Haiti, to suffer even more and allow the continuance and maintenance of a dictatorial government.

Last weekend I attended a meeting of Latin American states sponsored by the United Nations in Chile on democracy and development. At that meeting were representatives of the exiled government of Haiti. They made a very important and powerful argument that if we are to allow a military dictatorship to continue to exist in Haiti, flaunting all the best intentions of the OAS, the United Nations and the western countries, then it becomes a signal to other military dictatorships throughout the western hemisphere to do the same because it is a cost-free, risk-free enterprise.

The international community is undertaking very strong interventions in Somalia to ease the human rights violations, famine and hunger of that area. It has even gone into the enormously complex and difficult area of Bosnia, not necessarily with full success, but it has at least made the effort. Yet in our own hemisphere we are allowing the matter to be forgotten.

Once in a while a speech is made. There was a resolution passed at the UN General Assembly just a week or so ago, where countries in a unanimous way said "we cannot tolerate this anymore, we must ensure the restoration of constitutional government". I think we can say honestly words are cheap but action is what counts. It is really a question of whether we are prepared to live up to the commitments made by the Prime Minister who said "we are prepared to use any means to ensure the restoration of democracy"

Where is the initiative? Where is the effort being made to hold members of the OAS to account? Where are we making the case to our European allies, who daily break the embargo and send in oil and goods to wealthy entrepreneurs in Haiti in total contradiction of the embargo, and no one says anything?

[Translation]

As a matter of fact, our own country's attitude toward the level, the standards and the measures of the embargo is unacceptable. For example, during the last week of November, this government reduced the budget of Radio-Canada International and in doing so, cancelled the broadcasts aimed at Haitians; which were very important to them, and brought a message of hope.

• (1640)

[English]

Is this an act of a government prepared to use every means to keep freedom alive to cancel one of the few opportunities for the Haitian people to get unbiased news and uncensored information?

At the same time, on the question of aid and development, we have a very murky policy as to whether the aid going through the NGOs for humanitarian purposes is in fact being channelled to the military dictatorship government in Haiti.

We have not made very clear or improved our assistance, in fact we have cut it back, to try to alleviate some of the suffering our own sanctions are causing.

We are faced with a very serious difficult dilemma as a country. We are presently endorsing and accepting a program of economic sanctions which is being laughed at by the military rulers of Haiti. It does virtually nothing to apply pressure for the restoration of the Aristide government. At the same time we are doing very little to try to develop new initiatives to the OAS which are meaningful, real and consequential.

It is important to raise these questions at this time because I think there are opportunities for change. The election of a new administration in the United States has publicly taken quite a different stance in relation to Haiti and may provide some opportunity for a new dialogue and a new set of policy formulations for that country. They are now prepared for the first time to say refugees from Haiti will at least be treated according to the norms of international law.

To my mind nothing bothered me more than the transgressions by the Bush administration of the fundamental precepts of the international convention of refugees by what it called defouling people or sending them back illegally, even though the administration was one of the causes of the problems. It was an American government which supported the Duvalier regime for years.

Now there is a beacon of light. There is an opportunity.

[Translation]

Maybe Mr. Clinton and his new administration would hold a gala in Washington. The Canadian government certainly has the opportunity to propose solutions, to make recommendations and to present some new initiatives for Western countries.

[English]

I think we must undertake a far more significant and serious effort first as our resolution puts forward. If the embargo is going to be taken seriously we must ask others to enforce it. We cannot allow Europe and other countries of Latin America to cast a blind eye toward their responsibilities as members of the international community. We cannot continue to allow a double standard to exist.

I think it is almost immoral to initiate one set of actions for a devastated country in one part of the world and not at least show an equal initiative or effort in the other.

It goes back to the point I was trying to make in the debate last evening when we were talking about the government's actions in Somalia. If we are proposing to become involved as part of a multinational force in Somalia based on the violation of human rights, extreme suffering and a breakdown of government, does not the same criteria not apply to Haiti?

Why do we choose one and not the other? What is the difference? That is one of the reasons why these issues must become part of our parliamentary debate. It is one reason why we are using the measures under the special economic act to open this debate and ask the government what is the difference?

We want an explanation. We want to fully understand why it is taking multilateral, military action in one area where there is violation of human rights, deep human suffering and the overthrow of constitutional government and not in the other.

I think it is fair to ask what judgment is being applied to make a difference. There may be perfectly reasonable propositions, but we have not had them explained. I have gone through the statements the Secretary of State made at the Bahamas meeting. I read carefully the statement of our ambassador to the United Nations last week at the debate of the UN resolution and nothing was said.

Our ambassador at the United Nations addressed the Haitian resolution at the very same moment the debate was going on in Somalia, and yet it was as if there were two different worlds. It was not even mentioned. There was no attempt to even pose the problem that if the UN is going to be initiating a set of standards for one country, it should at least be considering one for the other.

The Sécretary of State for External Affairs has said she thinks this matter should be considered by the Security Council. I accept that at full value. Certainly, it should be accepted at full value, but the issue really is, what are we proposing to the Security Council? Are we undertaking diplomatic initiatives among other countries of the western hemisphere to build some kind of consensus as to what action should be taken? Should embargoes be strengthened? Should there be more aid? Should we be talking to the Americans to get them on side or are we prepared to discuss in realistic terms whether some form of military action might be required?

The US landed in Panama to get rid of Noriega, a drug smuggling ruler of that country. There is pretty good evidence the rulers of Haiti are also engaged in the drug business. I think it is up to Canada to raise these questions. There is no reason why we should not. There is no reason why we should not act to try to bring these very difficult matters into perspective.

I think it is also incumbent upon members of Parliament to raise these issues because in some ways they go to the very heart of what we are as a country. If we are going to be asked to assume and accept a new definition of international security, which requires and accepts the involvement and intervention of various countries of the international community and various countries which have broken down for reasons of enormous human rights violations, then surely it is a responsibility of this Parliament to come to grips with those issues.

It should not do it in an ad hoc responsive way and should not be subject to the vagaries of the U.S. presidential elections or whatever. Surely it is time we had some degree of consistency or coherence in those measures we think are important. I would say the kind of opportunity the special economic act offers for this kind of debate should be part and parcel of a standard procedure used when we are initiating major international commitments, whether through the UN, the OAS, CSCE or whatever. It should be an attempt to try to get this forum to broaden its view about Canada's roles and responsibilities internationally. If we do not do that and we allow these matters simply to happen in an unexamined, unthoughtful way, we are going to be meandering down a road full of treacherous turns and curves and heading for trouble. If we are prepared to accept the real responsibility of this Parliament to work through seriously what this new world looks like, what is expected of Canada and how we see the multilateral international groups we belong to acting in these cases, we will be properly earning our keep as legislators on behalf of the Canadian people.

• (1650)

I address a plea to this House to begin to focus on the issue of Haiti. It is a poor, desperate country, tragic in its deprivation and even more tragic in the denial of rights and the imposition of dictatorship. They made a valiant effort to change that by voting in a constitutional presidency. We must now keep the faith with those people. We must show that we have not forgotten their commitment. We must do everything possible in our own powers as a country, as a member of the OAS and as a member of the United Nations to reignite world interest in the plight of the Haitians and to say to them that they are not forgotten. We must continue to do our best to bring about the restoration of a democratic regime and fair and just development in that fellow country of the western hemisphere.

PATENT ACT

NOTICE OF ALLOCATION OF TIME TO CONSIDER REPORT AND THIRD READING STAGES OF BILL C-91

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, an agreement could not be reached under the provisions of Standing Order 78(1) or (2) with respect to report stage and third reading of Bill C-91, an act to amend the Patent Act, to amend another act in consequence thereof and to provide for other related matters.

Therefore, under the provision of Standing Order 78(3), I give notice of my intention to move a time allocation motion at the next sitting of the House for the purpose of allotting a specified number of days or hours for the consideration and disposal of proceedings at the said stages.

Some hon. members: Shame, shame.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I simply want to say how disappointed we are to hear the hon. minister give this notice. We have concerns about the incredible haste at which Bill C-91 is being forced through the parliamentary system.

I want to use this as an opportunity to give notice as well—

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order. The minister is only giving notice. You will have to wait for the matter to be brought to the House, if the government decides to follow through with it. Only then will the hon. government leader or any other member be able to voice their opinion. Right now, we only have a notice before the House, notice that might or might not be followed through by the government, according to its good pleasure.

SPECIAL ECONOMIC MEASURES ACT

REGULATIONS

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre) (p. 14873).

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, before commenting on this motion I might express my sense of disappointment that not one member of the government, of the Conservative caucus, is prepared to participate in this profoundly important debate about the tragic situation in Haiti.

Mr. Edwards: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I think the hon. member is making an assumption which is groundless. He is also dangerously trespassing on the rule of pointing out who or who is not in the Chamber.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I would not want to presume upon the integrity of the parliamentary secretary, but I think it would be in order to ask if there is any intention by the Secretary of State for External Affairs or her parliamentary secretary to be in the Chamber while this debate is going on.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Once more, I must remind members on both sides that in the House one does not mention who is absent and who is present.

Mr. Robinson: Mr. Speaker, we will soon find out if the Conservatives will participate in this important debate, important not only for the Haitian community in Canada, but also for all Canadians who are deeply concerned about the tragic situation in Haiti.

[English]

It will be two years ago next week, December 16, 1990, that the first democratically elected president, Jean-Bertrand Aristide, was elected in the country of Haiti with a vote of 67 per cent.

That historic victory brought not only a great sense of hope and optimism to a country that was desperately poor, in fact the poorest country in the Caribbean and Latin America, but a sense that the terrible abuses of human rights, the tragic legacy of Duvalier, both father and son, had finally come to an end. There was a hope for economic justice, a new beginning for the people of Haiti.

Today, two years later, Haiti once again is gripped by fear, poverty, brutal denial of fundamental human rights and murder. The tontons macoutes and their allies in the army, the thugs that are imposing their will through iron fists, are in fact running that country today.

It is important to ask: Where is the OAS? Where is the European Community at this time of need, at this time of such brutal violation of human rights of the people of Haiti?

Of course, the UN passed several resolutions. The OAS also passed resolutions to the effect that Mr. Aristide, the democratically elected president, had to be reinstated.

Since February, a mere four or five months after the violent coup, the United States has dropped all effective form of sanctions against Haiti. The United States said on February 4 of last year that it was going to relax its economic sanctions. Why did it do that? It is very clear; it is because it had too many desperate Haitian refugees trying to escape violence and sure death in that country. They were turned back. They broke international law; and every humanitarian law there is regarding refugees.

At the same time, to justify this inhumane policy, the U.S. claimed that the situation was improving in Haiti.

[English]

We saw very early in February of last year the United States easing the trade embargo against Haiti. In November, a couple of months after the brutal coup in Haiti, we heard the fine words of the Canadian Secretary of State for External Affairs when she said in the House on November 4 of last year: "Canada's goal is simple and through these actions our determination must be clear to everyone". She went on to say: "With the measures I have just announced we have gone as far as any country in the hemisphere in responding to the OAS call for a strong signal to the regime in Port-au-Prince that we will not tolerate, that the will of the Haitian people will be thwarted. Together with our OAS partners we are determined to restore democracy in Haiti".

• (1700)

Here we are one year later and the murder continues, the violence continues, and the poverty is even more grinding for the people of Haiti.

The United States abandoned any serious commitment to the embargo in February of this year. Even the Secretary-General of the OAS, Jose Baena Soares, expressed his concern at that time about the decision that was made when he said: "To change the multilateral recommendation in my view we should have some real progress in the implementation of the resolutions, imposing the embargo and calling for Aristide's restoration".

There has been no progress. Just last week another supporter of Jean-Bertrand Aristide was brutally murdered in Haiti. While the eyes of the world are focused on Somalia, on the unfolding tragedies in Bosnia, in the Sudan, in Liberia and elsewhere, perhaps it is difficult to remind the world of the importance of not abandoning the people of Haiti. The purpose of the motion today before the House is to do precisely that.

[Translation]

Its purpose is to give both Haitians and Canadians the assurance that we have not forgotten their struggle, the struggle of the Haitian people for democracy and economic and social justice. That is why this motion is before the House. Canada should play a leading role by asking the OAS, the UN and all European countries to enforce sanctions and do everything they can to restore democracy.

[English]

One of the most important issues at this time is support for the NGOs who are working, many of them very bravely, for a restoration of democracy and hope for the people of Haiti. Instead of increasing support for NGOs working in the field of development, the government in its economic statement just last week slashed funding to these same NGOs, to Oxfam, to l'AQOCI dans la province de Québec and to other NGOs working desperately to try to help the people of Haiti respond in this time of crisis.

We condemn the priorities of a government which is prepared to slash over $600 million from foreign aid at the same time as it budgets over $4 billion for helicopters. This is a shameful decision.

I also want to raise my concern about the decision of Radio Canada International to stop its broadcasts to the people of Haiti.

Since the coup in September 1991, the people of Haiti have had a very difficult time. Restoration of the military regime resulted in severe repression of all the media. Broadcasts by Radio-Canada International were one of the sole sources of international news available to the people of Haiti. The broadcasts opened a window to the outside world and gave Haitians at least some hope that the international community had not turned its back on their plight.

Why did Radio-Canada International stop these broadcasts which were so important to the people of Haiti? Today I want to ask the parliamentary secretary to help us provide the necessary resources to reinstate these broadcasts and get in touch with Canadian and Quebec NGOs who are active in Haiti and urge them to do what they can to help restore democracy.

I ask the government to resume the Radio-Canada International broadcasts beamed to Haiti. Unfortunately, terminating these broadcasts has merely reinforced the wall of silence that the de facto regime has raised around the people of Haiti to maintain repression and stifle the resistance movement.

[English]

It is essential that Canada play a leadership role within the United Nations, within the OAS and elsewhere to bring the strongest possible pressure to bear on the illegitimate and criminal regime of Haiti and to demand the restoration of the democratically elected president of Haiti.

The European Community has failed miserably to respond to the crisis of the Haitian people. The embargo is full of holes and the thugs and the Tonton Macoutes and the Haitian army, working together with the economic elite in that poorest of poor countries in the Caribbean and Latin America, are receiving a subtle message of encouragement by the failure of the government of the United States, the European Community and elsewhere to show their seriousness.

The people of Haiti have demonstrated tremendous courage in their struggle for democracy. I believe that the United States and the OAS, which has proven to be completely ineffective in this struggle, owe it to the people of Haiti, not only to ensure that those who are fleeing from this tragic situation have a safe haven but that we take strong collective measures in consultation with the democratically elected president and government of Haiti to put pressure on the regime that is now in power.

It is also very important that Canada consult closely with the constitutionally elected government of Jean-Bertrand Aristide with respect to humanitarian aid. A number of NGOs here in Canada have voiced their concern that the de facto government appears to be co-opting some well meaning humanitarian aid providers in Haiti. It is essential that all of those working in this field work closely with the government in exile to determine the most effective priorities.

The government in exile, while it continues to receive recognition, needs more than recognition. It needs resources and assistance to operate outside Haiti, to keep the flame of hope burning brightly for people within Haiti who are being gunned down and murdered by the thugs in power now.

We as Canadians can help to provide those resources just as we have done to the government in exile of Burma and provided resources to keep that hope alive; the hope of Aung San Suu Kyi and others that that illegitimate government as well will finally be overthrown.

In conclusion, I welcome this opportunity to again reinforce in this House the concern of my colleagues in the New Democratic Party and I believe of many people in Canada.

The Haitian community and especially the people of Quebec have been strong supporters of the Haitian struggle for democracy.

We support this motion and we want to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs to do a lot more at the United Nations and the OAS to tighten up the embargo and put an end to this attack on democracy. After restoration of the government that was democratically elected in Haiti two years ago next week, our first challenge will be to restore economic and social justice. This is exactly what President Jean-Bertrand Aristide had tried to do, and that is exactly why the elite, the tontons macoutes and the army got rid of this government. For the sake of justice and democracy, we are asking this government to do far more for the people of Haiti.

• (1710)

[English]

Mr. Benno Friesen (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to speak on this motion. I find it a little strange that we should be called at this hour of the day, this hour of the week and this hour of the year to speak on this motion and to speak to an amendment that was brought forward by the opposition to legislation to which it agreed when we passed it earlier this year. Now we are debating the implementation of this measure.

I recall that when we debated this legislation in the House it was a very short debate because all members on all sides agreed that the legislation regarding embargoes that Canada could impose needed to be strengthened. We realized that during the gulf war even though Canada, under the legislation that had been there heretofore, would impose embargoes, they were not effective ones. Therefore, the government took the initiative to draft legislation that would make them more effective so we could deal with situations like the gulf.

The opposition parties agreed to that legislation. As I recall, there were about two or three speakers in that debate from each party and that was it. Then when it went to committee, it was a short meeting, we heard several witnesses and it was a non-contentious bill. It was passed easily in the House. As I remember, it was not even with a recorded division, it was with a voice vote.

Today, the last week that the House is sitting, when there is so much important legislation that the opposition also agrees is very important, we are called upon to debate an amendment to legislation to which it has already agreed. I find that passing strange.

On July 7, 1992 His Excellency the Governor General in Council approved the above named regulations which we are purportedly debating today. The purpose was to reinforce the economic and commercial isolation of the Republic of Haiti. It would be too bad, it would be a tragedy if because of this debate the public watching the proceedings here today were to assume that nothing had happened by way of Canadian activity in Haiti since the time we passed that legislation. There has been a lot of work going on and I think members opposite would agree on that.

The intent of the Governor General's decision was to complete a series of previous administrative measures enabling the Government of Canada to apply Resolutions 191 and 392 of the Organization of American States, adopted October 3, 1991 and May 17, 1992.

The resolutions were unanimously adopted by the 34 member countries of the Organization of American States in reaction to the coup d'état of September 30, 1991 that forcibly ejected Haiti's first ever democratically elected government. As an institution, the Organization of American States, with Canada making a notable contribution, played a key part in the process of Haiti's transition from a military dictatorship to the free elections of December 16, 1990, two years ago.

The members of the OAS and Canada in particular had high hopes of seeing renewal in Haiti and we are still determined to enable it to again become part of the community of democratic nations. The measures of economic and commercial isolation that we are referring to today were part of the international community's strategy to force the perpetrators of the coup to negotiate in good faith with the democratic forces of Haiti.

It must be borne in mind that the United Nations Security Council is the only body with the power under international law to compel its members to implement measures ranging from political and economic isolation to blockading and the use of force. As a regional body, the OAS does not have this power. Its resolutions do have a moral and therefore political force but they are, nonetheless, no more than recommendations.

As I have already explained, the measures recommended by the OAS are recommendations only and engage only its 34 member countries. From the outset it was fully understood by us that they would not have a universal application. It should be added that most of the economic and trade relations between Haiti and the countries of our hemisphere were still going on. The embargo, although only partial, had a real effect on the Haitian economy and on the usupers' ability to manage the country.

As soon as resolution 191 was adopted by the OAS, it was brought before the UN. On October 11, 1991 the Secretary of State for External Affairs delivered a lengthy speech to the United Nations, denouncing the coup in Haiti. She rightly appealed to the international community, pointing out that whenever a democracy fell by reason of a coup d'état it was the duty of the United Nations to intervene to protect its cherished principles. She urged all countries to join with the OAS in its efforts to restore constitutional stability in the region.

Let me now bring to mind the speech delivered to the United Nations on November 24, 1992 by our ambassador, Mrs. Louise Frechette, in support of General Assembly agenda point 22, entitled The Democracy and Human Rights Situation in Haiti.

After calling to mind the new resolution on Haiti adopted by the UN on November 10 by the OAS, Mrs. Frechette expressed her satisfaction with a productive co-operation underway between the United Nations and the OAS concerning Haiti in both the political and humanitarian aid sectors.

Calling for an intensification of this co-operative activity, Mrs. Frechette affirmed that the new resolution, asked Secretary General Soares to seek the assistance of the United Nations and its Secretary General in order that special attention might be brought to bear on strengthening the trade embargo on Haiti, especially with regard to petroleum products and arms. I can hardly emphasize enough the importance that the Government of Canada attaches to this question.

I strongly encourage all the member states of the United Nations to join us to strengthen the international measures likely to assist democracy and restore legitimacy in Haiti. As far as Canada is concerned, we think that the Security Council should not hesitate to seize itself of the issue of Haiti.

Bringing Haiti back among the democratic nations is an act of justice and one whereby democracy will be strengthened in the western hemisphere. Canada attaches so much attention to the subject of democracy because it lies at the heart of the concepts of progress and the security in the region.

Not only is the proposed amendment unnecessary, as I have already pointed out, but the Special Economic Measures Act provides no authority to adopt it.

An amendment to the Special Economic Measures (Haiti) Ships Regulations must be based on the authority conferred by section 4 of the act. That section authorizes the adoption of regulations and orders related to the restriction or prohibition of activities that involve a direct relationship between Canada or Canadians on the one hand, and the state subject to sanctions on the other.

The relationship between Canada and states other than the one subject to sanctions is not a proper matter for orders and regulations under section 4. In brief, the proposed amendment is beyond the scope of the regulation making power conferred by the act.

When the Special Economic Measures Act was introduced as Bill C-53, it envisaged motions to revoke sanctions orders and regulations tabled in Parliament.

In committee, the member for Winnipeg South Centre proposed changes to the bill to allow motions to amend orders and regulations. He spoke eloquently of the "constructive" role that his proposal would give to Parliament in developing broad-based support for sanctions orders and regulations. His appeal to high-minded principles carried the day in committee. The motion we debate today is a flagrant abuse of the fruit of appeal to the principle by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre. All evidence suggests that this—

• (1720)

Mr. Robinson: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order the member for Surrey—White Rock—Delta is now arguing that the motion before the House is effectively out of order and that it is beyond the scope of the Special Economic Measures Act. He states that the motion in question is not made pursuant to section 4 of the Special Economic Measures Act.

I have a copy of the background statement with respect to this particular regulation. It states that the Canadian government approves the special economic measures Haiti ships regulations pursuant to subsections 4(1) and (3) of the Special Economic Measures Act.

Earlier today a colleague of the member for Surrey—White Rock—Delta attempted to argue that this motion was out of order. The Speaker stated it was in order. I suggest this is just another attempt to do an end run around the Speaker's earlier ruling.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I think it is a matter of debate. I give the floor again to the hon. parliamentary secretary.

Mr. Friesen: I would point out that the riding is Surrey—White Rock—South Langley. The member is a few years out of date and maybe that is indicative of his point of order too.

I would agree with you, Mr. Speaker, that it was a point of debate and not a point of order. I will conclude with the following remarks and I point out to the member for Burnaby that I have just said that the motion deals in effect with urging other countries to adopt the orders that we have and that goes beyond the scope of the legislation.

I conclude by saying that the member from Winnipeg and his appeal to high-minded principles carried the day in the committee. The motion we debate today is a flagrant abuse of the fruit of the appeal to the principle by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre. All evidence suggests that this motion is nothing more than a dilatory exercise far removed from anything to do with Haiti.

I move that we bring this debate to a close.

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau—Saint-Michel): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to speak in this debate and to support the motion presented this afternoon by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre.

I am glad to see that the parliamentary secretary at the very least had the courage to come to this House. If his minister does not have the same respect for Haiti, at least the parliamentary secretary is here to remind us of the speeches the minister has already made and also the speeches of the Canadian Ambassador to the United Nations.

He seems surprised that my colleague presented this motion that is supported not only by all members of the Liberal Party but also, I think, by members of the New Democratic Party.

As my colleague said very clearly, the reason we are presenting this motion is that we think the government spares no effort to make fine speeches, but when the time comes to really take radical, tough measures to restore democracy in Haiti, it seems that the Canadian government has no more energy and forgets the minister's or the ambassador's fine words.

The purpose of our amendment is to urge the government to go beyond rhetoric and to shake things up so that democracy is restored to this country that has suffered so much for too long.

Let me remind you of what the minister said last May to the Organization of American States:

[English]

Canada is determined that the impasse in Haiti not continue indefinitely. The illegitimate regime in Haiti has strangled every attempt to restore democracy to the Haitian people. Canada will continue to enforce sanctions as we all agreed last October.

The minister tells us that he does not want this impasse to continue indefinitely, but that is what is happening. This is not the first time that representatives of the government in this House make fine speeches in an attempt to encourage and pacify the Haitian community in Canada. What has the Government of Canada done concretely and specifically to restore democracy in Haiti? Nothing. Absolutely nothing concrete, except fine speeches at the United Nations or to the Organization of American States.

The purpose of my colleague's proposal is to get the government to do something, to put pressure on other member countries of the Organization of American States and on the United Nations to take concrete action. It would put the military regime, which has ruled that country for too long, in its place and prevent it from governing Haiti as it has governed there for too long, so that the voice of the people, expressed in free elections, can prevail and a duly elected president can govern unhindered, not as it is now and has been for too long.

If the president of Haiti is not in league with the military, he is overthrown and replaced. He is a puppet who apparently leads but in fact the military rule the Haitian state. Democracy in that country is violated in the worst way, and the minister's few nice speeches to the United Nations or the Organization of American States will not change anything.

The parliamentary secretary seems to be surprised that we are coming back to it now with an amendment to the resolution we supported before. Of course, all hon. members supported the government's motion to put an embargo on Haiti and ensure that special economic measures were taken against those who usurped power in Haiti and to put those unlawful rulers in their place so that democracy could be restored. At that time, we thought that the government was serious in its efforts and that this embargo would force those who had usurped power in Haiti to give up and make way for democracy. Several months later, we find that the situation has not changed. The military still control the country from behind the scenes and impose a military dictatorship on that nation, which is one of the poorest and most disadvantaged on earth.

In the name of human solidarity, I ask the government to have more conviction than merely to utter fine words.

I am particularly serious about this since I have the pleasure of knowing many Haitians who live in the Montreal area and who often talk to me or my colleagues, either the hon. member for Saint-Denis or the hon. member for Saint-Léonard or the hon. member for Saint-Laurent, who all have constituents of Haitian origin. We talk to these people, and we are constantly told they feel the government has treated them unfairly—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but it being 5.30 p.m., pursuant to order adopted earlier today, it is my duty to interrupt the proceedings and put forthwith all questions necessary to dispose of the motion now before the House.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those in favour will please say yea.

MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT SALARIES, PENSIONS AND BENEFITS

ESTABLISHING INDEPENDENT COMMISSION FOR REVIEW

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of establishing a non-partisan, independent Commission to review all salaries, pensions and benefits of Members of Parliament and particularly, to identify inequities in the pension plan by holding public hearings and examining other jurisdictions within and outside Canada and such Commission to report within six months of its establishment.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to once again rise in this House and speak to an issue which is of deep concern not only to many of my constituents in Burnaby—Kingsway, but I know to the constituents of my colleagues from the New Democratic Party and indeed the constituents of members from coast to coast to coast.

I want to underline the fact that I am speaking today on behalf of a number of my colleagues who are not able to be here in the House at this time because of other important business. The following members have asked me in particular to underline their support for this motion: the member for Kamloops who has been working very hard on this issue; the member for Vancouver East who is in the House at this time; and a number of other colleagues want their support for this motion clearly on the record.

The motion is straightforward. It calls upon the government to establish a non-partisan, independent commission to review all salaries, pensions and benefits of members of Parliament and particularly to identify inequities in the pension plan by holding public hearings and examining other jurisdictions within and outside Canada and such commission to report within six months of its establishment.

I tabled this motion in the House over one year ago. It was a couple of months later, in February of this year, that a debate took place, really a historic debate took place on legislation that was before this House on pensions. I say that was an historic debate because for the first time in the history of this House, a national party leader entered that debate to say on behalf of Canadians that it is time to review the members of Parliament pension plan.

I am speaking, of course, of the courageous leadership that the member for Yukon, the federal Leader of the New Democratic Party, has shown on this important issue. As the member for Yukon said at that time: "We are accountable for the public trust, we are accountable to those who elected us to make sure that what we support is fair, not less but fair, and that each and every one of us can stand before the electorate of Canada and say that we have put in place a fair system".

At that time the hon. Leader of the New Democratic Party called for an independent review, a review of particularly a couple of key aspects of the members of Parliament pension plan; the element of double-dipping or triple-dipping as well as the element of eligibility age for members of Parliament to receive this pension.

At that time the Leader of the New Democratic Party was vigorously and bitterly attacked not only by Conservative members of Parliament but by Liberal members of Parliament as well. The member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, the member for Broadview—Greenwood and many other members of the Liberal and Conservative caucuses attacked her at that time just as they are attacking me in the House now for speaking out on this issue of the public trust and public accountability.

When I came to the House a few minutes ago I had the opportunity to speak with a messenger from the House of Commons and she said to me: "Mr. Robinson, I have worked on the Hill for 14 years and when I retire I will have a pension of $212 a month".

I am proud of the historic role of the New Democratic Party in promoting strong and progressive pension plans for public sector workers. In particular I want to underline the historic contribution of Stanley Knowles, the former member for Winnipeg North Centre who did so much, who devoted so much of his life and career to the cause of public pensions and a dignified retirement for all Canadians.

I think it is time that we as parliamentarians recognized that in fact we have to clean up our own House. We have an obligation to ensure that the public trust that we hold as elected representatives is in fact one that is respected in all aspects.

That is why I have tabled this motion. The motion calls for an independent non-partisan commission to review all salaries, pensions and benefits of members of Parliament; not a commission of members of Parliament, not a commission of former members of Parliament as we have after every election, a well-paid commission that reports and then nothing is done on it, but an opportunity for members of the public from coast to coast to coast, from constituencies in Regina, Toronto, British Columbia, Glengarry—Prescott—Russell and elsewhere to tell their elected representatives and to tell an independent commission what they think.

I want to single out two particular areas that I think do constitute inequities that should be examined by this commission. First of all there is the question of the eligibility age, the fact that after six years of service, no matter what the age of the either retired or defeated member of Parliament is, they become eligible for a life time pension indexed at the age of 60. I think Canadians can legitimately ask whether that is fair.

As well Canadians can legitimately ask whether the opportunity to receive a very generous federal pension in addition to another federal salary, whether it be as a member of the judiciary, as a federal appointee or in another capacity, any of those very lucrative positions, should be supplemented by a federal pension as well.

Canadians are asking whether that is fair. I think it is important that there be an independent tribunal, an independent commission, that would give Canadians the opportunity to speak to that and to voice their concerns at this particular time in our country's history.

I want to note that on June 12 I spoke in the House on this issue. I pointed out that the President of the Treasury Board responded to a letter that was sent by the hon. member for Yukon, the leader of the New Democratic Party, and said at that time that he was prepared to put together an independent and ad hoc review of the pension scheme.

• (1740)

This is what the President of the Treasury Board said in a letter to the member for Yukon. He said: "At this time I am developing final proposals on the terms of reference for and composition of the ad hoc group which will undertake this review". That was on June 12.

Today, some six months later, where is the review? Where is the leadership of the President of the Treasury Board? Where is the leadership or the call of the Liberal Party for action on these inequities? Silence.

I am proud of the leadership that my colleagues and particularly the leader of the federal New Democratic Party have shown on this issue of equity and fairness. It is for that reason that I hope and assume that members on all sides of the House will join in supporting this motion. What it does is say that we are prepared to listen to the Canadian people. We are prepared to have an independent commission to give the Canadian people an opportunity to be heard on the question of MPs' pensions.

I challenge the member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell from the Liberal Party, I challenge the Conservative members in this House to say to the people of Canada and to their constituents that they are not prepared to even listen to them, that they are not prepared to allow an independent commission to hold public hearings with respect to the fairness of the MPs' pension plan. Let them stand up in the House and take that position.

I see, Mr. Speaker, that a number of members are looking for—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I am sorry but on a point of order, the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell.

Mr. Boudria: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member just asked me to stand up and that is exactly what I am doing. I wonder if he is yielding the floor at this moment so that I can make my speech.

Mr. Robinson: Mr. Speaker, I know that a number of my colleagues who are in the House today are anxious to participate in this debate. We certainly await with interest the position of the member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell who was so vigorously attacking the member for Yukon when she called for a review of pension plans. We will await with interest his position on this motion and the position of Conservative members.

In conclusion, once again I welcome this opportunity to ask the President of Treasury Board through his parliamentary secretary: When is this government finally going to move? When will it live up to the commitment that was made on June 12 to the leader of the New Democratic Party and indeed to Canadians for an independent review of the pension plans for members of Parliament? Canadians have waited for too long. It is time that there finally was an independent review.

Mr. Bill Kempling (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to address the motion of the hon. member for Burnaby—Kingsway on the subject of salaries and pensions for members of Parliament.

The hon. member for Burnaby—Kingsway moved that the government should consider the advisability of establishing a non-partisan, independent commission that would review the various elements of MPs' compensation and conduct public hearings in this matter.

Since the Minister of Finance last week announced that the salaries of members of Parliament would be frozen for two years, I will confine my remarks to the pension plan.

All hon. members must be aware of the criticism that has been levelled at the pension plan in recent years. Sometimes the criticism has been accompanied by an unattractive newspaper advertising campaign. I suspect that the hon. member's motion was in large part in response to that.

What exactly is the criticism? The criticism is that our pensions are too generous and that they should not be payable after only six years as a member of Parliament. What this criticism overlooks, however, is the underlying reason for the terms of the pension plan.

While there are certain norms which pension plans generally observe, allowances are often made for occupations and career patterns which differ from the main stream.

I am informed that the Members of Parliament Retiring Allowances Act was designed just for that purpose. That is to recognize the unique circumstances under which members of Parliament serve and to take account of the fact that most hon. members have left a successful career in private life to enter the public arena. Many of them have made considerable financial sacrifices.

We are all aware of the uncertain nature of our tenure and that we serve at the will of the electorate. I might add that MPs are not alone in having pension arrangements that exceed the norm. While meeting the income tax rules for registered pension plans they sponsor, the government and private sector employees frequently provide benefits outside the registered pension plans for certain groups of employees.

The Members of Parliament Retiring Allowances Act attempts in part to compensate for the disruption of career and the lack of controlled retirement planning for elected officials. In return, it demands a high rate of contribution from the plan members.

I am not sure whether those people or groups that are so vociferous in their criticism of MPs pension arrangements are aware that the contribution rate is some 11 per cent and that far exceeds the level of contributions required for most pension plans in Canada.

Earlier this year, this House debated Bill C-55, an act to amend certain acts in relation to pensions and to enact the Special Retirement Arrangements Act and the Pensions Division Act. On September 29, Bill C-55 received Royal Assent.

One of the main purposes of this legislation was to bring the federal pension statutes, including the Members of Parliament Retiring Allowances Act, into line with the requirements of the Income Tax Act rules and regulations for registered pension plans.

During the course of the debate on Bill C-55 and its study at committee, the President of the Treasury Board indicated that the legislation represented the first step only in Public Service pension reform. That first step was a very important step because in addition to addressing the question of the Income Tax Act compliance for federal pension plans, it introduced some long promised changes having to do with fairness and flexibility of pension arrangements for plan members and their families.

The President of the Treasury Board has stated on numerous occasions that the second step in the reform process will involve a review of the fundamental elements of the Public Service plan and a separate review of the members of Parliament pension plan.

The President of the Treasury Board indicated that these reviews would be undertaken in consultation with all the stakeholders and that the review of MPs and senators pension arrangements would involve an independent third party.

I understand that the Public Service Superannuation Act advisory committee has been chosen as the most appropriate vehicle for the Public Service review because its members comprise representatives of both the active and retired plan members as well as employer representatives.

The member will agree that it would be inequitable if the government were to treat members of Parliament differently from the members of other federal pension plans by denying them input on the review of their pension arrangements. He will also agree that pensions are an important element in the remuneration package which enables individuals to seek public life.

At the same time, I agree with the President of the Treasury Board when he said on second reading of Bill C-55 that to be credible, a review of parliamentary pension arrangements must also provide for specific input from the public and the views of those who are independent of Parliament would be actively solicited.

The government understandably felt that Bill C-55 should be passed before embarking on the review of MPs pension arrangements. It is now able to direct its attention toward the developing proposals on the composition of the ad hoc group that will undertake the review and drawing up the terms of reference.

I understand the President of the Treasury Board is close to finalizing these proposals which I believe should be acceptable to most members of this House because they provide a balanced input by plan members and by independent third parties. Therefore, I cannot support the motion put forward by the hon. member. The government is already acting on this. The motion put forward by the member is redundant as far as I am concerned.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to participate in this debate today. I will be curious to hear what the hon. members for Kootenay West, Nickel Belt and Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca have to say on this issue when I am through with my remarks. I am anxious to hear the remarks of these three hon. members.

An hon. member: What party are they from?

Mr. Boudria: From the New Democratic Party, of course.

On March 5, 1991, the Liberal member for Saint-Boniface had made the same request to this House.

[English]

Let me read from Hansard of March 5, 1991. This is in the name of the hon. Liberal member for St. Boniface.

> Let us consider an independent third party to address the question of salaries, pensions, allowances and other remuneration.

I say to my friends to the left who pretend that they invented virtue, or at least they pretend to have perfected it, that they did not invent anything in this particular case.

When I heard the comments of the member for Yukon last June, empty rhetoric of the kind I heard a little earlier today, I asked her questions because I believe I had a right to do so. I will continue to ask questions of members of all political parties on any issue for which the Standing Orders of the House provide.

There are two issues here today. One is the salary of MPs and second, the benefits, namely the pension. Let us take them one at a time. First of all, as my colleague from the government has just indicated, the salary of MPs is frozen and will probably be for some time to come.

I did a quick survey of various occupations to see how they compare with the one we have. I recognize that as MPs we are vulnerable. It is easy for organizations, be they the National Citizens' Coalition or any other to criticize all of us individually or collectively, to say that we are paid too much. Of course anyone else's salary is always too much and one's own salary never seems to be enough. That is easy to do and is fair game. Maybe we should expect to be criticized by others. That is okay. What purpose does it serve for some of us to start saying that we are overpaid?

I did not say that the member's motion said that. I do not want to be unfair. The member asked for an independent review. There is nothing wrong with having that. Actually the government has agreed to it and as I said, it was asked for originally by the member for St. Boniface in any case a year and a half ago.

The only thing I say to the government is that the motion might be redundant. If it is redundant because it is already being done, then surely there is no harm in adopting this motion because it is going to be done anyway. Notwithstanding the hon. member's criticism and my own of the member who proposed this today, we would proceed with it anyway because I do believe that it is going to be done. It was asked for by all three parties and it should be under way.

My only criticism of the government, and here I will join with the member from the New Democrats who proposed the motion, is to say that six months after something was proposed it should at least be under way. The other parties should have been told what the government is planning to do. It should not have been left in abeyance for this amount of time.

Perhaps the government is proceeding with it. At the very least it should have indicated its willingness to proceed to other members so that we would all know and, perhaps, that motion would not have been on the Order Paper today. I trust that would have been the case. However, I do not know.

[Translation]

Let me compare a few wages. I phoned the school board in my riding today to find out how much a teacher makes, out of sheer curiosity. This beautiful profession needs to be well paid. The work this profession entails is very important: taking care of our children, educating them, and so on. The maximum rate of pay for a teacher in my riding is $63,973. That is pretty close to the $65,000 we make as members of Parliament. A director general earns approximately $125,000, but not necessarily in my riding in that case, while a school superintendent earns $93,000 a year. A full professor in a typical university anywhere in this country—I am told—can earn up to $95,712. I do not deny that their job is important, but we must take into consideration that some of the members of this House do have this background.

Here are a few more examples.

[English]

Let me mention a few other professions. I have 1986 salaries. I am using Statistics Canada information which I obtained earlier today. In 1986 an MPs salary was $56,100. At that time the average veterinarian was making $59,796; an air traffic controller, $57,375 and an airline pilot, $56,622. There is at least one member who is an optometrist, a member across the way. I have the pleasure of sitting on various committees with him. An optometrist made $71,893; a pharmacist, $50,260; a civil engineer, $60,393. I could go on with a variety of other professions in Canada. So much for the salary part.

I am sure that the commission examining salaries will examine those examples as well. We will bring them up to date. The 1991 statistics will be available shortly.

Let us turn to the issue of pensions.

[Translation]

At present, parliamentarians have a pension system that does not work like the others with regard to benefits. That is true, but I can assure you it is also very different when it comes to premiums too.

[English]

How many people do you know who contribute 10 per cent of their salaries toward premiums? How many people do you know who contribute an extra 1 per cent on top of the 10 per cent in order to have indexation starting at age 60? We pay 11 per cent of our salaries so we can have that benefit. Of course, it is quite a high premium.

Maybe it does not make much difference to a person my age. Maybe it makes even less to a person who is a little bit older, but I say to members of this House that if we are going to attract a 31-year old or a 32-year old woman with children to come here from the other end of the country, we might as well ensure that we make the package in such a way that it does not discriminate against her and prevent her from running.

If we abolished the pensions today and my premiums were all given back with interest, I could work just fine. I do not want to over dramatize. I could probably retire and I would get along. Would that make it right? Would that make it such that it would be attractive for my daughter to run, or for someone else's daughter to run or someone else's son to run? Probably not. This is what we must bear in mind when we do all of this.

There is a third issue, and it has been addressed by the member. That is the issue of double, triple and in one case of an hon. member, quadruple dipping. There is one person and we all know who he is, who is a quadruple dipper, if that is a word. He is not a former Liberal member and he is not a former Conservative member. I will let you guess which party he used to belong to, having eliminated the previous two.

I do not say that to denigrate the person. I did not bring up this topic today to start with. We must keep in mind what we are doing. What if we decide that someone cannot receive a government pension and a salary at the same time—

• (1800)

An hon. member: Erik Nielsen.

Mr. Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Let me think a bit more to see if we can figure out who is—

Mr. Boudria: I can answer that question, Mr. Speaker, Erik Nielsen is definitely not a New Democrat.

I want to conclude my remarks by saying to members that I do not object to this motion, but the sanctimonious platitudes we heard at the beginning of this debate do not do much to advance the debate.

Let us be proud of our occupation. I am very proud to be an MP. I come, as members will know, from very humble beginnings. I started here on Parliament Hill, and I have said before, as a bus boy 26 years ago. I am very proud of what I have managed to achieve with, of course, the consent of my electors in Glengarry—Prescott—Russell and I want to continue to represent them.

More than anything, I want other Canadians to be able to climb that ladder as well and to get here in the future. I am already here, but that is not the case for many other Canadians. They too should have the right to aspire to come to this place, to what Mr. Diefenbaker called the highest court in the land, the Parliament of Canada. It is the place, if I can conclude, where there is no greater honour for a Canadian than to represent his or her fellow citizens than in this Chamber.

I believe that. Let us ensure that when we talk about this issue or anything else like it, we keep that in mind.

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased, in fact honoured, to contribute to this debate tonight in support of the motion of my colleague, the hon. member for Burnaby—Kingsway.

I agree that the issue of pensions of members of Parliament is a very hot topic. The telephones ring in constituency offices whenever there is a newspaper article or an ad about this issue.

I think what has to be said is that the urgency of this issue is very real. We have heard so much about the cynicism that is directed toward politicians. Believe me, this issue feeds that cynicism.

As an aspiring member of Parliament, I did not know about the provisions of the pension plan when I was running for office. I did not know that it was a very generous pension plan. I do not take issue that there should be a generous benefit package for members of Parliament. In supporting this motion that was put forward by my colleague from Burnaby—Kingsway and addressed in the House by my leader on February 24 of this year, has ignited the debate on this issue.

When my leader broke the unwritten vow of silence on February 24 it really did ignite the issue. It signalled that it was not going to be business as usual in this place under her leadership. We mean to do things differently. We are an alternative.

It is not that we are sanctimonious as some would suggest. It means we believe that if there is cynicism in the electorate, it is there for a reason, that we have to take some responsibility in addressing that cynicism.

That is why an independent, non-partisan commission to deal with the issues of MPs' pensions and salaries would be an non-contentious issue. Why not? It seems so sensible. It would take away the vision of MPs sitting behind closed doors making nice little deals for themselves so that they can secure a nice future for themselves and their families.

I know the sacrifices we make in this place, in this job. We all know it. We volunteered for these jobs. Nobody twisted your arm. If you do not like it, get out of the way and make room for those 32-year old women who were referred to in the previous speech because then there would be a real change in the way things are done.

There has to be a new way of doing things. The electorate is tired of closed door, behind the scenes, backroom dealing, making sure that our wallets are thick and our bellies are full while the rest of the country is asking for the justice that we are supposed to be providing. We as members of Parliament are supposed to be providing the justice.

I know we contribute generously to this pension plan. We make an 11 per cent contribution from our salary. Not many people know that. What is the contentious issue here? I ask my colleagues: Why are you opposed to an independent, non-partisan commission to review MPs' pensions and salaries? Why?

I know my daughter's principal earns much more than I do. Not many people know that. Would an independent commission not be able to demonstrate that? I feel embarrassed in saying I am hard done by; he is making more than I do. An independent commission would probably say it with a little more credibility than my saying it myself. What is the problem?

I urge support of this motion because it is not just a matter of money. It is a matter of confidence in the political system and, boy, do we need something to re-energize confidence in the political system.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I am afraid I was a little too quick off the mark. I was anxious to give all sides a chance to express their views, and normally, I should have looked toward the government side. If the hon. member for Regina—Qu'Appelle is willing to co-operate with the Chair, I will recognize the spokespersons on the government side, the Liberal side and then get back to him afterwards.

[English]

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I will endeavour to be brief.

I would like to point out that this subject is not new. I do not believe this subject was first brought to the House for debate by the Leader of the NDP. I can recall participating in discussions previously.

One that comes to mind is the debate on March 12 of this year with respect to Bill C-263 when I spoke and recommended a comprehensive, in-depth, professional, independent analysis of all aspects of compensation programs for members of Parliament. It is a recommendation that I have, long previous to that, conveyed to my colleague, the President of the Treasury Board.

Without breaking any caucus confidences, it is safe for me to say as well that it is a recommendation to which he has replied on several occasions with interest and with an expression of intent in this House to have such an examination of not only pension plans but hopefully an examination of all aspects of members' compensation provisions.

As other speakers have said, there is inherent and growing scepticism and cynicism of the political process in Canada, of politicians, of Parliament and of parliamentarians. There is no question that the perception of a pension plan that has grown too generous over the years fuels and feeds that cynicism.

As we reinforce the respect and confidence of Canadians in this Parliament and in the parliamentarians who serve here, it is important that we be prepared to re-examine and review not just the pension plan but, as I say, all aspects of compensation to try to correct what I perceive to be a patchwork of compensation provisions over the years: changes to salary conditions on the one hand at one time; then when it is timely, changes to the expense provisions at another time; and then when it seems that it is timely again, changes to the pension plan. There is no cohesive, comprehensive overview or design as far as I can tell to the compensation program that does exist here.

As other speakers have said—I think it is true of almost every member who sits in this House—the last thing we thought about when we considered coming to Ottawa to serve in this Parliament was what the salary would be, whether the expenses would be adequate or what the pension plan would be.

I am not complaining. I am proud to be here and privileged to serve. I have been proud to sit in the provincial legislature of New Brunswick, in the city council chambers of Fredericton and in the mayor's office for a total of about 15 years. I do not have a pension from any one of those experiences. Nor do I complain about it. Nor did I expect one.

The way the polls look right now, I will have to win another election to contemplate a pension plan in Parliament and I would not want to bet on that for a number of reasons. I do not make that statement in any sense of distress or pessimism; I just state it as a fact of life. It obviates the contingency of the pension plan. The pension plan of this House is generous if we live long enough to get it.

I have been a proponent for a long time in our own self-interest in generating respect for this House and those who serve here of the view that a comprehensive, independent professional view of all aspects of the compensation program is now due. It should start with an examination of the qualifications that Canadians want, expect and need from their parliamentarians; a comparison with the professions that are represented here; an analysis of the careers forestalled, of the opportunities passed, of the businesses that did not prosper in absentee ownership.

Again I do not say that in any sense of complaining, but I think it is a fair and objective foundation on which to start any analysis of compensation. It should then be followed by a study of salary provisions based, as I say, on the qualifications that Canadians feel should be in this Chamber and on the legitimate career costs involved herein.

It should involve an examination of expense provisions, an examination of the fact that in terms of charitable donations the member of Parliament is the first target in almost every campaign. I speak for everyone in this House that a large part of the so-called tax-free allowance goes in direct donations to charitable causes in our ridings.

In the area of legitimate expenses, I am not sure that Canadians appreciate fully and in detail what I consider to be the inadequacy of expense provisions for the contingencies of two homes: one in the constituency and one in Ottawa. Fortunately for me and my wife our children are all gone. There are just the two of us so we travel here every week. We travel home every weekend. We keep two homes. It is expensive. Again, I am not complaining. If I get to stay here long enough to get a good full pension, perhaps it would be compensatory and the arithmetic would all work out. I would say on the surface of it that the expenses for members of Parliament and what is expected of them is inadequate to the requirements of the job.

On balance I would say today I would be very surprised if a professional assessment of all aspects of our compensation program would not reveal that on balance salaries, expenses, and pensions, it is perhaps not an unreasonable situation. I say that again the likelihood of me getting a pension at that stage is a big gamble.

I hope it would be possible to conduct such a comprehensive study before the next election. That is probably unlikely in the circumstances, but it is certainly something I know that the minister has been examining.

The President of the Treasury Board has conveyed to me on previous occasions that one of the big problems here is to find the terms of reference and the methodology to conduct such a study because it does involve intensely personal feelings of all members of Parliament and longstanding inherent vested interests by members who came here knowing what they were getting into and deserving what they receive. You cannot change the pension plans in the middle of the game, in the middle of the career, anymore than you can change the rules of any other compensation gain.

If it could be started at the beginning of a term, if we could run an election knowing in advance what the new pension provisions, new salary provisions and expense provisions would be, then everybody from that point forward would be in a position to make the choice whether to run or not to run and there would be no cause for complaint. The vested interests in existing pension plans I would submit should be preserved.

This is a subject that has already been seized by the President of the Treasury Board, the cabinet, the government, again without revealing any caucus confidentiality. I can tell you that it has been widely discussed. It is a subject whose time has come for all of the reasons I have stated. I would hope that the plans of the President of the Treasury Board will reveal themselves in the fullness of time. I think they will take us in the direction that we all feel we should go in this respect.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to stand in the House today to address this particular motion.

First let me be very, very clear. I support the motion and I will tell you why I do. I spoke about this topic and I made this proposal on March 5, 1991; 21 months ago. It took the leader of the NDP 15 months to wake up and find out that proposal had been made and it took her members six more months to find out that she had made it. That is why we are debating here tonight, I guess.

This is what I said. I want to make sure the record is very clear. On March 5, 1991, over 21 months ago, I said: "Let us consider an independent third party to address questions of salary, pensions, allowances and other remuneration". That is fairly clear. It is in fact exactly what we are debating tonight. For the NDP to suggest that all of sudden they have come up with this great new idea that has electrified Canada, sorry it simply does not wash, it is a crock.

Mr. Robinson: Mr. Speaker, I hesitate to interrupt the hon. member but I am sure he would want to acknowledge that indeed a number of members of this House, including myself, over the past years have made a proposal for an independent commission. The point that I have made is not one member of his caucus, including the member himself, proposed either a bill or a motion to that effect.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): It is a matter of debate.

Mr. Duhamel: Mr. Speaker, sometimes the hon. member and his colleagues are very very difficult to take. For example, one colleague said we want those who do not want to be here to step aside so no people can come in, so we can do things differently; the suggestion then being the NDP do things differently.

We had one of their people, one of their elected MPs, roughly a week ago going to a riding of one of my colleagues who has undergone a quadruple bypass and denigrate what he had contributed to this House. Is this doing things differently? Is this the way we want to do things?

I am sorry, that is not the way I want to do things. This is what I said on March 5, 1991: "We should be asking questions such as the following. Why does it take 10 years only to accumulate 50 per cent of salary as a pension for MPs while in many other instances it takes 25 years to accumulate the 50 per cent?" I also asked if it is appropriate for an MP to have a cap of 75 per cent of salary? In a number of other instances although not always, it is capped at 70 per cent of salary.

I also indicated on that particular date MPs could retire at any age after six years of service with no penalty. They could collect their pensions then, while others, if they retired before 60, sometimes suffered up to 2 per cent to 3 per cent penalty per year.

I wonder if there is adequate explanation for those kinds of discrepancies.

I also mentioned double-dipping, but since that time I have become familiar with the terms triple-dipping and quadruple-dipping. I want to be fair. I mentioned Mr. Nielsen at that time who was collecting a fully indexed pension and earning a salary of over $130,000 a year. I am told Mr. Broadbent is collecting a full pension as well. He is one of the New Democrats I truly, truly appreciate who has a job in the neighbourhood of $100,000 a year I am told. I also used the example that day of the Minister of Communications and indicated he had been elected at a very early age. If he were to live to be 75, and I said he probably will because as cranky as he is he is no doubt assured of that, he would collect over $5 million of pension.

I also asked on that particular date if it was fair for people to receive a pension after six years of service. I also indicated I did not want to cast any judgments. I wanted an independent third party to look at our new remuneration package fully, in relation to what is offered in colleges, universities, the private sector, the Public Service and what have you. It could then recommend some specific guidelines for remuneration of MPs including their pension package.

It is not appropriate for us to set the rules. We set the rules on our own salaries and benefits. I think that is really questioned by Canadians all over. What is important

We should not claim today that this is a brand new idea, that it was proposed by the leader of the New Democratic Party, and that this is the first time we actually realize there are pensions that are quite high and are vastly different from what is available in other sectors.

I think the most important thing is to look at this commission, this independent, non-partisan agency that will review the salaries, pensions and benefits of members of Parliament, and also those of provincial and municipal representatives. Then, let us compare all that with the private sector and other Canadian institutions, to make sure it is fair. If it is too generous, let us suggest ways to change that.

[English]

All I want out of this is an independent, objective review of what is happening with appropriate adjustments if they are deemed necessary. I suspect in some cases they will be deemed necessary.

I want to be honourable in spite of the fact I am tempted to be less than that as a result of some of the comments I have heard from the left. I did say I would split my time and I shall do so, but I warn my colleagues to the left if I hear any more silly nonsense as I just heard a few minutes ago, then I shall seize the first opportunity to correct them.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I would like to thank the hon. members for Regina—Qu'Appelle and St. Boniface for their co-operation and sense of fairness.

[English]

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina—Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, I do wish to speak for just a few moments before the adjournment of the House this evening to put some of my thoughts on the record.

Certainly no subject reaches this House that creates the type of emotion and response the subject of MPs' salaries and benefits does. Even though we have heard various comments this evening on the subject, in the end we all agree with the intent of this motion. Even the official spokesperson of the government basically agrees but says it is not necessary because we are going to do it anyway.

That is to have an external review by non-members of Parliament to look at our wages, benefits and our pensions and make recommendations. The only difference between the official government position and the motion by my friend and colleague for Burnaby—Kingsway is that the government member is saying: "We are doing it already".

The fact is that although this commitment was made some six months ago, the government has not acted on it. I would suggest and I would plead with the member of the government to allow this private member's motion to go through.

The motion certainly is not contradicting what the government is intending to do or is in the process of doing. If anything, it would strengthen the government's intent. Therefore we should support the private member's motion and allow it to go through.

I have never been comfortable with the fact that I have to vote on my wages, benefits and pension. When I was first elected and was confronted with this situation, I did not like it. It is a no-win situation. Politically it is crazy for us in the House to vote on our own wages, pensions and benefits.

I have always thought we should study the various benefits people receive in professions somewhat similar to ours in terms of responsibility, hours of work, et cetera to determine an average wage and benefit package. Our benefits and wages should be tied to that. As the average goes up or down, ours will also go up and down automatically. In that way we are never called upon to vote on our own wages.

As I mentioned before I think it is crazy politically. It is a no-win situation. Even if from an outside perspective we were worth that much, if we tried to vote ourselves that amount the electors would take it out on us. That is why I do not think it is a great idea for us to vote on our own wages and benefits. Let an outside group determine that in a fair way.

I support the motion that is being presented to us. I think it is a good motion. I think it would have the support of the Canadian public and the support of all members of this House. Therefore I urge that this motion be carried and passed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): There being no further members rising for debate, the time provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired.

Pursuant to Standing Order 96(1) the order is dropped from the Order Paper.

Mr. Robinson: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. I wonder if we could just get clarification from the Speaker. If there are no further speakers within the hour, it was my understanding that the question would then be put. I believe that is the correct procedure.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I must remind the hon. member that the motion was not votable. If the hon. member wanted a vote, he should have asked the unanimous consent of the House to vote on this question. Since no one raised the matter and there were no more speakers on the motion, the Chair had no choice but to close the debate pursuant to Standing Order 96.

[English]

Mr. Robinson: Mr. Speaker, in light of that ruling, I would then seek the unanimous consent of the House to put this to a question at this point.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Members have heard the terms of the motion. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): There is no unanimous consent.

It being 6.30 p.m., pursuant to order made earlier this day, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at two o'clock p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

The House adjourned at 6.30 p.m.

KITTY NOWDLUK-REYNOLDS

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Nunatsiaq): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the RCMP Public Complaints Commission for recognizing the grave injustice done to Kitty Nowdluk-Reynolds by our very own justice system. The commission's report agrees with Kitty and with the views of many of us who followed the horrific details of Kitty's ordeal.

After suffering a violent sexual attack, Kitty was subjected to a further assault by an insensitive and callous justice system. The victim was again victimized. She was forced to serve the needs of a criminal justice system. The system did not provide for her needs.

I want to commend Kitty for her courage and determination, for not allowing the justice system to go unchallenged and for exposing the flaws and deficiencies within the justice system to the scrutiny of all Canadians.

The justice system failed Kitty. I urge the government to act immediately to make the changes necessary to ensure victims of crimes are not victimized again by the very system which is supposed to help and serve them.

Happy birthday, Kitty. Thank you for what you have done on behalf of all victims of crime in this country.

ILLEGAL DRUGS

Mr. Bill Attewell (Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville): Mr. Speaker, drug smuggling is a serious problem in Canada as it is throughout the world.

A few weeks ago, we were successful in bringing down a joint Canadian-Columbian drug operation in Casey, Quebec. I applaud the work of the officials who seized $2.7 billion worth of cocaine and closed down a drug lab in Laval.

The government must get even tougher in its strategy to end drug smuggling and the entire illegal drug trade in Canada. We must ensure that local police forces which are burdened with costly drug-related investigations are compensated for their efforts.

I call upon the Solicitor General to introduce legislation that will allow municipalities to share in the proceeds from drug seizures.

UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Prince Edward—Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have news for the House which might come as a shock to many members present but certainly came as no shock to me.

The two Ontario counties which constitute my riding have reported record increases in welfare applications. In fact, Hastings county reported the largest single increase in welfare case-load in the province of Ontario. Prince Edward county had the dubious honour of being in the top 20.

Despite the Minister of Finance's statements, I knew our area was being hit hard by a recession that will not quit. The sky-rocketing numbers of unemployed in the Quinte area are still reeling under its ravaging effects.

It seems that this government has not seen the devastation of its economic policies because it is concentrating so intensely on convincing itself that this recession is over.

It is time that members opposite wake up and shape up. They are wrong today. They were wrong last week and last year. They have been wrong for the last eight years.

Either start putting Canadians back to work or give us the chance to do so.

QUEBEC 2002

Mr. Marcel R. Tremblay (Québec–Est): Mr. Speaker, today, speaking as the member for Québec–Est, two–thirds of which consists of the city of Quebec, I would like to congratulate the promoters of Quebec 2002 on their success when the committee of the Canadian Olympic Association accepted their candidacy.

Throughout the process they were an example to us all by their determination and dedication, as well as by their outstanding presentation.

I am convinced that the same positive approach will help them take the remaining major stages in this process in their stride, and I want to say that I greatly appreciate their tremendous organizational talents.

This dynamic attitude will certainly reflect well on the Quebec City area, and its residents.

UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint–Léonard): Mr. Speaker, employment in the Montreal area is now in a free fall. The situation is deteriorating rapidly, with a 6.6 per cent loss of jobs in one year. Today the Montreal area has more than 215,000 unemployed workers on the books. In downtown Montreal the unemployment rate was 18 per cent at the beginning of this year.

The situation is depressing in other urban centres in Quebec as well. During the past year, the unemployment rate has gone up in Chicoutimi, Jonquière, Quebec City, Trois–Rivières and Sherbrooke. The average rate for these four centres is 13.7 per cent, which is 2 per cent above the national average.

This is intolerable. The Tory government has ignored the plight of the people of Montreal and of all Canadians. The government's priority should be to bring pride and prosperity back to the Montreal area and to Canada as a whole, but to do that we will have to get rid of the Tories and elect a Liberal government.

AIR CADET LEAGUE OF CANADA

Mrs. Louise Feltham (Wild Rose): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a statement in support of the Air Cadet League of Canada and in particular, the glider pilot training program.

The goal of the program is to stimulate and encourage young Canadians in the field of aviation. Since 1966 the Air Cadet League has given a great number of our young people a constructive purpose in which they have the opportunity to acquire organizational ability and discipline as well as skills in aviation.

The glider training program began in my riding at Natook Aerodrome in Olds, Alberta.

• (1410)

Today I would like to acknowledge the contribution made by many devoted people. I encourage them to proceed with the long–term plans to provide accommodation and sports facilities for our cadets not only from Alberta, but also from B.C., Saskatchewan, Manitoba, and northwestern Ontario.

Their dedication is much appreciated.

ROYAL ROADS MILITARY COLLEGE

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Mr. Speaker, rumours abound in my riding and in the greater Victoria area over the future status of the Royal Roads Military College.

Residents of southern Vancouver Island are hearing and reading reports that the federal government may decide to close this top–notch education facility which has served the best interests of our nation in an exemplary fashion.

This facility is the only one of its kind in western Canada. As such, there is a significant demand for such a post-secondary institute in greater Victoria.

Given the fact that Royal Roads Military College is a national resource and a much valued one in western Canada, and given the need for this facility adjacent to our defence establishments on the west coast, I strongly believe it would be a great error to proceed with any decision to close or erode the programs at Royal Roads.

I implore the Associate Minister of National Defence to put the concerns and anxieties of my constituents and other residents of the area to rest by stating that Royal Roads will have a safe and productive future in Victoria.

PEARSON INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, the environmental assessment report for the Vancouver airport took seven months. The environmental assessment at Pearson International Airport, by the time it is received by the Ministry of Transport, will have taken one year from the end of hearings to delivery of the report.

These time frames are ridiculous. If we are going to have environmental assessments, and I believe we must, then the Minister of the Environment should introduce legislation immediately to provide for the expeditious hearing of environmental concerns.

Otherwise, the whole concept of environmental hearings will soon become abhorrent to the public and the concept of environmental protection hearings will not be accepted because it prevents its development.

LINGUISTIC MINORITIES

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I have a question. Who speaks on behalf of language minorities in the federal cabinet? Who defends the interests of minority language groups in the country today?

We know the Secretary of State is ill, and we hope he will get well soon. But my question still is: Who defends the interests of language minorities in cabinet, at this time?

We know there will be a 10 per cent cutback in programs involved in language teaching and promotion across Canada. Again, the question is: Who will speak for and defend the interests of anglophone minority groups inside Quebec and francophones outside Quebec? The question is: Did the Prime Minister, who never met any of the groups since 1984, have the courage or the will to meet with these groups? I want to ask him here and now: Will you keep your word, Prime Minister? In April 1992, you promised you would meet these groups. Will you meet them soon to deal with a problem that has been waiting too long for a solution?

TRADE

Mr. Felix Holtmann (Portage—Interlake): Mr. Speaker, the free trade agreement has resulted in a tremendous increase of trade between Canada and the United States to the point that we are becoming the net benefactor.

Now, before the North American free trade agreement is announced there is a company in Leamington, Ontario—I am glad you are sitting down, Mr. Speaker—that is selling cactus to Mexico. Imagine, selling cactus to Mexico. It employs hundreds of Canadians.

Who does not believe in the Canadian ability to manufacture and export all over the world? Only those opposite. They will now be pricked into realizing that the fact of the matter is that cactus to Mexico is only the beginning of the North American free trade agreement.

PROPERTY TAX REFORM

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, the Ontario NDP government is always professing to be the party of reform and the party of the people. However, Torontonians were given a rude awakening today when they learned that the NDP government at Queen's Park has decided to kill the Metro Council property tax reform package.

In my riding of York West the majority of working middle class households have been paying too much in property taxes for too long. The new tax reform would have given these families a legitimate and long overdue tax break. Just when it looked like Metro Council was going to throw out the old system the NDP provincial government has said: "No way".

Working middle class families are facing an already heavy federal and provincial tax burden and they deserve a break on their municipal bill.

Residents also deserve better from an NDP provincial government that says one thing but does another. I call on the premier to reverse his regressive, unfair and misguided decision and deliver on the promises of reform and honesty to working class families.

LINGUISTIC EQUALITY

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, the resolution which has come to Parliament from New Brunswick affirming the equality of its English and French linguistic communities presents the reality of tolerance and mutual respect which has developed among the people of that province over many years.

These principles of linguistic equality were first established in legislation more than a decade ago by a unanimous vote of the legislature of New Brunswick, in which I had the honour at that time to participate. They are principles which have become a way of life in our province and have become increasingly well established through at least three provincial elections. I continue to support them fully.

I am deeply convinced that the equality of New Brunswick's linguistic communities will never be in danger because I have an abiding confidence in the commitment of our people to these principles.

However, the request from the province of New Brunswick to entrench these principles within the Canadian Constitution specifically for that province is both a timely and symbolic measure. It will not only reinforce official language commitments within New Brunswick, it will also strengthen the example of that province as a beneficial influence for all of Canada.

ECONOMIC STATEMENT

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, last week the Minister of Finance tabled the government's economic statement in which he complained about how broke the government is. The minister needed every penny of revenue. He raided the UI fund, cut programs and operations and froze civil service salaries.

Yesterday, finance department officials admitted that for the past 20 years corporate investors have used offshore tax havens to shelter hundreds of millions of dollars in profits at the expense of the poor, the middle class and our social programs. Importing and exporting capital at taxpayers' expense and importing losses and dividends at taxpayers' expense is becoming standard business practice in Canada.

What escaped the treasury of Canada in 1990 and still escapes the treasury includes the $4.2 billion in tax-free dividends that the corporations have received from their non-arms' length "investments" offshore.

That, Mr. Speaker, ain't hay and it is only the tip of the iceberg.

MONTREAL'S ECONOMY

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Prime Minister a question.

According to today's newspapers, it is clear that the situation in Montreal is absolutely untenable. The number of jobs has been dropping steadily for three years and Montreal now has 18 per cent unemployment. Quebec government officials say that, according to the OECD, the unemployment rate in several African cities is the same as in Montreal, 18 per cent. We all know that Montreal is a great city and must remain a great city.

Does the government have any special plans to restore prosperity soon to this city which is the engine of Quebec's economy?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, a major tool to strengthen Montreal's economy is Bill C-91, which is now before this House.

In 1987, the Liberal Party stubbornly fought Bill C-22. Since that bill passed in this House, thanks to our party, quality jobs have been created in Montreal. That is what we are trying to continue to do, but what we see now is the Liberal Party again opposing Bill C-91.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, this is the first time that I have seen a minister get up with a smile and boast about 18 per cent unemployment in a city like Montreal. Montrealers will remember in due course, when the government has the courage to call an election.

[English]

I would like to ask a question of the Minister of Finance.

Today and every day over a period of time we have seen the bad news coming; 10,000 jobs lost at CN, 4,000 jobs lost in St. Catharines over the last six months, 3,000 jobs at Dofasco in Hamilton, 500 jobs cut at Pratt & Whitney in Montreal.

We realize that in the statement that the minister made last Wednesday there was no forecast for the level of unemployment for 1993 and 1994. Will the minister explain to us why he did not dare give us a level of unemployment for next year, or can we conclude from this lack of clarity of the minister that this government will be happy to have exactly the same 1.7 million unemployed in 1993 as there were in 1992?

• (1420)

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, we did indicate in the economic statement that we expected growth to be in the range of 2.5 per cent in 1993 and we also expected that there would be some 300,000 new jobs created.

Mr. Ferguson: What is your forecast?

Mr. Chrétien: Call an election.

Mr. Mazankowski: I will remind the hon. member employment has grown in six of the last seven months. Almost 80,000 new jobs have been created, over 104,000 permanent jobs have been created since August. With the initiatives that have been taken with regard to the thrust of the economic plan which proposes to invest in growth, in people, in the small business sector, particularly from the standpoint of improving the incentives for re-equipping capital equipment and high technological equipment, plus the incentives for training and skills upgrading, plus the initiatives with respect to the infrastructure and a whole host of other positive things, we expect the 2.5 per cent growth to be achieved and perhaps exceeded.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I am amused to see the Minister of Finance having the gall to get up and make predictions on economic growth. Six months ago he got up in this House and said that there would be so much revenue. He has been known since that day as the $8 billion man who made a mistake of $8 billion over a period of six months.

Is it for that reason, that he does not know where he is going, that he does not dare to give the people of Canada the forecast for unemployment for 1993?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, 300,000 jobs is pretty specific. If the hon. members opposite would get on with the job of supporting this government on a number of initiatives such as Bill C-91, there would be a lot more jobs created.

EMPLOYMENT

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the minister of industry. We were concerned to learn today that when the retooling of the General Motors transmission plant in Windsor is completed some two to three years from now, 1,200 fewer people will have jobs there than is the case at present.

I ask the minister, what will the government do now to ensure these people have jobs rather than facing indefinite layoffs and no work? What answer does the government have today?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I think we should put this in perspective. I think my hon. friend has got it backwards. There will be 400 fewer, not 1,200 fewer workers. These workers during the time they are subject to temporary lay-off will be receiving 95 per cent of their salaries under the supplementary unemployment benefit plans of the companies.

He should also be aware that Ford laid off some people in Windsor while they were retooling and then replaced it with a $1 billion investment which was announced earlier this year.

GM Sainte-Thérèse laid off some people in Sainte-Thérèse in July 1991 and in September 1992 a large portion of them were back on the job with a new facility that was more competitive, more productive, and in that way maintains and provides for a strong base on which to build in these other communities. I would suggest it would be the same way in Windsor.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, the minister has no answer about what will happen to the hundreds of workers who will not be called back after the retooling is completed. I have a supplementary question for the minister.

He talks about unemployment insurance and supplementary benefits. Is he not aware that the SUB fund at General Motors does not have enough in it to provide 95 per cent of benefits? Does he not know that the unemployment insurance of the workers at the GM plant in Windsor will run out more than two years before the plant reopens?

I ask the minister, what are he and his government going to do to ensure that these workers have incomes to support themselves and their families before they can go back to work? In particular, will he speak to the General Motors management to ask them to continue making the three speed transmission in that plant as originally planned rather than having it moved to the United States? Will he make that request or is he going to sit back and rub his hands over misery rather than progress?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, that last shot I do not think impresses anybody, whether in this House or people watching it on television. No one is rubbing his or her hands in glee on this side of the House when we see this sort of restructuring going on.

We on this side of the House are realistic. We understand the nature of the restructuring that is going on in the world today. My colleague, the Minister of Finance, in his budget this past spring as well as in the economic statement last week introduced a number of elements in the tax system and other parts of our policies which encourage the restructuring that is going on in a way that will keep that business here in Canada.

If my hon. friend would reflect again in a realistic way as to what is happening with General Motors across North America and look at what is happening within Canada, I think he would see that policies that have been followed within Canada are attracting business to Canada in a very positive way.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister.

Last night I was in Montreal to talk about the economy. The government knows the situation in Montreal is catastrophic. The Government of Quebec spends $3 billion annually on welfare payments in the province, and one-third of the people on unemployment insurance in this country live in Quebec. Last week in the Minister of Finance's statement nothing was announced for Montreal.

Will the government finally take steps to deal with this emergency?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there are no miracles in economics. However, there are certain tangible things we can do to promote economic recovery in Montreal.

One is Bill C-91 now before the House, which would result is the creation of hundreds of new jobs in Montreal in the R and D sector, a vital component of economic and industrial expansion in Montreal.

The New Democrats, however, are against the bill. I suggest that instead of going to Montreal, the hon. member for Yukon should stay in Ottawa and help get this bill through the House. She could then go to Montreal and get all the kudos. The people of Montreal would tell her: Well done, you finally did something to promote economic development in Montreal.

[English]

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister is saying to us in this House that his government is prepared to push through a piece of legislation, Bill C-91, which will serve to help destroy medicare in this country and increase health costs in every province, including Quebec, and in every territory. That is a crime and we do not support Bill C-91.

Across this country we see the devastation that this government's policies have brought. In Windsor today 1,600 GM workers will be laid off; a GATT panel has ruled that the United States broke international trade law when it harassed the softwood lumber industry; and in fact, yesterday in Quebec City we heard from a coalition of Mexican labour, peasants and human rights organizations that the trade deal, NAFTA, will be bad for Mexican workers.

I appeal to the Prime Minister to do something for Canadian jobs. Will he agree not to proceed with the NAFTA deal? Trade policy in this country has been an abject failure.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): If the NAFTA deal is now bad for Mexican workers, maybe it is good for Canadian workers. My hon. friend will have to make up her mind.

My hon. friend is wondering what she can do to be helpful in terms of job creation. Her members could pass Bill C-91, but the leader of the NDP says that they will not pass Bill C-91 because it is bad for the economy. The member from Windsor says it is bad for the country. The day before yesterday Eli Lilly Canada announced a $170 million investment in Scarborough as a direct result of the federal government's new drug patent law.

• (1430)

I draw to the attention of the leader of the NDP—and I think this is significant—what the premier of Ontario said. The premier of Ontario said—

An hon. member: Ah.

Mr. Mulroney: Pay attention. With regard to the $170 million investment he said: "It is great to be here on a good day with a good announcement. We in the Government of Ontario don't want to be so opposed to Bill C-91 that we turn away investment. Not at all". That is what he said.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. The premier of Ontario, for the record, is clearly opposed to Bill C-91.

I would like to remind the Prime Minister since he wants to transfer statistics that the B.C. minister of health gave evidence to the committee on Bill C-91, saying that it would cost that province $145 million more in health care costs just for two drugs, because of Bill C-91.

I want to say to the Prime Minister it is clear that trade policy in this country has been a failure. Tax policy in this country has been a failure. Would the Prime Minister direct the Minister of Finance to bring in an economic statement that would create jobs in this country, not cost jobs in this country?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, jobs are created in Canada by the creation of a climate within which the private sector can invest and create jobs.

My hon. friend asks for an indication of how this can be done. I just indicated yesterday that if she passed Bill C-91 there would be $70 million of new investment in Scarborough, Ontario, with hundreds of direct research and development jobs. If she will not accept my word for it, I urge her to take the word of the premier of Ontario who says: "We don't want to be so opposed to Bill C-91 that we turn away investment".

Premier Rae is quite right. That is a very thoughtful statement, and I commend it to the leader of the NDP. After she consults with the premier, if she changes her mind on Bill C-91 that will be a very important policy initiative for the NDP.

CHILD POVERTY

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

Parents are not working and children are not eating. Brother Richard from the Good Shepherd Centre in Hamilton has advised us this morning that the centre alone is going to be feeding 3,750 children before Christmas.

The Sunday before Christmas that same centre will be offering a Christmas meal, a one-sitting Christmas meal to 1,200 people who do not have enough to eat. There are 342 food banks across this country and the number is growing daily.

If the plan of the Minister of Finance is working, why are the children of Canada going hungry just before Christmas?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, of course all of us are saddened by the tragedy that is occurring.

It has to be recognized that we have taken a number of very serious steps arising out of the economic plan I outlined last week to generate growth, to invest in people and to invest in business, particularly the small business sector; things such as the freeze on UI premiums for the employer, the 10 per cent investment tax credit, improved access to capital, improved treatment with respect to capital cost allowance on high-tech equipment, improved funding for IRAP, the extension of the home buyers' plan, assistance for the oil and gas sector, and assistance for the mining sector.

All these things are designed to generate growth through investment, to generate renewed economic activity, to bolster confidence and economic growth and to create jobs.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, I asked the minister about children.

In Saskatoon 2,500 food baskets are going to provide sustenance for kids and their families in the next two weeks. A Christmas dinner will feed 2,200 people in Saskatoon alone.

In Quebec City, 4,000 families will depend on Christmas baskets for food during the Christmas season. In Montreal, 18,000 children will receive Christmas baskets from Sun Youth.

I would therefore put the following question to the Minister of Finance: Why did he forget the children in his so-called mini-budget? Why did he not directly address the problem of one million children in Canada living below the poverty line?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, we have not forgotten about children. As a matter of fact the child benefit package which will take effect on January 1 will unleash another $2 billion over the next five years to children, particularly working families that are in the poor and middle income categories. What could be more responsive than that?

In addition, the reduction in personal income tax that took effect on July 1, 1992 and an additional 1 per cent that will take effect on January 1, 1993 will unleash another $2 billion worth of disposable income into the economy.

Clearly the best social safety net is a job. What we announced last week were steps to encourage growth, to encourage economic activity and to create jobs.

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

The Prime Minister's photo-op of a year ago when he signed the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child cost Canadian taxpayers over $50,000. Canada committed itself then to reducing child poverty, yet every report indicates that this year more children are living in poverty than there were last December.

Even though the children are not here today for another photo-op, their problems continue to haunt the government. Will the Prime Minister now acknowledge to the House that Canadian children have taken a giant step backward in the last year?

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, with regard to children the Minister of Finance outlined quite clearly the child benefit package that will come into effect on January 1, which puts another $2.1 billion into the hands of lower income people.

Another matter I would like to mention has to do with Brighter Futures that the Minister of National Health and Welfare announced some months ago in which we are assisting those people who really need the help with another $500 million over five years.

We do acknowledge there are problems. I want the member to know that we have looked at the needs of children very specifically, not necessarily in the economic statement but we took action long before that.

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Prime Minister.

The Prime Minister, in listening closely to the parliamentary secretary's response, will note that she does not deny the fact that children are worse off this December than they were last December. It does not matter where they are in western Canada, whether they are in Winnipeg, Saskatoon, Calgary, Edmonton or Vancouver, the depression-like lines lengthen as the economy shrinks.

In last week's mini-budget there was no offer of any additional support for Canadian children. When will the government face the reality that under this barbaric economic strategy hundreds of thousands of children can no longer be fed or housed by their impoverished parents?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, some $15 billion is spent by the Government of Canada to alleviate this serious problem. My hon. friend will no doubt want to put on the record that the total incidence of low income Canadians has fallen from 18.1 per cent in 1984 to 14.6 per cent at the end of 1990. Moreover, inasmuch as he mentioned—

An hon. member: That is pretty selective quoting.

Mr. Mulroney: I think it is important for the House to understand—

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): One in four children in Winnipeg is living in poverty.

• (1440)

Mr. Mulroney: Inasmuch as he mentions Winnipeg, there is a report which refers to the fact that a family of four living in Winnipeg would have fallen below the low income line if its income was less than $29,661. That is a tight budget by any standard but most Canadians would not consider it poverty.

An hon. member: For what year?

Mr. Mulroney: That is for this year, almost $30,000 according to Campaign 2000. In this particular case in Winnipeg the poverty line was drawn there; the low income line was set extremely high by the standards of any industrialized country. I point out to my friend that obviously if we put the limbo pole that high it makes it extremely difficult.

However there has been progress made in this important area. Canada is alleviating child distress and child poverty. I would hope my hon. friend would recognize the very significant steps forward that have been made by the government and the Parliament of Canada.

Oral Questions

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

Windsor is Canada's fifth largest industrial centre. Right now, because of the policies of this government, it has an unemployment rate of 14 per cent and for youth it is around 27 per cent. Because of retooling, 1,200 permanent jobs are going to be lost at General Motors.

What is the government going to do? Will the minister consider a special training adjustment program for Windsor? Would he consider the possibility of putting some jobs in Windsor, perhaps an immigration centre in this border town rather than Vegreville? What action is this government going to take?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, this is the same member who a while ago was attacking the cutbacks by the province of Ontario.

The solution for the working people affected by this massive restructuring has to be found by all the stakeholders working together trying to alleviate the impact of this and to find solutions.

That is why in Windsor, as in other communities across Canada, when a massive lay-off or a restructuring takes place affecting workers we have with the provincial ministry of labour in the province of Ontario and the programming under the industrial adjustment services agreement we signed with the union and owners of plants measures to help those people.

I know that party believes in the magic of the easy statement to solve problems, but it just does not work that way in the real world. We would rather work with those people on the ground in order to find solutions.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, we checked with the minister's officials in Windsor today. No initiatives have yet been taken by the ministry there. It suggests in fact that nothing is likely to be possible on the training front because very few jobs are available at this stage.

Last week it was St. Catharines. This week it is Windsor getting kicked in the teeth.

Is the minister prepared to show some real leadership on this issue? Will he set up a program of community development help and early retirement support? Will he get out and negotiate directly with General Motors to try to see to it that the number of lay-offs is reduced during this significant period of retooling?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I think hon. members in the House should know this. My understanding is that the 1,600 laid-off workers at the Windsor plant will receive a combination of unemployment insurance benefits and supplementary company payments equal to 95 per cent of the base salary after taxes until they are recalled in August 1994.

The industrial adjustment service program will be offered to the company and the union for 400 employees who will not be recalled in August 1994 at the GM Windsor plant location.

CANADA POST CORPORATION

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister responsible for Canada Post.

The post office in Saint-Clément de Rimouski has been occupied for nearly a week and we just learned that people in Scotstown in the eastern townships have been occupying their post office since one p.m. and that a demonstration is being prepared in La Rivière, Manitoba.

Is the minister prepared, finally, to understand common sense and abandon his policy of closing rural post offices?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows that these are not my policies nor are they the policies of anybody else. The House agreed unanimously in 1991, in creating Canada Post as a crown corporation, that it should be free to operate at arm's length, free of political interference.

That was a good decision on the part of Parliament. Were I to ignore that decision and to interfere politically, I am sure the hon. member would be among the first to be up on his feet calling it contempt of Parliament.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, this is utter nonsense. The minister knows that he and his government approved the corporate plan of Canada Post calling for the shutdown of 5,221 rural post offices.

[Translation]

I will put my supplementary question for the Prime Minister, then, since his minister refuses to understand common sense. Is the Prime Minister prepared to announce today that the government is giving up the policy of closing rural post offices in Canada? Is he ready and does he have the courage to make that announcement?

[English]

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member really does not have to shout rudely to be heard.

Let me also say to the hon. member that the corporate plan respecting the opening up of new retail outlets in the stores where people normally go to do their other purchasing has been in place for several years. About 3,000 of these outlets have been opened up and another 3,000 are due to open.

There have been significant changes in the historic way in which the post office has been operating. When the post office has gone to those communities where those changes have been made, the approval rating is 90 per cent. To suggest that a policy which has the approval of its customers to the tune of 90 per cent is in my opinion a wrong-headed attitude on the part of the hon. member.

PEARSON INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport and it concerns the announced redevelopment of Pearson airport in Toronto.

If Air Canada is not going to pay more as a result of the redevelopment of Pearson and if the developer is going to make money as a result of this project, can the minister tell Canadians how much the taxpayer is going to forgo in lost revenues and how much the travelling public is going to pay in increased fares, fees and taxes?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, as I mentioned yesterday, when we put out the RFP in March, it contained the following provisions.

The developer will be required to take on the ongoing operations of terminals 1 and 2 and associated facilities in a manner which provides fair and equitable access by users to the national air transportation system and proposes a terminal development program which appropriately considers both the timing of demand for additional terminal capacity and the economies of the air transportation industry.

We are developing a plan which will not call for additional input by air carriers.

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, the minister will forgive me if I have trouble understanding how he proposes to pull off this feat of financial wizardry. The government is taking us into a major plan of airport expansion at Pearson at a time when many of the people who work there are wondering how long they are going to be able to retain their jobs.

The question is very simple. Who is actually taking the risk for this multimillion dollar project that he has announced at Pearson airport. Who is going to pay?

• (1450)

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member should not be surprised that I do not understand what he is saying.

The hon. member said at the time that we issued the proposal that no sensible corporation would be prepared to go along with a proposal of this nature. He has been proven wrong. Two very reputable firms have tendered to the Government of Canada two very good proposals. We have examined them and Paxport's proposal has been selected as the better. It will be providing the money.

TAXATION

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the Minister of Finance a question. As of January 1, 1993, the minister is planning to prevent companies from deducting from federal income tax the provincial payroll and capital taxes that they pay. The disastrous effects of this measure have already convinced the minister to delay or postpone its implementation. Could the minister not announce now that he is giving up this idea once and for all, since it would cost Quebec employers $300 million more over three years?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I would like to advise the hon. member that there will be a meeting of finance ministers next week and this issue will be discussed.

I am sure that my hon. friend understands that it is important to preserve the federal tax base. That kind of payroll tax deduction serves to erode the federal tax base and we have to keep that in check.

We will attempt to find ways and means to deal with that, but I can assure my hon. friend that we will deal with it in a co-operative fashion with the provinces.

[Translation]

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, I would like to hope from the minister's answer that he will consider very carefully that this is not the time, with very high unemployment in Canada and in Quebec, to impose a burden that directly penalizes those who hire the most personnel. I really think that the government will want to avoid being in the strange situation of doing double damage, first hitting the unemployed and then those who create jobs. I ask the minister if he can give a message of hope at this time to all those in Quebec who are waiting to be told that this burden will not be imposed on them.

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): As I said, Mr. Speaker, this is a matter that is being discussed.

I am sure my hon. friend understands that it is important to prevent the constant erosion of the federal tax base. We are trying to put in place the appropriate kind of a structure, the appropriate kind of a formula that will preserve the tax base while at the same time not provide an undue burden on the provinces that use this kind of taxation.

EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Ken Atkinson (St. Catharines): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology.

The announcement in St. Catharines of the closure of the foundry and the intended closure of the axle plant are causing bitter feelings in my community. It has been acknowledged that these operations are profitable, modern and efficient and that the workforce enjoys an advantage of approximately $9 per hour over their American counterparts. The reason given was the lack of ability to expand these operations to take in other parts of the GM operation.

Is the department able to do anything to help maintain the viability of these operations or alternatively, can it help in looking for a purchaser, especially for the axle plant which General Motors has indicated will be for sale?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend has pointed to an area where we can help. We will work with General Motors in trying to find possible purchasers of the axle plant. We will be sitting down with the company to get the various elements of information to assist in this.

To the extent that we are able to be of assistance, we certainly will be very happy to do so.

SOFTWOOD LUMBER

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister for International Trade.

News reports today say that GATT has ruled against Canada and found that the U.S. commerce department had the right to initiate special countervail action against Canadian softwood exports rather than following their own procedures for such a process.

Can the minister confirm whether, in fact, GATT has issued such a report and whether GATT has made any decision on the question of the U.S. demand for our raw logs, the real issue behind this whole softwood dispute?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend has only got it half right. I can confirm there has been a report. There is a decision on the part of the GATT panel that we have just recently discussed with the provinces and with the industry, and I am pleased to share it with my colleague today.

As to the question of the bonding that the Government of the United States levied at the time of its announcement, the GATT panel found the United States in error. The result will be that some $15 million worth of bonds will have to be returned to Canadian exporters.

On the other question, my hon. friend is correct.

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): On the question of the bonding, my question to the minister is this. What specific steps is he taking to make sure that the Americans give us our money back?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I would expect that the Americans would honour the GATT panel ruling.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): This is something we will be taking to them. If they do not we will press the matter as aggressively as we possibly can. It is very clear in the GATT panel ruling that the position we took when we put the matter before the GATT panel is correct.

I might also say to my friend that we still have, subject to chapter 19 dispute settlement panels, the question of the final injury and subsidy rulings.

JUSTICE

Mr. Bill Attewell (Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General.

In February of this year William Henry Williams was sentenced to six years in prison for incest. Last month his sentence was reduced to four years. Now, after only nine months in prison, he is eligible for parole and his daughter Sandra is afraid.

For 13 years this man molested his daughter, sometimes raping her twice a day. A few years in jail is far too lenient for a man who inflicted such a lifetime of suffering on an innocent daughter.

What measures will the minister take to ensure that people convicted of committing these horrifying crimes remain in jail for at least as long as the abuse took place, and that they serve their entire sentences?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, the House will know that Bill C-36, which was proclaimed as of November 1, tightens up the measures for sexual offenders considerably. As well, and I appreciate that this is a new area of the law, we have made allowance in the law for victim impact statements to be given to the parole boards and also any victim will be given all of the details of the parole.

This has been in effect for a month now and we are monitoring the parole board hearings where victims have been in attendance. As far as we can determine, it is working well and we will continue to monitor the system.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General.

Does the Solicitor General know that the band leadership of Kanesatake is very concerned about the security of its community and it asks the federal government for help with respect to policing.

In fact, the Mohawk have asked the government for assistance in training the community watch force. They want a liaison arrangement with the RCMP so that this force can be trained properly and they will have a competent force composed of both native and non-native people.

When is the Solicitor General going to meet with Grand Chief Peltier to enter into a plan to implement this request?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, we are making some progress at Kahnawake in meeting with the native people there and dealing with the peacekeeper situation.

I will be quite frank with my hon. friend; I know of no current request from Grand Chief Peltier for assistance at Kanesatake. I shall contact my officials immediately after Question Period and get back to my hon. friend, perhaps during the vote.

The Solicitor General's department has responsibility for the new native policing policy now. We have negotiated several treaties across Canada and some are very close to completion in the province of Quebec. As for specific details on this particular situation, I will get back to my hon. friend.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

We are approaching the third anniversary of the incarceration of David Spencer and Christine Lamont. Canadians across the country and right here on Parliament Hill are maintaining a vigil on their behalf.

We have learned of Christine's illness. Hopefully it is a minor illness, but it could be life threatening. The prison conditions are dangerous and unacceptable.

On humanitarian grounds alone, will the Prime Minister honour his commitment to Premier McKenna and ask for their expulsion?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I made no such commitment to Premier McKenna at all.

In point of fact, the concept of expulsion which I raised with the President of Brazil and have subsequently written about to the new President of Brazil has been bandied about in a manner that is quite unfair to the families involved.

There seems to be the view that all one has to do is go and ask for the expulsion of a criminal, or an accused person or a convicted person in that country and the President will oblige.

It is important that members of the House understand this is not the case. Both the President and the Minister of Justice have advised that this is not the case. It is a most exceptional procedure and one that is used with the greatest of reluctance.

Also, my hon. friend refers to Christine's illness. The illness reported was swollen ankles. The doctor from the Consulate General in Sao Paulo attended upon her in the prison and is apparently assured that everything is okay.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs has been employing every effort and I have been in personal touch with the new President of Brazil on the question of the appeal.

We have been informed that the attorneys for the parties apparently neglected to include a document which brought about a revision in the procedure itself irrespective of the appropriate efforts of the attorneys for the Government of Canada.

We would like to see the treaty concluded between Brazil and Canada as quickly as possible so that the two Canadians can then come to Canada, pursuant to the provisions of this treaty, and be dealt with in Canada under Canadian law. This would be, in our judgment anyway, much more humane and much more reasonable. We could deal with it much more expeditiously.

I will take just a second of the House's time to explain to my hon. friend that we are in close and ongoing contact with both families. We are deeply concerned about this matter. We are employing every effort on behalf of both individuals.

There are some 550 Canadians held in prisons around the world for various offences, in much the same way as Canadian penitentiaries house nationals from other countries today.

We are trying to operate within the law and to cause that law to be expedited in the interests of these two Canadians.

I want to give my friend and the House the assurance that we are employing every effort on behalf of Christine Lamont and David Spencer because we believe they are worthy of our attention and concern. We are giving this matter every effort that we possibly can.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I certainly think all Canadians appreciate the fact that the Prime Minister is undertaking to communicate with the new President of Brazil.

With respect to the issue of expulsion, the chief legal adviser to the Secretary of State for External Affairs has said to the justice committee: "The Brazilian Minister of Justice also said to us that he would be prepared to facilitate an expulsion if that were to come forward at the state-to-state level".

In view of the Prime Minister's undertaking and his personal interest in this case, will the Prime Minister now make the request at the state-to-state level for expulsion which, according to the legal adviser to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, would be responded to positively?

Will the Prime Minister take that very important step on behalf of Christine Lamont and David Spencer?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I would like to commend to the hon. member a letter sent to the chairman of the justice committee of this House which goes into some considerable detail on this legal procedure.

The Prime Minister has given an excellent answer to the question.

With regard to the expulsion procedure, it has not been said by our legal counsel that a state-to-state request will result in expulsion.

There is a great deal of detail in the letter. I would be happy to share it with the hon. member. It was a letter to the committee which I think now is public.

Mr. Charles DeBlois (Beauport—Montmorency—Orléans): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 34, I have the honour to present to the House, in both official languages, the report of a parliamentary delegation's official visit to New Zealand. At the invitation of the Speaker of the New Zealand House of Representatives, a Canadian delegation visited New Zealand from November 8 to 14, 1992, and I have the honour to present this report. At this occasion, we had productive discussions with New Zealand parliamentarians on a number of issues of mutual interest, in particular international trade and Canada—New Zealand relations in general.

We had the privilege of having meetings with the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition, who extended their warmest thanks to Canada for helping New Zealand get a seat on the United Nations Security Council.

Finally, meetings were organized with some business people who have operations in Canada. This was certainly a successful visit and a most rewarding experience for participants from both countries.

I wish to thank our New Zealand hosts for their hospitality, their kindness and the excellent agenda prepared on our behalf. I also wish to thank and commend the members of the Canadian delegation for their contribution and for having so ably represented this House.

A lot has been written about acid rain. Much has been accomplished, but more needs to be done.

It is with pleasure that I chaired the sub-committee on acid rain. I wish to acknowledge the excellent co-operation and work of the members of the subcommittee. We found our work to be rewarding. A government response is requested, pursuant to Standing Order 109.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, first, if I might, I would like to make a slight correction. The seconder of the bill is the distinguished House leader of the New Democratic Party, the member for Kamloops. I would ask for that to be amended.

Mr. Speaker: I thank the hon. member. I am sorry I was unaware of that and I apologize to the hon. member and to the hon. member for Kamloops. Thank you for the correction.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to set out some rules that would be designed to protect the independence and integrity of the Canadian Football League. We all know that this is an important institution and part of the culture of this country. It is one of the remaining institutions that brings Canadians together on an annual basis to share in something they find both enjoyable and entertaining.

The purpose of the bill is to ensure that members of Parliament have an opportunity to debate this important issue. This is one that is of great concern to many Canadians. By presenting this bill, we hope to give all members of Parliament an opportunity to clearly represent the views of their constituents and make sure that we have an honest and fair evaluation of how we can maintain and protect the Canadian Football League for Canadians.

Mr. Speaker: Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre) moves that the bill be now read the first time and printed.

Pursuant to Standing Order 69(1), the motion is deemed adopted.

Bill read the first time and printed.

INCOME TAX ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-387, an act to amend the Income Tax Act (auto mechanics).

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 68(2), the motion is deemed adopted.

Mr. Langan: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to amend the Income Tax Act to allow automobile mechanics to deduct the cost of tools they must provide on the job from their personal income tax.

The Canadian Automotive Repair and Service Council, the Canadian Automotive Repair and Service Institute and automobile technicians from across the country have been requesting the government to make this change for some time.

I think that it is important to note that working men and women in this country are unable to get income tax justice at the same time as two-martini lunches are still deductible. I would surely hope that this House would support this bill.

Mr. Speaker: Ms. Langan moves that the bill be now read the first time and printed.

Pursuant to Standing Order 69(1), the motion is deemed adopted.

Bill read the first time and printed.

CRIMINAL CODE

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. John Reimer (Kitchener) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-388, an act to amend the Criminal Code and other acts in consequence thereof (pornography).

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 68(2), the motion is deemed adopted.

• (1520)

Mr. Reimer: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to strengthen and clarify the current law against obscenity. The bill for the first time would clearly define what is meant by adult material to be kept from those under 18 and pornography. The bill defines pornography in five categories; from violence causing or appearing to inflict direct bodily harm in a sexual context, to degrading sexual acts, to other specific sexual acts.

The bill proposes for the first time in the Criminal Code to protect children and women from exploitation, abuse and violence in pornography. Pornography not only degrades and dehumanizes women, but it leads to acts of aggression and violence against women and children. It is time for all Canadians to attack the personal and social evils of pornography with tough criminal sanctions up to five times more than current sentences, as this bill proposes.

Mr. Speaker: Mr. Reimer moves that the bill be now read the first time and printed.

Pursuant to Standing Order 69(1), the motion is deemed adopted.

Bill read the first time and printed.

CRIMINAL CODE

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-389, an act to amend the Criminal Code (invasion of privacy).

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 68(2), the motion is deemed adopted.

Mr. Lee: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to introduce a bill which proposes an amendment to the invasion of privacy sections of the Criminal Code.

Recent lower court decisions have called into question the effectiveness of the existing Criminal Code provisions on eavesdropping and wiretapping. In particular, these decisions have stated that the privacy protection provisions of the code do not apply to private conversations conducted over cellular telephones.

This bill makes it very clear that every telephone conversation between two or more individuals will be safeguarded from intruders, and that includes cellular telephone conversations.

Mr. Speaker: Mr. Lee moves that the bill be now read the first time and printed.

Pursuant to Standing Order 69(1), the motion is deemed adopted.

Bill read the first time and printed.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS AND INTERNATIONAL TRADE

AUTHORIZATION FOR STANDING COMMITTEE TO TRAVEL

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I move:

That six members of the Standing Committee on External Affairs and International Trade be authorized to travel to New York City to study the role of the United Nations from December 14 to December 16, 1992.

Notwithstanding any Standing Order of this House, the Chief Whip of any recognized party may effect substitutions for that review from any envelopes by filing notice thereof with the clerk of the committee and such substitution shall be effective for the entire period of travel and should be effective immediately when received by the clerk of the committee.

Mr. Speaker: Does the House agree?

An hon. member: No.

FINANCE

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I would also like to move:

That five members and three staff persons of the subcommittee on International Financial Institutions of the Standing Committee on Finance be authorized to travel to Washington, D.C., in relation to their study on the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank for four days in January or February, 1993.

Mr. Speaker: Does the House agree?

An hon. member: No.

PETITIONS

PHARMACEUTICAL INDUSTRY

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 36 to present a petition in relation to Bill C-91 from a group of petitioners from the west coast of Canada. They ask Parliament to repeal Bill C-22 and not proceed with Bill C-91 so that Canadians will have the full benefit from lower priced generic drugs and so that provincial and private drug plans can serve Canadians without being forced to charge higher fees and/or provide less coverage.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I have two petitions.

The first is from a number of my constituents in Coquitlam who ask the government not to proceed with Bill C-91 and repeal Bill C-22 passed in 1987 so that Canadians will have the full benefit from lower priced generic drugs and so that provincial and private drug plans can serve Canadians without being forced to charge higher fees and provide less coverage.

HEALTH CARE

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): The second petition, Mr. Speaker, is a huge petition with lots of signatures from all over British Columbia from the Council of Senior Citizens Organizations of British Columbia called COSCO and the Canada-wide peaceful grassroots people who support the universality of medicare.

The petitioners pray that Parliament and the government restore the original terms and conditions of the Canada Assistance Plan.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition pursuant to Standing Order 36 which points out that whereas family class and assisted relative immigrants have historically been an important part of Canadian immigration and whereas family class and assisted relative persons have relatives in Canada to assist them in finding employment, housing and learning the Canadian language and customs they call upon this government to reverse its policy and again establish family class and assisted relatives as the number one priority for immigration.

CHILD POVERTY

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition certified correct by the clerk where the petitioners remind the House that it expressed concern for the more than one million Canadian children currently living in poverty and would seek to achieve the goal of eliminating poverty among Canadian children by the year 2000.

The petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to take the actions necessary to reaffirm its commitment to seek the elimination of poverty among children in Canada by the year 2000 and to develop a plan for the implementation of this commitment.

REQUEST FOR ELIMINATION OF VIOLENCE IN OUR SOCIETY

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I would like to table a petition from La Motte and Amos, in Abitibi. The petitioners state that films of violence shown on television are dangerous and unacceptable because they promote more violence.

Consequently, the petitioners humbly call upon Parliament to legislate on the above-mentioned problems, to put an end to violence in our society and to better protect our children and ensure a better quality of life for all our fellow citizens.

OZONE DEPLETION

Mr. Louis Plamondon (Richelieu): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to table a petition signed by 1,900 people who support the environmental cause promoted by the students' association of the Sorel-Tracy CEGEP. This group, headed by Eric Plouffe, has gathered signatures from all regions of Quebec. The total of 1,900 signatures demonstrates how seriously the government should take ozone depletion.

[English]

PHARMACEUTICAL INDUSTRY

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I too rise today pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 36 to present a petition signed by numerous Canadians calling on the government not to proceed with Bill C-91 and to repeal the 1987 Bill C-22 for the purpose of protecting our medicare plans, our provincial pharmacare plans and our senior citizens from the ruinous cost of the high prices that would be induced by this legislation.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition which is signed by residents of Busby, Alberta, Vancouver and Burnaby, British Columbia and other towns and cities in Alberta and British Columbia noting that two Canadians, Christine Lamont and David Spencer, who have been sentenced to 28 years each in a Brazilian prison have suffered miscarriages of justice, cruel and unusual treatment in Brazilian prisons and discrimination in sentencing and parole.

The petitioners note that the cumulative effect of these irregularities provides ample ground for the Government of Canada to seek a remedy on their behalf and that the only remedy is expulsion. Therefore, they call upon Parliament to urge the Secretary of State for External Affairs to request the Government of Brazil to expel Christine Lamont and David Spencer and return them to Canada.

TRADE

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches—Woodbine): Mr. Speaker, I too have a petition from one of my constituents, Mr. Robert Varty. The petitioners draw the attention of the House to the fact that a free trade agreement between Mexico, Canada and the U.S.A. would be economically detrimental at this time. The petitioners also believe that an agreement to this effect would not be honoured, as has been proven by the trade agreement between Canada and the U.S.A. Therefore, the petitioners request that Parliament refrain from signing said free trade agreement.

YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): Mr. Speaker, I have two petitions today. The first one has 48 signatures from the lower mainland. It is in memory of Rosalynn Dupuis and supports the strengthening of the Young Offenders Act to protect Canadian society.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): This second petition has 346 signatures, also from around the lower mainland. It calls for the speedy return of Christine Lamont and David Spencer to Canada.

INCOME TAX

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): I have three petitions to present to the House. The first petition requests that the income tax system be made much simpler. The petitioners feel it is much too complex at this particular point in time. They point out certain incongruities and injustices in the system. For example, people can get a deduction for receipted child care, while those who choose to stay at home cannot. They would like that cleared up.

BROADCASTING

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Another petition points out that Parliament has a responsibility to ensure that the CRTC carefully regulate the use of foul language in radio and television programming. The petitioners believe that very often this language is a form of abuse that counteracts the efforts of the family with their children. As well, they point out that it is not necessary to use this type of language in order to inform or entertain.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): In the final petition that I have to present today the petitioners ask that the Government of Canada remove the GST from books and other reading materials. They point out that there has never been such a tax. They feel that reading is the cornerstone of democracy, as well as a key to building a healthy economy.

FISHERIES

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, the people of Ramea have sent me a petition, and 1,100 of them have signed it. It is clear and to the point so I will make a brief reference to it.

They feel that they have been discriminated against by the fisheries minister in his refusal to grant the fish plant employees of this community benefits under the Northern Cod Adjustment Program.

Second, it says that there is no doubt that they, the people of Ramea and the plant workers, qualify under the program because of their historic attachment to the northern cod fishery.

Therefore, they call upon the House to take appropriate action and overturn the decision of the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and give the residents of Ramea the benefits they justly deserve. I support wholeheartedly the prayer of the petitioners.

BILL C-327

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36 I am pleased to present a petition signed, coincidentally, by 36 professors from the University of Saskatchewan. They support Bill C-327, the employee share purchase plan. It is endorsed by the departments and a majority of professors in accounting, finance, industrial relations, and management and marketing departments.

The bill is presently in committee and I would encourage all members of the House to support the bill.

YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, it is my honour again today to present petitions in memory of Rosalynn Dupuis. Rosalynn was a young girl who was brutally murdered and a young offender is now on trial for her murder.

It is truly unfortunate it takes a tragedy such as this one to make us realize that a change in attitude and law is necessary. A large number of people have been signing these petitions and they ask that we consider making some drastic changes to the Young Offenders Act. Protection for the average Canadian has to be made a greater priority.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to present a petition on behalf of a number of residents of Oxford House, Grassy Narrows, Bear Island, Crocus Bay, Oil Springs and Nelson House. They indicate that Canadians wish to designate a day of recognition of Canada's original inhabitants to honour native cultures, and that June 21 is the most appropriate day. Therefore, they call upon Parliament to enact Bill C-268, an act respecting a National Solidarity Day for the First Nations of Canada.

WATER EXPORTS

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): The second petition I have to present is on a different topic. The petitioners, all from Clearwater, British Columbia, are simply pointing out their concern about potential water diversion programs. They ask that the Canadian government pass legislation declaring that our Canadian rivers are not for sale.

SENIOR CITIZENS

Mr. Lawrence MacAulay (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I am pleased to present a petition on behalf of a number of Canadian senior citizens.

They wish to draw to the attention of the House the fact that hundreds of thousands of Canadian senior citizens live below the poverty line, and that it is desirable for all Canadians to provide the necessary support to enable them to live their lives as independently as possible.

Therefore the petitioners call upon Parliament to urge the government to ensure that Canadian old age security pensions are sufficient to meet the basic needs of Canadian senior citizens.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I too rise to present a petition to the House from constituents of mine in Victoria.

The petition asks the House to consider removing the goods and services tax from women's sanitary products. It is signed by at least 100 people, mostly from Victoria, and I commend it to the House.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, if Question No. 352 could be made an Order for Return, the return would be tabled immediately.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House that Question No. 352 be deemed to have been made an Order for Return?

Return tabled.

[English]

Mr. Edwards: I ask, Mr. Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Mr. Duhamel: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. It was on December 12, 1991 that I put the following question on the Order Paper. It is very brief. I would like to read it into the record because I have still not received a response:

1. What is the total amount of revenue collected by the government from the goods and services tax since January 1, 1991 and what has been the total amount spent on (a) advertising (b) tax credits (c) GST rebates (d) set-up costs (e) other expenses associated with the implementation of this tax?

2. What is the total of GST revenue placed in the Debt Service Reduction Account and what is the current balance of the account?

I recognize that my hon. colleague has been attempting to get a response. I am also very anxious. We are nearing the end of the session and I still do not have answers to those questions that my constituents are raising. I am wondering if we might get it later on today or tomorrow.

Mr. Edwards: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the patience and I recognize the impatience of my hon. friend. I have given him assurances and those assurances stand. We have a couple of more days in which to get some results for him. I will make sure we make every effort to do so.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: Agreed.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that a message has been received from the Senate informing this House the Senate has passed Bill S-16, an act to restructure United Grain Growers Limited, to which the concurrence of this House is desired.

Pursuant to Standing Order 135(2), the bill is deemed to have been read the first time and ordered for second reading at the next sitting of the House.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

PATENT ACT

ALLOCATION OF TIME TO CONSIDER REPORT AND THIRD READING STAGES OF BILL C-91

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): I move, pursuant to Standing Order 78(3):

That, in relation to Bill C-91, an act to amend the Patent Act, to amend another act in consequence thereof and to provide for other related matters, not more than one further sitting day shall be allotted to the consideration of report stage and one sitting day to the consideration of third reading stage of the bill; and

That, 15 minutes before the expiry of the time provided for Government Orders on the day allotted to the report stage consideration and on the day allotted to the third reading stage consideration of the said bill, any proceedings before the House shall be interrupted, if required, for the purpose of this order and, in turn, every question necessary to dispose of the stage of the bill then under consideration shall be put forthwith and successively, without further debate or amendment.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order to ask you to refuse to accept this motion of time allocation on debate on Bill C-91 at report and third reading to a further two sitting days. In some ways this is a rather unusual point of order.

I am not so much asking you to interpret whether the Standing Orders of the House are being properly applied so much as whether the Standing Orders applied in this instance are consistent with the over-all responsibility of the House to make decisions in a parliamentary democratic fashion.

I am seeking to make only one point; that the motion to curtail debate on Bill C-91 at this time and in this way goes against what you once called "fair play and common sense" and that it is offensive to "the sense of what is appropriate under certain circumstances and which is acceptable to reasonable people".

• (1540)

Those were your words, by the way, Mr. Speaker.

I would like to begin this short point of order by submitting that as Speaker you have a special responsibility to address this issue. Mr. Speaker, you have both the authority and the responsibility to prohibit a motion of time allocation if, in your judgment, it is being used abusively.

There have been several occasions in parliamentary history when a Speaker has been called upon to intervene in this way. I would like to refer to two cases. One is the intervention of closure by Speaker Brand in the 1880s and the other your ruling, Mr. Speaker, of April 14, 1987.

I know I do a disservice to the history of Parliament by trying to distil Speaker Brand's famous closure ruling into a few sentences, but the history is clear. Parnell in the parliamentary Irish caucus abused the rules and obstructed the will of the majority. The democratic nature of the House was threatened by that abuse. The public wanted this abuse to end, and the Speaker intervened. He was acting in the interests of both the institution and the democracy that it served.

Over a century later, the Speaker of this House was asked to intervene to prevent what was perceived as an abuse of the rules when this caucus used dilatory tactics to prevent a time allocation motion from being moved to end debate on Bill C-22, a drug patent act.

I was House leader of the New Democratic Party caucus, the current government House leader was the then minister responsible for Bill C-22, the chair is still occupied by the same Speaker, and the bill before the House at that time and today are very similar. These parallels lend a parenthetic irony but nothing more to this point of order.

With the players all here in the House, it is not necessary to relate the history of your April 14, 1987 ruling. I would like to cite parts of it as I find, Mr. Speaker, you make my argument most compelling. You said:

It is essential to our democratic system that controversial issues should be debated at reasonable length so that every reasonable opportunity shall be available to hear the arguments pro and con and that reasonable delaying tactics should be permissible to enable opponents of a measure to enlist public support for their point of view.

Sooner or later every issue must be decided and the decision will be taken by a majority. Rules of procedure protect both the minority and the majority. They are designed to allow the full expression of views on both sides of an issue. They provide the opposition with a means to delay a decision. They also provide the majority with a means of limiting debate in order to arrive at a decision. This is the kind of balance essential to the procedure of a democratic assembly. Our rules were certainly never designed to permit the total frustration of one side or another, the total stagnation of debate or the total paralysis of the system.

When negotiations fail there comes a time when the Chair is obliged to consider what are its own responsibilities. One of the functions of the Speaker is to ensure that the House is able to transact its business. This does not mean that the Chair plays any part in assisting the government in the management of its business agenda.

There comes a time when the Chair has to face its responsibilities. When circumstances change and the rules of procedure provide no solution the Chair must fall back on its discretion in the interests of the House and all its members. This may require the Chair to modify or vary an earlier decision.

Notice of time allocation motions after only a few hours of debate at any stage of a bill can be an abuse.

> Both time allocation motions and dilatory motions are open to abuse. When such tactics are entered upon by either government or opposition the delicate balance of democratic parliamentary government can be easily upset. The maintenance of that balance is a fundamental responsibility of the Speaker.

The question is: What is time allocation and closure and what are the checks on its abuse? In your consideration, Mr. Speaker, I ask you to reflect upon the nature of our time allocation and closure motions and the manner in which the Standing Orders governing them were adopted.

Closure and time allocation are two separate concepts. While both restrain debate, the first is a motion to curtail it, and the second is a motion to structure it. In current Canadian practice that distinction is somewhat blurred, but in Britain the distinction continued and there are safeguards against abuse in both circumstances.

In the use of closure, a minimum number of members must support the closure motion. The Speaker has a power, which is often exercised, to refuse to accept a motion of closure if in his or her view it is premature. In the use of time allocation, of guillotine motions, there are different safeguards in Britain.

As was formerly the case here, a debate is required before a time allocation motion is adopted. One safeguard against abuse then is public debate. This serves not only to permit an explanation of the need to use the measure, but is an added incentive for negotiation to be used instead of unilateral government action.

Another safeguard is the practice of allocating a minimum amount of time to be given to consideration of each section of a bill. That way it does not occur in Britain, as it could today on Bill C-91, that a bill is passed without certain clauses or amendments being explained or rebutted at all. Under our rules we have no such safeguards. The motion for time allocation is not debatable and it not amendable.

Mr. Speaker, you once told us that division bells are no substitute for debate. By accepting a time allocation motion which cannot possibly provide for debate on all components of a bill, no matter what the collective efforts on both sides of the House are, we will arrive at a situation in which votes have become a substitute for debate.

I would argue that if division bells are no substitute for debate then it is also true that divisions are no substitute for debate. You may hear it argued that since the House adopted the time allocation mechanism, this mechanism has the support of the House. Since the House passed the motion, the House supports it. I ask the Chair to consider the questionable nature of this argument in the context of Parliament's best traditions of implementing change as consensually as possible.

The changes the House adopted to its Standing Orders in 1991 were not consensual. They were supported not by the House but by one side of the House only.

Is time allocation warranted at this point? The evidence is to the contrary. Considerable time was spent in committee discussing the timetabling of the bill but if this was intended as filibuster, it did not work. The opposition parties not only agreed to but volunteered a proposal which ended the roadblock in committee and ensured that witnesses were heard on this important bill. I believe the record shows that there have been no dilatory tactics to prevent consideration of Bill C-91.

I do not want to misrepresent the case. If we could have successfully defeated this bill through a sustained filibuster or dilatory tactics we would have. That is what we attempted to do back in 1987.

Perhaps the discovery and availability of new dilatory tools were positive incentives for us in opposition to use instead of a debate to communicate our concerns about the legislative proposal. However, in 1987 you intervened, Mr. Speaker, to remove that temptation from us.

Consider, though, that the unilateral changes to the Standing Orders and easy use of closure are now positive incentives to governments to use those tactics instead of negotiation and consensus building. It is not appropriate that the Chair similarly intervenes now and removes that temptation as it did earlier. Just as it saved us from ourselves, so to speak, in 1987 is it not time now to save the government from itself and save the institute from the abuse of rules by either side?

In conclusion, I simply want to say that I am asking the Chair to refuse to accept the time allocation motion until there has been more debate on the bill or until the motion is amended to provide further debate. I ask that the Chair ensure that the debate on Bill C-91 provides an examination of each of the key elements of the bill. In short, I ask the Chair to take whatever measures it deems necessary to restore fair play and common sense to these proceedings.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank my colleague from the New Democratic Party who has made a very solid and worthwhile suggestion to the Chair that this particular time allocation not be allowed.

My colleague made reference to the Chair's decision of 1987. At that time I was the critic for the Official Opposition regarding Bill C-22 and the government House leader was the minister responsible. However, it should be noted in the record that at report stage there are 73 amendments before us and we are now on amendment No. 1. It is very difficult in view of the interest that has been expressed, not only by members of the opposition but by members of the government, that we have a thorough airing of all those amendments to give each and every one an opportunity to express ourselves with regard to this particular provision.

In conclusion, at the committee stage there were a few witnesses but there could have been more witnesses in terms of number, and discussion could have been more extensive if the government had seen its way to elaborate further at committee stage.

I hope the Chair will give serious consideration to the point of order which has been raised, not allow this time allocation, and fall back on the principle which the Chair has used and demonstrated repeatedly in this House; namely, a measure of fairness for all members of Parliament regardless of their political persuasion to have an opportunity to put their views on the record on a subject matter which is important, not only in terms of the aspects of intellectual property, but also as it affects our health care and as it affects consumers in this country.

I hope, Mr. Speaker, you will give due consideration to this worthy point of order.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I congratulate the member for Kamloops for reading those notes which were eloquent but irrelevant and not entirely factual.

All of the procedures in respect to Bill C-91 that were followed by the government were in total keeping with the Standing Orders of the House and are therefore in order.

Certainly, as the hon. members opposite have said, it is important for the Chair to be fair. It is also important for the Chair, as the Chair always does, to recognize that the rules of the House as set down by the House are necessary for us to proceed in orderly fashion.

I want to correct a couple of items. The hon. member for Kamloops talked about insufficient time. Second reading on this bill was started in June.

Mr. Nowlan: Summer recess.

Mr. Andre: In the argument given by the hon. member, time must be required for the public to have an opportunity to consider it and for public reaction to set in. I think five months is a pretty good period of time.

The hon. member over there shouting from his seat says it was summer. Do people put their brains in neutral during summer, are they incapable of considering it?

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Patrick does not work all summer.

Mr. Nowlan: No, no.

Mr. Andre: I wonder if the hon. member for Annapolis Valley—Hants would allow me to conclude my remarks.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. government House leader is replying. The House has listened carefully to the hon. member for Kamloops, the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond, and I am sure the House would want to listen to the rest of the words of the hon. government House leader.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, the total time given at second reading was five hours and 15 minutes.

An hon. member: It is not enough.

Mr. Andre: It is not enough? There was some reference in the remarks of the hon. member for Kamloops as to the practice at Westminster, the mother of Parliaments. It was able to have a second reading debate on the Maastricht treaty which I think people would recognize as pretty profound in terms of the future of Britain and Europe and so on. It was able to conclude that in six hours and have a vote. For some apparent reason, on an important bill, but hardly of the same calibre as the Maastricht treaty, five hours and 15 minutes is considered insufficient.

An hon. member: Nine days lost.

Mr. Andre: At committee there was 11 hours and 45 minutes of discussion and nine days offered by the government which were turned down by the opposition—nine extra days of committee meetings. There was ample opportunity offered for detailed study.

The hon. member also mentioned that the Standing Orders of 1991 were not agreed to by the opposition. Standing Order 78(3) in play today goes back to 1969 which, if I am not mistaken, precedes everybody who is currently in the House.

I am sorry, there is one member who was here in 1969.

An hon. member: The loud guy in the back row.

Mr. Andre: Sorry, there are two members.

To suggest that Standing Order 78(3) is somehow an invention of this government is to misrepresent the situation.

Finally, the hon. House leader of the Liberal Party raises a point that I think we do need to consider. That is the 73 report stage amendments.

We have to consider it in this context. The intent of the rule changes that were brought in was that legislation would be given second reading in the House, it would go to committee for detailed study, come back for report stage and third reading. The intent was that amendments to bills should be discussed in committee. There they could be looked at in detail, they could be discussed, debated, voted on and dealt with.

The practice which is observed here is that the opposition members on the committee simply refuse to allow the putting of any amendments, wanting to bring them into the House, thereby negating the value of the committee study as it is currently structured.

We might want to look at some changes to our Standing Orders to make committee study much more useful of members' time than it is currently turning out to be because of the practices that are being used.

In conclusion, I repeat that any reasonable person will find that proper procedures have been followed. This motion is totally in order and we ought to proceed with holding the vote so the important debating points that hon. members opposite want to make during report stage and third reading can be made.

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants): A very short point of order, Mr. Speaker. I was a member here when certain rule changes were brought in. At that time Parliament did live and there was honest debate on controversial subjects. Mr. Speaker, as you undoubtedly know, and certainly the Table will know, the government House leader is right on the last part of what he said.

Now that I am on the opposition side, I wonder about moving amendments in committee because then you cannot move them in the House where you get the attention.

I never agreed more with the hon. member for Kamloops than on this issue. This bill was introduced on June 23, the day the House of Commons adjourned for the summer recess, and notwithstanding what was said by my hon. friend and former brotherly-like comrade, the member for Etobicoke, who talked about the summer, we all know that this past summer was involved in constitutional discussion.

Parliament came back on September 17 and that is when debate first started on second reading for one hour and 50 minutes.

We then adjourned because of the referendum, which was a unique period in Canadian history when the focus was on the Constitution and what was happening to Canada. There was no attention at all to the drug patent bill.

We had the referendum. We all know the results of October 26. This Parliament came back on November 16 and the bill was discussed for two days. Closure was put on the first day of debate, November 16, after two hours and 25 minutes of debate. The second day, November 17, debate was for three or four hours, for a total—and the government House leader has it wrong, to be fair—of eight hours and 40 minutes of debate at second reading of Bill C-91.

Mr. Speaker, in the sense of Parliament that used to be, if there ever was a bill that needed more focus from Canadians without the distractions, important as the Constitution was, that is Bill C-91. If the government is so convinced of its case, why is it so scared to have parliamentary debate in this open forum?

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, the opposition House leader said—and I know there are some games played here—that with 73 amendments, how in all sense of parliamentary tradition can they be discussed fully. We are not England where we know the longest debate was for two days on the European Common Market. In this country we are spread out and we need time to debate in this forum, if it means anything, to find out if people from coast to coast still believe in any of the issues we debate.

Debate cannot be choked off after three days between a September day when we were involved in the Constitution and then coming back here in the post-constitution hangover that the member for High River still has. There were two days of debate on November 16 and 17. Does the House think this is long enough for an honest debate on something that affects Canadians from coast to coast? Every Canadian takes drugs and patent medicine and pharmaceutical drugs and it is fundamentally important we examine this thoroughly. If there were ever a reason to support the unusual and unique motion of the member for Kamloops, if this Parliament is to mean anything, then this is the time for you, Mr. Speaker, a person equal among all of us, to exercise your discretion in favour of Canadians, not just in the technical interpretation of rules.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Louis Plamondon (Richelieu): Mr. Speaker, on the same point of order, although, in principle, it goes without saying that the Bloc Quebecois is against limiting debate. However, we are somewhat surprised to hear the NDP complain indignantly about time allocation today, after having connived with the Liberal Party during the referendum debate to limit debate in order to prevent us from speaking out. When fighting for principles, you cannot act the martyr when, just a few months earlier, the very same principles were applied in reverse to limit debate.

In that sense, we can understand that the government would want to limit debate on this bill so vital to the Montreal area, as the NDP, by its attitude both in committee and in this House, does not seem to want the debate to progress toward a conclusion and a vote. Without agreeing with the principle of time allocation, again we are surprised, considering the Liberals and the NDP had supported these very principles to limit us at the time of the referendum.

SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: I know that the House would want me to respond to the hon. member for Kamloops and the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond and the hon. member for Annapolis Valley—Hants who have raised an issue here which is, to put it simply, that it is inappropriate for the government to move now for time allocation. Some comments that I have made in the past have been quoted and I have listened very carefully to what I once said.

The difficulty it seems to me that those proponents of the motion are in is that, as the hon. House leader points out, there have been changes in the rules and the government has followed exactly the course it must follow under the present rules which govern us.

There has been some suggestion that when the present rules were past it was without the full consent of all the members in the House and that may well have been the case. The Speaker's area of manoeuvre in acting on discretion is always somewhat circumscribed and in this case it clearly is very much constrained.

I have to advise the House that in my view the government has followed exactly what the rules of the House are. As a consequence, while I have listened with great interest and some sympathy to the points made by members of the opposition, nonetheless I must rule that the matter can go forward.

The House has heard the terms of the motion.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

Mr. Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Speaker: Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion, which was agreed to on the following division:

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed from Tuesday, December 8, consideration of Bill C-91, an act to amend the Patent Act, to amend another act in consequence thereof and to provide for other related matters, as reported with an amendment by a legislative committee, and of Motions Nos. 1 and 2.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Madam Speaker, it is a privilege to rise and speak against this bill.

I think it is important to reiterate what this bill is all about. It is not about extending patent protection for pharmaceutical drugs. It is about completely eliminating, for the entire 20-year patent period, the right of any generic manufacturer to produce a drug that is under patent and to compete with that drug on the open marketplace.

Not only are we completely eliminating a process of licensing generic drugs in the patent period and providing cheaper drugs for Canadians, but we are making it retroactive. This means that somebody, who a year ago had the right to produce a drug, will be told that that right was cancelled a year ago once this bill passes.

What is the impact going to be? The impact for Canadians is going to be higher drug costs. Right now, generic drugs being produced while the original is still under patent cost 53 per cent of the cost of the patent drug. That is a saving of 47 per cent for Canadian consumers.

Who benefits from this? The patent drug companies benefit from this. I will give just one example. The changes brought on with this legislation to one drug company will mean $1.3 billion. That is just from making this provision retroactive and preventing competition with one of their drugs in the marketplace.

One would think from what we have been hearing from the representatives of the drug manufacturers that generics were undermining the market and threatening to destroy the whole industry. Nothing could be further from the truth. Generic drugs account for only 8 per cent of the market leaving fully 92 per cent of the market to the patent drug manufacturers who claim they need the protection and the extended rights that this legislation provides. Not only that, but this patent drug industry is the most profitable industry in the Canadian economy and in the American economy.

I think we have to ask who pays for these great gains. As I said, there are billions of dollars of revenue to be gained by the drug companies. Seniors will pay. Taxpayers will pay through medicare. Anybody who is too poor to have a drug plan or works for a company that does not have drug plan will pay. That usually means lower-paid workers in our society. Every single taxpayer across this country will pay for the extra revenue and the extra profits to be generated for the drug companies that already represent the most profitable business in North America.

Insurance plans will pay. Many of us have plans that cover the cost of our drugs but those do not come without a cost either. Ultimately it is the medicare system that will pay.

We have growing concerns about the cost of our medicare system and anything that adds to that burden undermines continuing a universal accessible health care system for Canadians.

Four hundred million dollars a year is being saved by seniors, the poor, insurance companies, taxpayers and middle class taxpayers because we have generic drugs in this country.

We have heard fear-mongering that new drugs to serve the health needs of Canadians to cut our health care costs will not be produced if we do not pass this bill. What utter nonsense. Canada accounts for 2 per cent of the global patented drug market. Do not tell me that companies are not going to continue to produce drugs for the 98 per cent of the market.

An hon. member: Right on.

Mrs. Catterall: Although we consume and account for only 2 per cent of revenues, only 1 per cent of the research money is being spent in Canada. This is from the industry that five years ago said: "Give us extended patent protection and we will spend more money on research in Canada".

Only 1 per cent of the new drugs developed are developed in Canada although we are 2 per cent of the market. Far fewer drug company profits go into research in Canada than in the United States and other countries around the world. We are getting half of our share of research. This is from an industry that five years ago said: "Give us more of a free rein in the marketplace, remove our competition and we will do more in the way of research."

What we have in Canada is branch plant drug companies. We do not have basic research. We do not have the kind of foundation that this country wants to see in this industry that is the most profitable in our economy and it does not deserve the kind of protection that this Conservative government is now proposing to offer.

It is really astonishing to see this bill coming forward from a Conservative government. What is it talking about? This is the government that talks about free market. This is a bill that limits competition. It says that for 20 years one does not have to compete against anybody else.

It is offering the patent drug companies a protected market for 20 years. This is the government that talks about competitiveness. How can competitiveness flourish, however, when rules change in the middle of a game? A company that a year ago was able to produce a drug is told now that despite the money invested in getting that drug ready to come on the market, it is not going to be able to do that because the rules have changed and they have changed retroactively.

We talk about fairness. The generic companies now have permission to produce 22 patent drugs that will not come on the market and will not compete with patented drugs because this government is saying that the rules of the game are changing. The change goes back to last year. We are removing the permission to provide 22 different drugs at a lower cost to Canadians.

We talked about honesty. There is no honesty in the debate on this bill. It is not extending patent protection, it is entirely removing the right of any company to produce generic drugs as long as the patent lasts.

It is not true that GATT requires us to do this. The proposed changes to GATT have not even been approved. Even if approved they would allow one year for a country to act and even after that year there is no certainty that Canada would have to take this kind of action.

It is not true that NAFTA requires us to do this. How could NAFTA require us to do this when NAFTA has not even been introduced in this Chamber? It has not yet been debated and has not been approved.

If NAFTA tells us what we can and cannot do to provide health care for Canadian citizens then we do not need NAFTA. That is just one more reason to vote against it.

I want to say a few final words about the corruption I have seen in people's integrity around this issue. This government attempted to suppress a report from its own officials that showed what this bill would do to drug prices in Canada, a report that said that patent protection was not producing research now and would not in the future. The report by our government officials would have led us to the conclusion that we should be cancelling the 1987 Bill C-22 that extended patent protection rather than making it absolute as this bill proposes to do.

I and every member of this House resent it when officials are told not to tell the truth, when they are brought before a committee of Parliament and gagged, when they are prevented from telling the truth about the scientific and analytical work they have done.

With all the money that is being spent on lobbying for this bill, we must ask who gains and who loses. Those who gain are the most profitable industries in this country. Those who lose are seniors, the poor, and the taxpayers, those least able to afford to pay to increase those profits.

To conclude, I do not think that we are here as government and as Parliament, to benefit the most profitable segment of our economy at the expense of those least able to pay.

[Translation]

Mr. Gabriel Fontaine (Lévis): Madam Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to speak to Bill C-91 which I view as a particularly significant piece of legislation for the drug industry in the province of Quebec. It is well known that this bill has generated considerable controversy and goes back to Bill C-22. You will recall the uproar, both in the House and in the Senate, surrounding the passage of Bill C-22 which paved the way for the present situation allowing us now to strengthen the protection granted to companies involved in research.

The government is aiming at striking a balance between economic growth and consumer protection. Bill C-91 builds on the 1987 amendments to the Patent Act called, as I already mentioned, Bill C-22.

In 1987 the government took the first steps to stem the exodus of researchers and manufacturers who were deserting the Canadian drug industry in droves for a more welcoming climate. The 1987 amendments to the Patent Act were aimed at developing a policy favourable to research and innovation while protecting consumer interests.

As you know, Madam Speaker, it is essential to reward research if we want to promote a strong economy at a time where technological expertise and international competition are forever growing.

In other words, we want to keep drug developers in Canada in order to increase our research and technology capacity here and not elsewhere. We want companies to stay in Canada so that they employ our science graduates, invest in plant and equipment on Canadian territory, invest in research in universities, hospitals and other research centres, and export from Canada instead of importing from abroad. These are the objectives we want to achieve, together with a solid mechanism to control the price of patented medicine.

We never wanted to stimulate unbridled growth of the drug industry at consumers' expense. The spirit of our policy in 1987, as today, was to guarantee tight control of patented medicine prices so that the prices paid by Canadian consumers remain reasonable. We obtained this guarantee with the 1987 amendments, thanks to the Patented Medicine Prices Review Board. This board has done its duty and with the present bill, it will have more power.

Bill C-91 will authorize the board to reduce prices that are considered too high and to impose fines and prison terms on those who refuse to comply with its directives.

Detailed calculations allow us to predict that thanks to this new legislation, the amount spent by pharmacies and hospitals to buy all prescription and controlled drugs should not increase by more than 2 per cent a year from now until the year 2000.

Furthermore, between 1992 and 1996, thanks to Bill C-91, the total increase in the cost of patented medicine is estimated at $129 million, or approximately $25 million per year, which comes to $1 a year for every Canadian. I do not think that is too much to pay for a policy that stimulates research and development.

Thanks to this bill, Canada will reap the benefits of almost half a billion dollars more in investment by the innovative drug industry in the foreseeable future. That is a real balance between promoting economic growth and protecting consumers. Our achievements since 1987 attest to that.

Since 1987, the amendments to the Patent Act, better known as C-22, have borne fruit and their success continues to this day. Remember the criticism that the opposition Liberal Party and New Democratic Party made then. First, they maintained that the innovative drug industry would not keep the promises of investment that it had made to the government. Second, they said that the government would not be able to keep the price of patented medicine down; and third, that it would mean the end of generic drugs.

I would like to report on each of these issues. Concerning the first one, investment in research, the innovative drug industry has reached the promised objectives by doubling investment in research as a percentage of sales and it did this five years ahead of schedule.

This same industry has invested over a billion dollars in research and development in Canada over the last five years; $340 million went to universities, hospitals and other medical research establishments.

As for the second controversial issue, drug prices, the average annual increase in the price of existing patented medicine was about 2.9 per cent from 1987 to 1991. In the same period, the consumer price index rose 4.4 per cent a year. The increase was thus less than inflation between 1987 and 1991. This is an example of effective control of drug prices that completely refutes the objections raised in 1987 and should also make our opponents today think.

Other countries find that our drug price control system works. A study by the United States General Accounting Office on the price of 200 best-selling prescription drugs published in October showed that prices were about 32 per cent higher in the United States than in Canada. Half of the 200 drugs in the study cost wholesalers at least 50 per cent more in the United States; 27 per cent of these best-selling drugs cost wholesalers at least 100 per cent more in the U.S.; four of the ten most popular prescription drugs in the United States cost between 59 per cent and 278 per cent more in that country.

The American study concluded that one of the main causes of the price difference between the two countries was that the Canadian government had taken action, as the report says: "In setting their prices, Canadian manufacturers of patented drugs must comply with Canadian federal regulations controlling the price of new medication and increases in the price of existing drugs."

Obviously the Patented Medicine Prices Review Board has done a good job and our policy works. As for the third issue, the alleged disappearance of the generic drug industry in Canada, that has not happened. That industry has grown twice as fast as the pharmaceutical industry as a whole since 1987. Here again, the critics were wrong, and if they continue to use the same arguments today to oppose Bill C-91 they will be wrong again.

This legislation enables us to strike the balance that we sought between two important factor: on one hand, consumer protection is maintained through strict price regulation; and on the other, we have a healthy, vigorous, competitive drug industry, which is precisely the type of knowledge-based industry that Canada needs for its future.

We have succeeded in every respect with price control and a policy that welcomes investment. Today we ask the Liberal opposition and the New Democratic Party to co-operate, because our business people, our young university graduates and our young scientists need a law to protect their inventions. This is why we ask all members to pass this bill as quickly as possible, particularly to help the economic situation in Montreal and in Quebec.

[English]

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): One of the basic articles of faith of any parliamentary system is that the government tries to tell the truth and to give to its citizens a fair and accurate appraisal of important matters in front of it so that the people will at least have the right to make a choice as to the legitimacy of legislation, good or bad, based upon legitimate facts.

We have been told that the reason for Bill C-91 is that it must be in full accordance with international treaties being initiated by this government, particularly the General Agreement on Trades and Tariffs and the North American free trade agreement.

In particular, it has tried to justify the retroactivity clause by saying that we had to go back and meet the new GATT laws.

What it did not say is that there is not yet a new GATT law. There is a set of proposals being discussed but it has not been agreed to, and if the French farmers have anything to do with it, it will probably never be agreed to. That is in the realm of speculation.

What is more dangerous and I think more erosive of the principles of this House is that even in that proposed GATT agreement there is no requirement, no hard and fast rule, that a country abandon its compulsory licensing provisions.

For the Minister for International Trade to go on to the lecterns of this country, trying to sell this legislation on the basis that somebody made him do it over in Geneva is pure, unadulterated hogwash.

Article 30 of the proposed GATT agreement, page 70 reads: "Parties may provide limited exceptions to the exclusive rights conferred by a patent provided that such exceptions do not unreasonably conflict with normal exploitation of the patent and do not unreasonably prejudice the legitimate interest of the patent owner taking account the legitimate interests of third parties".

In other words, according to article 3 three of the GATT proposal that is now being said as being the compelling reason why we must do Bill C-91, the Canadian government could properly argue that any drug monopoly will have a severe impact on the Canadian health care system, third parties such as seniors or sick people, and therefore have a legitimate reason for applying for an exemption under the GATT. Anybody who says differently is not telling the truth, is misleading Canadians and is attempting to bias the debate in this country to serve a particular purpose.

That is not even enough. Let us go to article 31(b) of the proposed GATT agreement and see how ironclad an obligation this is. I have the agreement here if anybody wants to read it. It is only about 400 pages long. I am going to read the quote directly:

"Where the law of a party allows for the other use of subject matter of a patent without authorization of the right holder, including use by the government or third parties, the following provision shall be respected: such use may only be permitted if part of such use the proposed user has made efforts to obtain authorization and this requirement may be waived by a party in the case of a national emergency or other circumstances of extreme urgency or in cases of public non-commercial use".

What is the public health care system of Canada if not a public non-commercial use? Do we not have a public health care system province by province? Is it not designed to ensure that all Canadians receive fair and equal medical treatment at the lowest cost possible? Does that not become fair, honest, serious grounds for exemption under the proposed GATT proposal? Of course it does.

We continue to have the voices of deception in this country led by this government trying to sell it as if somehow we must yield to some kind of holy obligation. If you go back to article 8 of the GATT agreement, in terms of setting out general principles: "Parties may, in formulating or amending their national laws or regulations in relation to patent law, adopt measures necessary to protect public health and nutrition and to promote the public interest in sectors of vital importance to their socio-economic and technological development".

That is the basic principle of the GATT agreement, that we have a right to defend our public health and our socio-economic system.

I charge this government, with no uncertainty, of misleading Canadians by saying that we need Bill C-91 and that we need the retroactive clause to meet the GATT agreement. It is simply not the truth. It is about time the Minister for International Trade owned up to fact he can no longer tell the truth because he no longer understands what it is.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, that is according to the text.

Therefore, any validity or credibility this government had that is prepared to defend the public interest of Canada gets flushed down the tube by the very words of what it says it has to obey. It is heresy. The Conservatives are misinterpreting their responsibilities under the GATT rule.

The NAFTA agreement is the government's own concoction. The countries of the world did not come up with NAFTA. It is what the government is writing into it. However, it was so stupid and so idiotic that it was prepared to sign an agreement that would allow the Mexicans to have an eight-year transition period for their own public drug companies but we could not bargain the same thing for ours.

It is incredible and it is unbelievable. Yet the Prime Minister and the minister of trade stomp across Canada saying: "NAFTA is good for you". Sure it is good for you. It is good for a $2 billion swallow of increased cost for you. It is good for their friends, it is good for their corporate buddies, and it is good for their allies. It may be good for getting them jobs after they get defeated but it sure is not good for the Canadian people.

That is the real reason. The real reason is not in the trade agreements. I will concede that when drafting NAFTA, in copying the GATT they tended to forget. They included the first part of the proposal, which requires the phasing out of compulsory licensing, but they did not live up to the honour and the word of the GATT proposal, which provided clear exemptions for compulsory licensing.

Mr. Edwards: Tories like Judy Erola.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I hear the Conservatives raising the name of one of my former associates, as if somehow the Liberal Party and the present caucus must be held responsible for the vagaries of one of its members.

If they answered for the vagaries of all their former associates they would be attending parole board hearings every single day of the year.

Let us not use that as an excuse. Let us get down to the merits of the case. There is nothing under GATT that would require Canada to implement Bill C-91. If there was any court of justice that required some sense of veracity and verity from a minister, the Minister for International Trade would be given the longest sentence possible.

He would be incarcerated for the rest of his life, because he has told the biggest whopper which has cost Canadians more money than any criminal we could possibly imagine. It is a bigger heist than the Brinks robbery, to use that argument.

The whole reality of what we are debating disappears. It vanishes. It is not there. It is ephemeral. It is made up. It is a fantasy. That is why we are simply saying that they cannot with any honesty justify this proposal with those arguments.

We must restore a sense of trust in Canadians so they can feel that their members of government and Parliament are at least prepared to deal with the truth. I would say there is only one way to restore credibility, and that is to withdraw Bill C-91 and make a serious examination of how Canada can live up to its proper international obligations and at the same time use the law as it has been proposed to ensure that we protect the public health and the public interest of the Canadian people.

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, throughout all the debates on this bill we must not overlook or minimize the fact that one of the fundamental objectives of this legislation concerns questions of protection and of rewarding people's investments in discovery.

In essence, that is what the patent protection bill is all about. Bill C-91 will help us open doors to world markets, contributing to the stimulation of this country's economy. As Professor Labrie of Laval University said so effectively in his presentation before the legislative committee last week: "We will have to adapt as quickly as possible to the rules of world-wide markets before all the seats are taken by others who have reacted more quickly and more vigorously than us".

He went on to say that: "While Canada's medical sector is recognized internationally for its excellence, opportunities will be largely lost if its work cannot be translated into economic spin-offs for exports and into the new drugs needed by Canadians for better health care".

Bill C-91 is very much a question of encouraging and recognizing discovery. It is also very much a question of fairness. We have spoken at length about protecting the consumer through strong patented drug price controls and of encouraging investments in a high technology industry with the resulting benefits of job creation and export development potential.

However, the whole question of fairness and recognition for innovation is also very important to the government, and it should be just as important to the people of this country.

It is the government's belief that innovation deserves to be recognized. If there is no protection or reward for such effort, that effort will eventually stagnate or move to where it is recognized. We well know that Canada lags behind all of its major international competitors in the patent protection it accords to pharmaceutical products.

Even though the full patent term award is 20 years, we must not lose sight of the fact that the period of actual product development testing, et cetera for new medicine comprises roughly 10 of those 20 years. Although that leaves 10 years for the marketing of that product under patent protection, present legislation permits others to copy the medicine after it has been on the market for only about seven of those ten years.

Consequently, while a company has a patent on a product for the last three years of that patent period somebody else can copy it and market it under a compulsory licence.

This seven-year period of market exclusivity in Canada lags behind that of the United States, where it is 14 years. It lags behind those of countries in Europe, where market exclusivity of pharmaceutical products is 15 years. Our regime of patent protection for pharmaceuticals, featuring compulsory licensing with a period of market exclusivity of only about seven years compared to these much longer periods elsewhere, simply does not measure up. Canada is losing out because of it.

Bill C-91 will go a long way toward changing that situation. This legislation will add on average about three years to the period of market exclusivity in Canada. It does not add 20 years to the period of market exclusivity—or 10 years or whatever other number of years critics across the way are saying it adds—it simply adds about three years of market exclusivity to the patented pharmaceutical product.

By doing that the legislation brings the Canadian drug patent regime closer to those of our international competitors so that Canada can once again compete for research and development projects, and particularly for investment dollars.

Although the practice of protection of intellectual property may seem to be a complicated affair the reasons behind it are really very simple when we strip away the legalese and the jargon. It is a straightforward affair. It stimulates invention and new technology. It recognizes people for developing a better mousetrap, except in this case we are not talking about mouse traps but about new medicines and new cures for treatments of ailments and diseases that afflict Canadians and people throughout the world.

Without patents on those inventions there really would be little motivation for people to develop those inventions. Why should someone invest years of effort and large sums of money when others can copy the work of the inventor with no obligation? In this situation, people will stop inventing and people will stop investing.

By adopting this legislation, we will be providing the pharmaceutical sector in Canada with the same conditions of patent protection as are available to all other sectors of our Canadian economy. As it is now, pharmaceutical inventions are not treated the way that inventions in other sectors of the economy are treated. For example, the patent for a new plastic compound receives full market exclusivity for the patent holder for 20 years.

Why not the same for the developer or the creator of a new medicine? We should all agree that it is only fair that all sectors of the economy should be treated the same way when it comes to recognition for a discovery.

That is the major reason we are going forward with Bill C–91. I urge this House to adopt the bill. It is good for Canada, it is good for Canadians.

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, one could accuse the government of being high on drugs but that would not be parliamentary. I suspect that it is high on the drug companies.

Just who are these people? A veritable who's who, no doubt: Bristol–Myers, Squibb, Hewlett–Packard, Johnson & Johnson, Monsanto, and Procter & Gamble. There is absolutely no doubt they are the poor people on the block. There is an old saying: "A spoonful of sugar makes the medicine go down". Well, this is a poison pill for Canadians across this country. A report in the 1960s said that drug prices in Canada were among the highest in the world. They corrected the problem. Now we are in a situation where the drug companies have reduced the price of drugs by 20 per cent and sometimes 30 per cent. They are saying: "That is not good. We have to jack those prices up and make them more expensive".

The member from Winnipeg talked about GATT. That is important. That is the legal slant on this particular bill and what the government has put forward as its argument. It has been proven to be fallacious. The average Canadian no doubt has a difficult time understanding what GATT is and some of us in these seats have difficulty understanding it also. However, what they do understand is that the price of drugs will continue to spiral as a result of C–91.

An hon. member: They are going straight up. They are not even spiralling.

Mr. Butland: They are not spiralling, they are going straight up. Constituents by the dozens in my riding were calling me just about a year ago, asking me: "What happened to this particular drug? The Ontario government says it is not going to pay for it anymore under OHIP". Upon further research it was indicated that the drug companies had increased the price twelvefold. After investigating, we asked: "What is the difference". The toothless Prices Review Board said: "Well, they are under investigation right now". The details of that investigation given to me revealed that they had repackaged the drug. "It is a new improved drug with better results, therefore, we have to increase the price of the drug 12 times."

I cite from some of the actual statutes of the Prices Review Board. The first consists of new strengths of an existing dosage form or comparable dosage form of an existing drug product, a line extension. The second includes drug products that constitute a substantial improvement over other drugs because of significant improvements in the therapeutic effects or important savings to the Canadian health care system. It is impossible to document, therefore, the Prices Review Board says: "There is not really anything we can do. We will have to allow the prices to increase tenfold, twelvefold and there is not a darned thing we can do about it".

Who is to prove how much more substantial a new product or an old product under a new disguise or a new camouflage is going to be for people. The Ontario government says: "We cannot afford these prices under the OHIP program". Therefore they take it off the list. The constituent says: "I cannot afford the $100 a month to pay for the drug bill". Who is at fault? I suspect the people at the top are at fault. but the person at the bottom of the heap always pays the price.

These are drugs that are absolutely essential to these people; life-threatening without them and they cannot afford to pay $100 a month. We can talk about GATT, NAFTA, free trade, patents and compulsory licences, but the bottom line is that average Canadians will pay considerably more. Really, once the bill is passed we will never know because there will be no effective police individual to look after the interests of Canadians.

I want to say when Bill C-22 was passed, the president of the Pharmaceutical Manufacturers' Association of Canada said: "This means the beginning of a new era in Canadian biomedical research".

An hon. member: They meant bigger profits.

Mr. Butland: A new era. Four years later the era is over and we are embarking upon a new era I suppose. It is the shortest era in history.

An hon. member: Hot era.

Mr. Butland: Hot era, that's a good line.

She was telling Canadians that their drug laws were not up to international snuff, but then Judy Erola was insisting Canada is the odd man out.

We certainly do not want to be the odd person out in the international world because our prices are a little bit too low. We would not want that to happen. That just would not be appropriate.

This is the second time in the four years that I have been here that the word retroactivity has been mentioned in legislation. The last time it was not all that noxious or consequential, but this time there is no doubt about it.

Today I received a fax—I did not know those Glaxos or Eli companies existed out there—saying "Dear Mr. Butland, we are delighted to tell you that we are going to invest $170 million". Isn't that wonderful? Today I got the fax.

It was purely fortuitous, purely coincidental that it would happen today when we are debating Bill C-91. We are hearing from all of these people. I understand they are jamming the faxes. They are all going to invest, invest, invest. It is no darn wonder. I would invest too if I were making the profits they are making.

The Americans have been unabashed in telling us in books, in reports and discussion papers about trade deals. This is what it is all about. I remember the Shamrock summit. It was indicated that President Reagan and the Prime Minister were discussing this and Mr. Reagan was particularly upset with the Prime Minister, saying that we have to move forward, we have to get Canada in line and he was very disappointed with us.

The Prime Minister, not wanting to disappoint the President, has brought this forward at the behest of his good friends in the pharmaceutical companies of this country and of course they are, as someone has pointed out, only branch plants of the multinationals.

This is a reprehensible bill and it is a bitter pill for Canadians to swallow at this particular time. Once again this bill is going to be shoved through Parliament. The last bill shoved through at Christmas was a claw-back bill. When everybody is into their world of good spirits of the Christmas season is when this government acts. That is when it acts quickly. That is when it must be watched even more closely, with more scrutiny.

Here we are at Christmas time and the very last bill we are going to pass in this Parliament is going to hurt Canadians. It is going to cost Canadians. The Grinch stole this Christmas and last Christmas, but I expect this will be the last Christmas it will have an opportunity because on this side of the House the New Democratic Party will vociferously oppose this bill. We only wish we had more time to oppose it.

Mr. Lee Richardson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, first of all I want to comment on a couple of points made by the previous speaker because I think there may be some misunderstanding as to why Canada no longer wants to be, in his words, the odd man out in terms of international law and international agreements, why countries around the world respect each other's patent legislation the same as they respect each other's copyright legislation.

If it is too difficult for the member to follow in terms of patents maybe we could talk about something as easy as copyright. An Anne Murray produces a record in Canada and would like to get royalties when her records and CDs are played in the United States. We recognize other countries' patent legislation and copyright legislation, and they respect ours.

If Canada is the only industrialized country in the world that does not have 20-year patent legislation, then why would other countries want to respect our patents?

The world has become a global community and if we do not respect the patent legislation of other countries, they certainly will not respect ours. If we are going to short-cut the system, if we are going to peel off a couple of extra years, kind of cheat the international system, abrogate GATT and other international agreements, then pretty soon other nations are going to start looking at Canada as they look at some banana republic that does not respect patent legislation anywhere in the world, that does not respect copyright legislation. That is only one point I wanted to mention.

He also talked about this era of investment that began in 1987. I would like to take a look at that era of investment and how it has not started today with the announcement of a $170 million research and development program in his area, but how it has been happening all across this country for the past four years, and how it will continue.

In 1987 Parliament passed Bill C-22, an act to strengthen the pharmaceutical patent legislation. At that time there was a furore over its implementation and the perceived effect it would have on Canadian research and development, drug prices and the generic drug manufacturers, the same kind of hullabaloo that we are hearing from the opposition today.

I would like to go over with members what type of research and development has occurred in Canada since 1987 and what the industry plans to achieve over the next three to four years.

In 1987, as part of the implementation of Bill C-22, the innovative drug companies promised to double the research and development to sales ratio to 10 per cent by 1996 if the country improved patent protection.

Mr. Speaker, Canada did. We passed Bill C-22 and the companies more than delivered on their promises. They essentially met their commitment by 1991, five years ahead of schedule, doubling their research and development expenditures in Canada.

The question that many Canadians may ask, however, is how much of this investment went to the regions of Canada? Was it all in central Canada, or were there jobs in research and development for the regions? Also, are there likely to be benefits for the regions in the future as part of the new legislation being debated?

As I mentioned earlier, it is apparent that the patent pharmaceutical manufacturers have more than delivered on their 1987 promise. The innovative industry has spent close to $1.1 billion on research and development in Canada since the Patent Act amendments of 1987. In 1991 alone, a year of recession in this country, research spending by innovative pharmaceutical companies totalled $376 million, a 23 per cent increase over 1990.

How many other industries in Canada saw such a growth in capital investment in that same period? It is readily apparent that the Canadian pharmaceutical industry is a Canadian success story that government should applaud and assist. In doing so, the industry will be encouraged to spread its success to all regions of Canada in an environment of co-operation and achievement.

These achievements have already begun to pay dividends in the regions of Canada that in the past were not traditional centres for investment in research and development.

Since 1987 and the revisions to the Patent Act, the innovative companies have created 2,400 jobs in Canada. These jobs are quality, long-term jobs that the regions of this country need to diversify and strengthen their resource-based economies. These jobs also attract the best students and professors for the universities that want to expand their horizons into the high-tech world of pharmaceutical development.

Perhaps the best way to understand what the effect of Bill C-22 has had on areas outside of central Canada is to examine the amount of investment into research and development that has occurred in these areas since its implementation. The Patented Medicine Prices Review Board has reported that in the period 1988-91 industry investment in research and development in Manitoba showed a 119 per cent increase. That is why the hon. member for Winnipeg South supports the bill.

Mrs. Dobbie: Absolutely.

Mr. Richardson: In the same period, industry investment in research and development in Saskatchewan increased by 170 per cent. In B.C. the increase in investment was 72 per cent. In my own province of Alberta, a leader in pharmaceutical research, current investment is at record levels, a point which I will dwell on a little further in a moment.

These numbers dramatically demonstrate that the innovative pharmaceutical manufacturers have spread their research and development spending across the country in a fashion unlike any other sector. The research community in the regions of Canada recognize the importance of this new legislation in order to foster an investment climate that will promote research and development, and the people across Canada recognize the importance of this legislation. I am sure that each of them hopes that new investment will find its way to laboratories and research facilities in their part of the country.

An important question for the people outside of central Canada concerns the ramifications for their economies if this legislation is not passed in the coming weeks.

The passing of this legislation is directly linked to job creation over the coming years in regions across the country.

On June 14, 1992 Bristol–Myers, Squibb announced that it would be spending $250,000 on a research and development project at the University of Alberta, and on October 6, Glaxo announced it would spend $15 million at the University of Alberta. The people of Alberta understand; they know this development research money is going to our universities creating jobs in Alberta.

On July 15, Bristol–Myers, Squibb announced it would spend $500,000 on research and development at the University of British Columbia.

On September 1, 1992 Merck Frosst Canada Inc. announced it would spend $15 million on research at the University of British Columbia.

On October 5, 1992 Ayerst announced it would build a new $60 million plant in Brandon, Manitoba. These are the types of announcements that the people in the regions of this country want to hear and they know the long–term benefits for both jobs and the health of their communities.

The Canadian Genetic Diseases Network is one of 15 research networks sponsored by the Government of Canada's $240 million Network of Centres of Excellence program. It has already announced remarkable breakthroughs in isolating the genetic defects responsible for cystic fibrosis, muscular dystrophy and myotonic dystrophy.

I do not think there is a person in this room who does not think that this important work needs to be done on an urgent basis to save the lives of people with these crippling diseases.

This work is also likely to create 10 new faculty positions at UBC, representing a tremendous opportunity for researchers in Canada. They will become involved in leading edge research and development in one of the most exciting areas of science and technology.

I have spent a lot of time discussing what effect this legislation will have on western Canada but I can assure the House that the same sort of optimism exists in the east in Atlantic Canada.

As recently as December 2, 1992 Marion Merrell Dow (Canada) Inc. announced it was going to establish a cardiac prevention research centre at Dalhousie University. This centre is funded in its entirety by Marion Merrell Dow, one of Canada's largest innovative pharmaceutical companies.

It is hoped that the work conducted at the cardiac prevention research centre will lead to effective prevention programs in the fight against coronary heart disease.

The provincial minister of health in Nova Scotia, the Hon. George Moody, has stated of the centre:

> Marion Merrell Dow is one of the first pharmaceutical companies to recognize the leadership role of Dalhousie in health research. The initiative is a direct investment in the future health of our province.

All regions of this country support the type of research and investment, ongoing commitment which can better the health of all Canadians.

In conclusions, the reasons why I support Bill C-91 are clear. It is good for Canada, good for the Canadian health research and development and good for the regions of this country.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I have stood in this House many times and complimented the government on its tactical skills and I have mentioned many times how it seems to have a superior ability when it comes to communications.

On this bill the government is going to discover within a very few months that the tactic it has used to push this piece of legislation through the House of Commons and this bill are going remove this government from office.

Earlier today we heard the chairman of the—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret I have to interrupt the hon. member because he has spoken on this grouping. There have been a lot of speakers and I had to check it out first before I recognized the hon. member. This is the same grouping and he cannot speak on it.

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, Bill C-91 builds upon the success of the Patent Act amendments of 1967, then known as Bill C-22.

The members of this House will remember very well the hue and cry of the opposition back then that the sky would fall on consumers and on the generic drug sector if Bill C-22 were passed.

It was also predicted back then that the promises of investment if we reinstated the patent protection for pharmaceuticals on the part of the innovative companies would not be kept.

• (1750)

Critics claim loudly and vigorously by that the powers of the Patented Medicine Prices Review Board would never be sufficient to control patent drug prices. Strangely enough, most of the same claims can be heard today from the opposition concerning Bill C-91. Bill C-22 has been a great success story. There is no reason for Bill C-91 to be any different.

The innovated companies have met the commitments the government asked of them in 1987. In some areas they have done better than they committed to do. There is no reason to doubt that they will carry through on their new investment promises related to the announcement of the government's new policy, with such planned investments totalling over $500 million to date and still counting.

In 1987, the innovative drug companies promised to double their research and development spending in a ratio—-

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. I am sorry to interrupt the proceedings, but if you check your rule book, you will see that members when they speak in the House are not allowed to read a speech. They can only refer very briefly from time to time to notes.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I do not believe that the hon. member is reading the speech. I think he has some notes that he is referring to. The hon. member has the floor.

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Speaker, I hope that time is added to my speech. In due respect, I very seldom stick to the script as I will tonight. The reason I am doing that is there has been so much distortion of that bill on the other side of the House, it is time that some of us put clearly on the record what this bill does and what it will do for the Canadian economy.

It is very unfair for the member to stand up and do what he has just done. He has been around here a lot longer than I have and I think in fairness he realizes that very seldom in debate do I have to step through the facts and figures as clearly as I have to tonight. It is very important that the facts and only the facts be laid on the line tonight. That is what I will attempt to do.

In 1987 the innovative drug companies promised to double their research and development spending in a ratio of sales of 10 per cent by 1996 if the government improved patent protection. Canada did and the companies more than delivered on their promises. They essentially met their commitment by 1991, five years ahead of schedule.

The innovative industry has spent close to $1.1 billion on research and development in Canada since the Patent Act amendments of 1987. In 1991 alone, a year of recession, in this country and others as well research spending by innovative pharmaceutical companies totalled $376 billion, a 23 per cent increase over 1990. How many other industries in Canada saw such growth in their capital expenditures? I do not think too many of them did.

The pharmaceutical industry in Canada is a success story of which we should very proud. The highest increase in house R and D expenditures of all industries in Canada over the period of 1988 to 1992 was achieved by the pharmaceutical industry; a 113 per cent growth, according to Statistics Canada in a report published in 1992. Spending on R and D by the pharmaceutical companies or the industry as a per cent of sales is five times greater than Canada's manufacturing industry.

Since the 1987 revisions of the Patent Act, the innovative companies have created 2,400 jobs in Canada. The system that has been in place since 1987 has worked very well on the economic development score.

Another concern of the opposition in 1987 were drug prices and the controls upon those prices. Bluntly put, the Patented Medicine Prices Review Board was set up in Bill C-22. It was not supposed to work according to the critics, but it has. There is no reason to believe that the board with its expanded powers under Bill C-91 will not continue to effectively control the prices of patented medicines in the future.

Let me put the board's role in perspective. The board is responsible only for patent drug price changes. Where the board does have jurisdiction it has been extremely effective. Since its creation in 1987, price increases for existing patent drugs have risen by an average of only 2.9 per cent a year while the consumer price index has risen by an average of 4.4 per cent. Therefore, we have kept patent drug price increases well below the rate of inflation and we will continue to do so. This is a very strong record of effectively controlling patent drug prices and it completely discredits the criticisms of 1987 as well as those today regarding Bill C-91.

Furthermore, it is becoming increasingly evident to others in the world that our system of drug price control works. A recent study by the General Accounting Office of the United States government, looking at the pricing of the 200 biggest selling medicines in the U.S., established that the wholesale drug prices in Canada were 32 per cent lower on average than those in the United States. Interestingly enough, the opposition never mentions that.

One-half of the drugs studied cost wholesalers at least 50 per cent more in the United States. Of the 200 top selling drugs, 27 of them cost wholesalers at least 100 per cent more in the United States. Three drugs cost at least 500 per cent more in the United States. Furthermore, 4 of the 10 top selling drugs in the United States cost between 59 per cent and 278 per cent more in the United States than in Canada.

Since there are no differences in manufacturers' costs in the two countries, the study concluded that the major source of the difference in drug prices between the United States and Canada is to be found in the actions of the Canadian government through the Patented Medicine Prices Review Board. This is a board that we set up. It relies on provincial formularies with their concentrated purchasing power to refuse to list overpriced medicines.

Clearly the Patented Medicine Prices Review Board is doing its job. To make sure it continues to do its job, Bill C-91 will strengthen and expand its powers.

Another element of the doomsday scenario of the critics of this bill and our patent drug bill in 1987 had to do with the supposed disappearance of the generic pharmaceutical manufacturing sector in Canada. The generic sector grew rapidly in the years preceding 1987. It followed the policy which the previous government instituted in 1969 to allow any company to license a patent product from a brand name company in exchange for a 4 per cent royalty fee.

This policy, although it led to the creation of a growing sector of companies that copied products developed by others, caused the international innovative sector in Canada to look for more welcome homes elsewhere. They looked in other countries in search of protection for their inventions and research efforts.

Bill C-22 was meant to reverse the outflow of economic activity away from Canada in an industry with a strong scientific and manufacturing heritage in this country. The intent of Bill C-22 was to reinstate a policy of recognizing discovery and rewarding innovation while balancing that with the protection of the interests of consumers.

Mr. Speaker, how much time do I have left?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): You are finished. The hon. member's time has expired and that includes the intervention. The new speaker is the hon. member for York Centre.

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, we are here speaking on a closure motion. I would like to begin by saying that if there ever was a demonstration of the smash and grab tactic used by this government, then this is it. There has never been a bill of such major importance to so many millions of Canadians, especially the elderly and those in ill health, that has been pushed through so quickly. As so many speakers have noted, it has been pushed through quickly for no valid reason other than to make sure that as few waves as possible are made and that the Canadian people do not find out what this government is smashing and who is grabbing with this particular piece of legislation.

However, it is as my colleague, the member for Broadview–Greenwood who just spoke briefly, said. This is a time bomb because the effect of this bill will come through to the Canadian people and it will not be very many months before they realize how misleading the government has been in the statements that it has made about this bill.

One of the theme songs of this government and one of the lovely melodies that it has played time and time again as it has inflicted its philosophy on the Canadian people over the last eight years is harmonization. What a wonderful word.

What does the government mean by harmonization? It means that the United States of America is the big time. It is the one that knows how to do everything right. It is the one that knows how to run an economy. It is the one that knows how to run a society. We are a backwater where we do not know how to do anything right. The quicker the government can bring us into harmony with every practice and every melody of the United States, the happier it will be.

When it took over in 1984 it found Canada to be a sheltered workshop. This was a place where we took care of each other. This was a place where we were prepared to interfere in the way the market operated. This was a place where one did not have to show one's credit card to get admitted into a hospital and did not have to pay for drugs if one was covered by some public programs as well as by the many private programs that existed.

The government's philosophy has been—in every area and as fast as it could—to bring us into line with the way they do it in the wonderful country to the south. That includes health care.

I heard a number of speakers in tonight's debate say: "We are the odd man out. We cannot be the odd man out. We cannot do things our own way". What makes us think that we are allowed to have a national health care program that works on our own terms, where its success has been proven and where its popularity with the Canadian people has been demonstrated every time it is challenged. This time the popularity will be challenged too.

"You odd man out, you Canada", they have said to us, "Get into line. Stop doing things your own way. Start doing things the way they are done in the United States".

A number of speakers have said that intellectual property has to be encouraged and recognized. They are absolutely right. No one would want to bother inventing anything commercially and so on if there was not a reward for it. The question is how much of a reward should there be.

Our doctors practise medicine in this country at a great financial disadvantage compared to the United States. This is what we are told. The good ones could go to the United States and make a lot more money. Many do that. That has not stopped us from limiting the income for doctors and from saying: "You've worked hard to become a doctor. You've exercised your profession with some skill. You deserve some recompense. You deserve, by the way, to be part of the highest paid occupation—by far—in our country".

Under our present medicare system we say: "However, there is a limit. You can't extra bill. You can't charge more than the tariff that we provide". We accept that. Doctors seem to accept it. At least there is a line-up to get into every medical school in this country. It cannot be that terrible.

On the drug side, however, we are told that we are not allowed to do things in the Canadian way. We are not allowed to decide how much intellectual property should be rewarded.

I think, just like the doctors, people who invent drugs should be well paid. Prices charged for drugs should recognize there is a degree of innovation and incentive to be put into this system and that we want to encourage invention and discovery and all the rest of it. I think we do that in the system we have.

Compulsory licensing is not theft. Compulsory licensing is not piracy. Compulsory licensing is a Canadian way of compensating the drug companies in a way which has made them the most profitable manufacturing business in Canada over the last few years.

It is since we had compulsory licensing and since the Tories began to take it away. They threw it out. Like the doctors who are in the highest paid profession, the drug companies have been the highest paid manufacturing companies. I do not think they have any right to complain that there is something wrong with our system of rewarding intellectual property.

Of course they have a right to complain but I am disagreeing with their argument. I say they have not made a compelling case and they need us to move to what they call a favourable climate for doing more research and development.

I want to talk about that for a moment. I can hear the drug companies say: We cannot go on working in this country because we are at a disadvantage here. If our taxes were too high, if our labour laws were too onerous, if our environmental standards and our pollution standards were too high, but they are not complaining about any of those things.

Those are the factors of government policy on which they could legitimately complain if we were out of line. The way in which we reward patents has nothing to do with the incentive to do research and development in our country. If they invent or discover something here, they will get all the world's patent protection that they would get if they had invented it in the United States.

However, they would be subject in Canada to what Canadians, I believe, consider a fair and appropriate reward for what they do. Therefore, they cannot get away with the argument that they need a more favourable climate to do research and development. It is baldly this: They are saying it is a sovereign Canada. We want a more favourable return if we are going to do research and development.

I know I do not have a lot more time, but I want to say a word about the significance of research and development. I think it is wonderful. It is great to have it going on in the country. It provides high paying jobs for a small number of our brightest Canadians who I am happy to encourage to stay in the country. We pay a lot to get that. As taxpayers, we put in a big subsidy and a big incentive for them.

If we were also to agree to this legislation, we would be giving them for the $500 million that is promised a very big return in the form of much higher drug prices, estimated by credible witnesses at about $7 billion. Maybe that figure is higher than the true figure, but the government is not willing to have an adequate debate about that.

Its smash and grab tactic is preventing us from really looking at the figures and deciding who is right and who is not. I would like to say one final thing about research and development. What we like about research and development is that if something is discovered, it will be manufactured here. Then there will be hundreds of jobs for other Canadians who are not university graduates, maybe, and who are not the brightest and the best who are doing the research.

It is kind of the front line for all the work that goes in behind successful research and development. However, those drug companies will not give that work to Canada. If anything was ever discovered here—I hope it is and things have been discovered here even while we have had compulsory licensing—by one of those international drug companies, it is going to be made in Puerto Rico, not in Canada.

In Puerto Rico, they have a deal where they do not pay any taxes at all on manufacturing that is done in the drug area. What is so exciting about getting this research and development here? Are we getting a commitment that if they discover anything, it is going to be made here? Absolutely not. Are we getting an iron clad commitment even that they will do more research and development? No, we are not.

We know that their business will expand in Canada in the future even if compulsory licensing continues because the market is growing. Our population is aging. More drugs and more things are being discovered. They need people here whether they like it or not just to process their applications to sell patent medicines in this country.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret the hon. member's time has expired.

[Translation]

Mr. Gaby Larrivée (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to rise in the House and support the motion at the report stage of Bill C–91, to amend the Patent Act.

• (1810)

The government tabled its bill in the House of Commons on June 23, and on September 17 the bill was debated at second reading.

The time has come to put this legislation before both Houses of Parliament so that it can be passed and given Royal Assent, after third and final reading. To be able to operate on the same level as other industrialized countries, we must have legislation that is in line with today's modern legislation on intellectual property. We see the bill before the House today as one of the most advanced of its kind.

We have before us legislation that is designed to promote science and technology, the acquisition of marketable experience and the ability of our researchers to meet current challenges on international markets. Providing better patent protection will help us achieve these objectives.

We have here in Canada everything we need to play a leading role in pharmaceutical research. The standard of medicine in this country is well regarded. We have a health care system that is the envy of the entire world. We have a skilled labour force, and we are now doing everything that is necessary to enhance those skills. Our tax credits are among the most generous in the world.

However, until now, something essential was lacking. We needed protection for intellectual property that was in line with the protection offered in other industrialized countries: patent legislation that would make us better able to compete for investment in research and development.

Since 1984, the government has set a high priority on intellectual property legislation, reform as part of its efforts to provide for a dynamic economy.

Today I would like to give an overview of Bill C–91, to refresh our memories and urge all members of this House to support this bill unanimously. I will answer a number of fundamental questions. What kind of amendments are we proposing to the 1987 Patent Act? What will be the principal benefits of the new legislation? Will the Canadian public also benefit from these amendments? How will it make us better able to meet the challenges in the pharmaceutical sector, on Canadian and international markets?

By reinforcing the Patent Act, we want to promote investment in an advanced technology sector. We also want to make Canada better able to compete on international markets for pharmaceutical products. It is a sector in which competition is intense, and we must make up for lost time. I am not an alarmist, but I think we should realize that we are lagging behind and that we must act now.

With the new amendments, Canada will eliminate compulsory licensing and bring its patent system into line with those of its trading partners. That is one of the main points of the new legislation. Patent holders will, from now on, be guaranteed protection for 20 years, the same period granted patent holders in all other economic sectors.

The proposed legislation will be an incentive for Canadians to develop new drugs in Canada, thus making it possible to reduce health care costs in the long run, another important aspect of this bill.

We must not forget that in recent years innovative companies discovered and developed 32 new drugs in this country, including drugs to treat cancer, Parkinson's disease and diabetes.

Last year the innovative sector of the pharmaceutical industry spent $84 million on research in universities and hospitals. Since 1987, the last time the government improved protection for drug patents, the innovative industry, which now has 18,000 employees, created 2,400 new highly-skilled jobs.

In 1987 again, the innovative industry promised to double its ratio of R and D to sales by 1996, provided the government reinforced patent protection. As of 1991, nearly five years earlier than originally planned, this objective had almost been achieved by the industry.

I might add that since the government announced last January its intention to remove compulsory licensing, the innovative companies responded by promising to invest an extra $500 million in our country between 1992 and 1996, $90 million of which in areas outside of central Canada.

Basic research on pharmaceutical products accounts for over 26 per cent of the research and development done in this country, roughly the same as in other industrialized countries. Between 1987 and 1991 the innovators in the industry spent about $1.1 billion on research and development. Between 1988 and 1991 investments grew from $30.3 million to $94.2 million just for basic research.

On June 19, 1992, Statistics Canada reported that, between 1988 and 1992 the pharmaceutical industry had registered the highest rate of growth—113 per cent—among Canadian industries in terms of R and D investments.

New products will translate into substantial sales because of the global product mandating of companies in Canada. We are at the crossroads and this legislation comes just at the right moment, as the statistics I just quoted indicate.

World class innovative companies have already decided to grant new product mandates to their Canadian plants. New investments in R and D, new scientific and technical jobs, spin-offs for other industries and increased sales abroad add up to improved Canadian competitiveness on the global market.

With the elimination of compulsory licensing, the purchase price of all the prescribed drugs and scheduled drugs that hospitals and drugstores buy should not go up, at least not for the first year. On the other hand, and this deserves to be stressed, this increase in research leading to the development of new, more effective drugs is likely to bring health costs down in Canada, if combined with improved management practices.

On the latter subject, the federal and provincial health ministers are totally in agreement and are committed to working together toward this end.

I have heard opposition members say that government was proceeding too hastily. They seem to forget that we have some $500 million in investments at stake here. Innovative pharmaceutical companies have promised to spend that much when the government announced, last January, that it was going to strengthen patent protection.

These investments are vital at a time when the pharmaceutical industry is undergoing restructuring. Many other countries would like to take advantage of such investments. As a matter of fact, if Canada does not act quickly enough, it may find this door now opening forever closed. That would be very detrimental to our country.

I see that my time is up.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I will recognize the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands. Then I will recognize the hon. member for Fraser Valley East and the hon. member for Brant.

[Translation]

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, its too bad that the hon. member who just spoke referred to the same figures as those mentioned by the member for Winnipeg South and other members from the other side during their speeches on this bill. Evidently those figures are wrong. They distort the facts. I cannot believe that the government would keep using these figures.

• (1820)

This bill is a disaster. It is a very bad bill for Canada and for Canadians. Canadians are once again being sold down the river by their government. It is not the first time it has happened with this government and I am sure it will not be the last.

Unfortunately the election has been deferred for a while. It appears we are going to have to suffer for some months longer with this continual sales job by the Government of Canadian interests to other foreign nationals.

Some people say in support of this bill that Canadians should pay their fair share. When I speak to my constituents who support this bill, and some do, they say to me that surely Canadians should pay their fair share. What constitutes a fair share? Why are drug prices in Canada so much higher than they are in Europe? Are Canadians not paying a fair price when we look at the European experience? Many of these drugs are made by multinationals with head offices in Europe.

Canadian drug prices are 32 per cent lower than American drug prices. Does that mean that our prices are somehow unfair? Does that mean because Americans are being gouged for their drugs by the multinational drug companies that Canadians should pay more? Does that make it unfair that we are getting away with a bargain because we have different rules that apply to drug manufacturing in this country? I suggest it does not.

I suggest what is fair is determined by the marketplace. We have set up a system for Canadian manufacturers to get involved in the drug manufacturing process that is fair for Canadians. It creates jobs in Canada. It has created a large industry in this country that is flourishing. What this government wants to do is undermine the industry and transfer all the money to the big multinational drug companies.

That is what this bill is all about. It is unfair for Canadians that their government is the one so avidly supporting this at a time when it has no need to support it and when it has chosen to pull this policy out of the air for no apparent reason.

The minister cites these foreign agreements and says somehow Canada is bound by foreign agreements to do this. Not one of those agreements is in force yet. The GATT agreement under which this was a proposal has not been agreed to. The minister is prepared to give away anything in order to make a deal. He gives it away before he is at the negotiating table, which is a shocking way to carry on any negotiation.

We have seen it before. We have seen it in negotiations with the provinces. We have seen it in negotiations with the United States in the free trade deal. We have seen it in all kinds of negotiations it has carried on with its public servants. It is incapable of negotiating properly. It is incapable of governing and this bill is further evidence of that.

This bill gives $700 million to one company, Merck Frosst Canada, on sales of just one of its products. That is the estimate we have in respect of just one drug because of the extended patent protection.

Where is that money coming from? Out of the pockets of every Canadian. Canadian taxpayers will pay for it in the government financed drug plans across this country, Canadian purchasers of drugs who have to buy them out of their own pocket, and finally the buyers of medical and drug insurance who will have to pay increased premiums to cover the cost of these drugs.

An hon. member: Senior citizens.

Mr. Milliken: Many of them are senior citizens, but in most cases they are provided by government so all taxpayers will bear that cost. It is going to be a very significant additional cost. In some cases we have governments like the Government of Ontario that takes drugs off the list so senior citizens have to buy the drugs on their own. This is going to drive up their costs.

Who benefits from all this additional money, the $700 million that is taken out of Canadians' pockets? Who gets the money? The drug companies get the money. That is who. The international drug companies get the money.

Sure, they told us that if we pass this bill there will be another $500 million in investment in research and development in this country. That is great, but how much are Canadians going to pay in order to get the $500 million in research? The cost of the retroactive provisions of this bill alone are estimated at over $2 billion.

The hon. member for Winnipeg South says that is nonsense. The government figures that she has put forward are a fraud on the Canadian public. They amount to nothing but a fraud on the Canadian public. The government's estimate is $550 million. Two billion dollars is the estimate from respected international experts who know a lot more about the drug industry than the hon. member or any member of this government obviously does.

What this government sees is dollar signs for its friends. It flashes away and says: "We will give you whatever you want". That is what is going on in this bill.

Where is the guarantee that the $500 million will be invested in Canada? Where is the guarantee that any percentage of the extra funds generated for these drug companies will be invested in Canada? You will look through the bill in vain, Mr. Speaker. It is not there. There is no guarantee written into this legislation.

How much are Canadians going to pay for this research? On the retroactive provisions alone, $2 billion. That is $4 for every $1 of research guaranteed, and that is only the cost on the retroactive provisions. The estimate that Dr. Stephen Schondelmeyer gave the other day was that this bill was going to cost something like $7 billion by 2010.

I think the hon. member was on the committee. She must know the figures. She says he trumped those up over a weekend. That is what she said in her speech the other day. I never heard such rubbish in my life.

The gentleman is a very capable expert, a professor of pharmaceutical economics and director of the Prime Institute of the College of Pharmacy. He knows more about drugs than everybody in this House put together. He says that is what the bill is going to cost.

The hon. member for Winnipeg South is clearly burying her head in the sand on this and trying to pretend that her government has not let her down again. She is wagging her head and mumbling from her seat, trying to tell me that the figures that this expert has quoted are wrong. She knows that this government has led her down the garden path again. She must have been embarrassed to make the speech she had to make yesterday, trying to discredit this expert and ignoring the facts on which we are basing our arguments that this whole bill and all the arguments government members have put forward in support of it are a fraud on the public. They are deceiving the Canadian public with their figures. They are wrong. They know they are wrong and they should be absolutely ashamed of themselves for putting them forward.

Canadians are so badly served by the arguments put forward by this government on this bill that it amounts to another national disgrace.

The hon. member for Winnipeg South, in the course of her speech, wondered how anyone could know more about drugs than Canada's Public Service. She knows that her government has chopped the Public Service: cut, cut, cut. It has taken people out of the Public Service. It has driven good people out of the Public Service. The Public Service is hardly able to do the cost projections required in order to come up with figures to support the government's arguments on this bill. They do not have the arguments. They do not have the figures, and the hon. member knows it.

The hon. member for London—Middlesex, in the course of his speech the other day, tried to let on that somehow I opposed research and development. That is absolute rubbish and it hardly bears answering. The hon. member for London—Middlesex who so rarely speaks here suddenly made a speech. Because I told him what he was saying was rubbish he went on to say that I was opposed to research and development.

I am not prepared to support research and development when we are paying billions and billions for peanuts. That is what the hon. member is doing. She is going to have Canadians pay $7 billion in exchange for $500 million in research. She will not even put a guarantee in the bill that the $500 million will be spent. I urge her to read Bill C–91 before she speaks again and see exactly what it says. She will find out there are no guarantees in the bill and then maybe she will not be talking through her hat.

Finally I want to turn to members of the party on my left. The other night they forced the House to sit for five and a half hours so we could vote on various provisions of a bill. They did it because they took the view that where time allocation is being used it is unfair and they had to show their objection.

I want to see them show their objections to this procedure tonight and insist on a vote on every clause. Let us see what they do. Or are they going to follow what Bobby Rae does and go soft on this bill? Bobby Rae told them to go soft on this bill in his speech yesterday. Are they going to do what Bobby Rae says, go soft on the bill and allow all the votes to be applied? Or are they going to sit here tonight and insist on the votes tonight? I will be here. I call on the hon. member to stay and to insist on it.

Mr. Ross Belsher (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, over the last few hours we have heard many inaccurate estimates and many exaggerated statements about prices and things like that. It is time to try to set the record straight.

Perhaps the most extreme and unsubstantiated claim being made is that Bill C–91 will significantly increase the cost of health care in Canada. Let us look at the facts. First, the entire wholesale drug market in Canada constitutes only 6 per cent of Canada's annual health care bill of about $60 billion, some $4 billion annually.

Patented drugs, which are the medicines affected by this legislation, make up only about 43 per cent of the annual total value of all drugs sold in Canada. That translates into a total annual cost of about $2 billion. That is the total cost for all the patented medicines.

Yet the member opposite has been running off at the mouth, saying there will be a $7 billion increase in prices while the total amount of patented medicines used in Canada only has a value of $2 billion.

Therefore, for opponents of this bill to charge that it will cost the Canadian health care system billions of dollars indicates to me they have a total lack of understanding of what this legislation is about.

As those who have read the legislation before this House will know, Bill C–91 will protect Canadian consumers from unwarranted increases in the cost of pharmaceutical products by expanding the powers of the board that reviews patented drug prices in Canada.

Some would say: "On a perfect road you would not need a review board". However, it is very necessary that we have a review board because it has proven itself since it was introduced in 1987.

First, let me explain exactly what the Patented Medicines Prices Review Board, the PMPRB, does. The board was created under the amendments to the Patent Act that came into force on December 7, 1987. Among other things, the amendments increased the patent protection available to the pharmaceutical firms. In exchange for the extended patent protection the Canadian pharmaceutical industry undertook to double its ratio of research and development to sales by the end of 1996.

I am reminded of the doom and gloom the members opposite talked about when we were doing the bill back in 1987. I remember the demonstrations out on the lawn. I remember the job losses that were predicted by the opposition members. None of those things came about. What did come about was the research that was promised by the companies and the extra jobs.

I will try to outline what has happened with the review board. The mandate of the Patented Medicines Prices Review Board is to ensure that the prices for patented medicines are not excessive. The board itself is an independent, quasi–judicial body. The Patent Act gives no power, formal or informal, to the government to direct the board or to review its decision and its orders.

However, decisions of the board are subject to judicial review by the Federal Court of Canada on jurisdictional or procedural grounds. This board's mandate has three specific components. First, the board's regulatory function is to ensure that the prices of patented medicines charged by patentees are not excessive. Second, the board is required to report annually on its activities, including a summary of pricing trends in the pharmaceutical industry. Third, the board must report annually on the ratios of research and development expenditures to sales for individual patentees and for the patented pharmaceutical industry as a whole.

The board has no regulatory authority over the prices of medicines that are not patented. Nor can it direct the levels of or nature of research and development expenditures of the pharmaceutical companies.

How does the board determine if the price is excessive? The Patent Act provides that the board take into consideration the following factors in determining whether the price of a patented medicine is excessive: the price of the medicine in the previous five years; the price of other medicines in the same therapeutic class; the price of those medicines in other countries; and the Consumer Price Index.

The board has developed its guidelines in recognition of the factors set out in the act put forward in 1987. These guidelines are not a rigid set of decision–making rules. They are intended to provide patentees with adequate information to establish in advance prices that may be presumed not to be excessive.

The record shows that the board has been successful in keeping increases in the prices of patented drugs well below the rate of inflation. Since this board was created the prices of existing patented drugs have risen by an average of only 2.9 per cent a year while the Consumer Price Index has risen by an average of about 4.4 per cent.

The PMPRB has been so successful it has earned the attention of our neighbours to the south. In the United States a report by the U.S. General Accounting Office recently compared the cost of prescription drugs in the United States and Canada. The study found that on average the manufacturers' price for prescription drugs was 32 per cent higher in the U.S. than in Canada.

Furthermore, the study found that half the drugs studied cost wholesalers at least 50 per cent more in the United States. Of the top selling 200 drugs, 27 cost at least 100 per cent more, three drugs cost 500 per cent more, and one, Isordril, which is used in the treatment of angina, cost an incredible 967 per cent more.

The Americans concluded that the Canadian system of controlling drug costs was working very well. The new legislation will make that system work even better.

Bill C-91 strengthens and extends the powers of the PMPRB. The board will continue to have the power to roll back prices to non-excessive levels and, because it will no longer be able to invoke compulsory licences as a remedy for excessive pricing, the bill provides the PMPRB with a range of new remedies.

The board will have the power to recoup excessive revenues earned by a company while the medicine was excessively priced. It will be able to order an extra price reduction for a sufficient period to claw back these excessive revenues, or alternatively it can impose a monetary penalty in the same amount.

In addition, if the board finds that the patentee has engaged in a policy of excessive pricing it will be able to impose double damages. That is, it can recoup twice the estimated excess revenues either through a price reduction order or a monetary penalty.

Much tougher sanctions will be also applied to patentees that fail to comply with a board order. This will be punishable as a criminal offence on a summary conviction and liable to fines of up to $100,000 per day for corporations and up to $25,000 per day for individuals.

Individuals will also be subject to imprisonment for up to one year. Alternately, the board will be able to file its orders with the Federal Court. Non-compliance with the Federal Court order would then be enforceable by the usual sanctions for contempt of court, which are unlimited fines and periods of imprisonment.

Finally, the board will also be in a position to order double damages on the grounds that non-compliance amounts to a policy of excessive pricing. Tough penalties will also apply to companies that fail to submit required data. The PMPRB is a proven and effective mechanism for controlling patented drug prices.

Bill C-91 will make it even more effective in deterring unreasonable prices. Canada's track record on drug prices compares favourably with the situation in other countries. For example, the U.S. General Accounting Office showed that prices for most drugs in the U.S. doubled between 1985 and 1991, and some prices even quadrupled.

In Canada, as a result of the PMPRB, patented drug prices rose less than the rate of inflation. The Canadian system of drug price controls, centred on the PMPRB, has been extremely effective. In fact, pharmaceutical companies in Canada have a good record of compliance with the board's guidelines, and there has rarely been any need to respond—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret that the hon. member's time has expired.

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, I have a very limited amount of time. I believe I have six minutes before the bells ring.

I want to make one or two points on Bill C-91. This is one of the most unpopular pieces of legislation introduced by the most unpopular government in the history of our country, certainly since the beginning of polling in this country.

I find it very strange that we are in this House today, in 1992, debating whether we should keep compulsory licensing in the drug industry. We have a government that is very unpopular with a very unpopular piece of legislation saying that we should get rid of compulsory licensing. Yet at the same time a new President has been elected south of the border and a large fraction of the Democratic Party in Washington is now coming out in favour of compulsory licensing in its own country. Why? It is to bring down the cost of drugs to the American consumers.

Yet we have the Conservatives saying: "No, it is not going to affect the prices. It is not going to increase prices any more than the cost of living, whatever that might be in 10 years' time".

Somebody is wrong. Somebody is not telling the truth. We have American congressmen and senators visiting our capital from time to time extolling the virtues of our medicare system. Many in the U.S. Congress want to adopt a system similar to the medicare system in Canada which, on balance, has worked very well over the years since it was first implemented.

We now have a Conservative government which incidentally was opposed to medicare 25 years ago saying that the price of drugs will increase and that it is not going to do anything about it. This huge international drug cartel will be allowed to make even greater profits, driving up the price of drugs. That in turn will have a very serious impact on medicare.

The cost of drugs and the cost of medicare are really part of the same parcel. Many of our drugs in this country are provided to people, particularly to senior citizens and people on—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Calgary Northeast, on a point of order.

Mr. Kindy: I call for a quorum count, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I see a quorum. The hon. member for Brant has the floor.

Mr. Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, I was just saying that the cost of drugs is a very important and integral part of our medicare system. In our country, unlike most of the states in the United States, we do provide drugs free for our senior citizens and to those who cannot afford them, those on public assistance.

With the increase in the drug prices that this bill will create over the next several years, it means either the cost to the taxpayers, who provide the money for those drugs, will go up and our taxes will go up in order to keep that public drug program or we are going to have to become more exclusive and restrictive in our public drug programs with higher threshold entry levels.

We cannot have it both ways. That is an expression the people across from us in this very backward Conservative government like to use a lot in their arguments on a number of bills in this House.

It is very interesting that at this time we are listening to arguments by the government which say: "Listen, there is a possibility that the drug companies, if this bill goes through might invest half a billion dollars in research in this country". Yet at the same time, we have also been told by experts that the cost of drugs cumulatively could go up over the next 10 or 15 years, I believe, by $7 billion.

If that is a good business deal for the Conservatives, is it any wonder that our economy is in such a mess at this time? They cannot tell the difference between a good business deal and a lousy business deal.

Are we to allow Bill C–91 to go through and launch a massive assault directly and indirectly on our public medicare system in this country, or can we do anything at all in this Chamber to drive some common sense into the people opposite us in the Conservative government and say: "We do not have to necessarily on this point move in lock step with the United States".

I know this Conservative government would love to continue to Americanize our country. The Conservatives have done everything they can through the free trade agreement. They are going to continue it through NAFTA, the North American free trade agreement. For Heaven's sakes, when are we going to come to our senses and say that our country is different from the United States, or at least it used to be and what is left of that difference should be preserved.

Here again in this drug patent bill we see a caving in once again to powerful American drug companies in order to be in sync with the FTA, the free trade agreement, and with NAFTA. That is basically what it is all about. We are caving in once again to American corporate interests. We all know that the cost of drugs in the United States is astronomically higher than it is in Canada.

Mr. Kindy: Mr. Speaker, the time has expired.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Are hon. members willing not to see the clock so that the hon. member can have five minutes? Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary Northeast): Mr. Speaker, Bill C–91 is going to affect our pharmaceutical industry in Canada for years to come. The government has brought in closure on the bill because I believe it does not want the bill to be debated on its substance.

This bill is protecting patents up to 20 years. It is going to cost the Canadian taxpayer a tremendous amount of money. That money is going to come from the Canadian taxpayer. The Canadian health care system is going to suffer because of that. It is estimated that it is going to cost the Canadian taxpayer over a billion dollars a year. There are different estimates. Maybe this one is a little bit high, but still it is an estimate that is certainly credible.

The Canadian Pharmaceutical Association believes that this bill is going to hurt those Canadian pharmaceutical companies that have their head offices in Canada, not those that are abroad. Most of the big pharmaceutical companies are located in Switzerland, Germany, France, England and the United States.

When I used to practise medicine, I could see that Canadians were beginning through the generic companies to manufacture drugs under licence. This was creating made in Canada companies. This government through its policies has been listening to the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank. The Minister for International Trade says that we need NAFTA. NAFTA is part of this deal and because of that, we will not have a manufacturing industry in Canada.

Since this bill was introduced, we have only had nine hours of debate. It is a major bill that is going to hurt manufacturing of drugs made in Canada. The government tells us this money that the big companies are going to make in Canada is going to be used for research and development. Naturally, some of this money might go to a couple of universities for research, but we are talking about huge amounts of money that the companies are going to transfer back to their head offices, whether it be in England, the United States, Switzerland, France or Germany. This is certainly not conducive to making Canada a country where industry can flourish.

What we need is not Bill C–91 or Bill C–22, but a reform of our taxation system where we would reward wealth creation by Canadian companies. We should not create companies here that have head offices abroad.

Therefore I am voting against this bill and I hope that members who believe that Canada has to have its own trade policies will do the same.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It being 6.45 o'clock p.m., pursuant to an order made earlier this day, in accordance with the provisions of Standing Order 78(3) it is my duty to interrupt the proceedings and put forthwith every question necessary to dispose of the report stage of the bill now before the House.

The question is on Motion No. 2. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Pursuant to Standing Order 76(8), a recorded division on the proposed motion stands deferred.

Mr. Angus: Mr. Speaker, a point of order. I think you may find there is disposition in the House to deem each of the proposed amendments to Bill C–91, an act to amend the Patent Act currently on the Order Paper to be moved by the member in whose name it stands on the Order Paper and seconded by his or her respective House leader in the case of the Liberal Party Whip and in the case of the New Democratic Party, except for Motion No. 51 standing in the name of the member for Annapolis Valley—Hants, whose seconder is myself, and that the House proceed immediately to the taking of divisions.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Members have heard the terms of the motion. Is there unanimous agreement?

Some hon. members: No.

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North) moved:

Motion No. 4.

That Bill C-91 be amended in Clause 4 by adding immediately after line 2 at page 2 the following:

"55.1 (1) It shall not be an act of infringement to:

(a) manufacture a product for the purposes of determining the capabilities of the manufacturer to manufacture the product in commercial quantities;

(2) Subject to subsection (4), where the Board finds that a patentee of an invention pertaining to a medicine has, while a patentee, sold the medicine in any market in Canada at a price that, in the Board's opinion, was excessive, the Board may, by order, direct the patentee to do any one or more of the following things as will, in the Board's opinion, offset the amount of the excess revenues estimated by it to have been derived by the patentee from the sale of the medicine at an excessive price:

(a) reduce the price at which the patentee sells the medicine in any market in Canada, to such extent and for such period as is specified in the order;

(b) reduce the price at which the patentee sells one other medicine to which a patented invention of the patentee pertains in any market in Canada, to such extent and for such period as is specified in the order; or

(3) Subject to subsection (4), where the Board finds that a former patentee of an invention pertaining to a medicine had, while a patentee, sold the medicine in any market in Canada at a price that, in the Board's opinion, was excessive, the Board may, by order, direct the former patentee to do any one or more of the following things as will, in the Board's opinion, offset the amount of the excess revenues estimated by it to have been derived by the former patentee from the sale of the medicine at an excessive price:

(4) Where the Board, having regard to the extent and duration of the sales of the medicine at an excessive price, is of the opinion that the patentee or former patentee has engaged in a policy of selling the medicine at an excessive price, the Board may, by order, in lieu of any order it may make under subsection (2) or (3), as the case may be, direct the patentee or former patentee to do any one or more of the things referred to in that subsection as will, in the Board's opinion, offset not more than twice the amount of the excess revenues estimated by it to have been derived by the patentee or former patentee from the sale of the medicine at an excessive price.

(5) In estimating the amount of excess revenues under subsection (2), (3) or (4), the Board shall not consider any revenues derived by a patentee or former patentee before December 20, 1991 or any revenues derived by a former patentee after the former patentee ceased to be entitled to the benefit of the patent or to exercise any rights in relation to the patent.

(6) Before the Board makes an order under this section, it shall provide the patentee or former patentee with a reasonable opportunity to be heard.

(7) No order may be made under this section in respect of a former patentee who, more than three years before the day on which the proceedings in the matter commenced, ceased to be entitled to the benefit of the patent or to exercise any rights in relation to the patent.

84. (1) A patentee or former patentee who is required by any order made under section 83 to reduce the price of a medicine shall commence compliance with the order within one month after the date of the order or within such greater period after that date as the Board determines is practical and reasonable, having regard to the circumstances of the patentee or former patentee.

(2) A patentee or former patentee who is directed by any order made under section 83 to pay an amount to Her Majesty shall pay that amount within one month after the date of the order or within such greater period after that date as the Board determines is practical and reasonable, having regard to the circumstances of the patentee or former patentee.

(3) An amount payable by a patentee or former patentee to Her Majesty under any order made under section 83 constitutes a debt due to Her Majesty and may be recovered in any court of competent jurisdiction."

Mrs. Dobbie: Mr. Speaker, could you please inform the House what motion we are voting on.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): We are on a grouping which includes Motions Nos. 15, 16, 18, 20, 21, 23, 25, 26, 28, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 38 and 39. Group 4.

[Translation]

Mr. Rocheleau: Mr. Speaker, you mentioned that motions 15, 16 and 18 were grouped together. It might be better to put them one by one, Mr. Speaker, because we could approve one motion and be against another. If they are presented together, it would be difficult to decide.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I am going to put all the questions right now and then we will vote on them.

Mr. Angus: Mr. Speaker, I think part of the difficulty is that as you went through the motions they are in the names of both government members and opposition members. The reality is that we are going to end up having to force a vote and sort it out when we come to the actual voting.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I have put the question on Motions Nos. 16 and 18.

Mr. Angus: Mr. Speaker, perhaps it is an appropriate time to try again to see if there is agreement to deem that all motions have been moved in the names of the members in whose name they stand on the Order Paper and seconded by the House leader of either caucus and the motion of the member for Annapolis Valley—Hants, by myself, and then we can sort it out after the fact.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, my colleague makes a very reasonable suggestion. However, for the purposes of the House this does not mean in any way that we are now voting. All it means is that we can proceed with the vote on the various motions which will have to be adjudicated in this Chamber. In no way, Mr. Speaker, does it interfere with how members will wish to vote on any particular amendment put forward.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it agreed?

That Bill C-91 be amended in Clause 7 by striking out lines 35 and 36 at page 13 and substituting the following therefor:

Madam Deputy Speaker: I should advise the House that an affirmative vote on Motion No. 48 obviates the need for a vote on Motions Nos. 49 and 50. A negative vote on Motion No. 48 necessitates a vote on Motions Nos. 49 and 50.

Mr. Gérin: Madam Speaker, I would like to know what happened. Are you trying to pass motions here without giving the members a chance to say whether they are for or against? I believe five members rose—

Some hon. members: No, no.

Mr. Gérin: Come on.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I can assure the hon. member that the Chair put the question correctly. There were some yeas and some nays. I waited for a few seconds—Really, I looked but nobody got up.

The hon. member for Calgary Northeast on a point of order.

Mr. Kindy: Madam Speaker, when you asked whether there should be a recorded vote, five members stood up and I was one of them.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I consulted with the people around me and in fact only four members asked for a recorded division when I said that the motion was agreed to on division. I can assure the hon. member for Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead that I can count to four.

The hon. member on a point of order.

Mr. Gérin: Madam Speaker, we tried to co-operate but I see that not everybody is co-operating in this House. Madam Speaker, for the rest of the evening, I would ask you to read so that we can understand what is said and to stop saying dispensed or not dispensed and all that. When questions are put to the members, when we have to answer yes or no, or even when we have to rise, let's make sure that we get a fair vote. In fact, five members did rise and I could name them for you.

If this is the procedure this evening, I would ask that you go slowly enough for us to follow what is going on.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Mr. Karpoff moves:

That Bill C-91 be amended in Clause 7 (a) by striking out at line 8—

Mr. Blais: Madam Speaker, just to make things perfectly clear. Motion No. 52 which you just read cannot be put to the vote along with Motion No. 53 which was presented by the hon. member from the opposition. Therefore, we will not be able to vote on both at the same time. I think that you should call a vote first on Motion No. 52.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Under the circumstances, I did not—Even though I had announced Motions No. 52, 53 and 54, after reading Motion No. 52, considering what the hon. member just mentioned, I had started putting Motion No. 54 to the House since it is pointless to move Motion No. 53 as long as we have not voted on Motion No. 52.

[English]

Mrs. Dobbie: Madam Speaker, I think that I misunderstood what you have said. We will vote Motion No. 52, will we not?

Madam Deputy Speaker: I do apologize. I was given Motions Nos. 52, 53 and 54 while I should have been given Motions Nos. 52, 54 and 55. Does that agree with the hon. member's finding?

[Translation]

Mr. Blais: I am sorry, Madam Speaker, but if you look at Motion No. 52 you will see that I presented it; Motion No. 53 was presented by Mr. Karpoff; Motion No. 54, by Mr. Karpoff and Motion No. 55, by Mr. MacDonald. In my opinion, Motion No. 52 must put to the vote separately from the three others, Madam Speaker, otherwise it will be very confusing.

• (1930)

Madam Deputy Speaker: I have to put Motions Nos. 52, 54 and 55. They just have to be read to the House; then we will have a voice vote on Motion No. 52. Depending on the vote on Motion No. 52, we will vote on Motion No. 54 or on Motion No. 55. For now, I do not intend to put Motions Nos. 54 and 55, but just to read them so that hon. members will know on what they are voting.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I declare the motion lost.

Mr. Dingwall: Madam Speaker, on a point of order a large number of votes will take place. In view of the substance of the motion which has just been voted on and its similarity to other motions and its similar consequences thereto, I think you could apply the vote just taken to Motions Nos. 4, 7, 9, 11 and 13 because of their similar consequences.

We could apply it in reverse to Motions No. 5 and 12 which would then allow us to proceed to Motion No. 19 and have a vote on that particular one.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: No.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Consent has not been given.

Mr. Dingwall: Madam Speaker, on a point of order. My record has not been too good, but perhaps there might be a disposition to apply the vote just taken to Motions Nos. 9, 11 and 13 so we could proceed with Motion No. 19 which covers a number of similar motions in substance and the consequences thereto.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: No.

Madam Deputy Speaker: There is not unanimous consent.

The next question is on Motion No. 13. An affirmative vote on Motion No. 13 obviates the need for a vote on Motions Nos. 9, 11 and 12. A negative vote on Motion No. 13 necessitates a vote on Motion No. 9.

An affirmative vote on Motion No. 9 obviates the need for a vote on Motions Nos. 11 and 12, and a negative vote on Motion No. 9 necessitates a vote on Motions Nos. 11 and 12. The question is on Motion No. 13.

The House divided on Motion No. 13, which was negatived on the following division:

Madam Deputy Speaker: I declare the motion lost.

The next question is on—

Mr. Dingwall: Madam Speaker, on a point of order. In view of the subject matter which we have just voted on, there might be a disposition in the House to apply the division taken on Motion No. 19 to Motions Nos. 16, 28, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35 and 39 and apply it in reverse to Motions Nos. 15, 18 and 38, keeping in mind that these are very similar in terms of their substance and the consequences thereof. Then we could proceed to a vote on Motion No. 17. There are several other votes after that.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I declare Motion No. 15 carried.

[English]

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The vote taken on Motion No. 15 might apply to Motions Nos. 18 and 38 and the vote which was taken on Motion No. 19 could apply to Motions Nos. 16, 28, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35 and 39 which would then allow us to proceed to Motion No. 17.

I wonder if there might a disposition in the House.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the suggestion of the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond. Is there agreement?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: The consequence of the agreement of the House is that Motions Nos. 15, 18 and 38 are carried. Motions Nos. 16, 28, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35 and 39 are negatived.

Mr. Plamondon: Point of order, Mr. Speaker. There was no unanimous consent on the motions you have just enumerated.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: I think I asked the House twice.

The House divided on Motion No. 16, which was negatived on the following division:

Madam Deputy Speaker: I declare the motion lost.

Mr. Attewell: Madam Speaker, I wonder if the House might be in agreement to apply the vote on Motion No. 51 in reverse to Motions Nos. 52 and 56.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Consent has not been given.

The next question is on Motion No. 52. An affirmative vote on Motion No. 52 obviates the need for a vote on Motions Nos. 54 and 55 and a negative vote on Motion No. 52 necessitates a vote on Motions Nos. 54 and 55.

The House divided on Motion No. 52, which was agreed to on the following division:

INTERPARLIAMENTARY DELEGATION

PRESENTATION OF REPORT OF CANADA-EUROPE PARLIAMENTARY ASSOCIATION

Mr. Terry Clifford (London—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to present to the House, on behalf of the Canada-Europe Parliamentary Association, in both official languages, the report on the Canadian delegation to the annual OECD debate of the Council of Europe Parliamentary Assembly, September 30 to October 2, 1992.

It is important for all parliamentarians of this House to know that at this debate it was firmly established that from now on there will be a formal debate held each year on the doings at the OECD.

Our government is heavily committed to the OECD. This gives parliamentarians a chance to find out the workings of the OECD, how it spends its money, what Canada's role is and to question the future of that assembly.

Finally, parliamentary debate at our delegation's urging has now been established.

TRANSPORT

FOURTH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Ken Atkinson (St. Catharines): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present the fourth report of the Standing Committee on Transport which deals with the future of the Great Lakes St. Lawrence Seaway system.

It calls on the government to eliminate distortions created by the Western Grain Transportation Act in order to ensure that grain transportation is mode, load and direction neutral. It further recommends a three-year freeze on seaway pilotage fees and seaway tolls, as well as federal contributions on all capital funding necessary for the seaway system to be a safe, efficient and reliable transportation route.

I am very pleased to state that we have had a unanimous report on this important transportation issue. I wish to congratulate all members of the Standing Committee on Transport and the members of the sub-committee on the St. Lawrence Seaway for a job well done.

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-390, an act to amend the Criminal Code (stalking).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to Standing Order 68(2), the motion is deemed adopted.

Mr. Rideout: Mr. Speaker, this piece of legislation would amend the Criminal Code to put more teeth into the area dealing with harassment and with wilfully following or stalking individuals. It is my hope that it will provide a more effective means of protection above and beyond the issuance of a peace bond and will give individuals, particularly women, but all individuals more protection under our Code. That is the reason I am introducing this bill at this time.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Mr. Rideout moves that Bill C-390 be read the first time and printed.

Pursuant to Standing Order 69(1), the motion is deemed adopted.

Bill read the first time and printed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to Standing Order 68(2), the motion is deemed adopted.

Mr. Duhamel: Mr. Speaker, this particular bill, if it were to proceed, would provide the following. My colleagues know that tradesmen who have an independent business are able to deduct from their revenue, their earnings of that year, the cost of the tools and equipment used in that profession. Tradesmen who work for someone and receive a salary, however, even though those tools and equipment are needed, cannot deduct the cost from their earnings.

This would permit mechanics, carpenters, plumbers, electricians, people from all trades who must supply tools and equipment to do their job for an employer to make the appropriate deductions from their earnings.

Canada's workers would certainly welcome the implementation of this proposal.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Mr. Duhamel moves that Bill C-391 be read the first time and printed.

Pursuant to Standing Order 69(1) the motion is deemed adopted.

Bill read the first time and printed.

MEASURE TO ENACT

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-392, an act to provide for the recall of members of Parliament.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to Standing Order 68(2), the motion is deemed adopted.

Miss Grey: Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank you and it is my duty and honour to introduce today a bill which is an act to provide for the recall of members of Parliament.

This bill would allow the electors in any federal constituency to recall their member of Parliament by circulating a petition containing the names and addresses of a majority of the voters enumerated in that riding in the previous election. If a recall petition were to be deemed successful by the chief electoral officer a by-election would be called for that seat.

The bill also contains a number of limitations on the recall process designed to avoid superfluous and mischievous employment of this device.

I believe that this bill would do more to ensure democratic parliamentary reform than all the committees this House could put together. It is time that members started representing the interests of their constituents in Ottawa rather than Ottawa's interest in their constituencies.

The passage of this bill may convince them to do just that.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Ms. Grey moves that Bill C-392 be read the first time and printed.

Pursuant to Standing Order 69(1), the motion is deemed adopted.

Bill read the first time and printed.

CORRECTIONS AND CONDITIONAL RELEASE ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-393, an act to amend the Corrections and Conditional Release Act.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to Standing Order 68(2), the motion is deemed adopted.

Mr. Redway: Mr. Speaker, I thank the member for London—Middlesex for seconding the introduction of the bill.

This is a bill to amend the Corrections and Conditional Release Act and to permit a police officer to arrest a person without warrant for breaching a condition of parole and statutory release.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, and as members of the House and the public are aware, police officers or peace officers can arrest a person who they believe on reasonable and probable grounds is about to breach the Criminal Code.

That is not so with respect to the breaching of a condition of parole and statutory release. They have to go away to try to get a justice of the peace to issue a warrant and then come back to try to find the person. If that happened in a normal situation under the Criminal Code, all sorts of crimes could be committed prior to the obtaining of the warrant. That is the problem here.

Members of the public cannot understand why, when they ask a police officer to arrest somebody who is about to breach their parole, the police officer shrugs and says: "I have to go away". This bill will correct that.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Mr. Redway moves that the bill be now read the first time and printed.

Pursuant to Standing Order 69(1), the motion is deemed adopted.

Bill read the first time and printed.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS AND INTERNATIONAL TRADE

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons) moved:

That, six members of the Standing Committee on External Affairs and International Trade be authorized to travel to New York City to study the role of the UN from December 14 to December 16, 1992.

That, notwithstanding any Standing Order of this House, the chief Whip of any recognized party may effect substitutions for that review, from any envelopes by filing notice thereof with the clerk of the committee and such substitutions shall be effective for the entire period of travel and should be effective immediately when they are received by the clerk of the committee.

FINANCE

AUTHORIZATION FOR SUBCOMMITTEE TO TRAVEL

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons) moved:

That, five members and three staff persons of the subcommittee on international financial institutions of the Standing Committee on Finance be authorized to travel to Washington, D.C., in relation to their study on the IMF and the World Bank for four days in January or February 1993.

[Translation]

Mr. Rocheleau: Mr. Speaker, we objected to this yesterday, and I do so again today. We thought substantial amounts of money could be saved by cutting on trips.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. I do not think there is unanimous consent. Members cannot explain why they agree or disagree with this motion without prior notice.

BILL C-333

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate a chance to be recognized on a point of order.

Yesterday, because of the late voting, there was a change to the sequence of private members' motions and bills with the consequence that the bill of the member for Mission—Coquitlam that was to be discussed on Friday will not be discussed.

There have been consultations among all the members of the House representing parties and individuals, and I would seek unanimous consent to move the following motion:

That Bill C-333, an act to amend the Canada Health Act, standing in the name of the hon. member for Mission—Coquitlam on the Order Paper, be discharged, the bill withdrawn and the subject matter thereof be referred to the Standing Committee on Health and Welfare, Social Affairs, Seniors and Status of Women.

[Translation]

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, after listening to the reasons given by the NDP House leader, we in the Official Opposition give our consent.

[English]

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary Northeast): Mr. Speaker, I rise on the point of order. As Independents we give our consent to this bill as well. It is an excellent bill and an excellent initiative.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Hon. members have heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

An hon. member: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): There is no unanimous consent.

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I might briefly explain why we withheld consent. Is that in order?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is there unanimous consent to give the floor to the hon. parliamentary secretary?

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Rocheleau (Hull-Aylmer): Mr. Speaker, just now you would not let me explain why we were against trips. I do not see why we should agree to hear the reasons for withholding consent for a bill that—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I want to thank the hon. member for his question, and I would like to make it clear that when unanimous consent is sought, the Chair must listen and wait. However, with the unanimous consent of the House, and I think the hon. member will appreciate this, any member may give his reasons for being opposed to or in favour of a motion. I will now ask the House whether there is unanimous consent for allowing the House leader to proceed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): There is no unanimous consent.

PETITIONS

FRESHWATER EXPORTS

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, it is an honour and a privilege to present a number of petitions this morning on behalf of residents of Barriere, Darfield, Vavenby, Heffley Creek, Clearwater, Louis Creek, Bremner Creek, McLure, Little Fort, Birch Island, Skwaam Bay, Adams Lake, Blue River, Valemont, Upper Clearwater, Avola, Chu Chua and Canuck Lake.

All the petitioners add their names to what must be now in excess of 30,000 names, pointing out their opposition to diverting any rivers in Canada in order to sell water to the United States and northern Mexico.

They are asking that the Government of Canada pass legislation indicating and declaring clearly that our Canadian rivers are not for sale.

VIOLENCE

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition from many hundreds of people from central Vancouver Island.

They note that there is a link between violence in entertainment and desensitization to violence in our society, with the result that hundreds of men, women and children are being killed each year and the killers are pointing out that the violence is based on something they saw on television or in the media.

They suggest we are increasingly becoming a culture of violence and that a part of this culture is the serial killer board game which comes from the United States. It contains a bag of 25 babies and the point of the game is to murder as many defenceless children and adults as possible.

The petitioners note that the laws of Canada deal inadequately with these kinds of materials. They are asking Parliament to consider amending the Criminal Code of Canada so that violent and degrading material such as the serial killer board game and the mass murderer trading cards can be kept from being distributed in Canada.

• (1030)

LANGUAGE USED IN RADIO AND TELEVISION BROADCASTS

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition this morning on practically the same subject.

Your petitioners ask Parliament to ensure that the CRTC carefully regulates the language used in radio and television broadcasts. It is their experience that quite often, unfortunately, the inappropriate language heard on radio and television undermines the efforts of families to create a healthy home environment.

Your petitioners also emphasize that it is unnecessary to use inappropriate language to inform people.

[English]

As I was indicating, it is unfortunate that inappropriate language is often used on radio and television. These petitioners would like it controlled because they see a link between language and abuse and they feel it has no place in Canadian society.

EAST TIMOR

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present two petitions, one from the Kitchener–Waterloo–Cambridge area and the other one from Ottawa and Montreal.

The petitioners are pointing out the hypocrisy of Canada in supporting United Nations resolutions for the self–determination of East Timor. As well we talk a good line about linking human rights considerations to foreign aid and international diplomacy. At the same time Canada allows the brutal repression of the East Timorese people to continue to the point where the situation is bordering on genocide.

Therefore the petitioners are calling on Parliament to condemn the Indonesian military occupation of East Timor and the genocide of the East Timorese people, to support publicly the right of the East Timorese people to determine their own destiny by referendum and free elections, and to support these causes in the United Nations and all other international arenas.

CANADA POST

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise to present two petitions both from my riding, one from the town of Caron and one from the town of Shamrock, concerning the future of Canada Post in those two communities.

The petition from Shamrock is signed by virtually every user of the post office there. They call upon this government to reverse its policy of closing down rural post offices in Canada.

They know the government is driving a stake into the heart of rural Canada every time it closes a post office. Communities like Shamrock need their federal outlets. They need their postal service. They have a right to the postal service.

They call upon this government to do the right thing and change its policies toward Canada Post in closing rural post offices.

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

AUTHORIZATION TO TRAVEL

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, under Standing Order 56(1), I would like to move two motions for authorization to travel:

That six members of the Standing Committee on External Affairs and International Trade be authorized to travel to New York City to study the role of the UN from December 14 to December 16, 1992;

And that five members and three staff persons of the subcommittee on international financial institutions of the Standing Committee on Finance be authorized to travel to Washington, D.C., in relation to their study on the IMF and the World Bank for four days in January or February 1993.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. members have heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those opposed to the motion will please rise.

And fewer than 25 members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Since fewer than 25 members have risen, pursuant to Standing Order 56.1(3), the motion is deemed adopted.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Rocheleau: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. We just said we were opposed to excessive spending on trips outside the country, and now they are taking advantage of the Standing Orders of the House to pass—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please.

Mr. Rocheleau: You are wasting taxpayers' money.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. I will remind the hon. member for Hull—Aylmer that Standing Order 56.1 says:

(1)(a) In relation to any routine motion for the presentation of which unanimous consent is required and has been denied, a Minister of the Crown may request during Routine Proceedings that the Speaker propose the said question to the House.

(2) The question on any such motion shall be put forthwith, without debate or amendment.

(3) When the Speaker puts the question on such a motion, he or she shall ask those who object to rise in their places. If twenty-five or more Members then rise, the motion shall be deemed to have been withdrawn; otherwise, the motion shall have been adopted.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I ask that all questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Shall all the questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)) moved that Bill C-91, an act to amend the Patent Act, to amend another act in consequence thereof and to provide for other related matters, be read the third time and passed.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to speak in this House to conclude the debate on third reading of Bill C-91.

Since the government announced almost a year ago that it intended to make further amendments to the Patent Act, I think that all concerned have had plenty of time and opportunity to express their opinion.

On our side, we listened very carefully to all the opinions expressed, whether here in this House or in other forums outside. We have taken account of them to a large extent in drawing up and improving the bill, especially in the amendments we tabled that were adopted last night.

I think that the time has come for members of this House to conclude and settle the debate, for the greater benefit of the Canadian economy and also Canadian consumers.

On several occasions since June, I have had an opportunity to explain the main objectives of Bill C-91 and I would like to come back to them a little.

First, Bill C-91 is meant to continue the major undertaking of modernizing Canadian intellectual property legislation, which began some years ago. In the present economic context where knowledge and innovation are the watchwords, I think that everyone will agree that it is an essential element of our competitiveness.

Our purpose is also to align our laws with those of most of our international competitors, so that Canada can provide the same benefits and be as attractive as other countries in terms of international trade and investment.

This bill will help us to stimulate research and development in Canada, as well as growth in a leading-edge sector.

With Bill C-91, we also wanted to strengthen consumer protection, so that consumers can continue to obtain patented medicine at reasonable prices. I think that all Canadians are entitled to that.

• (1040)

[English]

To attain these main objectives, we basically are proposing two new provisions. First, Bill C-91 proposes the abolition of the compulsory licensing system for patented drugs. Let me emphasize that Canada is currently the only country in the industrialized world applying this system. Holders of pharmaceutical patents will thus be assured of the 20-year protection that is already provided to all other patent holders in the Canadian economy.

Second, the bill increases the powers of the Patented Medicine Prices Review Board. These new powers will enable the board to more effectively control the prices of both existing and new patented medicines. The bill provides for fines and prison terms for those who do not comply with the board's orders.

We remain convinced that Bill C-91 strikes a balance between two government objectives: economic growth and consumer protection.

[Translation]

Hon. members will remember the first step was made when Bill C-22 was passed in 1987. Today we can say, without exaggeration, that the impact of the 1987 amendments has been extremely positive, both for economic growth and job creation and for Canadian consumers, as far as patented drugs are concerned.

It seems appropriate, in the circumstances, to look back on the process that started in 1987. The innovative sector committed itself at the time—provided the amendments to Bill C-22 were passed—to doubling its spending on research and development as a percentage of sales from 5 per cent at the time to 10 per cent by 1996. The industry had set a time frame of about 10 years, or actually nine.

However, last year, five years ahead of schedule, the commitment to increase research levels was practically met. We have every reason to expect that this percentage will increase substantially in the years to come, provided we align our intellectual property policies with those of other industrialized countries.

Since 1987, the innovative sector of the pharmaceutical industry has spent more than $1 billion on research and development. Investment in basic research has more than tripled, rising from $30 million to $94 million between 1988 and 1991.

In 1991 alone, innovative pharmaceutical companies invested $376 million in R and D, an increase of 23 per cent over the previous year. This is just for 1991: $376 million. Between 1988 and 1991, the increase in R and D spending was an impressive 113 per cent, the highest in any Canadian industry. Not bad. Sometimes people say: "Look, we give industry a chance and it is not responding". In this case, I think we can say we were on target.

The innovating sector in the pharmaceutical industry is a very dynamic one today and employs more than 18,000 people in Canada. This has meant a very significant increase in the number of researchers as well as in new drug innovation and development here in Canada.

We know that pharmaceutical research, and I would even say research in general, needs a critical mass. We need to create an environment where enough researchers are brought together in one place so that this sector can develop.

I have personally visited companies where considerable investments involving hundreds of millions have been made over the years and I met young researchers who had left us. They had been trained here in Canada, and we know how much money and energy we put into our education system. We trained these researchers who have doctorates, Ph.D.s, and they went to Switzerland, to California and other parts of the United States to work. To earn their living in a leading sector, these Canadian brains had to go to the United States. These people came back. Just in the company that I visited, I believe that from 15 to 20 people had come back to work here in Canada for years to come.

Meanwhile, with the Patented Medicine Prices Review Board, we were able to keep the price of patented medicine at a very reasonable level. In fact, between 1987 and 1991, the price of existing patented medicine rose at an average annual rate of 2.9 per cent, well below inflation for the same period, which was around 4.4 per cent. In actual figures, this means that prices in general rose at the fairly low rate of 4 per cent, but drug prices rose even less. Today, drugs cost less in constant dollars than they did five years ago. That is astounding. This has happened in few other sectors.

Despite this undeniable progress, we are still behind our international competitors in the amount of intellectual property protection given to the pharmaceutical sector. Indeed, our present system is by far the least generous of the industrialized countries. Our compulsory licensing system not only discriminates against drug patents—just look at the number of years—it also discourages investment in R and D and new drug innovation and development in Canada.

What kind of investment can we expect in this country if a company that does not do basic research can sit and wait until another company has spent 10 years and hundreds of millions of dollars on research to develop a new drug? All it has to do is sit and wait until the drug comes on the market, copy it, wait two or three years for the copy to be approved, and then put it on the market, not at 10 per cent but 80 per cent of the other company's price. That is the kind of choice Canada has to make. We have a choice. Do we want a country that encourages copiers or do we want a country that encourages research, that encourages our budding scientists who are still in school and who in some cases spend 15 to 20 years of their lives getting an education? Would you rather we told those people: "There are no jobs for you in Canada. You better go to California to get a job. All we do here is copy. We will leave innovation to people in other countries. We will let them do the creative work, and you can come and copy what they do". No, Canada can do better than that.

[English]

We cannot tolerate a situation that for Canadians means the potential loss of productive jobs in a leading sector so important to our future. It is time to correct this situation and to encourage new investments in research and development in Canada. It is important to offer new export markets for Canadian products so that we can be more competitive internationally.

By adopting C-91, this House will be committing itself to this path of innovation and progress essential to the Canadian economy. Since last January innovative pharmaceutical firms have already announced additional investments totalling some $635 million by 1996.

• (1050)

When the innovative pharmaceutical industries committed $1 billion dollars, they delivered. Now they announce another $600 million investment. That is $1.7 billion of investment. It is a lot of money. This is over and above the approximately $2 billion the brand name industry will invest in research and development by 1996. This sharp increase in research activity means job creation. Notably it will provide better opportunities for our researchers so they will not be forced to leave the country to find employment that corresponds to their education and ability.

What we are talking about here are high quality, high paying jobs that generate employment in related fields.

It is estimated that a single job in the scientific sector generates a dozen more. That is one the reasons why it is so important to stimulate research activity in this country. These companies need services and supplies. The economic spin-offs and the multiplier effect on jobs are vital for Canada.

Increasing research is essential for our universities and hospitals which are actively involved in research, especially in the health sector. I think we all realize that research requires a lot of money and drug companies invest in research. For instance, the University of Alberta has developed exceptional expertise in clinical research in recent years. In British Columbia they are now looking at the possibilities, while companies are also looking at the maritimes. Hundreds of millions of dollars are involved. We are going to develop this industry over time, not the way some people in the opposition would like to see us do, which would make us a nation of copiers, a nation of people without a desire to innovate.

In the New Democratic Party, they say: "No, we do not have the resources. It is not our market. Let other people innovate in other countries, and once they have a successful drug, we will go and copy it". It is easy. All we have to do is copy the drug. We do not have to invent it. Let these young people go down to the United States to work for the multinationals. Let them innovate down there, and we will do the minor stuff like copying. We will copy the pills and try and put them on the market. We do not want that. Canadians can do better than that.

An hon. member: Of course, they can.

Mr. Blais: Canadians can do better than that. This is not a nation of copiers. Canadians are innovators. Canada is the best country in the world. I have confidence in these young people and I am glad to see some of them here today. I am confident that these young people will be even better than we are. They will invent even more than we have, because that is the way of the future.

We do not have to be satisfied with crumbs, as those people would have us believe. The future is ours, and I am not afraid of it. Canadians are the best in the world and we have to prove it in fields like this one.

In 1991, the innovative drug sector spent $84 million in universities and hospitals doing medical research. Passing this bill will of course consolidate and even increase this essential role that our research and training institutions play. Canada has an increasingly solid nucleus of internationally known researchers and institutions in the field of medical research. It is very important to maintain and develop this nucleus. That is precisely what this bill will help achieve.

We have people like Dr. Labrie, who does basic research on prostate cancer at Laval University. This is very important, because a few years from now, as many as one out of three Canadians may get cancer. That is where we should put our money, because it will save hundreds of thousands of lives in this country. That should be our focus. We must help the people who work in our research centres, hospitals and universities across Canada.

Improving patent protection will also offer an incentive for Canadian-owned companies to develop their own patented drugs. Eventually they could also obtain exclusive research mandates from the big drug companies. That is the way to go. We have to start somewhere to create the critical mass we need.

Eliminating compulsory licensing will stimulate research activity, which will have a very positive impact in our competitive position internationally. The resulting new pharmaceutical products developed in this country will lead to increased sales on foreign markets because of the international exclusivity granted companies located in Canada. This means increased exports in a rapidly expanding sector of our economy.

Furthermore, Bill C-91 will promote research on new treatments for chronic diseases and help reduce health care costs in the long run. In fact, as new drugs appear on the market, they may reduce the need for operations and prolonged hospital care.

Recently, I read an article in a medical journal about a drug that will soon be on the market and can be used instead of surgery to deal with prostate-related problems. This means saving thousands of dollars that would otherwise be spent on surgery and hospital care. Imagine the tremendous saving in health care costs. It is incredible. Let us remember we stand to benefit in the long term.

[English]

The bill before us is also based on an obvious concern for fairness. It is fair that the pharmaceutical products sector be entitled to the same patent protection that is given in all other sectors of the economy. I would even say that this is of special importance to pharmaceutical companies which often invest between 10 and 12 years in research, not to mention significant financial resources in developing new medicines.

Critics of Bill C-91 focus of course on the price of patented medicines. You would have to agree, Mr. Speaker, that the opposition has changed its argument very little since the debate on Bill C-22 in 1987. It even called to its aid Mr. Ralph Nader, a citizen of a country where the cost of prescription medicines is 32 per cent higher than in Canada. Mr. Nader would clearly be far wiser to defend American consumers than spend his time here with the critic of the Liberal Party.

What did Mr. Nader say? Basically he said the same thing as he did in 1987 which was that increased protection for intellectual property in the pharmaceutical field will create an explosion in the price of prescription drugs.

However, as I said earlier, the price curve of patented drugs since 1987 clearly indicates that the opposition and even Mr. Ralph Nader, at the time, were wrong. They were wrong then and they are still wrong today.

Perhaps I may recall that since 1987, we have had a quasi-judicial agency which has proved its mettle in monitoring the price of patented drugs. I am of course referring to the Patented Medicine Prices Review Board, whose powers will be enhanced under the new legislation. The board will thus be able to provide all Canadian consumers with even more effective price control. These new powers will authorize the board to order a reduction of prices it considers too high. It will also be able to impose fines of up to $100,000 a day to compensate for previous overpricing and to discourage such practices.

• (1100)

The board's orders will have the same force and effect as a Federal Court order. This means that non-compliance with these orders is equivalent to contempt of court, which carries particularly severe penalties. I am convinced that these new provisions will assure Canadian consumers, of reasonable prices, like those they have had since 1987.

At that time, and this is the other aspect, the generic industry said that Bill C-22 would mean death for it. Surprise, it has continued to grow and everything indicates that this will continue after Bill C-91 is passed.

It has grown so much that a very prosperous Canadian generic drug company has even bought companies in the United States, where they do not have compulsory licensing, the same system we will have here. It is strange how they want to frighten people. I do not know if they think someone is behind me making me do this, Mr. Speaker. I will turn my back to the camera to show that is not so. We do not have to believe that kind of nonsense which was not true in 1987 and is still not true today.

The only difference is that these companies will now be on the same equal footing. They will have to comply with the same rules as the generic industries in other industrialized countries.

In recent months, we have heard some very pertinent observations from consumers, provincial governments, researchers and business people throughout Canada. Of course we will follow up these concerns in the amendments that we proposed which were adopted yesterday.

[English]

We shall continue to take whatever action is necessary to improve the effectiveness of our patented medicine price control mechanisms. We intend to get interested parties, especially the consumer and provincial health ministers, involved in the activities of the review board as well as in future appointments to the board.

We believe it is essential to move ahead quickly with Bill C-91 and pass it without delay. I assure you that after discussing the issue for one year, everyone has had the opportunity to express his or her point of view. It is now the duty of the House to make a decision.

The pharmaceutical industry is now involved in a major—

An hon. member: We only spent a few hours on the bill.

Mr. Blais: We know that the people opposite are not interested in that, but the pharmaceutical industry is now involved in a major global restructuring.

As I speak, important decisions are being made on the location of plants, on research investments and on mandates for subsidiaries.

Maintaining uncertainty under such circumstances will undermine Canada's credibility. It would cost us many investment opportunities when our whole economy urgently needs them.

By passing this bill quickly, we are going along with the great trend of globalization. We are resolutely putting Canada on the same footing as other countries to attract productive investments. It is time to choose. Do we want to be a land of copiers, of second fiddles, or do we want to be a land of researchers, of people who have confidence in their youth and in the future? Do we want to be a little country of copiers, a little country that counts on others and will try to get investments through the back door, by accident, or do we want to think of the future, the future of our industry in a rapidly growing leading-edge sector?

Over the past few weeks, distinguished Canadians involved in scientific research came forward to reaffirm their support for the proposed reform before the legislative committee. They had no ulterior motive. Their only concern was the best interest of all Canadians.

Allow me to quote in this regard the vice-rector, education and research, at the University of Montreal, Dr. René Simard, who is also a past president of the National Advisory Council on Pharmaceutical Research. Dr. Simard recently said:

> The government must hasten the adoption of regulations to allow Canada to compete with nations of the European Community, the United States and Japan.
> The provisions of Bill C-91, if passed, will give universities a major incentive to expand higher studies to produce Ph.D.s capable of meeting the tremendous needs emerging in that field.

Let us face it. Now is the time to act.

By passing Bill C-91—and I will close on that—this House will give a clear indication of the fact that Canada is entering the global economy, accepting the rules of international competitiveness and firmly positioning itself as regards R and D.

The Canadian government cannot look to develop an intellectual property sector, an international intellectual property sector, knowing that one job out of three in Canada depends from international trade—we are among the best in the world—and expect special treatment. We want foreign countries to respect the rights of our scientists and inventors when they work abroad while we have the right to say: "You know, we see things quite differently here in Canada". We want to be respected when outside of the country, but at home, we do not want to have to abide by the rules because we are in a rush to copy.

[English]

You cannot have it both ways, as we say, Mr. Speaker.

[Translation]

You cannot have your cake and eat it too. When we want to have rules and when we want to be respected around the world, when we want people to respect us for what we are, we must do things like the rest of the world. You cannot speak from both sides of your mouth.

These people can, and have succeeded admirably by doing so over the last few years. However, in the end, Canadians will be able to appreciate the facts, the courage of our government which dared to act in this area and to explain very clearly to Canadians the path we intend to follow. We are moving toward a developing economy, toward global markets.

I am convinced that Canadians will support these things and the policy of the government. I urge members like my friend from Dartmouth, who has been uttering enormities for a year on this subject, to come to their senses and try to understand that these investments are essential to our economy, everywhere in Canada.

I hope that my colleagues here, those on the other side of the House, will understand that it is for Canada that we introduced this bill and that we must all support it.

[English]

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, I sat here with a great deal of interest listening to my hon. colleague, the minister, trying to defend the indefensible. These individuals opposite know now that the Canadian public has seen through their very thin veneer, has looked at the arguments that they have made and found each and every one of them to be wanting.

The minister would like the Canadian public to believe first of all that Parliament has had a chance to debate this issue thoroughly. What nonsense. As a member of Parliament, forget that he is a minister of the Crown, he should be cowering in his seat when he sits down after talking about the rights of parliamentarians to debate this issue. He and the Minister for International Trade were the guys who rode shotgun with this bloody bill. This minister did the whole thing and made sure that Parliament did not have an opportunity to speak on this. He said that it has been before the Canadian public for a year. What nonsense. What utter nonsense. On June 23 the bill was introduced into the House. It was the last day we sat before the break for the summer. At that point in time the minister got up and he gave a good speech.

An hon. member: Now the truth comes out.

Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth): He gave a good speech. We had two and one-half hours of debate on June 23. We came back some time in September, we had a couple more hours of debate and then the government shut the debate down. It used the big bloody instrument of closure when we came back after the referendum.

The government says the Canadian public has had a chance to look at this, that the Canadian public has had this issue before them for a long period of time. What utter nonsense.

An hon. member: Absolutely.

Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth): It is very very clear why the government followed an agenda of search and destroy with regard to anybody who wanted to have a say on this bill. It either tried to discredit them or it used and abused the rules of Parliament to ensure that those individuals did not have an opportunity to speak. Why did the government do that?

An hon. member: It ought to be ashamed of itself.

Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth): Why? The government knew the longer the debate went on, the lower the numbers got for the Tories. The longer the debate went on, the more it would dip lower and lower and lower because the Canadian public would sit back and ask what in the name of goodness is that bunch opposite doing to Parliament.

One of the biggest problems we have as members of Parliament in this wonderful institution which has served us so well for over 125 years is with credibility.

People ask me when I speak, for example, in Alberta or Manitoba or back in my riding in Dartmouth: What in the name of goodness is wrong with Parliament? Why is it that individual members are not allowed to speak their minds? Why is it that everything is pro forma? Why is it that every time an important issue comes up for debate in the Parliament of Canada this government uses closure?

It is because this government is morally bankrupt. It does not have the right to go forward in this way when it is at 14, 16, 20 or 22 per cent in the polls and in the fifth year of Parliament. It does not have the moral authority to proceed with legitimate debate in the Parliament of Canada.

It has used this over and over again and it has done it again this time. It came in and used that blunt, bloody instrument called closure and time allocation because it knows full well that its arguments on bills like Bill C-91 will not hold any water once the Canadian public has a chance to look at it.

I want to set the record straight at the beginning of my speech. We started debate on this very important bill when it was tabled for first reading on June 23. We came back and had a few hours of debate the last day that we sat before the referendum.

Then we came back after the Canadian public had told us clearly that it wants us to go back and start dealing with real issues that affect Canadians. Did the government come back and put a bill forward to try and help the two million people who are unemployed or on welfare, give them some dignity back, give them some employment, put some money in their pockets? The government did not do that.

The first day we were back—after collectively this institution got its butt kicked in the referendum—the first bill the government put was Bill C-91, this bill we are debating today.

This bill does not help Canadians. It is not going to put legions to work in Montreal, Quebec, Dartmouth or Winnipeg. It is a bill that is going to take $4 billion to $7 billion out of the Canadian health care system and deliver it on a silver platter to multinational drug companies south of the border.

The government did not just come in and say here is our agenda, this is what we are going to do. It came in after two and one-half hours of debate and invoked closure, time allocation. It shut down the voice of Parliament. That is exactly what it has done.

After a few more hours of debate it went to committee, and I think it is very appropriate that this be put today, before we even looked at one list of witnesses.

This is a very important bill on our side and I think the Canadian public agrees with us. It could have the impact of undermining the integrity of the Canadian health care system; something that we have held near and dear, something that makes us vastly different from other states around the world.

An hon. member: The envy of the world.

Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth): This bill, coupled with the cutbacks in transfer payments for health care that the government has perpetrated over the last few years, this bill could have the impact of undermining the availability of quality health care for Canadians.

Is there a full debate on this? No. The government sent it over to the committee. The chairman of the committee or the former chairman is not here today. At committee, they did not even bother to look at the list of witnesses. They did not say to the member from the New Democratic Party, the health critic: Could you tell me who you think has to be heard on this bill? They did not come to me as the Official Opposition critic for consumer and corporate affairs and ask if they could hear my witnesses. They did not do any of that stuff. They said: "We have made a decision. We do not want Canadians to be heard on this issue. You are going to have three days of debate in committee. You are going to have three days to examine witnesses and if you do not like the fact that we are telling you that Canadians are not to be heard on this, we will shut you down. We will have a motion in the House and we will have the committee report without any hearings".

They walked into the committee and they had a gun at the temple and the itchy trigger finger of the minister opposite prepared to blow the brains out of anybody who dared say to the Government of Canada that this bill was improper and that there had to be full debate on it.

What did we do? Before they even looked at one list of witnesses, they shut us down. The Liberal Party had nearly 85 or 90 witnesses who absolutely demanded to be heard. The clerk of the committee, without any prodding from the opposition, had received 59 requests from witnesses to appear before the committee. How many did we have? The Canadian public has a right to know. Because of the blunt, bloody instrument of closure which they invoked on the committee, we had 18 witnesses.

The New Democratic Party was told it could have six, we were told we could have six and the government would have six. There were 18 witnesses who showed up at the committee. That was it, 18 witnesses. Incredible. A bill that has the potential to undermine the integrity of the Canadian health care system and they would not even let the witnesses appear. They would not let the provincial ministers appear, the individuals who are charged with the responsibility for making sure that the Canadian health care system works because health care is a provincial responsibility. This minister and his gang of thugs opposite made sure those ministers would not be heard. That is what they did.

Mr. Harvard: Nine out of 10 opposed the bill.

Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth): Nine out of 10 ministers opposed the bill. We were allowed to hear one witness. The hon. parliamentary secretary should be ashamed of her behaviour on the committee. She tried to discredit the minister of health for British Columbia, an incredibly articulate individual whose primary concern was maintaining the integrity of the health care system in Canada.

But, no. The Tories had their marching orders. We heard the jackboots through the committee. We heard the jackboots daily—bang, bang, bang. "You are not allowed to debate this thing". Do you know what they wanted to do, Mr. Speaker? They wanted to make absolutely certain that by the time this bill came back to Parliament and went over to the Senate that it would be competing with Santa Claus. That is what they wanted. They wanted to make sure that people in Canada were out doing their Christmas shopping while this bunch opposite participated and planned the biggest rip-off of Canadians in the history of this country.

With Bill C-91, these individuals opposite have ensured that the Canadian health care system which is currently under tremendous pressure may collapse over the next few years. That is what they have done. They do not have the guts to have a full parliamentary hearing on this. They knew that every single day that it was before the public of Canada, every single day it was before the legislative committee studying this and every single day it was before this place, there were tens of thousands of Canadians who would wake up and say: "What in the name of God is our government doing to us? What in the name of God would drive these individuals opposite to come forward with a bill that may cripple our health care system?" If there are some obvious benefits to Canadians, I am waiting to hear what they are. All that we have heard is: "We have to do this".

I do not know the reason. Maybe there are some golden parachutes for some of the ministers opposite. We know that there are going to be a lot of ministers opposite looking for more than parachutes after the next election.

However, I am going to tell you something. We have heard testimony at the committee on this bill that it is going to cost between $4 billion and $7 billion. I do not want to underestimate that. It is b-i-l-l-i-o-n—$4 billion to $7 billion that is going to be sucked out of the Canadian health care system. It is going to be sucked out of the wallets of consumers. It is going to be sucked out of the wallets of the elderly, like consumers in Chicoutimi, Quebec, who perhaps have to be on a heart medication like Vasotec that probably would have had generic competition in the next few years. We would have seen the drug price drop by maybe 32 per cent. That is the government's own estimate, about 32 per cent.

What has the government done with this bill for the poor consumer in Chicoutimi, Quebec? It has said: "You are not going to get the benefit of lower drug costs like you used to under generic licensing. That is not going to happen any more".

This guy over here, the minister opposite, is absolutely enthralled by companies like Merck Frosst. He goes gaga when they show up in his office. Merck Frosst is getting 14 extra years of protection, not three, like the minister says, but 14 extra years of protection for a drug that is in the marketplace.

It means that the consumer in Chicoutimi or Dartmouth or Winnipeg, or wherever, is not going to benefit from competition on that particular drug. It means consumers are going to be paying 32 per cent higher for 14 years on that drug. Where does Merck Frosst take its profits? It does not reinvest them in Quebec, like the minister would like to have us believe; it goes to other places. It goes to Caribbean countries where there are better tax laws, it goes to Swiss bank accounts, and on and on.

An hon. member: Tell us about the bill.

Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth): I am telling you about the bill. The Canadian public absolutely wants to know what the impact of the bill will be. Members want to talk about the bill, so let us talk about the bill.

They are saying opposite: "Tell us about the bill". I am going to tell them about the bill and they are going to start yelling to tell them about something else because they do not want the Canadian public to know this. In the 1960s—

An hon. member: Read my speech.

Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth): You cannot even read your speech. He does not read it very well, that is the thing. He can still read but not terribly well.

You will notice, Mr. Speaker, that I do not have notes, I am not reading from a speech like the minister. I do not need departmental assistants to tell me what is right and wrong. I know what is right and wrong because I represent the vast majority of the Canadian public who are opposed to this bill.

Let us talk about the background. The hon. member for Winnipeg South is in a fit or something over there. I do not know what the heck it is but perhaps she could go and have a drink of water and maybe calm herself down.

In the 1960s a number of reports were commissioned by the Canadian government to try to figure out why the drug prices in Canada were higher than they were in corresponding nations, like the United States or Great Britain or France or Switzerland, or wherever. These studies conclusively proved that drug prices in Canada were much higher than the average, given the comparable state around the world.

The minister opposite says that is not true. I can quote from his own departmental documents. The minister has had 40 minutes to put his case. He has not put it and now he persists in trying to interrupt when the case is being put properly. The minister, if he has so much to say, should have shown up at committee, should have allowed the committee to sit like it wanted to sit, and we would have been able to question the minister longer than 25 minutes, which is the amount of time we got because he did not want the facts to be known.

Back in the sixties the Canadian government reports said that drug prices in Canada were too high. The right hon. member for Vancouver Quadra, a colleague of ours in the House of Commons, at that point, in 1967-68 introduced a bill which set up a system called compulsory licensing. That system, as set up, recognized that there is intellectual property rights for patents in Canada and around the world, but it recognized that in Canada there is another interest, the Canadian health care system. In order to protect the Canadian health care system, a system called compulsory licensing was set up which allowed competition, because competition moderates prices, it drives prices down.

We embarked on a regime in 1968 which worked. It does not matter who you talk to, you could talk to the Senate subcommittee on aging in the United States, or you could talk to the general accounting office, or even if you talked to departmental officials such as Mr. Eastman, who is the chairman of the PMPRB, everyone says the system works. We can give quotes all day long that he gave.

It is a clear fact known around the world that the system of compulsory licensing, which was introduced into the Canadian health care system by the right hon. member for Vancouver Quadra, has saved Canadians billions of dollars over the intervening years. Through 1968 and 1987 it saved Canadians billions of dollars in drug costs. When competition goes into the marketplace—and the government's own figures tells us this—the price of the drug goes down generally by about 32 per cent. Canadians benefit. Canadian health care plans benefit. Private insurers benefit because the price goes down.

Everything was working okay. There was not a big problem with generic licensing. However, this bunch opposite came to power in 1984 and after they got in power they just dropped down dead to the American agenda.

It is clear and there have been books written on this, one of the big things the Reagan administration wanted was for Canada to get rid of its system of compulsory licensing.

It had nothing to do with whether or not it was working. It did not care whether or not it was working. What it cared about was kissing up to the Americans down south.

An hon. member: Shame.

Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth): This Prime Minister was more concerned about whether or not he was going to get the opportunity to sing. Remember in Quebec City when he sang When Irish Eyes are Smiling? Every Irishman in Canada was embarrassed by that.

There is a book out that said when the shamrock summit took place in Quebec City, the number one agenda item was not dealing with trade barriers. The number one agenda item was whether or not Canada would get rid of its compulsory licensing system.

The Prime Minister of Canada indicated clearly: "Ronnie, is that what you what? Ronnie Reagan, is that what you what? No problem. I will get my minions to work and we will kill the system. We will get rid of the system that has saved consumers in Canada billions of dollars".

That is what the government did. In 1987 a bill was introduced in this House called Bill C-22. Liberal Party members opposed it because it significantly altered the system of compulsory licensing in Canada. We fought it hard. We said Bill C-22 would lead to increased drug costs without any real increase in research and development investment in Canada. That is what we said.

We fought it very hard. The Senate of Canada did its job. The Senate of Canada sent the bill back. It had a number of amendments and it said: "No, this bill is not proper. We want the thing changed". But the government had its way like it usually does. It did not succumb to public pressure. That was in the glory days when it thought it could live forever. How things have changed.

The government pursued Bill C-22 and the system of compulsory licensing. At that time, the government gave a commitment, a solemn undertaking to Canadians and the ministers of health around the country, the system it put in place would remain in place until 1996. It said: "Do not worry about it. We know this is a great disruption to the system. We know it may lead to higher drug costs". The former minister even indicated at that time he knew it was going to lead to higher drug costs.

The government members said: "That is okay. There are going to be all these benefits, but do not worry because we are going to have some stability in the marketplace. We are not going to change the bill again. It is going to be like this until 1996".

Lo and behold, another call came from the lobbyists down in Washington about one year and one-half ago. They said to the Minister for International Trade and probably to the Prime Minister directly: "We do not like your system of compulsory licensing. We want it gone. We want it dead. We want it buried. We want it out of the system".

There have been articles written in The New York Times. and in papers all over the world about the U.S. drug lobbyists. They go around saying: "Great job. Not only are we influencing the agenda in Washington, but we have hijacked a government, the total Canadian government. We have put our agenda forward to the Canadian government and it has not even put up a fight".

It said: "Boys, what do you want?" They said: "We want rid of this thing called compulsory licensing because we do not like it. We think what we need here is a wide open system where we can charge whatever we want. We want to get rid of competition in the marketplace, but most of all we do not want an example of how you can regulate the drug industry for the benefit of consumers because there is change coming down in Washington. Down in Washington, we have a new administration coming in, President-elect Clinton. He clearly indicated the big multinational drug lobby that ran the Reagan-Bush administration is no longer going to be running the show down in Washington".

He has served them notice in a number of speeches and in his acceptance speech when he was elected just one month ago. He served them notice he was going to go after them. Health care policy in the United States would no longer be dictated by special interest groups like multinational lobbies. It would be dictated by what was in the best interests of American consumers.

Ms. Clancy: Tell us about the dinosaurs here.

Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth): What do the dinosaurs over here do? They fall down dead. They say: "What do you want? What are your interests? No problem, we will do it. How quick do you want it? Shut down Parliament? Not a problem, we do that all the time. Hear from Canadians? Ah, they do not have to be heard from. You just have to ignore those people. You just have to ignore the Canadian public".

So the government came in with a bill which effectively is going to shut down the compulsory licensing system in Canada. It is going to do it well before the 1996 review and it is going to do it at the expense of the Canadian consumer and the Canadian health care system.

I started by talking about the unholy haste of this bill. Let us talk about some of the specifics of the bill.

• (1130)

This bill is specifically going to eliminate the system of compulsory licensing in Canada. The system has saved Canadian consumers billions of dollars over the last 15 years. It has saved billions of dollars for the Canadian health care system, dollars that go toward opening new treatment facilities, new hospital beds and things like that.

The government members say: "No, no, no, we do not want debate on this. We are going to change the system to the benefit of multinational drug companies to the detriment of Canadian consumers. We are not only going to do it effective the date the legislation passes, we are going to do it retroactively."

I think the Canadian consumers should know this piece of legislation is retroactive. It goes back to December 20 of last year. All these products currently in the marketplace were priced for 17 years of exclusivity with some competition at the end. They are going to get not three years but in the case of drugs like Vasotec, up to 14 additional years without competition.

What does that mean? It means Canada is going toward a system similar to that of the U.S. I want to read this. We are now harmonizing with U.S. legislation. What does it mean?

Let me quote from the U.S. Senate subcommittee on aging. This is important. It says: "The average American pays 62 per cent more for prescription drugs than the average Canadian citizen". Why is that? It is because they do not have a system of compulsory licensing. That is the system this government is driving us toward.

Families U.S.A., September 10, 1992, reported the top 20 prescription drugs purchased by the non-elderly rose in price by 82 per cent in a six year period in the United States. That is the system this bill is going to give us.

The U.S. House subcommittee on health, and Congressman Henry Waxman say U.S. brand name prescription drugs cost on average 32 per cent more in the United States than in Canada. The report adds Canada's controversial drug patent system and compulsory licensing contributed to lowering of prices on drugs in Canada. What in the name of goodness is this minister opposite doing? He is introducing a bill in this House which effectively is going to cost Canadian consumers $4 billion to $7 billion more for the drugs they have to purchase.

Mr. Blais: Untrue.

Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth): The minister says it is untrue. Balderdash. The minister should read the minutes of the committee hearings, even those of the truncated committees. Elizabeth Cull, the minister of health from British Columbia was the only one we were allowed to hear. She represented nine of the 10 Canadian health care ministers.

The minister of health from Quebec decided he was going to opt out because of pressure from multinational drug companies. Elizabeth Cull said B.C.'s own study indicated it would cost over $140 million more for two drugs in British Columbia alone, as a result of this bill. That is just in B.C.

She indicated B.C. members had talked to the minister of health opposite and begged him not to proceed with this. As the protectors of Canada's health care system they knew this drug was going to put strains on it that may ultimately collapse the availability of quality health care for Canadians. However the government does not care.

The minister opposite talks about research and development. Give me a break. The multinational drug companies have rolled into town with their high-priced lobby. They have spent tens of millions of dollars to influence this bunch opposite and try to destabilize the opposition, which has not happened by the way, but they were absolutely enamoured by the international drug lobby.

These companies roll into town and say: "Okay, not only do we want the drug patent law in Canada changed, but we want it changed retroactively. We want it by December 31, 1992. If we do not get it Mr. Minister, you are not going to have those fancy announcements where you stand up and do your ribbon cuttings. You are not going to have the $500 million in research and development we are now promising. Either you get it done by December 31, or we are going to come after you, Mr. Minister. You are not going to have those photo ops we are now planning for you."

This government has caved in for photo opportunities with vague promises of $500 million for research and development. I think most Canadians out there who have a basic understanding of math will understand if you give $7 billion to multinational drug companies and they say: "We will put $500 million back", it is a pretty good deal for the multinational drug companies.

If the minister gave me $600 million, I would give $550 million back and retire for the rest of my life somewhere with $50 million in the bank. So this government says: "What a deal we have for you. Because we are going to eliminate compulsory licensing, we are going to give multinational drug companies up to $7 billion and out of that $7 billion, what a deal we got back from them. They are going to agree to put $500 million back into Canada for research and development." That is absolutely obscene.

The government sits back and talks about research and development in Canada. It knows full well the impact the drug patent laws have on research and development is minimal. It knows full well a big international drug company like Merck Frosst locates primarily in the country where it has its home base.

Let us get real here. Canada represents only 2 per cent of the international drug market. That is it.

This government would have you believe by giving another 3 to 14 years of protection we are somehow going to become the Mecca for research and development. What utter nonsense.

Mr. Côté, who was the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs or Industry, Science and Technology back in 1987, made statements all over the place. When the government came in with Bill C-22 he said: "This is going to change the system. We are going to have research and development coming out of our noses and our ears and other orifices." Well it did not happen. He said there were going to be 3,000 jobs created in Canada as a result of Bill C-22. There have been 1,345 jobs created as a result of Bill C-22.

An hon. member: Two thousand four hundred.

Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth): There have been less than 1,500 jobs created. The government promised these high-tech jobs and said: "You know these jobs are going to go to places like Montreal and Toronto." They include such things as janitors and floor washers. Those are the high-tech R and D jobs this bunch opposite negotiated with the multinational drug companies.

An hon. member: Government advertisers.

Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth): Jobs have been created for sales individuals, advertising firms and probably lobbyists.

The one thing this drug bill has done is increase the profitability of some of the lobby companies in Montreal, Toronto and Ottawa, I will tell you that much.

This bunch opposite said: "If we give even more protection to the international holders of patents on pharmaceutical drugs we are going to get more research and development in Canada." The Liberal Party said: "Okay, if you are so sure of that put it in the bill. Put a requirement in the bill that the international drug companies will have to increase their investment in Canada." The government opposite said: "We could not possibly ask them to do that. We could not possibly require them by statute to put 15 per cent or 16 per cent or 17 per cent investment back into the Canadian economy because we like these guys. They buy us great dinners. There are a couple of golden parachutes too maybe for a couple of the front bench ministers, maybe even the Prime Minister, who knows, we will see in the future". We have heard that.

Ms. Clancy: Oh, I am shocked.

Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth): So the government has not even required additional R and D in this bill.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please.

[Translation]

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I believe the hon. member should at least take the time to think before—

An hon. member: He is short of arguments.

Mr. Blais: You have to be short of arguments to say such things in the House, Mr. Speaker. I think it is unacceptable—

[English]

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, on the same point of order. Just because the minister does not agree with the comments does not make them unparliamentary.

If the comments made were unparliamentary that is one thing, but clearly that is not the case. They might not be the comments the members like, but they must not be ruled unparliamentary. The minister must be warned not to interfere.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please.

[Translation]

I would like to ask the hon. member for Dartmouth to be more careful in his remarks.

[English]

Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth): The truth hurts does it not? The truth shall set you free. The truth is this government has caved in to a multinational drug lobby which is going to take $4 billion to $7 billion out of the Canadian health care system. It is going to deliver it to multinational drug companies, not Canadian-based drug companies. It will devastate the Canadian success story called generic drug manufacturers, an industry that was born and has been successful in Canada because of compulsory licensing. It is going to do all that and the minister gets upset when I put the fact to the record.

I can understand why the minister would be upset. I would be upset if the Canadian public thought I was an accomplice in giving away $4 billion to $7 billion.

Mr. Blais: You are a liar.

Ms. Clancy: Mr. Speaker, privilege. Withdraw.

• (1140)

Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of privilege. The minister opposite has just called me a liar. Mr. Speaker, I would ask you to ask the minister to withdraw that statement.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. Does the hon. minister wish to comment?

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, you can understand my outrage when they accuse ministers of profiting from this bill. I may have called the hon. member a liar, but I would have liked him as well to retract the insulting insinuations he made concerning my colleagues and myself.

I am willing to retract, but I think my colleague should also retract the hurtful insinuations he made concerning this side of the House.

[English]

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. minister has withdrawn his remarks. I want to thank the hon. minister for doing that.

I also want to point out to the Chair that when remarks of that nature are made in the House, there are no preconditions which are set for those remarks. If the minister cannot accept the heat of debate in the House of Commons, perhaps he ought to do the honourable thing and resign or leave the Chamber.

I would hope that the Chair would take under due notice that my colleague, the hon. member for Dartmouth, has made no unparliamentary suggestions in his remarks whatsoever and we accept the apology and the withdrawal of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I have listened carefully to the debate from the beginning and I think that both sides of the House have uttered, in the heat of the debate, things that seemed almost unwise to me.

I have urged the hon. member for Dartmouth to be careful and I see that the hon. minister is also showing his good faith by retracting what he may have said. I think that in both cases co-operation is still evident and I call upon members from both sides of the House to carry on debate.

The hon. member for Dartmouth.

[English]

Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, as I was saying—

Mr. Dingwall: Why would the minister be afraid?

Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, this begs a question. Why would the minister be afraid of full debate? Why would the minister be afraid to debate the facts? Why would the minister be afraid to allow full and open committee hearings and hear the 150 or 160-odd witnesses who wanted to appear? Why would the minister on behalf of his government be afraid of a full debate in the Parliament of Canada?

It is fairly clear why he is afraid. The facts are not on his side. The facts are on the side of those who are opposing the elimination of compulsory licensing in Canada. The facts are on the side of the just and the good who say that this government has capitulated to a multinational drug lobby based in Washington. That is a fact. If the minister has trouble dealing with the facts, he knows what he can do.

They want more facts. We had at our committee an internationally renowned expert, Dr. Stephen W. Schondelmeyer, whom the government used to quote but no longer quotes since he came up with an unflattering analysis of what this bill was going to do. He is a pharmacological economist from the United States of America. I am going to read from the executive summary of what he gave us in those truncated committee hearings.

He said that total savings to Canadians from generic pharmaceuticals in 1992 was about $420 million in 1992 alone. Compulsory licensing saved Canadians almost $0.5 billion in 1992 alone. He also said that the added cost from one drug alone, Vasotec, to the Canadian health care system—the drug that has caused Merck Frosst to say to the minister that this bill must be retroactive because it has a drug in the pipeline and if there is a licence issued it will lose a lot of money—is an additional $50 million per year. This would be the value to Merck Frosst.

Whose interest is this government looking after? It certainly is not Canadians. It is certainly not the Canadian health care system. Listen to this, Madam Speaker. This is absolutely startling. This independent analysis states that the cumulative cost of Bill C-91 from 1993 to the year 2000 will be $1.7 billion by 2010 and the cumulative cost from 1993 will be $4 billion. This is the multibillion dollar, multinational drug bill. The ministers opposite, who have ridden shotgun over the parliamentary process to get this bill through with unholy haste, are delivering a multibillion dollar Christmas bonus to multinational drug companies.

Mr. Dingwall: Oh, there is a Santa Claus.

Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth): There is a Santa Claus and his name is the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, but the only individuals who are going to get gifts this Christmas are executives with the multinational drug companies. Consumers will probably get a lump of coal in their stockings.

An hon. member: That is right and they will have to pay for that coal from Cape Breton.

Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth): They will probably have to pay for that.

I want to give another quote from this eminent pharmacological economist, Dr. Stephen Schondelmeyer. He is the one that the Conservative members used to quote until they read his document and said: "Oh, my God, he has found out what we are trying to do here". He states: "The magnitude of the direct cost over the next 15 to 20 years of Bill C-91 will be $4 billion to $7 billion".

Mrs. Dobbie: Could the hon. member clarify if that was the same Schondelmeyer who worked for the generic drug companies?

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. parliamentary secretary does know that this is not a point of order but a point of debate.

Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth): I can understand why the hon. member opposite, who was riding shotgun through most of the committee hearings, is quite concerned. When the facts are put on the record, she has to squirm all over the place. What they did was unconscionable in the committee.

When Dr. Stephen Schondelmeyer, who is a well respected international pharmacological economist came forward, it was shameful. The member opposite tried to discredit the individual, after quoting him so many times in committee and in the House before she knew that he had seen through the thin veneer of this bill and saw what it was going to cost. It was very clear from his testimony and the other testimony that we heard from a number of individuals that this bill is absolutely obscene.

This bill is going to cost through retroactivity alone. I want to talk about that. The Canadian public has a right to know that this bill is retroactive. This bill changes the way that the system worked in the past. It goes back and says that for drugs that are currently in the marketplace where a compulsory licence most likely would have been issued or one was applied for that what the government is going to do is make sure that those licences get cancelled. That is what the government is going to do.

Who is going to benefit from this? Is it the provincial health care ministers? I do not think so. We heard from Elizabeth Cull, a minister from British Columbia, who said that it is going to cost an additional hundreds of millions of dollars to the B.C. health care system. Is it Canadian consumers? We heard from them and they said: "We are not going to benefit". We heard from all kinds of individuals.

Do you know what, Madam Speaker? The only group of individuals who are going to benefit are the shareholders of multinational drug companies. This is pretty interesting. Of drugs in the pipeline, we heard that there were 24 applications to get a generic on the market to lower the price for Canadians. This bill retroactively is going to wipe that out. It is going to wipe them out. Anything that was applied for that had not been given—

An hon. member: How much is Santa going to give?

Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth): Santa is going to give a lot to Merck Frosst, Glaxo and a couple of the other companies.

What we found out is that drugs in the pipeline, as they call it where a licence should be issued but because this government is going retroactive it will not be issued, is worth about $340 million per year.

It gets better. One drug, Vasotec, which is under patent to Merck Frosst, is worth $100 million of the $340 million of all the drugs in the marketplace. One drug is worth 30 per cent of the total value of all those drugs caught in this limbo of retroactivity.

Merck Frosst has been pretty good. Santa has delivered for Merck. Merck does not get three extra years for that drug, it gets 14 extra years for the drug. The effect of the retroactivity in this bill is to give Merck Frosst for one chemical entity called Vasotec in excess of $500 million in additional profits, sucked out of the wallets of Canadian consumers, of Canadian health care providers, of provincial governments and insurance companies. Not a bad gift for Christmas, $500 million, and every penny being paid for by the consumers of Canada. This is third reading debate. I am being told to wind up even though I could go for days on this. This is one of the most obscene bills we have seen in the Parliament of Canada since I was elected.

• (1150)

Members opposite are getting pretty skittish on this.

An hon. member: Particularly the minister.

Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth): They know the longer this bill is before the public, the lower its popularity numbers go. I urge the government members opposite who have a sense of decency to re-examine what this bill does. Look at it in the context of the Canadian health care system. Look at in the context of consumers who live in their ridings. Most of all, I say that right is right and wrong is wrong. We will not support this bill.

I urge members on third reading to find a little bit of guts and a whole lot of conscience and vote against this obscene piece of dirty work which is effectively going to gut the Canadian health care system for the benefit of multinational drug companies.

Mr. Riis: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. There have been discussions among all of the parties and the independents and others within the Chamber and I think you would find that there is unanimous consent to move the following motion:

> That Bill C-333, an act to amend the Canada Health Act, standing in the name of the hon. member for Mission—Coquitlam on the Order Paper be discharged, the bill withdrawn and the subject matter thereof referred to the Standing Committee on Health and Welfare, Social Affairs, Seniors and the Status of Women.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend is quite correct. There have been some consultations and I wish to give the consent of the Official Opposition to that motion.

[Translation]

Mr. Danis: Madam Speaker, if I may, I would like to intervene.

[English]

Before giving consent, since I am unaware of this, if you could just put it on hold for a few minutes. Of course, I do not doubt the word of my colleagues. I just want to be absolutely positive before we give consent.

Madam Deputy Speaker: If the hon. members for Kamloops and Cape Breton—East Richmond agree, the Chair will wait for a few minutes before putting the motion to the House.

Resuming debate.

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Madam Speaker, nobody on this side and most Canadian people cannot be happy that we are debating this bill this morning. That this bill should be here at all is reprehensible. That it is here because of the pressure of the American government and American multinationals is contemptible. That its inevitable passage has been assured by an abuse of the Parliament of Canada is despicable. Worst of all, that this government should argue that this bill is for the benefit of Canadians is hypocritical. Virtually all Canadians would agree that this is a reprehensible, despicable, contemptible, hypocritical government that cares not for its people. This is not a government for the people; this is a government for the multinationals.

Its resolve is to further the ideological attack of this government on the Canadian system of social democracy in an effort to pursue a United States agenda to make us more like them, a society with an almost complete lack of sympathy for the poor, the aged, the ill and the disadvantaged.

Canada has become for many nations in the world a model of how we can approach the issue of the cost of drugs and the cost of medicare in a creative and successful fashion. You will recall, Madam Speaker, that in 1969 legislation was introduced in this House to provide for compulsory licensing of patented drugs by generic companies. What Canadians who are listening ought to remember is that before that time the prices of patented drugs in this country were the highest in the industrial world. This government says that legislation was an attack on intellectual property.

What people seem to forget is that the generic companies did not simply copy the drugs; they paid royalties for them. For those who consider this an attack on intellectual property rights, let us remember that published songs or published books provide royalties to their creators, just as is done in this instance.

So this was not an invasion of the sacred territory of intellectual property. On the contrary, it ensured that competition would be the mechanism assuring reasonable drug prices in this country. We were successful. During all of that time the profits of the drug companies went up and up, as they have continued to do.

In 1986, this government introduced Bill C-22, a bill that extended longer protection to patented drugs. Why did it do that? In the midst of claims that drug prices have not gone up, the government did that in spite of its claim in order, quite specifically, to increase the profits of the drug companies. There is no other reason for having done so. That is perfectly clear.

But we have to remember that Bill C-22 was introduced just before the free trade agreement was signed with the United States. It was a condition imposed by the American government under Ronald Reagan for pursuing negotiations of the free trade deal. I hear the hon. member across the way say: "That is not so". Well, let us just review a couple of facts.

The chairman of the U.S. trade advisory committee was Mr. Pratt. Remember Mr. Pratt, the president of Pfizer? He had a significant role in impressing upon the President of the United States that the Prime Minister had to be told that if he was going to have a deal, he was going to have to give something up.

When the Prime Minister asked what should be given up, the reply was: "Well, how about that generic deal you have going over there, where Canadians actually get drugs for a decent, fair price?" The Prime Minister agreed. Even before the free trade agreement ever entered this place, the deal was cooked.

If there is any doubt about that, let us look at the record out of external affairs. External affairs observed specifically that the trade-off which would have to be made in order to get the free trade agreement would be the elimination, as much as possible, of compulsory licensing of generic drugs in Canada. That is what Bill C-22 did. It provided extended patent protection as was wanted by the American concerns.

Of course, the government did not come in here and say: "Look folks, we have to get this deal so that we can negotiate a worse deal, the free trade agreement". It did not say: "We are going to pass this bill to increase the profits of the multinational pharmaceutical manufacturers that hold the patents". Oh no, it did not say that. What it said was that prices would not increase.

Can you imagine the sophistry of passing legislation in order to increase profits but at the same time telling us that prices will not increase? Why will they not increase? We are going to have a Patented Medicine Prices Review Board which will keep things under control.

Meanwhile, Canadians were promised $1.4 billion in new expenditures for R and D. The then Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs said that we were going to get 3,000 jobs for scientists and technologists out of that and new R and D. That was the justification and argument. What were the real results?

• (1200)

With respect to research expenditures, it has to be admitted that more than $1.4 billion is credited now to the pharmaceutical manufacturers, that is, the multinationals, in terms of increased R and D expenditures.

However, those 3,000 new research jobs did not materialize. The drug companies, the pharmaceutical manufacturers, that is, the PMAC members themselves, said that as of 1990-91 they had created 1,386 new jobs. Let us give them credit for another couple of hundred.

They were not those great science and technology jobs. Two-thirds of those jobs were for sales and administration. The research jobs that were created were in fact for that kind of research that is involved in clinical testing by and large.

We do not have and we never will have the basic original research thrust. It will remain in the United States. Not only that, 850 production jobs were lost in that period of time since that legislation was passed. Those are the benefits.

What about prices? The government claims that prices have risen at a rate of 2.9 per cent per year for patented drugs. However, the Patented Medicine Prices Review Board said that new drug prices were from 40 per cent to twice as high as what they were before Bill C-22 was passed.

That is apparently the cause of the results reported by Green Shield. It finds that the costs for drugs have gone up 11 per cent per annum since that time.

Indeed, Stephen Schondelmeyer, whose name has come up previously, said that before Bill C-22 was introduced the Canadian prices for single source drugs were 17 per cent lower than U.S. prices. After Bill C-22, the prices for single source drugs in Canada suddenly rose to 12 per cent higher than in the United States of America. What benefits? The consequences of this were inevitable.

The burden on drug benefit plans has been tremendous. In Ontario, there has been a 50 per cent increase in per capita costs. As a result of that, a number of drugs have been deinsured. The deductibles have been raised for senior citizens in pharmacare plans. Therefore, the impact on seniors, on governments and on the taxpayer is clear: It has been more costly.

Now we have Bill C-91. For those watching this debate, Bill C-91 will essentially double the period of patent protection. It is a direct attack on the generic industry. It has the same purpose as Bill C-22. That is to increase the profits of the drug companies. I repeat that. Let us be clear and unambiguous. There is no other reason for this legislation than to increase the profits of the multinational patent drug makers. What are the benefits that we are going to get from this?

Of course, there was an alliance out there forged by the multinationals, led by the American government to get the rules of GATT changed and the Dunkel provisions to provide increased intellectual property protection. Of course, this GATT proposal has not been approved and it is somewhat weaker than what is provided in the proposed North American free trade agreement.

The North American free trade agreement has the same history as the free trade agreement with respect to the legislation we have before us today. We have another free trade agreement that has a proposal for intellectual property protection, but before that agreement is even ratified, the legislation is in the House. The multinationals said: "Jump," and the government asked: "How high?"

The arguments of the government are again the same as they were for Bill C-22. There is nothing about the increased profits for the drug companies, but again we are going to get more research. Another $400 million or $500 million in new research money is being promised by the PMAC.

Of course, we were promised that drug prices would not increase. The drug prices will increase because profits must increase. What must be understood is that NAFTA and this bill are part of a campaign to make sure that multinational drug profits will increase and be maintained.

It is particularly important that Canada's system be under immediate attack because Canada is a model for the Third World. Without the kind of leadership Canada provides with its system the Third World peoples will not have a chance in fighting the multinationals.

It is important to get this legislation through right now in a hurry. That is why Parliament has been abused. That is why this government has been so anxious to keep a tent over the entire process, to keep people from knowing what is really going on. Unfortunately, people do know what is going on and hold this government in contempt for what it is doing.

It is very important for the multinationals to get the legislation through Parliament and eliminate the model that we are providing not only for the Third World but also for the United States. The Clinton administration is being made aware that the generic drug system controlling drug prices through competition is a reasonable one to be adopted by the Americans as well.

We have Senators Henry Waxman and David Pryor suggesting that Canada has found ways to control prescription drug prices and it is time for the United States to get on the bandwagon. They say this in observing that patented drugs in the United States cost 32 per cent more than they do in Canada even under Bill C-22. Bill C-91 will bring them into line and that is dangerous.

What does Bill C-91 provide? It says in effect that patent protection will be extended from 10 to 20 years to make things simple. It will destroy the system of compulsory licensing. It will virtually eliminate the generic role in providing competition to keep prices low.

As has been mentioned before, it is not enough for the government to rush in with this legislation and get it done now. It is retroactive to December 10, 1991.

Why do you suppose that is so? Because the intellectual property committee advising Carla Hills, the U.S. trade representative, which is dominated by the multinational drug manufacturing representatives insisted that the United States tell Canada to make it retroactive. This is in spite of the fact it will eliminate a number of generic products that were already in the pipeline. How outrageous.

This legislation does not even require that the patent be worked in Canada. The drug does not even have to be manufactured in Canada and there is no provision for the fine chemicals that go into the drug to be made in Canada. There is no real advantage in this bill to Canadians if you look at the balance.

What are they going to get in return? They are going to get another $400 to $500 million in research. They say that drug prices will not increase because the Patented Medicine Prices Review Board will have its mandate for controlling the prices of drugs strengthened.

• (1210)

Come on. This bill is intended to increase the profits of drug companies. We are being told that this institution is going to make sure that does not happen, except there is one fatal flaw. It is very doubtful whether this new power which they pretend to want to confer on this board will be constitutional. There is a very good chance that it would be considered by the courts to be unconstitutional.

What we have here is nonsense because, remember, it is the multinationals that want Bill C-91. They are very clear about another thing. They not only want to get rid of compulsory licensing. They also want to get rid of the Patented Medicine Prices Review Board. Obviously that must be their ultimate goal.

These sneaky devils have said they would put it in the bill, knowing that ultimately it probably will not work but the people will be fooled. There are other ways in which the people are being fooled.

One hon. member said there would be $170 million invested by Merck Frosst in Ontario. That is big stuff. B.C. is not going to be so happy. It is to get $15 million out there if and only if the government puts some money in for the construction of the building. A real advantage.

Let us look at this a little more closely. What the companies are actually promising amounts to not a whole lot. But let us add up the figures of the previous promise and the current promise and let us suppose that they are going to put $2 billion of new investment in R and D. What does that really mean? In Quebec it means that the drug companies will put in 30 per cent and the governments will put in 70 per cent. In Ontario it means that the government will put in 60 per cent and the drug companies 40 per cent.

If we look at it across the country and put it all together the $2 billion drug companies are promising to put in research has $1 billion coming out of my pocket and your pocket, Madam Speaker.

What are going to be the increased costs? The government says it will be $125 million over a decade. There are various figures being bandied about but this much is clear. It is going to cost between $4 billion and $6 billion more in increased drug costs. The governments are going to put in $1 billion in research money. In order to get $1 billion more in research money we are going to take $6 billion or $7 billion out of the pockets of Canadian taxpayers, out of Canadian governments and out of ordinary Canadian people who are ill or need these drugs. That is no deal at all. It would be better if the government just gave them the billion dollars and let them go on their way.

This bill is a contemptible additional step in the attack on Canadian civility and humanity. It is an attack on the people. It is there for NAFTA. This bill should be rejected and if NAFTA is passed, it should be annulled and all in it, such as this bill as a consequence of it, should be similarly abrogated. We should start back on the civilized path, the civilized vision of Canadians, not the ideological meanness that characterizes this government.

Mrs. Dorothy Dobbie (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Madam Speaker, histrionics aside, I wonder if the hon. member could explain some things to me. Over the past number of days, this morning in the House and again when this member was speaking, we heard a lot of different figures being bandied about as to the cost of Bill C-91.

I would refer to an ad produced by the Canadian Drug Manufacturers Association, that is the generic companies, last January that said this bill would cost $300 million a year. After that in April, just a few short months later, they put out another almost identical ad, identical wording, except that suddenly the cost had jumped according to them to $1 billion a year.

We heard this morning what the hon. member of the Official Opposition was saying. He read Mr. Schondelmeyer's report, as if he were a great expert, saying that this was going to cost $1.7 billion a year until the year 2010. We just heard my hon. friend saying it is going to cost $7 billion until the year 2010.

There are some inconsistencies here. I wonder if the hon. member could explain what they are. The federal government's figures have been consistent throughout this whole period of discussion about Bill C-91. We have projections done by our federal public servants in whom I put a lot more confidence than I do in some American expert, some weekend expert who pulls his figures together on a Thanksgiving long weekend down in the United States. Our federal public servants have said consistently that there will be a cost attached, but it is a small cost in exchange for the huge amount of investment in research and development that will accrue from it.

They are saying that the cost will be $129 million over the next five years. That is about $1 per person per year, less than the cost of a prescription. They know how dangerous it is to try to project into the year 2010. It is almost impossible to figure out at this point in time with technology changes what will really happen. But as far as they would project, to the year 2000, they say that the cost may rise to a total of 2 per cent over that period of time.

Those are consistent figures. My hon. friend has given us a whole range of other figures that do not add up when we start to examine them, when we take a look at them. Perhaps he can explain why those figures are so inconsistent and where he got them from. What is the foundation, the basis, for these wild rhetorical projections that he has mouthed in this House?

Mr. McCurdy: Madam Speaker, the hon. member was in committee when I was there. I said to the hon. member that so many figures were being bandied about there ought to be adequate time before committee to hear the experts and cross-examine those experts to find out what the real figures were. If those figures are confused, largely it is because this government did not want those figures and did not give the opportunity to have those figures considered carefully enough to determine who was right.

The hon. member ought to be ashamed to display such ignorance as would have her describe an internationally known expert as a weekend expert. That is shameless.

Let us look at where the possible sources of the discrepancies, if there are discrepancies, are and what the sources are of my figures. Elizabeth Cull said that it will cost $1 billion additional money for the Government of British Columbia alone. Elizabeth Cull said that two drugs would cost an additional $145 million over six years. In Ontario it was suggested that additional costs would amount to $500 million a year in that province. Other experts suggests even more.

I do not know whether the hon. member knows it, but there are 10 provinces and 2 territories in this country. All we have to do is extrapolate the figures and we come up with exactly the same kind of figure as Schondelmeyer of between $4 billion and $6 billion over the next decade.

It does not make any difference. Let us suppose the figure is $4 billion. We are promised $2 billion in additional research investment. I did not hear the hon. member respond to the fact that of that amount of money no more than half will come from the drug companies. The other half will come from the provinces, from the governments, the federal and provincial governments.

If we are going to get $1 billion in additional research money actually put in by the multinationals, it is going to cost at minimum between $4 billion and $5 billion out of the pockets of Canadians. Madam Speaker, I know you know that does not add up to an advantage for Canadians.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Madam Speaker, I listened with attention to the remarks of my colleague this morning. He talked about trade as part of the debate. That brought another issue to my attention.

I have in hand a copy of a magazine called McKesson Today, published by this organization, McKesson, which by the way has acquired recently the Medis Corporation, a company that distributes 44 per cent of all the pharmaceutical drugs in Canada at the wholesale level.

• (1220)

Quite apart from the debate we are having today, there is another one which is attached to it, namely what the revocation of the Foreign Investment Review Agency of some years ago is doing to not only manufacturing, which is what we are debating today, but wholesale distribution which is falling into the hands of multinational corporations based outside this country. This company is advertising for itself in its own magazine which reads:

> With a population of 26.8 million, Canada represents a substantial market that has barely been scratched in terms of wholesale pharmaceutical distribution.

This is from an organization that already owns 44 per cent of that distribution in Canada.

With this bill, in combination with the bill of a few years ago and in combination with the revocation of the Foreign Investment Review Agency legislation, does my colleague agree that we will in fact see more and more corporate concentration, particularly corporate concentration based outside Canada, distributing, manufacturing and selling prescription drugs to Canadians?

Mr. McCurdy: Madam Speaker, the hon. member is quite correct. Whether they have been pharmaceuticals or scientific equipment provided to hospitals, there is no doubt that the provisions of the free trade agreement eliminate any performance tests and eliminate for all intents and purposes all tariff and non-tariff barriers. It is obvious that distributorship is being transferred to American companies.

When the member said something about import and export I thought it might be worth while to look at some of the claims that the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology advanced at one stage. He said that Bill C-22 encouraged the export of drugs from Canada and that our export market was going to be expanded. I do not know whether he said this—he may have left it unsaid—but what was unsaid was that exports of patented drugs increased from $200 million to $230 million. That is an increase, but it is also true that between 1987 and 1990, the same period over which that figure was gathered, our imports went from $700 million to $950 million, an increase of $220 million.

That just does not add up, and I am sure the hon. member knows that.

Mr. Brian White (Dauphin—Swan River): Madam Speaker, very briefly, I think it is important to follow up on the costs of Bill C-91. There have been some outrageous claims made.

I sat and listened to Dr. Schondelmeyer in committee where he estimated billions of dollars to the year 2010. There were four mistakes in that estimate. First, we cannot project to the year 2010 in this industry. Five years is as far as we can go. There were wrong sales figures in his estimate. There were lists of drugs that were off patent on that list and there were wrong patent expiry dates on that list.

There are government officials who have studied this matter for years. They have an analytical model based on five years. They have the products that are affected directly. They have made assumptions. For example, they assumed that every product will be copied, which is not the case, and they assumed that every generic will come on market immediately when it can, which is not the case either. That estimate is $25 million a year over five years; $1 per Canadian.

Could the member comment on that?

Mr. McCurdy: Madam Speaker, I will be happy to. I tell the hon. member what I told him and his colleagues in committee, as all of us on this side did in committee. If they had not limited that committee, if they had not done everything they could to disarm that committee and limit the number of witnesses and the length of time, we could have cross-examined on the various numbers from various sources.

He is getting his numbers from the government and we are supposed to trust that. He does not trust what we get from provincial governments, experts which the hon. member over there calls weekend experts.

The fact of the matter is that this bill was rushed through. We did not have the opportunity to engage in the kind of careful deliberation and study of these numbers that would have permitted a reasonable conclusion for our ourselves or for the Canadian populace. However, we do know that it is going to cost a lot more money, because that is why there is the bill.

No one can be so thick as to believe that eliminating generic compulsory licensing has any other purpose than to increase profits, and therefore increase costs. I do not know what is wrong with those folks over there. They know that is the reason for this bill. Why not admit it? It is going to cost us more, and we are not going to get anything out of it.

Mrs. Dobbie: Madam Speaker, on a point of order, I think that you will find that there is unanimous consent to extend the sitting hours through the midday interruption.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The House has heard the suggestion made by the hon. parliamentary secretary. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Madam Speaker, we have come to expect the sort of intervention that we have just heard. I always listen very carefully to what my hon. friend from Windsor says and how he says it.

When his voice goes up two or three octaves we know that he is getting into the political rhetoric. When he is talking in a low voice we know that it is fairly sensible stuff. Ninety-five per cent of the time his voice was up at least two octaves. That gives us a pretty good sense of the sort of stuff we are hearing from him.

During the course of this debate the greatest casualty of the debate has been the truth. I want to try to put some things on the record today that will present to Canadians who are listening the other side of the debate. It is based on careful work that has been done by members of the Public Service. They are people who have no political axe to grind, but who have done work based on the facts. They have made a careful analysis in supporting the positions they have advanced to us as ministers, which we are now presenting to the House.

We announced our intention to change the patent legislation on January 12, 1992. There has been plenty of time for people to understand the facts and get a clear understanding of what has been happening here. We are hearing in this debate the same phoney charges, the same hysteria, the same twisting of the facts that we saw in Bill C-22 some five years ago.

The opponents of Bill C-91—

Mr. Milliken: Nonsense.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): My friend opposite said nonsense. He unfortunately was not here because I am sure that he would have put a more sensible slant on the debate from his side of the House. However, the same outrageous statements are still being made.

Opponents have said recently that the innovative companies have failed to keep the promises they made in 1987, pursuant to Bill C-22. The companies said at that time that they would increase their percentage of sales devoted to research and development to 10 per cent. It was 4.9 per cent at the time. They said they would do that by 1996, and in 1991 it was 9.6 per cent. They have almost reached that objective, well ahead of schedule.

They invested $1.1 billion in research and development during that period and increased the amount of basic research from 17 per cent of total R and D to 26.5 per cent, a considerably higher dollar amount than was the case prior to Bill C-22.

Opponents said, and we have heard it again from my friend from Windsor, that they would never create the expected 3,000 jobs by 1996. In fact, they created 2,400 jobs by the end of 1991. These are figures for all to see, not the ones we have just heard unfortunately from my colleague from Windsor. Depending on the companies, between one-third and one-half of those jobs are in research and development. They are important jobs that people in this country are seeking governments to encourage.

Mr. Mills: They are sales and marketing jobs.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): My hon. friend is denigrating sales jobs. All I said was that one-third to one-half are research and development jobs. I do not know what my hon. friend is getting so exercised for. If he disagrees with that fact, then say so. He should not get exercised just because he has a different interpretation of it. The facts are the facts.

Opponents said that the 1987 legislation would destroy the generic industry. In fact, the sales of the generic companies increased by 180 per cent. We do not know what the profits are, but clearly the companies have been making profits because they have been investing in research and development. They have also been using some of those profits to buy generic companies. Where? In the United States where there is no compulsory licensing system. Let us put all these things in context.

The critics of Bill C-22 said that the prices of patented medicines would sky-rocket. The Patented Medicine Prices Review Board reported that the increase would be 2.9 per cent, well below the 4.4 per cent inflation during that period.

My friend talked about the fact that in 40 per cent of the cases there were excess prices. Let us put that into context, as well. It was about $700,000 in total in 1991. What the new legislation does do is provide for a roll back. In this bill we have improved the operations of the prices review board to deal with that particular concern.

Mr. McCurdy: Green Shield.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): My hon. friend has just yelled across at me: "Green Shield". That was a report that talked about total drug usage, not just the patented medicines affected by this legislation. It is very important to realize that the amount of drugs covered by this legislation is 20 per cent of the total.

When we consider the usage as well as the impact of prices on the non-patented medicines and the patented medicines not covered by this legislation then it is an apples and oranges comparison. It is very clear that people who are reviewing what Bill C-91 will do should not just take at face value what the Green Shield report says but look behind it. That is what the Patented Medicine Prices Review Board has tried to do.

Bill C-22 was a success as anticipated. It has improved the environment for R and D and has favoured job creation while maintaining reasonable drug prices and fostering generic concurrence.

But the world is going through many changes. The global climate surrounding the international drug industry is developing rapidly and Canada must be in the vanguard if we are to continue to lead the way.

[English]

Opponents are saying that we are doing this simply for the sake of the multinationals. They are wrong again. We are moving to do this for the sake of Canada and Canadians, for the sake of those who will benefit from new medicines, and for the sake of Canadian scientists and researchers and the growing number of innovative Canadian companies. I will just mention some of them: Quadra Logics in Vancouver, Biomira in Edmonton, Biochem Pharma in Montreal, Allelix Biopharmaceuticals in Toronto and Diagnostic Chemicals in Charlottetown. These are companies which will benefit from this protection of intellectual property. They are Canadian biotechnical companies. These are the companies that are developing the next generation of medicines for the sake of Canadian jobs in a dynamic, high-tech industry. Canadians, whether they are young or old, stand to live longer and more comfortable lives as a result of pharmaceutical innovations.

On the basis of the announcement last January and the tabling of the bill in June, the innovative drug companies have come forward with millions of dollars of new investment that will benefit all regions of the country.

The House may recall that I spoke about $500 million during the second reading of this legislation. That $500 million amount has now increased to $635 million over five years in new manufacturing investments and new research.

Astra is presently looking at various locations in Canada where it could set up a research centre with a world-wide mandate, and that represents an investment of $150 million.

Nordic Merrill Dow and Smith Klein Beechman have each announced investments of $40 million to increase research and development work.

Just three days ago, Ely Lilly announced new investments of $170 million for R and D for high-tech modernization and production.

There is more. Above all, the industry will invest more than $2.5 billion in Canada by 1996. This is good news. The economy needs good news.

[English]

I began my remarks by stating that there is a lot of misrepresentation and misinformation in the public domain on this legislation. Let us stop the scaremongering and look at the facts.

First, opponents say that drug prices will soar as a result of Bill C-91. They will not. They have not in the past and they will not in the future. The board, as I said a minute ago, has been given new powers over both new and existing patented drugs. The bill has teeth, it has very sharp teeth. It has some very substantial criminal law penalties that are quite significant.

Seniors have been especially concerned. Again, let us look at reality. Seniors are covered by drug plans in all provinces, and under current provincial plans at least 71 per cent will not pay one penny more as a result of Bill C-91. For the remaining 29 per cent, three-quarters or more of their drug costs are covered by provincial drug plans.

I believe what has caused some of the confusion is that some drug prices are rising faster than the rate of inflation. However, these are not the patented drugs. They have nothing to do with Bill C-91. There was a column in the paper the other day by Dalton Camp. He identified six drugs and talked about how much they had increased. None of these drugs will be affected by Bill C-91.

Eighty per cent of all drugs are not patented and therefore are not subject to any form of price control. The price increases of the remaining 20 per cent, the patented drugs, are under control pursuant to this legislation and Bill C-22 of 1987. These drugs have remained well below the inflation rate, as I mentioned earlier.

The second misconception relates to what my colleague from Windsor has been ranting about just now, which is the cost impact of Bill C-91. The government has over a period of time, from the ground up, made a drug by drug assessment of the cost increase. It would be $129 million over five years. I want to repeat that, $129 million over five years, roughly $25 million a year, $1 per Canadian per year. That would be offset by the tremendous benefits in new research and development and the new cures. I think that is something that Canadians can endure.

The opponents of this bill have offered cost projections that are all over the map. I listened carefully to my colleague from Windsor's response, but he did not give any substantiation for the wild figures of $4 billion, $6 billion, $7 billion that he threw around. However, Dr. Heinz Redwood, an internationally recognized industry expert, has reviewed the figures that have been developed in the Department of Industry, Science and Technology. He concluded that they are based on substantive analysis. I will quote him. He said: "They are based on acceptable methodology and reasonable assumptions".

He went on to say: "The cost to Canada may well turn out to be lower than forecast, thus adding a safety margin for possible but currently unforeseeable additional costs". Dr. Schondelmeyer, who my friend from Windsor referred to, projects this will cost $7 billion over 17 years. That projection may be sensational and you will probably read about it in the papers tomorrow morning. You will not read about the $129 million.

This is a gross overstatement because the professionals in the department of industry went through his analysis which he produced over the Thanksgiving weekend in the United States. They went over the analysis and pointed out there were drugs in there that were off patent. He was extending terms far beyond what he should have in order to come up with the analysis. What do they come back to? They come back to the $129 million we had developed.

We tabled Dr. Redwood's report in the committee and that is there for all members to see and review. I would like to talk about another element of this and that is the question of drug usage.

Drug costs are driven up more by drug usage, the type of drug, the size and the number of prescriptions. If each Canadian used just one less prescription per year, we would save almost 20 times the additional cost to the drug purchasing system we calculate.

Another misconception I want to address is the mistaken notion Bill C-91 will double the patent period for pharmaceuticals from 10 to 20 years. Unfortunately, we heard that again this morning from the hon. member from Windsor. It has been documented time and time again by my colleague, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

The increase as a result of this bill is three to three and a half years in the market protection provided to these companies. It is not 17, 10 or 20 years or whatever the figures are that get thrown around by the opponents of the bill.

Once the patent does expire, the generic drug companies in Canada will be able to compete openly with the company that invented the medicine, as is the case in any other sector of technology. This legislation is bringing the intellectual property protection for pharmaceuticals in line with what is there for all other types of inventions.

I think this point bears repeating again and again. We are not singling companies out for more favourable treatment, but bringing them into line with other industries.

Opponents say this bill will mean the end to the generic industry in Canada. As I said earlier, the generic industry has grown by 180 per cent since 1987. Our projections indicate in the new environment there is no reason why they should not be able to grow at rates equal to those of the rest of the pharmaceutical industry.

Close to 60 per cent of generic business is now generated from drugs that are already off patent. Furthermore, there are nearly 2,000 off-patent products available to the generics right now that have not been copied by them.

The U.S. generic industry operates in an environment without compulsory licences. It is growing and thriving so much the generic companies have bought U.S. generic companies using the profits they have generated here in Canada. Clearly, there is no reason why this sector should not prosper in Canada.

Yesterday morning Ralph Nader said on Canada AM: "If it ain't broke, why fix it?" These types of opponents ignore the changing realities of the global marketplace. Mr. Nader talks a great line about all Canada's inventions but he is really saying he would like to see us keep on inventing, but he would not provide the encouragement and protection to the inventors.

He would have us hand these inventions over to countries where there is this protection so they can commercialize the inventions for world markets and take the benefits outside Canada. I do not agree with that. We want to keep the jobs and benefits here in Canada and that is what Bill C-91 is all about.

An international consensus emerged in the GATT about a year ago on world standards for intellectual property. It is critical to Canada's future prosperity that we participate in this consensus. If we do not accept this proposal, Canada will put at risk many of the benefits of the Uruguay round and jeopardize our over-all trade relationships.

These are days of great change in this particular industry. I referred to Business Week, November 16, in my intervention earlier on second reading. I pointed out where a lot of change is happening. Jobs are being lost in other countries. Here in Canada we are gaining these jobs and we are doing so because we do have competitive advantages. We have world class scientists, excellent medical institutions and a reputation of high standards in the area of medicines. We have a tremendous international reputation in the type of health care system we have.

We are trying to achieve balance in this bill. I expect you would think people on both sides of this House would have an axe to grind at tilting the balance one way or the other in the course of the comments they make.

I want to quote someone who is probably quite objective. This person must try to find the right balance between attracting investment and controlling costs. I am speaking here of Premier Rae of Ontario. These are quotes from a press conference on December 7. He said:

> Just because we have some questions about Bill C-91 does not mean we are against this kind of investment.

For example, research and development, and high value-added manufacturing.

> The federal government has to take its responsibilities with regard to intellectual property and we respect that.

That is what we are doing with Bill C-91.

Then he went on to say:

> Whatever regime of intellectual property is worked through, this jurisdiction has to be competitive with others in attracting investments.

Again, this is what we are trying to do with Bill C-91.

He went on to say:

> We want to have a competitive balanced industry which can compete with anyone in the world. We need to have a reasonable regime for the protection of intellectual property and at the same time we have to take our responsibility for trying to manage the costs of a publicly insured plan.

This explains in a nutshell, the balance we are trying to attain with Bill C-91. I would encourage the members opposite to recognize those benefits we are bringing here, help us get this legislation through and then work with us in developing with the provinces and other players in the industry the best, most effective, most equitable type of price control regime we can provide for the Patented Medicine Prices Review Board.

That is the balance we should be trying to achieve in this House. We should not be trying to destroy the whole bill and with it the investment, research and development and good jobs that come from it.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Madam Speaker, I listened carefully to the minister. He seems to refer to this GATT agreement repeatedly not only in the House but in other conferences.

Yesterday my colleague from Winnipeg—St. James quoted from article 31(b) of the proposed GATT agreement. It reads as follows: "Where the law of a party allows for the other use of subject matter of a patent without authorization of the right holder, including use by the government or third parties, the following provision shall be respected. Such use may only be permitted if part of such use the proposed user has made efforts to obtain authorization and this requirement may be waived by a party in the case of a national emergency or other circumstances of extreme urgency or in cases of public non-commercial use".

What is the public health care system of Canada if it is non-commercial use? Would that not be a legitimate and valid argument for pleading for special status in exemption under the GATT?

• (1250)

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, I am surprised my friend of all people would miss the point on this. We are not trying to find a way to avoid attracting investment in Canada. We are trying to find a way to attract investment in Canada.

As I pointed out in my remarks, we have seen the changes that are happening world-wide where new mandates for research and development for manufacturing are being established. We are getting these in Canada.

If I took the approach my hon. friend is implying through his question, we would not get this investment. That is the balance we are trying to achieve in this legislation.

[Translation]

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Madam Speaker, I listened with great interest to the minister. As a member from Quebec, I was particularly interested in what he had to say, because if we believe what he just said, it seems that this will benefit everybody. There should be a very minor increase in drug prices, and a lot of jobs would be created in Quebec.

I am not so sure about that. The Syndicat des enseignants du Québec already said that it did not believe the minister. Moreover, if we believe the internal reports of the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, that department said that the projected spin-offs from Bill C-22 enacted a few years ago did not materialize.

A review is scheduled of the effectiveness of Bill C-22, which was enacted a couple of years ago and which was no small gift to the drug industry. Why do we not wait for that review which is already scheduled I think for 1996 before passing another bill which gives more or less the same results? Why is the government in such a hurry to legislate, to pass this new bill now? How can we trust a minister who, when he was the Minister of Finance, was never able to balance his budget? Is he relying on the same officials to get his figures?

[English]

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, I think these personal shots are not very appropriate and I am not going to respond to them.

I will say to my hon. friend, his province of Quebec supports this quite aggressively. It sees the benefits of the new research and development and manufacturing, balanced by the protection on costs that are important to the management of the health care system in the province of Quebec.

My hon. friend asks why do we not wait until 1996. I guess we could wait until 1996, but we would forgo that investment. We would also have to run counter to the proposals in the GATT. As I said, that would put our position within the GATT at risk. That is something we on this side of the House are not prepared to risk.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Madam Speaker, I am seeking a clarification from the minister. I ask this sincerely with regard to whether or not the minister believes there is a conflict between the wording of the Dunkel report on GATT and the proposed NAFTA agreement, particularly as it relates to intellectual property.

It is my understanding that article VI on pharmaceuticals of annex 1001.2a, chapter 10, pages 10 to 55 of NAFTA the text reads: "Until January 1, 2002, this chapter shall not apply to the procurement by the Secretaria—and the Secretaria de Marina of drugs that are not currently patented in Mexico or whose Mexican patents have expired". Then there is another sentence and this is where I need the clarification. It says: "Nothing in this paragraph shows prejudice rights under chapter 17, intellectual property". Am I right to conclude that under the NAFTA agreement, the Mexican pharmaceutical industry will have a transition period of eight years under NAFTA, which is not the case under GATT?

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, my hon. friend would have been able to get a better answer had he given me some notice of this question. I would be happy to respond to it.

My sense though is that what that particular provision provides for is a transition in the procurement as opposed to the intellectual property. My friend would be quite interested to know that patent protection in Mexico, a country that is fast developing and seeking this type of investment, is greater for the innovators than is the protection provided in Bill C-91. They have seen that it is important for them to have this degree of protection.

As a country that will be competing with Mexico for investment, as we compete with Europe and other countries, we have to be competitive as well. This is what Bill C-91 is all about.

Mrs. Dorothy Dobbie (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Madam Speaker, my question really falls into line with the question that we just heard posed.

There have been a lot of charges from the opposition that we are making this bill retroactive and that somehow that is unfair or unusual. I wonder if the minister could tell us why the effective date is December 20, 1991.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, the importance of that date is to provide some certainty in the marketplace. If we had not established a date when the new provisions take hold, there would be chaos in the marketplace. Neither the generic companies nor the patent medicine companies would know where they stood with regard to new investments that either one of them might want to make because of the cash flows from drugs that are currently under development now would be quite up in the air as to who would get access to that cash flow.

I want to point out that it was in the interests of the generic companies that Mr. Dunkel provided the transition that he did provide. If he had not provided transition, the compulsory licences that were in place now would have been cancelled. However, he has said to leave those compulsory licences operative so that the companies can take advantage of those and provide for an extension of the patent protection on others.

It was a grandfathering of compulsory licences that were already given. That was done in the interests of the generic companies. By picking that specific date in compliance with the Dunkel proposal, we guard against the market distortions that clearly would have been there if we had said that we were going to wait and establish a date sometime in the future.

Therefore, that is why we have done it the way we have. It is quite consistent with long-standing tradition here in this country on the implementation of budget measures.

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary Northeast): Madam Speaker, my question concerns the Patented Medicine Prices Review Board.

Bill C-22 provided for that board, but what it really does is monitor wholesale prices but does not monitor retail prices. As the minister knows, most of the wholesalers are subsidiaries of big manufacturing companies. Naturally this is why we only have an increase of 2 per cent. At the retail level prices go up 50 per cent to 100 per cent. Therefore, can the minister comment on that?

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): A brief comment, Madam Speaker. The federal government does not have the power constitutionally to control or to influence in a regulatory way retail prices. If there were to be controls, that would be the responsibility of the provincial governments. One of the important influences that we have in this country and one that can serve to help keep retail prices down is through the lists that the provincial governments put out indicating what drugs they encourage people to buy, the so-called formularies.

In this way they can keep an eye on what the retail prices are of the various drugs on the market and encourage people to use those when they are making their purchasing decisions.

This is one of the real strengths we have in Canada. It is one of the ways we want to work together with the provinces where we, through the prices review board, control prices at the manufacturing level and they, working through their formulary and the power that they have through the provincial drug programs, control the price at the retail level.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Madam Speaker, I would like to make a few points with regard to the bill which is before us and its subject matter, but first on the process.

This subject matter is of considerable interest to Canadians in every walk of life: seniors, health care professionals, individuals who have made careers in advocating certain provisions with regard to intellectual property. All have a great deal of concern about this bill and its consequences.

The arrangements which were made at committee were insufficient to deal with the subject matter in any extensive way.

There are those on the opposite side who would conclude because opposition parties sat down and heard a few witnesses that that should be the extent of the debate at committee. In fact members of that committee had hoped to have heard a far larger number of witnesses and wanted to have much more extensive hearings.

The able critic for our party, the hon. member for Dartmouth, repeatedly made that case only to be stonewalled because the government indicated that it was either a few witnesses or no witnesses at all. The motion which went on division was certainly done under duress and we are not being very well served by having a shortened debate on a subject matter which is of considerable interest to Canadians.

Also, I think it would give us a better opportunity. We have heard in this Chamber this morning the charges which were being made by the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs that our facts were wrong. Those of us in opposition made the claim that our facts were right and theirs were wrong. However, that is the essence of parliamentary debate. If we had had longer hearings at committee we probably would have been able to have a much fuller examination of those facts and figures. That is not to suggest or impugn upon anyone who appeared before that committee and gave evidence or testimony.

That is the reality, Madam Speaker. We did not have enough time. We saw at a later stage of the debate of this bill numerous amendments which were not debated. Some of them were adjudicated in this Chamber but again they were not debated because the government was using the guillotine of closure and time allocation to shorten debate on a very important subject.

We are now at third reading on a bill of considerable concern to Canadians and all we have had is a cursory examination of many of the salient parts of this particular bill.

Many of us who have studied this particular issue—I had an opportunity on a previous occasion in 1987 to have such an opportunity to examine this bill—and I want to repeat for the record that I do not concur at all with the findings of the government opposite that we as a separate and independent nation must move toward this new form of intellectual property rights at this time.

I want to be clear. I have great concerns about brand name companies operating in this country. I also have concerns about generic companies operating in this country. For the government of the day to say to Canadians we are now only going to have one industry which it will regulate in its entirety, that being brand name companies, the multinationals, to me is not fair. It is inappropriate and poor public policy.

We are not advocating as a national party, as the member for Dartmouth has indicated time and time again, that we get rid of one at the expense of the other. There ought to be a balance with regard to public policies which we believe compulsory licensing has been able to provide to Canadians over the years.

It was interesting to note that in 1987 the present government House leader, who was the minister responsible, said on the floor of the House of Commons on numerous occasions that the price of drugs in this country would not rise by one red cent. That is what the minister said. I wanted to make this statement, as I know the House would be interested in it.

My colleague, the member for Dartmouth, has repeatedly found information which has been placed on the record that this proposition and thesis just does not stand scrutiny by any test—the test of the opposition, the test of the New Democratic Party or the test of independent third parties. The cost of drugs has increased substantially.

In terms of the government's previous policy, it has not been able to live up to those promises, namely, that prices would not rise one red cent.

However, in this bill it is a little bit different. The government no longer takes out the argument that prices will not rise one cent. It takes out the argument that they are going to rise. Some may say by billions, but they are wrong. It is not billions, they say, it is millions. That is what they say. If you prorate that over a decade it becomes billions quite quickly.

I am astounded to find that the government opposite has seen fit to acknowledge and affirm our claim that prices will rise in this country. The mechanisms it has put in place to try to deal with that, as again our critic for the Official Opposition, the hon. member for Dartmouth, has repeatedly put, are not effective ways in which to deal with that.

The whole question of compulsory licensing and the rights of those individuals who have intellectual property is an argument that has been made in this House time and time again. We are a party that believes both systems can work in this country. They have been working up to now. They have been saving consumers thousands and thousands of dollars on an individual basis.

In point of fact just the other day I had to get a prescription for my son. I asked the pharmacist, who happens to be a friend, because a brand name was prescribed by the physician, if there was anything in stock equivalent to the brand name. The brand name product was $18.29. The generic product for the same thing, to treat the same illness, was $4.22—a sizeable difference.

I am not here to cry about the fact that I cannot afford the difference between $4 and $18, but the fact of the matter is that there are millions of Canadians who cannot afford that kind of difference. Why would we as a nation throw that system out when it has been balanced?

I know that my time is relatively short. I do want to say that I think there is room and there ought to be room in this country for the two systems of compulsory licensing as well as the brand name drug companies. I think we should keep the system that we have. It has been working well and it has been very effective for Canadians.

This particular piece of legislation does very little in terms of the guarantees for research and development. It does not address in any fundamental way the concerns that we have expressed in terms of pricing. Even the most objective soul in this world—I look to the Chair for guidance in that—would have to agree that a retroactive piece of legislation in itself is damaging.

A retroactive piece of legislation which is financial in its substance is far more damaging to the entire system than probably any other aspect of this particular bill. The government is ready to proceed as Santa Claus will proceed on Christmas Eve as he goes down the chimney and into the living-room to leave the gifts.

What a gift. The Conservative government opposite, consisting of the Minister of Justice, the Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs, the Minister of Communications, the Minister of National Health and Welfare—the Prime Minister will not be here shortly—has given this gift to the multinational corporations. It is at the price of taking the hard-earned dollars out of the pockets of ordinary Canadians across this country who work their 40 hours a week, who bring up their children, feed them, put them through school but who now have to be taxed by this government.

It is tax under Bill C-91 in order to facilitate the objectives of the multinational corporations whose primary concern as we all know is the bottom dollar. That is not fair.

Mrs. Dorothy Dobbie (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Madam Speaker, I heard the member say that compulsory licensing works, that it is a good system and that we should keep it in place.

I gather that he is parroting the words of Ralph Nader, the American expert the Official Opposition brought to Canada to support its arguments in favour of compulsory licensing. He said: "If it is not broke, do not fix it". I would suggest that it is broke. Because of compulsory licensing, Canada's growth in the development of the pharmaceutical industry has been severely retarded.

Until 1987 nobody wanted to invest in R and D or in new plants and equipment here in Canada because of the patent licensing regime that was created by the Liberals. Perhaps the hon. member would like to tell us how he thinks compulsory licensing worked to attract that kind of investment. How does he think the compulsory licensing helped to employ Canadians in high value-added jobs? How does he think that compulsory licensing contributed to the universities in Canada?

It did not work. Perhaps he could tell us how he thinks he could create that kind of investment climate under a compulsory licensing regime.

Mr. Dingwall: Madam Speaker, I am not surprised at the question.

I guess I am surprised at the quality of the question, its lack of clarity and understanding of the role that parliamentary secretaries play in governing this country. The hon. member opposite has a responsibility to consumers in this country.

If the hon. member is trying to suggest that compulsory licensing has not contributed to lessening the costs that Canadian consumers have to pay in this country for prescription drugs, the evidence is there in abundance. It is clear. It is on the record. It has been given there by third party individuals and organizations time and time again.

I suggest to the hon. member that the argument that she raises today is an argument which ought to be debated in the fullness of time. She strikes but one side of the coin. We as a national party believe in intellectual property and that individuals ought to be rewarded for their particular discovery. There is no question about that, but equally so we are a national party that also believes that Canadian consumers have a right to be heard.

They have a right to have people accountable to them in terms of the price they pay for their prescription drugs. I thought the hon. member was going to ask me the tough question: What do you mean there are concerns about the generics? I will tell you what I mean by concerns about the generics as with the brand name companies: price and research and development. We have a good system. We could make it even better if that were the focus of this particular debate. However, that is not the focus of this particular debate.

The hon. member is suggesting to her consumers, her constituents, that we want to wipe out completely, forever and a day, compulsory licencing so you as consumers will have to pay top price. That is the difference. That is the ideological difference between Liberals and Tories.

The Tory agenda is clear. One primary objective is to put money in the multinational corporations at any cost. Consumers be damned, research and development be damned, the health care system be damned. The objective is the bottom dollar of the multinational corporations that happen to be driving the agenda of the neo-Conservatives opposite in this House.

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to continue debate on Bill C-91 but it seems beyond imagination to understand why there is a debate.

It is very obvious that the people, the consumers in this country, are totally opposed to this bill. I see it in my own riding where I have received many, many letters in opposition and encouraging me on behalf of my constituents and others across Canada to oppose this bill.

It is incomprehensible why this government at this time is having to pass legislation which will bring further benefit to only that sector of our North American economy which at the present time has the highest profit margin. Why is it necessary at this time to give it the opportunity for yet further profit, and not only profit but profit at the expense of every single Canadian citizen and consumer? As well as costing more per person, it puts our health care system in jeopardy.

To quote the Consumers' Association of Canada when it spoke before the legislative committee last week: "With a new administration about to take office in the U.S., Canada has no reason to proceed with Bill C-91 on the grounds of previous deals with the old U.S. administration to eliminate compulsory licencing".

It said that in view of the fact that the government uses the excuse that it has to put through this legislation at this time. This is in order to comply with rules of the new GATT, which has not yet been approved, and with the rules of NAFTA, which has not been approved either and which we on this side of the House will fight until we get satisfaction that certain minimum standards are met.

When we look at the GATT we see that there is no reason under the articles of GATT that Canada would have to bring in this legislation at this time. There are exceptions expressed explicitly in the GATT legislation which say it is not necessary for Canada to introduce this legislation which would eradicate compulsory licencing in this country.

Furthermore, in NAFTA we see not only the fact that exceptions are allowed, but that our government in negotiating the NAFTA has given a special exception to Mexico that it can have a transition period of eight years before it has to do any alteration to its legislation having to do with patented medicines, pharmaceuticals and such.

However, in Canada before the trade legislation is enacted, we are bringing forward the legislation today which will have a very negative effect on consumers, on our health care systems, on the generic industry in this country. We are also making that legislation retroactive.

• (1320)

The minister said just a few minutes ago the generic companies have had some benefit since C-22 was passed some years ago, which extended patent protection of the brand name drug companies. But listening to the generic companies it is obvious when C-22 was brought in, it was to be in place until 1997 and would not be altered until there had been a full review. On the basis of that, the generic industry adjusted, made plans and did some research. Yes, they had opportunities to develop their market, but so did the brand name companies equally if not more from that same legislation. Here we are passing retroactive legislation, which will seriously penalize them financially to the point their very existence in this country will be jeopardized.

We stand on this side of the House and make our points. It is constantly stated there is contradictory evidence out there. The fact is this government cut off debate. It cut off once again the voice of the Canadian people who had important things to say about this legislation and very important concerns which we share with them.

The minister said a little while ago anybody who is opposed to C-91 is ignorant of a changing, global marketplace. However, day after day we hear this government using the excuse for our economic woes in this country that we live in a global marketplace. We must be globally competitive. Our government is making us adjust unnecessarily to the agenda of the multinational corporations which are dominating the economy of our world more and more. This is absolutely not necessary.

We do live in a globally competitive marketplace, but this legislation only serves to enhance and benefit the multinational corporations. We do have a national agenda which is to represent the best interests of the Canadian people and we do not see it here.

The government says that and promises to go on to another point. It says powers of the Patented Medicine Prices Review Board will be increased and there will be more investment in research and development. None of this is legislated as part of Bill C-91 before us today. There is no compulsion upon multinational corporations which benefit to increase their research and development.

Yes, there are promises. I got a letter yesterday from Eli Lilly, Canada saying it is going to put a $170 million, five-year investment in Canada. It added such legislation as C-91, which gives pharmaceutical manufacturers greater intellectual property protection is critical to attracting this investment and enabling the industry to expand in Canada. Eli Lilly makes this announcement before the legislation C-91 has been passed on the assumptions it is going to pass and there is no debate in this country on anything, in this case on C-91. It also has an underlying message that if for some reason C-91 does not pass then it is not going to make this $170 million investment in this country, which we all know will benefit Eli Lilly tremendously to the detriment of Canadian consumers.

The powers of the Patented Medicine Prices Review Board were supposed to be sufficient with Bill C-22. It is very obvious from reports of different groups its powers were insufficient and prices indeed have risen far more than was anticipated by the government when Bill C-22 was passed.

We can look at the reports of various groups. The Ontario government drug plan reports increases in drug prices of 13.2 per cent. Green Shield health insurance company reports increases of 11.4 per cent. The Manitoba health insurance plan reports increases of 12.3 per cent. All these increases are much beyond the levels of inflation.

The minister would say: "Well that is because they are talking about all drugs, not just patent drugs". However, the fact is any ordinary drug that shows a good profitability for a brand name company can be reformulated and have a patent applied to it, so for time after time after time profitable drugs for the multinational brand name pharmaceutical companies can be put on to patent at our personal expense. This country cannot afford to have the cost of pharmaceutical drugs increase. This country cannot afford this government.

Mrs. Dorothy Dobbie (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): I would like to make a comment, Madam Speaker, and clear up a matter that has been discussed twice just recently by members of the Official Opposition. It is the question of GATT. Some of the statements they have made are quite erroneous. I would just like to assure them NAFTA carries the very same commitment as the GATT Dunkel text in terms of intellectual property.

Mexico does not get an eight-year delay in having to comply with drug patent requirements under NAFTA. The fact is all the parties have to comply on the same basis. That is the whole idea behind this international discussion of trading rules. There must be a level playing field for everybody. The eight-year transition period the member opposite quoted a few moments ago when the minister was speaking has to do with the procurement of drugs and not intellectual property protection, which is what we are talking about here with Bill C-91 and the question of patent protection for drugs.

I would also just like to ask the member a question.

An hon. member: Point of order, point of order.

Mrs. Dobbie: The time is for comments and questions, Madam Speaker.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member on a point of order.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Madam Speaker, I just want to be sure, after 13 years of being here which is not a long time, what the proper role of questions and answers is relative to debate. I understood it is to allow appropriate questions by those members in the House interested in the debate. It does not allow debate and rebuttal by the government systematically to every speaker. I have noticed the hon. member opposite has been given repeated opportunity to rebut speaker after speaker on this side when there are many other members in the House who seek to be heard and ask a question or offer a comment.

The Speaker's job is to provide fair opportunity, which this Speaker has done in a totally exemplary fashion time and time again. I just want to be sure I understand well the role of questions and comments. I believe it is to provide as many members as possible a chance to involve themselves in the debate and not allow one parliamentary secretary to rebut every speaker who has spoken. I think that is wrong, Madam Speaker.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I thank the hon. member for telling me I normally do not have anyone unhappy with the way the floor has been given to different members. I have been trying to allow a first question after a speech to someone from another party. I have done this for the last six years, and this is the very first time it has been brought to my attention.

Earlier in the noon hour we had probably the best period of questions and comments I have seen in the House in a long time, following the Minister of International Trade's intervention. There were short questions and short answers. I think five different members from different parties and an independent were involved. At this time when we only have five minutes, I think it is normal to try to get questions from all sides.

Mr. Tobin: As long as it is not the same person over and over again.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Well, the Chair cannot decide who is in the House. Order, please.

Just before the hon. member was in the House, the hon. member for Dauphin—Swan River was up. I can assure the hon. member I will make sure people from all sides of the House get a chance to speak, but I cannot decide who is in the House from one party or another. This is totally out of my hands as the hon. member will understand.

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. I would like to respond to the comments of the parliamentary secretary across the way. I would like to quote again very specifically from the NAFTA text which gives Mexico exceptional treatment. If it does not apply as an exceptional treatment for Mexico then why was that particular section not also equally applied to Canada? The section says very explicitly until January 1, 2002 that this chapter shall not apply to the procurement by ministries. That could be provincial governments under our health care plan or the federal ministry. Why did that not also apply to Canadian provincial ministries of health on drugs that are not currently patented in Mexico or whose Mexico patents have expired? Nothing in this paragraph shall prejudice rights under chapter 17, intellectual property.

If that was not giving special benefit to Mexico in NAFTA then why did it not explicitly state Canada would have the same advantages as Mexico? It seems very clear to this side of the House this government has bowed once again to the lobby of the multinational brand name pharmaceutical companies and we, on the backs of Canadian consumers have given them, not us, a definite benefit.

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary Northeast): Madam Speaker, I was wondering about the Patented Medicines Prices Review Board and whether this member agrees with the minister when he says it is not constitutionally allowed for the federal government to monitor retail prices. He said we cannot monitor retail prices, only wholesale prices.

Does she agree with that statement?

Mrs. Stewart: I am not a constitutional expert but it seems bizarre to me the government or any body would only be able to supervise or review wholesale prices and not retail prices. That just does not make sense to me, but as I say, I am not a constitutional expert.

Mrs. Dorothy Dobbie (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Madam Speaker, I am delighted to be able to rise today and speak on this bill. I will try to deal with some of the issues that have come up in a factual way, one by one, to dispel any doubts or concerns my friends opposite might have.

It is clear to me they are still confused about a number of issues, not the least of which is the difference between procurement and intellectual property. To respond to the question that was inherent in the hon. member's last intervention, we are talking about procurement and not intellectual property when we are dealing with the text she quoted from the NAFTA.

We are dealing with Bill C-91 in the House today which is an act to amend the patent protection act.

I want to begin by going right back to the beginning and asking what is a compulsory licence. A lot of people must be scratching their heads and asking what does compulsory licence mean. If you have a patent does that not give you some protection against infringement on that patent for x number of years? Is that not something everybody would just take for granted? That is what a patent means, is it not?

That is what a patent means in most countries and that is what a patent will mean in Canada after the passage of Bill C-91. Much to my dismay when I came here I learned that currently, a patent can be infringed upon by a special system set up by the Liberal government that provides for something called compulsory licensing. Those words mean we give someone the special privilege to copy a drug while it is still under patent protection.

This bill removes this artificial and damaging provision that has been inserted into our Canadian intellectual property rights. It creates an atmosphere of fairness and a level playing field. It brings Canada into the 21st century with the rest of the G-7 countries and all the rest of the industrial world, with the exception perhaps of India, which is not exactly one of our key trading partners.

It allows us then to be able to attract investment and research and development dollars, which means more jobs for Canadians. They are not just jobs that do not pay well or that are difficult to attract key people to. We are talking about high valued-added jobs that will create opportunities for the development of information based technologies for the future.

The opposition has claimed that somehow the federal government of the day is trying to pass Bill C-91 because it has some nefarious plot. Nothing could be further from the truth.

The fact is, as I have said already, this bill will allow us to attract more investment and it will create more jobs. Since we announced that we were going to proceed with Bill C-91 a year ago—there has been ample time for the country to think about this bill and ample time for debate and discussion, in spite of what my friends opposite have said—we have had announcements of $502 million in investments to the benefit of Canada.

In my own home province, a local company that has been there since maybe the 1960s has doubled its investment by $60 million in the last two or three months. What this means in terms of real jobs and real investment for Manitobans is a spin-off benefit of $145 million a year. That is a tremendously significant boost to the Manitoba economy.

For the agricultural sector, it means jobs. It means opportunities to expand into other areas at a time when traditional agricultural products are difficult to market.

It means that young people coming out of our universities will have an opportunity for employment and will be able to use their degrees and make their degrees worth more in the future. It means that young people coming out of our universities, not just in Manitoba but around the country, will not have to go to the United States or Europe to ply their trade that they have spent so many years developing.

It also means more research. Universities like the University of Alberta, the University of B.C. or even the University of Manitoba, not to mention all the eastern universities, have received something like $84 million in increased research and development funds since 1987 when we passed Bill C-22 limiting the amount of time for compulsory licences. I think even members opposite would admit that this is a very important investment in the future of our young people and the future of our country.

I would also like to point out that the international trade consensus through GATT, which represents 108 countries, is that we must have level playing fields. Regulations such as compulsory licensing are totally unfair. Creating barriers to trade is no longer going to be tolerated in this world.

It is also important to recognize that this is part of the government's over-all plan to create an atmosphere in Canada in which there are jobs available for people, there are investments, there is real trade. Canadians will be far more prosperous in the future because they have a good strong foundation based on common sense rather than government interference.

Since we made the change with the introduction of Bill C-22 back in 1987 there has been a tremendously good pay-back. One of the things that the opposition will claim is that if we pass this bill—and it did this when we were passing Bill C-22—there are going to be huge price increases for drugs. Another claim it made was that the generic companies were going to go crumbling into oblivion because of the passage of Bill C-22, and now with the passage of Bill C-91.

The fact of the matter is that the increase in drug prices has been kept to 2.9 per cent over this period of time because of the PMPRB, the Patented Medicine Prices Review Board. One of the hon. members mentioned a few moments ago that part of my job is to protect consumers. That is precisely what the PMPRB has done since 1987 and precisely what it will continue to do except that now it will have an even better ability to do this than it did before. It will have more teeth. Under the new PMPRB we will be able to send people to prison for up to a year if they do not comply with the policies.

We can fine corporations up to $100,000 a day. These are real penalties. We can order roll backs. We can order a double indemnity if the company refuses to comply with the policies of the PMPRB, and ask it to pay the government double what it would have made in profits over the period of time when it was pricing excessively.

All of these things are issues that are not terribly well received by the innovative companies, by PMAC and others. However, they are things we think we have to do in order to protect consumers because, as the member opposite rightfully said, that is our job.

I would like to point out also that while we have heard a lot about how compulsory licensing has kept prices down there is just not any real evidence to demonstrate it over a long period of time. We have heard the GAO quoted several times and I would like to quote it myself.

The study the United States General Accounting Office conducted pointed out two things. I am going to quote it so that members opposite will understand exactly what I am saying. It said: "Price differentials appear to be driven by factors that influence how much manufacturers can charge for a drug product in the U.S. and Canadian markets. Specifically, manufacturers selling drugs in Canada face two constraints that do not exist in the United States: federal regulations that are designed to restrain introductory prices for new patented drugs as well as price increases for existing patented drugs; and provincial drug benefit plans".

The report then goes on to elaborate on this and mentions that: "The PMPRB appears to restrain Canadian drug prices" and it explains that its mandate is to review patented medicine prices and ensure that they are not excessive.

The key to lower drug prices in Canada has been the PMPRB. With this new bill and the PMPRB's expanded ability to control prices we will be able to have an even stronger handle on the increase in drug prices, particularly with regard to introductory prices.

Provincial formularies play another important role. In fact, the federal government is also examining the possibility of establishing a formulary, which would give us an even stronger handle on what drugs are being sold in our country.

It is not true to say that somehow if this bill passes consumers are going to pay some exorbitant price increase. I want to say to all the people out there, seniors particularly, who have been frightened by the fearmongering tactics of some of the opposition that they will not be forced to pay exorbitant price increases for their drugs as a result of Bill C-91.

Most seniors are covered by provincial drug plans, but even for those who are not the price increases they might face are really quite minimal. Overall, no matter who pays for it, the price increases we are facing—the federal government agrees, our officials have told us, that there will be some small price increases despite the PMPRB.

We are looking at $129 million over five years. That is all. That is less than the price of a prescription per year per person. It is about $1 per person per year over that five years. Even if we go beyond the five years to the year 2000 we are looking at an increase over today's costs of about 2 per cent. That is all.

I hope those who are being frightened by the tactics of some who would lead them to believe that prices are going to be out of control after this bill passes will set those fears aside because they are not warranted in any way. The members opposite should be ashamed for using such tactics to make their point.

On the question of price increases, we have heard a lot about Mr. Schondelmeyer who appeared before the committee and talked about numbers that were all over the map. As a matter of fact, some ads were put out. In January some of the generic companies got together and put out an ad that said that prices would increase by $300 million a year. That is a pretty scary figure, but I guess it was not scary enough because two or three months later they came back and said that prices were going to increase by $1 billion a year. They were at the committee a week ago, maybe eight or ten days ago, and guess what. Now the figure was not $300 million or $1 billion.

Now they are talking about $2 billion a year. That is utterly ludicrous. There is just no evidence to support such ludicrous and outlandish claims, but these are the kinds of things that are being said. They are very worrying to people on fixed incomes, and to seniors particularly, who have to rely on the system. They are concerned about costs.

Mr. Schondelmeyer admitted in committee, when I asked him a direct question, that he worked for the Canadian Drug Manufacturers' Association which represents the generic companies who are in opposition to this bill. I do not fault the generic drug companies for that. I can understand that they like things the way they are. They have a special licence to copy patents before they have expired. That is nice.

However, that is limiting the kind of investment we can have. I do not blame them for putting their point forward, but they should base it more on factual evidence than they have.

Then Mr. Schondelmeyer admitted to me in committee that not only was he working for the CDMA but in fact he had pulled his figures together over the Thanksgiving weekend. He told me that. How credible can figures like this be when someone admits that he is already dealing with a vested interest and that he has pulled these figures together over Thanksgiving weekend?

That was not enough. The opposition had to go out and find Ralph Nader. To be frank I thought he had passed on. He has not been a real factor in consumerism in North America for years. But here he was. Those members brought him out of moth-balls, propped him up and got him to say a few things about drug prices in Canada.

I do not know where he got his facts because the things he said were really quite irrelevant. He was reduced to the point of mouthing platitudes. He said: "If it ain't broke, don't fix it". As I mentioned before, the fact of the matter is that compulsory licensing, the regime set up here by the Liberals, is broken. If it had worked, we would have had the kind of investment and development in the industry that we are getting now and that we have been getting since 1987.

The instant American experts of the opposition do not have the facts at their disposal. I, for one, place a lot more reliance on our federal civil servants. They have taken the time to set up the models and to develop them over a long period of time based on very clear empirical evidence. We know that they found that drug prices will rise by only $129 million over five years, $1 per person per year. That is all.

There are a number of other issues I want to get to, but let me just touch on a couple of other things that might be of interest to the members opposite because they obviously lack information or they would not be making such outlandish claims all the time.

Eighty per cent of all drugs in Canada are not affected by Bill C-91. Did you know that? All we are dealing with is 20 per cent of the drug bill. All we are dealing with is 3 per cent of the over-all health care bill. Yet those members are making claims that are so outlandish that we would have to be dealing not only with the drug bill but the entire health care bill not just for Canada, but probably for the United States as well.

The opposition has said that the generic industry will be absolutely destroyed by this bill. It has made that claim several times. It also made that claim back in 1987 when we passed Bill C-22. Let me just share a few facts.

An hon. member: How about it?

Mrs. Dobbie: Clean out your ears and listen a little bit, because you may learn something.

Since 1987, with that nefarious Bill C-22 that it was so worried about, the generic companies' sales have risen by 180 per cent. That is 180 per cent. So much for a suffering industry.

The fact is there is no PMPRB overseeing what price increases the generic companies put into place. They are totally uncontrolled. Not only that, but 85 per cent of the generic drug industry is controlled by two companies. It is controlled by just two companies, and they are not public companies. They are not accountable to us. They are not accountable to anybody because the two companies are owned by two individuals. They are private companies. Therefore, we have no idea how much they are making in profits, none whatsoever.

Yet we hear across the way that somehow there is something despicable about the fact that these innovative drug companies made 8.3 per cent in profits in the last few years for which I have figures available. They were number six behind a long line of other companies. One of the ones right ahead of them was a mop and brush company.

I am not carrying a brief for the innovative drug companies. All drug companies make a fair profit, and perhaps some even more than a fair profit. However, the fact of the matter is that we do have control over price increases put on the table by the innovative drug companies. We do not have control over the generic companies. The other fact is that the generic companies will be able to continue to copy drugs once this bill has been passed. They cannot copy drugs that are under patent. They will have to wait another three years or maybe three and one-half years until the patent expires, which is only fair under international intellectual property law. That is just the standard across the world.

They will still be able to produce drugs under generic brand names. The fact is that right now only $167 million of their $400 million in sales per year are copied patented drugs. There is something I would like to explain to members opposite if they will be quiet long enough to listen for half a second. Just to go back, the generic companies have sales of about $400 million a year. Of that $400 million, only $167 million are for sale of drugs they have copied that are under patent. The other 60 per cent are drugs they are producing that are off patent already.

That reminds me of something. Going back to Mr. Schondelmeyer, when he put the figures before us he admitted to the committee that the list of the 42 drugs he supposedly used to create his outlandish figure of $1.72 billion was the same as the list we had. We found that half the drugs he had on his list or at least quite a number of them were already off patent. His figures were totally out of line.

The generic companies have done very well in Canada. That is all well and good. It is appropriate. I like to see Canadian companies do well. I might say that they took their profits and invested them in the United States to buy drug companies there.

The bottom line here is very simple. We are passing Bill C-91 because it is good for Canada, it is good for Canadians, it is going to create more jobs, and it is going to create more opportunities. I would like to close by challenging the Official Opposition to tell me, if it comes into government in the next year, whether it will withdraw Bill C-91 and reinstate compulsory licensing. I submit that it will not.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Madam Speaker, that was indeed an entertaining diatribe by the hon. member for Winnipeg South. I was curious as to why we had six or seven people lining up for the Liberal nomination in that riding and now I know why.

The member opposite just said, and Canadians listening to this debate should note: "Trust us, the additional cost of drugs in Canada will only go up by $129 million over five years". This is from the same government that told us last February the deficit was going to be $27.5 billion. It came in at $34.5 billion. This is from the same government that said it would create 500,000 new jobs in the budget last February. They are currently down; 250,000 jobs have been lost since it made that projection.

Why would anybody take seriously a commitment from this member that drug costs will not rise dramatically when it comes from the party that called senior citizens pensions "a sacred trust" and whose first act when it came into office was to attempt to deindex senior citizens pensions. It took a wonderful lady from the province of Quebec to call the Prime Minister "Charlie Brown" and bring him to his senses for attempting to mislead the senior citizens of Canada before the government finally backed off.

I want to ask the member and all these members who at some time, when they screw up their backbones and courage to do it, have to go back and face their constituents: Are they really serious when they say that the sick, the poor, the elderly, and those who live on fixed incomes have to subsidize R and D in Canada?

Are they really serious when they say that the only way the universities, the post-secondary institutions, the centres of excellence of Canada will have any money for R and D is if we take it out of the pockets of Canada's senior citizens and Canada's sick?

Are we so bereft of national vision, of commitment, of belief in the excellence of Canadians that we have to reach out and literally act as a bunch of back-room muggers, knocking off the elderly, knocking off the weak and knocking off the disadvantaged to pay for R and D?

Let me say the following to the member. If she is so convinced the people of Canada are with her, she should take this policy to the people of Canada in the next election and see what percentage of them are prepared to pass to this government the right to rape them daily in the cost of their drugs. She should take that policy to the people in an election.

Mrs. Dobbie: Madam Speaker, clearly I got under the member's skin when I asked if they were prepared to withdraw this bill if they came into power. It is clear to me that they are not.

I know most members opposite support the bill. In fact it is a previous Liberal Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs who is leading the innovative lobbyists who want this bill passed. It is pretty clear to me that they do support this bill and they would not withdraw it.

I just want to correct the record. Again my friend is using emotional tactics to try to create fear in the hearts of a lot of people who cannot defend themselves. Read my lips. I would not say that to you, Madam Speaker, but I will say it to the hon. member. The PMPRB will protect seniors, provincial governments and others from inordinate price increases. The PMPRB has been effective over the past five years.

I will repeat this so that my friend can hear it, just in case he cannot read lips. He may not be able to. Since 1987, when the PMPRB came into place, patented medicine drug prices in Canada have been kept to increases of 2.9 per cent. That is in spite of the fact that the Consumer Price Index was 4.4 per cent. The PMPRB was effective then. It will be even more effective with its expanded abilities to roll back prices, to imprison or impose fines upon drug companies that do not live up to the policies they set in terms of prices.

I say to the hon. member: Do not use scare tactics to try to frighten senior citizens and other people who cannot defend themselves. It is unconscionable.

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Madam Speaker, we thought we had heard it all from the hon. member for Winnipeg South. When she asks members on this side to read her lips, does she know that no one is prepared to use that line because we know what happened to the last guy who said: "Read my lips". The Americans down south did exactly that and Canadians will very likely do so in the next election.

This member has the audacity to suggest that it is not good enough that the multinational corporations in the pharmaceutical industry own and have captured 92 per cent of the Canadian market. At least we on this side of the House are advocating status quo. The Canadian compulsory drug licensing industry has 8 per cent. It moderates prices and creates jobs.

The member talks about only raising prices $158 million when in fact over the course of 15 years the price-tag will be more like $4 billion to $7 billion. Why did the government move on retroactive legislation to last December, giving the windfall of $2 billion just in retroactivity and $1.3 billion of that total going to one multinational corporation, namely Merck Frosst?

Madam Deputy Speaker: When we resume debate, there will be two minutes left for the hon. member for Winnipeg South to answer.

LANGUAGE EQUALITY

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, tomorrow the government will present a resolution to constitutionally entrench the equality of French and English languages in New Brunswick.

I want to congratulate the legislature and Government of New Brunswick for this outstanding initiative and tell them that we are strongly supportive.

This constitutional provision from a province with a two-third anglophone and one-third francophone population presents us with a model for several other provinces with substantial linguistic minorities, in particular Ontario and Quebec.

The argument by some critics that this provision was part of the Charlottetown accord and consequently rejected in the recent referendum is not valid. This provision only affects New Brunswick, and New Brunswick overwhelmingly voted yes in the referendum.

Another argument that provision to protect collective rights is out of place in our Constitution because it will reduce individual rights is equally invalid. Since 1867 we have had numerous provisions in our Constitution to protect collective minority rights including linguistic, religious and cultural rights. This has been balanced with substantial protection for individual rights.

Once again, congratulations to New Brunswick for its leadership, tolerance and fair-mindedness. Hopefully other provinces will follow suit.

ELDER ABUSE

Mr. Bill Attewell (Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville): Mr. Speaker, elder abuse is a dreadful problem that exists in Canada. Too many seniors are suffering from poverty, financial exploitation, neglect, emotional and physical abuse.

In every part of the country and in families of every social, economic and cultural background, seniors are being abused at the hands of their family members and people they trust. This is a far cry from the days when seniors were more respected because of their wisdom and experience.

The federal government has made it clear that fighting against elder abuse is a priority, but we must go further in our efforts to eliminate the abuse of Canada's elderly.

We live in a civilized society and elder abuse of any kind must not be tolerated.

GUN CONTROL

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Mr. Speaker, the day before yesterday, a 16-year old teenager killed himself playing Russian roulette under the bewildered gaze of his friends. He probably hoped the magazine was empty each time he pulled the trigger. Unfortunately, the second time he put the gun to his head, the bullet was in place and he killed himself. For him, the game was over.

How did he happen to have this gun in his hands? Where are our gun control laws? When will the next death defying game take place? We must tighten controls and monitor more strictly the sale and registration of fire arms right now. This accident is a useless loss of life, one death too many.

SMALL BUSINESS

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): Mr. Speaker, in this government's continuing effort to encourage small business growth, the Minister of Finance announced in his economic statement first of all the introduction of a one-year unemployment insurance premium cap, which will reduce costs to employers by about $500 million, and a 10 per cent investment tax credit. Investments in machinery equipment for farms, mines, oil and gas, fishing, manufacturing, construction and long haul transportation will qualify.

The benefit will reduce small business taxes by $300 million over the two years. The small business financing program will be extended until the end of 1994. The ceiling for guaranteed loans to small businesses under the Small Businesses Loans Act will be further increased to $250,000. The rules will be changed to further encourage investment in small business by RRSPs and labour sponsored venture capital funds.

I applaud the minister for his efforts to assist the Canadian small businessman.

INTERNATIONAL HUMAN RIGHTS DAY

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, today is International Human Rights Day and despite great strides and unprecedented change in global order, there is still an abundance of suffering in the world.

As a country long respected for its commitment to human rights and as a country with a diverse ethnic composition, Canada can and must use its influence to encourage other governments around the world to heighten their human rights standards.

Closer to home, I am concerned about a number of human rights issues here in Canada. While pleased that the Minister of Justice today began to address some of the concerns that Liberals have long expressed such as our country's treatment of our aboriginal people, people with disabilities and with regard to sexual orientation, there still needs to be much more work on these issues and others such as race relations. Indeed, the increase in both hate crimes and hate propaganda is a disturbing trend.

Today, as we pause to recognize Human Rights Day, let us all remember that as a country we must continue to endeavour to meet the many human rights challenges that face us both domestically and internationally.

INTERNATIONAL HUMAN RIGHTS DAY

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, once again, today marks International Human Rights Day. This event is even more important this year as we celebrate the 10th anniversary of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

This is a beautiful opportunity for all of us today, and for every Canadian, to reflect on the significance of our common values, of our citizenship and to take stock of the progress accomplished so far to eliminate the obstacles to equality faced by a number of Canadians.

Because of the international role Canada tries to play in the defence of human rights, Canadians should feel especially concerned by such a day which is aimed at reminding all of us of just how important our rights and freedoms are.

INDIA

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, on this International Day of Human Rights, all Canadians are saddened by the escalating level of violence and death as a result of the wide-spread bloody rioting throughout India following the destruction of a 16th century mosque in the northern town of Ayodha.

This incident could have been averted if the Indian government had ordered sufficient security to protect the site and adequate police to uphold the order of the Supreme Court to protect the shrine. This crisis has been in the making for the last three years and the Indian Prime Minister must accept full responsibility for the mayhem that has occurred.

It appears that the UP state government and federal government may have mishandled this issue in pursuit of narrow political ends. We trust now that all necessary steps will be taken to ensure that other mosques are not demolished and the violence is quelled.

I ask the Prime Minister to contact the Indian government and ask that the government urge all parties in the Indian federal Parliament to co-operate, take action and take every effort to end what is seen by many as a serious crime against a minority.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey—White Rock—South Langley): Mr. Speaker, 44 years ago, Canada's John Humphrey was instrumental in developing the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and today we commemorate the adoption of that document which laid down the fundamental rights and freedoms for all mankind.

Also today, at the United Nations, the hon. Monique Landry introduces a resolution proclaiming 1993 the International Year of the World's Indigenous People. Canadian government and indigenous representatives have led in UN efforts to advance indigenous rights world-wide and will continue to do so in the years to come.

The rights embodied in the universal declaration represent both central organizing principles of Canadian society and a cornerstone of Canada's foreign policy. The end of the cold war has set in train unparalleled progress in the building of a more secure and prosperous world based on respect for individual rights.

Canada has been a constructive force behind the historic trend bilaterally and in the UN, the Commonwealth, la Francophonie, the Organization of American States, the Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe.

Daunting obstacles remain in the quest to translate the principles of the universal declaration into universal reality, but these challenges only serve to reinforce our resolve.

CADET OFFICER TRAINING

Mr. Gilbert Parent (Welland—St. Catharines—Thorold): Mr. Speaker, two years ago a young man from my riding, Mr. Darrell Blue, and two other young men were expelled from the cadet officer training course which was being held in western Canada.

Since that time one of the young men has been reinstated but the other two, Mr. Blue included, have not been reinstated. I have contacted the Associate Minister of Defence but still no action has been taken to readmit my constituent to the officer training course.

I call on the minister to immediately rectify this case, or to publicly publish her reason for admitting one cadet but not reinstating the other two cadets. This, in my opinion, is a case of fairness being put aside and justice being denied.

CHRISTMAS TREES

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I have in my hand a very important government document issued by the Fire Commissioner of Canada, Mr. T. J. Danfield. It is Fire Prevention Bulletin No. 1988-2, our file No. 46003. It is issued to all heads of departments and agencies. The subject is the use of natural Christmas trees.

It says in part, and I quote: "The Canada Labour Code, part IV and the pursuant Canada Occupational Safety and Health Regulations outline fire safety requirements within the federal jurisdiction. This legislation does not prohibit the use of natural Christmas trees". The document proceeds to outline fire safety precautions that should be taken in the use and display of real Christmas trees in federal buildings.

Given that real Christmas trees are beautiful, fresh and safe, given that real Christmas trees are a centrepiece of the Christmas celebration, given that right down the hall in this very building the Senate foyer is adorned with a magnificent 25-foot natural Christmas tree, why are the halls of the House of Commons lined with a bunch of fakes?

Why does this House—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's time has expired.

REFUGEES

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, this government in its immigration plans is officially turning against real refugees.

The United Nations High Commission for Refugees has asked Canada and other well-to-do countries to resettle a total of 72,000 selected refugees in 1993, higher by 68 per cent than their 1992 request.

Nevertheless, this government has chopped Canada's planned share of refugees for selection overseas by 14,000, cutting government sponsored refugees by 3,000 and privately sponsored refugees by 11,000.

At the same time, Bill C-86 further restricts those who come to Canada to seek protection through the Immigration and Refugee Board. Likely almost half of those who arrive will be sent away without a hearing before the board.

Shame on Canada's government for cutting back help to refugees when the need has increased.

INTERNATIONAL HUMAN RIGHTS DAY

Mr. Ken James (Sarnia—Lambton: Mr. Speaker, December 10, 1992, is International Human Rights Day and the 44th anniversary of the United Nations adoption of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights.

Today is a good time for all Canadians to reflect on our common values and to renew our commitment to tear down barriers to full participation that can exist in our society. Canada remains known around the world for its caring and compassionate position, qualities that reflect our citizenship values and our ongoing desire for a society where equality and justice prevails.

Canada has played and continues to play a lead role in the field of human rights. We will continue along this path.

Only by working together, governments, individuals, businesses and community groups, can we fight racism, injustice, discrimination and achieve a fair and decent quality of life for all.

The Government of Canada cannot do this alone. We need the partnership of all Canadians to help promote awareness of human rights issues.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I make reference to the recent UI changes announced by the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

The so-called just cause clause makes reference to sexual harassment, hazardous working conditions, obligation to follow a spouse and discrimination.

Should the just cause clause be questioned and the legitimacy of the individual leaving his or her work place be in doubt, the minister did not bother to define anything and did not indicate that the appeal process could take years before final resolution of a dispute could be reached.

Another flaw was the lack of a clause allowing voluntary retirement to be a just cause to leave the work place. If unions, governments, employees and employers reach agreement that older workers be encouraged to take early retirement making positions available for younger workers, surely this is a just cause.

I ask the minister, is this just another Tory cause, is it just because or is it truly just cause?

COMMONWEALTH PLYWOOD

Mr. Gabriel Desjardins (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, Commonwealth Plywood announced this week an investment of $7.107 million for the reconstruction of a sawmill in Belleterre, Témiscamingue. With that investment, the company will be able to replace the previous building complex destroyed by fire in 1989.

The president of Commonwealth Plywood, Mr. Caine, said that it would have been impossible to realize this project, so important for the economic recovery of the Témiscamingue region, without a federal contribution of approximately $1,401,750 through the Federal Office for Regional Development. This ultramodern plant will create 70 new jobs and will confirm 30 existing ones.

Mr. Speaker, with Christmas coming, this is excellent news for a population hoping for such job creation projects and I would like to take this opportunity to wish Mr. Caine a very merry Christmas.

SCARBOROUGH GENERAL HOSPITAL AUXILIARY

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, one year after Scarborough General Hospital first opened in 1956 a group of 20 community-minded women, mostly the wives of doctors, decided to volunteer their services to the hospital.

This year marks the 35th anniversary of the hospital auxiliary which has grown from the original 20 founders to more than 400 male and female volunteers aged 13 to over 80, a full-time director of volunteer services, and a full-time manager of the gift shops.

The auxiliary's philosophy is the same today as it was 35 years ago: a smile for patients and an extra hand for staff. The dedicated volunteers provide patient care but also help to raise donations. In fact over the last five years the auxiliary has donated $1.1 million to the hospital.

Without volunteers, many of our most cherished institutions, groups, clubs and organizations would cease to exist. The spirit of volunteership is alive and well in the Scarborough General Hospital Auxiliary. All citizens of Scarborough salute these dedicated people this year celebrating their 35th anniversary of service to the hospital and the community.

ELIZABETH DOWDESWELL

Hon. David MacDonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring to the attention of the House the appointment of a prominent Canadian public servant to an important international post, that of executive director of the United Nations Environment Program.

It is an honour for Canada and a source of hope for the future of UNEP and of the international environment movement that the UN General Assembly has this week appointed Ms. Elizabeth Dowdeswell to that post.

Ms. Dowdeswell, who currently heads the Atmospheric Environment Service of Environment Canada, will bring to this senior function outstanding qualities as a skilful manager and negotiator and an uncommon sense of vision and determination at a time when creative thinking and energetic action are needed in the wake of the earth summit.

Ms. Dowdeswell played a key role throughout the international negotiations that led to the signing last June of the framework convention on climate change. It is appropriate that she was nominated to the UNEP post by Secretary-General Boutros Boutros-Ghali on the very day last week that the Prime Minister signed the ratification papers for the climate change convention and one on biodiversity on behalf of Canada.

I am sure we all wish her well in this important post.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE ECONOMY

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the Minister of Finance and Deputy Prime Minister.

Yesterday the Governor of the Bank of Canada said that problem number one in Canada was still the fight against inflation, while inflation is at 1.4 per cent and unemployment is virtually nine times higher at 11.8 per cent.

Does the Minister of Finance agree with the Governor of the Bank of Canada that the number one economic problem in Canada is still inflation? Yes or no.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, containing inflation is a very key component of our over-all medium term macro-economic policy because in order to maintain price stability one has to have inflation down and control inflationary pressures. That continues to be one of our fundamental policy objectives and in fact one of our key policy objectives.

The other one is the need to engage in fiscal consolidation. Through fiscal consolidation and the containment of inflation we can pursue a policy of price stability and sustainable growth. That is the clear objective of this government.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, we realize—and the statistics have come out—that there are 1.7 million casualties from this long fight against inflation. Does the Minister of Finance agree with the Governor of the Bank of Canada who said yesterday that it was just fine, as long as eventually we have our economy in better shape?

I would like to know from the Minister of Finance if the time has come for this government to stop fighting inflation at all costs and, as the first priority of this administration, start fighting unemployment and creating jobs for Canadians?

• (1420)

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the key to job creation and investment is low interest rates, and we cannot have low interest rates unless we have control of inflation. That is a very key fundamental.

A couple of weeks ago the hon. Leader of the Opposition was complaining about the rise in interest rates. Price stability and fiscal consolidation are key components to containing interest rates. We took steps in the economic plan that I outlined last Wednesday to pursue the continuation of fiscal consolidation, deficit containment, while at the same time taking steps to invest in people, business and infrastructure and to encourage trade and partnerships.

That is a fundamental plan that has been outlined. I heard nothing from the Liberal Party except to borrow $15 billion to spend on infrastructure and to go further in debt.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): First of all, we never said $15 billion.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Chrétien: I never used that figure. They can say whatever they want, but I challenge them to prove it. I have another question for the Minister of Finance.

Yesterday, the Governor of the Bank of Canada admitted that the unemployment level would still be very high next year. So I would like to ask the Minister of Finance why he refuses to release to us and to the Canadian people the predictions made by the Governor of the Bank of Canada and those made by his own department regarding unemployment levels for 1993 and 1994. Why is the Minister of Finance hiding the truth from Canadians in this pre-election year?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I remind the hon. Leader of the Opposition that five, five and five total fifteen. What he is suggesting is that the federal government go out and borrow $5 billion. He is suggesting that the provinces go out and borrow $5 billion, and he is suggesting that the municipalities go out and borrow $5 billion. There is only one taxpayer.

Financial markets are looking at the totality of Canada's debt: federal, provincial and municipal. The hon. Leader of the Opposition asks for specifics on job creation. Let him reread the statement. We predict 300,000 new jobs to be created in the next year.

Ms. Albina Guarnieri (Mississauga East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

The Minister of Finance and his predecessors sat comfortably as 200,000 metro jobs were swept away in just the last three years. This is a tale of two Tories who have cast record numbers on to welfare lines and food banks but offer only a pittance to relieve their suffering.

Why did the minister promise Canadians that he would restore hope before he launched his mini budget operation nickel and dime?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the mini pittance that the hon. member is talking about is a 450 per cent increase under the developmental use of the unemployment insurance program to help those very people who become unemployed get the skills they need to re-enter the labour market.

It may not seem important to the hon. member that in a time of fiscal restraint we would increase that amount of money for training unemployed Canadians so that they can re-enter the labour market.

At the time of the recession an interpretation of the help wanted index showed that some 300,000 positions in this country could not be filled by people with the proper skills. The emphasis of the Minister of Finance in his plan for growth in Canada by investing in human resources is the right recipe for Canada and for Ontario.

Ms. Albina Guarnieri (Mississauga East): Mr. Speaker, the government's empty coffers are only matched by its empty hearts. This government talks about responsibility while it is responsible for the highest unemployment rate in the G-7.

My supplementary question is for the Minister of Finance. The 1.5 million workers who were trapped by unemployment this summer must have winced every time they saw their taxpayers' dollars flashed across their television screens in pre-election "feel good" ads. If Canada were not number one in taxpayer funded political advertising, would there not be more money for job creation?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have a little difficulty following the hon. member's question.

The hon. member knows very well that within the fiscal constraints we are operating under we did provide some $1 billion plus toward stimulating economic activity in the country through investments in people, freezing the UI premium, providing a UI cap on employer contributions on behalf of employees, new provisions with respect to investment in infrastructure across the country, investments in infrastructure that will improve the economic and productive capacity of Canada. A number of jobs will be created as a result.

Clearly the best engine for economic activity and job creation is the small business sector. Members opposite allude to this on a frequent basis and I agree with them. We have addressed that in spades, from improvements in investment to incentives and to insurance premium holidays. All these things will stimulate the 900,000 small businesses out there and create more activity and create more jobs in the process.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister.

A report card on human rights shows that this government has a failing record in 15 different areas. It has failed to protect the rights of children, minorities, gays and lesbians, unemployed workers, native women and refugee claimants. I hope the Deputy Prime Minister, and indeed all ministers, will study this report card and make a commitment to improve human rights protections in the year ahead.

In particular, will the Deputy Prime Minister give his assurances today that his government will strengthen the Employment Equity Act and the Human Rights Commission to remove systemic discrimination against minorities in our own Public Service? We want no more Chander Grover cases.

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, that was sort of an omnibus question. The hon. member will know that we have just tabled amendments to the Canadian Human Rights Act which deal with a broad range of issues including the functioning of the Canadian Human Rights Tribunal and the relationship between the tribunals and the commissions.

I believe the amendments which I tabled today will go a long way toward making recourse to the Canadian Human Rights Commission available to Canadians and will in fact increase the damages which Canadians may get when they have a successful adjudication of a case before the commission.

The Canadian human rights process is alive and well and significantly improved as a result of amendments tabled today in this House.

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I am sure many constituents in the minister's own riding will not agree with the kind of proposal she has tabled today.

My supplementary question, however, is for the Deputy Prime Minister. The government has denied human rights protections to many minorities by cancelling funding for the Court Challenges Program and the Race Relations Foundation.

Today I want to suggest to the Deputy Prime Minister that his government can take a positive action that will cost very little. When will the Prime Minister apologize officially and discuss redress for past injustices to Chinese Canadians who paid a racist head tax and to Ukrainians, German and Italian Canadians who were illegally interned?

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship): Mr. Speaker, we have indeed listened very carefully to the representations that were made by the communities that have been affected. As a result of that very helpful consultation I am now studying a number of options on which I hope to be able to report back to the cabinet and the government in a very short period of time.

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I must say that was the answer the minister gave over six months ago. It is time the Prime Minister acted on behalf of all Canadians.

• (1430)

My final supplementary question is for the minister who is speaking for health and welfare today. The government signed the UN Declaration on the Rights of the Child to deal with poverty and yet over one million children in Canada are still poor.

Will the minister of health and welfare by February 1993 table an action plan to eliminate child poverty in Canada and will he give particular attention to the plight of native children?

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, with regard to children and families, the Minister of Finance, when he tabled his budget last February, outlined the new child benefit package and put $2.1 billion into this specific program over the next four years.

Also the Minister of National Health and Welfare tabled earlier Brighter Futures which channels $500 million to those families and those children, who are really the hardest up. We are going out there to prevent, to protect, also to educate the public with regard to youngsters and their difficulties.

I want to add there is a specific area dealing with our native people and the problems they have had. We have done a great deal.

POVERTY

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

The Artisans de Paix in Trois-Rivières will be feeding 10,000 children this Christmas. In Edmundston, the minister's home town, a Christmas dinner will be held for 250 poor people. The Atelier de Rado will give away 19,000 pieces of second-hand clothing to needy children and families. For the first time ever, children in that town will depend on food banks to get something to eat.

Does the minister still believe that these people are abusing the system? Does he really think that these people want to spend winter in Florida?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I have nothing to learn from the hon. member for Hamilton East as far as people from Madawaska—Victoria are concerned, and especially those from Edmundston. I know these people well and I have proudly represented them in Parliament for over six years now.

I have never questioned the fact that we have to rely on a strong economy if we really want to help the needy. Unlike the Liberals who are showing their stuff in front of the media, the Minister of Finance has put forward an action plan based on the fundamentals, to ensure that the economy will recover and that jobs will be created, not only for the residents of Madawaska—Victoria and Edmundston, but for all Canadians throughout the country.

[English]

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, Canadians are looking for jobs for other than Tory senators and if the minister and his party are not prepared to offer those jobs, I can tell you there are 40 candidates in the gallery here today on the Liberal side of the House who will—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Ms. Copps: Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister. If his policies are working, why is it that the Christmas Bureau in Red Deer, Alberta, is giving food vouchers to 1,500 families this Christmas? Why is the Supateria in Penticton, B.C., feeding 50 per cent more people than last year? Why is the Moose Jaw Food Bank feeding 550 families a month? Why is the Salvation Army food bank—

Mr. Speaker: I think we must move on.

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, a lot of Canadians saw the display by the hon. member and they will soon realize, if they have not already, that she was really quick to talk about the poor, the children, those that miss and quickly thereafter, the Liberal candidates.

This place is not a House of demagoguery. The government is trying to help those people. The difference—

Mr. Speaker: I think we should move on.

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, I have a question also for the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

As he will know, a quarter of Canadians live in abject poverty. Most are women, senior citizens and innocent children. That is the legacy of this government.

Newfoundland ranks first. It has the highest unemployment rate by a long shot. It has the lowest in terms of income levels.

With so many people in grinding poverty, why will the minister not do something to ease the pain, to make this Christmas just a little less miserable for Canada's poorest people?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member wants to know the extent of the concern on the part of the government for poor people, he should look at the impact of the moratorium on cod in Newfoundland and Labrador on the fishermen and plant workers. They are poor people.

The answer of this government was to put $700 million into a special program to help those people. The answer of this government was to have a special project in New Brunswick to help welfare recipients in the N.B. work project trying to put those poor people back into the labour market and give them hope.

It was about a project in B.C. and New Brunswick where we are investing $50 million to help welfare recipients by adding more money to their income to again bring them into the labour market.

The difference between those members and we on this side of the House is that we have a plan.

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, if your argument is really weak, shout all the more.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Simmons: We looked at what the minister did. We looked at what the minister did for unemployment insurance. We looked at what the minister did for family allowances.

[Translation]

For example, in the minister's riding a soup kitchen for students will be opened in January in his home town of Edmundston.

[English]

I ask the minister this. Why this despicable treatment of the poor people? Why the capping of payments? Why the tampering with assistance?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is right. He is absolutely right in adjusting the tone of this question and the height of his voice.

They may try to make the people believe that the measures being taken are irrelevant to the real needs of the people. Even casual observers of the world scene, after looking at the success of Canada on the world market, know we do it because we are an exporting country. We do it because we are producing goods and services that are the best in the world. To do that, we need to invest in human resources.

The statement last week by the Minister of Finance brought the contribution of this government to human resources development to an all-time high of $3.8 billion invested. That will yield results for Canadians and jobs.

Oral Questions

HUMAN RIGHTS

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, acts of war are the ultimate human rights abuse.

Today, on International Human Rights Day and every day, women and young girls are imprisoned, gang raped, tortured and killed in Bosnia-Hercegovina. Many are forced to bear children. Some die from gang rape and others are used, abused and then killed.

My question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. Will the government insist that the UN and European missions investigating war crimes in the former Yugoslavia pay particular attention to these bordello death camps where rape is used as a weapon of genocide?

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister Responsible for Status of Women): Mr. Speaker, I know that I share, along with all members of this House and all Canadians, the horror at some of the information we have received on this. I can assure my colleagues that the Secretary of State for External Affairs and I have been working to gather more information and put forward a very strong case.

Let me share with my colleague some of the specific initiatives we have already undertaken. As she knows, the United Nations has established a commission of experts to collect information on these crimes and very specifically to include crimes against women and children. We have a Canadian, Commander Fenrick, who sits on this commission.

We have also been supporting the establishment of an ad hoc judicial tribunal to try those who are charged with war crimes in ex-Yugoslavia and we are actively exploring the establishment of such a body. We are also looking at ways that we might be able to help, as part of our contribution to international relief agencies, to provide assistance to victims of such assaults.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs next week at the meeting in Geneva where they will be discussing the whole issue related to ex-Yugoslavia will, of course, be specifically raising this issue with her colleagues from other countries.

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I asked specifically whether these Canadian representatives would visit these rape death camps and take specific action on those camps?

A regional parliament in Germany has earmarked one million marks for aid to these women and girls. On Monday, in response to a question from my colleague for Victoria, the Secretary of State for External Affairs said that she was open to the idea of specific humanitarian aid to these women and girls.

What actions have been taken to target aid to the survivors of these gang rape campaigns?

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister Responsible for Status of Women): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated in my earlier answer, that is one of the initiatives the Secretary of State for External Affairs is exploring and we hope we will be able to provide that support in an appropriate way.

We have also indicated that we would be quite prepared to participate again in a mission that would have access to the detention camps. That would allow an opportunity specifically in the mandate of such a mission to look at the concerns relating to women and children.

UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

Unemployment rates for women, the disabled and native people are much higher than for others because these Canadians are paid much less than others. Consequently, they will get much lower unemployment benefits than in the past and they will suffer much more than before. Is the government prepared to correct this injustice? It seems to me that the government should recognize the seriousness of the situation and act immediately.

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member just referred to the situation of some native and disabled people. He just said to the House and to Canadians that the unemployment insurance benefits of these groups would be much lower when, in fact, the level of benefits which will be paid from April 1993 until the end of March 1994 will be exactly the same as it was in 1992. This is not a decrease. There is not a single unemployed Canadian now collecting unemployment insurance whose cheque will decrease from one month to the next, contrary to what the Liberals did in 1978.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): The minister should ask the groups I just referred to which one of us is right.

[English]

My supplementary question is for the Minister of Finance. Certain native programs have been frozen. I suppose the government will deny that. Others have suffered a 10 per cent cut. I suppose that will be denied as well. One example is native friendship centres whose prime mission is to help these aboriginal peoples to acquire the skills necessary to participate fully in their communities.

In trying to cut the deficit and the debt, will the government stop trying to cut corners on the backs of aboriginals, on the backs of women and on the backs of handicapped Canadians?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, it is a fact that the grants and contributions have been cut by 10 per cent, but with some significant exemption.

For example, the selected native programs relating to health and welfare, elementary and secondary education, housing, and policing have been exempted, as have training programs, GRIP and NISA and some cost-sharing programs with the provinces. We have been very attentive in making sure that these programs the hon. member referred to were protected.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, there is no way for a member to obtain clarification from the departments concerning the 10 per cent cut in grants and contributions.

In view of the specific commitment of Parliament to official languages, I would like to ask the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance which official languages programs will be affected by these cuts? How much will the cuts be in terms of percentage? What steps, if any, will be taken to prevent these programs of national importance from being crushed with all the others?

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member was probably here on December 2 when we all experienced contributing to a very difficult situation.

We will suffer a 10 per cent cut next year. That is right, but each department will examine their priorities. I am convinced that the Secretary of State will do his best, as always, to protect the official language minority communities. This year, there was over $28 million in this program. I am sure that will be a major concern of his when he is back in the House.

[English]

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, groups representing official language minorities, communities that are so important to the minister, are nearly exclusively dependent upon the federal government for their survival. He knows that. Everybody knows that.

Will the Minister of Finance tell the House whether la Fédération des communautés francophones et acadienne, Alliance Quebec, and other defenders of minority language rights in this country will be subjected to the same reductions of 10 per cent in each of the next two years?

We have lost the Court Challenges Program. Is the government now silencing the official voice of these communities?

I want the Minister of Finance to answer me. I did not get an answer from the minister of whatever it is. The Secretary of State will not answer. Treasury Board will not answer. Finance will not answer. For God's sake, give us a clear answer.

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship): Mr. Speaker, we have nothing to be ashamed of in our defence of official language minority communities since 1984.

I had the honour and privilege of having served in that capacity for some 22 months with the program in my direct responsibility. We did everything we could to make sure that we heard and considered the plight of the communities from coast to coast, whether they were the anglophone communities in Quebec or the francophone communities outside Quebec.

As I said in the other official language, when the minister returns to the House I am sure he will take into consideration the very serious concerns of the member.

However, we have to take into consideration the fact that these are very difficult economic times. There is the fact that we have all had to suffer a 10 per cent reduction in grants, contributions and subsidies. We will do this to the best of our abilities within our own ministries.

CONSUMER PRICE INDEX

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, yesterday in committee, officials of the Bank of Canada indicated that the consumer price index was overstated up to 1 per cent. This is because there had been a substantial change in the basket of goods making up the CPI since 1986 in terms of the quality of goods and in terms of consumption patterns.

• (1450)

Is the minister going to change the CPI or have Statistics Canada change it in view of the enormous number of payments made by the Government of Canada based on the inflation rate?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows that the composite index is usually fixed for a period of five years. Of course during that period of time there are several changes which can take place, such as the improvement in product development as well as a change in the over-all basket of consumer goods and the utilization of those goods. Therefore, it would be very difficult to change it on an annual basis.

Having recognized the fact that there are some biases built into the system, as time goes by, those are important things which need to be factored in. The suggestion was that there could be as much as one-half to 1 per cent. I am not sure whether that is a scientific assessment, but suffice it to say there is a bias built in by virtue of the product development that occurs and the impact that has, as well as the relative utilization of the basket of goods that was established five years ago.

Oral Questions

LUBICON INDIAN BAND

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

Last month the Hon. E. Davie Fulton, the government's own former investigator into the continuing plight of the Lubicon people, publicly described their situation as a history of abuse.

He charged that promises had not been fulfilled, that government representatives had said things they did not mean, abdicated obligations, engaged in obfuscation and generally prevented any settlement which may have ensured the Lubicons would not have suffered so dreadfully. He said the Lubicon people are "desperately in need of a sincere, honest and simple approach and response to their problems and a process of honest and open negotiations with a sincere desire to make a settlement".

When will the government heed Mr. Fulton's just counsel and begin to negotiate a fair and just settlement in good faith with the Lubicon people?

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, of course I have every respect for the Hon. Mr. Fulton and his advice of which I have taken careful note. In fact I have spoken with Mr. Fulton on these matters.

I am sure he was not referring to efforts I have sincerely made over the past 12 months, having met more than a half a dozen times with Chief Bernard Ominayak of the Lubicon nation to find a solution to this matter.

In the time available I can only tell the hon. member that we have made a very generous and honourable proposal to the Lubicon people which would build a new community, create an economic development fund and provide additional incentives to settle exceeding $50 million which, together with the 95 square miles and additional financial support from the province of Alberta, will be more than adequate compensation for their grievance.

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, Mr. Fulton delivered himself of these remarks on November 2, after the most recent government offer was made, after the most recent meeting of the minister with the chief of the Lubicon people.

Will the government at least accept the public conclusion stated on November 2 by Mr. Fulton? That was that the Lubicon claim of $100 million in compensation is, again in his words "justifiable on the basis of the hardships they have suffered, the indignities to which they have been subjected and the misery they have endured over these past years through faults entirely other than their own".

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, the significant offer I presented to Chief Ominayak last summer and which I discussed with him on subsequent occasions would more than adequately accommodate all of the aspects of the Lubicon nation's needs, provide a brand new community and significant financial compensation.

The additional $100 million the hon. member speaks of would be for the alleged loss of aboriginal title to oil and gas lands. That would amount to recognition that other bands in the area had no rights while those had been recognized under treaty and would amount to over a $1 million settlement for every family of four in the Lubicon community.

CHILD PORNOGRAPHY

Mr. Bill Attewell (Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice who earlier this year said the government would be introducing legislation to prohibit child pornography some time this session.

I understand the Butler decision has expanded the scope of the existing anti-obscenity law which referred to child pornography. I know our law currently makes it an offence to produce, manufacture and sell pornography.

I am sure the minister understands the urgent need to outlaw the possession of child pornography. Therefore, when will the minister take action? How will Canadians know that this legislation is being effectively enforced?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I compliment the hon. member on his question which has set out an excellent brief of where we are in the law. It leaves me very little room to expound in my answer but simply to say that I expect to introduce legislation in the new year.

The provision concerning possession of child pornography will be designed to close a loophole in the law where it is perhaps not possible to identify those who have been the victims of child abuse except through this particular type of evidence.

As to the assurance the hon. member asked for about knowing that it is enforced, all I can say is that by changing the law in this way we will put tools in the hands of law enforcement officers to lay charges.

We will have to monitor the enforcement of that provision as we do with any other and as is undergoing now in the parliamentary committee with respect to Bill C-15 which was the most recent legal change with respect to child sexual abuse.

TRANSPORT

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport.

The president of CN Rail confirmed this morning that as many as 10,000 employees of CN Rail will be likely to lose their jobs over the next three years.

As the sole shareholder of CN Rail, does the government support this job cut? If so, does it accept some responsibility for the well-being of the individuals involved?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I believe that the new president of CN appeared before the committee this morning and gave clear and precise answers to all the questions asked by the committee members.

I think he also said that the plan that is being developed has not yet led to definite decisions. I remind the hon. member that, generally speaking, the conditions of employment in railway companies are the most generous in the country as far as job loss is concerned.

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, such an appearance by the minister before the committee would also be welcome.

[English]

Given the situation in the railways which parallels to a great extent the problems we faced in the airlines, I would like to ask the minister this. In response to his challenge Canadian Airlines has announced a reduction of 15 per cent in its capacity. Does the minister expect a similar announcement from Air Canada?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I think that Air Canada is already on record as saying it is examining the cuts that have been announced in the capacity by Canadian Airlines and will probably follow suit very shortly.

CONFLICT OF INTEREST

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister and it concerns the government's so-called commitment to ethics in government.

In February 1988 the government introduced a conflict of interest bill and has allowed it to die twice on the Order Paper.

Given that nearly five years has passed since then, is the government in its dying days in office ready to commit itself again to conflict of interest legislation?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): In front of these 40 job applicants, I will avoid disappointing them in terms of their prospects.

In regard to the conflict of interest legislation, as the hon. member knows, the subject matter of the bill was referred to an all-party committee which produced a unanimous report recommending changes and so on. In fact, the government is examining these. I think I can indicate to the hon. member that fairly early in the new year he will have an opportunity to examine the government's proposals. I hope he will find them much to his liking.

• (1500)

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I want to test the minister's commitment right now.

[Translation]

Tomorrow, the House will adjourn for six weeks. During that period, the cabinet will still hold meetings. Is the minister prepared to make a commitment, on his behalf and on behalf of the government, that there will be no Order in Council appointments, no patronage appointments, until the House resumes sitting on February 1, so that parliamentarians can question the government on that issue?

[English]

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, that is quite a change of subject here in midstream. I just want to indicate to the hon. member that, as he properly indicates, even though the House may adjourn the government will carry on.

It is obviously very much in the interests of the government and the country that we have good people to fill the positions that are required in the boards of agencies and we will continue to maintain the same high standards we have for the last eight years.

HOUSING

Mr. Benoît Tremblay (Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the minister responsible for housing.

Why does the minister refuse to authorize the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation to guarantee the indexed loans or mortgages used by housing co-ops? This would give low and middle-income families a chance to own property, it would help economic recovery and would cost the government nothing.

[English]

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, this government is spending over $2 billion for the needs of housing for Canadians and we are looking at every possible way to address core need.

The question of ILM mortgages and other variations is under consideration. I will simply take my colleague's question as a representation.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. David Bjornson (Selkirk—Red River): Mr. Speaker, I would like to put a question to the Minister of Agriculture in response to a number of telephone calls I have received from people in rural Manitoba. Can the minister please tell the House the status of the interim and final payments of this year's GRIP program?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member will know, once the provinces receive the data they have the ability to flow that money through those programs when they wish.

The province that he comes from, the province of Manitoba, will be making both the final board and non-board payments early in 1993. Alberta will be making its non-board payments starting next week. As for other provinces, they have not informed me as to when they will be making that money available to producers but they do have the numbers and they have the capability to send that money to the farmers in Canada.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Madam Speaker, I am wondering if the government House leader would indicate to the House the business for tomorrow and in particular the chronology of the business tomorrow in terms of what we will start with and how debate will proceed for the remainder of the day.

I wish to give notice that I do not intend to raise a debate about it but I want to inform the government House leader and the parliamentary secretary that last June the House had given Royal Assent, as they will recall, to Bill C-22 which was the Bankruptcy Act.

At that time the minister in a news release indicated his intention to propose to the House of Commons when it resumed in the fall a special joint committee to be established on the important issue of unpaid wage claims which would report to the House of Commons by the summer of 1993.

I believe it has been raised in the other House. I do not know what the response of the government House leader is, but I am wondering if he could take that under advisement and perhaps tomorrow I might get a fuller answer to that question.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): In terms of that particular question, I am afraid I will have to take that as notice and will talk to the minister and see if we can get back to the hon. member to provide the information he sought.

In terms of legislation for Friday, there are discussions going on between House leaders and parties with respect to obtaining passage of a number of pieces of legislation which have general support and hopefully can be dealt with.

One is Bill C-94, dealing with Gitksan-wet'suwet'en land claims in Yukon and Northwest Territories for which I understand there is general support.

We would also like to proceed with Bill C-96, reorganization of the Nova Scotia courts, for which I understand there is general agreement, plus second reading of Bill C-8, the motor vehicle safety bill, a technical bill and it would be useful to have it in committee for work to proceed while we are adjourned. We would also like to proceed with Bill C-42, the wildlife plant and animal protection act, which has received second reading and committee study and which I understand is also generally accepted.

My colleague, the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism, has been talking to his counterparts, the critics from the opposition parties, with respect to amendments to the Small Businesses Loans Act and certainly if there were a willingness to introduce the changes in that, which would be quite beneficial to the small business sector, I would want to leave that option open.

Mr. Dingwall: Madam Speaker, I thought that perhaps it was an innocent mistake with regard to other business that may be raised tomorrow, particularly in view of what has transpired in other jurisdictions.

Mr. Andre: Madam Speaker, we are having discussions on that question and I think my colleague, the Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs, is working on that and I will certainly get back to the hon. member on that.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, on this last point, could the House leader be a bit more explicit? Is it the plan to proceed with some discussion tomorrow?

Mr. Andre: It certainly is the desire.

Mr. Riis: Madam Speaker, on another point of order. There has been discussion among the parties and among others in the House and I think the Chair might find unanimous consent to permit the following motion:

> That the order for second reading of Bill C-333, an act to amend the Canada Health Act, standing in the name of the member for Mission—Coquitlam on the Order Paper, be discharged, the bill withdrawn, and the subject matter referred to the Standing Committee on Health and Welfare, Social Affairs, Seniors and the Status of Women.

Mr. Andre: Madam Speaker, I had assumed and thought this was going to take place in the context of the debate on second reading after the debate on private members' business. I am a little surprised at the time it should be brought up. Certainly the government has no opposition to it.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, order discharged and bill withdrawn.

[Translation]

Mr. Côté: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order to ask the House for unanimous consent to allow me, exceptionally, to table a report, which will only take a few seconds.

[English]

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for the House to revert to presentation of reports from parliamentary delegations?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

POINT OF ORDER

COURT CHALLENGES PROGRAM

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. The concern I wanted to raise while the Secretary of State is here is with regard to the response that we were to receive from the Court Challenges Program.

I believe the committee had filed that report. It is well overdue and I think the opposition has been very reasonable. I think we have been generous, keeping in mind that Christmas is not all that far off, and I would hope that the minister could provide us with a very specific answer to the questions that we have raised on at least four occasions to that particular report.

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship): Madam Speaker, I do understand the concern and the desire of the member to have the answer immediately.

I am not familiar with how quickly that can be done, but I have been pursuing it very diligently and I am attempting to have that answer for the House as quickly as possible. I hope to be able to have that resolved within days, rather than any longer.

Mr. Dingwall: Madam Speaker, with all due respect to the minister, that answer has been given on at least three occasions when I have raised this particular issue. It being Christmas, I would have thought that the minister would be much more generous, much more reasonable and would give us a specific time.

I have asked the Chair and the Clerk for guidance with regard to this issue. This is a breach of the Standing Orders of the House which all members have agreed to. Here we have a minister of the Crown failing to provide a report which is due to this House.

There were extraordinary circumstances and we were prepared to accept those for a reasonable period of time.

I will conclude my remarks and I will raise this again tomorrow, because I know other members wish to proceed with debate. This is a very fundamental program of the government which it has axed on which the standing committee has made a report, submitted it to the government, and we are awaiting a response.

I would ask the minister again to give us a specific date as to when the report will be tabled. If that answer is not forthcoming, I am afraid I am going to have to raise the matter again tomorrow under another category.

PRESENCE IN GALLERY

Mr. Lee Richardson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I think that the House would want to be aware of the presence in the gallery of the Hon. Ken Rostadt, the Attorney General for the province of Alberta, and his colleague, the Hon. Steve West, Solicitor General for the province of Alberta.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The Chair does salute our guests and reminds the hon. member that the Chair is the one who should be doing that.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

PATENT ACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Blais that Bill C-91, an act to amend the Patent Act, to amend another act in consequence thereof and to provide for other related matters, be read the third time and passed.

Madam Deputy Speaker: When the House proceeded with the statements by members according to Standing Order 31, there were two minutes left in the period of question and comments. The floor belongs to the hon. member for Winnipeg South.

Mrs. Dorothy Dobbie (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Madam Speaker, before I answer the question or attempt to, I might say that this morning I mentioned that there was $84 million in university investments that had accrued to Canada since 1987.

I would like to correct that. In fact, $84 million is the amount that the innovative companies invested in research and development in Canadian universities in 1991 alone. Since 1987 the total amount to universities and hospitals is about $245 million.

I think that this correction to the record shows that by opening up our trade opportunities, by getting rid of compulsory licensing, we are attracting investment, not just in hard goods, plants and things like that, but in the future of our country through the ability of universities to fund training for students, open up new places, new posts for people who have spent their lives trying to develop the expertise that will allow us to create a very viable and important health industry in Canada.

This is important to the future of all Canadians, particularly those who are out there now worried about their health in the future. There is the development of new drugs and the opportunity to come up with new cures. These are the things that Bill C-91 is all about and these are the things that will have an important impact on the future of everyone, particularly those who are most at risk.

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): Madam Speaker, I thought I would say a few words on this bill after listening to the former Minister of Finance and the parliamentary secretary who followed the former Minister of Finance when they mentioned attracting investment.

The former Minister of Finance mentioned encouraging investment, giving incentives to create jobs. It was not that long ago that the former Minister of Finance used those exact same words in this Chamber when the Conservatives first got elected in 1984.

In 1985, the minister stood in this Chamber and used the same words in speaking about scientific research. He said that he was going to continue a program which had been instituted in 1984. As some members might recall, it was the scientific research tax credit program and the minister renewed the government's commitment for another year. It ended in 1986.

The minister stood in this Chamber and talked about creating jobs. He said he would put a moratorium on it but that the government was willing to expand employment in this country. He used exactly the same words as he used here today. The exact same circumstances apply. There is no guarantee in this legislation at all that there will be this investment. There is no guarantee that these jobs will be created.

I thought back to some of the horror stories that came out of the Government of Canada at that time. There was the case of a company that was given a $30 million tax credit to investigate the difference between black and white cows and red and white cows.

Another company was given $1.7 million to investigate the construction of miniature submarines in Canada. Another company was given another $20 million to investigate computers that would actually send things through the air waves between Vancouver and St. John's, Newfoundland without having anything in the telephone lines.

It brought back some memories of the minister standing in this Chamber in 1985 and then again in 1986, announcing the $500,000 capital gains write-off with no strings attached at all. There were no strings attached at all as to what you could use for that write-off.

Consequently, for that $500,000 write-off on capital gains, a great many people were claiming profits from the sale of diamonds, fur coats, yachts. In the following year, 1987, the same minister who stood in the House a moment ago and talked about giving breathing room for people to invest money and create jobs removed the surtax on large corporations. He removed that but he also removed the federal tax rebate of $100 per claimant in 1987.

It was the same reasoning. This will create jobs. This will encourage investment. There were no strings attached. There was nothing definitive in writing, saying you have to do this because you must allow these companies the breathing room in order to make their investments and create jobs.

• (1520)

Then Bill C-22 came in. It talked about the same thing we are talking about here today, namely, all of the jobs that would be created, all of this great new investment into our universities and into our schools of higher learning. I remind the minister that the interest on the $2 billion allowed in write-offs for the scientific research tax credit in 1985, not in 1984, and until it stopped in 1986, would have increased the grants to universities and medical research institutions in this country by a full 60 per cent. That is just the interest on the $2 billion.

The concern was trying to find out what the difference was between black and white cows and red and white cows when this would have increased the total amount given to universities in this country by 60 per cent.

The government was not satisfied in 1987 with giving further tax breaks, without having any restriction at all on the $500,000 capital gains, so it went into the diamonds, fur coats and yachts and things like that. Not content with that, the same minister who spoke in this House a moment ago about giving breathing room to create jobs and to have money invested, turned around in 1990 and removed all restrictions on capital gains to anybody who had large amounts of money in private trusts—tens of billions of dollars.

When he made the announcement, it was that this would actually create jobs. This would encourage investment. It all sounds so familiar. The same minister who talked about giving breathing room, encouraging investments and creating jobs turned around last year and changed the entertainment section in the Income Tax Act. What can you do now? It is not good enough to allow some people to write off the cost of a private box in Skydome. Not only can you write off 80 per cent of that, but we will allow to write off 100 per cent of various types of entertainment.

It was on the radio the next morning after the change was made, I believe it was CBC radio, Peter Gzowski's program. They claimed that escort services were now legal because they encouraged investment. They encouraged investors to invest in Canada.

Look at how far we have come with this rationale to allow breathing room, to allow money to be used to create jobs in Canada when our jobs have gone down at the same time those offers were made. There is only one thing we know about this bill, it is going to increase the cost to ordinary Canadians.

There was only one thing we knew about the tax changes that were made in 1985, 1986, 1987, 1989 and 1991. That was they increased the cost to ordinary Canadians and shifted the tax burden from the very wealthy and from the people who have all the money in our society, the international corporations, to our ordinary people.

Today we have gone to the GST. We have now gone to cutting back on unemployment insurance while the government says it is going to give more leeway, more breathing room to these big companies with the hope that they will invest, with the promise that they are going to invest in Canada. There is nothing on stride, nothing on paper at all, just a promise that they are going to invest.

I see that my 10 minutes are up. This is not a very intelligent way to deal with intellectual property.

In conclusion, let me say there appears to be a philosophy underlying all the changes that have been made since 1984. That philosophy has caused a major shift in who is paying the bill. The people we refer to as the middle class and the lower class are paying the bill.

This bill is just another exercise of that authority. The Government of Canada should be ashamed of itself that it is moving it through this Chamber at this speed.

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Madam Speaker, I could not agree with the member more when he said this was not an intelligent way to deal with intellectual property. There is no question about it. He is absolutely correct.

On that side of the House for the last two weeks all we have heard is rhetoric and nothing but misrepresentation of fact. They should be ashamed of themselves. They have done that continually on every stage of this bill.

The member should go back to the CBC which can use some good actors. All his speech is intended to do is to raise emotions back home. They have nothing, absolutely nothing, to do with facts. If he had been in the House this morning and had listened to the minister he would understand that what he was saying was absolutely incorrect.

The minister stepped through the numbers with regard to investment in this country as I did last night at report stage on this bill. They are absolutely incorrect. Bill C-22 did exactly what we said it would do. It led to an increase in investment and jobs in this country, something we want. We want to invest in Canada. We want more jobs in Canada. Every time we want to do it and bring in legislation to do it, they want to kill that legislation.

Bill C-91 is going to work as has Bill C-22. They should be absolutely ashamed of themselves for standing in the House and misrepresenting that bill.

Mr. Baker: Madam Speaker, Canadians must really be scratching their heads. They have all these Conservative members standing in this Chamber and saying two things, every single one of them—cabinet ministers, parliamentary secretaries, members from the east coast, west coast, north coast and central Canada. First—and they always make sure they make this point—they say drug prices have not gone up. They say that drug prices have not gone up. Do they want me to repeat it again? Drug prices have not gone up.

They say: "We are telling the truth". They say: "Here are the facts and figures to show that drug prices have not gone up". But the minister stated a few moments ago in the Chamber: "We have nothing to do with retail sales. We cannot control that. We cannot monitor that. We cannot monitor the sale of drugs to ordinary Canadians. We cannot do that".

What can they do? They say the price of drugs has not gone up. Then they say: "Oh, we cannot monitor the price of drugs to Canadians, but the prices have not gone up". Why? The minister says it is unconstitutional for them to monitor the retail sale price of drugs in the country. Every Canadian knows the price of drugs has gone up. Where do they live? It cannot be Canada if they say the prices have not gone up.

Not only that, but by the minister's logic there must be something wrong when nine out of ten governments say they are going to pay exorbitant prices under this new bill, that drug prices have gone up, that it is going to cost ordinary taxpayers hundreds of millions of dollars, and that the sick and the poor are going to pay.

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches—Woodbine): Madam Speaker, in terms of the dispute that seems to have arisen over prices and why governments cannot control them, is the hon. member aware of a case that arose in the United Kingdom? It involved a fellow by the name of Stanley Adams who had worked in the pharmaceutical industry. He was eventually blackballed by that industry for exposing the pricing practices of drug companies.

I will quote a passage from his book. He said: "Transfer pricing had two advantages. It enabled the company to avoid a large amount of taxation and it allowed them to overcharge without appearing to do so. It worked like this. If a Roche manufacturing company needed to buy raw material from the parent company in Basle to make a finished article, then the raw material was not as you might think, provided at cost or cost plus to a certain fixed level of profit. No. First Roche headquarters had to decide what the world market of that product was or, in other words, just how much they could sell it for and still be sure of having buyers. Then they had no further to look than at different levels of taxation in the various countries and then they had to decide, bearing that in mind, just how much profit they wanted each individual company to show, if any. Once they had made that decision, which obviously depended on how high—"

• (1530)

Madam Deputy Speaker: I have to interrupt the hon. member. We did specify that it had to be a very short question and that is becoming a very long comment. A very short comment from the hon. member for Gander—Grand Falls.

Mr. Baker: I have a very short answer, Madam Speaker. I know exactly what the hon. member was building up to. I did not read it, but I know exactly what this gentleman was building up to. He is building up to explaining why it is that so many of these companies paid not one penny of tax in this country, not one cent. He can explain why Revenue Canada today can tell each member of Parliament that there are individuals who are involved in those companies and make over a quarter of a million dollars a year who do not pay one penny of income tax and why there are so many people in the six figure bracket in this country claiming the child tax credit and the GST rebate because of our system of taxation that favours the very wealthy in this country.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Madam Speaker, it is a great pleasure to follow in debate my colleague, the hon. member for Gander—Grand Falls. For those of us who are new members of this House of Commons in the most recent election, he is someone to watch, to emulate and to consider a mentor in his ability as a debater and in his representation of the people of Newfoundland and the people of Canada.

Bill C-91 in and of itself, the pernicious piece of legislation that it is, is really only a symptom. It is a symptom of a far-reaching disease that is afflicting this country. In the United States it was known as Reaganomics, in Great Britain it was known as Thatcherism. The only thing I think we can call it here is Mulrunacy.

It is not funny. It really is not funny. It is tragic. It is tragic that senior citizens in this country and the parents of young children in this country are going to be sacrificed on the altar of this government's desire to harmonize with the United States of America. All we have heard for the last eight years is harmonize, level playing field, all of these things, that somehow, somebody over there, all of them over there—we could read their lips I suppose—would tell us is a good thing for Canada.

It is interesting that in the United States a little over a month ago, the electorate there decided to change direction. Would that the electorate in Canada had soon the opportunity to do that very thing.

Why is this bill pernicious? It is pernicious because of the amount of money it is going to cost ordinary Canadians.

We know from the experts in the field that the total savings to Canadians from generic pharmaceuticals in 1992 was about $420 million. Is this a figure to sneeze at? Madam Speaker, would you tell me why the government thinks that this is not something that is good for Canadians, particularly in a recessionary economy, particularly when it has failed so abysmally at all the other promises it attempted to make to the people of Canada about job creation and creating a better future; all the promises with regard to the free trade agreement; all the promises with regard to the economic plans that it had.

This country is littered with the broken promises of this government. This country is soon to be littered with the broken hearts and broken spirits of Canadians who cannot and will not survive because of the hard-heartedness of the government that sits on the other side of this Chamber.

It is not amusing, it is not funny and it is not something that we should heckle about. It is not even something that we should be debating here today. I impute no motives to the members on the other side. I believe and I have always believed that the vast majority of parliamentarians are here to do their best for their constituencies because they believe in public service and because they want to represent their people. However, for those of us on this side of the House there comes a point where you must say: "Stop". You must say: "Look at what it is you are trying to do". You must say to each and every one of them: "Go back into your ridings and talk to the senior citizens. Go back into your ridings and talk to the young parents. Go back into your ridings and talk to the ordinary Canadian on the street. Ask them whether they think this is a good bill". The answer, overwhelmingly, from coast to coast is: "No, no, no".

I do not know how much clearer it can be. The answer equally to this government is that the smoke and mirrors response offered by the minister, by the member for Winnipeg South, by other apologists for this piece of legislation that deserves to go in instantly to the circular file, is this smoke and mirrors response on research and development.

We would like to see some hard figures. We would like to see some response as to just how much money is going into research and development when the whole research and development area in this country is at an appalling low level. Again, why is it at an appalling low level? Because of the ghastly policies of this government. Slowly but surely Canadians' birthrights are being sold off. We are losing all of those things that made us uniquely Canadian and we are losing them because of government policy.

It is enough to make you scratch your head and say: "What is the motivation behind this government? What is the reason that it wants to do this? What motivates these people?"

Mrs. Gaffney: They are masochists.

Ms. Clancy: Well, their masochism, as my hon. colleague from Nepean has suggested, is soon going to come home to roost because the pain that they must so clearly desire will very soon be inflicted upon them.

Again, this is no cause for levity, no cause even for humour. Here we are, two weeks before Christmas, in what is going to be one of the hardest winters in this country since the Great Depression of the 1930s. In a country where people are going to go cold and hungry this winter because of other government policies, in a country where women cannot get justice from their own government in areas of pay equity and sexual harassment, in a country where the government appears to turn a blind eye and a deaf ear to the pleas of its own citizenry for justice, for equality and for a decent standard of living, here we sit in this House of Commons, two weeks before Christmas, in this the hard winter of the hard recession of the 1990s prepared once again to see a bill forced through the House of Commons that is an attack on the people of Canada, that is more particularly an attack on elderly people. Of course when we get to that, who form the majority of the elderly? Elderly women.

There was a joke that said something about women living longer than men. The joke was something about no, it just seems longer. Well, it is going to seem particularly long when elderly women, the poorest of the poor in this country, are hit yet again from another direction.

Some provinces have limited pharmacare for the elderly. That is very true. However, every single day more of those drugs that are covered by provincial programs are removed from the list. The sovereign province of Ontario with a great socialist government put a whole new list out just in the last couple of months.

This is not the kind of Canada that we want. I do not think it is the kind of Canada that the members over there really want. I guess the only thing I can do in all of this is to make a plea to the members over there as we sit here on this Thursday afternoon, on the second last day of what has been one of the most truncated sessions of Parliament in the history of our country, as we sit here following the example of my colleague the hon. member for Dartmouth, and try to stave off what is clearly the inevitable because of the mathematics of government, as we sit here to show to the people of Canada that we on this side of the House find this bill pernicious, that we on this side of the House stand up for the ordinary Canadian, that we on this side of the House have a care for something other than the bottom line of big business and the so-called harmony with the United States of America.

Yes, Madam Speaker, I am winding up. We are all winding up in this House and very soon the pitch is going to be thrown and I know across whose plate it is going to land.

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Madam Speaker, I compliment the member for Halifax for the eloquence of her remarks. Indeed, I found nothing in them that I disagreed with.

Like many other members, I have had an outpouring of petitions from my constituents, in fact the biggest number of petitions from my riding since the free trade debate in the early life of this Parliament and very much a part of the same debate.

My constituency is one of those places where medicare in this country was founded. Some of the great battles of medicare were fought in the community of Prince Albert. People there know that what this represents is not only a chipping away of medicare but a very real cost to the individual consumers and a further selling out of our country's social programs.

There are those who look at the polls and some looking at them think there is a chance that her party might form a government after the next election. Certainly that might be a premature assumption, but nevertheless since any party in this House could form a government, I would like to ask whether if in fact her party forms a government it is committed to getting rid of this legislation and replacing it with the pre-1987 legislation. Furthermore would it rid of the NAFTA which would entrench this legislation beyond the reach of this Parliament if it were to survive?

Mr. Edmonston: Answer the question.

Ms. Clancy: I ask the hon. member from wherever he is from in Quebec to let me answer my own questions.

First and foremost, it may come as a vast surprise to the hon. members of the New Democratic Party that the NAFTA has not passed yet. News flash, guys, it has not passed yet.

Second, with regard to restoring the pre-1987 levels, I can say with clarity and with conviction that we in the Liberal Party are committed to restoring the infrastructure, in the broadest sense of the word, of this country whether we are talking about our transportation sector, whether we are talking about pharmaceuticals or whether we are talking about social programs in general. There has been a perilous amount of damage done in this country since September 4, 1984, a day that will live in infamy. When the day comes that we return to government, we will have to work long and hard to correct the damage that has taken place over the last eight and a half years.

I look at the member for Eglinton—Lawrence, I look at the member for Northumberland, I look at the member for Nepean, and the members from Winnipeg and from Windsor, Cape Breton Highlands—Canso, and Ottawa. I say to every one here that all of us and our colleagues who were here today, the 40 new nominated Liberal candidates across this country, that when we form the government the people of Canada will know once again that they have friends in the House of Commons on the government benches.

They will know that they have friends in the cabinet. They will know that there is a humanitarian and compassionate government—

An hon. member: —next summer.

Ms. Clancy: —and one that does not interrupt.

An hon. member: Answer the question.

Ms. Clancy: I answered the question. NAFTA has not been passed, Bill. Check your newspaper.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Halifax should know better than within a period of 30 seconds calling hon. members by their names and so on. I know there is a full moon. I know it is almost the Christmas holiday, but let us try to keep faithful to some of the rules.

Ms. Clancy: I have not named anybody, Madam Speaker.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Let us be faithful to some of the rules. It would be appreciated.

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg—St. James): Madam Speaker, earlier today my hon. friend from Winnipeg South asked, what is $129 million?

I would like to remind my hon. friend that the last time a politician uttered such nonsense, that politician got toasted in the next election. By the way, Bill C-91 is not going to cost $129 million. It is going to cost in the billions.

I want to raise this question with my colleague from Halifax. A famous Conservative said back in 1984: "Conservatives must show the Canadian people what we have about us, a dimension of tenderness. Of all the challenges of government, none is more noble, no obligation more sacred."

Did the hon. parliamentary secretary say that? Uh, uh. Did the Minister for International Trade say that? No. Guess who said it? The Prime Minister of Canada said it.

I would like to ask my colleague from Halifax whether Bill C-91 is consistent with a dimension of tenderness. Is it consistent with a dimension of tenderness?

Ms. Clancy: Madam Speaker, I thank my hon. colleague from Winnipeg—St. James. I say that only is the bill not in keeping with the dimension of tenderness, it may be in keeping only with some form of dementia.

At the very best of times, when you look at what happens vis-à-vis Canada and the United States, we all remember—speaking of George Bush as the hon. member for Winnipeg South did a little earlier today—that Mr. Bush talked about a kinder, gentler America when he was first elected.

Those of us living here said that we already have it. It is called Canada. The great tragedy is that in this Mulrunacy coming from the same fountain as Thatcherism and Reaganomics, we are in great danger of losing this kinder, gentler country. However, there are those of us here who will see that it comes back.

Mr. Brian White (Dauphin—Swan River): Madam Speaker, I am very pleased to join in the third reading debate on Bill C-91 today.

It is an issue that is dear to my heart, being a 1972 graduate of pharmacy and still a licensed pharmacist in the province of Manitoba. In fact, I spent 12 years behind the counter of a retail pharmacy in Manitoba until I became a member of Parliament in 1984.

I will be right up front to start with. It is largely a question of philosophy. I will be up front about my own feelings. I support this legislation on face value because I believe in intellectual property rights, and I believe in property rights of all kinds.

I can understand the New Democrats being opposed to this bill on philosophical grounds because intellectual property rights and property rights of any kind contradict socialist theory. You cannot practice social engineering in a country when you embrace intellectual and other property rights.

With the Liberals it is a little harder to understand because I know its members believe in research and development, and I know they are not guided by the theories of Karl Marx. It is a little harder to understand other than base crass politics. Simply put, Bill C-91 means Canada can enhance its reputation as a modern, industrial country with a high-tech research capability.

Hundreds of millions of dollars have been invested since the passage of Bill C-22 in 1987. These companies, the brand name companies, the multinationals, and I should clarify this point, may be multinational but they employ 17,000 Canadians in plants and offices across the country.

• (1550)

They are profitable. As I mentioned, they are multinational. I will tell the House this country is in a lot of trouble if we continue to treat profitable businesses with such disdain. That is because governments cannot finance the research and development that needs to be done if we want to be considered a first world modern country.

In fact, industries like the brand name pharmaceutical companies are doing more than half of the R and D in Canada now and governments cannot afford to do it all. If we do not pass this bill we are moving in the wrong direction.

As a matter of fact, Canada is the only industrial country in the world that uses the Patent Act to control drug prices. Other industrial countries all use some form of a prices control board. We have had the Patented Medicine Prices Review Board in place since 1987 with the passage of Bill C-22 and Bill C-91 strengthens the powers of that board. It will have powers to roll back prices, to recapture over-priced products from companies. It will have powers to fine companies and individuals and even powers in extreme cases to imprison people.

In fact, we had the chairman of the board, Dr. Harry Eastman, appear before the committee. He told the committee on more than one occasion that the board has been quite effective in controlling the prices of patented medicines in Canada. It is odd that Dr. Eastman was capable enough to head a Liberal royal commission back in the 1980s but somehow when he becomes chairman of the Patented Medicine Prices Review Board and the Liberals oppose a bill, suddenly he is not credible anymore. He told us quite clearly the board is working.

With the hysteria and the fear mongering that has been going on, please excuse me if I do not get overly agitated like some of the speakers in this debate. I was on the committee that dealt with Bill C-22 in 1987 and again with Bill C-91. I heard all the same arguments in 1987 so we have been through all this before. It was not true then and it is not true now.

I will give you three examples of what was said back in 1987 about Bill C-22. The first one was that drug prices would increase dramatically. There are two points I would like to make here.

In the committee the generic drug company representatives told us that Bill C-22 has had no effect on them yet. To claim that we have higher drug prices since 1987, based on what they told us, cannot be justified. How can we prove that there have been price increases at all?

Based on the report from the Prices Review Board the prices of patented medicine which is the only category of drugs in Canada controlled and monitored by the PMPRB have increased 2.9 per cent per year since 1987, below the level of inflation. That is absolutely true.

We also heard from Green Shield, which is a source often quoted by opposition members. It told us that prices have increased by 11 per cent. That report and the report of the board are not contradictory because they use different criteria and they measure different things. They are not contradictory, something that was confirmed by Dr. Eastman, the chairman.

One of the other criticisms was that there would not be any creation of jobs and research and development would not happen. The companies are five years ahead of schedule. They promised in Bill C-22 to increase research and development to 10 per cent of sales by 1996. They are at 9.6 per cent in 1992. There have been 2,400 jobs created, more created than work in the entire generic industry. What reason do we have to doubt those brand name companies this time?

The third criticism was that the generic industry would somehow be destroyed by Bill C-22. I do not blame the generic drug company representatives and the owners for saying what they are saying because they are trying to protect some massive profits. We are speaking of profits that have gone up 180 per cent since 1987. Two of the top 10 drug companies in Canada are generic companies. There are only two or three other companies in Canada that have sales higher than the highest selling generic company. They are trying to protect their niche of the market and they are trying to protect their profit margin.

One final point on this is that there is a thriving generic industry in the United States and it has a much more restrictive patent policy than we do here in Canada.

We hear a lot from the other side about billions of dollars of costs to our health care system. These claims have been proven to be outrageous, and I will tell you why.

One of the sources being quoted by the opposition, one witness we heard at committee, was a Dr. Schondelmeyer from the United States, a pharmaceutical economist with impeccable credentials. I do not question the man's credentials, he is very knowledgeable. What I do question is his study.

When I looked at his study there were four areas where there were serious mistakes. He uses a list of 42 products. He has wrong patent expiry dates; he has wrong sales figures in at least one case; he has off-patent products on that list, unaffected by Bill C-91; and he assumes a 30 per cent growth rate in sales for these drug products to the year 2010. Anybody in the pharmaceutical industry knows that you cannot predict past five years, and even predicting five years from today is very risky.

We also hear a lot about the costs of pharmaceutical drugs to our health care system in Canada. We hear that it is going to cost our health care system billions of dollars. One thing we do not hear, and one thing that has to be said, is the amount of money saved to our health care system by some of these brand name products. These products, researched and developed by these brand name companies would not exist and there would be nothing to copy if these products were not developed.

The one that is mentioned most often and has been mentioned several times today is a product called Vasotec, made by Merck Frosst and distributed in Canada. It is, I believe, if not the highest selling drug in North America is right near the top. It is used in cardiovascular disease for high blood pressure. There are tens of thousands of people in Canada who die each year from cardiovascular disease, hundreds of thousands in the United States who die each year from CV disease. There has been an independent study done which states Vasotec saves the health care system in Canada $100 million per year because of 58,000 fewer hospitalizations.

There is a new drug on the market called Proscar, which has been on the market a matter of weeks. It is used for prostate enlargement, and 75 per cent of males in Canada will suffer from that illness. This drug will prevent surgery in many cases. We do not yet have the cost figures on this but the savings will be in the millions of dollars as well, because every day that you can prevent someone from going into hospital you are saving a great deal of money.

One other recent case. There is a drug called Zofran which is used for cancer patients undergoing chemotherapy. It helps control the nausea and vomiting that go along with chemotherapy, unfortunately, in many cases. This drug is being used in hospitals across the country. There is one hospital in Ontario that is saving $12,000 a day by using this drug which allows patients to go home who otherwise would be in the hospital. It is saving $12,000 a day in one hospital in Canada.

The final classic example, going back several years, was the product Cimetidine used for ulcer therapy, made by Smith, Kline & French, which saved tens of millions of dollars to our health care system.

What I am trying to say, in conclusion, is that in Canada we either have to consider ourselves as a first world, high-tech, modern country or we do not. Of course it is going to cost consumers more money with a policy like this. This type of thing costs money. If every industrial country in the world had a system of compulsory licensing, we would not have the infrastructure in place, we would not have the incentive to develop these new products that give us all a better quality of life and save our health care system millions of dollars.

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): There is a logical error in the comments made by the hon. member and I would like to ask him about it.

He makes the point that medicine, like any other patented product, deserves to be treated like any other patented product and that, therefore, compulsory licensing or that type of restriction on the rights of the inventors to realize profits on their gain, is unreasonable.

• (1600)

On the other hand, while he is saying that this is an invention like any other and should be treated like any other, he says that we have this board which is going to limit and control prices. Does the government also advocate a control system for the prices of books, or for the prices of zippers, or all the other products that are subject to patent?

It seems to me the very recognition and acceptance of a prices control board is an admission by the government that prescriptions are prescription drugs and patented drugs are in a special category and should be treated differently from other inventions and that this government is prepared to treat them differently. Therefore, to make the argument that they are just in the same boat is disproved by the very way it treats them.

If it turns out that the prices control board is unconstitutional and is struck down as ultra vires of the federal government, will that member then allow for a system like compulsory licensing to make sure that the consumer does not get ripped off on patented products which are not like any other but which are essential for life and health?

Mr. White: Madam Speaker, there is no error in logic at all. When I began my comments I talked about my personal philosophy and my belief in the protection of intellectual property rights. That belief exists by itself.

I am not the minister and it was not my legislation that was written in 1987, but the prices review board was part of the process and it has been working. Most industrial countries are using a prices review board to control drug prices. It was shown clearly in 1969 when compulsory licensing was put in place that the prices of pharmaceuticals were too high.

However, I think they can be dealt with separately. We can believe in the protection of intellectual property rights. We have the board in place. I support the board because most of the concerns that we hear on this legislation are for costs.

As long as we have the board in place and we can believe what it is saying, because opposition members in the committee did not believe what Dr. Eastman was saying and I cannot think of anyone more reputable or able to lead that board than Dr. Eastman. What he said was not believed. His opinion was that the only problem with constitutionality was controlling the price of drugs at the retail level because there was an overlap with provincial responsibility at that end.

I support the board. I think it is doing good work and I think it will stay in place as long as there are concerns about the prices of drugs.

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Madam Speaker, the fact of the matter is that the elimination of compulsory licensing will mean higher drug prices for Canadians. It will mean a direct attack on our Canadian health care system.

I have to take issue with most of what the hon. member said because it is in a direction that this country is not going. If he talked to Canadians, he would find they are concerned that they are going to have to pay higher prices for drugs. They are afraid that as a result of that they are going to have to pay a lot more for their drug plans.

The member is from the province of Manitoba. This may not be related but I know the hon. member knows the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs is also a mini-agriculture minister. The minister keeps talking about the fact that the reason we have to bring this in is because of the GATT.

Why is the minister prepared at this time to bring this bill in when he knows that at the GATT for supply management he could use something like this as a bargaining chip? He could use something like this to help the supply managed industries which are really important to Manitoba.

The minister knows we are the only country that is bringing in a bill like this. Why is it that when the minister—

Madam Deputy Speaker: I will have to interrupt the hon. member to allow a few seconds for an answer. We are in questions and comments period.

This is not the time for debate. This is questions or comments and the floor belongs to the hon. member for Dauphin—Swan River.

Mr. White: Madam Speaker, I will be brief in my response because I know we are almost out of time.

The first question asked was whether drug prices were going to be higher. Yes they are going to be higher. I have looked at the model that the ISTC has put together and it makes a lot of sense. There is a list of drugs affected by Bill C-91. I have checked that list and it is all valid with the extended patent dates.

There are two assumptions made that I do not agree with. First of all, the department assumes that all products are going to be copied and that is not the case. It is about 1 in 20. The other assumption made is that generics will all enter the market immediately when they are able to. That does not happen either. Usually they wait until it is seen how profitable the product is going to be. Then the product comes on to the market once the licence is in place.

Those figures say $25 million a year for Canadians. That is $1 per year per Canadian. Two cups of coffee a year per Canadian. I think that is a fair price to pay to have the proper system in place to encourage this type of investment.

Mr. René Soetens (Ontario): Madam Speaker, it is a pleasure to participate in the debate on this very important bill.

What we might ask first is why we would be interested in changing the patent legislation particularly as it relates to the drug manufacturing sector.

During the committee process we did hear from a number of witnesses. One that I thought made an excellent presentation was Professor Fernand Labrie from the Laval University Research Centre. I should remind hon. members that Professor Labrie is one of Canada's premier research scientists.

In his brief he gave us a number of comparisons about the economic activity of research and development as it existed in Canada prior to 1987, prior to the current drug patent legislation and also what was going on in other parts of the world and how this legislation would compare to others.

Certainly, there was no doubt about the content of Professor Labrie's argument. He was certainly very supportive of the change. He was supportive of the change because it would bring a much increased economic activity of research and development into the university process. It would create lots of improvements because of the change in patent legislation.

I would like to read one particular paragraph by Professor Labrie. There was a concern about how Canada's patent legislation would then stack up to others. I would just like to quote briefly from his comments on page 14.

It says: "Bill C-91 is the minimum required since the addition of three years of protection for patent products, namely from 7 to 10 years, after approval of the drug remains below the standards accepted by the other members of the group of seven nations. In fact it can be seen on figure 4 that a protection of 14 years is offered in the United States while 15 years are already accepted or planned for the countries of the European common market. So what we are doing is still not achieving the levels that other of our major competitors have, but certainly moving in the right direction".

Then you have to question whether that view is shared and will that economic activity in the form of research activity come to Canada.

The committee received from the Office of the Dean, Faculty of Medicine of the University of Alberta, a very strong endorsement of the whole idea of an influx of research dollars into that particular university. We received another one from the University of Alberta, Department of Medical Microbiology and Infectious Diseases. Again, it was a very strong endorsement of the program as proposed.

We also received endorsement from the Canadian Pharmaceutical Association. Although its brief went into many areas that were really outside what was being reviewed by the committee, I would just like to read one sentence which relates to a comment raised by others about prices. It states: "The association is pleased that the government is proposing to expand the powers of the Patented Medicine Prices Review Board".

The prices review board, although part of the legislation, is something not referred to too often at least in the public press as to the ability of government to control the price of patent medicines so that the concern about the economic impact on the health care system is in fact minimized. It certainly supports that particular aspect of it.

McMaster University, Faculty of Health Sciences sent forward a number of reasons that it supports the particular legislation that was before us.

• (1610)

The idea that it is a very centralized support system is somewhat erroneous because we received recommendations of support from the Victoria General Hospital out of Halifax. We received support from the Metropolitan Toronto Board of Trade and the Board of Trade of Montreal.

We received numerous submissions, for example from Quadra Logic Technologies Inc., a group in British Columbia. It says: "My colleagues and I at Quadra Logic Technologies Inc. strongly believe the extra patent protection given pharmaceutical innovators and their investors would be an important encouragement to the creation of knowledge based jobs in Canada".

We had numerous representations to the committee. Even another group from Dalhousie University sent in submissions of support. Support within the industry that the government says will benefit is certainly there and it is there in spades. I am pleased to see that.

I have to look at this and ask how it affects my constituency. Well, the Liberal Party in my constituency is saying that this is going to be devastating on jobs in my riding. Of course, it is interesting that the Liberal Party representative in my riding, having lived there for I think two or three weeks, knows diddly nothing about the riding because what he is out talking about is the comment: "Your local MP wants to destroy the Canadian pharmaceutical industry and cost up to 100 people in this community their jobs". Obviously he has not done a lot of research.

If he were to do some research in my riding about the jobs that are being protected for the Canadian pharmaceutical industry, he would find a company by the name of Fisons Canada located in Pickering. Since the implementation of the drug patent legislation in 1987, it has invested some $8.5 million in research. It has built a new facility in the town of Pickering. It has increased its employees from 38 to 67 people in the Pickering office itself and has added 27 or 28 people in other parts of Canada. It is a large plant of 50,000 square feet.

So there it is. A Pickering based company has clearly increased its investment in my riding. Of course, he would challenge the people who work there as not being important to the constituency. What he ought to do is learn a little about the constituency.

However, recognizing that he is new and maybe he has not seen that plant, maybe he would like to drive by the Purdue Frederick plant which did not exist in 1987. It is 82,000 square feet, an investment of $14 million and employs 135 people. It has a commitment to increase its investment in research. In fact, its investment in research has grown from 2.5 per cent in 1988 to 6 per cent of its sales in 1991.

If that Liberal candidate in my riding had the slightest inclination of being concerned about what goes on in the riding, he might have discovered that.

Or he might have gone over to Ajax where there is the large Leo Laboratories head office. That was not there in 1987. He would have discovered the opportunities that have been created. It has increased its number of employees in the last five years from 32 to 71. He is not concerned about all those people who work in that head office.

He is not concerned about the fact that that company has increased its investment in research from zero dollars in 1987 to over $1 million per year in 1992 and anticipate further increases. In fact, it is not only anticipating further increases, it is expecting its research expenditures to increase by at least 25 per cent a year over the next period of time.

Of course, if he is concerned about jobs, he would want to go to the Sandoz operations in Whitby. I am not sure he knows where Whitby is in my riding. If he would go over there and have a look at the Sandoz operations, he would see a large manufacturing plant which employs some 260 people that has more than doubled in size since 1987.

It has doubled in size for a number of reasons. One is patent protection. Two is the free trade agreement. Because of the free trade agreement, that manufacturing plant in my riding was able to take a contract from Sandoz U.S. to supply the U.S. market with one of its products. Because of that acquisition of increased economic activity in the Sandoz plant in Whitby, it was then able to go to the Sandoz operations world-wide. It now has a mandate to produce this drug in Whitby, Ontario for the world market.

If my Liberal opponent wants to get out and learn a little bit about the riding, I would be happy to take him when he has a lot of spare time some day after the next election and show him around so he fully understands just what is going on in my riding.

To make it a little more meaningful, we had a problem with the whole issue of pricing and the perception people have. I would like to finally wrap up and say I believe the Patented Medicine Prices Review Board and the powers it has been given will adequately protect the people of my constituency from the drug prices the opposition is espousing as terrible things. In fact, I think they are well protected.

I thank you for this opportunity. I only wish I had more time to give you more information.

Mr. Joseph Volpe (Eglinton—Lawrence): Madam Speaker, since the hon. member who just spoke could not remember the name of his opponent in the riding of Ontario but devoted 12 minutes of time to him, I will blurt out his name for him. It is Dan McTeague. Either way he is going to be the member.

The member is confused about prices. He has overlooked the fact prices are already very high so there is a return on investment over a projected period of time, which under Bill C-22 is indicated as seven years. This legislation will extend protection, or a monopoly on those prices for an ever greater period of time.

If the member is really sincere about protecting intellectual property rights he will be honest enough and remind himself and all the members of his caucus such protection already exists for a 20-year period. The portion of the 20-year period that goes beyond the exclusivity of the competition portion is already recompensed by anyone who copies the product to the tune of 4 per cent of sales to allow for competition. It does not deprive them of anything and most, if not all of the investment, is returned before that competition is allowed.

Such is the case in a report published in the Globe and Mail the other day. We learned one of these multinational corporations was receiving 100 per cent return on investment per annum over the course of the last five years for the parent company. They do not need greater incentive. Let us just be honest and say the intellectual property rights are already well protected and we are not talking here about encouraging further investment. The inducements of the marketplace are already there.

We are really looking to reach out further and extend a monopoly, not free marketplace trade, but an inhibition of trade for a longer period of time. Why?

Mr. Soetens: I did know the name of the Liberal candidate. The problem he is going to have is most Liberals in the riding do not know his name because they had to bring him in from Scarborough to fill the nomination.

There is a process in this legislation dealing with prices. When the Department of Industry, Science and Technology appeared before the committee to explain the rationale of how it arrived at its price structure and forecast of the costs in the $125 million to $130 million range, the Liberal Party and the NDP spent a whole day questioning the officials on their process and evaluation methods and could not find a loophole.

I should point out when the opposition witness appeared before the committee with Professor Schondelmeyer, the first question asked by the government members shot his forecasts full of holes. This continued through the second, third and fourth questions.

I believe the system is put in place so Canadian consumers will not be gouged by an unfair price structure. That has proven to be the case in the last five years and I believe with the increased strengths in this legislation for the review board that will not happen in the future either.

[Translation]

Madam Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 38, it is my duty to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: The hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce—Refugees; the hon. member for Western Arctic—Fur Industry; the Hon. member for Moncton—External Affairs; the hon. member for Moose Jaw—Lake Centre—Agriculture; the hon. member for Comox—Alberni—Aboriginal Housing.

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Madam Speaker, I rise today to oppose Bill C-91, a bill experts say will have us pay anywhere from $1 to $7 billion more for drugs.

This legislation will have disastrous consequences in Canada, in Quebec, especially as regards our health system. Basically, what we have here is legislation which will increase the price of patented drugs in exchange for promises—I want to lay emphasis on the word promises—of job creation in research and development.

I may well be the only member from Quebec to speak against this bill because I tend to agree with The Toronto Star when it says that this government cares more about intellectual property than about people.

I think it is outrageous to be willing to exchange a promise to create jobs, a few menial jobs perhaps, for billions and billions of dollars in giveaways because, from what the federal government has told us, it would seem that we did not get the jobs we had been promised with Bill C-22 when it was passed. We did not get the jobs.

When the government says that the price of patented drugs has not increased—and I want to be precise here—by more than the rate of inflation since Bill C-22 was adopted, that is not true. We have heard the testimonies before the committee on consumer and corporate affairs. We have heard government experts who have told us that they did not have all the answers to our questions, for instance, on the drug called Vasotec. I can tell you that Mr. Eastman, a government expert, said he did not know that drug. Therefore, he could not tell if the price increase was more or less equal to the rate of inflation.

We were left hanging to some extent. We had been asked to take part in this debate by a number of people who may not be important the way ministers or pharmaceutical company officials are, but important people nonetheless. They are constituents from my riding and from other ridings who have responded to our small household mailings and answered the question: Are you for or against this bill on pharmaceutical products?

In my riding of Chambly, I can tell you that the vast majority of those who responded were against. Most of them were middle-class and middle-aged people. These people have told us—I would not want to offend the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, but I will say it: anyway—that they do not trust at all what the government says about the price of drugs. The people in my riding of Chambly believe, and this is important, that it is dead wrong about the price paid by consumers for drugs when they go to the pharmacy.

To check on the claims made by my constituents, I decided, like a good lawyer, to go to the nearest drug store. There I met an honest pharmacist and I asked him what the price difference really was since the government had legislated on patented drugs. What was the difference? Had prices only increased between 2.7 per cent and 2.9 per cent a year, as the government claimed, since that legislation came in force? The pharmacist replied: "Not on your life, Phil". He then showed me some boxes of medication and said: "Look how much it used to cost and how much it is now". And I must say that I am much more inclined to believe the people in my riding, the middle-class, the poor and the older people. I believe them because they have a lot—

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order I just have a technical question for the hon. member. I am quite willing to let the member talk freely on this issue, but he just showed two boxes of medication here in the House, without identifying them and without mentioning their price either. It becomes very difficult for us to judge. Mr. Speaker, it is not customary here in the House to show—

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): As far as I am concerned, he should not be displaying anything on his desk. If he does that again, I will just recognize the next speaker.

Mr. Edmonston: Mr. Speaker, this is my own personal medication. I wish to refer specifically to the medication and show you the difference between the generic and patented drug. I needed the box to remember the exact pharmacological name.

If I may refer to it, I will try to keep it out of the view of the camera. I think it is very important to refer to it. I am not trying to make any grandstand theatrical play with this government, but I do need to have that information, if I have your permission, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): As I rise, you can look at your box and then find out what the name of the generic drug is. Then I will let you speak on it.

Mr. Edmonston: Thank you very much, Mr Speaker, for your help in this matter.

I was speaking about the visit I made to the local pharmacy. The pharmacist told me he agreed with many of the people who wrote to me in Chambly that this was a particularly nasty bill.

An hon. member: What about the name?

Mr. Edmonston: I will get to the name in a minute. Please hold your horses.

He said he felt if this bill were to go through it would mean a great deal more money spent by Canadians, particularly in my riding, because of the government's gift of millions and according to some experts, billions of dollars to the drug industry.

Vasotec is an example of a drug that is going to be increased in price to the extent it will be very difficult for average Canadians to pay for it. It is used quite extensively. I believe it is either the number one or number three best seller in Canada. It has not been proven by Mr. Eastman to be one of the drugs that did not go higher than the rate of inflation.

Mr. Eastman told us he did not have the information on Vasotec although we had gone to a pharmacy. I think as the minister pores over his notes he will remember that if he was there that day. I believe my colleague from Surrey North actually gave the material to the minister's people as well as to Mr. Eastman and discovered they did not have the information.

My colleague from Surrey North alleged the price of this one pharmaceutical patent drug had increased far in excess of 2 per cent. I would be glad to have a response from the minister. I believe it had gone closer to 6 or 7 per cent.

• (1630)

I continue on to the question of the difference between the government's figures and the figures presented by independent agencies like Green Shield. Green Shield is an independent agency that deals with drug pricing. It has been doing so for many years on behalf of unions and other people who need to know about that when they are dealing with collective agreements.

It is interesting to note that whenever the government hears that Green Shield is disputing the government figure of 2.9 per cent the federal government automatically says Green Shield is talking about much more than just these patent drugs, that it is talking about all drugs.

Green Shield has said that the increase is close to 6 or 7 per cent if we take out the other drugs. That is incredible. That is not 2 per cent. It is 6 or 7 per cent.

[Translation]

We all tend to have an axe to grind in this House. It is understandable and normal in the context of parliamentary debate to stand up for one's constituency. However, I wonder what constituency this government opposite is representing. Does it represent the seniors? Certainly not because seniors are angry; they are really annoyed about this bill. I cannot understand how members opposite who represent older people can say that people are not angry. That is incredible.

People are angry, and not just older people, but also middle-class people who cannot afford to pay more for Vasotec or other drugs. They are convinced—and there is evidence to back this up—that the price of drugs, of patented drugs, has really been horribly inflated over the past few years.

We are asking this government: Why the rush? Why is it so urgent that we pass this legislation today? What is the hurry? To please GATT of course. But people have asked: Why this urge to please GATT just now? This thing has worked well for us in Canada. It has even helped keep our health system healthy. However, if this bill were to be passed today, I really think that would strike quite a blow to our health system.

I am probably the only member from Quebec to speak and vote against this bill. I know that many Conservative members from Quebec and Bloc Quebecois members will call me an enemy of Quebec. I hate this sort of criticism because it is divisive. People are being labelled as either friends or enemies of Quebec. Let me tell you that I am as much a Quebecer as the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and that I am no enemy of Quebec. But I am definitely an enemy of exploitation, and I suggest that this bill does exploit the most vulnerable people in our society.

I know there are plenty of statistics supporting both sides. The government has quoted figures indicating that all kinds of jobs will be created. I suggest we will get next to nothing, essentially jobs with low pay, jobs in marketing, and jobs in testing pharmaceutical products developed elsewhere, in other countries. Born in the U.S., I chose to become a Quebecer and a Canadian. Quebec and Canada are really very different from the United States. I am therefore a little sad and sorry to see that we are in the process of becoming exactly what the Americans no longer want to be. In other words, they no longer want to be exploited by one of the biggest lobbies in the world, the drug industry lobby.

I know the government was approached by a lobby firm which happens to be one of the biggest in the world. It probably has one of the worst reputations as well. As far as the truth is concerned, talk about a bad reputation—

An hon. member: Time.

Mr. Edmonston: I am sorry, but I believe I have 20 minutes and those 20 minutes are not up yet, Mr. Speaker. I will continue. Patience, my friends across the way, even if it hurts. I will not take long.

Let me tell you about your friends called—

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member has another four minutes.

[Translation]

Mr. Edmonston: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, I was aware of that. But it does not hurt to tell my colleagues.

Do you know the people behind the lobby firm called Hill and Knowlton, the one that works for the big patented drug companies? Hill and Knowlton is the same lobby firm that made such a fuss, when we had that problem between Iraq and Kuwait, over this young lady who said she had seen poor little babies thrown out of their incubators and killed by the Iraqis. In fact, she was the daughter of the Kuwaiti ambassador, and she did not see a thing, no massacre of infants, nothing.

Mr. Blais: What does that have to do with it?

Mr. Edmonston: I mention this because what we have here is a problem with the truth. We have a problem with the figures quoted and especially the ones government members quoted today, because the lobbyists are doing most of the work. In my opinion, when you have lobbyists working with you to get this bill through the House in record time, people who have worked for Jean-Claude Duvalier, the Moonies and Reverend Moon, and the Church of Scientology, well, I am sorry, but I have a problem with the truth of what is being said.

I intend to finish the way I began. My goodness, I never saw the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs show such a lively interest in the proceedings. It is fantastic.

As long as you support the absolute right to intellectual property, I say you are really out to lunch, because people have no absolute right to intellectual property. Especially not where drugs are concerned. The present system works very well, without any problems. And we do not have to give away billions of dollars to the drug companies.

In concluding, I would like to make one more comment. As a writer who has written 64 books, I ought to know the importance of intellectual property. Now you may not know this, but when you write books, you do not have the absolute right to intellectual property over those books. There is a Canadian program and a Quebec program that allow people to copy your books, and you are paid royalties for those copies. My point is that we can have a mixed system under which we can protect people like writers as well as people who are sick. And that is why I am against Bill C-91.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member's time has expired.

• (1640)

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, there are a few comments to which I would like to respond, especially when I listen to the hon. member saying that the system is working very well. I cannot reconcile that with what they say has been an explosion of prices. It works well or it is not working. They cannot have it both ways. They should make up their minds.

[Translation]

I would like to come back to some points, Mr. Speaker. They talk about promised investment. Rumour or gossip has it that the hon. member wants to be mayor of Montreal—

An hon. member: Good luck.

Mr. Blais: They say that he wants to run for mayor of Montreal. One billion in investment, which he can see from his own car as he returns to his Montreal area riding. He can see it with his own eyes. The 2,400 jobs created in Montreal and Toronto, the $85 million spent in university research centres in Alberta, British Columbia, soon in Nova Scotia and in other parts of the country are very concrete. Half the jobs he is talking about, the jobs created, are in high technology. He should be able to realize those things.

He mentioned something in particular that I would like to come back to. Can he admit that the price of drugs for which we are responsible, because he often tends to confuse federal and provincial responsibility, the price of patented medicine, that we are responsible for it at the manufacturer's level but the provinces are responsible at the retail level? Perhaps he could talk to his colleague, Premier Bob Rae of Ontario, and the two other provincial premiers, one of whom is in British Columbia, and ask them to act so as to prevent the retail price of a drug like Vasotec from going up 13 per cent, not the manufacturer's price but the retail price. The retail price depends on the provinces. Perhaps he could discuss it with Mr. Rae and tell him to intervene. The federal government cannot act on the retail price. That is one thing.

Also, I would like the hon. member to give me an answer. Is he aware that the price of patented medicine accounts for only 3 per cent? We are only talking about 3 out of 100. Patented medicine makes up 3 per cent of the total. I have a young daughter who is this tall. When I tell her this is 100 and that is 3, she understands what I mean. I hope that my colleague will understand that it cannot lead to an excessive increase in drug prices, because it affects only 3 per cent. I would like him to give me an answer on these points and maybe also tell us the name of those famous drugs he has on hand, because I suppose he must have had time to take a look at them so that we can check the things he said at the beginning of the debate.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Maybe I could get the other questioners to ask questions and then I will cut them all off at once.

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I was interested in the interchange. As this debate draws to a close I am struck by the fact the statements by the government become more outrageous while we need to have a great deal of calmness.

I have been concerned with this piece of legislation. Both as social policy chair and as chair of western caucus I noticed the way in which regional development has been used as a stick. The fear of unemployment is used against fellow Canadians, the promise of jobs that will never appear.

In all my years as an academic I remember watching this take place in terms of urban development and other sectors of the economy where people promise you jobs in order to keep you quiet.

I was wondering if the hon. member would talk a little bit about this job strategy as a phoney way to approach health policy.

Mrs. Dorothy Dobbie (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, I understand that the member opposite will make a final comment. However, I just wanted to take the opportunity to thank all the hon. members in this House for their wholehearted and spirited debate, not just in the House but in the committee process. It was in the best parliamentary tradition. I appreciate the interest that they have all shown in the bill.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I have a question. I do not want this mush. I want to ask the member why he thinks the government is putting this legislation through when it means that my constituents will have to pay more for their drugs when they cannot afford it.

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, I want to put a question to the member who just spoke. I do want to stick to the facts, which I do not believe he has done. I want to remind him that patented drug prices have risen only 2.9 per cent on average.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It being 4.45 p.m., pursuant to order made Wednesday, December 9, 1992, in accordance with the provisions of Standing Order 78(3) it is my duty to interrupt the proceedings and put forthwith every question necessary to dispose of the third reading stage of the bill now before the House.

Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion, which was agreed to on the following division:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I declare the motion carried.

Bill read the third time and passed.

Mr. Shields: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, the green bus got in an accident, had a flat tire, ran out of gas, I ran and—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): On a point of order, the hon. member for Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia.

Mr. Geoff Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I seek consent for the following motion:

> That, notwithstanding any Standing Order and the usual practices of the House, Bill S-16, an act to restructure the United Grain Growers, Limited, be now called for second reading and that the House proceed to dispose of the said bill at all stages.

Motion agreed to.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS

[English]

UNITED GRAIN GROWERS, LIMITED

Mr. Geoff Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia) moved that Bill S-16, an act to restructure United Grain Growers, Limited, be read the second time and referred to Committee of the Whole.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Paproski in the chair.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. House in Committee of the Whole on Bill S-16, an act to restructure United Grain Growers, Limited.

Clauses 2 to 14 agreed to.

On Clause 15—Board of Directors

Mr. Geoff Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia): Mr. Chairman, I want to speak briefly to this bill, S-16, and in doing so thank especially the member for Lambton—Middlesex for their co-operation as well as the critics from the other parties.

The United Grain Growers had its origin in the Grain Growers Grain Company which was formed by farmers in the Sintaluta district of Saskatchewan in the early 1900s. The United Grain Growers, Limited was an amalgamation of the Grain Growers Grain Company along with some other farmer organized co-ops. It was incorporated under a special act of Parliament in 1911. Today it is a co-operative with some 86,000 members and $400 million in assets. It operates 266 elevators across the four western provinces as well as two terminals at Thunder Bay and one in Vancouver.

In addition to the handling of grain, UGG sells fertilizer, seed and other farm supplies and publishes farm papers like Grain News and The Country Guide.

As hon. members know, the world marketplace for grain is not easy. In the face of subsidized competition, any and all deficiencies in the handling and transportation of grain to tide water must be examined. Like the other handlers, United Grain Growers faces major capital expenditures to modernize its grain handling facilities. Significant investments will be required in order to build new elevators and upgrade many of the older facilities so they can be made to work effectively in linking producers to their offshore customers.

• (1720)

To this end, over 95 per cent of the shareholder delegates at the United Grain Growers 86th annual meeting last month approved a capital reorganization and restructuring plan. Since that date, November 4, 1992, the company has moved swiftly to meet the requirements of Parliament to allow this petition to be considered. The problems are UGG is not now legally empowered to enter into underwriting agreements with the investment banking community nor can the company issue shares to take advantage of the investment interest that has already been expressed.

Further, the capital construction plans of the company contemplate attracting equity capital for investment. If UGG were not able to enter into an underwriting arrangement, this would cause delays that would impact on the company's cash position and ultimately the investment program in grain handling infrastructure.

It is for this reason that timely consideration of the bill has been requested. UGG was incorporated by an act of Parliament. The general laws of Canada do not allow the company to reorganize itself. The changes must be approved by Parliament.

The changes are these. They are embodied in Bill S-16. The legislation will cause UGG's capital structure to change in the following ways. First, it will allow for new capital investment needed. Second, it will allow for the allocation of the existing equity and patronage dividend credits on a fair and equitable basis. Third, it will allow for the preservation of the existing representative membership structure. Fourth, it will preserve farmer control, as 12 of the 15 members of the board of directors will be farmers.

Once this reorganization is complete, United Grain Growers intends to make an initial public offering of its common shares in order to raise the capital necessary for expansion and modernization of its infrastructure.

Finally, this legislation will enable United Grain to better serve its customers throughout western Canada. In the larger picture it will help Canada's competitive position in world agricultural markets.

I therefore thank all members present for supporting this motion in regard to Bill S-16 which will enable the restructuring of United Grain.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Chairman, we would like to lend our support to the hon. member's statement this afternoon on Bill S-16, the United Grain Growers restructuring bill. It is a private member's bill from the Senate.

It will allow this company to restructure its financial arrangements so that it can raise funds in the financial markets of the country. It will maintain the control of the grain producers who now are involved in this organization. It will allow them to go ahead with capital construction in the summer of 1993.

The United Grain Growers have had some 25 information meetings throughout the west. I understand there is broad support from their 86,000 members across the three prairie provinces to see this capital reorganization of the company go ahead. Then it can raise funds in the capital markets of the country and go ahead with its capital construction projects in the summer of 1993. We support the speedy passage of this bill.

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Mr. Chairman, on behalf of my party and myself I would also like to indicate that we intend to support this legislation. It is obviously something the farmers that have been involved in the United Grain Growers have thought through very carefully. They have discussed this in many meetings and have finally made a decision on it. It is only appropriate that we not stand in their way of this reorganization.

However, as my party's critic for co-operative and community development, I do have to say that in some ways this is a sad note in the history of Canadian agriculture. The United Grain Growers really pioneered the whole concept of the organization of co-operatives on the prairies that very firmly entrenched farmer control of grain handling over a number of generations now.

This present structure envisions that farmers will continue to maintain control of that structure but that might well prove difficult to do once the present course of action has been embarked on.

In closing, I would just like to congratulate all the directors of the United Grain Growers over the years both at the local and at the national level and recognize the contribution that they have made to Canadian agriculture.

AUTOMOTIVE POLLUTION REDUCTION ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed from Monday, November 23, consideration of the motion of Mr. Ferguson that Bill C-226, an act to reduce automotive pollution, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Natural Resources envelope.

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to speak on Bill C-226 this afternoon, an act to reduce automotive pollution.

The Department of Transport administers emission regulations for motor vehicles under the Motor Vehicle Safety Act but it does not regulate fuels. The Minister of the Environment has authority to regulate certain aspects of fuel quality under the Canadian Environmental Protection Act. I would like to say a few words about motor vehicle pollution and the relationship between vehicles, fuel and emission controls.

The North American automobile industry is gearing up to manufacture vehicles meeting new stringent United States emission standards beginning in 1994. These low emission vehicles are designed around fuel available in the United States.

Considerable work is being done by vehicle manufacturers on more advanced emission controls planned on the U.S. Clean Air Act. Some of these involve reformulated gasolines and other alternative fuels.

Motor vehicle emissions depend on the fuel that is used and how the vehicle and its emission controls process that fuel. To achieve much lower vehicle emissions than we have today, we need better fuels as well as better vehicle emission controls. In some cases, the fuel constituent itself is harmful, as was the case with lead. In addition, certain fuels and fuel additives can damage emission control devices.

One of the reasons against the use of lead in gasoline is that it in a sense poisoned the exhaust catalyst so that they are no longer effective in controlling emissions. Canadians are very conscious of the need to protect the environment, and the government takes very seriously its responsibility to regulate emissions from the ever-growing fleet of motor vehicles.

• (1730)

Under the impetus of government emissions regulations, the auto industry has made impressive improvements in the unit emissions from passenger cars. Today emissions of hydrocarbons and carbon have been reduced by over 95 per cent from the uncontrolled vehicles of the 1970s while emissions of oxides of nitrogen have been cut back by 70 per cent and further reductions will occur in the mid-1990s.

Canadian regulations are planned to have the same stringent vehicle emission controls as those in the United States. One step toward bringing new emission regulations on stream is to make detailed amendments to the Motor Vehicle Safety Act. This step is currently in progress through Bill S-8, the Motor Vehicle Safety Act.

Meanwhile, there is a memorandum of understanding with vehicle manufacturers that cars sold in Canada between 1994 and 1996 will meet the new standards. These further reduce emissions of hydrocarbons by 29 per cent and of oxides of nitrogen by 60 per cent from the already low values.

Since Canada represents 8 per cent of a largely integrated U.S.-Canadian market supplied by an international industry, manufacturers have little difficulty providing Canada with the same emission controls as used in the United States even if they are stringent controls.

As I said, an important part of vehicle emission control is the fuel. Canadian gasoline is not always the same as that available in the United States. We have our own feedstock and refineries, and marketing of the final product is relatively local rather than being international or even national.

As the U.S. tightens its regulations on automotive gasoline and as the vehicle manufacturers develop emission controls based on fuels of a certain standard, the availability of compatible fuels in Canada becomes a very important issue.

In addition to any direct emission effect of a fuel it is an issue for manufacturers that their vehicles give a satisfactory lifetime performance in Canada.

It is important, therefore, for the successful outcome of the emission control negotiations and regulations under the Motor Vehicle Safety Act that compatible fuels are available and continue to be available in Canada.

The two items addressed by Bill C-226 are oxygen content and another very difficult phrase known as MMT or methylcyclopentadienyl manganese tricarbonyl. The oxygen content of gasoline is important for low emissions of carbon monoxide and can be raised by gasoline additives, one being ethanol about 10 per cent by volume, to achieve the suggested oxygen level. However, there are important questions in developing an oxygen level less than the number in Bill C-226.

MMT is not allowed by regulation under the United States Clean Air Act. It is widely used in Canada and is a potential issue for vehicle manufacturers. They are faced with a different gasoline than used for 92 per cent of the vehicles in the Canada-U.S. fleet. It is a very significant thing that the gasoline we use in Canada with MMT is not allowable for 92 per cent of the fleet produced in an integrated fashion by Canada and the United States. Ninety-two per cent of that is represented by the U.S. market.

Evidence of direct harmful effects, or of significant effects to vehicle emission control systems is not yet clear. The Ethyl Corporation, maker of the MMT additive, continues research and representations in Washington with a view to having MMT allowed in the U.S.

Environment Canada with its responsibilities under the Canadian Environmental Protection Act and Energy, Mines and Resources Canada are both well aware of these issues. These departments along with Transport Canada are in close contact.

Fuel standards are extremely technical in nature and it is vitally important to the environment that gasoline should be compatible with vehicle emission controls. Comprehensive fuel regulations need to be developed and kept up to date with rapidly changing technology.

Whereas the intent of Bill C-226 to foster cleaner gasolines has merit, the mandates it contains to bring about changes in fuel quality are not appropriate primarily of course for the marketing reality that I mentioned earlier of 92 per cent of the integrated market being in the United States where MMT is not allowable.

There is, however, an established process for considering new fuel specifications and this should be followed in the quest for cleaner fuels. Federal departments, the Canadian General Standards Board, provincial governments, and the oil refining and vehicle industries are all following this subject very closely. A workshop was convened in October by government departments and the Canadian Petroleum Products Institute to discuss the opportunities and the costs associated with gasoline reformulation. This workshop involved the numerous parties which would be affected by the fuel changes, including the motor vehicle industry and environmental organizations.

To ensure proper consideration, therefore, of the complex technical and environmental health and economic issues involved in this whole question of fuels and contaminants, the established process is the one that we on this side feel should be encouraged.

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, I do not know where the member for Fredericton—York—Sunbury gets his information from, but it seems to me he is sadly unaware of the fact that MMT, which he discussed in his intervention, has been banned in the United States since 1978. Therefore, it is very unlikely it will ever be allowed again as he implied in his speech.

We have before us for discussion today a very reasonable and interesting proposal, namely a bill that would reduce automotive pollution. It is proposed by the member for Lambton—Middlesex. It is a bill that commands attention and respect. It will have three results if implemented. It would ban a substance that is detrimental to health, namely MMT, which is an additive to gasoline. It would reduce certain emissions that cause various forms of air pollution. Also, it would promote the use of a renewable source of energy called ethanol which is produced from corn and would add considerably to the agricultural economy.

The title of the proposal alone, namely an act to reduce automotive pollution, should be enough to generate positive supportive interventions on the part of backbenchers of all parties. Only a Conservative government would argue against it. This is what we have seen throughout the debate on this measure.

The last time we debated this bill on November 23, the government trotted its big artillery into the Chamber which revealed in the course of the discussion the weakness of the arguments.

Let me quote, for instance, the parliamentary secretary for national health and welfare, as reported at page 13764 of Hansard. She said:

> The elderly may be susceptible to brain damage from manganese but we lack the knowledge about both susceptibility and differences in metabolism in this particular group.

Manganese is what we are talking about when we mention MMT. The parliamentary secretary for national health and welfare seemed blissfully unaware of an Environmental Protection Agency decision which made a specific reference to manganese containing the substance MMT as follows:

> During EPA's consideration of the 1990 ethyl submission, EPA's office of research and development conducted a manganese inhalation risk assessment based on the available data which found that:
> —because of the considerable uncertainties and data gaps in the available information it is not possible to conclude definitely that the increased use of MMT as a fuel additive will (or will not) increase public health risk.

• (1740)

Obviously the Environmental Protection Agency did not rule out MMT as a risk to public health. This is a point which seems to have escaped the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Health and Welfare as well as the member for Fredericton—York—Sunbury.

Then on November 23 we had an intervention by an esteemed colleague whom I admire and respect, the member for Parry Sound—Muskoka. He said in his intervention that ethanol increases nitrous oxides. That is true, but ethanol blends reduce carbon monoxide and hydrocarbon emissions while an increase in nitrous oxides takes place. The over-all effect is a net reduction of ozone-forming acids. That is a point that has escaped the spokespeople on the government side.

The member for Parry Sound—Muskoka went on to quote the Ethyl Corporation. It is tantamount to putting the fox in charge of the chicken coop to start quoting the Ethyl Corporation on matters related to pollution.

There was an interesting quotation in the speech by the member for Parry Sound—Muskoka when he said:

> Our interventions to regulate fuel quality should only be where no other mechanism will achieve the desired result.

He invoked the idea that voluntary co-operative efforts of the fuel suppliers and motor vehicle manufacturers should take place. He remarked:

> Market based approach has proven effective and therefore the government will continue to support and facilitate these efforts.

When it came to acid rain the member for Parry Sound—Muskoka was a very active participant and promoter of government intervention. One wonders why the same approach should not apply when it comes to gasoline additives and automotive pollution.

The member for Parry Sound—Muskoka went on to say:

> The benefits of removing MMT should be addressed and development of a comprehensive strategy on fuel quality should take place.

After eight years in power it is outstanding that such a declaration should be made, having had five subsequent environment ministers and having had to invoke the necessity of a comprehensive strategy. Where is this strategy, one wonders?

Then we have the Parliamentary Secretary to the Prime Minister asking on November 23:

> Is it reasonable to pre-empt a comprehensive review of gasoline specifications and environmental impacts under way in Canada?

Which review is that? By whom? With whom? When? Where are the public consultations?

The Parliamentary Secretary to the Prime Minister went on to say:

> If MMT were not allowed, gasoline costs would increase likely leading to higher gas costs to consumers.

What about the lower gasoline cost in the United States where MMT is not used because it is banned? How do the Americans achieve that miracle of selling unleaded gasoline at lower cost than in Canada and not using MMT?

In essence, to sum up, government members in desperation are using studies by industry. The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Health and Welfare admits that the elderly may be susceptible to brain damage. The same parliamentary secretary admits that we have knowledge on manganese and health, but she prefers to shift the onus of proof that manganese is not dangerous to the health community rather than ask industry to prove that MMT is not dangerous. This is a rather absurd position for a parliamentary secretary for health and welfare to take. Instead he should insist that the onus of proof ought to be on industry, that industry should prove that manganese is not harmful to human health.

The member for Parry Sound—Muskoka admits that existing data on MMT are inconclusive. Unfortunately he embraces a double standard, as I mentioned earlier, government intervention on acid rain but not on MMT.

The Parliamentary Secretary to the Prime Minister reveals the existence of a comprehensive review of gas specifications taking place but without public consultations.

A very distressing picture is emerging in the debate on this very fine bill of the member for Lambton—Middlesex. We can congratulate him for having taken this initiative. It is good for the farmers. It is good for urban dwellers. It is good for the improvement of air quality and ought to be enthusiastically supported on all sides of the House.

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to speak on this bill today. I will cut my remarks short in order to allow other hon. members who want to speak on the bill the opportunity to speak.

I want to congratulate the member for Lambton—Middlesex on all his hard work and diligence in bringing this matter before the House.

The environment, renewable resources and a viable agricultural community are all extremely important concerns this House has looked at for some time. Ethanol, an environmentally sound product which we have in abundance, really relates to all three of those concerns. Ethanol is good for the environment. It is a renewable resource. It creates an additional market for Canadian agricultural products.

Throughout this debate we have heard government members telling the House that MMT is a safe, environmentally friendly product. They say that many health risks associated with MMT have been greatly exaggerated. For this reason they say they cannot support this bill because it would necessarily ban MMT as a fuel additive in gasoline.

The fact is that the government's position is so entrenched that it does not even test for emission standards. When it tests emission standards the gasoline that it tests does not even have MMT in it. A letter to the hon. member for Lambton—Middlesex from the Minister of the Environment dated December 10, 1992 stated:

> Thank you for your letter—Transport Canada's emission testing procedures—The methods it uses in confirmatory emission testing are based on U.S. Environmental Protection Agency certification testing procedures, which are accepted industry-wide, and require that a standardized test fuel be used. That fuel does not contain MMT.

The Minister of the Environment is telling Canadians that we do tests in this country on fuel that does not contain MMT, but everyone driving down the street has MMT in their fuel. This is scandalous. I would gladly put this letter into the record because I think the government has to address the issue seriously. It is a scandalous issue. In addition as spokespersons for the MMT industry, namely Ethyl Corporation, they cannot in good conscience support this bill. Make no mistake. The government has made its position very clear.

Contrary to what the hon. member for Calgary Southwest has said—and I have indicated to her that I would be speaking on her comments tonight; I realize she is not in the House—there are many health risks and effects at this particular point in time associated with MMT.

Certainly we are all aware of the neurological effects of the key ingredient manganese. Manganese poisoning can lead to learning disabilities and neurological damage. Ms. Ellen Silbergeld, Environmental Defence Fund, who has a Ph.D. from John Hopkins University, made a written submission to the EPA on July 20, 1990, two years ago.

• (1750)

She said:

> We know that manganese at high dose is a demonstrated human neurotoxin with persistent and irreversible pathological effects on brain structure and resulting severe impairments in movement and mental state. We do not know what the long-term chronic, low dose consequences of human exposure to manganese are. We do not know a "safe" level of manganese exposure, particularly for those subgroups that may be at increased risk for neurotoxicity (the young and the aged).

The Liberal Party and people on this side of the House have constantly supported the need for Canada to develop alternative fuels. It is good for rural Canada. I think it is good for all Canadians.

On many occasions we have called on the government to introduce legislation that would seriously support the use of ethanol and ban MMT. We have consistently called on the government to put a program in place for the development of ethanol blended fuels in Canada. All we have seen is government inaction which prompted my hon. colleague from Lambton—Middlesex to bring forward this bill.

Excise tax relief alone is not enough. The $12 million announced last month to encourage production and use of ethanol in Canada is really just a drop in the bucket. It means nothing. It will not help the corn producers in my area and will not help the corn producers in southwestern Ontario.

The ethanol industry does not need more research and development. It needs a serious commitment from this government on ethanol. It needs industry supply for this product and consumer demand for it, which could immediately be realized by banning MMT.

The government needs to take the initiative and then the ethanol plants will be built. That will help Canadian farmers, rural Canada, all Canadians and the Canadian environment.

[Translation]

Mr. Fernand Jourdenais (La Prairie): Mr. Speaker, we must ask ourselves what will be the impact of Bill C-226 on the fuel-producing industry.

Right now in Canada ethanol blended fuel production is around 18 million litres a year and comes mainly from two plants. The first one is owned by Mohawk Oil in Minnedosa, Manitoba and produces 10 million litres a year. The other located in Lanigan, Saskatchewan also produces 10 million litres a year. It is owned by Poundmaker Ethanol Limited. The Lanigan plant, which started production in July 1991, is the first ethanol plant linked to a cattle feedlot in order to take full advantage of co-products. If, by law, gasoline sold in Canada had to have a 3.2 per cent content of oxygen-containing compounds, we would have to produce 10 million litres of ethanol a day, that is close to 200 times our present capacity. In the short term, we probably would have to increase our ethanol blended fuel imports to fill the gap in production.

However, the possible shortage and the initial dependence on imports would be offset by an increase in ethanol production which would greatly help the farm industry. Many interest groups and segments of our society would benefit from ethanol production and its use as a transportation fuel. Suffice to mention the environmental sector, the agriculture and forest industries, as well as the various opportunities to diversify the economy and employment. That is why in early 1991 the federal government created the Interdepartmental

Committee on Ethanol with the mandate to develop an action plan aimed at promoting ethanol production and use in Canada.

What would be the impact of this bill on the refining industry? Right now Canadian refineries use an additive called MMT which increases by a point the octane rating of the gasoline they produce. Canada is one of the few countries in the world which prohibits the addition of lead in gasoline in order to meet fuel specifications. Allowing refineries to add MMT to their blends gives them a certain flexibility in their production. On the other hand, American refineries do not use MMT in their unleaded gasoline but mix it with their lead blends, which gives them great flexibility to raise their octane rating.

What would refineries do if all of a sudden, the use of MMT was banned?

In the short term, increasing the severity factor in the refining process would probably be the least costly solution for most refiners. Nevertheless, the additional costs have been estimated at $75 million a year, or about 0.2 cents per litre of gasoline. If the severity index were increased in the refining process, refineries would consume more fuel and produce more carbon dioxide, thus going against our efforts to solve the problem of global warming.

This decision would also slightly increase the amount of benzene and other aromatic compounds in gasoline, which in the long run might not help encourage the use of less polluting fuels. To offset the losses in processing and to meet their fuel requirements, the refineries would need 278,000 cubic metres more crude oil, which would force us to import more oil in years to come.

Nevertheless, this bill does not just seek to eliminate MMT. It would also impose the use of an oxygenated fuel as a component of gasoline. In the United States, the most widely used oxygenated fuels are ethanol and MTBE, an ether produced from methanol and butane. In most cases, MTBE is the cheaper of the two and American refiners use it even without a tax break.

To meet the oxygen content requirements of this bill, we would have to use more MTBE than present gasoline standards allow. If these standards were more flexible, refiners could use MTBE and remove MMT from gasoline without increasing the severity factor in oil refining, as I already explained. Nevertheless, as a result, gasoline production costs would rise by about $300 million a year, or 0.8 cents per litre.

If refiners used ethanol to comply with the oxygen content standards and could meet the demand, they could replace MMT without increasing the severity factor in the refining process. However, this solution would be even costlier than using MTBE, and even taking account of the decision made in the budget to abolish the excise tax on the alcohol portion of mixed fuels, the refineries' annual operating costs would increase by $600 million, or about 1.6 cents per litre of gasoline.

Who would pay these costs? The refineries. But given the difficult economic situation of that industry, I expect they will be under strong pressure to pass the bill on to gasoline buyers. Thus Canadian consumers would pay much of the extra cost.

Should consumers be glad to pay the cost of a product that will improve environmental quality? That depends on the balance between product cost and environmental benefits that the consumer can observe around them.

As people have said, we do not know very well how good it will be for the environment to remove MMT from gasoline and impose a very high oxygen content. In some cases, it might improve air quality locally, but in others, air quality might be worse. In fact, it all depends on what environmental problem is being dealt with.

That is one more reason to set gasoline specifications after a thorough technical examination. We must ensure that the proposed changes to the specifications will improve air quality in cities and not worsen it, and that this improvement will benefit consumers in return for the extra costs they will have to pay.

• (1800)

In short, by supporting Bill C-226 moved by my colleague on the other side, we must not encourage the setting of arbitrary specifications that would serve no other purpose than to impose the marketing of ethanol. Instead, we must continue to examine possible changes to various gas blends, as CGSB does, and carry on consultations with the provinces and the automobile and petroleum industries. Finally, we must also maintain the government's ongoing initiatives to stimulate production and use of ethanol.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The time provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired.

According to Standing Order 93, the item is dropped to the bottom of the order of precedence on the Order Paper.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 deemed to have been moved.

REFUGEES

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, in late May of this year Vigil, a Toronto-based refugee support group, announced that it would no longer make requests to the minister of immigration to admit refugees on humanitarian and compassionate grounds because, it said, the minister was systematically turning down every such request. This position announced by Vigil was supported by many other refugee support groups working in Canada.

The figures justify what Vigil had said. For example, in the period January 1, 1991 to April 22, 1992 only 23 of 3,485 cases were admitted on the basis of humanitarian and compassionate grounds. For the entire year of 1991, in Quebec only four out of 884 cases were admitted, and in Ontario only 16 out of 2,288 cases were admitted.

What I am talking about is a discretionary power given to the minister in the Immigration Act to admit refugees and other immigrants, especially refugees, who have gone through the process but for one reason or another, despite the merit of their case, it is turned down, either due to mistake, forgotten evidence, the fact that new evidence has come on after the case was heard, error, or whatever.

The power given to the minister to admit cases on humanitarian and compassionate grounds was the last resort given to refugees—I am talking about meritorious refugees, not phoney ones—to have their cases heard and to be granted admission to this country.

I am not talking about the humanitarian and compassionate review which is done at local levels throughout Canada after a refugee's case is turned down by the Immigration and Refugee Board. There is an automatic review at the local level of all cases turned down locally by the Immigration and Refugee Board. I am not talking about that.

In answer to my question on June 2, the minister said that 8,000 had been admitted in 1991. He is talking principally of those cases which are reviewed at the local level. I am talking about the direct appeals to the minister.

On June 2 I asked the minister why he was systematically turning down all these cases, why he was changing the policy under the former minister. That discretionary power had been used with good judgment. He gave me no answer.

During the debate on Bill C-86, the minister announced that he appointed Gordon Fairweather to recommend criteria for the use of that power. I welcomed that announcement, but I want to know today when Mr. Fairweather will report. When will we have these criteria in place and will the minister not use this power in the interim period and those cases that are flagrantly admissible? There are some cases where it is obvious the individual is a refugee but there has been an error. Would the government please at least—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. parliamentary secretary.

Mr. John A. MacDougall (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I have quite a long answer here but I will try to get part of it in on the record.

I would first like to place the question in context of noting that persons who have been refused have already been through a pre-inquiry on humanitarian and compassionate review, the most generous refugee determination process in the world with regard to acceptance rate.

We are interested in offering protection in Canada to those persons who are individually in need of protection. The primary criteria of this post-review was to take place after second level of CRDB refusal. It is to ensure that we do not remove persons who would become a "person of circumstance case" with respect to refugee review climates.

As surely good people, we must also consider that over one million people each year inquire about immigration into Canada through a normal process. These decisions are made on a case by case basis, taking into consideration all aspects of the case.

In addition, the government has undertaken as part of Bill C-86 to seek regulatory powers which will allow the creation of special programs on public policy on humanitarian consideration.

FUR INDUSTRY

Mrs. Ethel Blondin-Andrew (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, I am very happy to have the opportunity to once again address the issue of the fur industry and the sealing industry.

As you have probably noted in my request to appear again, I am not satisfied with the answers that I received during Question Period and I have asked for an adjournment debate.

I want to deal with the obstacles this industry is currently facing. The economic livelihood, of course, of the Inuit peoples and the people of Newfoundland is being seriously jeopardized by these rather callous and insensitive, mostly foreign financed animal rights campaigns which have unfairly targeted what is left of the sealing and fur industry in this country, an industry which is also sustainable and environmentally friendly and a cultural way of life.

I have asked the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development to make a commitment for the protection of the livelihood of these peoples by launching a counter ad campaign. I feel that would be very effective and would at least send a message out that the fur industry is not up for the abuse of foreign financed organizations which do not really care about the livelihoods of the people of Canada, the original peoples of Canada. I urge the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development to make that commitment.

In light of the finance minister's recent economic statement in which we can expect 10 per cent cuts in funding to a number of vital aboriginal programs, I want to stress the importance of this government continuing its commitment to organizations such as Indigenous Survival International and the Fur Industry Defence Program. These organizations provide a voice for the fur industry in this country and also struggle to provide that Canadian sealers and trappers have the tools they need to struggle for their economic survival.

Last Wednesday the Minister of Finance announced that this government's priority was to build confidence, enhance growth, create jobs and help Canadians take advantage of new opportunities. He also stated that: "Trade is Canada's life-blood".

After almost 400 years, Europe still takes 75 per cent of our wild fur production. The incomes of 100,000 Canadians depend upon access to that market. In 1995 the European Community law will try to end this remarkable trading record by placing severe restrictions on most wild fur exports. If this government is really committed to keeping the Canadian fur trade competitive, the Minister of the Environment together with the Minister for International Trade and Industry, Science and Technology must reaffirm that their departments each will provide the adequate funding needed to complete the trap standards and research work required to satisfy and meet 1995 European Community humane trap requirements.

In addition to this, the Minister of Finance, who says he is committed to helping Canadians take advantage of market opportunities, needs to assure the trappers and sealers in this country that the proper educational and new trap technology training programs and information must be made available. This government must not let three-quarters of our market slip away, never to be regained again.

It is time for this government to take action and make a firm commitment on this national and fast becoming international issue. Mr. Speaker, you and I are both advocates of the fur industry, as I know only too well. We both wear fur publicly and I encourage our leaders and our elected officials to do likewise.

I would also like to say I want to wish all those hard-toiling individuals out on the trapline a very merry Christmas.

Mr. Ross Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure for me to respond to my friend from Western Arctic, particularly in the presence of my friend from Timiskaming who has taken such a lead role in his work with the fur industry over a long period of time. The fur industry is, in fact, Canada's oldest industry. There has been a wild fur industry in this country for over 400 years. The reality is 95 per cent of the Canadian market is in Europe. If we want to continue to trade with Europe we must protect the interests of the constituents of my colleague opposite and from other parts of the Arctic. We must protect the trappers in northern Ontario and other parts of this country, as well as the people of Newfoundland and Labrador who depend so heavily on the seal industry.

• (1810)

We must recognize we have to have a realistic approach in response to the European legislation. Its demands have made it very difficult for our trappers. However the response of government, the fur industry and those who depend so heavily on it has been to sit down and work together. We must ensure we have the proper trapping methods available to all so we comply with European law, but we must also have the skills and tools my hon. colleague talked about available to us.

There has been an extensive amount of training provided to aboriginal peoples and there is a special emphasis on replacing any outmoded equipment. The co-ordination over the last five years has been provided by Indian Affairs and Northern Development. There is a renewed commitment by this government to ensure that program is in place for the next five years to protect those markets and ensure the people of this country who have depended so long and so heavily on the fur industry can do so in the future.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, I recently asked a question of the minister of external affairs dealing with David Spencer and Christine Lamont who are in prison in Brazil. The answers I received from both the minister and the Prime Minister have me concerned. They are indicating the request for expulsion would not be automatically granted. I agree with that, but they go further and say it has not been granted in modern times and is not the type of thing that could be utilized. Yet the evidence I have which the justice committee received indicates quite clearly the expulsion order would be expedited quickly and has been granted in the past. In fact, a Chilean was expelled from Brazil just within the year.

There are precedents for this particular remedy under Brazilian law. The Prime Minister, in an excellent response to my question went into great detail. But one thing he said which has me concerned is that Christine Lamont's illness was just a minor thing, a swelling in the legs. From the information we are given, that may well be the case, but in all likelihood something more serious is causing that particular problem. It ranges anywhere from tuberculosis to AIDS. Those are serious matters and I do not think the Prime Minister should simply just cast that away and say: "Well, it is not that serious. It is just a minor thing".

The third thing that really has me concerned is I spoke with the premier of the province of New Brunswick, Frank McKenna who said he had a meeting with the Prime Minister and the Prime Minister assured him he had already requested expulsion and was committed to that. However, when the Prime Minister responded to my question he said that no, that was not the case, that he never made the commitment to the premier. I do not want to get into a fight between the Prime Minister and the premier of New Brunswick, but there is a very wide difference between what the Prime Minister is saying and what the premier is saying. I think it is incumbent upon the Prime Minister to clarify his position and clarify just exactly what is going on with respect to the commitment he made to the premier of New Brunswick.

All in all when you translate it, according to the minister's own officials this matter can be dealt with very quickly on a state to state level. If a request came from Canada to Brazil, the minister of justice in Brazil promised to expedite the matter just as quickly as it could possibly be done. Many people in Canada and I feel this is an excellent opportunity to get two Canadians back to Canada. No matter whether they are guilty or innocent they have served three years in a Brazilian jail. If they were here in Canada they would probably be eligible for parole. If they were Brazilians they would be eligible for parole. Now we have an opportunity for Canada to intercede on their behalf and bring them back to Canada.

This is the step that we would like to see. For that reason the response of the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs is quite frankly unacceptable to the families and to a number of Canadians.

It is time that we looked out for these Canadians, as well as other Canadians who are in other jails and who are experiencing similar problems. We have a chance and an opportunity to act on their behalf and we ought to do so.

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I listened with care to my hon. friend from Moncton. As he correctly said the Prime Minister did give a very complete answer to this question yesterday. I do not think the Prime Minister would have committed himself to do something that he knew he could not do.

It cannot be assumed that if Canada were to ask for the expulsion of Christine Lamont and David Spencer it would be granted automatically. While the Brazilian president has the discretionary authority to grant expulsion, it has been emphasized to us that there is a clear distinction between the authority, as set out in the Brazilian constitution, and the practice by which that authority is exercised.

We have been told that in practice expulsion would not be granted while appeals are under way or before the convicted prisoner has served his or her sentence. We have also been told that the Brazilian government would not agree to expulsion in these circumstances because it would amount to unwarranted interference by the executive branch of government in the affairs of the judiciary and would discriminate against the other defendants who would not be released or expelled.

The case of the Chilean who was recently expelled from Brazil bears no resemblance to this case. There was no court procedure under way in Brazil in his case, nor was he even in custody. The Chilean authorities wanted him in order to provide information on individuals for whose disappearance during the Pinochet regime he is alleged to have been responsible. This is essentially an extradition case and was handled by expulsion because it is a more rapid procedure.

On many occasions the Secretary of State for External Affairs has expressed concern over the severity of the sentences received by Ms. Lamont and Mr. Spencer. These sentences and the convictions themselves are being appealed in the Brazilian courts. The Canadian embassy in Brasilia has been working actively to ensure that both the appeal of the convictions and the appeal of the sentences move forward as quickly as possible.

Unfortunately, the appeal of the sentences received a set-back on November 30 when the judge ruled that an essential document was missing from the appeal documents, but this ruling was immediately appealed by the lawyers representing Ms. Lamont and Mr. Spencer. The embassy will continue to do everything possible to ensure that the appeal process keeps moving expeditiously.

The embassy's efforts to hasten the ratification of the Transfer of Offenders Treaty between Canada and Brazil, which was signed last July 15, have also been achieving some success. The treaty was approved by the foreign relations committee of the Chamber of Deputies yesterday and we are told that it will be forwarded to the justice committee today.

Finally, I would like to reaffirm that the consulate general in Sao Paulo is doing everything possible to ensure the safety and welfare of Ms. Lamont and Mr. Spencer. Last week when the consulate general learned that Ms. Lamont was suffering from swelling of the ankles it immediately dispatched a Canadian doctor to examine her. After consultations with the prison doctor who had examined her previously and with Ms. Lamont's lawyers arrangements for blood tests at a private facility were made. The consulate general provided sterile syringes for the blood test. It will continue to monitor the situation closely and provide all possible assistance.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, last Friday I rose in the House to ask the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Agriculture a question with respect to the Crow benefit.

Western Canadian farmers are at a disadvantage in western Canada because they are hundreds of miles from port. In fact, in some cases they are over 1,000 miles from port and have to ship their grain long distances to those ports. The Crow benefit, and before it the Crow rate, has been instrumental in the grain transportation system as we know it in Canada.

Today, the grain transportation system accounts for tens of thousands of jobs and creates hundreds of millions of dollars for our Canadian economy. When the minister cut the Crow benefit it took $73 million directly out of the pockets of western Canadian producers and put in jeopardy the future of the whole Canadian grain transportation system. In fact, the loss of the Crow benefit will destroy this system unless alternatives are put in place.

• (1820)

The history of agriculture that this government has certainly does not show confidence in this government by the western Canadian producers because it has spent billions of dollars on agriculture in this country but the money has not been spent with any real objective in mind. We still have farmers losing their land, we still have problems in agriculture, we still have rural communities disappearing.

Taxpayers should be upset, farmers should be upset, rural communities should be upset at the waste of money that this government has spent on agriculture. What is even more disparaging is the fact that this money could have been spent much more wisely and with a much greater benefit.

The fact that this government is removing the Crow benefit causes me a lot of concern and causes farmers right across this country a lot of concern. Unless there is something to put in place of the Crow benefit there are going to be grain shipments south. They are going to be going through different ports and our transportation system as we know it is going to disappear.

Right now the St. Lawrence Seaway is in severe difficulty because it is not receiving the grain shipments that it feels it should and it is having financial difficulties. There have already been shipments of grain that have gone through the state of Washington as an experiment. Some of the grain companies are already talking in terms of moving grain south.

It is going to wreak havoc on the economy of western Canada if those procedures continue, if the Crow benefit continues to be reduced and if the Crow benefit disappears. The only reason grain is not moving south right now is the Crow benefit which provides a financial advantage for the farmers to move their grain on the Canadian lines. If the Crow benefit is gone, if the Crow benefit disappears, what we are then going to see progressively is more and more grain moving south.

Look at the subsidized Mississippi River route that the Americans employ. If somewhere down the road they change their attitude toward subsidies and if the cost goes up we may find ourselves in Canada unable to ship grain via the Canadian route simply because we have not taken into account these alternatives.

I would like to ask the government, at a time when it is reducing the Crow benefit, at a time when it is taking money out of the farmers' pockets, what alternative programs does it have in place? What is its plan? When it reduces the Crow benefit, when it loses the Crow benefit, what is it going to put in place to ensure that we have not only farm families in viable rural communities but a viable and healthy Canadian grain transportation system?

Mr. John A. MacDougall (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, in considering the impact on agriculture of the economic statement by the Minister of Finance, it is important to examine the whole package of measures.

In seeking the control of the over-all budget, the government is asking many groups to make sacrifices and adjustments. The government has exempted some groups and most important it has exempted the major safety net programs for farmers.

The safety net programs are the core measures through which governments and farmers together have organized to protect farmers against unfavourable markets or production uncertainties. The government recognizes that prices to farmers are among the lowest in history, but that is precisely why we have in place the Gross Revenue Insurance Program, the Net Income Stabilization Accounts, Crop Insurance and the National Tripartite Stabilization Programs. These programs are completely exempt from what the government is asking in other areas.

The over-all impact of reducing the WGTA subsidy by 10 per cent on the well-being of prairie grain producers will be small. At most, it would reduce operating margins by two per cent. What will be much more important will be world market developments and growing conditions in 1993. At the same time, it is estimated that net operating margins of beef and hog producers will increase by about one per cent.

The 10 per cent reduction in grants and contributions, including the reduction in the dairy program subsidy, while significant and meaningful, will not put individuals or subsectors at risk. The supply management system provides protection to the dairy sector that is more important and more valuable than a small reduction in the dairy subsidy.

The reintroduction of the 10 per cent investment tax credit for the balance of this year and for all of 1993 will provide significant benefits to farmers on the purchase of new machinery and equipment.

I would like to table the balance of this so that the hon. member can see that we are certainly working with the agricultural community.

ABORIGINAL HOUSING

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, last Friday, I asked a question of the minister of aboriginal affairs concerning aboriginal housing.

I note the parliamentary secretary in the House is a faithful attender in the aboriginal affairs committee so he will be aware of the extent of the problem relating to aboriginal housing which the committee has been studying over the last several months.

What prompted my question was that a few days ago the associate deputy minister made a statement in the public accounts committee that of the 70,000 units of aboriginal housing stock in the nation, 35,000 of those units were unliveable. I would like to quote the associate deputy: "Thirty-five thousand units at this stage of the game would be what I call adequate and suitable, liveable in other words".

That statement was so shocking that I decided to bring the issue to the attention of the House during Question Period. When you consider that 35,000 units or half of the existing aboriginal housing stock is unliveable, that there is a backlog of housing units according to the Auditor General of 10,000 to 11,000 units that need to be built and that, when you add in the Bill C-31 requirements for people newly reinstated as aboriginal people under that bill, they require an additional 13,000 units.

The requirement for aboriginal housing stock is 59,000 units. The government is doing virtually nothing to deal with this backlog. The Auditor General's cost estimates, if they are extrapolated to the whole problem, would indicate that the total cost of eliminating the backlog of aboriginal housing would be $2.1 billion, or half the cost of the government's attack helicopter program. I want to emphasize that that cost is just to deal with the backlog.

My reason for asking the question was to point out that in the financial statement of the Minister of Finance, he did not include aboriginal housing as one of the job creation programs. Rather he included transportation infrastructure and transportation megaprojects.

I want to draw the attention of the House to the fact that if aboriginal housing could be included under the minister's financial statement, it would have created jobs in aboriginal communities where those jobs are desperately needed. It would have created new housing which would have reduced the problems related to overcrowding such as drug abuse, sex abuse, family violence and all of those things that were pointed out by witnesses in our committee were problems with aboriginal housing.

It would have created needed employment in those aboriginal communities because building housing is the most job intensive way of investing capital that a government can do. I hope that the parliamentary secretary will have a positive response as compared to the one given to me by the member for Lincoln when she misled the House by her answer last Friday. I am looking forward to that answer.

Mr. Ross Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure for me to be able to respond on behalf of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

My colleague from Comox—Alberni makes reference to the Standing Committee on Aboriginal Affairs and the work it is doing on a study of aboriginal housing.

A number of the concerns that we are all aware of and some of the ones that he has alluded to are addressed in that report, not the least of which is that there is not enough money. That is clear. Not enough money is something that unfortunately faces all governments in this country, and it comes down to the ability of the government and therefore the society to respond to the need.

Clearly, as the report will point out, there are a number of needs other than just money, not the least of which is the way we deliver the programming and the best way that aboriginal people and aboriginal communities can take advantage of the housing.

One of the problems at this point is that to spend money in housing does not in fact provide the local benefit that we would like to see and we think possible. However, I think it is important to recognize that DIAND's responsibility for housing on reserve has led to a commitment that has increased by 34 per cent in the last five years, from $102.7 million to $137.8 million. This fiscal year alone, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development has budgeted $300 million in direct contributions to First Nations governments. He will also provide about $127 million in guarantees for on reserve housing and CMHC will invest $100 million this year in on reserve housing as well.

Ninety-one per cent of the housing on reserve has brought adequate water service. Seventy per cent of the current housing stock on reserve has been constructed or renovated in the last 10 years.

As we have discussed and we agree, there was much to be done. One of the things that the department has undertaken is a major study of the housing need itself. There has been a broad consultation with First Nations. The government has spent about $2.5 million on that consultation and held over 250 meetings with a variety of First Nations and their representatives.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Pursuant to Standing Order 38(5), the motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow morning at 10 o'clock a.m. pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

The House adjourned at 6.31 p.m.

PRIVILEGE

MEMBER FOR LOTBINIÈRE

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

The news last night and this morning indicated that the hon. member for Lotbinière has been convicted of misuse of funds of the House of Commons. Members of the House obviously have refrained from making any comments until the final resolution had taken place.

We have learned of the conviction and now the House must decide. Normally the member would have resigned and maybe that has already taken place. Perhaps I could seek some information from the government side.

It is the tradition of this House always to discipline its members in addition to the discipline meted out by the courts.

Mr. Speaker, I would ask that you give some guidance regarding the consideration of taking action on this case. If there is a particular course of action to be taken I would be prepared of course to move the appropriate motion.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Privy Council and Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the member for Kamloops and I have roughly an equivalent formation in the law and he would know as I do that this is a matter which may still be before the courts.

He made reference to the wisdom of the House in letting court processes be carried through to their conclusion. It would seem to me, Mr. Speaker, for your guidance, that was a prudent course at the time. In the circumstances, it remains a prudent course.

It would be well for all of us to respect the difference between the political functions that occur here which always require some restraint and the functions of the courts.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, my colleague and friend from the New Democratic Party has made an intervention. I wish the record to show that in the adjudication announced by the courts the sentencing will not take place until the new year.

There may be appeals. There could be questions of law which would thereafter be examined in a higher court. Mr. Speaker, I am not attempting to advise you on all the aspects of law, but I do not believe at this time it would be the most appropriate thing to do in view of what the courts have before them.

I would suggest that you give careful consideration to the interventions made by the Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs and me.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I want to make it clear to my hon. friends this was not intended to mean that we should act in haste.

This was the first opportunity we have had since learning the news. I felt that we should at least seek some clarification as to what the course may be.

Having heard these interventions in terms of the recognition of the right of appeal, we await some advice from you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Kamloops has raised a matter which of course is of importance to this House. The right hon. minister has responded on the government side and the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond on behalf of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition.

The matter raised is the announcement of the conviction of a member of Parliament for certain offences.

There is a convention which I expect would be followed. It is that the court will inform the Chair officially of what has transpired. I do not anticipate receiving that this morning or maybe not even for some days.

The other matter referred to is the question of an appeal. I am not in a position, nor I suppose are hon. colleagues, to know whether an appeal would be taken. I think we should look carefully at that.

Again, we do not know what is likely to transpire at the sentencing or what arguments may be used by the defence at that time, all of which would affect whatever action this place might ultimately take.

• (1010)

We had a matter like this some years ago. Hon. members will remember that I took the matter under advisement to consider my position and to consider what was appropriate under the circumstances. As it turned out, the matter was resolved without the necessity of the Chair having to make any ruling at all.

However, the hon. member for Kamloops has, as he said, brought this matter to the attention of the House at the first possible opportunity. If I understood him correctly, he is not suggesting that the House should take any sudden action today, but when it is appropriate under all the circumstances.

I will take the application of the hon. member under advisement. As soon as I am in a position to advise the House further I shall do so.

THE CONSTITUTION

NEW BRUNSWICK CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT PROPOSAL

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration) moved:

WHEREAS section 43 of the Constitution Act, 1982 provides that an amendment to the Constitution of Canada may be made by proclamation issued by the Governor General under the Great Seal of Canada where so authorized by resolutions of the Senate and House of Commons and of the legislative assembly of each province to which the amendment applies;

NOW THEREFORE the House of Commons resolves that an amendment to the Constitution of Canada be authorized to be made by proclamation issued by His Excellency the Governor General under the Great Seal of Canada in accordance with the schedule hereto.

SCHEDULE

AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION OF CANADA

1. The Constitution Act, 1982 is amended by adding thereto, immediately after section 16 thereof, the following section:

"16.1 (1) The English linguistic community and the French linguistic community in New Brunswick have equality of status and equal rights and privileges, including the right to distinct educational institutions and such distinct cultural institutions as are necessary for the preservation and promotion of those communities.

(2) The role of the legislature and government of New Brunswick to preserve and promote the status, rights and privileges referred to in subsection (1) is affirmed."

2. This amendment may be cited as the Constitution Amendment, year of proclamation (New Brunswick).

He said: Madame Speaker, in the parliamentary life of any politician, there are moments that have special significance and remain engraved on our hearts for a long time. Today is one of those moments.

From the time of our earliest forebears and during the relentless efforts of past generations to carve out a place in this difficult landscape, to create a safe home for their language and culture, our country—which is more than a mere territory—has been a crucible in which was forged a historic reconciliation of two languages and cultures.

[English]

We are witnesses today to the culmination of a long historical development which is also the beginning of a new journey for the English and French linguistic communities of New Brunswick and indeed of Canada. Today is one of those history-making moments for New Brunswick's two official language communities.

The constitutional resolution we are proposing to pass today will entrench in Canada's Constitution the main provisions of an act recognizing the two official linguistic communities in New Brunswick.

This constitutional amendment recognizes the principle of equal status, equal rights and equal privileges for these two language communities. In particular, it recognizes the right to the separate educational and cultural institutions that are necessary for their protection and promotion.

It also reaffirms the role of New Brunswick's legislature and government to protect and promote the status, rights and privileges of these language communities.

The constitutional amendment proposed by the New Brunswick legislative assembly is the fruit of a number of years of constant effort by governments and the people of this province.

[Translation]

It is the direct consequence of the enactment of the act recognizing the two official linguistic communities in New Brunswick, better know as Bill 88 or the Equality Act, which was passed under the Hatfield government in July 1981.

Bill 88 is much more than a mere legal provision. For New Brunswick's Acadian community, Bill 88 was intended to respond to the legitimate aspirations of Acadian men and women as expressed at the Convention d'orientation nationale des Acadiens, held in 1979 in Edmundston, the principal town in my riding.

I participated in that convention, and the spirit that inspired it bore witness to the courage and determination to equip the Acadian community with the tools it needed for its cultural, linguistic and economic development. Important steps had already been taken at that time.

Former Premier Robichaud, now a senator, had embarked on major reforms, particularly the Official Languages Act and the equal opportunities for all programs. Under the leadership of his successor, Premier Hatfield, and his minister, Jean Maurice Simard, also a senator now, several further reforms were implemented, such as duality in the Department of Education, community centres, schools and so forth.

[English]

In the same vein as its predecessors who were the pioneers, Premier McKenna's government supported these reforms and committed itself, with the leaders of the Progressive Conservative and the New Democratic opposition parties to entrenching this recognition of equality in the Canadian Constitution. This was attempted in amendments to the Meech Lake accord of June 9, 1990 and in the Charlottetown agreement.

It should be made clear that at no time during this period and these negotiations did the province of New Brunswick, the provincial governments or the federal government waiver from the purpose of entrenching these principles.

[Translation]

I wish to refer especially to the efforts and indefatigable support of the Prime Minister, without whom passage of the resolution today would be far from certain. All official language minorities can count on the Prime Minister as a staunch friend, and I want to thank him personnaly on behalf of all New Brunswickers for his constant support and leadership on this issue.

[English]

For New Brunswick's anglophone community Bill 88 and the entrenchment of its main provisions in Canada's Constitution means a number of things.

First, it confirms almost inalienably the road that the two communities have taken together for many years now, the progress they have made together and the future they want to build together as partners, not opponents.

It testifies to an irreversible social maturity that wants to develop a common existence and pass on to future generations of New Brunswickers their desire to continue this social and economic experiment.

This resolution enables anglophone communities which are in a minority situation in some areas to take control of their own cultural and linguistic development in the field of education and other government services.

• (1020)

In a community like Madawaska—Victoria, my riding, the main town, Edmonston, a small community of 12,000 people, has a population of only 4 per cent of anglophones. Because of the spirit in New Brunswick and because of that duality, these people have separate school boards in my home town, district 33. Therefore, this constitutional measure testifies to New Brunswick's generous and creative vision of Canada's future.

[Translation]

This province is a microcosm of the Canadian federal reality. On our home ground, by working devotedly, making compromises and above all respecting the reality of others, we have succeeded in creating a climate of understanding that is conducive to fruitful and satisfactory linguistic arrangements.

As you know, the constitutional amendment we are debating today had a proper place in the Charlottetown agreement. When the referendum was held, more than 60 per cent of my compatriots voted in favour of the constitutional agreement laid before them.

In other words, not only did they support the constitutional amendment that particularly affected them, but they were still sufficiently generous to accept the other compromises that would have put us on the road to greater national solidarity and consequently greater prosperity.

However that may be, the possibility of such a bilateral constitutional resolution is provided for in section 43 of the Constitution Act, 1982.

[English]

New Brunswick has always been a haven for our two linguistic communities. Many Acadian men and women found refuge there after the deportation in 1755. It was there that the Loyalists, fleeing the United States, established a home following the Treaty of Paris in 1783.

Today this tradition of hospitality to strangers is still very strong among us. New citizens come from all over the world with the goal of building here, with us, a bright future for themselves and their descendants.

[Translation]

This constitutional amendment will strengthen this social fabric and give it a permanent foundation. It is also a splendid and significant step forward for the men and women in New Brunswick involved in a continuing search for harmony based on self-confidence and openness to others.

[English]

I fervently hope that this example of respect for differences, of tolerance toward cultural diversity and of receptiveness to others spreads throughout Canada. Despite the difficulties that have sometimes marred the development of our national identity, the truth is that we have more things in common to celebrate than we have differences to define.

[Translation]

A historic moment such as we are experiencing today, at the beginning of this holiday season when we celebrate men and women of good will, can only strengthen us in our sincere desire to extend the productive lessons of New Brunswick's experience to Canada.

[English]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, I am very proud to get up today in this House to support the motion. It is not every day that I agree with the Minister of Employment and Immigration, but I am delighted to get up today to support his motion.

[Translation]

As you all know, becoming the member for Beauséjour was probably one of the finest moments of my political career.

[English]

To get up today and to speak on this motion gives me great pleasure. The minister referred to an historic moment and it is, indeed, a big one.

It is Canada at its best. This is the generosity, the tolerance, the diversity that has made this country what it is. This is what we are enshrining in the Constitution for New Brunswick.

[Translation]

Going around that riding in the past two years, I realized that a third of my constituents were English-speaking and two-thirds were French-speaking. They all live together, but they have their own schools. They share a common life but are separate at the same time.

[English]

When you are in Sackville, Dorchester, Cape Tormentine, Port Elgin, you have people who came from the United States to Canada. They were Loyalists who wanted to remain part of what they believed in. In those days it was the British Empire. They did not want to join the American revolution.

[Translation]

Then you go to the other side, to Cap-Pelé, Shediac, Buctouche and you see these French speaking people, these Acadians, who were deported and came back, but who kept the French language and culture in absolutely incredible conditions. They are proud of their Frenchness, they are proud of speaking French and very proud of being New Brunswickers; nothing will stop them from remaining French speaking. They are very proud to be Canadian.

If that spirit prevailed in the country from coast to coast, I think it would be the best example that Canada could give to the whole world. When we see the problems in the world today, where people kill one another because of cultural or language differences and you go to New Brunswick or to my riding, the smallest English speaking communities have their school commission, the French speaking community has its school commissions and they live and work together for the economic progress of that community; this is Canada at its best.

Today, as I speak in this House as the member for Beauséjour, I am pleased to support this motion, because in the history of New Brunswick and especially of the French community in New Brunswick, they have taken their destiny in hand, with this unfailing perseverance and determination.

The minister talked about Senator Robichaud, who decided to shake New Brunswick's cage, so to speak, by proposing to make the two language communities equal. Later Richard Hatfield took up the torch and today Premier Frank McKenna is continuing to advance the cause.

[English]

For me it is a great day. It is an example that we can be together and at the same time be different in Canada. I have my colleagues with me. The member for Moncton and the other members live that by the day. They are all elected, every one of them, by francophones and anglophones. They manage to keep them happy.

That is the way I would like this country to work. It is not the Charlottetown accord or anything else. This is a commitment of these two communities that was done a long time ago. When we amended the Constitution in 1982, we made provisions so that some amendments could be made to the Constitution in a bilateral way between the provincial and the federal governments.

That is exactly why it is there. There are some elements in the Constitution that affect only one province. It will not be unique to New Brunswick. For example, in Newfoundland they have the duality of the school system based on religion. This does not exist in other provinces. The same thing exists in Quebec. It is not the case in Ontario and other provinces. We need to have that flexibility in the Constitution. It is being used for a very noble purpose today.

• (1030)

In conclusion, I would like to say that it is a great example of understanding, generosity, tolerance and diversity.

[Translation]

Since I will unfortunately not be a candidate in the riding of Beauséjour at the next election, I am happy to take the opportunity given me today to support the government's proposal and ensure that the Canadian Constitution will fully protect New Brunswick's French speaking community. This is a great day. I am pleased to support this motion and I take the opportunity to thank the people of Beauséjour who have been so generous to me and my wife these last two years during which I represented them.

[English]

All these places, Cape Tormentine, Sackville, Dorchester, Memramcook up to Richibucto, are the best of Canada.

Therefore, it is with great pleasure that I support this motion.

I move, seconded by the hon. member for Acadie—Bathurst:

That the question be now put.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Madam Speaker, I too wish to say a few words on behalf of my party in support of the motion before the House today to amend the Constitution of Canada.

It is really a very rare day indeed in this country when we actually amend the Constitution of Canada. We have spent many hours and many years talking about constitutional reform, but today we are actually amending the Constitution and making this country a better place not just for the people in New Brunswick, but a better place for all of us regardless of where we live.

I am very proud, on behalf of my party, to say that we support the amendment of the Constitution to enshrine in our constitutional law the equality of the linguistic communities of the anglophones and francophones in the province of New Brunswick.

I do that for two reasons. First of all, the process here is the right process and, second, because of the substance of what we are doing today in terms of New Brunswick. In terms of process, this amendment has come through a long and very open process in the province of New Brunswick.

I can remember years ago speaking with New Brunswick people about the process in that province toward the fight for linguistic equality of the two communities. Away back in July 1981 the New Brunswick legislature passed a law guaranteeing the equality of the two official language communities in that province. In 1982, in the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, we had section 16 that guarantees the equality of the French and English languages in the province of New Brunswick, making it the only officially bilingual province in this country.

We can go on to 1989 and 1992 when two legislative committees in New Brunswick recommended further constitutional change after extensive public hearings in the province of New Brunswick.

[Translation]

This process has been going on for many years. Right here in this House, the language situation in the province of New Brunswick has already been studied.

I very well remember Mr. McKenna two years ago during the Meech Lake crisis. We also had a committee, chaired by the Minister of the Environment and the same proposal was in the Charest report. In June 1990, we also had a resolution in this House to change the Canadian Constitution for New Brunswick. The motion was already before the House then, but unfortunately it was not presented to the members.

I also remember the Beaudoin–Dobbie report very well. It was supported by every political party in Canada. We also supported the proposal on New Brunswick in the Beaudoin–Dobbie report. Later, we had the Charlottetown accord. Despite the result of the referendum on that accord, the Charlottetown proposal received very strong support in New Brunswick, both from anglophones and from francophones. If I remember correctly, over 60 per cent of the people in New Brunswick supported the Charlottetown agreement. Again, the New Brunswick proposal was included in this agreement, Madam Speaker. It was supported by the people, by the provincial government members and by the members from the three major parties represented in this House.

On Friday, December 4, the resolution was introduced and adopted by the New Brunswick Legislative Assembly in Fredericton. It was supported by the McKenna Liberal Party, by the Conservative Party as well as by the hon. member and leader of the other party at the Legislative Assembly, Elizabeth Weir.

I would like to say a few words about Mr. Hatfield. He was the premier of that province for many years and he fought hard for linguistic equality in New Brunswick. He has accomplished many positive things for the Acadians as well as for the other people of the province.

I can also remember another former premier, Mr. Robichaud, a Liberal premier, who has done exactly the same thing for New Brunswick. The other party has always been quite small in that province, but nonetheless present, as exemplified by Elizabeth Weir last week, at the Legislative Assembly.

[English]

For all kinds of reasons of process what we are doing today is the right thing. This has been studied by people in New Brunswick, by committees in that province and by federal committees for the last number of years. It has been before the House previously. It was part of the companion resolution of Mr. McKenna back in 1990. It was part of the Charest report and part of the Beaudoin–Dobbie report. It was supported by all political parties as the right and proper thing to do.

Last Friday the legislature passed it, supported by the three national parties in the province of New Brunswick. They have now asked the federal Parliament, the Senate and the House of Commons, to pass the resolution as required under section 43 of our Constitution Act to make this an amendment to the Constitution of Canada.

The process has been open, consultative and supported by the people and the legislature of the province of New Brunswick. Of course the resolution applies only to the province of New Brunswick.

The second point I would like to make on why we should be supporting this today is its substance. It is right and just to make sure we have equality between the two linguistic communities in that province. It is an act of generosity, an act of tolerance, an act that reflects our history that we have in this country as a whole two linguistic communities.

New Brunswick is really a microcosm of Canada. One-third of New Brunswickers are francophones and about two-thirds are anglophones. In order for the community to survive and thrive, the equality of those two communities should be enshrined in our Constitution. Our party has always supported minority language rights, openness, generosity and tolerance when it comes to the two languages in this country. I am very proud to be supporting this amendment to the Constitution of Canada on behalf of our party.

I want to conclude by briefly making a couple of more points. The first is that we are doing this in the proper way. In 1981 we had about four or five ways agreed upon at that time on how to amend our Constitution. One way was through unanimous consent for about five different items. The major way was with the support of two-thirds of the provinces, with 50 per cent of the population residing in the province and with the support of Parliament. That was the bulk of the amendments to our Constitution. That was the bulk of Charlottetown.

The third way was a bilateral way where the amendment affects one or more provinces but not all provinces. It had to be passed by the legislatures of those provinces and by the Parliament of Canada, under section 43 of the Constitution of Canada. It is interesting that section 43(b) also refers directly to language issues. It states: "Any amendment to any provision that relates to the use of the English or French language within a province".

What we are doing here is precisely what is called for in terms of the Constitution of Canada as patriated by then Prime Minister Pierre Elliott Trudeau.

• (1040)

That leads me to my last two points. There is a concern by some people that maybe what we are doing here is introducing something new called collective rights. I just want to say that line of thinking is absolutely wrong. We already have in our Constitution many times references to collective rights of people, linguistic rights in terms of the French language and English language all across this country. We have in section 16 of the Constitution the listing of those rights. We also have in section 23 guarantees for official language minorities. Be they English in Quebec for education or the francophones outside Quebec for education, those are collective rights. They are already in the Constitution of Canada.

In addition to linguistic rights and educational rights, we have rights for the aboriginal people that are already part of the Constitution of this country. In addition to that we have rights in Canada for people who come from many different multicultural and multiracial backgrounds. I suppose we could even say that under section 36 we have certain economic obligations of the federal government to provide equalization and regional development plans to help poor provinces, and again that helps collectivities in the poorer parts of the country.

Any challenge to what we are doing today is a very shallow challenge. It reflects people who go back to the 19th century and think the only rights that are important are individual rights. That is a very reactionary thing of the past and something we should be turning down as Canadians. This is a very positive, progressive amendment to the Constitution. It is in sync with what we have done before. It is an extension of what we have done before.

The last point I want to make before I sit down is that I do sometimes worry about the future of this country. I want to say at this time I know that the minister himself worries about the future of this country. The Minister Responsible for the Constitutional Affairs has done many months of very fine work in trying to build a national consensus. It is not just the minister; indeed many people in this House and many of the provincial political leaders across the country have worked hard. That consensus did not achieve fruition. We saw the results of the October 26 referendum.

Despite that, despite the fact that I sometimes worry about the future of this country, I think that within Canada and all regions of this country there is a great feeling that we must keep this country together. There is a great feeling that we must find ways of reforming our institutions, making this institution more meaningful, binding our country together and expressing that tolerance and that generosity to keep the country together as we move on to the 21st century.

I am optimistic about the future of Canada. I think this country is going to work. The gesture of today is a very concrete step in making this country better not only for the Acadian minority, not only for New Brunswick, but for all Canadians regardless of where we may live.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Before moving on I should officially put to the House the motion moved by the Leader of the Opposition a bit earlier. Mr. Chrétien, seconded by Mr. Young (Acadie—Bathurst), moved:

That the question be now put.

[Translation]

Mr. Douglas Young (Acadie—Bathurst): Madam Speaker, it is with great emotion and pride that I participate in this historic debate on a motion authorizing an amendment to the Constitution Act of 1982 in order to enshrine: (1) that the English linguistic community and the French linguistic community in New Brunswick have equality of status and equal rights and privileges, including the right to distinct educational institutions and such distinct cultural institutions as are necessary for the preservation and promotion fo those communities; (2) that the role of the legislature and government of New Brunswick to preserve and promote the status, rights and privileges referred to above is affirmed.

The two official language communities of New Brunswick have shown great understanding and generosity, and it is this spirit of liberality and magnanimity that allows us today to enshrine in our Constitution this principle of equality which is so important for our people's harmonious development.

For the Acadian community in my province, the recognition of these rights is the result of a very long struggle. A century ago, the Acadian people gave themselves a few emblems to rally around such as a flag, an anthem and a national day. From these symbolic actions emerged a defensive nationalism, whose first priority is to preserve their language, culture and religion. Eventually they established ways to develop their economy, such as the Acadian co-operative movement, to ensure that the survivors of Grand-Pré would continue to survive.

Rapid progress was made when Louis Robichaud was elected as the first Acadian premier of New Brunswick in 1960. The University of Moncton was founded in 1963 and the Official Languages Act was proclaimed in 1969.

The equal opportunities program launched by Mr. Robichaud in the sixties has been essential to Acadians achieving recognition of the equal status they now enjoy with their English speaking neighbours.

Two figures who followed in the footsteps of Mr. Robichaud also deserve our recognition and gratitude, and I am referring to the late Richard Hatfield, who became premier in 1970, and the present premier, the Hon. Frank McKenna, who on Friday, December 4, led the legislature of my province in passing a resolution that recognizes the equal status of both official language communities of New Brunswick.

I want to thank my colleagues in the New Brunswick legislature whose co-operation made it possible for us to take part in this important event in Acadian history and in the history of New Brunswick and Canada. The support shown for Premier McKenna's resolution by the leader of the Conservative Party of New Brunswick, Dennis Cochrane, and by the members of his caucus, and the support of the leader of the New Democratic Party, Ms. Elizabeth Weir, is tangible proof that friendship and understanding between two official language communities are possible in this country.

I want to thank the Government of Canada, led by Prime Minister and seconded by the hon. member for Madawaska—Victoria and Minister of Employment and Immigration for what they did today.

It is a great privilege to witness this historic day with the Leader of the Opposition who sponsored the enshrinement in the Constitution of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms and who represents a large number of Acadians as the member for Beauséjour in my province. A coincidence, I would say, that proves that luck is always on the side of those who persevere.

On this day, as we witness the end of a long struggle for harmony and the enhancement of both official language communities of New Brunswick, it is also appropriate to mention the many people who worked so hard, often without public recognition, that we might experience this historic moment.

I am thinking of Father Clément Cormier, Martin Légère, Raymond Gionet, Dr. Marcel Sormany, Dr. Alexandre Savoie, Antonine Maillet, Hédard Robichaud, Blanche Bourgeois, the nuns who worked with such dedication in Acadia, Gilbert Finn, Marie-Esther Robichaud, Michel Doucet, Michel Bastarache and many others who worked without respite for equal status for New Brunswick's Acadians.

Madam Speaker, need I add that these pioneers and passionate defenders of the cause acted in the best Acadian tradition by avoiding confrontation and fruitless debate, preferring instead the route of dialogue and compromise.

[English]

The English speaking majority in New Brunswick is made up of Canadians whose origins can be traced to many lands: Ireland, Scotland, India, England, Germany, Italy, Pakistan, the United States. The list is very long.

I want to say today to my colleagues in this place that what makes so many of them so very special is that they share a tradition of generosity of spirit and a commitment to fairness and equity that makes me extremely proud to be a New Brunswicker.

[Translation]

This day will remain engraved forever in the collective memory of Acadians as the conclusion of one of the longest battles ever fought by a Canadian minority, determined to contribute in a positive way to the development of its province and its country.

This is a solemn moment, and all those who helped write this chapter in our history deserve our admiration, gratitude and respect. In concluding, I want to say this is a great day for Acadia, and I hope that the example set by New Brunswick's two official language minorities will be followed by others across Canada.

Christmas has come early this year for Acadians, and speaking on behalf of my colleagues—the hon. member for Restigouche—Chaleur, the hon. member for Moncton, the hon. member for Miramichi—and all New Brunswickers, I can assure you we are very grateful.

• (1050)

Mr. Gilles Rocheleau (Hull—Aylmer): Madam Speaker, first of all, I would like to point out the big effort of the members from New Brunswick in this House who agreed to table and sponsor this motion today. As members of the Bloc Quebecois, we are extremely pleased to endorse this motion. However, I would like to make some comments.

We did not have a chance to examine it more closely and I wonder whether the Meech Lake accord would pass as quickly if it came back to the House today. The Meech Lake accord let Quebec return to the Canadian Constitution upright and not on its knees. I wonder if the other Canadian provinces would have the courage New Brunswick has in recognizing duality and the founding peoples. I take Ontario for example. It is making slow progress, but should follow New Brunswick's example. Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and the other provinces should imitate Quebec, for all purposes. But no, that was not done. Furthermore, it was confirmed in the massive rejection of the Charlottetown accord throughout Canada. Not only Quebec voted against the Charlottetown accord, but many other provinces of Canada, like British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba and Nova Scotia; the Toronto region voted yes, but when the outlying regions are included, 50 per cent of Ontarians voted against the Charlottetown accord.

We will support this motion because the Bloc Quebecois would not want to prevent Canada from developing as Canadians want. At the same time, we are showing this House again today that Quebec is being prevented from developing as it wants.

Just a few weeks ago, when the House returned, the minister who tabled this motion, supported by the Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs, told us, in answer to a request from the Bloc Quebecois to transfer occupational training to Quebec, that the Government of Quebec's requests could not be granted because the people had voted against the Charlottetown accord. Today these same ministers are tabling this motion and asking the House to agree to pass it on first, second and third reading in the same day, which we will do.

In conclusion, I say that this country, Canada, divided as it might be, is never divided because of Quebec. We in Quebec want the rest of Canada to develop as Canadians want, as long as they let Quebec develop as the people of Quebec want and agree to that.

[English]

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

Madam Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

Madam Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

Madam Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

[Translation]

Madam Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 45(6), the recorded division stands deferred until 6 p.m. on Monday, February 1, 1993.

Mr. Plamondon: Madam Speaker, on a point of order. We are prepared to give our consent. If there is unanimous consent, we are prepared to vote immediately, since all three parties are in favour.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): If the hon. member wants to reconsider his objection, we are willing to have the question put again, and we are in favour of having a vote immediately.

[English]

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is that agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

[Translation]

Mr. Rocheleau: Madam Speaker, we wanted a vote in the House, but we are willing to have the vote held immediately. If a vote is held, we in the Bloc Quebecois will vote in favour.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Unfortunately, when he requested a vote at this time, the hon. member overlooked the fact that unless there is unanimous consent, the House never proceeds with a vote on Fridays. The division is always deferred, unless there is unanimous consent.

[English]

Mr. Dingwall: Madam Speaker, when the Chair read the motion that the question be now put, to my colleagues who are in favour of the motion, it simply means that we will have an opportunity to vote on the question which is before us.

I am happy to see that my colleague who has spoken on behalf of the Bloc Quebecois is in agreement with that.

If the Chair were to ask if the motion could go forward, I think it would find a disposition in the House for that unless there were five members who would then stand up and oppose that particular motion. If those members would understand, we could proceed with the vote which I think all members would like to have forthwith.

Mr. Nowlan: Madam Speaker, the situation we are in is that the Chair has already called the vote. Five members have stood to put the vote, and the Chair stated that according to the rules of Friday it would be deferred.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Madam Speaker, it always requires some interpretation of the rules of the House.

My understanding, based upon what I have seen here, is that five members rose, two of whom may not have clearly understood all of the consequences of their rising at that time. As I understood the interventions that were made by the Bloc Quebecois members of the House, it was an indication to the Chair that they would like to have reconsidered the vote that they had cast which had caused this matter not to proceed.

If there are only three members opposed, then the matter can proceed. If there are five, it cannot. My understanding is that the Bloc members wanted to proceed and therefore the only opposition would come from the Independents and the Reform members. I would ask the Chair to put that question again since there has been a clear indication that there had been some voting without a full understanding of the consequences.

• (1100)

Madam Deputy Speaker: We are now at eleven o'clock and the House should proceed to Statements Pursuant to S. O. 31.

I understand what the hon. minister is saying and what other members have also suggested. However I will need unanimous consent to come back. What I suggest is that not only the Chair but each and every member takes it under advisement until after Question Period when, if unanimous consent is given, I would be delighted to put the question again.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Al Johnson (Calgary North): Madam Speaker, yesterday was Human Rights Day and I was therefore pleased that the Minister of Justice tabled legislation to amend the Human Rights Act and that this discussion is now in the public domain.

I was most disappointed, however, that the legislation failed to explicitly define what constituted a family relationship. I am also disappointed that it did not state categorically that spousal benefits were exclusively available to heterosexual families.

I am also troubled that the legislation merely added sexual discrimination to the long list of personal attributes which we do not discriminate against rather than state quite plainly that we do not discriminate against people based on their personal attributes, whatever those attributes may be.

In short, the legislation lacks definition where it needs it and it has too much definition where it does not. I call upon the Minister of Justice to review these amendments to ensure that they do two things. First, they effectively protect all Canadians from discrimination and, second, they strengthen, define and support Canadian families whose existence is the very foundation of our country and the basis for its continued existence.

HOCKEY CANADA

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Madam Speaker, Hockey Canada has been involved in international hockey for 20 years. NHL players donate their services.

I have asked several ministers repeatedly for the complete books and records of Hockey Canada: revenues, expenses, tax receipts, sponsorships, rink board advertising, et cetera.

The U.S. government through the FBI has been gathering this information on Hockey Canada for three years. Why is the Government of Canada not interested in satisfying the NHL players who were involved in these tournaments and who want to see the records?

I believe taking three years to react on the Hockey Canada file is too long.

QUEEN ELIZABETH II

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Madam Speaker, on behalf of myself, my family, members of this House and the people of Canada I wish to convey to our sovereign, Queen Elizabeth II, the Queen of Canada, our warmest best wishes for the holiday season and above all for a most happy, healthy and peaceful 1993.

The past year, the 40th year of the Queen's reign, has been an exceedingly trying and stressful one for her, but through it all she has continued to personify and to demonstrate the finest qualities of the human spirit, qualities which are best demonstrated at times of adversity.

As each of us has our own personal problems and difficulties, times of trouble bring us together. It is at times like this that we can truly appreciate what the Queen symbolizes to us and how exceedingly well she fulfils her role and her responsibilities.

Our thoughts and our prayers are with her. God save the Queen.

FISHERIES

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Madam Speaker, the emergency response program of the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, announced a couple of weeks ago, was certainly a step in the right direction. It will ease the financial situation for many people, but it excludes some people who really ought to have been included.

For example, seven fishermen at Lord's Cove will not qualify despite their long attachment with the fishery running from 12 years to as much as 46 years. At Rose Blanche, long-time fishermen do not qualify. At Red Harbour, Burnt Islands, Point May, many communities, many fishermen in my riding, many plant workers are also unfairly left out.

There is no argument that the program does what it sets out to do. It eases the pain. I applaud the minister for that, but he must now realize that some people who ought to have been included have unfairly been falling through the cracks.

I invite the minister—

Madam Deputy Speaker: I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

PEACEKEEPING

Mr. Larry Schneider (Regina—Wascana): Madam Speaker, last night the Prime Minister, in an address to Harvard University, indicated that Canada had 1 per cent of the world's population and yet provided 10 per cent of the world's peacekeeping efforts. I support Canada's role in peacekeeping for in many ways keeping peace abroad is similar to keeping peace in our own country.

However many constituents are concerned with our level of involvement. This comes at a time when our debt seems to be in a critical situation thereby stifling our ability to deal with many of our own problems.

Canadians are unaware of the participation of other countries in what should be a shared role. Many of my constituents are asking Canada to reconsider the extent of our involvement in international peacekeeping and be guided by the principle that charity begins at home.

RURAL DIGNITY

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Madam Speaker, next Monday marks the sixth anniversary of the founding of Rural Dignity.

In the last six years its members have fought tirelessly on behalf of rural Canada. Rural Dignity has helped to draw attention to the issues affecting rural Canada. Whether it has been the closure of rural post offices, the loss of VIA Rail services or cuts to health care in rural areas, Rural Dignity has been there. Equally important has been Rural Dignity's ability to make people aware of the seriousness of the problems facing rural Canada.

Today most Canadians and even some politicians realize that if we do not act soon many of our rural communities will not survive. Increasingly people in rural communities across Canada have made it clear that they are not going to let their communities be shut down without a fight.

Today the people of St. Clément, Quebec, are occupying their post office to prevent Canada Post from shutting it down. In my own constituency of Moose Jaw—Lake Centre the people of Shamrock are working to force Canada Post to respect the wishes of the community and keep the post office open.

The renewed determination of Canadians in rural areas who fight for the survival of rural Canada is due in no small part to the work of Rural Dignity.

NUCLEAR POWER

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Madam Speaker, ever since coming to Ottawa I have pressed the case for nuclear development in New Brunswick because of two equally compelling considerations.

First, the existing Point Lepreau nuclear reactor is rated as one of the best operating units in the entire world and New Brunswick's nuclear management capability is highly regarded as the right environment for carrying out the construction of the Candu III prototype.

Second, the future potential for modular construction and sale of Candu III units world-wide offers New Brunswick an unprecedented economic horizon that would be difficult to match in any other way.

Unfortunately the provincial government in New Brunswick has apparently not been satisfied during negotiations that acceptable costs and guarantee provisions have been forthcoming and has been unwilling to consummate an agreement with AECL and the federal government.

Without question, in my view, New Brunswick is now on the verge of missing a compelling opportunity. I call on my colleagues in both the federal and provincial governments to make extraordinary efforts to salvage these nuclear power negotiations between them.

INDIGENOUS PEOPLE

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Madam Speaker, yesterday was International Human Rights Day. It draws attention to an issue which has become fundamental to world peace.

As well, yesterday at the United Nations General Assembly our minister in charge of development assistance presented the commemorative resolution marking recognition of 1993 as the International Year of Indigenous Peoples.

Citizens of the world know—certainly the Government of Canada must know—that Canada will be known internationally by its actions, not its rhetoric.

CIDA's current development assistance decisions in Colombia are one current example of government wrong-headed human rights and indigenous policy. A recent successful CUSO linked project benefiting indigenous people in Colombia has just been denied third phase funding on the basis of budget cuts. The project risks failure from midstream abandonment by CIDA.

On the other hand, with no consultation with thousands of indigenous peoples in the Choco rain forest area of Colombia, CIDA is involved in supporting development of a megaproject which will destroy the indigenous peoples' lifestyle and habitat.

The Canadian government must improve its indigenous—

MINORITY RIGHTS

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Madam Speaker, I note after long awaited consideration from Quebec that Bill 178 may be changed. After four years of keeping our English speaking face from being seen on streets and signs, Bill 101 will be reviewed.

Social justice and fair play were always on the minds of the Quebec people. I am glad the politicians plan to listen and act, respecting anglophones as part of Quebec's rich heritage and in the interest of an open and democratic society.

Let there be respect for the bilingual contract of Canada, the spirit of choice. Let anglophone schools enrol immigrant students from English speaking countries in their excellent bilingual immersion programs. Let municipalities continue to reflect their bicultural history. Let tourism reflect our two great cultures on our roads and in our resorts.

I call not for a softening but for a repeal of Bill 178 and for significant revisions to Bill 101, not as a gesture of goodwill but a statement that Canada's respect for minority rights and minority language rights has not been extinguished under Bill 178. For like the hanoukka lamp of old, the festival of—

YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT

Mr. Bill Attewell (Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville): Madam Speaker, I was speaking to Bryan Cousineau, York Regional Police Chief yesterday. He said that changes to the Young Offenders Act, specifically with respect to age limits, is a priority. He explained that youths of 16 and 17 years who commit crimes know exactly what they are doing and should be punished more severely. Right now these young people commit dangerous crimes, armed with weapons, and they walk away with incredibly lenient sentences.

The federal government must introduce changes to the Young Offenders Act so that these young people will be tried in adult court and will be dealt some harsh penalties for their criminal activities.

We need to support our police officers and make sure we are doing everything we can to help them do their jobs more effectively.

INTERNATIONAL CRIMINAL COURT

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, last April I urged the Canadian government to support at the United Nations sixth committee a proposal for an international criminal court.

I said at the time that it was an idea whose time had come. I am pleased to report to the House today that the government has indeed actively supported such a court. I would like to congratulate the minister of external affairs.

Last week, some 130 experts in this field, including 12 parliamentarians from all across the world, members of Parliamentarians for Global Action, attended the UN sponsored conference in Siracusa, Italy.

That conference urged as a first step to such an international criminal court the establishment by the UN or the CSCE in Europe of an ad hoc tribunal to try allegations of genocide and war crimes in Yugoslavia.

Last night the Prime Minister urged the UN to be more than just peacekeepers but to become peacemakers in Yugoslavia. I urge his government to promote this new proposal actively as a first step to bringing—

TRADE

Mr. A. H. Harry Brightwell (Perth—Wellington—Waterloo): Madam Speaker, we are presently discussing the North American free trade agreement and its effect on Canadian trade and its workers.

I want to discuss trade that is already occurring. This week a firm in my riding announced the contract for the sale of prefabricated homes to Mexico. This contract will in its entirety create employment for some 340 Canadian people over 30 months. It will use existing industrial space and does not require new technology.

What it does require is recognition of the emerging purchasing power of Mexico, recognition of the material that must be used and the ingenuity to design a structure that can be packaged and shipped to Mexico at a competitive price.

In this case Festival Developments Group Limited has done all of these. The startling size of this contract makes it special. The total sale of 27,500 units will create a $179 million export to Mexico with opportunities to expand it.

Canadian skill and Canadian ingenuity can compete in Mexico and around the world.

LANGUAGE EQUALITY IN NEW BRUNSWICK

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur): Madam Speaker, we New Brunswickers are very proud of the support for the motion on language equality in New Brunswick.

I listened with interest to what my leader, the Minister of Employment and Immigration and my colleague from Acadie—Bathurst said and I fully agree with them.

[English]

The population in my riding is comprised of both French and English people who have been living together in harmony since the time of settlement.

Today's motion simply recognizes something that these people have known for hundreds of years, that both linguistic communities are equal.

The support for this motion is a message and a challenge to the rest of Canada. I urge Canada to unite in a lasting way and accept the challenge. Such unity would be a model throughout the world.

I am proud to have had an opportunity to participate and support this motion.

CHEMAINUS

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Madam Speaker, this fall I attended the 10th anniversary of the Chemainus' Festival of Murals. Chemainus notes with amusement Welland's attempt to claim the title Mural City of Canada. While I congratulate Welland on the attempt, I feel I must point out a few facts.

Chemainus is recognized internationally as the Mural Capital of the World. The town and its citizens combine history, culture and the arts to save what could have become a ghost town.

Chemainus, like so many small communities, was a single industry town dependent on forestry. When the economy slowed and the industry began to change, Chemainus suffered.

This was a town that would not die. Instead, through the inspiration of Karl Schultz and others and the hard work of many, Chemainus was born again. Now, after 10 years, 32 murals and thousands of visitors, Chemainus is known as the little town that did.

Its Festival of Murals Society has gone on to help other communities start mural projects of their own in Steubenville, Ohio; Bowenshire, Queensland, Australia; and Welland, the mural capital of Ontario.

ROUGE RIVER VALLEY

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Madam Speaker, four and a half years ago the Minister of the Environment committed to support the establishment of a park to preserve the Rouge River Valley lands in Scarborough.

The government at that time pledged $10 million to the park initiative. Since then the provincial government has decided to establish the park and a multipartite advisory committee has recommended that the land base of the park be 20,000 acres in Scarborough and Markham.

This park proposal will create Canada's largest urban parkland to protect the natural environment and wildlife including 55 species of fish, 200 species of birds, 28 species of mammals, 700 species of plants, wetlands and forests.

The provincial government will make a critical decision next week on the future of the park proposal. We ask the government to renew its commitment to the Rouge Valley, participate in the planning and management of the park and commit surplus federal lands in the area to land swaps to build the necessary park land base.

CHILDREN

Mrs. Dorothy Dobbie (Winnipeg South): Madam Speaker, one year ago Canada said its children are important by ratifying the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child. Since ratification this government has taken concrete steps to honour its commitment to children and their families.

In May 1992 Canada introduced its action plan for children and announced the child development initiative, a group of long-term programs to address the conditions of risk that threaten the well-being and development of one Canadian child in five.

In addition, the new child tax benefit to begin in January 1993 represents an increase of $2.1 billion in federal government support for children and families over the next five years.

Children are our most precious resource. These initiatives demonstrate the Government of Canada's resolve in meeting its obligation to children and their families.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

SENATE APPOINTMENTS

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, since it is the last sitting day, I would like to wish you and everybody in the House of Commons a very Merry Christmas and happy holidays.

My question is for the Acting Prime Minister. We read in the press that Senator Lowell Murray, the Leader of the Government in the Senate, confirmed yesterday that the Prime Minister is about to make ten Senate appointments. He said: "We want to be more at ease to pass controversial legislation like Bill C-91 and NAFTA".

Everybody remembers that in 1984, the right hon. member for Vancouver Quadra, when he was Prime Minister, made some appointments in the fifth year of his mandate. At that time, the present Prime Minister said that the Prime Minister had an option and it was not normal to do something like that in the fifth year of the mandate.

I ask the Acting Prime Minister why it would be moral in 1992 to do something like that when it was absolutely immoral according to the Prime Minister in 1984. Why would the Prime Minister do today that which he used as an instrument to win the election in 1984?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. Leader of the Opposition knows, many of the appointments having to do with the contents of the referendum were held in abeyance until such time as the decision on the referendum was held. Therefore, there is a backlog of appointments in a number of areas.

The hon. Leader of the Opposition knows the outcome of the referendum which involved very substantial changes to the structure and the composition of the Senate. Of course, with that having been rejected by the people of Canada, the institutional structures of the House of Commons and the Senate remain the same.

There is not only an obligation but also a responsibility for the Prime Minister to fulfil his duties commensurate with the Constitution and the traditions of the past.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, that is exactly my point. Now we are in the fifth year of the mandate and that was the big argument made by the Prime Minister in 1984. I do not question the legality or the constitutionality. I am talking about the morality of doing such a thing.

• (1120)

The Prime Minister was so offended in 1984 and a lot of people claim that is what made the difference in the election. I want to know from the Acting Prime Minister what makes it moral in 1992 when it was absolutely immoral in 1984?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, there is quite a difference between filling the Senate on the eve of an election versus an election that may be held anywhere from six to ten months down the road.

If we want to talk about democratic morality we could not get a better example than the Leader of the Opposition going into a constituency and hand-picking his favourite candidate to represent the Liberal Party in the next election. That is quite an example of political morality.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): I had the backing of 90 per cent of the members who were delegates.

[Translation]

I shall return to this question.

In 1984, the government was in the third or fourth month of its fifth year. Today this government is in its fifth year and it is getting ready to do exactly what they reproached the government for in 1984.

Will the Acting Prime Minister inform the Prime Minister that Canadians do not want this kind of abuse of power by a government that has absolutely no legitimacy now?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, it is quite interesting to note the hon. member is now backtracking on a spirited defence of his former leader which he took back in 1984.

Let me just assure the hon. Leader of the Opposition. He says he has the backing of 90 per cent of his members. The Prime Minister has the backing of 100 per cent of his members.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

An hon. member: And they are all going down with him too.

EMPLOYMENT

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

All the excuses in the world will not cover up the fact that the Prime Minister and this government are desperately clinging to power in the fifth year of a mandate.

Canada has the highest unemployment rate in the industrialized world. We have more jobless Canadians at this point than at any other time in our 125-year history. Food banks are bursting at the seams.

If the Conservative government has done such a great job on the economy why is the jobless situation so absolutely heartbreaking?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, it is interesting that the hon. member is on this kick of bad-mouthing Canada when the United Nations says we are the best country in the world in which to live.

The hon. member talks about the high level of unemployment and yes, it is too high. We are taking steps to bring it down. I also remind the hon. member that there are 12,252,000 Canadians who are working and there are 1.8 million self-employed Canadians. That too is a record.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Madam Speaker, I am not bad-mouthing Canada. I believe in Canada. I think a new government could give Canada a chance again.

[Translation]

We know that more than a million children are lining up for food and clothing over the Christmas period. We know that unemployed Canadians are being treated savagely by this government.

If your government's policies are so good, why are you not ready to go to the people directly to find out if you have their support in an election?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, she will not have to worry. She will have a chance to go to the people.

We had the same invitations going into the 1988 election. Many members opposite were sorry they badgered us to call the election because when the dust settled they ended up over there and we ended up over here.

Certainly there are difficulties. The impact of the economic slowdown has had an effect on all Canadians.

I remind the hon. member that federal spending on social programs which really address some of the difficult programs that he referred to has increased. Spending by the federal government between the period 1984-85 and 1991-92 increased from $44.6 billion to $66.8 billion. That was an increase of 5.9 per cent, and that was per year, when program spending was averaging at a growth rate of about 4 per cent on an annual basis.

In terms of the incidence of low income, 1984 to 1990, the 1984 figures had a percentage of 18.1 per cent. In 1990 it was down to 14.6 per cent. It went up a little bit in 1991 to 16 per cent, reflecting again the economic slowdown, but conditions are better today than they were in 1984 when we assumed office.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, this morning young homeless Canadians are forced to live in tents out in front of the Parliament Buildings in the middle of a snowstorm. Some members find humorous the fact that homeless people exist in this country. I know people find this very, very funny. As young children line up at food banks which is their source of food today, 1992 will be remembered as the worst year in government performance since 1981 when the Liberals were on that side of the House.

Remember then there were a million people unemployed and now it is 1.6 million people. There were huge debts and now we have larger debts facing this country.

Will the Minister of Finance admit that the old ways have proven to be a complete disaster? Will he use the next six weeks to rethink his policies and come back with a new initiative to get people back working again?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Well, Madam Speaker, the hon. member wants government to bury its head in the sand and ignore the realities of the North American and world economic situation. We are going through a period of economic downturn because there is a global slowdown.

As a matter of fact, we are projecting a growth rate of 2.5 per cent for 1993. The combined growth rate anticipated for the European Economic Community is 1 per cent. The world growth rate is at 1 per cent. Canada has been affected by that.

We are taking steps as outlined in the economic statement last week to invest in people, business and infrastructure and to encourage more trade. We are a trading country. Naturally our performance in trade is very important. We are investing in productivity enhancement, but most important we are investing in skills upgrading and retraining.

That is the focus, because the focus of the changing economy compels us to adapt to those changes and that is precisely what we are doing.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, the Minister of Finance can use all the figures he wants. The reality is that unemployment in Canada is remaining at unprecedented rates. The predictions are that it is not going to change for the next couple of years.

As a matter of fact, the manufacturing index this morning indicates that Canadian manufacturers are losing market share domestically as well as on world markets at a higher rate than most other industrialized countries. The situation is worsening.

As he and the Prime Minister and their colleagues do a lot of walking in the snow during the next six weeks contemplating their employment futures, they should give some consideration to the plight of the unemployed in this country.

Will he consider the tens of thousands, yea millions, of people concerned about the future in terms of their own employment and change his policies?

If he refuses to do that, will he do the right thing and urge the Prime Minister to call an election so we can change this government and get a government in that will actually change course and put people back to work?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I can only take it that the hon. member is suggesting we follow the same kind of policies as the New Democratic Party is following in the province of Ontario. That is an anti-business attitude which has driven business out of this country into the United States and has disrupted orderly growth and orderly transition. That is not the course of action we intend to follow.

THE SENATE

Hon. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs. It is about jobs, namely the 10 vacancies in the Senate.

During the referendum campaign the Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs, the Prime Minister, most people of this House and indeed the people of this country found the present unelected Senate to be absolutely unacceptable in a modern democracy.

In light of that, and I know the Prime Minister has the constitutional right to appoint senators—I do not want that for an answer—I wonder if the minister would suggest to the Prime Minister that there be a moratorium on the appointment of all senators until either we reform the other place, the Senate, or if we cannot reform the Senate, then abolish it; in other words, no more senators until it is reformed or abolished.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Privy Council and Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Madam Speaker, I think that such a recommendation would be quite inappropriate. We had proposals for change. They were considered. They were extensive. They were rejected. We must now make do with the Senate that is in place.

We cannot allow the referendum result which stopped one attempt at reform to also stop the business of Canada, which could be the result if we simply allowed the atrophy of one of the two institutions established by the Constitution of Canada as being part of the Parliament of Canada.

I am sure the hon. member understands that. I know he was a believer in whole-hearted reform. I am sure he would not associate himself with people like Preston Manning who are suggesting that after they had defeated a proposal for whole-hearted reform, we should go forward with some kind of half-hearted, partial reform.

THE HOMELESS

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

Only a few steps from Parliament Hill in my riding of Ottawa Centre, homeless and jobless people are living on Wellington Street in a makeshift tent.

Why was there nothing in the recent budget to help these homeless young people and others in cities across Canada so that they may have a dignified shelter over their heads?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows very well that the federal government puts in in excess of $2 billion on an annual basis toward housing in Canada. It is a very, very large commitment and it has been growing over the years.

I do not know what the hon. member has in mind specifically, but here again, the best way to enhance confidence and optimism is to create the opportunities for job creation. We took a number of steps and announced a number of initiatives in the statement on Wednesday which will help small business and which will help individuals train and adjust to the changing environment. It constitutes a massive program of complementing the changes that are already taking place and being advanced by the private sector.

What we are proposing here is a partnership regime between the two levels of government, the private sector and the workers of Canada to deal with this very important challenge that can be turned into enormous opportunities for our country.

POVERTY

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Madam Speaker, if this government's policies are so great, how come in Montreal 18,000 children need food baskets this Christmas, while in Quebec City another 4,000 are going to need those baskets and in my own riding of Mount Royal, 540 people will go to the Multi-caf food bank for their Hanukkah and Christmas baskets, now without meat and now without milk. They have had to put in powdered milk because they cannot afford real milk. That is a total shame.

What are this government's economic policies going to do to answer the needs of these families? Is this the way we have to live in the province of Quebec to feed our families?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I say to the hon. member that the federal government is transferring in excess of $39 billion annually to the provinces in the form of cash transfers and tax points. That is a lot of money. Those transfers are not going down. They are going up.

What we are doing as well, as we outlined in the economic plan last week, is taking a number of steps to bolster growth, to encourage confidence, to create jobs and to generate economic activity. Rather than zeroing in on the negatives, I ask the hon. member to look at the positive elements in that package and look at the response that it has been receiving from the business community which is responding in a very favourable manner. It will, I am sure, deliver the jobs that we have projected.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Madam Speaker, I will put a question to the Minister of Finance.

As he probably knows, in Winnipeg this year, right now, close to one out of every four children live in poverty. We have had a 500 per cent increase in welfare cases, and we have the highest unemployment rate for young people in the entire country.

Yet this week his colleague the minister of western diversification had the nerve to spend public dollars to begin a series of ads trying to camouflage the fact that this government has frozen transfer payments to the province of Manitoba for the past two years.

I want to ask the Minister of Finance: As a minister who preaches the virtue of frugality, will he ask his colleague to either pay for those ads out of his own pocket or out of the bulging Tory coffers from those $500 a plate dinners and use the public money to alleviate poverty, suffering and unemployment in the province of Manitoba?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I take it that the hon. member is taking exception to the very generous contributions that the federal government provides to the province of Manitoba.

If he is opposed to it, tell us what elements he wants cut back.

[Translation]

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

This year, 1.2 million Quebecers will spend Christmas in poverty. Could the minister tell us how he will give hope to these 1.2 million poor Quebecers? Will he once and for all attack the problem of unemployment and create jobs, instead of attacking the unemployed who are victims of his bad economic policies?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, like all hon. members in this House, we are concerned about unemployment and poverty. I could tell the hon. member, who voted against Bill C-91 yesterday, that it is a way to create high quality jobs and thus reduce unemployment.

Instead of voting for this positive measure, the hon. member just repeated the nonsense that his party spewed out during the whole debate on a similar bill in 1987. That bill passed and has yielded concrete results for the Montreal region.

NATIONAIR

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport.

Today's report in both The Ottawa Citizen and Montreal's The Gazette has an uncanny resemblance to Justice Moshansky's report on events leading up to the Dryden crash. In short, like the Dryden crash, the Nationair crash in Jeddah was an accident waiting to happen.

Will the Minister of Transport agree to do the following: One, release the Jeddah report today; and two, invite Justice Moshansky to come back into the aviation field and do an inquiry into the affairs of Nationair and the Jeddah accident.

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, we will release the Jeddah report as soon as we receive it and have a chance to examine it.

The Jeddah inquiry was under the auspices of the local governments, with participation by the National Transportation Safety Board of Canada. We will deal with this report when it comes to us.

I think the hon. member has to accept the fact that after Mr. Justice Moshansky tabled his report, the next day when appearing on television and radio programs and in interviews with the media, he reiterated that the aviation system in Canada is one of the safest in the world.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Madam Speaker, the minister did not respond to my request for an inquiry, a request that has been communicated to me today by both CUPE, the union that represented the flight attendants who were killed on the crash, and by two parents of those flight attendants.

I want to go back to the minister in a slightly different way. There has been a question about the relationship between Transport Canada and Nationair. The chief of air carrier operations for region 7, an individual who was part of the pre-Jeddah audit of Nationair, who also wrote the glowing report on Nationair's safety during the lockout situation, has been seconded this fall by Transport Canada to work for Nationair as part of an executive exchange program for up to three years.

• (1140)

In light of this, I would ask the minister once again, will he not only launch an inquiry into the safety aspects of Nationair, in particular the Jeddah crash, but will he also conduct an inquiry into the relationship between Nationair and Transport Canada?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, as soon as Nationair started experiencing problems with its employees and there were reports about the Nationair safety system not being adequate, we had put into place a regular inspection system to ensure that safety was in fact maintained in conformity with the Transport Canada standards. All the reports received not just from one inspector but from all the inspectors assigned to this case were to the effect that the company did meet Transport Canada requirements. There were no reports of Nationair not meeting Transport Canada requirements.

Regarding the employee in question, the hon. member said he was taking part in on ongoing exchange program between government and the private sector. This employee, who is experienced in transportation, will go and work for Nationair, and a Nationair employee could come and work for the government of Canada. As far as I know, the department looked into all aspects dealing with conflict of interest and there was no conflict of interest in this case.

CYPRUS

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, I would like to pose my question to the Minister of National Defence.

The United Nations Security Council passed a resolution to bring about peace in Cyprus. Talks between President Vasilious, representing the Greek Cypriot side, and Mr. Denktash, representing the Turkish Cypriot side, have been going on all summer and have been suspended because of the presidential election coming up in Cyprus in February. These talks will resume in March.

Does the minister not think that our peacekeeping troops should be left in Cyprus at least until a just and viable solution is found, since it is around the corner, or at least until the United Nations can find peacekeepers from other countries to replace the Canadian peacekeeping forces?

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister Responsible for Status of Women): Madam Speaker, perhaps I can advise the hon. member that on behalf of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, I will be making a statement immediately following Question Period with respect to the government's policy on Cyprus. I can assure my hon. colleague that it will be consistent with the recent report of the Secretary General of the UN.

CYPRUS

Mme Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister.

After a presence of over twenty years in Cyprus, the Canadian government gives just a few months' notice before withdrawing our troops. Why abandon at this time a policy that has maintained peace since 1964 without even debating it in this House?

[English]

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister Responsible for Status of Women): Madam Speaker, as I have already indicated, I will be making a statement in the House with respect to the government's decision on this important matter and there will be an opportunity for the parties to respond at that time.

REFUGEES

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, my question is for the minister of immigration. This week a distraught government-sponsored refugee couple came to my office. As the minister knows, the Husseins have been awaiting the arrival of their child for six months because Canadian officials in Turkey were not able to complete the rather simple paperwork. On December 6 they received news that their child took sick and died the same day. Given that the department was fully aware of this case because of numerous inquiries and urgent requests on behalf of this couple, will the minister initiate today a full and complete investigation into this tragedy and commit himself to reporting back to the House?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, first let me thank the member for giving me notice of his question.

This issue was first brought to my attention this morning. On a personal note, I can certainly empathize with any family that has lost a child. I have given directions in my department to provide me with information as to what has happened in this case. I can assure the hon. member that as soon as I find out I will apprise him of the results of those findings.

What is important here and what this points to is the importance of our refugee determination system proceeding in a more efficient and faster way. That is behind many of the amendments I proposed to the Immigration Act.

It is of little comfort to a family that is going through a tragedy like this, but the purpose of these amendments is to change the situation in order to avoid tragedies such as this.

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister. The minister is quite right that this sort of tragedy has to be avoided at all costs. I would remind the minister that his department and his office were contacted several times in the last six months and he should, as part of the investigation, ensure that this does not happen again.

There is a similar case of another family that came on the same plane and is in London, Ontario awaiting the arrival of their child. I would like to ask the minister to look into the case of the Taher family and to make sure that they do not suffer the same tragedy as the Hussein family.

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, absolutely. I want the hon. member to know that the member for London East is working on that case. Again this morning this was brought to my attention and I have personally asked my officials to provide me with a report of this situation.

If the hon. member or any hon. member in the House has suggestions of how we can improve the system in order to have a more expeditious dealing with those cases, I am open to suggestions.

TELECOMMUNICATIONS

Mr. Al Johnson (Calgary North): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Communications. During the recent referendum the Reform Party of Canada distributed letters and pamphlets which urged Canadians to call a 1-900 line to support their campaign. What it conveniently failed to mention was that there would be an automatic charge on the caller's phone bill. Many people thought this was a toll free line. Now they find they have to pay the bill which may total millions of dollars.

I challenge the Reform Party to tell Canadians the full cost of this scam.

What is the minister going to do to stop this sort of shameful abuse of legitimate services offered by our telephone companies?

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of Communications): Madam Speaker, the regulations of the CRTC are quite clear in terms of ensuring that consumers are informed about potential charges.

For example, the general tariff for Bell Canada specifies that each sponsor's advertisements, publications or other communications containing a 900 service number shall also contain an appropriate statement outlining the charges that a caller will incur for each call to that number.

The CRTC does this in order to protect consumers. If any Canadian has a concern where they believe that a service has not followed this regulation, they have the right to launch a complaint with the CRTC.

JUSTICE

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Madam Speaker, two months ago Dawn Shaw, a six year old girl was raped and murdered in a school playground in Comox, B.C.

The RCMP has done everything in its power, without much success, to identify the murderer. One of the things hampering the police investigation is the fact that rapists do not leave fingerprints but they do leave body fluids and other tissue which contains DNA material.

Will the Minister of Justice consider changes to criminal law to permit DNA samples to be taken in addition to fingerprints and photographs when people are charged with sexual assault in order to facilitate the identification of sex offenders through DNA matching?

• (1150)

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for what is a very good question.

As that member and the House may know, DNA typing is a relatively new technology. It is expensive but it seems to be very effective.

The Criminal Code at present places limits on what the police can do in obtaining evidence of crime. The courts have taken some decisions with respect to what is appropriate interference. I have asked my officials to look further into the matter of how DNA testing can be regulated and how it can be made available for the best use of this kind of situation.

I thank the member for his question.

HOCKEY CANADA

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport.

The minister will know that today in Florida, governors of the National Hockey League are discussing the future of the league, while in Canada the hockey tradition, whether it be professional or amateur, goes on.

However, many serious questions have been raised recently about the financial dealings of the non-profit federal agency Hockey Canada and certain individuals.

I ask the minister responsible if the government will provide to this House a full financial disclosure other than the annual one-line item expenses and income reports for Hockey Canada since Hockey Canada has been incorporated?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Madam Speaker, I will take that question on behalf of my colleague, the Solicitor General, who has indicated that this matter is currently being investigated by the RCMP. The Government of Canada will offer no further information until the RCMP has concluded its investigation.

Mr. Bob Kilger (Stormont—Dundas): Madam Speaker, I welcome the Minister of Justice telling the House that the RCMP has an ongoing and I would hope an independent operation and not simply an operation in conjunction with the FBI.

I would like to ask the minister why the government has hidden the RCMP's involvement for so long in this matter?

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Minister of State (Youth) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, I think my hon. colleague would know that the RCMP does not necessarily advertise the investigations it is undertaking.

AIRLINE INDUSTRY

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport.

Given that the mandate for the U.S. negotiators in the bilateral air services treaty expires on January 20 when the new administration takes office, I would like to ask the minister what instructions he has given to the Canadian negotiator in view of this timetable and in view of the current crisis in the Canadian airline industry?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, the negotiations are proceeding in a satisfactory manner. If it is not concluded before the new administration takes power in the United States, we do not doubt that it may renew the mandate of the present negotiators or it may appoint new negotiators and the negotiations would then continue on a normal basis.

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Madam Speaker, I am becoming increasingly concerned with the government's failure to take really meaningful action in the face of the crisis in the Canadian airline industry.

We need some answers to some questions and I hope the minister will give some today. In particular, has the government initiated a meeting between the government and the two major carriers as provided in the terms of the loan agreement to Canadian Airlines? When will the government announce the details of its plans to recalibrate the regulatory framework of the industry, to use the minister's own mumbo-jumbo? When can we expect some real action on this crisis by the government?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, we are not only having discussions with the airline presidents and employees but we are also negotiating and discussing with all the stakeholders in the airline industry. I hope, when the House returns, to be in a position to table proposals.

VIOLENCE AGAINST WOMEN

Mr. Bill Attewell (Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister responsible for the Status of Women.

I am very concerned about the enormity of violence against women in Canada. We live in a country where at least one in every ten women is battered by her husband or male partner. An average of 100 women are murdered every year by their partners.

The federal government has a responsibility to ensure that Canadian women live in a safer Canada. The only way this can be accomplished is with a tough and aggressive national policy.

What is the status of the panel on violence against women and when their final report is received, hopefully early in the new year, will she deal with the recommendations quickly?

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister Responsible for Status of Women): Madam Speaker, I know my hon. colleague has been following the work of the panel and is aware that over the past year submissions from some 4,000 individuals and organizations have been heard. Along with the aboriginal circle, the panel has visited 139 communities, including many remote communities in all parts of Canada.

An interim report has been published, to which I would draw the attention of members. As well, last week a compilation of testimony, a very moving and disturbing reflection of what has been said, was published.

Early in the new year the final action plan will be published which I know will give not only the federal government guidance but will provide actions which each individual in this country can take, along with organizations, to bring about an end to violence against women throughout Canadian society.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Madam Speaker, the president of the CBC has secretly threatened to close down the network's television stations and take CBC radio and Radio Canada off the airwaves if employees do not allow the corporation to dip into their pension reserves in order to shore up its funding shortfall. This is blackmail of the worst kind.

I would like to ask the Minister of Communications if he will refuse to allow this blatant coercion of CBC employees to have to actually pay in order to secure their own jobs.

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, the constraints that apply to all aspects of government activities apply as well to the CBC. The CBC and its employees are currently looking at the question of a surplus which exists in the accounts at the present time. It is the responsibility of the board of the CBC and the board of pensions to take a look at this and determine the best way to use that.

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Madam Speaker, as the minister knows, the employees had reached a tentative agreement with the management of the corporation to use those pension surpluses. Apparently on the directive from Treasury Board that plan is out the window.

So also is a counter offer by the CBC employees to allow the CBC to make zero contributions to its pension plan over the next year.

I would like to know if the minister is prepared to resolve this ongoing financial dilemma by committing this government to implementing long-term and stable financing for the CBC. Or does he condone the wishes of Treasury Board to essentially take the guillotine to the CBC?

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of Communications): Madam Speaker, let me first of all challenge my hon. friend to indicate to me what directive of the Treasury Board he is referring to. The Treasury Board did not direct the board of the CBC to take a decision with regard to the pension funds.

Second, the federal taxpayers are currently providing a subsidy for the CBC every year in excess of $1 billion—it is a very substantial subsidy—at a time when ordinary Canadians are wrestling with the need to try to be able to afford the basic necessities of life, at a time when the federal deficit continues to put additional pressure upon governments.

It is incumbent upon all members of Parliament who call for more federal spending to explain to Canadians directly that they also favour running up the federal deficit at the same time.

PRIVY COUNCIL OFFICE

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister.

The public accounts of the Government of Canada inform us of shocking increases in the costs of running the Privy Council Office and the Prime Minister's office.

I want to ask the Prime Minister how come there is no money for the poor in Canada and there is enough money for a 160 per cent increase over four years to run the Privy Council Office.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, if the hon. member had inquired into this he would have realized that the increase in the PCO and PMO budgets is essentially due to the four royal commissions; the Royal Commission on National Passenger Transportation, the new reproductive technologies commission, the electoral reform, the Indian claims and aboriginal peoples commission.

I should advise the hon. member that the increase in the political staff component of the Prime Minister's budget over the last four years has been something in the order of 1 per cent per year, less than the rate of inflation.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Madam Speaker, that is cold comfort for the unemployed and the homeless in Canada.

• (1200)

[Translation]

Are the Deputy Prime Minister and his government finally willing to set an example for Canadians, to stop what they are doing and to help the poor in this country instead of satisfying the needs of the government and the Prime Minister?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, let the hon. member be serious. Who does he want to pay for the royal commissions? Does he want the private sector to pay for them?

What other department of government would he suggest should pay for them? These four royal commissions are very important, the first on national passenger transportation, the second on new reproductive technologies, the third on electoral reform and the fourth on Indian claims and aboriginal peoples.

If he does not want the government to pay for them, who does he suggest should pay for these commissions?

NUCLEAR INDUSTRY

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources about Canada's nuclear development program.

It is my understanding that negotiations for construction of a Candu III prototype reactor have not yet been successful either in New Brunswick or Saskatchewan, the two provinces involved, but I understand that a separate element of that program, a Research Centre of Excellence, has been separated from negotiations with one or both of the provinces.

I would like to ask this question: Why has the Centre of Excellence been separated from the commitment to build a reactor? What is the status of the over-all negotiations?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, the hon. member has been very faithful in his promotion of his province and also for nuclear power.

Lepreau L-1 in New Brunswick is without any question of a world-class standard. It was my hope that we would be able to develop an agreement with New Brunswick. New Brunswick has informed us that it will not need that type of power before well into the next century.

We have finalized a memorandum of understanding with Saskatchewan whereby, tied in with 25 per cent of the world's uranium production that is now located in Saskatchewan, we will put together a deal, especially now after the NDP in Saskatchewan has supported the nuclear industry.

What we will do is ask of the NDP in the memorandum of understanding the same consideration for the nuclear industry as we asked of the previous government in Saskatchewan. I think it is a good deal for Saskatchewan, for Canada and for the nuclear industry.

As I say to the hon. member, we ask of the NDP government in Saskatchewan the same deal as we asked from the Grant Devine government.

VIMY BAND

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, the Department of National Defence is considering moving the Vimy band from Kingston to Camp Borden at a cost in moving expenses of over $400,000 when the same people could be moved from Camp Borden to Kingston at a cost of only $93,000.

Will the minister direct her department to abandon this foolhardy and expensive scheme in the interest of saving money for Canadian taxpayers and ensure that the Vimy band remains where it has been since its founding 40 years ago, in Kingston?

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister Responsible for Status of Women): Madam Speaker, I would like to correct my hon. colleague and state that the cost savings from such a move would be about $400,000 a year.

We have to look at all sorts of ways in which to reduce our budgets and meet our commitments. We will be looking at a variety of options and will certainly be prepared to advise my hon. colleague when decisions have been made.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

PEACEKEEPING IN CYPRUS

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister Responsible for Status of Women): I rise today on behalf of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, who was unable to fly to Ottawa this morning because of the snow storm. On her behalf I am now announcing the government's decision about Canada's participation in the United Nations peacekeeping operation in Cyprus.

After extensive consultations with the United Nations, Greece, Turkey, as well as Greek and Turkish Cypriots, the government has informed the Secretary–General of the United Nations that Canada will withdraw its troops from Cyprus beginning June of 1993, the withdrawal to be completed by September.

For the past 28 years, from the very beginning of the UN peacekeeping operation in Cyprus, thousands of Canadian men and women have displayed extraordinary competence, fairness and calm under pressure in the cause of peace. Their presence in Cyprus has been a powerful symbol of Canada's commitment to peace and security in the world. It has been a source of honour and pride, not only for those serving there but for all Canadians.

I am sure I speak for all members of the House and for all Canadians when I say that these Canadian men and women, as well as their families, are those to whom Canada owes a large debt of gratitude for their dedication and their professionalism, and to the 24 who died in the service of peace for their sacrifice.

Beyond our contribution of troops and equipment, Canada has spared no effort to help the Secretary-General find a peaceful solution to this dispute. As recently as this year, the Secretary of State for External Affairs visited Cyprus, Greece and Turkey in May to press all parties concerned to work with the Secretary-General to that end.

She renewed our plea to Cypriots at the UN General Assembly in September and indicated that our patience was running short. We were deeply disappointed that the discussions under the Secretary-General's guidance have not been successful. In a unanimous resolution on November 25, the Security Council stated that the present status quo is not acceptable.

The government has also taken into account the report and appreciates the effort by a group of parliamentarians, led by the hon. member for Don Valley East, that provided the Secretary of State for External Affairs with useful information on the current situation in Cyprus.

After 28 years of service in Cyprus, after 28 years of watching both sides in the dispute being either unable or unwilling to negotiate a political solution, after 28 years of significant expenditures to maintain troops and equipment in that region without any measurable progress, it was time to face facts and come to certain conclusions.

Our experience in Cyprus has taught us many lessons.

One of the most important is that parties in a dispute must understand that there are limits to the duration of any peacekeeping operation. Peacekeeping must never be considered as an end in itself or as a substitute for political leadership, negotiation and honourable compromise. The basis for any peacekeeping operation has always been an agreement by the parties involved to work toward a political settlement. Whether or not Canadian troops remain in Cyprus, Greek and Turkish Cypriots bear the ultimate responsibility for resolving the dispute.

It appears that instead of taking advantage of the peace and order which the UN mission has afforded, some political leaders have used the presence of UN forces to avoid making the difficult choices, to avoid making the compromises required to ensure peaceful coexistence. At a time when there are increasing demands for peacekeeping around the world, we must ensure that we establish our priorities carefully and manage our resources and contributions effectively.

In deciding to withdraw our troops, we are not saying that the United Nations should put an end to its peacekeeping mission in Cyprus. That is a matter for the Security Council, the Secretary General and the parties involved to consider.

• (1210)

Furthermore, I assure the House that we will continue to support the Secretary-General's ongoing efforts to find a peacefully negotiated solution. In that regard, Canada once again calls upon the parties involved to implement Security Council resolution 789 and to work with the Secretary-General. If circumstances change, Canada would consider contributing directly to new UN efforts toward a peaceful settlement in Cyprus or to its implementation.

As the Secretary of State for External Affairs told the UN General Assembly last September, the Government of Canada endorses the Secretary-General's agenda for peace, in particular the peacemaking and peacekeeping themes of that document. That is why Canada will continue to play a leading role in international efforts to secure peace. We are turning a page in this particular chapter of our history. Our passion for peace remains as fervent as it was 30 years ago when our soldiers donned the blue beret and went to Cyprus.

With over 4,000 troops participating in peacekeeping missions from Cambodia to Bosnia, from Croatia to Central America and the Middle East, the words Canada and peacekeeping will always be closely associated in the eyes of Canadians and in the eyes of the world.

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, it is my honour to respond on behalf of the Liberal Party to the minister's statement notifying the Secretary-General of the United Nations that Canada will withdraw its troops from Cyprus beginning in June of 1993, the complete withdrawal by September.

On behalf of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition, I would like to express our gratitude, our appreciation, our heartfelt thanks to the thousands of men and women who act as our peacekeepers around the world. Their role is expanding now to peacemaking, to diplomacy. Returning from Cyprus, spending a lot of time with our peacekeepers there, I saw first hand what an outstanding reputation our Canadian UN troops establish for Canada.

The problem, as I said even on that visit there, is that they are doing too good of a job and the countries do not want to release them back to Canada. That is maybe part of the dilemma we are in.

I had the privilege with the hon. member for Don Valley East to establish the Canada-Cyprus parliamentary committee to look into the whole Cyprus situation because after 28 years Canadian taxpayers are saying that maybe it is time we brought our troops home. In that committee were members from the government side, the opposition side, my colleague for Kent joined me, the member for Outremont, the member for Don Valley East and a senator formed part of the fact-finding mission.

That committee made certain recommendations to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. If the Secretary of State for External Affairs and if the government will not listen to the Liberal recommendations, to the NDP recommendations, I thought that the Secretary of State for External Affairs would at least listen to her own members.

The committee made excellent recommendations. One was that the Government of Canada not withdraw from participation in the United Nations peacekeeping force in Cyprus until a replacement is found or a just and viable solution to the problem has been reached. I thought that was an excellent recommendation that the committee made to the government and had the government implemented it, I think everyone in Canada, in Cyprus, in Greece and in Turkey would have been happy.

Another recommendation made was that the Government of Canada seek additional funding to offset the costs of our peacekeeping force in Cyprus from those countries with a direct interest, including the Republic of Cyprus, Greece, the U.K. and the United States of America.

We heard from President Vassiliou himself that the Republic of Cyprus would be willing to increase its share of the peacekeeping cost. However, did the secretary of state negotiate that before making her decision? No. Did the secretary of state bring the issue to this House of Commons so that we could debate it as our party has been demanding for the last month? No.

Has the secretary of state gone to the Standing Committee on External Affairs and International Trade and said to the committee that this is a very important issue for Canada and for peacekeeping around the world, please investigate and make recommendations to the government? No. The minister made her decision and then notified the standing committee and then notified us without consulting Canadians through this Chamber.

Another excellent recommendation was that the Government of Canada should do its utmost through the UN to bring about a just and viable solution to the Cyprus problem as quickly as possible. We were also pushing for the solution to be brought about as quickly as possible.

However, the secretary of state, as usual, went on her own way without any diplomacy, without any consultation of the Canadian people, without bringing it to debate in this House.

I do not think the secretary of state is fair to Canadians. In the statement read by the Associate Minister of National Defence she did not point out the serious situation that exists in Cyprus today. On the northern side, Turkey has 35,000 troops, and that is in addition to the Turkish Cypriot army.

The Greek Cypriot side is spending $1 million a day on purchasing military equipment. If the UN peacekeeping forces pull out of the buffer zone, what is going to happen? I am quite sure that some of the 35,000 Turkish troops will start occupying the buffer zone.

Is the Greek Cypriot side going to stand for that? No. It is going to make sure that there are some forces brought to the green line, to the buffer zone to counter that move. Without the UN forces to negotiate disputes—it is not going to be a full-fledged war from day one—there will be little incidents between the Greek Cypriots and the Turkish Cypriots or between the Greek Cypriots and the Turkish army which will fester like a wound and then blow up into a full-scale war.

There is a lot of cost on the part of Canadian taxpayers and those of other countries. However, which is cheaper? A full-fledged war between Turkey and Greece, or keeping our peacekeepers there until such time—and that is all the opposition is asking—that a just and viable solution is found.

I mentioned in my question in Question Period today that President Vassiliou and Mr. Denktash had negotiations all summer. The talks did not break down completely. The talks were suspended because there is a presidential election in February. Both sides agreed, together with the Secretary-General Boutros Boutros-Ghali, that these talks will resume in March under the careful guidance of the Secretary-General himself.

Why not wait to withdraw until a solution is found? A solution is around the corner. Why not wait until such time that another country will help us and send some peacekeeping troops in there? Unfortunately our secretary of state blew it again. I wish I could have congratulated her in the spirit of Christmas, but no, our image in the international community is suffering. The secretary of state does not bring such important issues, where our military is involved, to be debated in this House first.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I rise to put the position of the New Democratic Party on the government's announcement on the record.

I can actually find reason to congratulate the minister. We on this side, certainly our party, do appreciate that the minister has chosen to make this announcement in the House of Commons. It demonstrates that the government or at least the minister can learn rapidly. A week ago the Secretary of State for External Affairs chose to make the announcement on Somalia downstairs in a press conference while the House was in session. I want to say that we appreciate that the minister has made the announcement here in the House today.

• (1220)

The next step for the government is to decide that important decisions of this kind will actually be brought to the House with a resolution in order that the House can pass judgment and can debate the issue before the government simply announces it. However, we appreciate the rate of learning demonstrated by this minister in the last week.

Canada has contributed to UN peacekeeping in Cyprus since 1974. Thousands of Canadian service personnel have served in Cyprus since that time. Thousands of families have made the sacrifice of separation in order that Canadians can participate in keeping the peace in Cyprus. Twenty-one Canadian Forces personnel died in Cyprus in the service of their country and in the service of the United Nations and we honour their sacrifice and their commitment.

I should take this opportunity to note the fact that many Canadian veterans of UN peacekeeping operations are disappointed that the Canadian government has so far failed to strike a Canadian service medal for peacekeeping under the United Nations in recognition of that service. The Canadian Peacekeepers Veterans Association, headed by James MacMillan-Murphy in my riding, has taken up this issue and I hope the government will respond to it.

The minister has today announced that Canada is withdrawing its forces from the United Nations peacekeeping force in Cyprus. It has done so with no replacement indicated. It has done so with no resolution of the dispute that took Canada and the United nations into Cyprus and it has done so with no assurance that this withdrawal will not make the situation worse. The government has said that UN peacekeeping is part of the problem. I submit that is simply wrong and that there is no evidence for that statement. UN peacekeeping is what is maintaining peace and security for the people of Cyprus.

The parliamentary committee to which my friend from Parkdale—High Park referred gave that evidence this week to the House of Commons, an all-party committee. It spoke to Cypriots from all sides and said that the UN peacekeeping force is vital for peace and security in Cyprus. In the minister's announcement there was no item of evidence against that proposition.

I submit that what the government is doing here is pandering to a natural war weariness by Canadians of the contribution that has been made over these many years. I submit that it is incumbent upon the government to show leadership to Canadians on this difficult issue and to say that we are performing a vital role and we must keep it up until either our forces are replaced with others or until there is a just and honourable solution to the dispute. As long as we are providing a useful service, we should stay in Cyprus.

We oppose this resolution because all parties say our contribution is vital to peace. We say that this announcement comes at a particularly delicate time while there are initiatives to try to resolve this dispute. There will be an election in Cyprus in February. The peace discussions have been adjourned until March and I think the government has a duty to those from Canada who have sacrificed over the years in service in Cyprus not to come to this House until it can give assurance to the House and to the country that what we are doing is part of a solution and not simply an abandonment of responsibilities.

If we leave now or in 1993, as the government has announced, there is a real risk that the situation will blow up again and that all we are doing is saying, particularly to the Turkish side, wait long enough and our arms will again be able to impose our solution in Cyprus. That is wrong and it is a position that this government should have rejected.

It is said that this costs too much. It is said the government trots out the $14 million a year that this costs. As the member for Parkdale—High Park said, this is modest compared to the costs that may occur as a result of this decision.

It is modest to the billions of dollars that this government wastes in the Department of National Defence, including the latest outrage on helicopters.

I regret this decision. Our party regrets this decision and we hope the government will use the Christmas season to reconsider.

Mr. Prud'homme: Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Saint-Denis, on a point of order.

Mr. Prud'homme: Mr. Speaker, thank you for allowing this point of order. I am well acquainted with the Standing Orders, and I know that unfortunately, there can no further speeches by members.

[English]

I was elected in 1964 and we have had Canadians in Cyprus since 1964 and it so happens that I have been following the issue since 1964. Therefore, I very much regret that the rules of the House do not allow more participation because the rule is very clear: only the minister's statement plus two members, one from each party, can speak. I am unable to participate, but I shall at the first opportunity since I sit on the committee on management of the House.

The very able chairman from Edmonton Southwest is here and I will certainly raise the issue at the first opportunity at the committee of management of the House that we may see the time has now come to change the rule which deprives a full debate, maybe at least an hour debate of some kind, with more participation from the House on very specific and important issues of international importance. I have a great deal of interest and Canada has a great deal of interest for its reputation.

Unfortunately, such is the rule, such is life. I want strongly to be on record that I very much regret that we are withdrawing at this time. We should have waited until at least March to know what would have taken place.

BILL C-98

PRESENTATION OF REPORT OF THE LEGISLATIVE COMMITTEE

Mr. Bill Attewell (Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville): Mr.Speaker, I have the honour to present, in both official languages, the report of the legislative committee on Bill C-98, an act to provide additional borrowing authority for the fiscal year beginning April 1, 1992, without amendment.

ELECTORAL REFORM

THIRD REPORT OF THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present, in both official languages, the third report of the Special Committee on Electoral Reform.

I would point out to the House that it contains close to 100 pages of amendments. It is an interim report and deals with the issue of who shall vote and how they shall vote. There are a few other items but that is the primary thrust of it.

The committee has engaged itself in close to 31 separate long meetings on the draft report alone because the work is so detailed in trying to provide for Canadians a better system of voting and protection against fraud at some kind of reasonable price.

The big change to enable Canadians who are away from their normal home to vote more easily under those conditions. That will include Canadians who are in some other location temporarily within the country as well as Canadians who reside abroad.

Previous to this report, Canadians have had the opportunity, if they were in an embassy or the military, to vote. That is extended to others who have engagements outside the country for some limited period of time but still have their connection to Canada.

The report is far-reaching.

We are also anticipating as committee members that the government will produce a bill for us to consider immediately upon return in the new year so that these changes can be implemented in time for the next election. That is why we have done a report that contains what we believe to be the appropriate legal language to implement all of these provisions. That is the way we have done it. The drafting hopefully is done and will be checked by justice to make sure that we are all protected. We look forward to that.

• (1230)

I would like to pay a compliment to all members of the committee and the staff who have served us so well in difficult circumstances, and also to Elections Canada which have been so diligent in being of assistance to us in this very very detailed examination. It has been difficult, but we hope it was very worth while for Canadians and for our democracy. I commend it to all members, to read it in all its glory during the break.

We will also be sending it out to the 295 returning officers in Canada, and asking them to examine this detailed drafting and feed information back to us if they think we have gone astray.

They are very knowledgeable human beings. They have just been through the referendum and should be in a position to give us some good advice if they think we have done something, and recommended to this House something, that will not work.

This was a little longer than a normal introduction but I think the subject matter is of considerable importance and difficulty. Thank you again to all committee members and our staff.

BILL C-88

REPORT OF LEGISLATIVE COMMITTEE

Mrs. Nicole Roy-Arcelin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the hon. member for Welland—St. Catharines—Thorold, I have the honour to present, in both official languages, the report of the legislative committee on Bill C-88, an act to amend the Copyright Act, with amendments.

I would like to take advantage of this opportunity to thank my committee colleagues and the Minister of Communications for the efforts and co-operation that made it possible to table this report today.

BILL C-227

REPORT OF LEGISLATIVE COMMITTEE

Mrs. Nicole Roy-Arcelin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the hon. member for Welland—St. Catharines—Thorold, I have the honour to present, in both official languages, the report of the legislative committee on Bill C-227, an act to amend the Criminal Code (desecration of the flag).

[English]

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. I forgot to mention that the committee intends to report in another couple of phases and will be meeting in January on all the other issues. This issue was the dominant one but the other issues have to be dealt with and quickly, and the committee intends to do so. I want the House to know that as well.

ABORIGINAL AFFAIRS

FOURTH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Larry Schneider (Regina—Wascana): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present in both official languages the fourth report of the Standing Committee on Aboriginal Affairs.

In so doing I would like to comment that this report has given members of the committee an unparalleled opportunity to visit places and people of Canada that we otherwise would not have had the opportunity to experi-provided mixed emotions for us. We experienced moments of pride and we experienced moments of sorrow in what we saw. We felt compassion and some helplessness during our visit. Perhaps this report will in some way help.

There are those whose housing was quite comparable to what we might consider to be an average southern community. They had an established economic base, a form of self-government, a relatively stable social environment and a good climate. We learned about them.

There were those settlements that had little of what I have just referred to. Yet despite it all they seemed to be determined to make their plight a better one despite the adversities confronting them. We learned about these people as well.

It is our sincere wish that this report accurately reflects what we heard, what we saw and what we felt. Our recommendations are intended to provide a path to resolve the housing problems that exist for our native Canadians in order that they may achieve suitable, adequate and affordable housing.

The committee and the chair, in particular, are greatly indebted to the clerk of the committee, whose camera seemed to appear everywhere and the results of her photographs will appear in the report, our Library of Parliament researcher, and the members of our own staff for their work and efforts in the research and writing of this report.

Most of all, I would like to extend the committee's most sincere and heartfelt thanks to those communities that opened their hearts and their homes to us. Their hospitality was beyond reproach and served as an example to the rest of Canada.

I want to thank the members of the committee whose dedication to this cause was beyond reproach. There were times when details seemed to attract the attention of some of the frustration of others. When all is said and done our report is better for their participation, and I want to thank them for their determination.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS AND INTERNATIONAL TRADE

SEVENTH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Girve Fretz (Erie): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present in both official languages the seventh report of the Standing Committee on External Affairs and International Trade. In accordance with Standing Order 108(2), the subcommittee on Development and Human Rights has examined the subject of human rights.

Pursuant to Standing Order 113(1), this report is deemed adopted when laid on the table.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 68(2), the motion is deemed adopted.

Ms. Campbell (Vancouver Centre) moves that the bill be now read the first time and printed.

Pursuant to Standing Order 69(1), the motion is deemed adopted.

Bill read the first time and printed.

NORTHUMBERLAND STRAIT CROSSING ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of Public Works) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-110, an act respecting the Northumberland Strait Crossing.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 68(2), the motion is deemed adopted.

Mr. MacKay moves that the bill be now read the first time and printed.

CRIMINAL CODE

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-394, an act to amend the Criminal Code (firearms).

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 68(2), the motion is deemed adopted.

Mr. MacWilliam: Mr. Speaker, four out of five Canadians want stiffer legislation preventing criminals from using firearms in acts of violence or in the perpetration of a crime.

The government responded to this public pressure by passing the current gun control legislation. However, this legislation does not get to the root of the problem, which is the criminal misuse of deadly weapons. Instead the government's legislation restricted the legitimate recreational use of firearms without really tackling the need for stronger enforcement of regulatory control.

Since I could not support the government's legislation, I prepared this private member's bill to increase the penalties for those convicted of a firearm related offence. My private member's bill would ensure that the recommendations of the Special Committee on Gun Control are enacted with specific reference to increased penalties for the misuse of firearms and that plea bargaining could not be used as a means to reduce a sentence without the Attorney General's permission.

The bill is a major step toward keeping deadly weapons out of the hands of criminals.

Mr. Speaker: Mr. MacWilliam moves that the bill be now read the first time and printed.

Pursuant to Standing Order 69(1), the motion is deemed adopted.

Bill read the first time and printed.

CANADIAN BILL OF RIGHTS

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. John E. Cole (York—Simcoe) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-395, an act to amend the Canadian Bill of Rights (right to property).

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 68(2), the motion is deemed adopted.

Mr. Cole: Mr. Speaker, every citizen of Canada must be guaranteed that their right to own, use and enjoy property is recognized and respected by all levels of government in Canada.

The right to enjoy property is a fundamental right existing long before the constitutions that protect it. When, for example, a garbage dump is imposed upon a community against its wishes, it is extremely difficult and costly for individual Canadians to protect their rights even though they would be directly and obviously affected negatively.

The amendments I propose to the Canadian Bill of Rights will strengthen Canada's commitment for individual Canadians to protect their right to use and enjoy their property.

Mr. Speaker: Mr. Cole moves that the bill be now read the first time and printed.

Pursuant to Standing Order 69(1), the motion is deemed adopted.

Bill read the first time and printed.

PETITIONS

NORTH THOMPSON RIVER

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, it is an honour and a privilege to present petitions on behalf of literally thousands of British Columbians from the communities of Little Fort, Darfield, Barriére, Clear Water, Vavenby, Blue River, Birch Island, Bridge Lake, Louis Creek, East Barriére Lake, Blackpool, Avola, McLure, Valemount, Jasper, McBride, Skwaam Bay, Heffley Creek, Chu Chua, Whispering Pines, Wells Gray and Vinsulla.

I will summarize their lengthy petition, but basically they indicate their opposition to diverting the North Thompson River, a tributary of the Fraser River. The plan is to divert the water into the San Diego, California area. It is an extension of the North America Water and Power Alliance Program.

These petitioners are asking that the Government of Canada introduce legislation that would prohibit the sale of Canadian river water or lake water to the United States or northern Mexico.

HOUSING

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I have a number of petitions. The first ones urge the government to reinstate the federal co-operative housing program and commit $6.1 million to the program which has been planned for 1992 to permit approximately 2,000 co-operative units to be sponsored. That comes from people in Coquitlam, British Columbia.

PHARMACEUTICALS

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, the second group of petitions is a little late but is important. The petitions urge the government not to proceed with Bill C-91 on the drug matter.

NORTH AMERICAN FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Finally, the last one is from the Council of Senior Citizens' Organizations of B.C. The petitioners urge the government not to proceed with the free trade agreement with the United States and Mexico.

CHILD POVERTY

Mr. Larry Schneider (Regina—Wascana): Mr. Speaker, I rise today pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 36 to present a petition signed by numerous citizens from Regina, Saskatchewan.

They remind the House of their express concern for the more than one million Canadian children currently living in poverty. They seek to achieve the goal of eliminating poverty among Canadian children by the year 2000.

The petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to take the action necessary to reaffirm its commitment to seek the elimination of poverty among children in Canada by the year 2000 and to develop a plan for the implementation of this commitment.

YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT

Mr. Lee Richardson (Calgary Southeast): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition signed by several thousand Albertans.

It is particularly appropriate that I rise today to present this petition. As you know, Mr. Speaker, just yesterday the Hon. Ken Rostad, Attorney General for the province of Alberta, and the Hon. Stephen West, Solicitor General for the province of Alberta, met with their federal counterparts and Alberta members of Parliament to press for further amendments to the Young Offenders Act.

This petition indicates the support of my constituents for the revision of the laws of Canada to respond to the sense of concern that many Canadians are feeling in the face of rising levels of violent crime committed by young people.

I thank my Alberta colleagues for their support and commend those who have circulated this petition in the memory of Ryan Garrioch.

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT

Mr. Walter Van De Walle (St. Albert): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition duly authorized, pursuant to Standing Order 36. The petitioners are concerned about the increasing incidence of rape and murder.

They call upon the Parliament of Canada to reinstate the death penalty.

[Translation]

OLD AGE SECURITY

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have the pleasure to table a petition from many of our seniors.

[English]

They are asking the government to re-evaluate Canadian old age security pensions so that they can truly reflect the needs of our Canadian seniors.

"SERIAL KILLER" GAME

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Mr. Speaker, there are several hundred signatures petitioning the House of Commons to prohibit by law the importation, distribution, sales or manufacture of a game called "Serial Killer" and to advise producers of "Serial Killer" that their product, if destined for Canada, will be seized and destroyed.

Mr. Speaker, we abhor crimes of violence against persons. We believe that "Serial Killer" offers nothing positive for children or adults to admire or emulate but rather it contributes to violence.

YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT

Mr. Al Johnson (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to present two petitions today each of which relates to a tragic murder of a child in Calgary.

The first petition is in the memory of Ryan Garrioch and your petitioners request that Parliament revise the laws of Canada to replace the Young Offenders Act with an updated juvenile delinquents act with a lowered minimum age of 13 years.

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT

Mr. Al Johnson (Calgary North): The second petition, Mr. Speaker, is in the memory of Shannon Dawn Morrisette Bird in which your petitioners strongly request that the penalty for child murderers be increased to capital punishment.

KILLER CARDS

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36 I wish to present a petition on behalf of constituents in my riding who also represent many others.

• (1250)

They petition this government to amend the laws of Canada to prohibit the importation, distribution, sale and manufacturing of the so-called killer cards in law and to advise producers of killer cards that their product, if destined for Canada, will be seized and destroyed.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to present a petition on behalf of constituents and others from the Scarborough and Markham area.

The petitioners indicate their concerns for human rights accordance in India and in other countries. They have noted the continued detention of Mr. Justice Ajit Singh Bains who has now been released from custody.

The petitioners wish the Canadian government to communicate their concerns on the issue of human rights accordance to the Government of India.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mrs. Ethel Blondin-Andrew (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, I am honoured to rise before the House with two petitions on behalf of the First Nations of Canada.

The first petition pursuant to Standing Order 36 is a petition about the goods and services tax. Whereas the First Nations of Canada are immune from such taxation by virtue of their aboriginal and treaty rights, the petitioners call upon Parliament to fulfil its responsibilities to the citizens of First Nations in Canada.

They ask that the government take immediate steps to rectify the deficiency of the policy guidelines, including changes which will protect the taxation immunity of First Nations citizens both on and off reserve lands, including those citizens who do not yet have recognized reserve lands.

ABORIGINAL LANGUAGES

Mrs. Ethel Blondin-Andrew (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, the second petition has to do with aboriginal languages.

This is on behalf of over 100 aboriginal First Nations people who have given their names to express concern about the erosion of their languages. They speak about the 53 aboriginal languages and are ever committed to the preservation, development and enhancement of aboriginal languages.

CHILD POVERTY

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, in accordance with Standing Order 36, it is my honour and pleasure to present a petition from a number of residents of Toronto.

The petitioners point to the resolution passed on November 24, 1989 in the House of Commons unanimously that this House express its concern for the more than one million Canadian children currently living in poverty. They seek to achieve the goal of eliminating poverty among Canadian children by the year 2000.

They point also to the fact that Canada ratified the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child and its moral obligation to seek the elimination of child poverty in Canada.

They point to the fact that on May 7, 1992 the Minister of National Health and Welfare said that there is no plan to cope with the problem of poverty exclusively for children.

Therefore, the petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to take the actions necessary to reaffirm its commitment to seek the elimination of poverty among children in Canada by the year 2000 and to develop a plan for the implementation of this commitment.

LOW LEVEL FLIGHT TRAINING

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition also from a number of residents of Toronto who urge the Parliament of Canada to join with the Assembly of First Nations, the Innu of Labrador and other aboriginal peoples of northern Canada in opposing the use of their lands for NATO-NORAD attack training.

The petitioners demand that the Canadian government end all NATO-NORAD low level flight training in Canada and to redirect Canada's NATO and NORAD funding toward enabling Canada's aboriginal peoples to regain control of their lands and their livelihood and promoting sustainable development for all Canadians.

STONEY POINT RESERVE

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I have a number of petitions to present today.

The first is from 475 people in the Stoney Point area near Sarnia. The petitioners note that in 1942 the Canadian government confiscated their reserve number 43 under the War Measures Act. In spite of a government promise to return the land after the war, the land is still in the possession of the Canadian Armed Forces in breach of the proclamation of 1763.

The petitioners therefore call upon Parliament to fulfil its responsibilities to the Stoney Point First Nation by returning the land at Stoney Point to its aboriginal inhabitants and their descendants.

SOFTWOOD LUMBER INDUSTRY

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I would also like to present a petition indicating that the United States has unfairly imposed a duty on our softwood lumber exports and has engaged in numerous other harassment practices against Canadian producers.

The petitioners note that the free trade agreement has caused serious job loss and devastation in the Canadian economy without the promised benefits.

They therefore ask Parliament and the Government of Canada to take any action necessary to defend the interests of the Canadian softwood lumber industry and to effect the cancellation of the free trade agreement.

NORTH THOMPSON RIVER

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present 27 more petitions in the long line of petitions regarding water exports.

These petitions come from people in Armstrong, Anglemont, Celista, Chase, Sorrento, Tappen, Salmon Arm, Sicamous, Mara, Endorby, Vernon, Lumby, and Falkland. They are all towns and communities within the riding of Okanagan—Shuswap.

The people that have signed the petition are very concerned about the proposal to divert a portion of the flow of the North Thompson River, and divert the water to the California market.

They have asked that the Government of Canada state categorically that it will not permit Canada's fresh waters to be dammed and diverted to the U.S.A. or to Mexico, and to state categorically that our Canadian rivers are not for sale.

CHILD POVERTY

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, I am privileged, on behalf of approximately 200 citizens of Windsor and Essex county, pursuant to Standing Order 36, to submit this petition pointing out that the House of Commons unanimously passed a motion to the effect that this House expressed its concern for the more than one million Canadian children currently living in poverty and that it would seek to achieve the goal of eliminating poverty among Canadian children by the year 2000.

The petition goes on to describe the tragic jeopardy in which this nation's future social and economic stability will be placed if this problem is not addressed.

Therefore they humbly pray and call upon Parliament to take the necessary actions to reaffirm its commitment to seek the elimination of poverty among children in Canada by the year 2000, and to develop a plan for the implementation of that commitment.

PHARMACEUTICALS

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Mr. Speaker, I am privileged to present a petition signed by a number of people from Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca. The petitioners express concern about the rate at which drug prices have gone up, and about the cost of these drugs to provincial and private drug plans as well as to individuals.

The petitioners urge that Bill C-91 not be finalized. Further, they ask that Parliament repeal Bill C-22, passed in 1987, so that Canadians can have the full benefit from lower priced generic drugs.

GWICH'IN LAND CLAIM SETTLEMENT ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development) moved that Bill C-94, an act to approve, give effect to and declare valid the agreement between Her Majesty the Queen in right of Canada and the Gwich'in, as represented by the Gwich'in Tribal Council, and to amend an act in consequence thereof, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Human Resources envelope.

Some hon. members: Agreed.

• (1300)

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, I think there would be disposition in the House that the subject matter be referred to Committee of the Whole for further debate.

Mr. Speaker: Is there agreement?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the House went into committee thereon, Mrs. Champagne in the chair.

Madam Chairman: House in Committee of the Whole on Bill C-94, an act to approve, give effect to and declare valid the agreement between Her Majesty the Queen in right of Canada and the Gwich'in, as represented by the Gwich'in Tribal Council, and to amend an act in consequence thereof.

Shall clause 2 carry?

On Clause 2—Definition of "Agreement"

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Chairman, I believe there is disposition on the part of the parties to make a short statement at the committee stage. Then if there are questions I would be prepared to take them.

I would like to very briefly outline the provisions of the Gwich'in Land Claim Settlement Act, Bill C-94. I will, in the interest of time, keep this very short.

This bill will give the force of law of the Gwich'in comprehensive land claim agreement, of which I have a copy and which was tabled in this House on November 26. It is a historic agreement formally signed by the Governments of Canada, the Northwest Territories and the Gwich'in Tribal, council on April 22 of this year.

Under the terms of this accord the 2,200 Gwich'in people living in the Mackenzie River area, largely in the communities of Aklavik, Inuvik, Arctic Red River, and Fort McPherson, will receive title to more than 22,000 square kilometres of land in the Northwest Territories, and title to more than 1,550 square kilometres of their ancestral homelands in the Yukon Territory.

Bill C-94 also allows the Gwich'in to play a major role in managing the renewal resources of the area. It provides sub-surface rights to 6,100 kilometres of land in the Northwest Territories, and exclusive rights to certain commercial wildlife harvesting activities.

The financial benefits include a tax-free payment of $75 million in 1990 dollars to be paid out over the 15-year period following adoption of this bill. It also gives them an annual share of resource royalties at the level of 7.5 per cent on the first $2 million of resource earnings and 1.5 per cent on sums beyond that level of earnings as resources are extracted from the Gwich'in lands within the Mackenzie River Valley, and also a 15-year subsidy of property taxes on the undeveloped lands known as Gwich'in lands within municipal boundaries.

Under the terms of this bill federal, territorial, and municipal laws will continue to apply to the Gwich'in and their land until a self-government agreement has been successfully negotiated and brought forward to this House.

Those terms form the backbone of the land claim settlement, the backbone of Bill C-94, a bill whose merit all parties will acknowledge.

In every respect, this bill represents a great and historic step of progress. Bill C-94 provides the Gwich'in with a role in the development of the north. It does this through the creation of a number of specific management boards. It provides economic opportunities beyond their traditional vocations, a voice in the ongoing management of those resources, and provides for a dispute settlement mechanism to resolve disagreements which may arise with governments.

Let me just add that while the Gwich'in are exchanging certain undefined hunting, fishing and trapping rights contained in the existing Treaty 11 for the more clearly defined benefits of Bill C-94, all other treaty rights contained in Treaty 11, which was signed in 1921, will continue in place. These other treaty rights include the provision for annual treaty payments, education rights and other social treaty benefits.

The settlement of aboriginal land claims has been a major priority of this government. In recognition of the vital necessity to settle these land claim issues, necessary for the future of aboriginal peoples and the economic development of Canada, this government made the resolution of comprehensive claims the first pillar of the agenda of native initiatives which the Prime Minister presented in this House in September 1990.

Therefore, this legislation represents the first regional land claim settlement resulting from the prolonged negotiations with the Dene and Métis people of the western Arctic. In that regard the Gwich'in are truly pioneers. They have broken the ice and set an example for others in the western Arctic to follow.

In conclusion, I would like to personally compliment President Willard Hagen of the Gwich'in Tribal Council, Chief James Ross of the Fort McPherson Band and other members of their negotiating team and board for their very positive, optimistic, and confident approach to concluding this agreement.

Hon. colleagues, Madam Chairman, I would ask you to lend your support to the legislation before us today, which received a 94 per cent ratification vote from the eligible voting members of the Gwich'in nation last year. I call on members to facilitate quick passage. I do so especially because of the economic and human importance of this agreement to the Gwich'in people. I note that the Gwich'in elders will receive benefits before the Christmas period if this legislation is passed today.

I trust that hon. members will be prepared to give their consent to completing the passage of the bill through all stages today, including the final passage and referral to the other place. I encourage hon. members to give their complete co-operation to this important initiative.

Mrs. Ethel Blondin-Andrew (Western Arctic): Madam Chairman, I am honoured to rise to speak to the second reading and passage of Bill C-94, which deals with the Gwich'in land claim. I am honoured to have the opportunity to speak on this comprehensive land claim legislation. As the minister has mentioned, the Gwich'in people are the first to reach a regional land claim agreement in the Northwest Territories since the failure of the comprehensive Dene—Métis final agreement.

There are now two other native organizations in my riding of the Western Arctic, the Sahtu Tribal Council and the Dogrib Tribal Council, that have also initiated land claims negotiations based on the former comprehensive claim final agreement.

The Gwich'in people are very proud of their agreement, which is the final product of many years of very hard work and their tireless efforts to seek and achieve an agreement that would give them an immense opportunity for a financially secure future. The Gwich'in people are looking forward to using this agreement to better their lives.

As parliamentarians we can and are obligated to assist the Gwich'in people in obtaining this goal.

• (1310)

Negotiations have spanned seven generations of the Gwich'in people. Their struggle began in 1921 under Chief Julius Salu of the Tetlit Gwich'in and Paul Niditchi of the Gwich'a Gwich'in who were signatories to Treaty 11 on July 26 and July 28, 1921, respectively, in the communities of Arctic Red River and Fort McPherson.

The Gwich'in people had believed Treaty 11 could be a peace and friendship treaty until it was discovered that there was a misunderstanding in the translating of the treaty from the spoken word to the written page, with Ottawa interpreting the treaty as a surrender by the Gwich'in people of their lands and their cultural identity. Their language, religion and traditional values which had survived for thousands of years were almost lost.

A strong and proud people, the Gwich'in have stood peacefully against those outside forces which sought economic wealth in taking their non-renewable resources and using their water and lands, some of which have sustained damage. They have survived against the wealthy and misguided anti-fur lobby groups which callously and dishonestly oppose the harvesting of fur and animal hides with precious little regard for the impact such deceitful and disrespectful campaigns have had upon the the Gwich'in, their values, traditions and their economic way of life.

It has been Gwich'in determination which has carried the Gwich'in people to this moment of the second reading of their legislation today. Theirs is an agreement which is the product of extensive negotiations conducted since the Government of Canada first accepted claims from the Dene and Métis in 1976 and 1977.

Using the 1990 agreement in principle as the basis for continuing negotiations, the Gwich'in of the Mackenzie Delta region and Canada began negotiations in December, 1990 and initialled a comprehensive agreement on July 13, 1991.

Special thanks and congratulations should be made to the people of the Gwich'in Nation who turned out to vote, as the minister mentioned, and to the support of the Gwich'in Clan between September 16 to 20, 1991. Of the 1,122 eligible voters, 1,021 cast a ballot and 960 voted in favour of the agreement; a very impressive 91 per cent turnout and a 94 per cent vote in favour of the agreement.

Appropriately, the historic signing of the Gwich'in comprehensive land claim agreement took place on April 22, 1992 at the Chief Julius School in the community of Fort McPherson. It should be noted that at that time there were many officials there, including territorial officials, the leader, the hon. Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development as well as the member of Parliament for Western Arctic. Many respected elders who played an important role in the negotiation process were present and participated in the actual signing of the final agreement.

The agreement is a celebration of the Gwich'in's culture and identity. After the signing, drum dances and fiddling dances and feasts were held in each of the communities of Fort McPherson, Aklavik, Inuvik and Arctic Red River, with the celebrations lasting for days. This agreement may not be the end of almost 20 years of negotiations or 70 years of struggle, but it is definitely a major step forward. The Gwich'in have negotiated a modern day treaty with more economic benefits, sub-surface and surface ownership, regional powers in some cases, exclusive rights to hunting, trapping and fishing and clearly defined aboriginal rights. These provisions have been accepted and ratified by the majority of the Gwich'ins.

On the gains and provisions, the Gwich'in agreement represents significant gains for the Gwich'in people. They have within that particular agreement a flow-through provision in section 3.1.5.

A general provision within the Gwich'in agreement protects the aboriginal identity of the Gwich'in people and within their legislation they are protected and included in the opportunity to benefit from or participate in any existing or future constitutional rights for aboriginal people which may also be applicable to them.

There is also the self-government framework in appendix B. The self-government framework agreement provides a broad range of affairs*jurisdictions over which the Gwich'in may enter negotiation with the Government of Canada.*

The framework agreement will allow the Gwich'in to discuss the transfer and delivery of programs, services such as education, training, language, revenue and taxation, health and social services and the administration of justice through a Gwich'in tribal justice system based upon traditional values. In years to come this aboriginal group will be recognized, its rights entrenched in the Constitution of Canada. There have been gains made from Treaty 11. Most Gwich'in Treaty 11 rights remain unaffected by the agreement.

On the question of land, the Gwich'in will receive title to 8,622 square miles of land in the Northwest Territories, including increased sub-surface rights and sub-surface resources, and an additional 600 square miles of land in the Yukon, which do not include sub-surface resources. They will receive $75 million over 15 years.

I urge the members of this House for speedy passage of this legislation in that there are specific provisions for the elders to be affected immediately upon the passage of this legislation.

It also touches on the harvesting rights; many detailed rights in Gwich'in settlement area, including exclusive trapping of fur bearers, harvesting preferences on all species, exclusive harvesting on Gwich'in titled lands.

There is also the issue of expropriation. The quantum of land that was agreed upon in this land claims agreement is guaranteed to the Gwich'in forever. Even in the unlikely event that the government should need to expropriate a portion of land within the settlement area, this guarantee will stand.

Management rights and economic opportunities also exist. Gwich'in are guaranteed 50 per cent on management boards, including renewable resources, land use planning, environmental assessment, land and water regulation. The Gwich'in see this as a very positive gain which now gives the Gwich'in an equal say and a voice.

First time economic opportunities will now exist in a number of areas. They will have a role in development resolving disputes between government and Gwich'in and the amendments of the treaty. The Gwich'in believe that where no provisions existed before, now the Gwich'in have guaranteed consultation by developers on a variety of matters. There is an arbitration panel should there be a difference in interpretation of the agreement, and amendments may be made by agreement between the Government of Canada and the Gwich'in.

On the subject of future concerns and the implementation process, I would like to raise a concern which has been expressed to me by the Gwich'in. The Gwich'in are concerned over the lack of a benefits package for the Gwich'in when developers wish to explore for oil and gas on Gwich'in lands. In the Gwich'in settlement area this is an essential requirement for any First Nation that wants to promote and establish some form of self-government.

Another pressing concern is the existence of outstanding loans against the financial compensation package. The Gwich'in have taken responsibility for 15 per cent of the $40 million loan to the Dene Métis acquired when attempting to obtain a comprehensive land claims agreement. The Gwich'in believe that the Government of Canada has a fundamental obligation to provide claimant groups with the necessary funds to procure a comprehensive land claim agreement.

In the best interests of both parties and in good faith of the negotiation process, I hope and trust that the Government of Canada will respect the reasonable timeframe allotted to the establishment and commencement of the implementation plan and the implementation committee as well as provide the adequate necessary funding to put the structure of the agreement into place.

As the Liberal critic of aboriginal affairs and as a member of Parliament responsible for the constituents' concerns in Western Arctic, I will monitor the progress made with respect to the process put into place within a reasonable length of time of the settlement legislation passage.

I would like to take a brief moment to describe for the members of the House today the four communities of the Mackenzie Delta, Aklavik, Inivuk, Fort MacPherson and Arctic Red. Aklavik, meaning place of the barren land grizzly in Inuktitut, is a community of 760. These are the communities that have worked closely together to achieve this land claim legislation.

The community of Aklavik, which grew out of a small trading post established by the Hudson Bay Company, quickly became the chief trapping, trading and transportation centre of the muskrat-rich Mackenzie Delta. Aklavik is probably known by many of its inhabitants as the town that would not die. If you are from Aklavik you commonly use the phrase in a situation that is tough, "never say die". As the town was relocated by the federal government to Inuvik due to the serious flooding and erosion, despite these problems many residents remain in Aklavik today. Inuvik is the largest Canadian community north of the Arctic Circle. With a population of 3,200, it was the Northwest Territories' first modern planned town.

• (1320)

Fort McPherson is located on the edge of the Gwich'in Dene territory on the Dempster highway and was named after Hudson's Bay trader Murdoch McPherson. With a population of 729, it remains to be one of the north's most important economic areas for hunting and trapping.

The small community of Arctic Red River, with 125 residents, is located where the Arctic Red River meets the Mackenzie and has been a seasonal fishing camp for the Dene for centuries.

I would like to take the opportunity in closing to pay tribute to the people who have worked on this particular land claims legislation. Do I have time? I do not. I will save the tributes and the closing comments for the next part of my speech.

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Madam Speaker, I would like to thank my colleagues who made the initial presentations from the Conservative and Liberal parties. I want the House to know that our party is prepared to support this legislation through third reading.

We recognize that the Gwich'in claim was overwhelmingly ratified by the Gwich'in people. As mentioned by the member for Western Arctic, on September 21, 1991 when the ratification vote was taken, 94 per cent of the Gwich'in people supported this claim and therefore I think the House has to recognize that the choice has been made by the Gwich'in people and that they overwhelmingly support the agreement with the national government. Only 5 per cent opposed. I wish we had achieved something like that in our own referendum.

Our party has always supported the idea of aboriginal land claims, not only because they resolve some outstanding social problems and problems of injustice that Canada has experienced with its aboriginal people, but also they are capable of bringing a substantial boost to economic development. Our party supports the settlement of claims because we know that through the settlement of lands and resources and also the financial compensation and royalties along the lines that the minister mentioned, a great deal of capital and the opportunity for economic development will be returned to the north.

The past northern policies of Liberal and Conservative governments have resulted in a decapitalization of the north where non-northern companies go into the north—mine, log, fish, hunt, whatever they do—and take the resources out of the north. They take the capital out of the north, they take the income out of the north and leave people in a relatively poor situation, with aboriginal people being the poorest among the poor.

This agreement has an opportunity to reverse that kind of decapitalization process. The people who live in the Arctic have been living there for approximately 9,000 years. It was their home in the past. It is going to be their home in the future. Any kind of capital or income that returns to their investments on their own lands is going to be reinvested in the north and we are going to see the kind of economic growth that we have not seen in those areas for a long time.

Land claim settlements should be a key part of the economic strategy of Canada. They certainly can reverse the decapitalization trend that has taken place in the past.

I want to let members know that we do have some concerns about the federal government's involvement in the negotiation process. As my colleague the member for Western Arctic pointed out, in the past the federal government insisted that the Dene Métis groups in the western Arctic get together and negotiate a comprehensive land claim that would cover the whole area. After the expenditure of a great deal of money, time, research and negotiations, they came to an agreement. When that agreement was presented at Dettah in July 1990 it was rejected by the vast majority of the Dene Métis people. At that point the Gwich'in people walked out of the meeting and indicated that they were prepared to make their own settlement.

One of the reasons they did that, as the minister of Indian affairs will know, was because they said that their people had been suffering long enough. The land claim was going to bring about compensation, it was going to give them a land base, it was going to give them certain administrative and government powers which they felt they needed in order to get their people on the process of development. They were able to get into separate negotiations with the federal government with that as their priority.

Unfortunately it is a bit of a form of blackmail that the federal government is able to use when dealing with aboriginal people. On the one hand, aboriginal policy of the national government keeps native people in a state of perpetual poverty; it deprives them of the resources they need in order to pursue their economic development; but, on the other hand, they may be forced to accept land claim agreements in which they are required to extinguish their existing aboriginal rights. That creates a serious problem, a serious dilemma, for aboriginal people.

The Gwich'in felt they could negotiate a claim which would help them with their economic and social programs, which would move them ahead as a people, and yet they were anticipating in the future that there would be some change on the part of the government, some change which would eliminate the blanket extinguishment provision or the right to extinguish aboriginal rights. They were taking a chance on the future in order to assist their people.

It is unfortunate that we still have, not necessarily the blanket extinguishment provision but the cede, lease and surrender kind of provision which still reduces aboriginal rights of people and requires them to surrender aboriginal rights when they enter into land claims.

Aboriginal people are the only people in this country who, in settling an outstanding grievance with the national government, are required to give up rights that have been assured to them under our Constitution. As far as I am concerned, it is unfair, it is a form of blackmail, and it should not be done.

I am pleased to see that there is another party in the House which has followed the lead of the New Democratic Party back in 1985 when we passed a resolution saying there should not be an extinguishment clause. Certainty it can be obtained by setting up forums through which native people can negotiate with the governments of Canada and the provinces, in order to make sure their rights are respected and their land and resource requirements are respected, given the changing circumstances.

We were also concerned, Madam Chairman, about the way third parties were consulted in the advancement of the Gwich'in land claim. We were concerned that, for example, 600 square miles of land became a part of the Gwich'in settlement in Yukon. The consultations that took place between the Government of Yukon and the federal government were not what we would call free and open and the parties were not considered equal in the process.

In fact, the federal government simply told the Government of Yukon that 600 square miles of the Yukon would become part of the Gwich'in settlement. In some cases that is more land than was received by groups of the Council of Yukon Indians during their settlement. They felt they were not being treated fairly and equitably in relation to the 600 square miles which was allocated as part of the Gwich'in settlement. The minister may be able to respond to that.

With those concerns stated, we would like to pay tribute to all of those who were involved in the negotiating process. We think the result will be satisfactory to the Gwich'in people and will help them with their economic and social programs. It will make sure they can develop along the lines that they as a people in the Northwest Territories would like to develop. We wish them all the very best as a result of the outcome of this settlement.

• (1330)

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary Northeast): Madam Chairman, I would like to make some comments about this bill.

Bill C-94 is a very important bill because it deals with aboriginal people. They have been neglected for so long that they merit more attention than we are giving them. This bill is presented here the same day as the House adjourns, and it has to pass through all stages.

I find it somewhat strange that the Department of Indian Affairs could not have introduced this bill a long time ago so that it would be debated on its merit. This leaves us very little time to do so.

As the Gwich'in people seem to be happy with this agreement, I am certainly supportive of this legislation. It is extremely important that the Gwich'in people be in accord with this legislation and as the minister and other members said, the people are in agreement.

However, I would like to mention something here. I have been to the north and I have seen the aboriginal people living in conditions that are so bad that the Third World countries would be ashamed of those conditions. Canada should put a priority on treating her own aboriginal people fairly. I do not think the federal government has done it in a proper way.

We have a huge Ministry of Indian Affairs consisting of almost 3,000 employees dealing day to day with this problem. They should have projects and situations that would improve the lives of the aboriginal people. If you go to the north, you see how appalling the situation is. The aboriginal people cannot continue to live in such a way. It is late in the day and the minister brought this legislation in only half an hour ago but I would like to commend him for doing it. It is better late than never. I hope that he will take a lesson and deal with aboriginal affairs seriously and have other treaties signed to the satisfaction of the aboriginal people.

Therefore, I support the agreement and I congratulate the minister for bringing it in, even if it is late.

Clause agreed to.

On Clause 3—Binding on Her Majesty

Mrs. Blondin-Andrew: Madam Chairman, in speaking before to Bill C-94, I did not get an opportunity to pay tribute to the people who were involved. I think this is very important.

The minister had the opportunity to do that, and I appreciate it, but a double tribute is not going to hurt in this case since the treaty was so much work.

The prominent Gwich'in have worked for the Gwich'in cause over the last 71 years. Chief Julius Salu of the Tetlit Gwich'in and Paul Niditchi of the Gwich'in were signatories to Treaty 11 in 1921.

The late Chief John Tetlitchi of the Tetlit Gwich'in represented the Tetlit Gwich'in for many years as chief and as a member of the legislative council of the Northwest Territories.

These individuals are outstanding leaders in their communities and basically drove the process at a time when it was not deemed to be either fashionable or the thing to do. Chief Johnny Charlie of the Tetlit Gwich'in represented the Tetlit Gwich'in for 10 years as chief and still plays an active role within the Gwich'in nation. He is also a very active member of the community as well as of the region. He is respected by many Dene people throughout the Northwest Territories and many aboriginal and non-aboriginal people.

Willard Hagen, president of the Gwich'in Tribal Council has led the Gwich'in since they decided to proceed with a comprehensive land claims agreement with the Government of Canada.

James Ross, Chief of the Tetlit Gwich'in, was instrumental in obtaining a Dene Métis Comprehensive Land Claim Agreement on April 9, 1992, and later the Gwich'in Comprehensive Land Claim Agreement. Chief Ross has served his community and his people in various capacities over the last 10 years. He has been very active within the region and within the Northwest Territories, and is recognized for his work. He is fiercely determined, a very proud man, very intelligent and very eloquent on issues that affect his people, as well as his region and the north in general.

The former leaders of the Gwich'in who deserve special recognition and praise are: Chief Hyacinthe Andre of Arctic Red River, the late Chief Johnny Kaye of Fort McPherson, Chief Andrew Stewart of Aklavik, Chief Grace Blake of Arctic Red River, David Krutko, a former negotiator of the Gwich'in claim and former vice-president of the Métis Nation of the Northwest Territories, Margaret Donovan, former vice-president of the Gwich'in Tribal Council, Fred Koe, former negotiator of the Gwich'in claim and currently the MLA for Inuvik in the Northwest Territories Legislative Assembly, Richard Nerysoo, the MLA for the Mackenzie Delta in the Northwest Territories Legislative Assembly, and newly appointed cabinet minister for the Government of the Northwest Territories, as well as having been a former Minister of Justice and a government leader of the Northwest Territories.

As well, I would like to commend and congratulate the current leadership of the Gwich'in Nation, without whose efforts the Gwich'in Comprehensive Land Claim Agreement might not have been realized:

Willard Hagen; James Firth, Chief of Inuvik and vice-president of the Gwich'in Tribal Council; Robert Alexie Jr., vice-president of the Gwich'in Tribal Council and former negotiator of the Gwich'in claim; Chief James Ross; Chief Eugene Pascal; Chief Peter Ross, Charlie Furlong, president of the Métis Local of Aklavik and former president of the Gwich'in Tribal Council; Morris Blake, president, Métis Local of Arctic Red River; Ernest Firth, president of the Métis Local, Fort McPherson; Tommy Wright, president, Métis Local, Inuvik.

In closing, I would like to say that we support the passage of Bill C-94. It is what the Gwich'in people want. There is a saying within that community and it reflects the history of the Gwich'in people.

During the celebrations and during the finalization of the comprehensive claim they passed out stickers, posters and sweat shirts, and on them it said something that speaks loudly for these people. All it says, as we have said many times about being Canadian, "Proud to be Canadian", many of those Gwich'in say "Proud to be Gwich'in".

Clause 4 agreed to.

On clause 5—Renewable Resources Board

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary Northeast): Madam Chairman, I would like to ask the minister a question concerning the Renewable Resources Board. Who is going to be sitting on that board and how are the members going to be elected or appointed to that board? Also, what are the powers of that board?

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Chairman, the Renewable Resources Board will comprise members chosen half from the governments, principally the federal government, but with the devolution of authority to the Government of the Northwest Territories, the GNWT will have a role, and half from the Gwich'in Nation people.

It will have authority to review the proposals for the harvesting of renewable resources on the Gwich'in territory. It should be remembered that the harvesting of renewable resources will be enabled with the first right of use to be granted to the Gwich'in people within their own territory. The board will adjudicate and consider the larger interests of the surrounding people, and within the context of the laws of Canada and the Government of the Northwest Territories, the implementation of those rights of the Gwich'in people.

• (1340)

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Madam Chairman, I wonder if the minister could indicate whether this concept of a renewable board is something that is being considered in relation to the other claims such as those in British Columbia.

As the minister knows very well, one of the more pressing considerations in the B.C. claims is obviously the fishery. There has been a considerable amount of discussion about impact evaluation, particularly independent impact evaluation in relation to the fishery. Certainly, part of that has been dealt with in this most recent negotiating process between the Government of Canada, the Northwest Territories, the Yukon and the Gwich'in.

I wonder if the minister could give us some idea how that concept is evolving or devolving toward the settlement of comprehensive claims in B.C.

Mr. Siddon: Madam Chairman, the concept of a Renewable Resource Management Board is an element of our approach to negotiations of a land claims settlement with any First Nations group. However, we do not want to pre-empt the latitude which is taken by the parties to the table in seeking a flexible arrangement.

I would not necessarily undertake that in the case of British Columbia land claims we would create an entity to be called a renewable resource board. There will be in the context of British Columbia land claims, provision for a process of negotiating self-government which is provided for in the Gwich'in land claim agreement as a subsequent step but in the context of British Columbia First Nations may be part and parcel on a parallel track with the settlement of the land based issues. It would be premature to anticipate how those arrangements would work.

In the case of the Gwich'in agreement, the provision for a Renewable Resource Management Board is something that will take place immediately, subject to establishing the membership of that board. It will have immediate effect upon the adoption of this legislation and it will deal with all matters of administering wildlife within the settlement area.

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Madam Chairman, I wonder if the minister can explain this. Within the 600 square miles, or whatever the area is, within the boundaries of the Yukon territory, will there be representatives from the Yukon government with respect to renewable resources in that area? Or does it even come under the jurisdiction of this renewable resources board?

Mr. Siddon: Madam Chairman, we should understand that the 600 square miles was provided in recognition of the fact that part of the traditional territory of the Gwich'in people was in an area known as the Upper Peel River Valley on the eastern side of the watershed.

However, due to an anomaly in the maps, when the boundary was drawn between Yukon and Northwest Territories, that area which was part of their traditional hunting and trapping area was caught on the western side of the boundary.

The 600 square miles are not to be administered in the same way as those within the primary Gwich'in settlement area within the Northwest Territories. The wildlife or renewable resource management would be administered in a co-operative way with the surrounding First Nations in the Yukon and subject to arrangements that will be worked out with the government of the Yukon territory as well.

In particular, the interests and concerns of the people of NaCho Nyak Dun will be taken into account and there will be no question of the management boards provided for in this agreement having effect in that other 600 square mile territory, which I think if I am correct, falls under what we describe as a fee-simple type of arrangement subject to management structures being worked out with the existing public government, the government of the Yukon territory and in collaboration with the surrounding First Nations.

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary Northeast): Madam Chairman, my understanding is, if I am correct, that half of the board is appointed by the federal government and the other half is appointed or elected by the Gwich'in people. If there is a tie vote, what happens?

Is there a veto by the Gwich'in people if they really disagree on a given subject or is it carried simply by a majority vote?

Mr. Siddon: Madam Chairman, the board will have responsibility to administer renewable resources under provisions of the existing laws of general application that apply in that region of the Northwest Territories, unless and until a self-government agreement gives it expanded powers over the management of wildlife in that area. It does recognize its pre-eminent right to the harvesting of wildlife resources.

There are to be six members of the board, as I understand it: three from the government, non-aboriginal, and three from the Gwich'in nation, plus a chairman for a total of seven. The chairman is to be a resident in the settlement area, is to be nominated by members of the board and appointed jointly by the Governor in Council and executive council of the two governments.

Therefore, the presumption would be that if the chairperson is drawn from within the settlement area it would be a Gwich'in person. Then the Gwich'in would have the ultimate say in decisions taken by the management board but they would not be binding on the public government in terms of existing laws, unless those laws are changed through the negotiation of the self-government agreement which is provided for in this settlement act.

The Chairman: Shall Clause 5 carry?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Clause agreed to.

On Clause 6—Orders and Regulations

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary Northeast): Madam Chairman, I imagine the orders and regulations are coming from the Order in Council so it is really the federal government that makes all those regulations.

Are the Gwich'in people really happy with this type of situation? Naturally, if we make the regulations, we control more or less everything as well as orders and there is no input from the aboriginal people at all. If everything is Order in Council it is done by the federal government and its ministry.

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Chairman, that is not the case, although in law I believe the hon. member makes a valid point. If we had constitutionally recognized inherent right of self-government with clear designated authorities residing with First Nation governments, as had been envisaged in the Charlottetown accord, there would be no question of the powers of those First Nation governments being in any way fettered by the powers of Parliament.

However, under our present system of law and given the supremacy of Parliament, this is the body which must implement laws with respect to the administration of all territories within Canada unless those laws fall within provincial constitutional jurisdiction or by delegation are exercised by territories or other levels of government.

Under the present system of law within Canada if the orders and regulations to give effect to this agreement are to be changed they must be changed by Governor in Council.

The question the hon. member asked was: Do the Gwich'in people consent to this arrangement? Yes, they do, and I am advised that clause 3.127 of the agreement provides that the agreement may be amended—this is why we would use Orders in Council—with the consent of Canada, the Gwich'in as represented by the Gwich'in Tribal Council and where the territorial government is affected, the Government of the Northwest Territories.

In other words, there is no question here of the Parliament of Canada usurping the authority and the recognition of Gwich'in prerogatives with respect to their territory. Their consent would be required.

Mr. Kindy: Madam Chairman, is the consent binding on the government? Does it mean that if they do not give consent there can be no change to the agreement, or is it correct?

• (1350)

Mr. Siddon: Madam Chairman, as we have passed clause 3 we will not return to debate on it. Clause 3 says:

> This act is binding on Her Majesty in right of Canada or a province.

The section of the Gwich'in settlement agreement which I referred to, clause 3.127, is a section of the agreement which is being approved by way of this legislation today. Therefore, if it is binding upon Her Majesty in the right of Canada and provides for the consent of the Gwich'in Tribal Council I believe that should answer the hon. member's question.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 7 agreed to.

On Clause 8—Inconsistency or conflict

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary Northeast): Madam Chairman, in case of environmental damage, pollution or whatever might happen to the environment, is there any provision that any construction in that area would go to a review board so that there would be no things done to the environment that would be inconsistent with the new concept on the environment?

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Chairman, as with the Renewable Resource Board we spent some time discussing a few moments ago, there is also provision for an Environment Impact Review Board. In all there are some five boards which will deal with the administration of water rights, for example, environmental impact and the governance arrangements.

The Environmental Impact Review Board will be structured in a parallel way to the Renewable Resource Management Board. It would have the responsibility of assuring that the necessary environmental standards by which we are all constrained would be carefully considered before any regulations were adopted which might affect either the interest of the Gwich'in people or others residing within their territory or surrounding the perimeter of their territory.

Furthermore, where there is a dispute as to decisions arising from the advice of that Environmental Impact Review Board there is also provision for an arbitration process within the legislation.

Clause agreed to.

On Clause 9—Payments out of C.R.F.

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary Northeast): Madam Chairman, as far as appropriation is concerned, the funding of all this agreement, does the minister have any numbers to show how it is budgeted, how much it is going to cost to implement that agreement, and whether it is going to pay for itself or the federal government will have to disburse moneys?

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Chairman, subsequent to the initialling and signing of the settlement agreement there was a negotiation of something called an implementation agreement. This is an important aspect of our policy on land claims. It is not good enough to make promises. We must have a system for carrying out those promises and providing the mechanisms and funding to do so.

In this implementation agreement there has been negotiated a one-time payment of $8.4 million to establish the management boards that were referred to earlier and the mechanisms so that the provisions of the agreement can be carried out. Then there will be an annual budget of $2.4 million thereafter to provide for the financing of the year-to-year provisions of the agreement.

Preamble agreed to.

Mr. Siddon: Madam Chairman, at this stage I would like to compliment all members of the House who have taken such an interest in his important and historic achievement. Particularly I compliment the member for the Western Arctic whose constituency encompasses the Gwich'in settlement area.

I have been involved with this process over some three years. I have met the leadership and representatives of the Gwich'in nation on many occasions. I would like to say how impressed I have been with their commitment to securing the conclusion of this important agreement.

I want to reflect for a moment on the mood in the hall at Fort McPherson on April 22 when this agreement was signed. There was a huge map behind the stage of the territory, as well as the assets and amenities of that territory. On all the walls of the gymnasium were extracts from the text of the agreement. Every member of those communities who came to witness the signing of the agreement on April 22 had a full, complete, and, for the younger members of those communities, impressive knowledge and understanding of the matters we are debating in the House this afternoon.

I commend the Gwich'in people on their study and preparation for this important matter which we hopefully will approve today. It bodes very well for their future.

Mr. Kindy: Madam Chairman, I would like to add that the minister certainly deserves the praise of this House for having done that. I am sure he will continue to serve the aboriginal people well.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported, concurred in, read the third time and passed.

Mr. Jelinek: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Pursuant to Standing Order 53, I move that the notice provisions of Standing Order 54 be suspended for the following government motion:

• (1400)

That, notwithstanding Standing Order 45(6), the deferred division on government business No. 15 be taken immediately upon adoption of this order,

That the said government motion stand on this day's Order Paper in the name of Mr. Valcourt and;

That Standing Order 24(3) regarding the daily adjournment of the House be suspended for this day's sitting.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I will put the motion to the House and then hear argument on whether the motion is acceptable. The motion can be debated, so we will debate it after.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

Madam Deputy Speaker: There is a one-hour debate.

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants): Madam Speaker, procedure is almost becoming more important than the substance of where we are today. This is fundamental and I cannot believe the advice of the Table to the Chair would allow this motion to be put.

Section 53(2) it says, if one takes the time to read it, that the minister in proposing the motion has to state reasons for the urgency of such a motion and then the Speaker shall propose the question to the House. There was not a reason mentioned in the minister's motion about why this is an urgent motion.

My point goes much further to say that the motion is also fundamentally defective because this talks about notice and/or days and sittings. There was a notice about where we are in this procedural problem. The point is that this is a national urgent matter that I think has only been used once before and ironically I think it was in the peacekeeping of Cyprus 20 some years ago. The fact of the matter is that this motion is for matters to be handled, not to try to remedy a problem the government finds itself in now by not observing the rules. This is for future events. My position is that this matter has been defined and it is no question of notice. It is no question of hours and days of sitting. It is a question that in effect we had a motion of the minister, as Your Honour says. That motion was put and the question was put. You were in the chair this morning, Madam Speaker, when the question was put. Five members rose to force a vote.

I want to see the "blues". I am sure Your Honour has seen the "blues" and the question was called. Five members rose and Your Honour said something. Most of the words I heard. Then there was a little confusion: "That pursuant to Standing Order so and so, the order to defer the vote until another time".

There were some of us in this House who appreciated the problem the government might be in if the motion was put to a vote, we had a deferral, and in view of the Christmas recess this would give time for this motion to sit out there.

It is an amendment to the Constitution. Even yesterday the opposition House leader was talking to the government House leader in terms of the order of business and talking about notice.

We got on to something about other matters to be discussed. If this matter is so urgent how come there was not any previous notice? Even yesterday, in effect talking about what might come up, the opposition House leader at page 15049 said:

I thought that perhaps it was an innocent mistake—

Referring to the government House leader's outline of business.

—with regard to other business that may be raised tomorrow, particularly in view of what has transpired in other jurisdictions.

The inference was very clear of what happened in the legislature of New Brunswick.

There is no person here, and certainly not myself, who is reflecting on what happened in the province of New Brunswick. New Brunswick can look after itself and decide to pass its own laws as it already has.

What some members have forgotten is that this is the Parliament of Canada, not the legislature of New Brunswick. This motion has very serious implications. It certainly is a very important motion. It is an amendment to the Constitution.

There were many of us who were thinking of speaking this morning. However, knowing the rules and knowing you cannot roll back the clock, even if this is Friday and knowing we cannot have another Black Friday in this House, we knew that if the vote was put the matter would be deferred. Let it be deferred if it is an important matter so that there can be reflection across the country. Some of us by this procedure of trying to get back into it, having had the vote, in effect are precluded from now debating the issue, even though we can debate on a procedural point.

How can the Chair accept the motion when the minister did not even give the request for urgency?

Madam Deputy Speaker: If the hon. member would remain in his seat for a minute, I think I may be able to settle that right away and to his satisfaction.

While re-reading article 53, I have to admit that the hon. member for Annapolis Valley—Hants is right in saying that when presenting his motion, the hon. minister did not as per Standing Order 53(2) state reasons for the urgency of such a motion. At this time I must decide that the motion is not receivable by the Chair.

I wish to inform the House that pursuant to Standing Order 33(2)(b) because of a ministerial statement, Government Orders will be extended by 21 minutes.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

NOVA SCOTIA COURTS AMENDMENT ACT, 1992

MEASURE TO ENACT

Hon. Charles Mayer (for the Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada) moved that Bill C-96, an act to amend the Judges Act and other acts to give effect to the reconstitution of the courts in Nova Scotia, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Departmental envelope.

Mr. Dingwall: Madam Speaker, I think there is a disposition that the subject matter not be referred to a legislative committee but in fact referred to Committee of the Whole.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Madam Deputy Speaker: It is so ordered.

• (1410)

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the House went into committee thereon, Mrs. Champagne in the chair.

[Translation]

The Chairman: House in Committee of the Whole on Bill C-96, an act to amend the Judges act and other acts to give effect to the reconstitution of the courts in Nova Scotia.

[English]

On Clause 2—

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Madam Chairman, I have just a brief question for the parliamentary secretary.

This particular statute, cited as the Nova Scotia Courts Amendments Act, will do away, as I understand it, with all county and district courts in Nova Scotia, which is the same as a provincial statute which has been passed in the legislature in Nova Scotia. Can the parliamentary secretary indicate how many Superior Court judges will now be in place in Nova Scotia as a result of this.

Mr. Lee Richardson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Madam Chairman, I frankly do not know. If I can just have a minute, I can look it up. If you want to go on to something else. It is not something I have readily available. Thirty-three.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Madam Chairman, may I just ask a question or can I make a comment?

The Chairman: The hon. member has up to 20 minutes.

Mr. Waddell: Let me begin by saying a few things about the bill and perhaps the parliamentary secretary can respond. I know the position he is in.

As the Chair knows, this legislation enables Nova Scotia to proceed with reorganizing and streamlining the court system, merging the County Court and the Supreme Court trial division into one court, the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia. That has been done in most parts of the country, so we will support the bill.

The Supreme Court appeal division will now be constituted as a separate court, the Nova Scotia Court of Appeal. That is like in British Columbia, where we have the Supreme Court of British Columbia and then the Court of Appeal for British Columbia. It is a housekeeping bill, removing references to the County Court and the judges' salaries associated with that institution.

I just want to point out to the parliamentary secretary that the drafters of this legislation took the time to include clauses which remove sexist language from the drafting, I think for the first time. For example, subclause 33(1) reads "of the province concerned of the judge's election as provided" where the original read "of the province concerned of his election as provided". Of course, we have a lot more women judges.

That is one of the matters I wanted to ask about. In the Nova Scotia legislature there was a bill, Bill 241, the Court Reform Act, which was passed this spring in the Nova Scotia legislature. Speaking for the New Democrats, John Holm, called the bill "by and large a tremendous move forward". He noted that "certainly we will be supporting it". Therefore, if it is good enough for Mr. Holm, it is good enough for me in this instance.

I read the Nova Scotia debates with care. Miss Sandra Jolly, who is the member from Dartmouth, raised a number of interesting matters.

She raised the matter of other recommendations that were being put forward with the Nova Scotia bill, a recommendation that judges, lawyers, police, prosecutors and court staff should receive regular supervised training to ensure that they understand the unique nature of domestic violence and to assure that they are kept abreast of developments in this area. In other words, so the court and the court officials know about domestic violence and what that means because so many of these cases are coming before the courts.

Another recommendation that was made in Nova Scotia was that the Government of Nova Scotia should, in relation to family violence, promote and encourage more effective needs, assessments and planning, better service co-ordination, stronger client advocacy, public and professional education, preventive strategies in the development of a treatment program for batterers, mainly wife batterers.

A third recommendation that was mentioned by the hon. member in Nova Scotia was mandatory gender sensitive training for judges.

Does this bill deal with any of these matters and if not, why not? Is the government doing to deal with these very legitimate questions that were raised in the Nova Scotia legislature?

Mr. Richardson: Madam Chairman, this specific bill simply deals with the changing of the courts in Nova Scotia. I do want to thank the hon. member for raising the point that he did. Of course the government does take cognizance of all these reports.

In relation to the gender of language raised by the member this government has now appointed over 100 women to the bench in Canada. We were proud in Alberta that the new Chief Justice of Alberta, Catherine Fraser, was the 100th appointed by this government.

Mr. Waddell: Madam Chairman, the parliamentary secretary did not answer my question about the gender-sensitive training of the judges.

On the matter of gender sensitivity training for judges, there was a Liberal bill or motion in this House but it was pulled at the last minute. I do not know why but it was just pulled. It seemed to me that was too bad because it was a motion that this House could have debated.

I take it then that the parliamentary secretary does not have anything new to add to the matter of training for gender sensitivity.

Mr. Richardson: Madam Chairman, I am sorry if the hon. member missed it, but I did in fact note that the government takes cognizance of all of these such reports. However, it has been brought to my attention that the federally appointed judges take quite an active role in pursuing judicial education and this is only one area in which they are further enlightening themselves.

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary Northeast): Madam Chairman, I see that Bill C-96 deals as well with the retirement age of judges. There are a couple of examples of judges retiring at the age of 70.

Could the parliamentary secretary tell us what criteria was used to come to this particular age? Some judges in the United States are 80 and they still have not retired from the Supreme Court of the United States. Some judges might be incompetent at the age of 50.

Is there any provision in the bill to retire judges forcefully before they reach that age?

• (1420)

Mr. Richardson: Madam Chairman, I believe there is reference to a joint resolution of both Houses of Parliament to take such an action.

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants): Madam Chairman, having practised in Nova Scotia in my early days, I am obviously interested in any act that reforms.

I know what has been going on there in terms of the merger of the county court system with the Supreme Court system following the precedence in other jurisdictions. Frankly, there are so many questions one could raise on this whole matter.

I did not fully appreciate that it was going to be on the floor of the House today, although I must say that I now see it is on the Notice Paper for today.

I was interested in the questions put by the hon. member for Port Moody—Coquitlam who is the NDP justice critic. He has certainly maintained a consistent interest in this field. I was also interested in the parliamentary secretary's answer. I certainly agree with the parliamentary secretary that the government has moved eons in appointing women to the judicial role.

Just recently, one of the last appointments—and it was not the person the parliamentary secretary mentioned—but it was certainly a former friend of mine in the sense that she was a resident of the Annapolis Valley. She was a county court judge and family court judge and has become one of the more recent Supreme Court judges in Nova Scotia.

Mr. Kindy: He is an independent and got some appointments. That is good.

Mr. Nowlan: I had nothing to do with this. It is not the gender question, per se. It is a question of the single parents. Of course, in most cases it is usually the woman looking for support from the absconding male. This is very serious.

I can think of many situations but obviously I am not going to mention names. There are a number of single parents who have gone through the family court process involving the county court judge. They have gone through long hearings and often, the male does not show up. The legal bills have been astronomical. I can think of one person in the heart of my riding who for a total of about $800 in family support payments has run up a legal bill of over $26,000 with a firm that I know very well.

After having heard all these facts for and unfortunately knowing some of the players, I seriously considered writing or taking some action to ask the judicial system of Nova Scotia why this was happening. Why did the judge in charge render decisions and keep delaying and let the defaulter continue to default?

I tried to quickly look through the bill when it first hit the floor. Is there anything in this bill whereby the parent can write to a judicial committee of the court setting out the facts that they think they have not been treated fairly. Maybe they could also complain about legal bills and perhaps have some redress. Is that redress separate and apart from the judicial system?

Mr. Richardson: Madam Chairman, I appreciate the question from the member and his concern for those circumstances in his riding.

The requirements he was asking about are really beyond the scope of this bill. This bill is neither major nor complex. Its provisions are essentially technical.

What we are doing here is to substantially affect the functioning of the legal system in Nova Scotia by making necessary amendments to federal law to permit the court restructuring in the province of Nova Scotia. That is essentially what we are doing with this bill. It is essentially a technical bill to allow the province of Nova Scotia to restructure its court.

Mr David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Madam Chairman, very briefly to the parliamentary secretary. I must say he is doing an admirable job in responding to the many and varied concerns on the subject matter before us.

We understand there are now 33 Superior Court judges in the province of Nova Scotia. Perhaps he might want to indicate the annual salary range for those judges.

We note that retirement is at age 70. Is that a reduction from the previous high of 75 down to 70? I presume that corresponds to the provincial legislation in Nova Scotia.

Regarding the sensitivity that judges display in their respective courts, my colleague from the New Democratic Party raised a number of concerns which had been placed on the floor of the Nova Scotia House of Assembly by the Liberal critic from Dartmouth.

One was with regard to sensitivity that judges have or should have in their courtrooms. I wonder whether it is the desire of the Government of Canada to come forward with subsequent legislation in terms of mandatory training for judges on gender sensitivity as well as the whole issue of family violence, which is becoming more prevalent as time goes on.

That concludes all of the questions I have regarding this particular bill. Perhaps I may put in a supplementary for my dear friend and colleague from Annapolis Valley—Hants. The parliamentary secretary could indicate to our colleague, who is a distinguished member of the bar of the province of Nova Scotia, whether or not there are any vacancies available at the present time.

Mr. Richardson: I am sure the hon. member for Annapolis Valley—Hants is not holding his breath for a moment, or really even wondering if the reason for the question is to find an answer for him rather than for other members in the House.

First let me deal with the question on the training of judges. Yes, obviously we are very concerned about the reasons for the question and the discussion in the country today. The government, as I said, takes cognizance of all such reports.

If I could just get the attention of the member for Annapolis Valley—Hants, an ordinary judge would make $155,800. The retirement age is set for the Superior Court at age 75 and County Court judges 70 until it is raised by this legislation.

Just to clarify this, apparently in 1975 the retirement age of judges was raised from 70 to 75. This bill will take it back to 70 but it simply grandfathers those who were on the bench subsequent to 1975.

Mr. Kindy: A supplementary, Madam Speaker. The parliamentary secretary forgot to answer part of my question. It was whether judges who are appointed are being screened. Is there any process to appoint judges not just by the whim of the Prime Minister or Order in Council? Those judges should be screened and have some training as well.

What bothers me as well as the very high salaries is it is also my understanding that some judges have limousines given to them. Maybe not in Nova Scotia, but in certain provinces they have limousines given to them. Could he inform us on that?

• (1430)

What happens to the judge who is 69 or 70 and just marries? I know of one case in which a young lady married a judge because his wife died, and she was about 22. The judge died a year later and my understanding is that there is no provision, so that she would not receive a pension. Is there any consideration given to this matter?

Mr. Richardson: Madam Chairman, these are matters entirely beyond the scope of this act.

For the member's information, it might be useful for the House to know that there are advisory committees of the bar and others who advise the minister and the department, on recommendation to the Prime Minister. I would take exception to his point that judges are being selected on a whim.

With regard to any perks that the judges might have, I think service would be provided by the provinces and not by the federal government, if in fact such services existed.

Mr. Waddell: Madam Chairman, the hon. parliamentary secretary is right.

This is dealt with in another act, the Judges Act, which is being considered by this House. However, members have just made a good point. This is a huge salary increase, is it not?

An hon. member: No.

Mr. Waddell: It is not? Perhaps I had better ask that. It looks to me that if we take county court judges who were making $70,000 and make them Supreme Court judges who are making $155,000—

An hon. member: That is wrong.

Mr. Waddell: Maybe I heard the wrong figures. I thought the parliamentary secretary said that in Nova Scotia they were making $70,000, and now they are going to be Supreme Court judges making $155,000.

Perhaps he could clarify that. Could the parliamentary secretary clarify that?

Mr. Richardson: Madam Chairman, that is a misunderstanding. I am sorry. I am not quite sure, it is a misunderstanding.

As a matter of fact, for the county judges I think it is about a $5,000 increase. I am sorry if there was some confusion.

Mr. Waddell: Madam Chairman, perhaps the last point I would raise is one that the parliamentary secretary discussed.

First, I should tell the member that the Minister of Justice actually rejected gender sensitivity training. The government rejected that because the minister considers it to be interfering with the judiciary. Other people have different views on that question.

However, I raised the matter of getting more women on the bench and he responded. He said a lot of women were appointed. He is from Alberta. The last appointment to the Supreme Court of Canada was Mr. Justice William Stevenson, who has written about four judgments and who is a man. I am sorry, he was second last. There was William Stevenson and then John Major, who is another man.

The Minister of Justice said that they had approached and offered the job to several outstanding female judges, but they turned it down. There is a problem in getting women judges.

The Vancouver Sun wrote an editorial on November 26 saying:

> If the federal government recognizes there is a problem—and there is one when only two of the court's nine judges are women—

That is, in the Supreme Court of Canada. Often women come up through the courts from Nova Scotia or British Columbia, for example, to the Supreme Court of Canada.

The editorial continued:

> —it should be working to find a solution. There is no simple answer, but one thing it might consider is the requirement that Supreme Court judges live in Ottawa.
> And what about job sharing in the top court? It's a radical idea, but smaller case loads and the ability to remain based in their home provinces might make more judges—male and female—consider a Supreme Court appointment.

In other words, it would not be a full-time job so that a woman could feel, if she has to spend time with her family, that the family will not be destroyed. More important, women will not feel that by taking one of these jobs they will put their family in jeopardy. That is a barrier that stands in the way of women being appointed to the court.

My friend from Annapolis Valley thinks—ladies and women is what he calls them. Both ladies and judges are women.

An hon. member: He is discovering both categories.

Mr. Waddell: Has the government considered new ways or new ideas to get more women on the bench to occupy some of these jobs?

I wonder if you could tell me when you are answering that, of the 33 Supreme Court judges in Nova Scotia how many will be women?

Mr. Richardson: Madam Chairman, I again want to thank the hon. member for this interesting interjection which has no relevance to this particular bill. He has laid some very important points on the table that we can think about in anticipation of a review of the Judges Act.

I am sorry that I do not have that information here. It is not part of the act. I do not have that information.

Mr. Kindy: Madam Chairman, I am wondering about presiding judges. The official languages bill, the last one we passed in the last Parliament, stated that presiding judges would have to be perfectly bilingual, as would presiding chairmen of commissions.

This regulation probably comes into effect very soon. Is the justice department studying this question? Is it making provisions so that anglophone judges would study the French language and francophone judges would study the English language in order to be appointed presiding judges? I would like to know whether this question is being addressed by the department.

Mr. Richardson: Madam Chairman, this particular bill, and the amendments contained therein, will give effect a decision by the province of Nova Scotia to restructure its courts by merging the county court into the Supreme Court in Nova Scotia and by establishing the current Supreme Court Appeal Division as a separate court called the Nova Scotia Court of Appeal.

That is the nature and intent of this bill. Although there is some interest in the questions raised they have no relevance to what we are discussing here today.

Mr. Dingwall: Madam Chairman, further to a question that has been raised by my colleague, the hon. member for Calgary Northeast, I was wondering if the parliamentary secretary, whose knowledge of the subject matter which we are debating is extensive, could perhaps secure from the officials and perhaps give us a date when he could do the following.

It is my understanding that with respect to jurisdictions, particularly with respect to federal appointments, an arrangement has been concluded with the Minister of Justice and the Canadian Bar Association, as well as the provincial attorneys general. There is now a new system in place with regard to how justices are appointed to Superior Court, some of them accept applications, with respect to the screening process et cetera.

I am led to believe that there is a manual which is readily available. I wonder if the parliamentary secretary could secure from the officials an undertaking to table the procedures that are used for the appointment of justices in this country, and which take into consideration a variety of different characteristics?

I am sure that it is readily available. I would hope that the parliamentary secretary could provide that information to the House.

Mr. Richardson: Madam Chairman, the question is again entirely beyond the scope of this bill. However, as a courtesy to the hon. member I will be pleased to make the Attorney General aware of his interest.

Mr. Kindy: Madam Chairman, what really interests me is the fact that the parliamentary secretary does not seem to answer the questions that are being posed. I thought that he was very much enlightened and very competent in this domain.

I sat on the justice committee in the last Parliament. We did some re-writing on the Criminal Code. At that time a question was posed as to whether judges who refuse policemen the order to have a search warrant should be questioned. Is anything in the department being looked at if a judge refuses a request by a policeman for a search warrant, whether this can be appealed in some manner?

• (1440)

Mr. Richardson: I know it is in the hon. member's interest today to delay proceedings in the House, but this is outrageous. What possible relevance has this question to this bill, a simple technical bill to restructure the courts in Nova Scotia?

I am sorry, but it is so far beyond the scope of this bill, there will be no answer forthcoming to that particular question.

Mr. Nowlan: Madam Chairman, before the parliamentary secretary leaps to too many conclusions and imputes too many motives, for his assertion about delaying here, no one over here caused the procedural problem that presently faces the House.

We have sat here all day and have already passed a very important bill. With all respect to the junior inexperienced parliamentary secretary, for that parliamentary secretary to think that delay tactics have been used here to the extreme, he is, with all respect to the opposition House leader, more often in bed with the government on many things than on his own. He in effect does not understand what parliamentary opposition let alone obstruction is.

There has not been one tittle of obstruction on the very important bill of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development which went through this House and Committee of the Whole. That in itself opened up the whole question of self-government for aboriginals and the Charlottetown accord and we could have talked quite relevantly until the cows came home on that. There was circumspection and in effect relevance to the questions put and that bill got through.

The parliamentary secretary can say that in effect this is just a reorganization of the courts of Nova Scotia and the fact of the matter is it has something to do with the judicial system in Nova Scotia. That in itself opens up the whole question of the judicial system in Nova Scotia on which any member from Nova Scotia or any member from across the country could have an awful lot to say.

Let us not have disparaging remarks on legitimate questions that perhaps the parliamentary secretary may not agree with, but it is certainly nothing in terms of the rules of obstruction and parliamentary debate that prevents us moving ahead.

While I am still on my feet, I must say I do have more questions that I hope the parliamentary secretary will not take umbrage with. I frankly was absolutely amazed. I have not practised law for years and I know what the members of Parliament get. We get frozen and everyone gets frozen. I was on the phone in the lobby talking to some good people from Nova Scotia about what they thought about this bill. I hope to hear from them in the next two or three minutes so that I will have perhaps some more relevant questions that will ease the ear of the parliamentary secretary, rather than what I am going to say now.

I was very surprised. I heard the parliamentary secretary answer when I was on the phone. Did he say the judges as defined in this bill get $155,000? I point out to him a study that I have done. We in Canada in many areas are paid quite a bit and sometimes too much. I understand it from work done in my office, that compares with the Chief Justice of the United States of $166,200 U.S, but that is more than this judge. Supreme Court justices under the Supreme Court get $159,000 U.S; again that is the very top court.

Circuit court judges in the United States receive $137,300 U.S. District judges, which would be I guess like our former county court judges, get $129,500 U.S.

I do think if the answer of my friend the parliamentary secretary of $155,000, albeit Canadian, is correct for the judges created by this bill in the reorganized court, although some of my judge friends may not agree with this, they are very well paid.

Back to the question that even though the parliamentary secretary says this is a technical reconstruction of a court, I find it very difficult when you eliminate the county court and put them all into one court that you consider this just a technical change. Even with a technical change, does the parliamentary secretary to the government not think there is any merit in having some type of judicial committee that the citizen can write to, complaining about problems, somewhat like an ombudsman, for a citizen in the courts who feels that perhaps he has not been served properly or do they just have to come to members of Parliament or do they write to the Chief Justice?

Mr. Richardson: Madam Chairman, here we go again. It is a novel and interesting idea and I am sure that if constituents came to the hon. member for Annapolis Valley—Hants they would be well served.

With reference to the salaries, this bill does not deal with the salaries per se. It is simply levels the field across Canada and moves the county court. That is a figure that has been established across Canada for ordinary judges across the country. For the member's information, that amount has been frozen for the next two years. There will be no increases.

Mr. Kindy: Madam Chairman, I see that Bill C-96 deals as well with additional judges. I would like to have the parliamentary secretary, who is very knowledgeable in these matters, explain—

Mr. Nowlan: He is parliamentary secretary for transport, not justice.

Mr. Kindy: I am sorry, transport. Perhaps he is more knowledgeable about the question of the Canadian airlines and Air Canada and maybe he knows about debts and liabilities and assets.

Could he tell this House what are the criteria to appoint additional judges? Who makes the appointments? Who makes the recommendations? The public should really know how our additional judges are appointed. What is the procedure for anybody to become a judge? I think there were questions here and discussion that we should have more female judges. I agree with that. There should be judges who are sensitive in certain areas much more than some of them are today.

Maybe the parliamentary secretary could tell us what the criteria are for the appointment of additional judges and how many additional judges this bill provides for.

Mr. Richardson: I thank the hon. member again for his question. It was a question raised just moments ago by the hon. member from Cape Breton. He may want to refer to Hansard for my reply to that question.

Mr. Kindy: I do not think this answer is satisfactory. He did not answer how many additional judges would be appointed, what the criteria were to appoint those judges. How do you proceed? Maybe the parliamentary secretary does not understand my question.

Hon. Paul Dick (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Chairman, we in this House as members of Parliament, and I happen to be a lawyer as well, have all received from the Minister of Justice information on how judges can be appointed in this country.

Any person who wants to be a judge has to fill out an application and it has to go to the judicial council and is reviewed by the Canadian Bar Association and with the office of the Minister of Justice. Any person can put in their name, any member of Parliament, any one from the public can recommend a person as long as that person will also file an application that they want to be a judge.

We have all known that procedure has been in place for at least four or five years. I would be very surprised if the hon. member has not known that as well for four or five years. Other than that he should read his mail.

• (1450)

Mr. Kindy: Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the comment of the minister. At least he has informed us how judges are appointed or how they apply.

I know that he knows and probably most members know as well but the question was put to the parliamentary secretary so that he could inform the public. The public wants to know why certain people are being appointed and others are not being appointed. Some very superior lawyers are being by-passed, not just making an application.

Another factor that the minister did not mention is that lawyers have to be a member of the bar for 10 years before they can apply to be appointed a judge.

Mr. Dick: So you have read it. You know all about it. Why ask the questions?

Mr. Kindy: So the public knows how the judges are being appointed.

I wish there were more female judges on the Supreme Court of Canada. The ratio of judges, men to women, is very low. I hope that the government will continue to do the proper thing and appoint not only people that may be friendly to the government as judges but judges should be screened on the basis of their competence.

Clause agreed to.

Mr. Edwards: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order. I would move:

> That notwithstanding Standing Order 28(2), at any time during the adjournment of the House between December 14, 1992 and February 1, 1993, the Speaker may, after consultation with the government, cause the House to sit for the sole purpose of giving Royal Assent to a bill or bills; and following each Royal Assent the Speaker shall each time further adjourn the House forthwith until February 1, 1993, and that the provisions of Standing Order 28(3) respecting the recall of the House for urgent and pressing matters not be superseded by the provisions of this order.

The Deputy Chairman: I have to say to the hon. member that we are in committee of the whole and I cannot take the motion until I am in the Chair.

Clauses 3 to 11 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 12—Superior and Tax Courts

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary Northeast): Mr. Chairman, I would like an explanation of clause 12. I see in the bill that clause 12 deals with superior and tax courts. I have a question on that.

I know that most tax judges travel across the country and naturally they are under a lot of pressure. They are being paid certain allowances for when they stay in hotels and they have to pay for their meals. Does this bill provide for any additional tax judges because as far as I know they are overworked? Does this bill provide for that?

Mr. Lee Richardson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): No, it does not.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 13 agreed to.

On Clause 14—

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants): Mr. Chairman, clause 14 refers in the amendment to "the judge attending the judicial centre at which or in the immediate vicinity of which the judge maintains his or her principal office". Would the parliamentary secretary please explain to me what is the purport of that amendment?

Mr. Lee Richardson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Chairman, I am advised that the purpose is simply to prohibit the claiming of an additional travel expense.

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary Northeast): Mr. Chairman, as I understand it, this is so he should not claim another expense for his travels or hotels. Who is checking on that? How is it verified?

Mr. Richardson: Again, Mr. Chairman, this is beyond the scope of this bill.

Clause agreed to.

On Clause 15—Judges of Supreme Court of Nova Scotia

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants): Mr. Chairman, again I am a little surprised at the parliamentary secretary saying, when a question is put, that it is beyond the scope of the bill. Clause 15 sets out in great detail "of judges, judicial centres and expense claims, travel allowances, moving or transportation expenses and reasonable travel and other expenses incurred by the judge in attending" a judicial centre.

Members may not have to like it, and perhaps he is supposed to know this from reading all the paper that we get across our desks, but what is the system? I think it is a legitimate question. What is the system for?

Mr. Kindy: Absolutely.

Mr. Nowlan: As members of Parliament we have the unfortunate situation of today—a point of privilege which I thought was not in good taste about one of our colleagues who has just got himself into real problems, I gather—and we are subject to expense claims or some review and accountability. It is a proper question for a member to ask and the public has a right to know what is the system for judges to show their accountability of their expenses in their various forms.

Mr. Lee Richardson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Chairman, that is a somewhat different question. I appreciate the member's reference to the section. The question referred to who was responsible for it and that is not part of the bill. I am sorry if there was confusion in my original answer.

For the record, Mr. Chairman, if it is in the interests of the House and now that the member has raised the question, I can tell him that the Commissioners for Federal Judicial Affairs administers this and all judicial expenses across the country.

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary Northeast): Mr. Chairman, I like this answer a little bit better because at least it deals with the subject matter.

Could the parliamentary secretary explain to us how this commission works? Who are those people who are on the commission; who appoints them; are they bureaucrats or are they appointed people; are they independent of the judiciary? How does it work? Is it a self-governing body? These are very important questions for everybody. We need accountability of everybody, not just parliamentarians and other bureaucrats, but judges as well.

I would like him to answer that question straightforwardly.

Mr. Richardson: Mr. Chairman, although this question is not particularly related to the change of the courts of Nova Scotia, I may in the interests of providing information to the House—and I am sure this is the member's reason for seeking this sort of information—refer him to Chapter J-1, the Judges Act, in section 73 where it refers to the Commissioner for Federal Judicial Affairs.

• (1500)

I will quote in the interest of the member if he wants to persist in this line of questioning: "There shall be an officer called the commissioner for federal judicial affairs who shall have the rank and status of a deputy head of a department who shall be appointed by the Governor in Council after consultation with the minister with the council or such committee thereof as named for the purpose by the council".

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 16 and 17 agreed to.

On clause 18—Definition of "judicial office"

The Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 18 carry?

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary Northeast): No, no.

The Deputy Chairman: No, no, what?

Mr. Kindy: You are going very fast, and I did not have the time to look at it.

Mr. Nowlan: What clause?

Mr. Kindy: It is clause 16.

The Deputy Chairman: We have already gone past clause 16. We have passed clause 17. We are on clause 18 right now.

Mr. Kindy: We are on clause 18. This is what happens, Mr. Chairman.

It is the definition of a judicial office:

> "judicial office" means the office of a judge of a superior court or of the Tax Court of Canada.

Is that the office that is located in the court itself or is it a different office? What happens to judges who travel? What offices do they use?

Mr. Lee Richardson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Chairman, the answer to that question is totally irrelevant to this particular bill.

We will give the member a minute to find a reasonable question to ask.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 19, 20 and 21 agreed to.

On clause 22—Annuity to surviving children

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary Northeast): Mr. Chairman, I have a question. Clause 22 deals with the death of a judge. If I remember right, I had asked the parliamentary secretary what happens to the widow or the children.

He did not answer. He said that it was an irrelevant question because it did not deal with the subject matter. I see that clause 22 specifically deals with that. Maybe he could revert to the first question and I will ask him: If a judge marries at age 69 because his wife died and he is a widower, and he marries just three months before dying, at that point, is the widow entitled to three-quarters of his pension?

Mr. Lee Richardson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Chairman, I am just conferring with officials here to get a specific answer to that question.

In such a case, I am advised that the second widow in this case would receive one-third.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 23 agreed to.

On clause 24—Chief justice or chief judge to report.

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary Northeast): Mr. Chairman, this clause talks about the chief justice reporting. To whom does he report in his duties? I would like to have precision on that clause. How does he report? Why this clause?

Mr. Lee Richardson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Chairman, he reports to the Minister of Justice.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 25 to 28 inclusive agreed to.

On Clause 29—

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary Northeast): Clause 29 is entitled Bank Act. Subclause 29(c) states: "Section 2 of the Bank Act is repealed and the following substituted". Could the parliamentary secretary explain why it is being repealed and the following is substituted in the provinces of Nova Scotia, British Columbia in the Supreme Court of the provinces. Could he explain the reasoning behind this repeal.

Mr. Lee Richardson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): It is simply to take out the reference in the act to the trial division of the Supreme Court, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants): Mr. Chairman, I asked the parliamentary secretary earlier about a judicial committee where citizens would be able to register complaints about the improper attention they thought they might have received from court procedures. Initially I did understand the parliamentary secretary to say that really was not in this bill and it was beyond the scope of this bill.

You are moving very quickly, Mr. Chairman. After all this is Committee of the Whole where we go through clause by clause. We went by clause 26 which talks about a council. It states: "The objects of the council are to promote efficiency and uniformity and to improve the quality of judicial service in Superior Courts and in the Tax Court of Canada".

I am just trying to balance that amendment that we sped through as I was reading the bill with the parliamentary secretary's answer earlier. As I read this amendment, that is perhaps the vehicle whereby a citizen can in effect register some question about the quality of the judicial service that that citizen received or was exposed to.

I would like to have a chance to put that question. I always thought, before we got into this bill, as I understand some other aspects of law, that there was some judicial committee. It may be composed of the Chief Justice. I think it may be an in-house committee with other judges. That is what I would like to ask about and to have it explained in view of the earlier answers.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman (Mr. Paproski): Can we revert to clause 26?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Richardson: Mr. Chairman, I am sorry if there was again confusion. My reference was not that we were amending any committee or council. This bill is simply deleting the reference to county courts. With respect to the Canadian Judicial Council, yes, clearly the hon. member, who is a lawyer, is correct. There is of course the Canadian Judicial Council that any citizen can complain to. I thank the member for clarifying that point.

Mr. Kindy: Mr. Chairman, referring to that council, can the parliamentary secretary inform the House of the procedure of this council so that the public at least can become cognizant of how it works and how they may complain if they feel that something was not done properly.

Mr. Richardson: Yes. It is a pretty straightforward procedure. They simply write to the Canadian Judicial Council in Ottawa.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 30 agreed to

On clause 31—

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary Northeast): Clause 31 states the Co-operative Credit Association Act is repealed and the following substituted. Can the parliamentary secretary explain to the House why this is being repealed and something else being substituted. What was the reasoning behind this? The parliamentary secretary is very astute. He knows this bill very well.

• (1510)

Mr. Lee Richardson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Chairman, I thank the hon. member for the compliment. Despite my astuteness I obviously do not explain it very well. I have answered this question three times.

The reference in clause 31 is the same as the similar references. It is simply because there will no longer be a trial division. That is the reason for this amendment.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 32 to 43 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 44—

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary Northeast): Mr. Chairman, this clause deals with the Customs Act. It is the same type of repealing and substituting. We have added the Yukon Territory, the Northwest Territories and the Supreme Court in subclause (c). Could the parliamentary secretary explain the substitution itself?

Mr. Lee Richardson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Chairman, I am not clear on exactly what the question asked for.

Mr. Kindy: Mr. Chairman, clause 44 (1)(c) reads:

—in the Provinces of Nova Scotia and British Columbia, the Yukon Territory and the Northwest Territories, the Supreme Court,

Why the Supreme Court?

Mr. Richardson: Mr. Chairman, again the previous reference was to county courts. This legislation is very simple legislation. It removes that level from the Nova Scotia court system. There is no longer a country court and that is why we have these technical amendments simply removing the name county court from the legislation.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 45 to 56 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 57—Order enforced as judgment of court

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants): Mr. Chairman, on the clauses that you quite properly went through with no debate, I guess the same answer would be applied. I understand that, but because all these different statutes are mentioned I again point out to those who have not seen how a bill can sometimes be dragged out that it really opens up all those acts to say something if we really wanted to. We have not been doing what some people may think we are doing, although I must say the clock is an interesting feature of a debate.

I am very interested in the Merchant Seamen Compensation Act in several ways. This is not just amending the terminology of the judges to conform to the different acts that have already been named. This sets out an order of the board. As the parliamentary secretary may or may not remember, it was members when some of us were in government and in opposition. Certainly the member for Regina—Lumsden as a member of the transport committee spoke in the House on the Merchant Seamen Compensation Act. I do not know if that is the act because I do not have it before me. I think it is the act whereby merchant seamen finally got compensation after a long fight to be recognized. I would like to know that first.

It may be the Veterans Merchants Compensation Act. I am not sure, but I would like to know the reason for the amendment whereby it speaks of an order of the board for payment of compensation. What is the composition of that board, which seems to be a new feature, although it may not be? I just cannot understand why it is within the reorganization of the court system in Nova Scotia.

Mr. Lee Richardson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Chairman, I would be very surprised if the eminent barrister and solicitor from Annapolis Valley—Hants really did not know the answer to that question.

However, in the interest of providing responses, I can tell him again that this bill does nothing but remove from in this case the Merchant Seamen Compensation Act the words "county court". It is the same answer as we have given for the last seven.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Chairman, with respect to the parliamentary secretary, it is a little different and is sort of highlighted in the side note. Rather than a court it is going to be an order of the board that will have the same power as a judgment of the court. Is that a correct interpretation?

Mr. Richardson: No, it is not. It is simply deleting a reference to country court which this bill does. It is simply a technical bill to remove the county court in Nova Scotia.

Mr. Nowlan: I am getting surprised now because the word court does not even appear in this amendment. Right on the side note of the section it does say "Order in force as judgment of court".

Mr. Kindy: It is the board.

Mr. Nowlan: It is the board and there is no court around. Therefore it is a little different from just renaming one court for the new restructured court. In his answer I thought the parliamentary secretary would have just read off the side note on the clause itself.

In view of his answer I really am confused as to what is going on with this amendment. I would like some clarification and this is the proper place to do it.

Mr. Richardson: Mr. Chairman, I just hope that everyone is quite clear. There is no confusion. It is just simply dragging out debate in the House.

The hon. member knows full well the previous order had to be filed with a county court. There no longer will be a county court as I have said several times here. That reference is simply removed from the act.

I am sure the member is fully aware of this procedure. It is just a game they are playing here. We are prepared to play if that is how they want to waste the time of the House of Commons and the people of Canada. They want to continue to drag this out with these repetitive questions. They know the answers to these questions. It is a simple technical bill that we should pass to allow the province of Nova Scotia to get on with the restructuring of its courts to bring it in line with all of the courts in Canada.

For the people of Nova Scotia whom he represents this will now not happen. The province of Nova Scotia has come to Parliament and asked: "Would you please make these minor technical amendments to federal law so we can get on with the revision of our courts in Nova Scotia?"

I would like to say to the people of Nova Scotia today that there is one reason and perhaps two sitting across the floor as to why this bill has not passed. It could simply have passed in 15 minutes this afternoon. They are simple technical amendments that the people of Nova Scotia will be denied because of the delaying tactics of the hon. member opposite.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Chairman, I have no hesitation in the questions we have asked in the different bills that have come before the House. I must say it is really quite interesting how the parliamentary secretary considers the whole institution of Parliament, let alone Committee of the Whole. With some other examples he can find out that the sections of this bill, most of which we have not even asked questions on, have flown right by. We have already passed one bill this afternoon.

• (1520)

I will take my chances with my electors from Nova Scotia as much as any of my friends are taking their chances with their constituents too. Our duty is to ask questions. The government brought the bill into committee of the whole. It wanted to get something through the House quickly. If it had any procedural experience, it would have never have opened up Committee of the Whole.

We could have held the bill up if we had wanted to obstruct. If we wanted to delay, we could have held up a section, which I told you about before on the debate on the aboriginals. It would have been legitimate debate, opening up that whole area of concern of Canadians, let alone aboriginals.

However, because it was a very important bill, and the minister of Indian affairs controlled his exasperation, although he obviously was a little exasperated by questions from time to time, that bill got through.

We are now in a massive reconstruction, for the first time, of the court systems in Nova Scotia and we are sailing along. The parliamentary secretary of transport—not even the parliamentary secretary of justice or the justice minister—is answering the questions. That shows how much this government feels about the court administration in Nova Scotia. It has a junior parliamentary secretary here and it is not even his jurisdiction.

I do not have to take second place to the parliamentary secretary who is a fine person, an astute individual and is an experienced politician belying his youthful looks. The fact of the matter is that he is not the parliamentary secretary for justice and we have found out that in questions, he could not give simple answers. Quite frankly in this last one, where he did get a little exasperated, he by his second answer—

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. It being 3.21 o'clock p.m., it is my duty to rise, report progress and request leave to consider the bill again at the next sitting of the House.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 26(1), I move that we sit beyond the normal time of adjournment for the purpose of continuing consideration of Bill C-96.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Will those members who object to the motion please rise in their place.

No members having risen, pursuant to Standing Order 26(2), the motion is adopted.

Motion agreed to.

[Translation]

Mr. Plamondon: On a point of order, Madam Speaker.

Madam Deputy Speaker: If 15 members or more rise, the motion is deemed to have been withdrawn. I did not see any member rise. Less than 15 members having risen, the motion is adopted according to Standing Order 26(2).

[English]

Mr. Riis: Madam Speaker, on a point of order, since we decided as a result of this motion to continue to sit for the consideration of Bill C-96, there has been a great deal of discussion among all the parties and all the representatives in the House regarding Bill C-42.

This is a very important environment bill. If we are going to sit, I wonder if I could have unanimous consent to consider Bill C-42 in the last stage as well.

[Translation]

Mr. Plamondon: Madam Speaker, further to the private discussion I had earlier with the minister, I am happy to say that I too will support this motion.

[English]

Mr. Breaugh: I may be mistaken on this, but I thought the Chair put the question for continued study of Bill C-96 in committee to the next sitting of the House. Is that not correct?

Madam Deputy Speaker: That was what I did say when the report from committee of the whole was received. Then the hon. government House leader brought in a motion which I put to the House and which was accepted, which means that we would continue studying Bill C-96 after the period for Private Members' Business.

Now a motion has been put by the hon. member for Kamloops asking the House to agree to study another bill as well. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Arseneault: Point of order, Madam Speaker. As you know, today the New Brunswick resolution came up for debate. I attempted to get in on that debate but because of different reasons, I guess regulations or whatever, I could not participate directly in the debate and I had a prepared text. I was wondering if, in keeping with the spirit of the holiday season and the co-operation here in the House, my colleagues would permit me to table my speech for the record to be published in Hansard. I would so request.

Mr. Andre: Madam Speaker, I would be delighted to agree to that, and indeed it might be worth examining as a hopeful precedent.

Mr. Nowlan: Madam Speaker, in keeping with the Christmas season and the importance of the subject, I am totally in agreement with this particular notion, and let us hope we can get it as a precedent for other events.

Mr. Kindy: I would add the same thoughts. The hon. member is certainly very much entitled to do that. I hope that other members in future are going to grasp the same opportunity and that this would be accepted as well.

Miss Grey (Beaver River): Of course, I have a problem with what has gone on in the House procedurally today. However, if the member from New Brunswick has been allowed to table his speech, I would like to submit my prepared remarks as well. We know the House turned into an absolute zoo on the other side this morning, and the government is preparing now, of course, through Standing Order 53 to force something through.

I would just say in closing before I table my written remarks that I was prepared to make today, that this government seems to feel that it can start putting through bits and pieces of the Charlottetown accord on Fridays by using these procedural agreements. It is just putting things through when people aren't paying attention on the last day before Christmas holidays. It is attempting to use Standing Order 53 right now. It thinks it will be able to put Charlottetown accord through bit by bit. If the government learned nothing on October 26, it should be that it cannot do that. If it does it by using these standing orders, putting it through bit by bit, this place will just be a very sad place and this will be a very, very sad day. The hon. member for Annapolis Valley—Hants earlier talked about a black Friday, it certainly is one now.

I will table my remarks.

Mr. Andre: I am not sure what brought that on. Frankly, I had always thought the Reform Party's position was that the questions of language should be totally provincial. What this does is establish for the province of New Brunswick the constitutional right to be officially bilingual.

The Constitution Act of Canada requires the approval of this body and of the other place, and we were simply complying with what was a request from the province of New Brunswick that they be officially bilingual. I had always assumed, indeed I think I read it in the little blue book, that the policy of the Reform Party is that language should be up to the provinces. So I am not sure why the agitation.

But that being said, I would respect the decision of the House in respect of her request to have her speech tabled.

Mr. Fulton: Just for the record, I would like it to be recorded that I do not think it would be wise for this House to start accepting simply submitted speeches to be attached to Hansard.

• (1530)

I have been here almost 14 years and it is always better to not see the clock for awhile. I am prepared to sit here and finish Bill C-96 and finish Bill C-42. I think that the practice of attaching speeches that were not given on the floor of this Chamber would end the necessity and value of this place.

Miss Grey (Beaver River): Madam Speaker, I was certainly surprised at the generosity of the other side to just willy-nilly accept a speech on behalf of that member.

Now of course if that is going to be done then there would be every reason for it to be—as the member here says, it is a bit ridiculous—but if it is going to be good for that, then certainly.

My point of order earlier and what I request of the government House leader right now is one question. We went through the motions today, there were five people who rose in their places, a vote was deferred by yourself, Madam Speaker, until February 1. That is all we were asking for on this side of the House.

I would like to know why we are still here at 3.30 p.m., with the government having struck out twice on trying to bring in Standing Order 53? I want to know what it is going to do for strike three and if it is not such a crisis why may we not defer the vote, as was decided this morning, until February 1?

Madam Deputy Speaker: At this time there is no request to adopt Standing Order 53. What I have put to the House and what the House has adopted is Standing Order 26. It will allow the House to conclude study of Bill C-96 and Bill C-42.

We did ask for unanimous consent. I was to ask for unanimous consent on the request of the member for Restigouche—Chaleur and the member for Beaver River. One hon. member refused that unanimous consent so I cannot do this. Now we will proceed with Private Members' Hour, as it is 3.31 p.m.

Mr. Fulton: Madam Speaker, a point of order. My saying no to the attachment of the member for Restigouche—Chaleur's speech and the member for Beaver River's speech was not intended to stop us from finishing Bill C-96 and Bill C-42.

I believe there is goodwill and unanimous consent in the House to do that.

[Translation]

Madam Deputy Speaker: No. I understood that perfectly. I was simply repeating, in connection with what was said by the hon. member for Beaver River about the possibility that the government House leader or another minister might move a motion under Standing Order 53, that this was not the case. I simply repeated what I said before, that Standing Order 26 had been used and the motion was carried.

We will now continue consideration of Bill C-96 and Bill C-42, but I was simply reminding the House that there was no unanimous consent for allowing speeches prepared by members who did not have a chance to speak in the House this morning, to be part of the record. I was just summarizing the situation for the benefit of members who just came in and perhaps this will also be helpful to our listeners who have been bearing with us for part of the day.

It being 3.34 p.m., the House will now proceed to consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS

CONVERSION OF NUCLEAR WEAPONS INDUSTRY

MEASURE TO ENACT

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina) moved that Bill C-274, an act to provide for the conversion to civilian uses of technologies and skills used in the nuclear weapons industry, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Natural Resources envelope.

He said: Madam Speaker, I am very happy to have this opportunity to begin the debate on Bill C-274, which I tabled in the House in 1989.

It is an act to provide for the conversion to civilian uses of technologies and skills used in the nuclear weapons industry. Bill C-274 is to prepare for the ending of contracts for producing or handling nuclear weapons. It encourages the conversion of technologies of nuclear weapons work into the manufacturing of civilian goods. It helps workers who lose their jobs as a result of the change to find new jobs or it provides benefits to those who become jobless.

The bill requires a company with a nuclear weapons contract to set up a committee to help in changing the plant to civilian production and in retraining the workers. The committee will have equal numbers of representatives from the company and the workers and non-voting community members.

The nuclear weapons company must set up a fund to do all this, and must deposit in it 2.5 per cent of its gross revenues each year. The company and the committee are also to seek funds from other sources.

The bill gives the minister discretion to help the committees and the companies carry out this conversion and provides fines for those who contravene this act.

This bill is supported by two recommendations of a report made to Parliament in October 1992 by the Subcommittee on Arms Export of the Standing Committee on External Affairs and International Trade. That report recommended that Canada prohibit the export of components for nuclear weapons, and also that the government should help to establish a Canadian diversification and resource centre.

My colleague, the New Democrat member for Victoria, will further explain these recommendations later in this hour, as he was a member of that committee. However, I would like to present two strong reasons for converting from the making of nuclear weapons to the making of civilian goods.

First, nuclear weapons use up huge amounts of money, labour, scientific training and research. This is a terrible waste. Instead of these bombs and the missiles to deliver them, we should be making such things as mass transit systems for our cities and instruments for detecting and cleaning up pollution, or we could be developing renewable energy resources that our country and the world badly need. With so much poverty in Canada and in the world we cannot afford to squander our best skills and our best materials.

Second, we already have tens of thousands of these mass killing machines stored in many places around the world, and under many governments. They terrify us, and with good reason. They have killed people already, not only in the bombing of Hiroshima and Nagasaki but in other ways since then, more accidentally, and they have been used to threaten people.

If they are used again they might end all human life. Enough. Let us learn to work to get rid of them, not to make more. We cannot rely on the arms manufacturers by themselves to switch from making killing machines to making things useful for life because arms manufacturing is very profitable.

The arms makers' association that used to mount an annual sales blitz in March in Ottawa called ARMX is now advertising the same weapons to the same international buyers under the slick title of Peacekeeping '93.

Most people do not know to what extent Canada is engaged in producing nuclear weapons systems—vehicles, planes, ships or missiles that are designed primarily to carry nuclear weapons.

Canadians do not make a whole nuclear weapon or a whole nuclear weapons system but we do make many parts of them, mainly to sell to the United States or Britain. I have a list published in the Ploughshares Monitor in March 1990 of the companies that have made these parts since 1986. We have made parts for the following systems: the B-10 bomber, the B-52 stratofortress bomber, the tomahawk sea-launched cruise missile, the MX (peacekeeper) missile, the midgetman missile, the Trident submarine, the F-111 aircraft, Lynn HAS 2/3 helicopter, Nimrod MR2 aircraft, P-3 Orton aircraft, P-7A aircraft, S-3 Viking aircraft, SH-60 Seahawk helicopter and Tornado aircraft.

• (1540)

We make them in Waterloo, Ottawa, Rexdale, London, Kitchener, Montreal, Mississauga, Fort Erie, Haley, Carleton Place, Scarborough, Oakville, Cambridge, Stratford, Winnipeg, Ajax and Peterborough.

The companies that made them are Fusion Penn Inc., Canadian Commercial Corporation, Garrett Canada, Litton Systems Canada, General Motors of Canada, A.T.C. Automation Tooling, Canadian Marconi Company, MIL Vickers, Vadoko International, Cercast Inc., Fleet Industries, General Electric Canada, Haley Industries Ltd., Leigh Instruments Ltd., McDonnell Douglas Canada Ltd., Magna Electronics Corporation, Vac-Aero International, Via-U-Ray Testing, Bristol Aerospace, Menesco Aerospace, West Heights Manufacturing, C.A.E. Electronics, Computing Devices, Canadair Ltd., Dowty Canada, Dowty Electronics Ltd., Unisys Canada, Spar Aerospace Ltd., Leigh Instruments and Walbar of Canada Inc.

The people who made these instruments for nuclear warfare are not bad people. They are good people who are trying to do as we all try to do, put bread on the table. These companies are engaged in legal work. Many of them are subsidized by a government program that uses $500 million per year.

The purpose of this bill is not to blame them but to declare that the people of Canada wish us now to follow a different course of action. We wish to convert war industries to peace industries so that workers like these can put bread on the table doing work that helps people live rather than work that helps people die. I ask members of this House to support this bill.

Since I will be leaving half of my time for other colleagues to give their support to this bill, I wish to close simply with a verse written 25 centuries ago by the prophet Isaiah:

> The work of justice shall be peace
>
> And the effect of justice quietness
>
> and confidence forever
>
> Keep judgement and do justice
> For my salvation is to come
> and my justice be revealed.

Mrs. Dorothy Dobbie (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to speak on Bill C-274.

I would like to make a few points. First of all, for the member opposite, there are no nuclear weapons in Canada. We do not have a nuclear weapons industry in Canada.

Second, Canada is committed to the peaceful use of nuclear technology.

Third, the nuclear industry is very important to Canada and nuclear technology plays a very vital role in power generation and in the medical and food industries.

I want to reiterate that Canada does not have a nuclear weapons industry. We removed all our nuclear weapons many years ago and we maintain a defensive policy today that does not include nuclear weapons. However, Canada is recognized internationally for its peacekeeping activities, for its stringent nuclear non-proliferation policy and its full-scope nuclear safeguards, for its arms control and disarmament activities and for its commitment to the elimination of weapons of mass destruction. There is no nuclear weapons industry in Canada.

It is interesting to note that among the six nations of the world that have complete scientific and industrial military capability to support nuclear weapons—Canada, the U.S., United Kingdom, France, Russia and China—Canada is the only one that chooses to apply its nuclear knowledge solely for peaceful purposes, not for the production of nuclear weapons.

Canada's nuclear technology has from its very inception been under civil control. Scientists, physicists and engineers from the National Research Council established Chalk River, the birth place of Canada's nuclear technology, during the Second World War.

The Atomic Energy Control Board was established by an act of Parliament in 1946. Under civilian control AECB is responsible for ensuring that the use of nuclear technology does not pose undue risk to health, safety, security or the environment. Atomic Energy of Canada was formed as a Crown corporation in 1952 and it too is committed to the peaceful development of Canada's unique nuclear option, the Candu reactor, and to the achievement of excellence in related science and technology for the benefit not just of the present but of future Canadians.

In addition to its international obligations under the treaty on non-proliferation of nuclear weapons, Canada has it own stringent nuclear non-proliferation policy and full scope safeguards.

Canada's nuclear industry contributes to quality employment for many sectors of the economy, including the mining of uranium in Saskatchewan, the production of reactor fuel in Ontario, the manufacturing of equipment, the construction and operation of electrical power plants and the production of medical equipment and radio isotopes for use in medicine, cancer treatment and food processing.

Over 30,000 people are employed directly in over 100 companies. They include scientists, engineers, miners, technicians and support staff. The industry provides over 70,000 indirect jobs as well in related supplies and services.

It is also noteworthy that many aboriginal people are employed in the mining of uranium in northern Saskatchewan. Recently, Chief Harry Cook of the La Ronge Indian Band was appointed to the Cameco board of directors.

The nuclear industry in Canada contributes over $4.5 billion to Canada's economy annually, primarily to Ontario and Quebec, but to Saskatchewan, Manitoba, New Brunswick and British Columbia as well. Ontario, for example, has already saved over $17 billion in foreign exchange by using uranium rather than coal for its power.

Nuclear technology is important to our exports. Prospects and orders on hand for Canadian exports of nuclear technology are considerable. They include over $1 billion of Candu technology, annual exports of $1 billion worth of uranium, heavy water supplies estimated at $.5 billion and related engineered products such as radio isotopes, cancer treatment equipment, food irradiators, training simulators and engineering services valued at $250 million.

I would like to quote Mr. David R. Anderson, the vice-president and manager of Canatom Inc., Ontario operations and chairman and CEO of the Canadian Nuclear Association. On the subject of our Candu exports to Korea, he said:

> For the Candu unit ordered in 1990 for the Wolsong nuclear power plant, AECL, the prime contractor to Korea Electric Power Corporation, will generate approximately 500 engineering quotation requests to be sent out from the Mississauga offices of AECL-CANDU to selected suppliers in Canadian industry for the components of the Nuclear Steam Supply System.

In addition, CANATOM Inc., acting as the architect-engineer to KEPCO through the AECL main contract, will issue from its offices in Toronto and Montreal, another 75 requisitions for purchase of equipment in Canada for the Balance of Plant, which comes under the direct control of KEPCO. Korea Heavy Industries Corporation will also place orders on Canadian suppliers.

The Wolsong 2 project will inject some $400 million into the Canadian economy, providing some 7,000 jobs over a four year period.

This is important at a time when jobs are scarce:

The breakdown is 2,000 direct and 5,000 indirect jobs. In addition, some 75 Canadian technical experts will be needed in Korea, many of whom are already living in Seoul.

Two more CANDU units for the Wolsong plant were ordered by KEPCO in September 1992. For the three units, Wolsong 2, 3 & 4, a total of 1030 orders will be placed in Canada by all parties concerned. The value to the Canadian nuclear industry is $915 million.

• (1550)

There are virtually no importations of nuclear equipment into Canada, however. Candu technology is developed, researched, engineered and manufactured right here in Canada. Canada has a positive balance of trade as well in two high technology sectors, aerospace and nuclear reactors, and Canada is not dependent on any country for the supply of key technologies, equipment, services or uranium supplies for its nuclear industry.

The September 1992 report in Business Magazine ranked Canada's top 100 research and development spenders. Atomic Energy of Canada Limited ranked second with 1991 expenditures of $293 million, a 13.2 per cent increase over 1990.

Uranium, I would submit, is a clean source of energy. Nuclear power plants do not produce greenhouse gases. France, for example, generates 75 per cent of its electricity from nuclear reactors and has one of the lowest carbon dioxide emission levels per capita.

Canada, fortunately, is in the forefront of nuclear technology and nowhere is this more evident than in nuclear medicine and radiotherapy. Nuclear medicine provides a reliable and non-intrusive way to diagnose and treat various diseases.

For example, Nordion International Inc., a Canadian company with over 500 employees and annual sales of over $100 million, is a leading international producer, marketer and supplier of radioisotopes for nuclear medicine and research laboratories. Nordion is best known as the world's largest supplier of cobalt-60, a radioisotope used for sterilization of surgical instruments and cancer therapy.

Nordion also manufactures radiation processing equipment and supplies approximately 85 per cent of the world's requirements for molybdenum 99, moly-99, an essential radioisotope used in many medical procedures.

Theratronics International Limited is another Canadian nuclear technology company with 200 people and annual sales, mostly exports, of over $40 million. Theratronics is a pioneer in the field of radiation therapy and developed the world's first cobalt-60 cancer treatment machine in 1951. Since then the company has installed over 1,800 units in 70 countries. Over a million cancer patients a year are treated using Theratronics' products.

Canada's nuclear medicine community is highly regarded world-wide. Each year vast quantities of the world's food production are spoiled due to food borne bacteria, insect infestations and parasites. Food irradiation solves the problem.

I will not go into details, but I will say that it is because of nuclear technology that people have clean, safe food to eat.

Let me just summarize very briefly. Canada does not have a nuclear weapons industry. Canada has maintained the steadfast commitment to the peaceful use of nuclear technology and the Canadian nuclear industry is making a remarkable contribution to Canada's economy in terms of quality employment, significant export performance, providing a clean, efficient reliable source of energy, providing for our energy security and the development of human, intellectual and natural resources.

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, as I looked at this private members' bill I would have to say that it does not apply to Canada and certainly, since we cannot pass laws in this House of Commons for other countries, I am really wondering about the purpose of this bill to begin with.

If the hon. member was looking at that poor, forlorn new chairman of Ontario Hydro, appointed by the Ontario NDP government, he is receiving only $425,000 a year, I understand, and I do not know how the poor fellow is going to exist on that.

I think the NDP government in Ontario would be better off putting some money into road maintenance budgets to make the highways safe for people in this country so we would have some safety on the roads.

First, all Canadian governments since that of Lester Pearson in the 1960s have been in support of non-proliferation of nuclear weapons. Regardless of political party, all governments have agreed on this point and have actually sought ways to strengthen the nuclear non-proliferation treaty. This is one of the fundamental values that Canadian governments and indeed the Canadian public have in common.

Second, in looking at the bill of the hon. member for Trinity—Spadina, one reads that Canada should convert to civilian uses technologies and skills that are used in the manufacture of nuclear weapons.

Under Canada's policy of non-proliferation, Canada does not export uranium to the United States because that country has a nuclear weapons program. Canada does not have a nuclear weapons program and we have never had one. However, we sell steel to the United States. We sell plastics to the United States and several other non-nuclear materials to the United States and these materials could be used in the manufacture of nuclear weapons with no relationship whatsoever to the actual terminology of nuclear.

Is the NDP in sponsoring this bill today asking us to sever all trade with the United States in all materials that are used in the manufacture of nuclear weapons? Is it asking us not to send steel to the United States? Is it asking us not to sell our plastic products to the United States, or a host of other products we sell to them that may be used in the actual product that is produced in the nuclear weapons industry? They are certainly using it in the manufacture of cars, for example, the steel industry.

As a supporter of the non-proliferation treaty, Canada supports the right of developing countries to develop nuclear technology for peaceful means only. Many poorer countries are interested in nuclear energy because huge amounts of energy can be supplied. You cannot improve the way of life of people unless they have an energy source to modernize their production in their every day life, even the decencies of electric lights and fridges for the saving of food.

Canadian policy is that Canada will not give nuclear technology to a country unless that country agrees to International safeguards by the International Atomic Energy Agency. It is interesting to note that the Candu reactor is the most useless of reactors for those countries wanting to use the uranium in missile warheads. Heavy water is used as a coolant in the Candu reactor. This means that it uses natural uranium. As such, there is no need for a reprocessing facility in the Candu reactor system. The proportion of fissionable uranium, U-235, that is produced from the Candu is only 0.7 per cent.

If a country wanted to acquire a nuclear energy facility with the underlying intention of obtaining weapons-grade uranium for warheads, it would need a reprocessing facility to make this kind of uranium.

As indicated, the Candu is useless in this regard as it does not come equipped with a reprocessing facility and that is one of the safeguards of the Canadian Candu reactor. Canada is a major supporter of the non-proliferation treaty and has been since day one as one of the founders of it.

Of all the countries in the world, Canada is the leader in the promoting of the non-proliferation treaty dealing with nuclear weapons. There are only six that independently have the nuclear technology to develop nuclear weapons programs. These are the United States, the United Kingdom, France, Russia, the Peoples' Republic of China and Canada.

• (1600)

Other countries suspected of having nuclear weapons got the technology from other sources and did not develop it domestically.

Of the six countries I listed that have innovative nuclear technology, Canada is the only one with the capability to develop nuclear weapons but did not do so. We have never done so. This certainly says something about the kind of people Canadians are.

From the days of Lester B. Pearson it has been a policy of Canada not to develop an independent nuclear weapons system. Every government to date has stuck with that.

Canada has a nuclear program dedicated to peaceful purposes only. It has developed the Candu nuclear power reactor, a wide variety of medical and industrial radiochemical products, and a uranium industry that is the largest exporter in the world.

I just wish we could see the day when the critics of Canada's peaceful nuclear industry would begin to realize and talk about the tremendous strides that have been made in medicine in the nuclear field. Chalk River is a perfect example of what has been done in the field of medicine.

To ensure that these industries are not jeopardized by links to nuclear weapons, great care has been taken to develop international agreements with our trading partners. The important segments of Canada's nuclear non-proliferation policy are the bilateral agreements signed with all trading partners and the nuclear weapons non-proliferation treaty, which I have mentioned.

That is administered by the International Atomic Energy Agency. We have about 20 people working at the International Atomic Energy Agency in Vienna.

From the very beginning of international trade in nuclear products and technologies, Canada has required assurances from trading partners that Canadian-supplied items would not be used in any nuclear weapons programs. This policy has been strengthened, starting in 1974, requiring all trading partners to make the following basic commitments in bilateral nuclear co-operation agreements:

Canadian-supplied items will not be associated with nuclear explosive devices.

A provision for fall-back safeguards must be made if the International Atomic Energy Agency is unable to continue with its inspections and safeguard functions.

No transfer of Canadian-supplied items can be made without prior consent by Canada. They cannot be transferred from one country to another without Canadian consent. It is part of the agreement.

Enrichment of Canadian-supplied uranium beyond 20 per cent is prohibited; and adequate physical protection will be applied to ensure compliance with the previous conditions.

I see you are giving me the high sign, Mr. Speaker. I just want to say that Canada has been one of the leaders in the nuclear industry for peaceful purposes. Yes, we have a lot of expertise and good technology in this field, but it should be supported by the public at large for the good work that it has done in medicine and in biology and many other fields.

It is a great science. I do not know why we are debating this bill today because it really does not apply to Canada.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): I thought, Mr. Speaker, you said the hon. member for Christmas. I know that he is a very avuncular fellow. I do appreciate your recognizing me and the opportunity to participate in this debate.

I am sure that the thousands, if not millions, of people across this country who believe very strongly, now that the cold war is over, in a peace dividend will be very disappointed that the speaker for the Liberal Party when speaking on this bill not only completely misconceived it but essentially spoke against it.

It is very revealing that the only person the Liberal Party puts up is someone who would go on about the Candu reactor which has absolutely nothing to do with the resolution before this House.

This resolution calls for conversion from a nuclear military weapons industry, not civilian industry, but nuclear military industry. It is a very critical and important issue to millions of people across this country.

We are not surprised that the member for Winnipeg South would oppose this resolution, although she too also misconceived the point of the resolution.

I want to congratulate the member for Trinity—Spadina who has pursued this issue diligently for many years and has finally seen this bill come before the House. It is a great tribute to him.

He has served this House very well. He has indicated he will not be running in the next election and this House will miss him. He has been a conscience of the House on this and many other issues. I want to assure him that if I and others are back, we will carry on the fight for the important concept he has embodied in this resolution.

Under the rules of the House, if we cannot get agreement and the matter dies on the Order Paper, I would ask all members to agree that this be referred to the Standing Committee on National Defence and Veterans Affairs for consideration.

This bill calls for conversion of the nuclear weapons industry in Canada. It should not be misunderstood. This country is completely committed to the manufacture of components of nuclear weapons systems and the export of those components particularly to the United States of America. This bill by establishing the national policy of conversion is a very important bill for our country to accept.

I want to use the few minutes I have to draw the attention of House and of the country to an important companion study done by the Standing Committee on External Affairs and International Trade.

Last year and leading into early this year, a sub-committee on arms exports undertook a very comprehensive study of the future of Canadian military goods production and export. In the course of that study, it made a series of important recommendations, two of which bear directly on this resolution.

The first is recommendation 12. It recommends that an export control list be established which would include the components of nuclear weapons. This recommendation was unanimously accepted by the committee and recommended to this House by the members, including representatives from the government side and from the Liberal side. Where are they today? Why are they not standing up in support of this bill which would embody at least in part that unanimous recommendation?

The committee also recommended a number of other steps which would be in the spirit of this bill. It recommended that the government act upon the 1982 request of the United Nations General Assembly to prepare a national assessment of the relationship between disarmament and development in Canada.

The committee recommended that the Canadian defence procurement policy be changed to foster a leading edge in innovative industrial capability in civilian as well as military high technology products in areas of surveillance and monitoring, verification, sovereignty protection and peacekeeping.

The committee also recommended that the mandate of the Defence Industry Production Program be changed to encourage conversion and diversification and that it primarily focus on technologies with significant civilian spin-off potential.

It also called on DIPP funds to be available to assist when a defence industry had been closed. I want to conclude with drawing the attention of the House to this most important recommendation which is at the heart of this important bill brought before the House by the member for Trinity—Spadina.

I will read recommendation 20 it in its entirety.

> The Committee recommends that the government support the establishment of a Canadian Diversification and Conversion Resource Centre. The Centre should gather and disseminate data on diversification and conversion efforts in Canada and overseas, on federal, provincial and municipal programs which might assist diversification and conversion efforts, and on new products and markets. The Centre should also monitor Canadian and international defence production, defence industry support and military goods export control policies, and encourage the establishment of conversion committees.

• (1610)

This bill calls upon the nuclear weapons industry to establish conversion committees and the recommendation would broaden that to cover all military production in this country.

I commend this bill to the House and urge all members to support it.

Mr. Lyle Kristiansen (Kootenay West—Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to speak to the bill introduced by my colleague from Spadina.

The bill is to provide for the conversion to civilian uses of technologies and skills used in the nuclear weapons industry. In prefacing my remarks, I should point out that my own constituency, particularly the community of Trail, produced the heavy water for the Manhattan project. The Cominco Special Metals and Electronics Division produced a lot of the sophisticated technology used in President Reagan's ill-fated Star Wars program.

Therefore, to say that we have never had an industry in Canada that has contributed to the nuclear weapons industry and delivery system is quite wrong.

The main purpose of my remarks is to point out, in supporting the principle of this bill, that there are opportunities that I and many others feel are being missed for Canada to get aboard, gear up for and contribute in a major way to what should be and will be a major nuclear clean-up industry on a world-wide scale.

The delegation of my colleagues and I, headed by my friend, the member for Okanagan—Shuswap and three other New Democratic members were the first Canadian parliamentary delegation to visit the Hanford Nuclear Reservation in Washington State at Richland, Washington last March to investigate what is going on at that facility. It is a major clean-up.

I will read very briefly what they are doing to clean up the mess left over from the Manhattan project, the number of plutonium development facilities and about nine reactors that used to exist on that site. It is setting the pace and is a laboratory for the world in terms of the nuclear clean-up industry. I just want to point out what is happening in the local area. I will quote from The Economist of August 15, 1992:

> Doing something about this problem is revitalising the local economy. More than 16,000 technicians, engineers and scientists are now beavering away on the site. During the past year the population of Richland grew by 10%. Home prices have risen 30% in three years—unusual in an environmental disaster-area. As Ralph DeSibio of Westinghouse Hanford, an erstwhile plutonium producer and now the prime contractor for the clean-up, puts it, "We're sitting on a waste mine."

It may be a waste mine but it is a gold mine for many of the people there. It can be a major contributor to more and sophisticated jobs in Canada, if we accept our responsibilities to help lead the way.

The federal government should be co-ordinating and communicating with American Westinghouse officials and attempting to get a piece of the action or at least be in an observer capacity at that site in Washington. In that way, we would be in a better position to clean up our own matters, whether they stem from military nuclear hardware or the clean-up of civilian nuclear problems. That is another major problem that we have not dealt with either. It would also allow us to contribute, in a more meaningful way, and we should be beginning to do that as well, in the major problems in the nuclear industry in what used to be the Soviet Union.

For a number of reasons, including demand reasons and the state of public opinion, the nuclear industry in Canada, and I am mainly talking about the peaceful nuclear industry, is gearing down in many ways. We can create employment, create technology, be on the leading edge in the so-called global marketplace that the government likes to talk to us about, if we are in a position to understand the clean-up technologies that are taking place. We could lend a helping hand to what otherwise will be a major disaster for the whole world and help to clean up some of the problems left over by the change of regimes and the inappropriate and old fashioned nuclear technology that existed in the Soviet Union.

That is a disaster waiting to happen. We have potential disasters from the peacetime nuclear industry in Canada unless we are in a position to get on board and help to clean up this major waste disposal problem on a world-wide basis. There are opportunities there, let us grab them.

The intent of the bill before us is to begin to move us in that direction and I hope the government does.

Mrs. Suzanne Duplessis (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister for External Relations and Minister of State (Indian Affairs and Northern Development)): Mr. Speaker, I just learned that the hon. member for Trinity—Spadina will not run in the next election, and since I may not have the opportunity to do so later on, I should like to congratulate him for his hard work on behalf of his constituents.

Canadians can be proud of their country's record on arms control and nuclear non-proliferation. Traditionally, these issues have been among the priorities of Canadian foreign policy since the Second World War.

In the late 1940s Canada rejected the development of nuclear weapons. Instead, Canadian efforts in this area have targeted the peaceful uses of nuclear energy. Electrical power generation, medical applications of radioisotopes, are among the contributions that Canadian nuclear science has made to human betterment. A corollary of this policy of focusing on the peaceful uses of nuclear energy was the decision to pursue in a consequent and unremitting manner initiatives towards nuclear arms control and non-proliferation. Canada has always stood on the side of peace and opposed war.

Canada was among the first nations to ratify the non-proliferation treaty in 1969. The treaty continues as the essential cornerstone of the global non-proliferation system. Canada's unwavering support for the NPT rests on its indispensable character in stemming the spread of nuclear weapons. At the same time, the NPT also permits the dissemination of the peaceful uses of nuclear energy. Canada, through the International Atomic Energy Agency and other channels, has played a strong role in this area.

The essential character of the NPT has prompted Canada to promote actively universal adoption of the treaty. Such a stance supports Canada's ultimate objective: the total elimination of nuclear weapons.

Canada has always been in the forefront of multilateral efforts to reduce conventional weapons, stem nuclear proliferation, and otherwise work for peace. The end of the cold war greatly reduced the threat of nuclear war, but this most welcome development also brought to the fore new and pressing challenges.

For that reason, the Prime Minister, in a seminal speech last year at Johns Hopkins University, set out an agenda for action on non-proliferation.

First, the NPT must be strengthened by its indefinite extension and by universal accession to it. These objectives were reflected in the political declaration issued by summit leaders meeting in Munich last year. Since then, Canada has participated in multilateral and bilateral initiatives to urge acceptance of the NPT. These efforts have met with considerable success and, to date, 155 countries have acceded to the NPT.

Nonetheless, a number of key countries remain outside the treaty. Further efforts are needed to persuade states like India, Pakistan, Algeria, Israel, Chile, Argentina, and Brazil. This is particularly important as we move to prepare for the NPT Extension Conference in 1995.

Second, nuclear cheating must be stopped by strengthening the mandate of the International Atomic Energy Agency and increasing its resources. Canada will support giving the IAEA the teeth—the authority and the resources—to inspect any time anywhere. To this end, a Canadian expert is participating in a high-level group to develop strengthened and streamlined safeguards.

• (1620)

Third, controls on the export of nuclear technologies, materials and equipment must be tightened. With strong pressure from Canada and others the Nuclear Suppliers Group has agreed to require the acceptance of full-scope safeguards by recipient countries as a condition of supply.

Fourth, the migration of nuclear brainpower must be stopped. To that end, Canada has contributed generously to the establishment of International Science and Technology Centres in Kiev and Moscow so that scientists of Russia and Ukraine apply their knowledge and expertise to peaceful endeavours and not add to the world's stock of nuclear weapons and delivery systems.

Fifth, security co-operation must be strengthened regionally to reduce underlying causes of tensions, particularly in such chronic hot spots as the Korean Peninsula, the Middle East and the sub-continent. Canada is bringing its experience and expertise in verification to the arms control working group of the Middle East peace talks and we have been instrumental in encouraging the countries of the north Pacific to consider ways to enhance their security through cooperation and dialogue.

How much time do I have left, Mr. Speaker?

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret the hon. member's time has expired.

Mr. Brewin: Point of order, Mr. Speaker. It is evident from the speeches in the House that there is not likely to be unanimous consent to adopt the motion, but I wonder if you could test the House on the following motion:

> That the motion be amended by deleting all the words after the word "that" and substituting the following therefor:
> Bill C-274, an act to provide for the conversion to civilian uses of technologies and skills used in the nuclear weapons industry, be not now read a second time but that the order be discharged, the bill withdrawn, and the subject matter thereof referred to the Standing Committee on External Affairs and International Trade.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Members have heard the terms of the motion. Is it agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The time provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired .

Pursuant to Standing Order 96(1), the order is dropped from the Order Paper.

Government Orders

JUDGES ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration in committee of Bill C-96, an act to amend the Judges Act and other acts to give effect to the reconstitution of the courts in Nova Scotia—Mr. Paproski in the chair.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. House in Committee of the Whole on Bill C-96, an act to amend the Judges Act and other acts to give effect to the reconstitution of the courts in Nova Scotia.

We have finished clauses 55 and 56. We will now go to clause 57.

On Clause 57—Order enforced as judgment of court

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary Northeast): I have an initial question. The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport did not seem to have answered properly. When they talk about the board, what board is it? What constitutes that board?

Mr. Lee Richardson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Chairman, the board is constituted under the Merchant Seamen Compensation Act. It is set out in that particular statute. This particular clause now makes reference to the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 58 to 69 inclusive agreed to.

Clause 1 agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported and concurred in.

Hon. Harvie Andre (for the Minister of Justice) moved that the bill be read the third time and passed.

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants): Mr. Speaker, I was literally out on the phone regarding this bill. I just have one question for the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Justice. I am glad he is here.

Do these judges in this reconstituted court have to again take the oath? I understand this is a concern of judges in view of what it might do to the judicial seniority pecking order within the court. I would like to have an answer. I know this is not a formal third reading. Obviously, I do not want to impede the thing any more, but that is a very legitimate concern.

Mr. Rob Nicholson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, in answer to the hon. member's questions, it is my understanding that judges would be resworn in the new Supreme Court of Nova Scotia.

In terms of the precedence, I do not have the Nova Scotia enabling legislation. My understanding in terms of seniority, which I think was another part of his question, is that is set out in the legislation itself.

I know there was one question, and I can get back to the hon. member, as to one judge who I believe is now on the Court of Appeal. There was some question about seniority. I do not have the answer to that, but in direct answer to him yes, they will be resworn and their seniority is established under the enabling legislation passed by the province of Nova Scotia.

• (1630)

Mr. Waddell: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I would like to know what is the government's intention with respect to this constitutional amendment. Personally speaking I think it would be very unwise to proceed with it at this time. We should wait to do it property in the new year. I wonder if the government could give us some indication of what will happen.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Before dealing with that perhaps we could finish with third reading of Bill C-96.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the third time and passed.

Mr. Waddell: As I was saying, I wondered what the government's intention was with respect to this constitutional amendment. I personally think it would be unwise to proceed with it now. I hope the government would reconsider and when the House returns we could have proper consideration of it. I know my constituents would be very interested in seeing it happen.

Mr. Andre: The constitutional amendment with respect of New Brunswick has been debated, put to a voice vote, and five members stood to call for a standing vote. Therefore there is no further debate to be held on it.

According to our Standing Orders, on a Friday there is an automatic deferral of the vote. We had sought, since the intent of the House was clear, unanimous consent to have the vote now to allow those who want to vote against it to do so and allow those who want to vote for it to do so. That was denied.

We had looked at the possibility under the Standing Orders. The means exist for those who would deny this coming to a vote to do so and they did so. Certainly the position of the government remains the same. We are ready to vote. It is one of those factors in our Standing Orders for our own protection. It says on Friday all standing votes are automatically deferred. If at any time we could get unanimous consent we could have the vote, but that is all that is left to be done.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, I rise on the same point of order. I think the government House leader did recite the situation evenly. There had been some discussions. As far as I am concerned, without replaying the whole issue, I did not get to speak in the early stages because we did have the voice vote.

However, I just hope the government has learned the importance of proper notice and discussion with all members on something so fundamental as the Constitution of Canada. Albeit a special section that applies to one province, this is the Parliament of Canada. There is very real concern on any matter affecting the amendment of the Constitution of Canada, be it Bill 101 in Quebec, be it founding races, be it the fact that we are replaying the Constitution. Having had the referendum debate and vote on October 16, we will go about it a different way if we are going to try to amend parts of the Constitution piecemeal.

I am glad it is going to sit there until February 1 when we come back. Goodness knows what may happen between now and then.

Mr. Kindy: Mr. Speaker, I rise on the same point of order. I would like to add to what my neighbour here has said. As far as I am concerned the constitutional amendment that was brought in today with just yesterday's notice did not give enough time for members to be here. It is just before Christmas. It is a very important amendment. I think the House of Commons should have the opportunity to vote one way or the other. I hope the government is not going to try to ram it through with some tactic like the Standing Order 53, without giving proper reasons why the Standing Order should be put aside.

There is probably some agreement here on having other bills passed between today and December 31, so the House might be sitting. I hope it has learned a lesson from the vote on the Charlottetown agreement and today's experience and that it will respect the Parliament of Canada.

WILD ANIMAL AND PLANT PROTECTION ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House proceeded to consideration of Bill C-42, an act respecting the protection of certain species of wild animals and plants and the regulation of international and interprovincial trade in those species, as reported, with amendments, by a legislative committee.

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment) moved that the bill be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Charest moved that the bill be read the third time and passed.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I would like to start by taking a few moments to thank hon. members for their unanimous consent, considering the fact that we had to extend our sitting hours today in order to pass this legislation. I appreciate the fact that the hon. member from Sorel supported the request for unanimous consent, as did hon. members sitting as Independents and our Liberal and NDP colleagues.

I am pleased to say that the bill before the House today, now at third reading, has met with a very broad consensus. The bill itself and the proposed amendments were given thorough consideration by a legislative committee. There was also a detailed study by various environmental groups. This legislation is the culmination of many years' work, as a result of which we were able to table this bill in the House.

[English]

An act respecting the protection of certain species of animals and plants was presented for second reading on March 17 and reported back by the legislative committee on June 18.

There are some changes proposed to the bill and I am happy to report that the changes, as far as I know, are the object of a wide consensus on behalf of all members of this House. There has been a very inclusive process of study of this bill in the legislative committee.

May I also add that the parliamentary secretary for the Department of the Environment, the member for Brandon—Souris, played a key role, as he did on other pieces of legislation, in facilitating the work before the legislative committee on this matter. I thank him today on the record, given the fact that as usual he will have done most of the work in the parliamentary process in advancing this bill.

This bill is about the important stress that is now on the world's wildlife populations. We know there is considerable stress on our ecosystems, on the species themselves, and within the species in certain cases. In the case of Canada this is especially significant given the richness of our geography and the fact that we have very key species that are threatened and measures are required to protect them.

The act is new federal legislation. It will protect wild animals and plants by regulating international and interprovincial trade in them and their parts and products.

There are three objectives: first, to help protect wild animal and plant species in foreign countries from poaching and smuggling; second, to protect Canada's wild animal and plant species from illegal trade; and, third, to protect Canada's ecosystems from the introduction of designated harmful species or so-called biological pollutants. It will replace the 1941 Game Export Act and regulations first made in 1975 under the Export and Import Permits Act through which the Convention on International Trade in Endangered Species is implemented in Canada, otherwise known as CITES.

• (1640)

As mentioned a few seconds ago, this piece of legislation has gone under some very thorough and very extensive debate within committee itself and some amendments address the concerns that were expressed in the committee.

For example, this new act will allow Canada to support the efforts of other countries to conserve and protect species, especially endangered ones. It will also prohibit wild animals and plants from being brought into Canada if they have been obtained or otherwise dealt with in violation of foreign conservation laws.

There is a very legitimate trade in certain species or threatened wild animals or plants going on now. That being the case, I should point out that this bill is something that will not impede that trade but will rather create a context in which it can happen with the safeguards we are all seeking.

[Translation]

I do not want to go into details because we have agreed and it is already late; this is the last day of the session. I could talk about this bill at length, but I do not intend to do so. I know that my colleague and friend, the member for Davenport, also wants to give us his comments and I will be very pleased to hear them. My friend and colleague, the member for Skeena, also wants to add some comments and I will be very happy to hear them too. I just want to tell members one thing in closing: the bill will help Canada meet its obligations under the biodiversity convention which the Prime Minister ratified recently.

Two conventions which bind Canada internationally came out of the conference called the earth summit held in Rio de Janeiro, as you will recall. One is a convention on climate change and the other is on biodiversity or, if you prefer, the preservation of biological diversity. Canada is the first industrialized country in the world to sign and ratify both conventions. We did so with the unanimous support of the provinces and territories and I must tell you that we are very proud of it. Today's bill will help us meet this commitment.

So, without further ado, knowing that it is already late and recognizing that the ultimate goal is to pass this bill, I want to thank you, Mr. Speaker, for your patience and take the opportunity, since this may be the last time that I speak to you, to wish you and all those who work in this House, and especially those who contribute to its work, wonderful holidays. Mr. Speaker, I also hope that you will be able to enjoy this ecosystem which—

[English]

Mr. Edwards: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. There have been thorough consultations and I think you would find consent for the following. I would move:

> That, notwithstanding Standing Order 28(2), at any time during the adjournment of the House between December 14, 1992 and December 31, 1992 the Speaker may after consultation with the government cause the House to sit for the sole purpose of giving Royal Assent to any of the following bill or bills: Bill C-26; Bill C-42; Bill C-63; Bill C-86; Bill C-94; Bill C-96; Bill C-100; Bill S-13; Bill S-14; Bill S-15; Bill S-16; Bill S-17 and Bill S-18.
>
> And, following each Royal Assent, the Speaker shall, each time, further adjourn the House forthwith until February 1, 1993; and
> That the provisions of Standing Order 28(3), respecting the recall of the House for urgent and pressing matters, not be superseded by the provisions of this order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is there consent to introduce this motion?

Mr. Kindy: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. I do agree with this motion.

I understand there will be no attempt by the government to bring in an amendment to the Constitution concerning New Brunswick. I give my consent for that reason.

Mr. Riis: I want to say to my friend, the government House leader, that I appreciate the motion that is before us and I certainly will support it. I simply want to acknowledge the fact that we requested that Bill C-91 not be made a part of this list and that he has agreed to that and I want to extend my appreciation.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Andre: I want to respond to my friend from Kamloops. This particular motion is the usual one when we adjourn. We have what basically I think most people would agree is an anachronistic procedure of Royal Assent. There is a bill somewhere in the Senate to do away with that step which is really not necessary. Since Bill C-91, it is my understanding, will not be completed by the Senate prior to Christmas, it is not necessary for us to have it included in this Royal Assent.

I wanted to make sure that the public understands that we are committed to Bill C-91. There are hundreds if not thousands of scientists out there waiting for this bill and we are going to meet their concerns.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I want to respond to my hon. friend, the government House leader. While I appreciate his interest, I do want to acknowledge—this is a strange acknowledgement—that perhaps the democratic approach to the consideration of Bill C-91 will be conducted by the appointed Senate. It certainly was not conducted by this government in terms of allowing adequate public input and reaction to the contents of Bill C-91.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, since we are in the Christmas mood, perhaps the government House leader could indicate to the House, as I am sure he has had extensive consultations with those in the other chamber, when the government intends to have Royal Assent of Bill C-91 should it pass in the Senate. What is the time frame?

Mr. Andre: The one thing about the other house is it actually does have I think proportionately more people than we have who understand the import of the bill. I am thinking of people like Dr. David Keon, the famous surgeon from Ottawa, who is enthusiastically supporting the bill and who recognizes the importance to medical science.

It will be trying to deal with it as expeditiously as possible and certainly as soon as it is able to deal with it. I am sure that the wisdom of that body of sober second thought will prevail. It will reach the right decision, provided it does not for Christmas get a whole new allotment of cow bells and kazoos.

As soon as it is passed, we will be very anxious to bring this House back to give Royal Assent to that bill.

Mr. Nowlan: On the Christmas spirit and the fragility over the difference of opinion on Bill C-91, perhaps the government House leader, even though it affects the other place, since he is sort of in a position to know, can he tell us if the Senate is going to be refurbished with new senators before it starts Bill C-91?

Mr. Andre: All I can say is I hope it is refurbished as soon as possible.

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, as you know, we are conducting a debate on this bill, an act respecting the protection of certain species of wild animals and plants.

We welcome on our side of the House the return of this bill roughly 13 months after it was introduced the first time.

• (1650)

We think that this legislation is long overdue. We want to report that a considerable amount of work was done in committee with a very strong and vigorous input on the part of the member for Skeena, who I am sure is very anxious to speak in a few moments on the strength of the bill, both in terms of international and interprovincial trade of endangered species.

In essence, the purpose of the bill is to protect certain species of animals and plants when it comes to international and interprovincial trade. The prohibition, and this is important for the Canadian travelling public, is to the effect that a person should not import into Canada any animals or plants in contravention of any law of any foreign state, meaning any law that is endorsed and subscribed to in connection with foreign trade by nations which adhere to the convention on international trade in endangered species.

This bill brings Canada in line with other international accords such as the convention on biodiversity and especially with the convention on international trade in endangered species.

It intends to protect biological diversity globally. It intends to band illegal trade of endangered species, fauna and flora.

Last year a convention on international trade in endangered species was strengthened and a list of protected species was extended to include over 1,000 species.

These international actions are no reason for complacency. The House may have heard about research reports that through poaching, the African rhino is on the verge of extinction in southern Africa. The African elephant is still in a precarious state because of the slaughter for the purpose of providing tusks and profit making.

A report issued only this week by the United Nations Environment Program warns that between 100 and 300 species a day, flora and fauna combined, become extinct through habitat destruction, especially through the destruction of tropical rainforests, coral reefs, wetlands and other biologically diverse and rich ecosystems.

Therefore, extinction is not someone else's problem. In the remote areas in Canada, for instance, there are at least 25 endangered species.

My next point is that while we support the passage of this bill because it is important, we would like it to go further. We would like to have fines increased to ensure that they are in line with other international penalties for illegal trade, and possibly the member for Skeena will address this subject more effectively based on his wide-ranging experience.

The fines as far as we are concerned could be brought to $100,000 for individuals and it would not be too little. The fines and criminal charges must be strict enough to ensure that Canada does not become a haven for smugglers.

Aside from the offences, this bill is about international trade, and yet we need parallel legislation which takes an ecosystem management and conservation approach to the protection of species. That is what some of us have proposed by way of private members' bills, including a private members' bill by the member for Davenport, Bill C-209, which I would like to bring to the attention of the minister in the House. I am sure that he already knows about it. This bill intends to provide protection for Canada's own biological diversity. It is intended to identify, protect, if you like rehabilitate, flora and fauna threatened or endangered by human activities in our nation.

Finally, once this bill is given third reading, we on this side of the House urge the government to move swiftly with its promulgation and to make good on the government's commitment contained in the green plan to increase public awareness through environmental education, environmental communications, the schools, through all means that are available. We will build on the urgent need to strengthen wildlife protection for the enrichment and enjoyment of present and, first and foremost because of the pressures to which the minister himself alluded earlier, for future generations.

We are glad to give support to this bill and to take this opportunity to urge the minister to also take an initiative for the protection of Canada's own biological diversity. I know that it is close to his heart and that he will move swiftly with the determination which characterizes him, for which he is well known, to fill this gap for which this measure is badly needed.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to have an opportunity to speak in support of Bill C-42, and that good will actually got it to the point of being able to pass today. I was worried earlier today as I sat and the hours went by that perhaps those which we are here speaking on behalf of, which are the wild plants and animals of this planet, might not have any voices speaking on their behalf as this year rings its way out.

This has been a profound act of political will. It is a kind of consultation that I do not think very many pieces of legislation have ever been through. A national-inter-provincial-territorial consultation process began in 1982. The legislation itself actually started to formulate back in 1987. It has been a very long and tedious process to get it to where it is today.

Frankly, it is now a pretty good piece of legislation and the minister should be complimented for having ridden herd as he has and provided the necessary political will to actually get it to the floor of the House. I know, with the legislative agenda that there has been in the last little while, getting a piece of legislation about wild plants and animals to the floor of this Chamber with all of the other competing interests has not been an easy task.

I also think that the minister and those on the government side listened at least with due diligence to the concerns raised from this side about the issues of fines. They were substantially altered. They are considerable. It is in that area to which I direct my remarks for a moment, because I think there is a responsibility not so much now of the Minister of the Environment but of his colleagues in the field of justice and in law enforcement to make sure that law enforcement personnel generally in this country are aware of what this bill is all about.

As my friend from Davenport pointed out, this is more about plants and animal species that are being trafficked internationally and in some cases interprovincially than it is to protect the biological nature of this country. We do not have a lot of endangered species, in fact we have very few that are listed under CITES. We have 195 endangered species at the moment that are listed by COSEWIC, Canada's committee in this field on endangered plants and animals. There is a great deal of work to be done in that area.

On the education of the enforcement personnel, the minister is committed to $12.3 million under the green plan—I spoke to him earlier today. I am quite confident that the funds are there and are going to be delivered—and for the 29 new person years. I know that excellent public servants such as Mr. McLean in the minister's department will be eagerly anticipating learning later today that the 29 person years will in fact still be delivered by the Minister of the Environment, perhaps over the next five years instead of over the next six, to get it jump-started and going.

So there is that one big job on educating enforcers of the law.

• (1700)

The other much bigger one is to educate the bench. In my own experience, it follows the issue of the exportation of things like bear gall bladders and paws and various "exotic parts" of Canadian wildlife internationally.

Regrettably when offenders are finally caught, charged, and brought before the courts such as some of my own constituents, the sentences are inappropriate. One fellow in particular was before the courts after having been convicted more than 100 times already and came back before the bench and was not given what I consider to be an appropriate sentence.

I am hoping that all members of this House will take some interest in this issue, in particular the Minister of Justice, and those who have some direct access to educational materials for the bench. Make sure that the judges and the courts in this country understand the seriousness with which this bill was taken by the members who worked on it.

The fines are not inconsiderable. They go up into the hundreds of thousands of dollars for corporations that are involved. There are extensive periods of incarceration, and it is certainly something that I as a member of this House, and I know the Minister of the Environment is hoping that these kinds of sentences will be handed down.

I know that when a corporate entity appears before a court in any area of this country with an orchid in hand and the lawyer gets up and extols the virtue of the corporation and the client and says: "Oh, my Lord, you are not possibly going to put my client away for six months or a year and fine him or her $300,000 over this one measley orchid?" I hope the bench will come to understand that this legislation, at least in the foreseeable future is going to become more, not less, important.

According to Edward Wilson, the global authority at the moment on the loss of biodiversity, we are losing at least 10 entire species an hour on this planet. It is mind boggling. That is an entire species of parrots, entire species of orchids, entire species of other forms of plants and animals. In Somalia there is not one elephant left. At the turn of the century we were losing maybe a specie a month but the time clock is accelerating so fast that legislation like this has become mandatory.

Even though the fines and degree of incarceration were not brought to the levels that I think were necessary, meaning there is a possibility of Canada continuing to be a conduit for smuggling, and a conduit for poaching, I would hope through stringent and rigid enforcement, there would be zero tolerance for the smuggling of endangered plants and animals at the border.

I do not care what excuses some people have when they have a little snake hidden inside their cowboy boots, that they are taking and saying they did not know it was worth $100,000. I just do not buy it any more.

The amount of money being made, as we heard from witnesses in terms of the traffic in endangered plants and animals is comparable to the drug trade. We are talking hundreds of millions being exchanged for things like bear gall bladders for people who think it is some kind of erotic medicine. It is a very serious state of affairs and I am pleased this bill is being passed.

I know I told the minister and my friend from Davenport I was not going to talk very long, but I can get wound up into these things quite quickly.

We want to pass this, Madam Speaker, and I do have a few other things I need to say.

The minister pointed out the bill does three things. Canadians should not be fooled by the brand name. It is called the Wild Plant and Animal Protection Act. It does not protect those endangered species and biosystems inside Canada. This brings us into compliance with CITES, the Convention on International Trade in Endangered Species. There is about 50,000 species now listed in the appendices of CITES. Most of them are plants like orchids but there are many mammals listed in it and Canada's own COSEWIC listings should be included.

It does protect some of Canada's wild plant and animal species from illegal trade. It protects some Canadian ecosystems from the introduction of designated harmful species and it helps to protect wild animal and plant species in foreign countries from poaching and smuggling. The initiatives of the legislation are good.

As I said earlier, the kind of consultations the Minister of the Environment conducted are first class where there are consultations with the provinces and the territories and we get them all on board.

Now the job is getting the enforcers on board, the 29 professionals who can identify the particular endangered species that are often smuggled in, particularly at our airports but also at our ports and in vehicles coming into Canada. It is a big, big job and the public needs to be educated about the severity of it.

I do hope the minister will soon take the next step. That is to move on the kind of endangered species legislation there is at least in the United States. I would not take it as a specific model, but clearly there needs to be a legislative move in this country to protect endangered spaces and endangered species. I know the minister is committed to doing that.

I will end by saying it is a bill that Canadians should not be tricked by. It does not do a whole lot for plants and animals inside Canada, but it is a very useful weapon in the arsenal of dealing with international crime, even those international petty criminals who think that just smuggling a few orchids is not that bad. There is big money in it and has to be stopped.

I am pleased this is the last debate to take place before Christmas because it is a bill well worthy of singing a few tunes to. I congratulate the Minister of the Environment for getting it through.

Motion agreed to, bill read the third time and passed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

BUDGET IMPLEMENTATION (GOVERNMENT ORGANIZATIONS) ACT 1992

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed from Friday, December 4, 1992, consideration of the motion of Mr. Mazankowski that Bill C-93, an Act to implement certain government organization provisions of the budget tabled in the House of Commons on February 25, 1992, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Economics envelope; and the amendment of Mrs. Finestone.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): When the debate was suspended, the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands still had 11 minutes left.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to be the first speaker for the first sitting of the House in 1993, and I hope all members on the other side spent a pleasant holiday in their constituencies.

My own constituents were asking me when there would be an election, because nearly everyone I met during the holidays wanted at least to be able to vote against this government and have an opportunity to do so very shortly.

We now see a government here in the House introducing bills that are unacceptable to most Canadians. Canadians would like to have a chance to say no to this government now. And I hope that when the Prime Minister considers the matter this week, he will consider the interests of Canadians.

[English]

I have to return to the bill before us. As I was saying at the time of the adjournment on this debate on December 4, the bill is unacceptable to this party, primarily because of the change relating to the Canada Council and SSHRC, the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council.

I note also in the bill that it is stated that part of the purpose of this bill is to transfer certain functions and staff of the Department of External Affairs concerned with the promotion of Canadian culture abroad to the Canada Council. The Canada Council would be renamed the Canada Council for the Arts and for Research in the Social Sciences and Humanities to reflect this expanded function.

I have grave concerns about that latter transfer as well. The Canada Council has never been involved in foreign cultural work on behalf of Canada. It has no personnel who are trained in that particular kind of work. The Department of External Affairs has people posted abroad doing work already. Surely the cultural part of that work has been relatively minor to date. It is surely not taking up a lot of full-time positions in the Department of External Affairs. Yet, the government in its wisdom has decided as an apparent cost saving measure—although it is hard to imagine how this is going to save any money; I expect it will cost more—that it is going to take this jurisdiction away from the Department of External Affairs and create a new international arm, if you like, at the Canada Council. One wonders how many more employees will be required to administer this program now at the Canada Council than are currently engaged in external affairs, where surely it is a very part-time function of most of the officers involved in it.

I am very concerned about this not being a cost-saving measure at all, but in fact one that will cost Canadians more. This whole scheme was very ill-conceived. The government did not apply its mind to the problem before it brought this bill before the House or before it introduced the budget. I am sure it was a last minute thing in an effort to get an impressive list of government agencies that could be folded up. It stuck this particular one on the list because it had nothing else to do and it had to make the list look impressive and long.

We know from the savings that have been announced on the total list that the savings on this particular aspect of it must really be peanuts. If the government were saving money there, it has been spending it elsewhere.

We had a spectacle recently in Kingston. The new minister of state for science came to Kingston on January 22. If he would have told me he was coming, I would have gone to the airport to meet him but he did not let me know. He came to Kingston and announced the Prime Minister's awards for teaching excellence in Kingston. He issued a lot of fancy, very colourful and beautifully printed brochures and $585,000 worth of prizes. They are not actually scholarships, just prizes. They are to be given to deserving teachers across Canada who assist their students with quality education in science and mathematics.

It is a fine program, but you have to wonder. The government is saying we have to save money by bunching these agencies together and forcing them to do things together when in fact they should be separately represented and are doing a perfectly adequate job at a relatively modest cost now. How did it find the money in the year of an election to come up with $585,000 worth of prizes?

An hon. member: Election is the operative word.

Mr. Milliken: Of course the figures that I do not have and which were not in the minister's press release—surprise, surprise—are the administrative costs of this program. How much did it cost to produce the glossy brochures and the fancy application forms? How many people are going to be employed to review the awards that are being handed out and decide who is entitled to them? It is a phenomenal program, a very good idea, but it is of no coincidence I suggest that April 30 is the deadline for applications. I will bet you the Prime Minister in giving out his awards will be jetting across the country during the campaign, calling teachers in to receive their awards from him when he visits the communities across Canada.

I suspect we might find in next year's budget, if this group is re-elected, this program cut as a cost saving measure because they could not afford it any more. Yet in an election year they can afford it, a year when they are closing down the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council and disbanding some of its activities by forcing it in with the Canada Council and similarly putting works of the Canada Council at risk. It is a not a satisfactory way to run a government. This is most unsatisfactory and the government must know it.

I also note that this particular $585,000 prize program, the Prime Minister's teachers' awards for excellence, comes at a time when the department of science as I understand it has recently had cuts. The hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell no doubt is aware of this. I read in the paper recently that 180 jobs were cut in that department the other day. Why was that? A shortage of money. Yet the government managed to find $500,000 for this program, plus the unaccounted for costs of administration. We have not heard about those.

At a time when the government is preaching restraint to its employees, firing off right, left and centre saying it has too many employees, their jobs are redundant and it does not need them any longer, it is embarking on new prize givings for Canadians all in the name of the Prime Minister and clearly designed to be handed out in the course of an election campaign.

These changes in this law are opposed by the scientific community in Canada. I have a letter from the Social Science Federation of Canada signed by their executive director. I would like to read a paragraph from the letter. The letter states: "As you know the Social Science Federation of Canada, which represents some 15,000 social scientists in 24 learned societies and 68 universities, has grave concerns about the ability of the new agency to protect the gains made by the Social Science and Humanities Research Council over the past 14 years. We are particularly concerned with maintaining separate funding for the research segment of the new agency and further encouraging the collaborative efforts of the other two granting councils which have been introduced by SSHRC".

He indicates that SSHRC expects to appear before the legislative committee when it holds hearings on Bill C-93. I can only hope that the members on the government side will listen very attentively to what these people say.

I have received numerous letters from constituents of my own involved in the university community in Kingston who are opposed to this bill. They believe it is a bad bill. The minister of state for privatization I know knows something about the evils of this bill. He must have spent some time studying it because he knows about privatization and what damage it has done to the fabric of the Government of Canada. I would welcome his remarks in the course of the debate on this bill.

He must have concerns about this bill and the fact that these agencies which have functioned perfectly well before are being lumped together. Given the government's record of funding cuts, of failure to support the scientific community in Canada, which we have seen repeatedly in the reductions that the government has introduced in this budget particularly, one can only worry about the future of the social sciences in this country.

• (1210)

I am proud to say that I was a graduate in the social sciences. I studied political science and economics. I enjoyed the experience very much. I do not say that it was great preparation for being a member of this House but it certainly did me no harm and brought me into contact with this institution.

Mr. McDermid: Some members have done well.

Mr. Milliken: I cannot hear the hon. member's remarks. I am sure they are erudite as usual. It brought me into contact with this institution at an early age, a contact which I have enjoyed repeatedly and continuously over the years.

I see you are indicating my time is almost up, Mr. Speaker. This bill is one that needs revision. As I indicated in my earlier remarks, parts of it are acceptable to the opposition. Part III, which changes the role of the Canada Council and the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council, is quite unacceptable. I urge the government to consider deleting this section from the bill.

Some government members have indicated they object to the changes in the Unemployment Insurance Act. I can only urge them and others who have put on their thinking caps to look at this bill and see if they do not agree we should make significant changes in this bill along the lines that have been suggested we make in the Unemployment Insurance Act.

If they stand up and object, we can get the government to change its mind on this bill and get rid of this obnoxious part of it. This will allow the bill to go through in a way that is acceptable to the vast majority of Canadians.

This way is not reasonable. It is not a money saving measure. It is a political game. It is one the government ought to be ashamed it even embarked on. I hope the government will see fit to withdraw Part III.

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, I listened to my hon. friend as I did in the earlier part of the session when he began his speech.

I must say his logic fails me in these times when the public and even his own leader is calling for more efficient use of taxpayer resources. It is not just a matter of cost cutting, though cost cutting is extremely important. The issue involved here is service to the public. The world changes and as the world changes, institutions of government must change in order to respond.

I quote from his leader's speech the other day when at the University of Ottawa he said: "Our challenge today is to adapt the role of government to a new world". That is what this government has been doing in a variety of ways. I am pleased to see that the Liberal Party is starting to discover some of the wisdom of the policies of this government by following suit in a number of the policy pronoucements they have been taking.

However, that is not the purpose of this discussion. My hon. friend speaks with specific reference to the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council and the other funding agencies. I have been a great supporter of the work of these agencies. The Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council had the good wisdom some years ago to award me a doctoral fellowship. Naturally I have a great appreciation for its judgment and the quality of its work.

It is important this work continue. It is important that the support of research both at the graduate level and at the post-doctoral level be carried out and be supported. Whether that necessitates the maintenance of three separate bureaucracies is a different question.

What is before this House is not the value and the importance of that work. It is not the rigor with which those applications are screened by experts in the field on the basis of peer review as they are. That is the basis upon which those decisions are made.

My hon. friend knows perfectly well that people sometimes make mischief with decisions made by granting agencies by pointing out that a grant was made to this person to study this or that. They try to tag the government when in fact, peer review is the only proper basis. That is the basis upon which it will be done in the future.

What is being done here is an improvement of the system. It makes the process work more efficiently for the benefit both of the clients of the system but also for the modest benefit of the taxpayer as well.

Perhaps my friend would like to reflect upon those no doubt profound remarks and offer his observations.

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, I would be delighted to reflect on what the hon. member said. I would love to believe what he said but he has not cited a tittle of evidence in support of the fact that this is going to save the Canadian taxpayers a single cent.

I would like to know who is going to be displaced. Who and what jobs are going to be eliminated as a result of this change? There is no evidence that there will be. The Social Science and Humanities Research Council functions very well. It is one of three granting councils in Canada. The three granting councils act in a similar fashion. It is not a merger of the three granting councils that is being proposed in this bill. It is moving one of them into the Canada Council which does a different kind of function, albeit similar, but is not the same. It grants exclusively to the arts.

The Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council, NSERC and the MRC are the granting councils for three academic disciplines. They normally act in roughly the same way in terms of peer review and so on.

That is not what is proposed to be changed in this bill. What the government is doing is taking one of those three academic granting councils and putting it in with an arts granting council and saying that the two can work together now. It does not make sense. If there were some move to put the three granting councils under one roof, there might be some justification for it and there might be some saving to taxpayers. I do not know.

There certainly is not a saving by merging these functions and by transferring the external affairs functions, which I noticed my hon. friend blithely skipped over. He knows that is going to cost Canadian taxpayers. He knows it is going to drive up the cost. He knows that the money the government is saving from this scheme is being spent away on the Prime Minister's awards for teaching excellence, and he did not answer that.

If he is so concerned about the Canadian taxpayer, why is he not objecting to the extra half million dollars being handed out this year on these awards, plus the administrative cost which will probably bring it up to about one million dollars? I did not hear a peep from him on that score.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I am rather shocked that the government member would not understand the implications of this particular piece of legislation. Frankly what was said is not accurate.

My colleague should know we have received hundreds of petitions and letters objecting not only to the substance of the bill but in fact to the process that was undertaken.

I would like to ask my colleague who has just spoken on behalf of my party how he feels about the process itself. There was no consultation. Is that an appropriate way to proceed?

I would like him to comment, as I believe he mentioned it, on whether I am correct that organizations involved both directly and on the periphery are not happy with this piece of legislation. They are the people who are most affected. They are saying that it is inappropriate, that it will not do those things that the government is saying it should do and that in fact it will be dysfunctional.

Finally, I have received comments to this effect and would be interested in knowing how the people in the hon. member's riding have reacted to the research and development funds that have been made available in his particular area. In mine, they have been shocked, they have been angered and they feel that it is contrary to what the government has said it ought to be doing in this area.

Mr. Milliken: Certainly, Mr. Speaker, I agree with the hon. member that the lack of consultation was a serious blow in this case. Surely if a government agency is going to be amalgamated with another one of the two it at least ought to be consulted, but apparently this was a decision made the morning of the budget and stuck in at the last minute. There was no apparent communication from all the indications that we have.

Mr. McDermid: How do you know that?

Mr. Milliken: If the hon. member has evidence to the contrary he can present it. I would be glad to hear from him, but our understanding is that there was no consultation.

Mr. McDermid: You are just making that up.

Mr. Milliken: No, we are not. It was reported in the press at the time. The hon. member can check the news stories, very reliable sources.

Second, the opposition in my community is widespread to these changes. Many of the social scientists at Queen's University and the Royal Military College have written to me expressing their concern, particularly those at Queen's. They and many of the students are very concerned that this change is not for the better.

I am surprised that the hon. member for South Shore having received a grant once would treat this in such a cavalier way. He should be out supporting these councils and helping them as the people in my riding are.

Finally, in respect of the government's cuts in funding for research, I have a letter to the Prime Minister. A copy was sent to me from the vice-principal of health services at Queen's University, Dr. Duncan Sinclair. I would like to read part of the letter just to indicate the degree of dissatisfaction with the government's policy. It states:

Hidden away in Mr. Mazankowski's economic statement of December 4 was announcement of your government's decision to renege on your previous very far-sighted commitment to provide increases to the federal granting councils of 4 per cent in funding for each of the next four years. When this commitment was made, many of us commended you and your colleagues for having the foresight to invest in the nation's future even at a time of severe financial constraint. We were all aware that increases of 4% would not go far to undo the many years of relative neglect of investment in research and development in Canada but we agreed then it was a start, and a good one given the state of our economy.

• (1220)

That this decision has been reversed is dismaying at the least and unconscionable at the worst. That it is unknown to most Canadians that you have reversed your course and reneged on your commitment is shameful. I was present at a consultation on a new strategic plan for the Medical Research Council that you addressed, the first such direct comment, to my knowledge, by a Prime Minister to a granting Council on government's recognition that investment in inquiry is the only way to future health in our economy and nation. It was brave speech now made hollow by the actions taken on December 4.

My colleagues and students deserve better, Mr. Prime Minister, as does the country. Like it or not, the future will soon be upon us and our inheritors will not be able to do much with it without the knowledge, derived from research, that will make it possible for us to compete in a world made small by modern communication. I urge you to reverse this decision and give them and us a fighting chance.

That is the kind of letter I have received. That is the kind of disappointment that is felt in this country because of the government's two-faced approach to research funding. This bill is further exemplification of that two-faced approach. It is cutting one of the councils and merging it with the Canada Council. It need not do it. It is pulling out of external affairs cultural responsibilities which are well looked after there and need not be transferred. It will not save the taxpayers of Canada money. It is embarking on a Prime Minister's prize program for teachers and spending additional taxpayers' dollars at the very time it is preaching restraint to all these people. This is wrong-headed policy and it cries out for amendment.

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have an opportunity to participate in this debate. I am going to refresh the House's memory as to why this legislation has been brought forward and place it in context as well.

It is interesting to note that today we have well over 400 separate organizations and advisory bodies that comprise the Government of Canada. There are 26 statutory departments, 80 departmental agencies, 56 Crown corporations and over 200 boards, tribunals, councils and other advisory bodies. There are times when one wonders how decisions ever get made in the government with so many agencies, bodies and individuals involved in the making of them.

If the government is going to meet the needs of the people it has to move with the times. Sometimes there is a sentiment, and I sense this sentiment as prevailing on the other side of the House, that once something is created it is created in perpetuity whether it has a purpose to exist or not. That is not the philosophy which prevails on this side of the House. We see the government's role as providing service to Canadians in response to needs which have been identified. Some of those needs last for many years and others are short in their duration.

The purpose of this bill as a budgetary measure is part of the process of streamlining government. It is not just for the cost savings although obviously they are a very important factor. It is important to note that this streamlining exercise which has been going on and was manifested in Bill C-63 and indicated in the budget of the Minister of Finance in March 1992 when he announced the winding down or closure of 47 agencies, still leaves over 400 of these agencies.

This streamlining process is to take place not only for the purpose of saving money, although that is important. Saving money and efficiently using tax dollars is of importance to taxpayers. It is important to me as a taxpayer because I do not want to see the government waste my tax dollars. I want to see the most effective and efficient use made of them. There is also the matter of service to the public. How can government best provide the services? How can government best respond to the individual needs of the taxpayers and the citizens of the country? That is what this exercise is all about as well.

It is interesting to note that we have had such a proliferation of government in this country that we now have to have meetings of interdepartmental groups to decide things simply because so many different departments are involved in the same decision. I understand for example that 11 federal government agencies or departments were involved in a simple exercise like planning the Canada Day celebrations last year.

Today there are four different federal government departments involved in the inspection of food: National Health and Welfare; Agriculture Canada; Fisheries and Oceans; and Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Does this sort of duplication and overlap make sense?

I guess from time to time it is incumbent upon the government as part of the process of serving the Canadian people to take a look at the machinery and structure of government that exists and see if there are ways to reconstitute things so it can more effectively serve the Canadian people. That is really what it is all about.

It is reasonable to ask the question from time to time: Does the purpose for which this agency or board was established still exist? If it does not then obviously it is time to get rid of it. Or the question could be as to whether there is a better way to do it. Or if other agencies and departments have been developed meaning there is some sort of overlap, then by collapsing them together the service could more efficiently be provided.

We are talking about service to Canadians along with decision making and cutting down on the red tape and bureaucracy by which things happen. That is really what this exercise of which Bill C–93 is a part is very important.

Reference has been made in this debate to the privatization program of this government. Indeed, this bill is sponsored by the Minister of State for Finance and Privatization. Privatization is a process by which the taxpayers are relieved of costs with which they are burdened.

I am pleased to say that this government during eight and a half years in office has removed 90,000 people from its payroll. I hasten to add that most of those people are still employed but they are employed in the private sector. They are no longer the burden of the taxpayer and so it should be. The people of Canada are looking to government to streamline itself to provide services in a most efficient way and with whatever possible benefits there can be for the taxpayer.

It is appropriate to look at each agency and ask the question: Does the need still exist? Is there a public policy objective and can that public policy objective be more effectively served through the private sector? If it can be provided through the private sector then clearly there is no reason for the government to be involved. That is the philosophy on this side of the House. I suspect that does not necessarily apply to my colleagues opposite who seem to think the government should have its nose in everybody's business from time to time.

Our view is that the government should be motivated by the question of how best it can serve the public and how best it can provide a good deal for the taxpayer. That really is what part of the present bill is all about.

On the subject of cost savings it is important to make a point and I have heard some members in this debate discuss how much money would be saved. I think the amount of money to be saved in this bill is relatively modest. However, over time if we improve the efficiency of the government and services to the Canadian people, that in itself is an important thing. Clearly, there will be some modest savings effected as a result of this piece of legislation and that obviously is very important.

I think we should be looking even further. Take for example the matter of decentralization of government. Perhaps my perspective is somewhat impacted by the fact that I live in Nova Scotia and not in central Canada or in Ottawa.

Why is it that the Government of Canada is so centralized in Ottawa? What is more ridiculous than the idea of the Department of Fisheries and Oceans being headquartered here in Ottawa? Why do we have a massive bureaucracy of people, working very hard granted, involved in fisheries right here in Ottawa where the only fish in town are at the Dominion stores? Why is the department of fisheries not operated out of the regions, out of Nova Scotia or Atlantic Canada with another segment of the department in British Columbia where people really have a sense of what the fishery is all about? These are questions that need to be asked. Do we need these great bureaucracies?

I strongly and openly recommend to the Minister of Finance in his review of government boards, agencies and departments that he take a serious look at the whole business of whether the entire Government of Canada has to be in Ottawa.

• (1230)

After all, not all Canadians are in Ottawa. What is wrong with the Government of Canada performing some of its central decision making services in Nova Scotia, Saskatchewan, Newfoundland or British Columbia? Is there anything wrong with that?

I certainly do not think so. I do not think so at all. I think we need to do more reviewing of these agencies of government and the tremendous bureaucracies that seem to have developed. They take on an existence of their own which may or may not have anything to do with why they were established in the first place.

This is important. I would ask all members of this House to recognize in this bill a very important step forward in looking at government and at how government can best serve the people of Canada. That is what this streamlining process is all about. It is about service to Canadians and it is about decision making.

I am sure hon. members like myself frequently get calls from constituents about granting processes or decisions. When you go to get copies of the forms that are there for approving things, it is amazing. Some require seven, eight and nine signatures before a decision can be made. I wonder why that is so. Why not hire a competent person who knows what they are doing and let them make the decision?

Again, I use the example of the fisheries. Why are individual licensing decisions made here in Ottawa? Why are they not made by the very excellent fisheries and oceans staff in Nova Scotia, Newfoundland, in the gulf and so on? The point I am making is that we need more streamlining of government and this bill represents a very important step in the right direction.

Any suggestion that my remarks are critical of any individuals who work for the Government of Canada would not be appropriate. My experience is that Canada benefits from an extremely dedicated Public Service. We have a competent Public Service with people who do what we in this House try to do, namely serve the Canadian people as well as they can.

The question is how can we do it in order to provide the best service? All of these various structures of government exist for one purpose only, to serve the Canadian people. That applies to us and to all departments and agencies. Therefore, the reviewing of these structures of government, the decision that was taken and the thrust implied in the budget of the minister last year, is an extremely important one. It is beneficial for Canadians.

I might say, unlike my hon. friend who spoke just prior to me and who has a large university in his constituency, that I have not had a lot of people phoning me and saying that they disagree with this legislation. It is quite the contrary. I remember when the budget came down that I received a number of comments from people saying: Delighted to see that you are thinning government a little bit. Some have even gone so far as to suggest to me that I should thin down myself a little bit, and I must say that is certainly an aspiration that I have. The process of thinning and streamlining government is one that is indeed supported by the public.

Most people wonder why we are debating this at all. After all, this is a budget implementation measure. The principle of doing what this bill is here to do has already been approved by this House and, I might say, has been significantly endorsed by people from coast to coast.

This debate in a way, while it is legally necessary, is really an after the fact debate. This House and the Canadian people spoke on this measure when they passed the budget. Nevertheless, the bill is before us. I think it is very consistent with where the Canadian public wants to see government restructure in this country. I heartily commend the government for bringing forth this measure and encourage all members to give it their support.

[Translation]

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I would like to comment on what was said by the Conservative member for South Shore, in Nova Scotia. I saw him make a big song and dance about the need for further decentralizing the Public Service so that people in his riding would have a place to find work besides the Dominion stores. I do not know exactly how long he has been a member of the House, but I do know he has been here for at least four and a half years.

The hon. member may have been here since 1984 but, if he has, he certainly is not doing his homework because he ought to know that decentralization of the Public Service has been taking place since 1972. If he bothered to make inquiries he would receive a little brochure from the Public Service explaining that there is a quota system for public servants across Canada.

For instance, the province of Ontario represents 30 per cent of the population so Ontario has about 30 per cent of the number of public servants. If his province represents 8 per cent of the population, if he had bothered to do his homework, he would know that his province has about that proportion of public servants. As for ensuring that public servants are in the right place, I am sure the various fisheries services in Canada are located in Nova Scotia, Newfoundland and British Columbia, not in the middle of Saskatchewan.

Conversely, when certain activities focus on agriculture our public servants are in Saskatchewan and Alberta where the farmers are, not on the coast of Nova Scotia or Labrador.

When a member wants to defend the interests of his constituency, his region and his government, he should at least check his statistics before making all kinds of statements.

[English]

Mr. McCreath: Mr. Speaker, I certainly commend and understand my hon. friend's interest in speaking on behalf of public servants as he has probably as large a percentage of public servants in his constituency as anybody in this House and I commend him for taking that position.

My remarks of course were not addressed to the subject of public servants. My remarks were addressed, and I am sure on reflection he will realize that, to services to Canadian people that government, government agencies and departments provide, asking the question how well and how best they can be provided.

It would not make a lot of sense to me to have all the Coast Guard stations spread equally across the country, not that he advocated that. What is important is that the question be asked whether government ought to be involved in providing the service that is required. If the answer is yes, the next question is how best can government provide that service.

The Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency, for example, is based in Moncton. It is operated from the maritimes where it should be because it is Atlantic Canada that it serves. I do not understand why they have an office with 75 to 100 people here in Ottawa. I do not understand why that is necessary. That is not in any way to disparage any of the individuals who work there. That is not the point I am making.

The point I am making is whether or not that is what is required to provide the services of that agency, the same point I made when I spoke about fisheries and oceans. Why is fisheries and oceans headquartered here in Ottawa with a large bureaucracy and staff of people when what they are dealing with is an industry and the support and direction of an industry that is located on the coast?

That is the point I was making.

In looking at government and in streamlining government the fact is no matter how many people we have in fisheries and oceans here in Ottawa we still require them in Newfoundland, Nova Scotia, Quebec, the gulf and British Columbia because that is where the fisheries are.

I again commend my hon. friend for doing what he felt was appropriate. I certainly hope he was not suggesting I was in any way attacking public servants, which I do not think he was. He was taking advantage of this debate to make a point on behalf of his constituents. The point that I was making and that I would invite the House to address is the issue before us, which is how best government serves Canadians from coast to coast.

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, in response to what my hon. colleague was mentioning, particularly about geography being one of the important features of making a government more streamlined, I was reflecting on that. It does not seem to me that moving certain aspects of the ministry of immigration to Vegreville, Alberta, is really going to make the government that much more streamlined. It is a problem that we have with waste in government right now. It is a question of competence and mind-set, the attitude of this government.

I paid particular attention to my colleague when he spoke about how we have a certain amount of duplication between federal and provincial government activities. Working on the Beaudoin–Dobbie committee, we found from Quebec studies that that sometimes goes up to about $15 billion a year. I am not quite sure whether that figure is correct or not, but we do know that there is a great deal of money wasted by this government. It is not a question of geography. I am sure if you had these people moving from Ottawa into the different provinces or regions, you would still have people doing jobs that other people are already doing.

I am concerned about this question of whether maybe it should be more regionalized. I think it is a far deeper problem than that. I think the problem is one of the government, whether it is well intentioned or not. I am not here to castigate the motives of the government necessarily, but it seems that every time it says it wants to help the population in general and respond to needs that arise, as my hon. colleague mentioned, needs which the government is sensitive to, it shoots itself and fellow Canadians in the foot.

If you take a look at the so–called UIC reform for unemployment insurance, there was an obvious remark made by the minister of manpower and immigration who said essentially that there is this duplication.

I would like to ask the hon. member how he sees this duplication ending, not just moving the people from Ottawa to the other regions, but really ending this duplication.

Mr. McCreath: Mr. Speaker, I am a little taken aback. What is wrong with Vegreville? What is wrong with locating a centre that could be put anywhere in Canada in Vegreville? Is there any reason that the people of Vegreville, who pay their taxes, should not experience some of the economic benefits that accrue from having a government agency located in their community? Is there anything different about that than locating the Department of Veterans Affairs in Charlottetown or locating the Canadian Philatelic Museum in Antigonish, which the Deputy Prime Minister of the last government did, which just happened to be in his constituency? What is wrong with locating the GST centre, which is a brand new facility that is necessary, in Summerside, Prince Edward Island?

My remarks earlier were directed to the notion that things that occur in the region logically necessitate that the government should be centred there to ensure the delivery of those services.

An hon. member: To streamline services.

Mr. McCreath: That is right, to streamline those services. Absolutely, as my hon. friend points out.

There are other things that do not necessarily have to be done in Ottawa. This government is here for the benefit of the people. Why should this government not be located where the people are, which is in different parts of the country, so that there is no duplication involved in having certain government departments or agencies headquartered elsewhere than in Ottawa? I see nothing wrong with that.

I look forward to the day when some Canadian public servants, a greater number than the handful that are there now, have the honour and privilege of having their particular agency located in western Nova Scotia. I think that Lunenburg, for example, would be a marvellous spot to locate the Department of Fisheries and Oceans. I think the Department of Forestry would do marvellously if it were located in Liverpool, Nova Scotia.

My friend raised the question of duplication. I listened with great care, although I am not sure I really understand what he was saying. One of the things that was discussed in the constitutional discussions last year was streamlining government by getting rid of overlap between federal and provincial responsibilities. I think that is a very worthy goal. It was one that was pursued in Charlottetown to a degree that was not, as it turned out, acceptable to the public as a whole but it is certainly an aspiration that should be continued. Perhaps on another occasion, I will speak at greater length on that subject.

[Translation]

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I listened very attentively to what the hon. member opposite said and I wonder how he can say one thing and change his opinion nearly 180 degrees in a few seconds when he is questioned about what he said.

[English]

The issue is not whether the immigration service should be located in Vegreville, although a whole argument could certainly be made about that. According to the member's own arguments the issue is that fisheries and oceans should not be located in Ottawa because that is not where the majority of the people using it happen to be located.

An hon. member: Right.

Mr. Boudria: My colleague and I have used the member's own argument, not ours, to show the duplicity in the government's ways.

An hon. member: In Vegreville it is a computer centre.

Mr. Boudria: Oh no.

Then I hear the hon. member saying that they are going to merge these two councils, the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council and the Canada Council, to save money.

To start with, as the very distinguished and learned member for Kingston and the Islands has said, the member has not made a case that it will save any money. Even if the hon. member had made that case that is not the sole criteria. It is perhaps a criteria but certainly not the only one.

This government then says that it really wants to save money because it is the government and it wants to do that. I have spoken on occasion in this House about Tory government waste and I just happen to have a few examples of how the government wasted the money of the taxpayers of Canada.

An hon. member: Let us hear it.

Mr. Boudria: I was not going to but at the insistence of the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands I am going to have to do so.

For instance, the government decided to use a private courier, Interpost Systems of Canada, instead of Canada Post because it wanted to have reliable service. This is what it said. One department alone has spent $301,237 in hiring Interpost courier instead of Canada Post. Another department has spent $26,000. It goes on and on. Millions of dollars have been spent because the government did not trust the agency run by the government House leader to deliver the mail. I am putting it kindly because of my usual non-partisan style.

The government tells us again that it wants to save money. Well, well, well. I have news for the government. First, according to media reports in recent weeks the government has resumed the initiative of having not one but two jets fly the Prime Minister around. One of them carries the Prime Minister and out its window can be seen the other jet flying beside it. I suppose that in case the first jet is defective there is a second jet to carry the Prime Minister.

I am not an expert in aviation but something tells me that if the jet ever conked out, especially in the air, there would be some difficulty in transferring this very precious passenger to another jet. However I shall not comment on that any further at this moment.

I have examples of the constituency householder of the hon. member for Charlevoix. All the members and all Canadians who might be listening must know that we cannot address members directly, so let me put it this way. These are the grants that the Prime Minister announced in his riding, as he is the member for Charlevoix.

For instance, the sum of $500,000 has been given to an outfit in his constituency. It is going to find a system to remove the smell from pig manure in a piggery located in his constituency. This is from the same government that tells us it has no money. I am not saying we should not invest in agriculture, but this money goes to one farm in his constituency.

• (1250)

There are other grants of $81,000 and $155,000 to tourism establishments in his constituency. I could go on and on and list all kinds of grants that he has given all over the place in his riding. Maybe some of these agencies, maybe all of them for all I know, deserve them. However, the issue is that there seems to be one rule for the Prime Minister and his constituency and one rule for the rest of us.

For instance, last week there was a demonstration in Ottawa against the closure of rural post offices in Canada. The government has closed down many post offices in my riding and that is shameful. It has closed down the post office in Saint-Clément de Rivière-du-Loup. The government says that this is the new way and we have to cut down.

Last week I brought to the attention of the media the situation of five post offices in the riding of Charlevoix. In the five cases the postmasters retired but new ones were hired. Therefore, there is one rule for the Prime Minister and one rule for the rest of us.

It is that kind of policy that is again represented in this bill.

[Translation]

I have in front of me a letter that was published in the daily newspaper La Presse on December 18, 1992. In this letter the president of the Canadian Federation for the Humanities, a professor in the Department of Philosophy at the Université du Québec à Montréal, Dr. Robert Nadeau, said this about the federal government's policy: "While it is certainly legitimate for a responsible government to want to reduce as much as possible the administrative costs of the many programs and organizations that it supports, it is not legitimate to do so in an authoritarian way and without any explanation, as if the measure were self-explanatory and those affected had no say in the matter. It is unacceptable that this bill dissolves the SSHRC and creates something as an appendix to the existing Canada Council by in a sense adding the SSHRC, as well as international cultural promotion programs, on to it. In proceeding this way, Ottawa is clearly giving the impression that it confuses research in the humanities with the business of promoting culture. Furthermore, it clearly suggests that the federal government is not very serious about its commitment to maintain and even develop research in the humanities".

Dr. Nadeau is telling us that the decision is first of all wrong and second, arbitrary. More and more we see governments announcing all kinds of policies by putting them in a so-called economic statement or budget, things that may have nothing to do with the budget, because in this case no one has proven that we were saving or spending a penny more or less. Is it a budget measure? That is certainly debatable, but the point is that because it is in the budget and the budget is considered a matter of confidence in the government, government backbenchers are forced by the way things work to support it even if they are opposed.

That is what the government does to pass such measures. That is why it is arbitrary and that is why Dr. Nadeau is right. We can go further and wonder why the Social Science Federation of Canada and the whole humanities sector were never contacted and consulted by the government. For example, if we agree that this organization should be merged with another one—and I am not saying that they should be merged, but supposing they should—is it not possible that it is being merged with the wrong organization, with one that is unrelated to it, instead of being merged with another organization that might be a more logical choice? The government has not even shown that it is necessary to combine it with another agency, much less that it is being merged with the right one.

[English]

That is just one example of the arbitrariness of this bill. There are other things in the bill that I have no great objection to. From what my colleagues tell me with regard to the Agriculture Products Marketing Board there is not much that is of controversy in terms of what the government wants to do with Bill C-93.

We in my party are definitely opposed to what the government is doing to the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency. The government says it is no longer needed. My distinguished colleague and House leader, the member for Cape Breton—East Richmond, certainly thinks there are still a lot of opportunities that remain unfulfilled in Cape Breton. There is still plenty of need for an organization such as this. Who has been consulted? Were the three members from Cape Breton who are caucus colleagues of mine consulted? Was anyone consulted? The government has not made a case that it has asked anybody. It has just inserted that to show the Reform Party or whoever that it is going to collapse a certain number of government agencies in order to pretend that this will somehow be better and that this government is really tough.

I have already spoken about the Canada Council and the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council and mentioned that my colleagues and I disagree with that particular merger.

As for the independent review commission for the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, we certainly hope it will improve efficiency and the operation of the complaints process. However, we are concerned that this might lead to reduced service.

We have looked at the International Trade and Procurement Tribunal which is also in there. As for the Petroleum Monitoring Agency, for instance, we feel as a caucus that there is still a need for independent advice to the government in this sector. Right now we perhaps do not have some of the concerns we had a few years ago. Today there is no shortage or no crisis.

The good way of planning for a crisis is to organize things when there is no crisis. Then it is not necessary to buy a fire truck when the place is on fire because one does not usually make good purchases or good decisions in that kind of situation.

We certainly have a number of reservations. It is not that we are against everything in the bill but we are against the process that was used, the lack of consultation and the quality of some of the decisions that were taken. In some cases they were just bad. At the very least, in the case of the merger of the two councils the government has not given us one iota of evidence that it will be better, other than the platitudes we heard from the hon. member who spoke earlier this day representing the government. He constructed an argument that basically said the opposite of what he had said only moments before. If that has convinced anyone in this room, it certainly has not convinced me. The parallels he drew in his argument, and I do not want to be rude, frankly did not make sense.

• (1300)

When we speak of the councils, I want to say to the House that this is not something that I, my colleagues or anyone else has concocted. The university academic community is certainly not in agreement at all with it. I have received letter after letter. I have one here from Professor Judith Herz of Concordia University in which she indicates her disappointment with this.

I also have a letter from the Social Science Federation of Canada which was sent to the Minister of Communications in which Professor Louise Quesnel, president of that organization expresses her objections.

[Translation]

I have a press release sent to us by the Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada. In this communiqué, the association tells us that it is unhappy with the government's policy.

[English]

I have another letter, signed by Professor Claude Lajeunesse, president of the Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada, in which he explains to us everything that is wrong with the bill.

Another letter is from the University of Guelph. I should bring this one to the attention of hon. members because it comes from the Department of English at the University of Guelph. One member of this House is very familiar with that university. He is the former Minister of Science who recently has taken retirement from cabinet. He has not retired from the House yet although I understand he is not running again. However he has resigned from cabinet. As I understand it he was president of that university. He certainly knows that community. He knows how the academic community feels. He knows how much it is against this bill.

I want to close by saying that even if the savings of funds were the sole criteria, which they are not, the government has not made a case. It is not the sole criteria. The government has not consulted anyone.

Finally, in terms of the merging of the two councils, it has not tried to convince anyone that what it is proposing is even appropriate, that is if merging was the appropriate decision to start with. The government has not convinced us of that.

Why does the government not remove that section from the bill, along with the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency section? We could then proceed with the rest of it, send it to committee and hopefully assist the government in trying to find an expeditious way to deal with the proposed legislation but not with those two particular sections in it.

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina—Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, I want to pose one question to the spokesperson from the Liberal Party.

I listened to him quite intently and I appreciated many of the remarks he made, particularly regarding bringing SSHRC, the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council and folding that in with the Canada Council as well as that part of external affairs which deals with cultural and academic matters.

I share many of his concerns and concerns expressed by other members of the Liberal Party.

We will be having an election this year and the probability is quite high there will be a change in government. I wonder if the hon. member can give us the assurance that within one year, if his party gets elected as the government, it will trigger an automatic review of this new arrangement. If the review proves that amalgamating these groups was useless to begin with, as we now maintain, will it take the appropriate steps to restore what now exists?

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, that is an excellent question. I have just conferred with my colleague who is the critic in this area and obtained his assurance that would be the policy.

However it goes beyond that. It is not just a matter of whether we can unmake the omelettes this government is making right now. It is a matter of all of us in this House indicating to the government some of its shortcomings and telling it to hold off. This government is in the fifth year of its four-year mandate. What kind of moral authority does it have to govern right now?

Some hon. members: None.

Mr. Boudria: There you go. This government is around 17 per cent or 18 per cent in the polls right now. What kind of moral authority does it have to govern?

Some hon. members: None.

Mr. Boudria: There you go, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. McDermid: Do you govern by polls?

Mr. Boudria: I am asked that question by the organization which gave $1 million worth of polling during the referendum period. I am asked by the minister who was probably at the cabinet table when the decision was made. Do I govern by polls?.

Listen to this. This is absolutely interesting. I think the minister has forgotten about the polling contracts which he and his colleagues gave before he uttered that one liner. He is probably sorry that he even brought it up because he has brought that topic to the forefront again. Maybe we should all forget that the minister uttered those words. Maybe this government should start thinking about the fact it has so little authority to govern that it certainly has no right to take these kinds of decisions.

This business of whether we have a four or five year mandate, the member for Charlevoix said that we have to have elections every four years. I know the member for Charlevoix would always tell us the truth.

[Translation]

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I wanted to ask my colleague a fairly simple question.

[English]

We have been told by one of our colleagues from the government side that very little money will be saved by this particular action. In fact he said modest. I wonder if my colleague has heard any figures or whether the government is prepared to put forward those actual numbers. It would be interesting to investigate.

The second point that was made, and an important one, is that apparently this will increase effectiveness. I have not had any evidence which indicates that except for a few philosophical statements that there are many out there, there will be fewer and therefore it will be better. I wonder if the member would care to comment on that.

A final third point. It is my contention that this government wanted to get closer to its kissing cousins the reformers and tried to respond to the Reform Party agenda. It was not a question of saving money although the government would like Canadians to believe that. It was not a question of increasing government effectiveness although it would like Canadians to believe that. It tried to give the semblance of reform, to pretend that something important was being done, to somehow try to regain the support of many of its former supporters who are now clearly supporting the Reform Party. I wonder if the member would care to comment on this.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, in terms of effectiveness, whether or not money is saved, as I said earlier, is not the sole criteria. It is one of the tests but not the sole one. However the government has not made a case for that. I say to the government across the way: Show me, I am from Glengarry. I would like to know where we are supposed to save money with this scheme. At least then the government would have one leg to stand on. We need more than that to satisfy us and it has not even done that very basic element in any case, that which it alleges is the important one.

• (1310)

The member for St. Boniface is quite right when he talks about the bosom buddies of the government across the way, the Reform Party supporters. The government wanted to pretend to collapse a group of agencies which would get them rave reviews in the media. Of course it did nothing of the sort, the government's popularity has been sinking since then. Having done that, it said it would pretend to save all of this money.

Let me give you an example of the money it was going to save. It is abolishing the Veterans Land Act. This is a section of the bill. The last time the Veterans Land Act board sat was 16 years ago. The only thing that remains is the name. The government is not going to save anything. It is just window dressing. It is just trying to please a particular constituency it is trying to cater to right now. The Tories are going after the "Presto Moaning Deformed Party" vote but it is not going to work. Frankly I do not care whether it does or not because between the two of them there is still not enough there to make a political party worth supporting.

In any case, Canadians know better than that. They know the truth. They know if you do not make a case that you are going to save any money at all, they are not going to believe it. To start with, even if that were the test, as I indicated initially, it would still have to be proven that it is the correct decision as opposed to a bad one.

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina—Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, I rise in opposition to the bill before us today, Bill C–93, in particular that section pertaining to the abolition of the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council and the international cultural programs.

As the House knows, Bill C–93 has various sections in it. It rises from the budget of February of last year and my colleagues from my party will have some things to say on some of the changes. We have no trouble at all with some parts. My comments will be restricted mainly to the part that sees the Canada Council taking over the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council and the international cultural programs.

I have listened to government members try to justify this. They spoke in large generalities of abolishing and therefore came to the conclusion that this would save money. They said by bringing the function of the Canada Council with the functions of SSHRC and the international cultural programs together, this was automatically going to save money. One hon. government member did admit that the money to be saved was quite insignificant.

We really do not know if money is going to be saved. You can come to that type of conclusion by bringing something together so therefore you are going to save money but that is not necessarily the case.

I have heard other hon. government members make these great statements on how they have reduced the Public Service and how much money they have saved. Of course they never mention the increase in the number of consultants they have had to hire. They never mention the increased costs of going through consulting companies. When you balance the two together you come to the conclusion that not much money has been saved.

What happens of course is that ordinary workers in the Public Service have less protection because now many of them are working as employees in private consulting companies quite often doing the same job they were doing before but they do not have the type of protection and the type of social benefits they would formerly have.

The government is still paying the same amount of money but it is now paying that amount of money to the heads of some of the private firms who are now collecting some of that money as profits. It is not really much of a cost saving. What is the cost saving on this measure that is part of Bill C–93?

We have to examine how much money is to be saved in dollars and cents. We must compare the effectiveness of this new organization to the effectiveness of the existing arrangement and then determine the cost.

I am suggesting that what we must do is examine whatever potential savings there might be and examine the effectiveness of the delivery of programs to determine whether any of these possible savings are made at the expense of lower delivery of service to the clientele. Then we can see what the bottom line is and determine whether money will indeed be saved and whether the effectiveness of the programs will be reduced.

One of the things that is really discouraging is the method by which the government undertook to implement these changes. There was no consultation. I understand that even the minister responsible was totally unprepared for this change. It was a change that was thrown in at the very last minute.

I understand that one of the ministers was going to address some of the social scientists. When he heard the budget it was the first time that he was aware that SSHRC was to be abolished. Of course, the minister cancelled his appointment to talk to the social scientists because he did not want to meet with them and have to justify what the government had done. Despite the fact that he was the minister in charge of SSHRC he did not even know about the changes that were coming.

So much for consultation, even within the government. It is no wonder that we have a very inefficient and ineffective government because even among the cabinet level they do not communicate with each other, let alone between departments.

We are also quite unhappy with things in the act itself. We do not accept that SSHRC should be folded into the Canada Council. We are also unhappy with what happens after that. We are not happy at all with the board and the way in which this new organization is to be governed.

We are not happy with the lack of assurance in the bill itself that the money that will go for research for the social sciences and humanities will come out of a research envelope. Verbal assurances have been given to SSHRC that for the next number of years its funding will come from the research envelope. They will not be in competition with the Canada Council for money that will go to culture in this country. However, there is no assurance or backup in the bill itself.

I have spoken to social scientists. They are quite concerned and I do not blame them. This government has said many things. The Prime Minister has said many things. He has made many promises and statements. However when the actual reality comes into play, when we actually see what the government does, it is quite the opposite.

• (1320)

I would not want to go so far in this House as to suggest that the government lies but I would not trust it. I do not blame the members of the social sciences community for not trusting this government when it comes to any verbal commitment as to what the sources of funding would be.

Why is it important to the social sciences that they not be forgotten and confused with the Canada Council? It is not that they have any objection or fights with the Canada Council. There are some similarities, particularly when we deal with the humanities and the Canada Council. That is the reason that originally the Canada Council and the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council were one. A decision was made in 1978 to separate the two after a long time of consultation and discussion within the academic and cultural communities. There were some very valid reasons for that decision.

One of the major reasons, which I hope this government might understand, is that the social sciences and the humanities conduct research into some extremely important elements of our society. That role is different from what the Canada Council does and funds.

We are living in a day and age of very rapid social change. Never in the history of the human race has there been such a rate of change. It is a rate of change that continues to accelerate. Think of the difference between now, in 1993, and 1983 or 1973, only 10, 20 years ago. The social changes and the economic changes have been horrendous, and not just in our North American and Canadian society but on a global level. We know that these changes are going to continue to accelerate.

The question that we have to ask as a society is: Do we continually react to these changes or do we try to anticipate, try to understand, try to predict and try to do things so that we can go through these changes with the least amount of human harm? An intelligent society wants to understand the forces that are changing it. It wants to understand them so that it can take measures that will allow it to survive those changes with the least amount of human hardship and harm, so that it can go through those changes and be better able to profit from the positive side of those changes.

Just in terms of economics the social sciences are involved in research on physical problems, monetary policy, urban development, productivity, economic and strategic planning, managing for global competitiveness, and science and technological innovation policy. They are also doing research on family violence, an aging population, racism, sexism, youth and unemployment. They are doing important research that affects our native people and aboriginal people. It is important research and essential research.

If we are going to go through the end of this century and into the next century and the next millennium we need this research.

I know that the minister in charge of privatization and his colleagues in the Conservative government consider themselves to be tough macho characters. They consider all this social science research stuff to be woolly, soft, marshmallow type stuff. They feel that we really do not need it and that it is a waste of government money. Quite often the research that is done contradicts the government's policies. The government members are tough macho people and they figure that people will be able to toughen things out and toughen out the economic and social changes in our world. I believe many of them secretly believe that all this social science stuff is pinko stuff that is not really needed. I suspect that many government members in their hearts would like to see all of the social sciences and humanities abolished.

An hon. member: That is not true.

Mr. de Jong: I know there are some exceptions and I suspect the hon. member who interjected would be an exception but I am thinking of some of the other Conservative members, particularly the minister in charge of privatization. I become scared when a member like that is in charge of the social sciences and humanities. His concern about the social sciences and humanities could be put on the head of a pin, and maybe even the head of the pin might be a little too big for it.

What this government is doing is not just totally insensitive but it is dumb and stupid. I suspect it is going to be wasteful as well. Now SSHRC is being merged with the Canada Council. That organization is still going to need its own internal bureaucracy to deal with the humanities and the social sciences and to deal with the universities. One would wonder what the savings will be in the end and how many other types of duplication will be needed. For example, when the International Cultural Program is moved out of external affairs and into this new Canada Council this new council will need some ability to deal with our embassies and some people who know what our foreign policy is. It will need people who are in touch with the cultural and academic pursuits in other countries. It will need to duplicate what should already be known within external affairs.

We wonder how much new duplication will be created as the government tries to wipe out possible existing duplications, then we wonder how smart this move is.

Certainly this bill will be examined very closely when it reaches the legislative stage. We hope to be able to hear from the government members and the officials of the Department of Finance their justification for this move. We hope to hear their justification both in terms of the concept and of dollars and cents. I want to see in black and white how much this is really going to save the government. They should be prepared to show us that.

We will also be interested in seeing some amendments to the bill so that if this bill is to proceed it will at least proceed in the best possible form. It is a dumb, stupid, and useless move. I hope that this time next year I will be back here and many of the members sitting opposite will not be back. I hope that we will have a new government which will look at what this present government is doing now in its dying moments. Hopefully this time next year we will see a reversal of the stupidity of the existing government.

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, I was wondering if the member would advise us whether his party only objects to the amalgamation of the Canada Council into a new council, the Canada Council for the Arts and for Research in the Social Sciences and Humanities. Is that his only objection? He did not speak on the other parts of the bill at all. They all seem to be housekeeping measures designed to more effectively, as far as the government is concerned, operate these various agencies and activities of the government. If his only concern is with respect to Part III of the bill why would he not just move this bill forward to committee so that evidence could be heard to fortify some of the things he said? It seems to me that while there may not be huge savings in grants, it certainly would be more efficient to have one group of people responsible for the grants and allocations of funds rather than two. After all, there is an overlap of the kind of thing that is involved. The Canada Council does research in the social science field. Indeed, some of the complaints we as members of Parliament get are often in connection with Canada Council grants of a social science research type. The existing body on the Social Sciences and Research Council does research. It seems to me that to have it all under one head would be an efficient move.

The members of the New Democratic Party are perhaps not trusting of the government, but that is another matter. I was wondering if he had any other objection other than the objection to this one amalgamation set out in part III of the bill.

Mr. de Jong: Mr. Speaker, as I mentioned at the beginning of my remarks, other colleagues will be dealing with other parts of the bill. I understand there is some objection to some aspects and no objection to other aspects of Bill C-93. Some we recognize are just housekeeping measures and some my colleagues disagree with. I do not think they feel very strongly about it, but they will be putting some of their concerns on the record as well.

As I stated at the beginning of my remarks, I was going to focus on that part of the bill that brings in under the Canada Council the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council and the international cultural programs.

I want to answer the other part of the question that was put to me by my friend and colleague from Mississauga and that is all the different organizations that are opposed to this aspect of Bill C-93. We have the Canadian Conference of the Arts, the Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada as well as different groupings of people involved in the social sciences themselves. The point is that the arts community, the humanities and the researchers and people involved in the social sciences are almost overwhelmingly opposed to this move. Yet the government continues to push it through. As well, the government admits it is not going to save much money. It claims it is going to be more efficient and yet all the people involved in the field, the so-called clientele, are telling the government it is not so. It is not going to be more efficient. It is going to be more inefficient. Why is the government proceeding with this part of Bill C-93?

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, Bill C-93 is not at all what the government pretends it is. If it is about saving money, let us see the figures. Put them on the table so that we can examine them. Stop trying to pretend to Canadians that there are going to be millions of dollars that will be saved. Put the figures on the table. I shall be insisting as will other colleagues that that be done.

I just remembered the Auditor General's report. For example, on tax loopholes for foreign affiliates the Auditor General had some statements to make which could have saved millions if not billions of dollars: the implementation of the GST, up to $1.7 million according to that report: 4,000 new people administering that particular tax; untendered contracts, 22 contracts for the prosperity secretariat worth $3.3 million. I could go on and on.

By the fiscal year 2000-01, $1.2 billion will be lost in pension overpayments to ineligible recipients. Those are but a few examples of some of the programs that are not working, some of the over-expenditures, some of the problems that are being experienced by government that are in fact costing Canadian taxpayers not millions but billions of dollars. If the government truly wanted to save money, it could have attacked that.

There are other areas as well it might have addressed. Let me give a few examples. It could have in fact reduced the size of cabinet. It could have reduced the number of parliamentary secretaries. It could have reduced some of the travel and other advantages that we have and there are many others. Talk about saving money.

[Translation]

Let's be serious. I see an hon. member laughing over there. Do not laugh, it is serious. If he wants to save money I gave him some very good examples that could save lots of money.

Mr. Hudon: Look at the list.

Mr. Duhamel: When I touch some sensitive points they start to shout. They begin to speak up because I hit a nerve I will continue.

[English]

As I was saying, if we wanted to save money the Auditor General's report is a good place to start. Look at the size of cabinet and the size of government and do something meaningful there.

They talk about increased efficiency. They want to increase efficiency.

[English]

They have just thought about that, eight years after they have been in government. They said we had better do something because it is starting to fall through the cracks. More than eight years after they came to government they finally woke up. Somebody said: "Hey, we had better do something here to give the impression that we are going to have a more effective government. What is it we could do?" I am sure somebody has said it does not really matter whether or not it does it but it must give the impression.

[Translation]

The impression is what counts. That is what they want, to give the impression that they have cut, that they are suddenly becoming efficient, that now they have seen the light and with this bill government will be more efficient.

[English]

Canadians are not going to be fooled. Unless the government can put specific proposals on the table and demonstrate absolutely clearly there is going to be increased effectiveness, Canadians will not believe the government. They will simply not believe what it says.

I see one of my colleagues. I think he is probably nodding in agreement or if not he is miffed, but it comes out to the same thing. I can conclude the same. He agrees with me that unless Canadians are shown absolutely crystal clear that there will be additional effectiveness, they will not buy this.

Canadians know this government. They know it is a master at smoke and mirrors, of changing attitudes or attempting to do so, creating new perceptions, trying to forge an agenda that will in fact be used to try to persuade Canadians to give it a third mandate. This is part of the plan.

[Translation]

Of course it is part of the plan. Why pretend to save money by exaggerating the amount saved? Why pretend that the government will be more efficient when there is no evidence of it?

[English]

Because there is an election coming, it wants to forge the agenda, try to give the impression through the smoke and mirrors and glitz it can do a fine job for Canadians.

An hon. member: That is right.

Mr. Duhamel: My friend said that is right. I am glad that he agrees with me. I know he was not saying what I was saying was correct. That is what he was agreeing to. Absolutely. I know that. He knows it will not save any real money. He knows it will not increase effectiveness but he knows what it is trying to do.

He was probably at that strategy table trying to determine what it was going to do to persuade Canadians to say yes, it is okay. Canadians are not going to say yes, it is okay. It wants to try to persuade Canadians that something is in fact being done when it is not being done.

• (1340)

Let us look at the bill. A number of colleagues have talked about the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council. It is an important part. I shall stress that part, but at the same time I will say that it deals with a number of other features.

It is called the budget implementation, the Government Organization Act, 1992. That is rather impressive, is it not, Government Organization. It talks about the Agricultural Products Board. Some of my colleagues have addressed that, so I will not go into any detail.

There is the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency, the Canada Council for the Arts and for Research being blended into the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council. It talks about the Canadian Commercial Corporation, Emergency Preparedness Canada, the Independent Review Commission for the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, the Intellectual Property Tribunal, the International Trade and Procurement Tribunal and the Petroleum Monitoring Agency.

Therein lies one of the traps. Canadians have never heard about those things before. As one of my colleagues pointed out, one of them has not been sitting for 16 years. Probably a few others have been dead for some time too.

My colleagues want to abolish something that is already dead. What a functional piece of legislation this is. Therein lies one of the traps that they are trying to set. They come out with these rather impressive titles and Canadians, they hope, will be persuaded that something meaningful is being done. Somehow they hope that they can change those opinion polls around.

Let me deal with perhaps the most significant part of the bill for many, many Canadians. It is the clauses that would wind up the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council and transfer its functions and staff to the Canada Council. That is bothering most Canadians and is one of the aspects of this bill that this government will live to regret.

There is another feature that I think the government has forgotten. It has forgotten that this particular council is a grant-giving body which administers funds for research and scholarship. It was created in 1977 and it has worked well ever since.

The second part troubling Canadians is that the Department of External Affairs has a staff of approximately 25 people working for the International Cultural and Academic Relations Program. It forecasts a budget for this program of $27 million. The Canada Council, which was created in 1957, offers grants and services to artists and art organizations. It has a staff of 248.

The governement is going to put all that together. It has not shown us at all where money will be saved, whether or not there will be jobs lost and I hope that there are not, or whether or not there will be money saved. It has not done anything. It takes these organizations which many people know little about and tries to suggest that something meaningful will be done. All it is, in the final analysis, is the creation of perception.

Let us look at what the academic community has said about these.

[Translation]

I have in front of me a press release dated November 30, 1992, just a few months ago. It says: "Funding of social science research threatened".

[English]

Funding for the social sciences research is threatened. That is what these people think about it.

"Merger legislation threatens eclipse of humanities research". That is what is being said. There is a lot more. Funding for social sciences research is threatened and may not be able to be continued, which is the gist of this argument, at the level or quality that has been so in the past.

I have another communique from the Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada. I will read the headline: "Abolition of the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council is turning back the clock". It goes on to say that this particular association has concerns about this council's programs being taken over by the Canada Council. It makes several important points.

This same organization says that the transfer of the International Academic Relations Program from External Affairs to Canada Council could also be problematic. It goes on to point out that the importance of the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council to Canada's over-all research effort is one of paramount importance. It describes the history of the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council in Canada. I would urge colleagues to read this because it has some excellent notes with which they may not be familiar.

In another communiqué from the Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada it says that the merger of these academic relations and cultural programs is neither necessary nor desirable. It proposes a series of amendments that would shift the emphasis in an appropriate direction.

However I am sure the government has not taken the time to look at this. It does not want to listen to Canadians. We know that because if it had been listening to Canadians it would have put a halt to this. It would have consulted the people of Canada who are those most directly affected.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, you know very well that these people have a better idea of the impact of this bill on their organizations and on what these organizations do for Canadians.

[English]

Here is another communiqué from the Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada with respect to the mini budget.

[Translation]

This mini budget has left a bitter taste with the universities. Why? Because the universities have been betrayed. That is why. They have been betrayed.

Here is another communiqué, this time from the Social Science Federation of Canada: "The government is defying its commitments to fund social sciences". In what way is the government defying its commitments?

[English]

The government, subsequent to or roughly at the same time as part of its strategy, decided to merge those.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, you know that as well as I do.

[English]

It knew there would be a problem because it did not consult, it did not make sense and it had not thought it out. The government said: "Aha". It held out a carrot. "There will be a 4 per cent increase in research and development funding". However, a few months later, after a great announcement about that 4 per cent increase over four years, what did the government do? It reneged on that.

If one can renege on that—supposedly you are in a worse financial position than you thought you were when you made the announcement—then one admits two things. First, one did not do one's financial predictions particularly well. It was not done well at all.

[Translation]

Most people would agree with me that when I promise something publicly and then come back later saying "Well, listen, I did not fully realize the budget constraints, et cetera", that does not look good and that is not right at all. Something comes to mind, which I think would be almost too awful to say.

[English]

The people will not forget that a promise was made and that the promise was not carried out. It would not be so bad if it was the first time but it is not the first time.

I have another communiqué from the Canadian Federation for the Humanities: "A promise is a promise or is it?" I have another communiqué: "Bitter surprises for universities in mini budget".

Let us remember this. It is so critically important. I know that my colleagues will agree with me on this point even if they might disagree or question the others. Our greatest challenges in this country are really the social problems of the nation. In fact they may be the greatest challenges of this planet.

Say one stops to think for a moment to say: "What are the difficulties that this country is experiencing?" One would talk about our poor. There are different statistics but many people would agree that there are almost five million. It depends upon how one defines poverty and I understand that. However the majority of them are women and one million are children.

One would also recognize that there are more than 1.6 million unemployed Canadians in this country today. Most of them want a job and want to work but there are no jobs. This is the latest figure I have been using. I am told it is too low and I am sorry that it is too low, but there are over 2.2 million Canadians who are receiving social assistance. Apparently that is crowding 3 million people. The food banks at one time were using the figure of 2 million people to feed. It is now in excess of that.

Those are the challenges that are facing Canadians and those are the challenges that are facing this government as it enters this new session. The government is now trying to give the impression of doing something by taking some organizations that never meet and suggesting that if it takes them out it is going to save money and it is going to bring greater government effectiveness.

Let me go on to some additional social challenges.

[Translation]

Almost every day we talk about the problems of abuse. Whether it is abuse of the elderly, children, people one is living with, too often of wives, these are challenges for our society. We talk about this abuse because we recognize that it must not be tolerated in this society.

• (1350)

When I talk about the unemployment rate, about people receiving welfare, about men, women and children who will be fed by food banks, about abuse, be it abuse of seniors, women or children, who are the people who could enlighten us and possibly provide solutions?

[English]

Of course, it is the people who are called social scientists, broadly defined, who could bring us some answers to those questions. They are the people who could somehow give us a new sense of direction and possible new solutions so that all of us who are committed to ridding society of those ills could make some progress toward that.

It is important to look at this action on the part of government, which I said was for purely political reasons. One has to understand what has been happening to the total culture of education.

There will be $10 billion less transferred for education from 1986 to 1995 in about a decade. There will be fewer dollars if one adjusts for inflation, and the need out there for training and retraining is increasing.

With respect to research and development, the government made a promise to double its investments and match Japan, U.S., Germany, France and other countries. What has happened? We have slipped even further.

I have not even talked about student debt or the astronomical increases in tuition fees and incidental fees in universities. I could go on but we have to look at the merger in this context. The educational community has once again been attacked without consultation. It made recommendations. It denounced this. It said: "At the very least, stop this. Hold consultations subsequent to having studied the implications of this. Then and only then if one feels it is appropriate should one proceed".

[Translation]

I conclude by asking the government to consider this proposal, to stop proceeding with this bill and consult. When it has consulted and if it firmly believes that it is the best decision for our academic community, our students and other Canadians, it can go ahead, but not without consulting and thinking it over.

[English]

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Finance and Privatization): Mr. Speaker, I must say that the rhetoric of my hon. friend far exceeds his logic.

I was trying to understand the thrust of what he was saying other than in a general and sweeping way suggesting that whatever this government did he was against it.

He says that Canadians have never heard of most of these agencies that are being dissolved. Remember when he said that? Then moments later he said that the government is not listening to Canadians about how they want all these institutions to remain. They have never heard of them, yet they want them.

I suspect that I mixed his metaphors a little bit and that he was really saying that Canadians want to keep the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council. He talks about the assault on the academic community employed in this.

It seems to me that if the grants and fellowships of these agencies, particularly by the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council, were discontinued then I would have to stand in my place and totally agree with him because I think those are very important.

What is significant is that the funding of research and graduate studies takes place in this country. That will continue.

He said in his remarks that the SSHRC was established in 1977. I wonder if he recalls that prior to 1977 those same grants were delivered by, guess what, the Canada Council. The Canada Council has already performed this function. Is that not interesting?

The government that preceded this one believed in the proliferation of government and agencies. This government believes in cost effectiveness, efficiency and keeping up with the times. Even his own leader in a recent speech at the University of Ottawa said that our challenge today is to adapt the role of government to a new world. That is precisely what this government is doing. I assume that is where the Leader of the Opposition got that rather excellent idea. I would say to my hon. friend and put a question to him: "Does he not agree that government must be slim? Does he not agree that government must respond to the needs of the people? Does he not agree that it is appropriate from time to time for government to take a look at its own structure to provide a streamlined presentation of services that better serves the Canadian people than a plethora of agencies—over 400—that exist today? Does he not agree that streamlining is most appropriate and that is the thrust of this legislation and that is supported by the Canadian people?"

Mr. Duhamel: Yes, I do agree the government ought to take a look at streamlining, but it has to have an honourable purpose. This is a dishonourable purpose.

I am shocked. My colleague who calls himself a Progressive Conservative ought to really be standing up in the House today to suggest a change of name to regressive conservatives because that is exactly what this is all about.

If my rhetoric exceeds my logic, since he did not understand my message, I wonder what that says about his intellect, but I will not answer that question. I will simply leave it in suspension.

My colleague should understand something about this country of 27 million Canadians. There is an academic community with students and supporters that understands the implications of what it means to do what this government intends to do to the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council. My colleague should understand that.

Then there are a number of other Canadians, perhaps my colleague does not understand that, who do not have the time to delve into fancy names of organizations that have been around for a while. If the government was intending to save money, if the government was intending to try to introduce effectiveness into government, if the government was being honourable as opposed to dishonourable, if the government was not trying to fool the people of Canada, if this had been thought out, if the people had been consulted, then I would be delighted to support this kind of legislation.

We know that was not the reason. Therefore, my colleague should consider my recommendations. They are not suggestions but recommendations. He should stand in this House and rename his party the regressive conservatives as opposed to the Progressive Conservatives and reconsider the comment he made about rhetoric and logic. Perhaps he can tell me confidentially—I would not want it to be a public statement—what it says about his intellect when he did not understand what I said. It was crystal clear: "You are shafting the Canadian people". That is what I said. Maybe he understands that language better.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise and speak on this bill and particularly to address the future of research in this country. One of the important issues dealt with in this bill is the folding of science, humanities, education and social studies into the Canada Council. This is not a partnership. It truly is merging one existing organization into another.

There is a great deal of concern about that. The Canada Council already has its own act and mandate. One of the major areas of concern is that the social and humanitarian sciences are going to be lost in the shuffle and given less importance at a time when the council has been funding, promoting and causing to be done some extremely important work.

The government talks frequently about the process of change, adapting to change, a new competitive environment and a new global environment. We talk about a future economy based on information and service industries. There is no doubt we are going through a major transformation in society, not only in Canada, but around the world. A lot of that transformation is based on scientific and technological advances.

However, along with the scientific and technological advance in the narrow sense of the physical sciences, another major revolution is taking place in how people live, how we learn and all the social dynamics that keep our societies and human beings functioning.

There is growing appreciation that physical sciences and technology do not develop in a vacuum, that they have significant repercussions for individuals and for society. More and more the need to look beyond the technical improvements we may be making to see the repercussions throughout society is being appreciated and understood.

I will turn to the area of social sciences and humanities.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

COMMUNICATION-QUÉBEC

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, for several months now, the Communication Canada group, through its chief executive officer, has been striving to eliminate an excellent service provided by Communication-Québec for the federal government regarding its programs and services.

The people of Abitibi—Témiscamingue are happy with the services provided by the Communication-Québec personnel who have answered thousands of inquiries since this service was established.

The Government of Canada has been using Communication-Québec's structures and informational support free of charge since 1986.

Quebecers tell us every day how happy they are to have access all in one place to information services from both levels of government. This has been the case since 1986.

The Communication Canada group must consult with the federal members of Parliament from Quebec before eliminating this service provided by Communication-Québec for the Government of Canada.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, every day 1,500 kilograms of 18 persistent toxins enter Lake Ontario waters. These include more than a tonne of lead, 424 kilograms of arsenic, one kilogram of PCBs and several kilograms of pesticides.

These persistent toxins endanger the ecosystem and the health of over 8 million people who live on the shores of Lake Ontario basin and those living downstream along the St. Lawrence River.

With the green plan the government promised to eliminate persistent toxins. Today the government still does not have specific targets and a timetable to reduce toxins entering Lake Ontario.

In the Niagara River there is a 50 per cent reduction target for the 18 persistent toxins by the year 1996, but it is not clear whether it will be achieved.

We urge the government to regulate eight of the still unregulated persistent toxins, to introduce targets and timetables for—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. The member's time has expired.

TRADE BARRIERS

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, the Department of Supply and Services office in Moncton, New Brunswick, has a policy of buying smaller purchases only from New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island and not allowing businesses in Nova Scotia the opportunity to supply the government at this office.

This means that businesses as far away as Edmonston, New Brunswick, 300 or 400 kilometres away, have opportunities to provide this government office with goods and services. This means that businesses on Prince Edward Island, over 200 kilometres away, have access to this business; but businesses in Nova Scotia only 50 kilometres away are restricted by this federal government interprovincial trade barrier.

Provincial and federal governments in Atlantic Canada are urging all parties to remove trade barriers. This position was a key part of the Charlottetown accord and is now an important recommendation outlined in the prosperity initiative. As well, the Council of Maritime Premiers has identified the removal of interprovincial trade barriers as one of its most important goals.

Considering these federal and provincial government policies, I urge the Minister of Supply and Services to drop this trade barrier and open federal purchases in Moncton to Nova Scotia businesses, some of which are only 50 kilometres away.

INNU

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Nunatsiaq): Mr. Speaker, the government must deal immediately with the tragic mass suicide attempts of the young Innu children in Davis Inlet, Labrador.

The pain and grief suffered by this community have been ignored for too long. Government promises of facilities and services made 26 years ago remain unfulfilled. The Innu request to be moved to the mainland has not been acted upon and their land claim is not settled.

Too many have died. Too many are trying to die.

The government must act urgently in consultation with the Innu leadership to relocate the people to their chosen site on the mainland and to provide full community infrastructure. Health, treatment and healing services of the kinds requested by the Innu must also be provided.

I urge the government to give real meaning to the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child and to 1993 as the International Year of the World's Indigenous Peoples by acting to give hope to the despairing children and families of Davis Inlet.

TRANSPORTATION

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, one of the important instruments for economic development in the Atlantic region has historically been the federal transportation policy. Both highways and railways have long been critical considerations, particularly so for freight traffic purposes.

In the situation pertaining to freight which exists today, however, there is a serious and costly aberration: Increasing volumes go by truck on highways which are already overloaded beyond safe use. Meanwhile rail freight is diminishing and main rail lines are being considered for abandonment.

It is also significant to remember that highways are built and maintained at public expense, while rail infrastructure has generally been the result of corporate investment. Surely there is potential to balance freight traffic more efficiently over both systems. For example, can the long distance heavy trucking burden on our highways not be relieved by such concepts as piggyback services over corridor rail lines? Are there not economic incentives or disincentives that can be designed to redirect freight traffic from the roads to the rails?

These are important questions for Atlantic transportation policy, and in view of current circumstances they deserve serious consideration now.

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT WEEK

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, today marks the beginning of International Development Week in Canada. International Development Week provides Parliament, the government and Canadians with an opportunity to reflect on Canada's long-standing commitment to Third World development.

Development week is a time for all of us to congratulate development NGOs and their thousands of volunteers for their vital and tireless efforts. Non-governmental organizations work as partners with local groups in developing countries. Together they work to improve basic health care, education and training, farming techniques, small business enterprise, and a host of similar projects. NGOs are experienced, efficient and accountable.

The government has indicated that it intends to cut aid to Third World countries in favour of eastern Europe. We agree that eastern Europe needs help, but such help should not come instead of or at the expense of Third World countries or the funding of NGO work in those countries.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Mrs. Gabrielle Bertrand (Brome—Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, I would like to clarify several misconceptions going around in the media about the proposed changes to unemployment insurance. There were references to a confrontation between the minister and the Quebec caucus, even a revolt. Such allegations are unfounded.

Of course it is only normal that we question the minister on behalf of our constituents, which we did and continue to do in a spirit of close collaboration and mutual understanding.

We are all in agreement on the principle of the measures announced by the Minister of Finance in his economic statement of December 2, 1992 and reports are to the effect that the vast majority of Canadians and Quebecers are also in agreement.

However, my colleagues and I want to make sure that these measures will not be unfairly implemented. The members on this side of the House are faithful to the same basic principles of fairness, economy and, above all, justice.

VIOLENCE

Mr. David Berger (Saint-Henri—Westmount): Mr. Speaker, during the last two months Montrealers have been victims of right wing violence and vandalism.

In December a church used by Haitian Quebecers and a mosque were set on fire, and youths attacked and killed a man they believed to be gay. On January 2 seven synagogues were desecrated with swastikas and hate slogans. On January 27 anti-Semitic symbols were spray-painted on a synagogue, a community centre, four cars and two homes. Just yesterday two school buses were spray-painted with anti-Jewish slogans and swastikas.

There is troubling evidence that these are not isolated incidents. New groups are emerging in Canada. Students are being recruited in our schools and modern technologies are being used to propagate hatred. For these reasons B'Nai Brith has called for a royal commission on racism.

I urge the Minister of Justice to meet with B'Nai Brith, to review its recommendations, and to take action to demonstrate that racism will not be tolerated in Canada.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Ms. Barbara Greene (Don Valley North): Mr. Speaker, citizens in my riding and across Canada are deeply horrified at the Nazi-like atrocities occurring in Bosnia-Hercegovina and other parts of the former Yugoslavia. The United Nations is condoning ethnic cleansing by its proposals which allow territory seized by force to be retained.

I urge the Secretary of State for External Affairs to demand that the United Nations impose a peace plan which respects the territory of Bosnia-Hercegovina and the property rights of former residents, and which imposes a war crimes tribunal that will punish these barbaric acts.

The world should not stand by and watch.

GROUNDFISHERY

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, the government's cancelling of the inactive groundfish licensing is a reversal of a 10-year old policy known as the bona fide licensing policy.

This licensing policy gave priority to full-time fishermen to hold multiple licences and retain them even if they were not used. This multiple licensing policy allowed fishermen to play a direct role in resource conservation.

The fact that fishermen have not used these licences for two years means that they have helped to conserve the stocks. Yet the administration in Ottawa has chosen to penalize them.

I believe that the Maritime Fishermen's Union, the Prince Edward Island Fishermen's Association and the Eastern Fishermen's Federation are correct in challenging the minister and his groundfish management plan for 1993.

The onus of proof should be on the Government of Canada, not on inshore fishermen, as to whether the new policy of eliminating licences will conserve stocks. The Government of Canada must be condemned for the abrupt and arbitrary fashion in which the long-standing policy was reversed thereby hurting inshore fishermen.

JUSTICE

Mr. Felix Holtmann (Portage—Interlake): Mr. Speaker, citizens living in a village within my constituency are gathering today in a place they would much rather not be. The people of St. Eustache, Manitoba, are burying their dead.

Maurice and Sherri-Lee Paul were stalked and murdered last week while in the confines of their own home. St. Eustache is a quiet small village. Maurice and Sherri-Lee were active, community minded parents of three children. They were well known and liked in St. Eustache. Like so many others they did not deserve to die.

It is time we put some teeth in the laws of this land. The killer of Sherri-Lee and Maurice had a restraining order prohibiting contact with the family. The Pauls sought refuge in the law, in the system. The system let them down.

This House must enact legislation now so that other communities will not be put through what St. Eustache is suffering today.

TRADE

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister said in 1987:

> Our highest priority is to have a trade agreement that ends the threat to Canadian industry from U.S. protectionists who harass and restrict our exports through the misuse of trade remedy laws.

The Prime Minister failed in achieving this highest priority and trade harassment continues in steel, pork and softwood lumber.

With the failure of free trade and the rejection of a sectoral trade agreement by the United States, where does that leave Canadian steelworkers whose work force has been decimated with 12,000 lay-offs in four years?

The trade minister is now suggesting, believe it or not, a blue ribbon commission to study the industry and make recommendations to both governments, but as of this morning there has been no formal proposal to the U.S. government.

As to the dispute panel and its decisions, it would appear that if the U.S.A. wins a ruling it is commonplace and quite acceptable, whereas if Canada wins there has been an extraordinary mistake and the ruling is challenged.

May I suggest to the Prime Minister that the steel trade be upper—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please.

CAPE ASPY

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, this past weekend the town of Lunenburg, Nova Scotia, was struck with yet another sea disaster with the loss of the Cape Aspy, some 67 miles off Cape Sable Island. Although we are grateful that 11 crew members survived, Captain Albert Eisner and 4 others perished.

I wish to commend the efforts of the crews of the vessels and aircraft that came to the rescue, together with those involved in the search and rescue effort.

On the best of summer days the North Atlantic can be a killer. During a winter storm with high seas and ice build-up it is positively terrifying. Any way we cut it, fishing is a tough and at times perilous way to make a living.

I wish to pay tribute to the men and families who generation after generation have prosecuted Canada's oldest industry. I am sure all members join with me in expressing our sympathy to the families and friends of the men lost at sea this weekend.

GENERAL ELECTION

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, the Conservative government is now clinging desperately to power, afraid to give the public the opportunity to throw them from office.

In 1984 a colleague of hon. members opposite made the following speech: "After four years Canadians are entitled to have their say about the government. After four years Canada is entitled to a general election. For all practical purposes the government's term has come to an end. Only political cowardice or contempt for the democratic process could explain why after four years in power the government refuses to announce a general election. It has to if it has any respect for democracy".

Those words came from none other than Senator Lowell Murray, the Prime Minister's confidant and government leader in the other place. The Prime Minister should heed the advice of his friend given so freely and forcefully in 1984.

I hope all hon. members opposite, unless of course they have no respect for democracy, will convey their feelings to their leader and convince him to go to the people now. Goodness knows the people are waiting.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE PRIME MINISTER

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the right hon. Prime Minister. The Prime Minister might feel that he is not obliged to give a straight answer to his caucus, to his cabinet colleagues or to the press, but he has an obligation to tell the truth to the Canadian people and clear the air. We would like to have a straight answer. Is the Prime Minister quitting? Yes or no.

Mr. Speaker: I have some difficulty finding that question in order. Perhaps the hon. Leader of the Opposition might try to put his question in another way.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I do not know why the Prime Minister is refusing to reply to this question.

Mr. Speaker: I probably should point out that I did not agree the question was in order.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, it is a very serious question because ministers are campaigning instead of working and the bureaucrats do not know where they are going. I would like to know if there will be a change in the role of the Prime Minister in the next few weeks?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, given the fact that my hon. friend has been saying for weeks that he could hardly wait to get back to the House to lay out his program for job creation and social advancement in Canada, I find it somewhat interesting he would waste questions. He indicated that he could hardly wait to get to the House to ask questions and advance his alternatives on GST, free trade and all those other matters.

Inasmuch as he is asking this question and he persists in it, perhaps I could just tell him this. In the 10 years as leader of my party, I had the privilege of doing pretty well against a Liberal leader in 1984. Then in 1988 we did pretty well again. With a leader like this, my expectation is that the triple crown is just around the corner.

TRADE

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, it is very easy. If we really want the country to feel good then do not chicken out. Call the election right away. Again the government has proposed we should have a free trade agreement with the United States.

In spite of the free trade agreement this government has not been able to convince the American administration to establish dumping and tariff rules that will work. So last week the United States treated Canada exactly the same way it treats any other country.

• (1420)

Will the Prime Minister or the minister explain to the nation why the Americans do not want to respect the so-called free trade agreement with Canada?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have to conclude that my hon. friend is suggesting we ought not to have a free trade agreement with the United States in which case we would not have available to us the appeal procedure to a binational—

An hon. member: What a joke.

Mr. Mulroney: My hon. friends say what a joke. There have been eight such instances under the free trade agreement and we have won eight out of eight. That is not a joke. That is a reality.

Canada has increased its exports to the United States in steel. Steel exports are up by 41 per cent. Even though we are going through difficult times, of the 19 countries hit by this tariff Canada is the only one capable of appealing to a binational panel composed of an equal number of Canadians and Americans. We have won those cases in the past and we are going to win again. If the Leader of the Opposition had his way there would be no such panel and Canadians would be the losers.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, let the Prime Minister explain that to the workers at Sidbec in Quebec and the workers in Sault Ste Marie and Hamilton, hundreds of whom are losing their jobs each month.

Why does the Prime Minister not admit that they made a mistake by failing to negotiate subsidy rules that would be binding on both countries? That is the problem we have today. The Americans apply their own laws, but we should have rules that are binding on both countries.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition will have to make up his mind. Does he or does he not support the free trade agreement? Does he or does he not support the GST? Does he or does he not support this government's policies?

As far as free trade is concerned, I may point out that compared with 1988—before the free trade agreement came into force—our annual exports of goods to the United States have increased by $17 billion. In November the value of our exports of machinery and equipment rose 24 per cent over the previous year. The value of our exports of consumer goods has increased 24.8 per cent and, listen to this, the value of exports of automobile products increased 11.4 per cent over the previous year.

The free trade agreement is a great success and without it Canada would now be at a distinct disadvantage. At a time when every single country in the world would like to have this kind of agreement with the United States, we have one.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, the fact is that during the three years since this so-called free trade agreement came along, the Canadian steel industry has lost $1 billion in investment. In my own riding and the Hamilton area alone more than 10,000 workers are unemployed.

How can the Prime Minister praise the benefits of this agreement, when last week's steel decision was a travesty of the spirit of free trade?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member said that problems in the steel industry are all the result of problems with the free trade agreement with the United States. There are many problems throughout the world in this industry. The problems experienced by the Canadian industry with its cost reduction of $100 per tonne are not due to the free trade agreement. The problem lies with the industry in Canada. It is both a management and a labour problem.

That is the problem we have to deal with and my department has already started discussions with the unions and management. It is not a problem with the free trade agreement.

[English]

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, that answer is an absolute disgrace for the minister.

When he suggested there is not a problem with free trade, can he explain why last week despite his claims five years ago that the free trade agreement was going to be great for steel the Americans slapped unfair tariffs against Stelco and Algoma and other Canadian companies? That is not a problem of Canadian management. It is not a problem of Canadian workers. It is a problem of the failure of this government to define what constitutes an unfair subsidy.

Why is the minister blaming Canadian workers and the Canadian steel industry for his own failures and the failure of his government in the free trade negotiations?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, what is a disgrace is the way that my hon. friend twists the facts and says that the problem is with the free trade agreement with the United States. She knows full well that this is a world-wide problem.

The Canadian industry had not been affected prior to last week by the anti-dumping duties by the Americans. For her to suggest that the problems the industry has suffered over the last three years are the result of the free trade agreement is a total distortion of the facts.

I did say there was a margin of cost advantage between the Canadian and U.S. industry of $100 a tonne 10 years ago. That has dissipated, not by the free trade agreement but by problems within the industry, some of which can be laid at the doorstep of the companies themselves. That is the problem we are trying to address now.

EMPLOYMENT

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, while the Leader of the Opposition and the Prime Minister wish to debate the employment of one person, I would like to talk about the unemployment of millions in this country.

When the Prime Minister was first elected and was responding to results of the Liberal recession he said: "Unemployment is morally offensive and there is a moral imperative to bring unemployment down".

Since this House rose in December we have seen 400 high-tech jobs lost in Ottawa, 1,450 jobs lost in Oshawa, 10,000 in Canadian railways, 1,200 at Woodward stores, and so on.

We hear that things are improving, but we have to ask one question and one question only. Where are the jobs? How can the Prime Minister justify his policies which have led to what he has said is morally wrong and that is higher unemployment in this country?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend asks where the jobs are.

She indeed raises a serious matter, unlike the Leader of the Opposition. The matter of Canadian employment is a high priority. Canadian unemployment is unfortunately too high.

There has been employment growth in seven of the last eight months with 57,000 new jobs created in December alone. This was the most—

An hon. member: Where?

Mr. Mulroney: Where? In Canada. Across Canada there were 57,000 new jobs. My hon. friend should be encouraged as well by the fact that I take the time to answer seriously because it is an important question.

Inflation is down and was annualized at its lowest rate in 30 years. Interest rates in 1992 were annualized at their lowest in 20 years in Canada. The Conference Board indicated this morning that Canada will lead the G-7 countries in economic growth this year. This combination will allow us to lower the unemployment rate in a durable and ongoing way, not with fly-by-night job creation projects, but in an important, thoughtful and durable way.

[Translation]

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, the problem is that this government is not launching an attack on unemployment but on the unemployed. The proposed changes to the unemployment insurance system are so abusive and so cruel, especially for women, non-union workers and people who work under hazardous conditions, that the government does not even have the support of all its members.

Will the Prime Minister withdraw his policy on changes to the unemployment insurance system?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we are of course prepared to listen to what all members of this House, including the Leader of the New Democratic Party have to say about any bill.

With respect to unemployment insurance, if she has any suggestions for saving the $600 million we need to reduce the deficit while being fair to workers, I would be delighted to hear them.

However, we are talking about a proposal which—

An hon. member: It's a cruel measure.

Mr. Mulroney: The member of the New Democratic Party says it is cruel. In France, the socialist government went ahead with a measure that is practically identical. It cannot be all that cruel in the eyes of international socialism. Of course we will listen carefully to any interesting ideas coming from the opposition.

[English]

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, we have a very simple suggestion. The government should attack unemployment and not the unemployed. The changes it proposes attack the unemployed.

Given the lay-offs we have seen just since December 12 when this House rose, the proposed lay-offs in the railway industry, the devastation across this country in every sector, the large farm rally we saw in Saskatchewan where people were protesting the devastation of rural communities and farms in this country, every policy the government has brought forward has been a failure.

I say to the Prime Minister: Do not proceed with changes to UI, do not proceed with the Canada–U.S.–Mexico trade deal, do not bring in another budget, do not do anything except call a federal election. Will the Prime Minister do that?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I considered calling an election, but out of affection for the leader of the NDP I did not.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

An hon. member: A kinder, gentler Brian Mulroney.

Mr. Mulroney: I indicated to my hon. friend that employment rose by 57,000 in December. Employment has risen in seven of the last eight months, a net gain of 134,000 jobs in Canada. Full–time employment increased for a fourth consecutive month, recording a gain of 35,000. Merchandise exports are up. Unit costs are down 5.2 per cent. Productivity is up by 2.6 per cent and exports are climbing dramatically. That means jobs at home.

I must say this. My hon. friend says cancel the free trade agreement, cancel the GST, cancel our deficit reduction plans, cancel everything. I may disagree with that. I disagree with every single policy she puts forward, but at least she has policies, which is infinitely more than we can say about this bunch.

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (York North): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister of employment. His proposed amendments to UI are nothing more than a failed attempt by the minister and his government to distract Parliament and Canadians from the real issues.

The problem is unemployment, not the unemployed. The problem is harassment and arbitrary management, not laziness. The problem is lay–offs and termination, not voluntary quits. Canadians are hard working people. They want to work.

When will this government stop attacking the victims of its economic mismanagement and provide immediate relief and opportunity?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows the December statement was very broad. It encompassed the fiscal deficit and outlined plans to contain it because of the dramatic decline in revenues.

In the course of containing that slippage, we also provided expenditures toward investing in people, in infrastructure, in training and skills upgrading and particularly in the field of small business. I am encouraged by the response of small business and by the comments of the president of the Canadian Federation of Independent Business who indicated that the December statement was clearly a win–win situation for small business.

The hon. member knows that 80 per cent of new jobs in Canada are created by the small business sector. We believe that the initiatives prescribed in the December statement will go a long way in assisting in the creation of jobs in the small business sector.

I remind the hon. member that the manufacturing sector has grown by 3.5 per cent in the first 11 months of last year thanks to our policies.

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (York North): Mr. Speaker, thanks to your policies we have 1.6 million Canadians unemployed and 2.2 million Canadians on welfare. The minister is going to stay the course which is absolutely unacceptable.

Canadians need a sound economic plan. Instead of attacking the unemployed, will he attack unemployment by immediately establishing a national apprenticeship training program and a national youth service program to give our young people the skills and opportunities required to get them working again?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I know the hon. member is making a pitch for the re–establishment of Katimavik which was not a very successful program.

If the hon. member wants to use statistics, I will certainly use statistics. Total employment in Canada today is 12.24 million and there are 1.8 million who are self–employed. That means there has been an increase in employment of 12 per cent since we have been in office.

Employment has grown, the labour force has grown and continues to grow. The participation rate is higher than that in most G–7 countries. As the labour force grows, job creation becomes that much more of a challenge. The hon. member would be the first to agree, I am sure, that we are going through a period of adjustment and restructuring in order to meet the challenges of a newly emerging economy.

The economic statement I outlined in December speaks to that. I ask the hon. member to re-read it. I am sure he will find there are positive measures in it that will bolster growth and create jobs for the future.

[Translation]

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. According to the Conseil régional intersyndical de Montréal, the changes in the unemployment insurance program proposed by the government are like a sledge-hammer being used to crack a nut. It is overkill. How can the Prime Minister justify this excessive and inordinate attack on the Canadian unemployed? Why is it always the unemployed and the needy who are penalized by the administrative incompetence of this government?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we would be delighted if the hon. member would make some concrete suggestions.

Does he think it is unfair and morally indefensible for a government, especially a government that has fiscal problems, like all governments in this country, to decide that if a worker leaves his job voluntarily, without provocation, he should be deprived of the chance to receive unemployment insurance benefits that are paid for by all other workers in Canada?

All legitimate cases are covered: sexual harassment, and so forth. All that is covered by unemployment insurance, as it should be. The fundamental question is this: Does he think it is morally indefensible, in the circumstances, for a government or a Parliament to vote in favour of this kind of legislation? I would like to hear what he has to say about this, as well as any alternatives he has to suggest for streamlining our unemployment insurance system in this country.

• (1440)

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, I am very glad to hear the Prime Minister. If anyone in this government knows the construction industry in Quebec, he should, since he was on the Cliche commission and knows very well that Quebec is the only place in the country where the construction industry is governed by a decree. He is very well aware of the problems. Now I will ask him a very specific question.

With these new changes to unemployment insurance, what happens when an employee working at James Bay has to quit his job because he must go home to deal with family problems? Does the Prime Minister not think that these new measures will penalize the worker, who will not be entitled to unemployment insurance benefits if the employer says he quit his job voluntarily?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it is covered by just cause in section 28.

Now as for sexual harassment—

Some hon. members: Answer.

Mr. Mulroney: I am answering a question, and the Liberals will not even let me finish my answer. I gave the right answer because it agrees with the facts and reality. But you see, the opposition party did not answer my question. Do they find it morally unacceptable for a government to deprive an employee of unemployment insurance benefits if that person quits his or her job voluntarily, without provocation, for no reason? That is a basic question.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

I am sure the Prime Minister is already aware of the fact that the 13,000 people who attended the farm rally in Saskatoon last Tuesday represented the biggest outpouring of support for the farm community in prairie history.

I would also like to remind the Prime Minister that the projected net income for Saskatchewan farmers next year is $4,000, which is less than they would receive on welfare. Many of them are in the hopeless situation of not having enough money to put in next year's crop.

Since the Prime Minister was unable to attend the rally in person, I would like to ask him to tell us today what words of support and encouragement he is prepared to give the farm families of Saskatchewan.

Hon. Charles Mayer (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, I attended that meeting and we had a chance to visit at its end. I will say the same thing to the hon. member that I said to him in Saskatoon, we know these are difficult times and we think we understand how difficult it is. At the same time the federal government is providing record amounts of support to producers, not only in Saskatchewan but elsewhere, that have been affected.

If you add up all of the support the federal government has provided over the last six or seven years it has amounted to almost $21,000 per farm in Saskatchewan, which is well above the national average.

We also worked out an agreement a week ago with the province of Saskatchewan to see an additional $170 million go into that province in this calendar year. We have a proposal on the table with Saskatchewan to see an additional $63 million go into that province if we can cost share with the province.

While we recognize the problem and have tried to deal with it, we also know that no matter how much money any government provides, it is not the real answer. The real answer is to get better prices for our product when we sell internationally and the government is very committed to that.

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister refused to come to the rally last Tuesday in Saskatoon. He is refusing to answer to the people of Saskatchewan right now.

I want to remind the Prime Minister that last fall he told Premier Romanow and all the people of Saskatchewan that once the results of the harvest were in he would look at providing help if needed. Those 13,000 people last week provided an answer and revealed just how bad things are.

Will the Prime Minister tell the farmers of Saskatchewan and all Canadians exactly how he plans to fulfil the commitment he made to them last fall? The crisis farmers are facing extends far beyond Saskatchewan's borders. If the federal government refuses to take its responsibility seriously, thousands of farmers from across this country will be joining the ranks of the unemployed.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend is quite wrong. I did not refuse to attend anything. I had the opportunity to delegate the Minister of Agriculture who himself is a prairie farmer and who is committed perhaps as least as much if not more than any member of this House to the well-being of the family farm.

This government brought in—the NDP is asking the question Mr. Speaker. Now they apparently do not want to hear the answer.

This government brought in the GRIP program. This government brought in the NISA program. Both programs are greatly admired by Saskatchewan farmers. The government brought in a program of $170 million, announced by the Minister of Agriculture a few days ago. He just referred to another $65 million that the Government of Canada is working on with respect to farmers.

I would tell my hon. friend this. This government increased aid to agriculture, including western agriculture, over the eight year period by 650 per cent. It has provided more aid to agriculture than any government in the history of Canada and we are working with farmers to do more.

EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, 1.6 million Canadians are out of work. Given this and given our very limited financial resources, I would like to ask the minister of defence why this government is spending $4.3 billion on helicopters instead of programs that would get Canadians back to work right now. Where are this government's priorities?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, some years ago the party of which the hon. member is now a member of Parliament had a defence policy that called for the building and the deployment of frigates by the Canadian navy.

The purchase of the EH-101 helicopters is an essential part of that program because to deploy those frigates without helicopters is like building aircraft carriers without airplanes.

What I would like to know from the hon. member is whether the Liberal Party has a defence policy or if it has abandoned the policy that it initiated when it was government and which was carried on by this party when it became government to deploy the properly equipped frigates with the helicopters which are their essential eyes and ears.

I would point out that as a result of the very good industrial benefits negotiated by this government in the course of developing this particular defence procurement, there is very significant employment for Canadians in fulfilling this important defence priority. It will have long term industrial benefits for Canada.

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, we do have priorities such as the 1.6 million Canadians who do not have jobs today.

This is why I want to ask again: Why does this minister have funds to enter into partnerships with foreign governments when it does not have the funds to enter into programs to renew our municipalities and reconstruct our devastated manufacturing sector?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member and his party are very quick to stand up in this House and urge the Government of Canada to participate in international operations for peacekeeping and peacemaking. They appear to want to have our men and women in the Canadian Armed Forces fulfil that obligation without being properly equipped.

I would suggest that the 45,000 person-years of employment that result from this contract are not insignificant. The bottom line of this is the well-being and safety of Canadians in terms of the search and rescue capabilities of these helicopters and in terms of their ability to protect the people who serve in the Canadian Armed Forces.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, the last minister of defence to stand in this House and defend with such enthusiasm an absolutely essential defence priority was the minister of communications who in 1987 announced the $10 billion nuclear submarine program.

Of course that was followed quickly by the Prime Minister who announced the $l billion Polar 8 ice-breaker, followed again by the program for a northern terrain vehicle, nearly $1 billion, announced in Alberta just before the last election. All three have vanished into thin air.

I say with great respect to the Minister of Finance, cut out the bluster and simply tell 1.6 million unemployed Canadians why they must stay grounded while this minister builds a Cadillac helicopter fleet.

• (1450)

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs): Perhaps the hon. member could explain to this House why his party thinks it is appropriate to send Canadian men and women aloft in 30-year old aircraft.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, this party does not think it appropriate to send men and women in any field of endeavour without appropriate equipment, but we think it inappropriate to purchase a Cadillac system at a time when the Prime Minister says the deficit is so high he cannot put $1 into job creation.

I want to ask this Minister of National Defence and this government to recognize that the cold war in 1993 is being fought on the streets of Canada by Canada's unemployed and will it get its priorities straight once and for all in advance of an election?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, perhaps that hon. member will explain to the fishermen of Newfoundland who may have their lives saved by helicopters that are able to stay airborne for five hours instead of two hours, that are able to fly in weather conditions we now do not have the capability to fly in, and perhaps he will tell the families of the people who are saved by those helicopters when they perform their search and rescue functions that he regrets that we had a Cadillac helicopter to save their lives.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

Mr. Bill Kempling (Burlington): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Defence and Veterans Affairs.

On the weekend a report was released in Britain that is critical of the Canadian forces who served in Hong Kong in World War II. They were men of the Royal Rifles of Canada and the Winnipeg Grenadiers and a contingent of Canadian Army nurses. I have been to Hong Kong and viewed the battleground with the survivors of that conflict. I have visited the cemeteries and read the headstones of the young men and women who gave their lives. None of the headstones read coward or drunkard or any of the derogatory comments that appear in the report.

Would the minister care to comment on this secret report attributed to the late Major General Maltby?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I know that in responding to this question I speak not just for the government but for all members of this House.

I have seen the responses of a number of distinguished Canadian historians to the comments of Major General Maltby and I think all agree that there is no historical basis for his comments.

I do not think it is necessary to speculate on why he made those comments, but simply to remind all Canadians, as all members of this House are aware, that the battle of Hong Kong was a terrible one, that there were grievous losses and in fact the survivors of that battle are among the most important clients of the Department of Veterans Affairs and receive the most comprehensive health benefits and that there was in that terrible battle one Victoria Cross awarded and that Victoria Cross was awarded to Major John Osborn of the Winnipeg Grenadiers.

EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Cid Samson (Timmins—Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

Attack, attack, attack. I wonder if this government does not have anything better to do than to attack the unemployed in this country.

I would like to know from the minister just how reducing the benefits from 60 per cent to 57 per cent will help the unemployed in this country. It does not leave them enough money to take a bus to go look for jobs that do not even exist.

When is this government going to stop attacking the unemployed, do something realistic and create some jobs for these people? They are getting sick and tired of this nonsense.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows what the reduction from 60 per cent to 57 per cent effectively does. It freezes the UI benefits. Those who are currently receiving UI at current levels will continue. That is grandfathered.

The hon. member knows that because of the maximum insurable earnings adjusted upward there would in effect be an increase of 3 per cent to 4 per cent. At a time when many employees across the country are having their salaries frozen and indeed having their salaries reduced, it was certainly appropriate to take this initiative.

The alternative is to increase UI premiums, which is another form of tax upon the working men and women of this country, the small businesses and all the employers of this country. It is a time when everyone has to tighten up to meet the difficult deficit challenges that we face. I hoped the hon. member would understand it in that light.

RAIL INDUSTRY

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. It has to do with a recommendation by a group of consultants hired by the National Transportation Review Commission that would lead to further unemployment in this country in the tens of thousands. That has to do with the recommendation that 23,000 jobs be cut from Canada's rail industry.

I want to ask the Minister of Transport when this government will realize that the answer to what is wrong with the transportation system is not in getting rid of more and more jobs in that very industry, but in admitting that deregulation and free trade are killing the transportation industry in this country and setting about re-regulating the transportation industry.

If the minister is not willing to do that, will he agree, because he has that report now, to release it and to convene a meeting of all the stakeholders in our transportation industry, not just the companies, but unions and communities and everyone else concerned, so that we can finally do what is right by Canada's transportation industry.

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member wants to quote some excerpts from that report he should also refer to the contents of that report which say that deregulation has been of great benefit to all stakeholders in the transportation industry in Canada, especially the clients and the shippers.

The report he is referring to is one of the reports requested by the National Transportation Review Committee. It is part of the report. We will table our response to this report as soon as we have had a chance to go through this report that was tabled last Friday.

TRADE

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Supply and Services.

The federal and provincial governments in the maritimes are working really hard to eliminate interprovincial trade barriers but the Department of Supply and Services in Moncton has its own little interprovincial trade barrier. The Moncton office will go west 300 or 400 kilometres to buy from businesses, they will go north to P.E.I. to buy from businesses, but they will not go 50 kilometres east into Nova Scotia to buy from Nova Scotia businesses.

Will the minister open this trade barrier up to Nova Scotia businesses and do the right thing?

Hon. Paul Dick (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question. The answer does not change a great deal from the letter I sent to him on December 29. As a result of his representations, we are taking a look to see if we can change the delineation between the New Brunswick region and the Nova Scotia region.

YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): My question is to the Minister of Justice. Canadians are becoming increasingly alarmed about the rising incidence of crime and violence in their communities. In particular, violent youth crime has more than doubled in the past five years.

The government promised changes to the Young Offenders Act by the fall. The fall has come and gone and we still do not have these changes. Canadians are becoming alarmed.

Why is the government refusing to make these much needed changes to the Young Offenders Act?

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend knows that we made some changes in May with Bill C-12 addressing some issues that Canadians were concerned with.

My hon. colleague, the Solicitor General, and myself are contemplating other amendments to this legislation and we will talk with Canadians in the weeks to come as well. We have a symposium, and I think my hon. friend will be there, in Toronto with all stakeholders—police officers, all groups and provinces—to get together to decide what is best to ensure that people will feel more secure in this country.

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, Bill C-12 was passed over a year and a half ago. Even before it was passed his predecessor said that more changes were needed to the Young Offenders Act. We still do not have those changes.

Does this government need a symposium to tell it that the Young Offenders Act is flawed? Does the government need a three-day symposium to tell it what to do? Is this government so out of control on the question of law and order that it cannot make up its own mind, or is it just stalling?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Justice, Attorney General of Canada and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, I must remind my colleague that the Young Offenders Act was passed in April 1984. I think that his party was in power then, but our government has already brought in a first round of changes.

• (1500)

I told the hon. member that I was very open and that we would work together. My colleague must know that responsibility for law enforcement in Canada is shared with the provinces and that it would be inappropriate for us to go ahead with reform on our own. I think we must bring everyone together in order to find the best possible approaches.

I already said that my predecessor had already spoken about our intention to go ahead and we will do that.

MANPOWER

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

The government seems to have adopted the policy of doing the opposite of everything Quebec wants, be they business executives, workers, the Liberal Government of Quebec—its ally—or the Official Opposition of Quebec. This is especially true of the federal government's refusal to withdraw from the manpower field, a field that we know is essential for economic recovery.

I therefore ask the government and the Prime Minister why they stubbornly insist on maintaining the present imbroglio, which is paralyzing the efforts of all governments, and why they refuse to withdraw from a field where efficiency requires that there be only one authority, namely Quebec.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Privy Council and Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, it is well known that a national referendum was held, with a certain result. Therefore we cannot proceed with the constitutional changes as such, but it would be quite possible for us to have discussions with the provinces, Quebec as well as the others, on arrangements that could change the status quo here in Canada.

We want a country that works; we are not trying to have an Italian-style country and Parliament.

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Lac-Saint-Jean): That kind of answer is avoiding the issue! Mr. Speaker, I think that we can say that that is the classic answer of all successive governments that have refused to comply with Quebec's most legitimate demands.

The saddest part is to see that there are always members from Quebec, be they New Democrats, Liberals or Conservatives, to support these unfair measures against Quebec.

I ask the Prime Minister whether he realizes that he is burning his last bridges with Quebec.

Tributes

Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, what is unfair to Quebec, an unemployment insurance program or a job creation program?

Some hon. members: We are talking about the manpower field.

Mr. Mulroney: Oh, manpower. It would be important to point out that we Liberals, Conservatives and New Democrats wanted to offer that to Quebec in the referendum but the Bloc Quebecois said no.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: It is my duty to remind the House that as a consequence of discussions the House will now hear tributes to the Right Hon. Jeanne Sauvé.

[Translation]

THE LATE RIGHT HONOURABLE JEANNE SAUVÉ

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it was in this House that from the beginning of her political career Jeanne Sauvé was to radiate her remarkable personal qualities and her profound love of this country.

She was a member of Parliament for 10 years, most of which were spent as a minister of the government of that time. Subsequently, from 1980 to 1983, she presided over the proceedings of this House. I am sure you, Mr. Speaker, will appreciate that this responsibility may at times be a very heavy burden for the Speaker of a democratic House such as this one.

Those among us who sat in the Commons at the same time as Madam Sauvé will remember above all that she drew strength and serenity from an optimistic and generous vision of Canada's future.

Although she was an eager and able participant in the partisan give and take that is an entirely natural expression of one's political commitment, she never forgot that our first duty as a member is to serve our fellow citizens and our country.

As parliamentarians, while we mourn the passing of an esteemed and respected colleague, we also admire a career that was outstanding in every respect.

May her memory always be an inspiration to us and to those who some day will be our successors.

As Governor General she represented our country with a natural dignity and generosity that was appreciated by all, from the average citizen to the leaders of this world. Since we first met more than 25 years ago, I have appreciated the warmth of her personality and the strength of her convictions.

Since I was first elected as Prime Minister of Canada and until the end of her mandate as Governor General in 1990, her advice, encouragement and of course her friendship were much appreciated. I will always consider it a rare privilege, in the course of my public career, to have served my country in the company of this great lady.

Jeanne Sauvé was sincere in her conviction that Canada is more than the sum of its parts, that British Columbia, the west, Ontario, Quebec and the Atlantic provinces, with all their differences and similarities, together form the most splendid country on earth. She always showed as much confidence in our future as she did pride in our past.

Her most precious legacy to us and to future generations is her exemplary dignity, lucidity and unshakable confidence, especially when coping with the illness she was to experience during the last 10 years of her life.

[English]

Jeanne Sauvé possessed many remarkable qualities. A person of deep religious faith she was also acutely aware of and sensitive to the realities that exist in a great pluralistic society. She was a committed foe of intolerance and racism in all of their forms. She was equally blessed with a sharp and inquisitive mind and an exuberant sense of humour. She expected others to meet the same high standards that she always demanded of herself. Yet she abounded in compassion for those who from time to time fell short through no fault of their own.

In her public life, as in private, I always thought that she was a supremely gracious person. She brought to every office and to every task a measure of quiet dignity and effortless appearance which enriched and impressed all with whom she dealt.

Above all, Jeanne Sauvé was a passionately committed Canadian. She loved Canada with every fibre of her being and she came to represent Canada. She was a French speaking young woman from Prud'homme, Saskatchewan, who became one of the builders of modern Quebec and yet felt so at home in English speaking Canada. She came to represent the very best values that all of Canada stands for, both here and around the world. She was keenly aware of the diversity of Canada and she applied that awareness in ways that always strengthened our citizenship.

With the support of her late husband, the hon. Maurice Sauvé who also served in this House with distinction and whom many of us remember very fondly as well, she became the first woman elected to this House from the province of Quebec. Obviously talented, she was soon appointed to cabinet where she successfully discharged many portfolios. As Speaker of this House she implemented significant administrative reforms which have greatly improved the efficiency of the institution.

Her years as Governor General were characterized by an admirable combination of verve and dignity, proof if ever it was needed that style and substance are not mutually exclusive. Her Majesty was extremely well served by Jeanne Sauvé's tenure at Rideau Hall.

• (1510)

After an exceptionally full life of service she continued to devote herself to noble causes, and in a very special way to the cause of the youth. She caused to be created the Jeanne Sauvé Youth Foundation to stimulate in our young people and the youth of other countries the creativity and initiative that she herself displayed throughout her entire life.

With other members of Parliament which I see here today, I was at the first Jeanne Sauvé Conference for Youth that took place in Montreal. The Secretary–General of the United Nations was the principal guest, and it then broke down into four days of seminars, discussions, and debate. It was an exhilarating and genuinely impressive experience.

At the end of the day the conference was all about tolerance and the fundamental values of citizenship, and about encouraging these young men and women from around the world to assume positions of leadership in their own countries when they returned to them.

Those who knew her well understood that nothing brought more joy to the lives of Jeanne and Maurice Sauvé than their son, Jean–François. He was truly the apple of her eye and no mother could have been prouder of a son.

I remember well that her smile was never brighter and her eyes never more expressive than when she talked about Jean-François, her family and those she held dear.

To Jean-François and his wife Diane I extend my very deep personal condolences.

[Translation]

Speaking on behalf of the Government of Canada, of all members of this House and of all Canadians, I wish to express to Jean-François and all members of his family our feelings of profound admiration for the historic endeavour of Jeanne Sauvé and to extend our sincere condolences.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, like the Prime Minister, I rise in turn to pay tribute to this great lady who was our colleague in the House of Commons.

The members of my party benefited from her company and her advice for 12 years when she was a member of this House.

She was a quite remarkable woman. She was very learned and had travelled around the world, but she still remained unpretentious. Everywhere she went, she loved to meet young people and we felt that Jeanne Sauvé represented the best of Canada. I think that she is the finest example we could give Canadian youth.

As the Prime Minister just said, she came from a small French speaking village in Saskatchewan and spent part of her youth in Ottawa. Later she was quite at home in Montreal's artistic and journalistic community. When she came to this House in 1972 she was already very well known, both in Canada and abroad.

She was always very diligent in the many cabinet positions she held. She was very interested not only in her own department but in what was happening throughout the government. She was always the first. In the tributes paid to her it was mentioned that she was first in school and she was also first here. She was the first French speaking woman from Quebec appointed to cabinet. She was the first woman Speaker of this House and, of course, to crown her career, she became Governor General of Canada. She filled that position with a style that had not previously been matched.

When she retired she wanted to go on. It was very much in the character of Jeanne Sauvé because when she was a young person she was involved with young people. She tried to organize them. She tried to make sure they would find a comfortable place in society in Canada as La jeunesse étudiante catholique: comment se trouver une place dans la société canadienne.

She decided to spend the last year of her life trying to get the young people of the world together because she fundamentally understood there was no difference among human beings. It did not matter what language they spoke, what religion they professed, what was the colour of their skin or what gender they belonged to; it made no difference to Jeanne Sauvé. What she always sought was to make invaluable what is the best in every human being. Until the last weeks of her life she worked at trying to bring the young people of the world together.

As was said by the Prime Minister, Jeanne Sauvé was probably the greatest lady we have known in public life in Canada in this century. I had the pleasure of serving with her and her husband. It is very rare to see a family so completely committed to public life. Both had the feeling that when you are in public life, you can make a difference if you work hard at it. We can say that this couple was a great asset to this House of Commons and to the country.

On behalf of the party that Jeanne Sauvé served in, I would like to express to her son and his wife our deepest regrets. He can be proud he is the son of two great Canadians. Jeanne Sauvé was, among all Canadians I have known, one of the greatest persons I have had the pleasure to spend time with and work with. God bless her soul.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I also rise to grieve the passing of Jeanne Sauvé, a Canadian whose work in public life was a model for all Canadians. Her accomplishments truly were remarkable, as the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition have noted.

Jeanne Sauvé began at a very young age, at 20, as national president of the Jeunesse étudiante catholique. Later she became head of la Fédération des mouvements de jeunesse du Québec, an employee of UNESCO in Paris, a mother, a wife, a prominent Quebec journalist, a member of Parliament, a member of cabinet, Speaker of this House, Governor General, and most recently head of a scholarship fund which had as its goal bringing together world youth.

While remarkable achievements in themselves, they were more significant because Jeanne Sauvé was often a trail blazer and her efforts made it easier for others who followed.

[Translation]

She was the first woman from Quebec to be appointed minister. She was the first woman Minister of the Environment, the first woman Speaker of this House, the first woman Governor General.

Madam Sauvé belonged to this very special breed of people who give dignity to their tasks without ever shying away from a challenge.

[English]

I have been personally inspired by Madam Sauvé's steadfast conviction to change, her conviction in spite of obstacles that were often in her way. Of special importance was Madam Sauvé's drive to create space and funds for on site day care for children of the House of Commons' employees. She was not a woman to shy away from controversy when it came to principle.

[Translation]

As Governor General she made a number of people jump with the stand she took on the Meech Lake accord, when she argued passionately that Quebec had always been a distinct society, and she said so because she was convinced it was her duty to promote national unity.

[English]

Madam Sauvé once said that the role of the Governor General was to meet people, make them conscious of the presence of the Crown and the importance of the Constitution to their country, comfort them, manifest enthusiasm over what they were doing because it is an encouragement trying to foster national unity. It is fitting that in her last years she would again focus on the issue of youth in Canada and around the globe.

Madam Sauvé will be fondly remembered by many. While there is great sadness in her passing, there is also great respect for what she has done for the people of Canada.

On behalf of my party, I would like to express our condolences to her son Jean-François, his wife and family and simply to say that thanks to his mother and father, Maurice Sauvé, Canada is a better place. They will both be missed.

• (1520)

[Translation]

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, I knew Madam Sauvé and had the opportunity to see her at work both on the home front and abroad. Whatever she did, she did with distinction, intelligence and passion.

Her view of her role as Governor General was more Canadian and activist than that of most of her predecessors. She travelled more extensively abroad in her official capacity and never hesitated to carry out, to the fullest, the role of head of state for Canada.

She was also the first Governor General whose status of head of state was recognized in France during an official visit to that country. In addition, she did not hesitate to call upon the open-mindedness of her fellows citizens to urge them to ratify the Meech Lake accord. Not one of those who have had the honour to be in contact with her will forget the pleasantness of her conversation and the nobility of her views.

I wish to pay the last honours to this great lady on behalf of the members from the Bloc Quebecois and to reiterate all the respect and admiration I had for her. To her son and daughter-in-law, I offer my deepest sympathy.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: I would like to remind all members that they have until six o'clock this evening to go to the Rotunda to sign the register in memory of the late Right honourable Jeanne Sauvé.

There is another tribute this afternoon for a former colleague of many of us in this House, Charles Turner.

THE LATE HON. CHARLES TURNER

Mr. Joe Fontana (London East): Mr. Speaker, I am honoured to pay tribute to a former member of this House and of the Senate, the Hon. Charles Turner, who on January 10, 1993 at the age of 76 passed away in London, Ontario.

He served the constituents of London East and Canadians very well between 1968 and 1984 in this House. He was appointed to the Senate by the Right Hon. Pierre Trudeau in 1984 where he served until 1991 at his retirement.

He was known to most who served with him as Choo-Choo Charlie because of his locomotive engineering background. Most will recall that he was an officer of this House, being Whip of the government of the day. I suppose some will fondly remember the great bell escapade in March 1982 when for 15 days the bells rang. As a faithful servant of this House, Charlie brought his bed into the lobby and stayed there for a number of days protecting the government of the day.

In London East Charlie was known for his big heart. He was a big man with a very big heart. He was a man with a common touch who at no hour of the day hesitated to serve his constituents by delivering a passport or an unemployment insurance form. You name it and Charlie did it.

Charlie loved serving the people. He loved his job here and he loved the Senate. His contributions were many. While he was here he spoke frequently about transportation and safety, unemployment insurance, portable pensions and pensions for veterans, workers' rights, and an end to pollution in Lake Erie.

This is a trademark of the quality of this man. He said that it was the little guy that makes the world go around. The big guy is nobody if he does not have the little guy to do the work. That is what Charlie was all about.

To his wife, Marjorie and his daughters, Charmaine and Gloria, and his three grandsons, we on this side of the House pay our deep respect and convey our deep condolences to the family. He was a great man who will never be forgotten, not in London East and not in this House or in the Senate.

Hon. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, I too want to say a few words on behalf of my party about Charlie Turner.

I was first elected in 1968 and Charlie Turner was one of the class of 68. He was successfully re-elected in 1972, 1974, 1979 and 1980. When Mr. Trudeau ceased to be Prime Minister, Mr. Turner was appointed to the Senate. He was a Senator from 1984 until his retirement. For awhile our responsibilities in the House overlapped. He was the chief government Whip and I was the Whip of the New Democratic Party for part of that time.

Charlie was very well liked as a member of Parliament. For those who did not know him, he was one of those members who was liked on all sides of the House. He was one of the so-called ordinary people elected to this place who never lost the common touch with the ordinary person in his riding or elsewhere in the country.

If you wanted to know what was happening and wanted to get the pulse of ordinary Canadians, Charlie Turner was one of the members of Parliament you could count on to have that knowledge at his fingertips. I can remember the Prime Minister of the day, Pierre Trudeau, saying that he often consulted Charlie Turner when he wanted to know what was going on among ordinary people across the country.

On behalf of my party, I want to express to his wife, his daughters and his grandchildren our deepest condolences and sympathy. We will miss Charlie Turner. This House is a much better place because of Charlie Turner and we will miss him.

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister for Science and Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise on behalf of the people of the city of London, and particularly London West which I represent, and on behalf of our party to add my words of condolence to Marjorie, her two daughters and grandchildren on the passing of Charlie Turner.

We have just paid tribute to Jeanne Sauvé and we are now paying tribute to Charlie Turner. It shows the glory of this institution. Madam Sauvé was the Speaker and later the Governor General. Mr. Turner had the common touch and everybody who served with him in this House remembers him with tremendous affection. Charlie Turner, as my hon. friend just said, liked to articulate the needs of the ordinary person, the small guy.

I remember very well having lunch with him the first week I was elected in 1984. He told me that one of the secrets to getting re-elected was to deliver the passport personally to the front door, because you have to find ways to make contact with the constituent. "Don't send it through the mail, Tom. Take it yourself". He was searching for ways to reach out to the average person. Nobody was more successful in the history of London's political life than Charlie Turner at doing that.

He was named Choo-Choo and he had the image of the average guy's politician. Wherever you were with Charlie Turner, people would approach him and treat him as if he was their uncle or older brother. He had an accessibility which all of us admired enormously.

Charlie's greatest concern was when organizations got big: big business, big unions, big institutions. He was afraid they would lose touch with what ordinary people were saying. He used to talk about that. He always tried to make a connection to the average person in order to make sure these big institutions, be it government, Parliament, a union, a company or an institution, did not get out of touch with whom they represented?

The people of London were proud to have him as one of their members of Parliament. They were proud they had somebody whom the Prime Minister of the day trusted so fully, as Prime Minister Trudeau did. They were proud to have somebody who was from their part of the world and who had gone through the economic growth of southern Ontario in a way that would make an ordinary person proud.

As a member of Parliament from London, I have always looked at Charlie Turner as a model of how to be a constituency MP and colleague. I know this House will join with me in saluting his memory.

• (1530)

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, as one who knew Charlie Turner from the day he came into the House, I want to say today to Marjorie, his two girls and the rest of the family that they have every right to be very proud of Charlie Turner.

He was indeed a grassroots representative of his riding. He was a grassroots representative of the people in London, simply because he came from the average walk of life? He came into this House having spent many years as a railroad engineer.

When he was Whip of the Liberal Party Charlie faced some tough days and some tough issues. We would tease him because he ran the Whip's office just as he would a steam engine or locomotive on the railways. He had a heart. Deep down he was a very kind-hearted individual, but he was one who wanted to get the job done.

He had a very close liaison with the labour community, not only of the railroads but also other industrial bases across this country. He was respected by people right across Canada from coast to coast to coast.

Everybody in this House certainly knows there is not a much tougher job that a person can be given than to be Whip of a political party. The Whip has to deal with every single member. Charlie was able to do that on an individual basis. When he had a tough decision to make, he made it, but he made it with fairness.

I consider it to have been a great pleasure to have worked with Charlie Turner for several years. I consider it an act of respect that one of the other members in this House today said that he kept touch with the common individual because he came from the average walk of like.

He has given all of us a lesson. As we sit in this House today and in the days to come, if we use Charlie Turner's ideas and his empathy for people who are having difficult times, we will certainly be emulating the great example that Charlie Turner gave to this House and to the working people across this nation.

Today I want to say to Marjorie and to Charlie's and Marjorie's two daughters that we thank them for giving us Charlie Turner in this House for a long time. We respect the work he has done. We are with them today in telling them to keep their chins up. They have every right to be proud. We only hope that the people of Canada will remember the Charlie Turners of this world. They too are outstanding representatives in this nation.

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, I got to know Charlie Turner between 1979 and 1984 in the transport committee on the opposition side and of course on the government side.

As my predecessors have already mentioned, he was a grassroots politician. He brought the concerns of the average worker, whether it was from CN or CP, to the transport committee. I remember how hard Charlie fought for better pensions for the retirees. Some had retired from CN with very inadequate pensions. They wanted to make representations to the transport committee and Charlie Turner made sure they were represented there.

When we were crossing Canada with the western transportation and grain handling act, known as the Crow bill, Charlie Turner fought for not cutting branch lines. People do not know this about Charlie. He had the foresight to know that if branch lines were cut it would be the end of many family farms in Saskatchewan and Manitoba. Charlie saw that and he fought to preserve the branch lines. Charlie has added a lot.

Yes, Marjorie, his two daughters and grandchildren can be very proud of another great Canadian who has made his niche in the history of Canada.

I got to know him as our party Whip. Charlie practised what I call the three Fs in life. He was firm. He was fair. He was friendly. I pay tribute to Charlie Turner, a great parliamentarian, a great Canadian.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I would like to extend my condolences to Charlie Turner's family. He and I were elected in 1968 along with almost 100 other new members.

He was an expert in the field of transportation having been an engineer on the railroad. He not only was an authority in caucus and in the House on railroad and transportation issues but he was also capable of regaling us with great stories about his years on the CNR.

He was a staunch supporter of Mr. Trudeau and ultimately was the chief government Whip during the difficult times of the bell ringing incident during the early 1980s.

His great supporter of course was Marjorie. She would often be on the Hill. He was dedicated to his riding. He drove home practically every weekend from Ottawa to London. He loved to attend all the public functions in his riding, to meet and greet and be well known by his constituents.

I simply want to join in the words of condolence that have been spoken in the House to Marjorie, their daughters, and their grandchildren. He really was a great constituency person, a great parliamentarian, and ultimately a great senator. He will be missed.

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants): Mr. Speaker, I too want to add some very personal words on the death of Charlie Turner. I frankly did not know he had passed away during the break until I heard the words expressed here today. I am not going to repeat everything that has been said.

I first got to know Charlie when he came here in 1968 on the transportation committee. I was in the opposition and he was a government man. Charlie was fair, civil and had that manner of respect for fellow colleagues regardless of what side of the fence they stood on, something that is getting to be a rare commodity around here. I agree with all those who have said he was the model of a constituency member. I do not know what he did in the Senate, but I know that in this House of Commons he added a note of civility and common sense that is much needed around here.

I got to know his wife Marjorie because, as the member for Algoma has just said, she was always around. I certainly want to extend to her and the family my sympathy for their loss.

In closing, everything has been said in a sense. I can see the common thoughts he gave as the member for London, as parliamentary secretary to the minister of science and technology. One of the things I am going to miss now that I have heard these eulogies today is his great sense of humour. Boy, you need a sense of humour around here too.

There was that belly laugh and a smile which really did captivate and came out at times when there was tension and strain. I think that helped all of us from time to time.

I am glad I was in the House to hear the statement earlier today and to acknowledge the many years I shared with Charlie, regardless of the fact we were on opposite sides of the fence. It did not make any difference in terms of respect for each other. We were each trying to do our thing in making this a better place, and he certainly tried to make this House and the country a better place.

Mr. Speaker: I want to thank all hon. members, the Prime Minister, the Leader of the Opposition, the Leader of the New Democratic Party, and others for the eloquent tributes they have paid this afternoon to the Right Hon. Jeanne Sauvé and to our former colleague, Charlie Turner.

PRIVILEGE

HOCKEY CANADA

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I rise today on a question of privilege which arose on December 11, 1992, the last day the House sat before the Christmas break. During Question Period at that time I had asked the government if it would produce the full financial statements for Hockey Canada, a public agency. The member for Vancouver Centre responded on behalf of the government. I quote from Hansard of that day at page 15105:

• (1540)

> I will take that question on behalf of my colleague, the Solicitor General, who has indicated that this matter is currently being investigated by the RCMP. The Government of Canada will offer no further information until the RCMP has concluded its investigation.

This answer was interesting in itself, Mr. Speaker, since the Solicitor General has never indicated to this House or publicly, to my knowledge, that such an investigation was ongoing by the RCMP. More important, however, six days later the chairman of the board of Hockey Canada, Mr. Ian Macdonald, released a statement saying:

> The suggestion that the RCMP are investigating the financial records of Hockey Canada is simply not true. No one in Hockey Canada has had any conversations with the RCMP concerning such an investigation, nor have any of our records been examined by them. It is difficult to determine from where such reports emanated.

The question of privilege is simple. Either the member for Vancouver Centre misled the House or an Order in Council appointee to a government agency is refuting the words of a minister of the Crown and casting aspersions on the proceedings of this House.

I would like to quote from the 19th edition of Erskine May, chapter X, page 144 under the heading "Constructive Contempts", subheading "Speeches or Writings Reflecting On Either House":

> In 1701 the House of Commons resolved that to print or publish any books or libels reflecting on the proceedings of the House is a high violation of the rights and privileges of the House.

Also noted in this passage of Erskine May is:

> Reflections upon members, the particular individuals not being named or otherwise indicated, are equivalent to reflections on the House.

Although Mr. Macdonald did not publish a book, he did in fact cast aspersions on the proceedings of this House. In the 1990s the press release of a statement is equivalent to a published document. It is circulated instantly and widely to millions of Canadians across this country.

Mr. Macdonald's press release of December 17, of which I have a copy and will provide to the Chair at the completion of my remarks, was based on the proceedings in the House during Question Period. There is no doubt of the source in the minds of the public who watched Question Period on December 11, 1992 and the media who reported the exchange on national television and in daily newspapers across this country. Mr. Macdonald was clearly upset by the proceedings in the House when he admitted to The Toronto Star on December 18, 1992: "I cannot describe how frustrating it is to pick up the paper and be connected with something like that".

This is not the case of the opposition and the government disagreeing. We are not talking about a dispute over facts that the Official Opposition and the government engage in during our daily accountability sessions. We are talking about a government agency which spends taxpayers' money in its deliberate attempt to bring into disrepute the proceedings of this House.

We in this House, as I think you have evidenced on many occasions, take seriously the honour of taking a member at his or her word. A senior public servant has publicly refuted what a minister of the Crown placed on the record of this House. The question was a simple informative question and the answer was simple: There is an RCMP investigation.

What has transpired since the House adjourned has been confusing and contradictory. The taxpayers of Canada have a right to know how their taxes are being used. That is essentially why we are here. One of the main roles of the Official Opposition is to hold the government accountable. I do not believe the opposition or the government are able to do their jobs and to do them well when the head of a public agency publicly disputes the proceedings of this House.

In Erskine May the definition of contempt is as follows, and I quote from page 143 of the 20th edition:

> It may be stated generally that any act or omission which obstructs or impedes either House of Parliament in the performance of its functions, or which obstructs or impedes any Member or officer of such House in the discharge of his duty, or which has a tendency, directly or indirectly, to produce such results may be treated as a contempt even though there is no precedent of the offence.

We asked a question in this House. We are told that we cannot have an answer because of an RCMP investigation pertaining to the question we have raised. Then the chairman of the board attempts to refute the minister's answer claiming that no such investigation exists and this happened six days later.

The truth is missing somewhere behind the words of two responsible parties. We in this House are being impeded in performing our constitutional role of holding the government to account for the disposing of taxpayers' money. Our job in Parliament is to subject all Crown agencies to public scrutiny to show the wise use of tax dollars. We must be objective and, I suggest, constructive.

Public agencies that comment on the proceedings in this House are not conducive to us fulfilling our responsibilities. Indeed we believe them to be breaches of our privileges. Mr. Macdonald's actions are more than a disagreement with something said in the House. He is a public official who is attempting to prevent the House, I suggest, from getting the facts. It may well be that the responsible ministers will agree with me on this point.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, if you find a prima facie case, I am prepared to move the appropriate motion. On the other hand, if somehow the minister has inadvertently misled the House with regard to the RCMP investigation, we will want to hear why such a thing was allowed to stay on the books and to stay in the minds of the public for such an indefinite period of time while her colleague, the Solicitor General, sat idly by and responding with nothing in the interim.

Hon. Doug Lewis (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to respond to my hon. colleague's allegations. There's a suggestion that the time of the House and of members of Parliament and of the committee on privileges and elections should be used to pursue this matter.

First, it would be helpful to review the actual question to see how loose and rambling the actual question was. I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that when you have the opportunity you will agree with me.

My hon. friend started out by talking about Florida, then discussed the future of the league. He went on to suggest that serious questions had been raised recently about the financial dealings of the non-profit federal agency Hockey Canada and certain individuals. Then there was the direct question after the rambling that asked the minister responsible whether the government will provide to this House a full financial disclosure other than the annual one-line item expenses and income report for Hockey Canada since Hockey Canada has been incorporated.

The hon. minister replied. Bear in mind that it is a fact of life that we are often out of the House on business and she was responding on my behalf. I know that in no way would the hon. minister have ever misled the House. On this very simple case she had no cause to mislead the House.

Her answer is: "I will take that question". I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that when you review the text you will see that the question is: "Will the government provide to the House?" She undertook to take that question "on behalf of my colleague, the Solicitor General, who has indicated that this matter is currently being investigated by the RCMP. The Government of Canada will offer no further information until the RCMP has concluded its investigation." That is what took place in the House.

My hon. friend has not told the House something. I do not suggest for a minute that this was in an effort to mislead the House, but my hon. friend did not go on. I would not suggest for a minute that my hon. friend would deliberately mislead the House. However, my hon. friend neglected to point out to the House that there were comments made outside the House. Those of course are not something that would go to a matter of privilege based on a question answered in the House.

• (1550)

It is quite fair to say that I am not briefed on behalf or acting on behalf of Hockey Canada, but I do have in my hands the same news release that my hon. friend referred to. In there Dr. Macdonald was quoted as saying: "The suggestion that the RCMP are investigating the financial records of Hockey Canada is simply not true. No one in Hockey Canada has had any conversation with the RCMP concerning such an investigation nor have any of our records been examined by them. It is difficult to determine from where such reports emanated".

There is no mention of the House of Commons in here. If one is going to be hauled before the bar of the House for defaming the House of Commons, one has to defame the House of Commons and the members in it.

I know my hon. friend is used to being referred to in the media in many places. Over the holidays, for example, he was in several newspaper accounts, that I believe I remember reading, with regard to certain difficulties he had in his party. I know he is used to being referred to in the media, but in this report there is no reference to the House of Commons. For one to defame the House of Commons one has to at least mention it.

I am sorry. I respect the desire for truth from members of Parliament. I have been on both sides of Question Period. I am sure that my hon. friend could pursue this matter under estimates. He made reference to the real question he is referring to, which is whether the government will provide to this House the full financial disclosure. That is the question my hon. friend asked.

The House knows there is a place to do this when the estimates of the government are considered. I think with all due respect to the time of the House and the items before the House that that is a matter to be dealt with at committee and I am sure we would be more than ready to entertain any questions on that line. I do not believe it is sufficient, but I am in your hands.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, the hon. minister opposite is trying to paint a picture that we in the opposition have somehow done something which ought not to have been done in our attempts to elicit information from the government and responsible ministers.

I did not ask in my question of the day about an RCMP investigation. I asked specifically and made a reference to financial information. It was the Minister of Justice—not a minister who is unfamiliar with the law and the workings of the law—who responded in kind. I wish to read this for the benefit of all members: "Madam Speaker, I will take the question on behalf of my colleague, the Solicitor General, who has indicated that this matter is currently being investigated by the RCMP. The Government of Canada will offer no further information until the RCMP has concluded its investigations".

What are we supposed to do in the opposition? If there is an RCMP investigation, that means we cannot get the information according to the Minister of Justice and not someone who is unfamiliar with the law.

My final point is that perhaps the Solicitor General would set the record straight. Is there an RCMP investigation of Hockey Canada or is there not?

Mr. Speaker: I am sure the Solicitor General will be heard in just a moment. I am concerned that this is moving away from the procedural issue I have to decide. However, if the hon. minister wishes to respond to the question just put by the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond, he is entitled to do so.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, if my hon. friend had made the question that direct and succinct when he asked it, he would have received this reply.

We are aware that the RCMP is reviewing the alleged wrongdoing pertaining to the National Hockey League Players' Association. Hockey Canada is co-operating with the RCMP in this review. Hockey Canada is not under investigation.

Mr. Speaker: The position of the Chair in a case like this is one sometimes of caution because something which is just a difference of opinion, or a difference of fact or a difference of fact as argued, does not necessarily amount to a question of privilege.

I have listened very carefully to both the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond who raised the matter and to the Solicitor General who has responded. It may be that the response of the Solicitor General has done something to clear the air, if I can put it that way. However I am going to look very carefully at the question that was asked, review the arguments that were given and return to the House as quickly as possible.

AMERICAN MUSIC AWARDS

K.D. LANG

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I rise to take the admittedly unusual but certainly not unprecedented step of seeking the unanimous consent of the House at this time to move a motion to congratulate Consort, Alberta's own k.d. lang for being named the best new adult contemporary artist by the American Music Awards in Los Angeles on Monday, January 25, 1993.

I have taken the step of notifying all of the House leaders of the various parties in the House and believe that with unanimous consent we can deal with this matter expeditiously.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is quite right. There were consultations with our party. I wish to give the unanimous consent of our party to this particular motion.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I too want to acknowledge that there were consultations and on behalf of the New Democratic Party I give consent.

Mr. Speaker: Is there consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): Therefore, I move:

That this House congratulate Consort, Alberta's own k.d. lang for being named the best new adult contemporary artist by the American Music Awards in Los Angeles, California, on Monday, January 25, 1993.

Well done, k.d.

POINT OF ORDER

STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE ON SCRUTINY OF REGULATIONS

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Mr. Speaker, a point of order on the matter of Motion No. 15 on our Order Paper.

On November 19, 1992 the Standing Joint Committee on Scrutiny of Regulations tabled its sixth report in this House recommending disallowance of certain provisions of the public works nuisance regulations. The committee believed that these regulations placed unlawful restrictions on freedom of expression and peaceful assembly.

Under the rules this disallowance will later today become an Order of the House of Commons. I am pleased to note that on December 10 last the government acted to comply with the disallowance resolution of the committee and we would like to thank the Minister of Public Works for having acted on this matter in advance of today's formal Order of this House.

PETITIONS

NORTH THOMPSON RIVER

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, it is an honour and a privilege to present a petition on behalf of the Coalition of People Against River Diversion which recently held a two-day conference in Barrière, British Columbia. It was hosted by the North Thompson Indian Band and attended by a large number of participants including delegations from a variety of First Nations.

They point out that a firm by the name of Multinational Resources plans to divert the North Thompson River in order to sell the diverted water in the San Diego, California area.

They point out that this is simply part of the thinking flowing out of the NAWAPA plan. They know that at present the federal government has no legislation prohibiting the diversion of Canadian waters to the United States and therefore they are simply asking the government to state categorically that it will not permit our fresh waters to be dammed and diverted into the United States. They want the government to state that Canadian rivers and lakes are not for sale.

JUSTICE

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition signed by 800 of my constituents in memory of Dawn Shaw, a little girl who was raped and murdered in the Comox Valley.

The petitioners have indicated their concern that children are increasingly becoming victims of sexual assault and they have proposed a number of measures to make our community safer for children. One measure is DNA testing of persons suspected of sexual assault.

HOUSING

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to present a petition from a number of constituents in my riding who are concerned about co-op housing in this country.

The petitioners say that many Canadians have experienced serious housing problems and that the government terminated the federal co-operative housing program on February 25, 1992. They state that this action eliminated 2,000 new co-op units for 1992 alone, along with 4,000 construction and manufacturing jobs for the same period.

They state that the indexed linked mortgage introduced in Canada by the co-op housing sector has substantially reduced the cost to the government of producing non-profit co-op housing. They state that there are approximately 164,000 renter households who want to move into co-op housing due to the success of the program in creating affordable and stable mixed income communities.

The petitioners therefore call upon Parliament to urge the government to immediately reinstate the federal co-operative housing program and to commit the $6.1 million to the program which had been planned for 1992 to permit approximately 2,000 co-operative housing units to be sponsored this year.

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, my petition concerns the government cut in social housing by 34 per cent.

As a result of that cut many of the housing programs have been cancelled. There is a need for a strong federal presence in housing programs in order to ensure equal access to adequate and affordable housing, to which all Canadians have a right.

I join with my constituents who are calling on Parliament to urge the government to restore its planned commitment to social housing by reinstating many of the programs that it has cancelled.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, petitioners from across Canada are asking that the government remove the goods and services tax on books and other reading materials.

They point out that there has been a zero rate of tax since Confederation. They also emphasize that education is the cornerstone of increased productivity and increased competitiveness. They conclude by saying that the government ought to review its policies with regard to this tax.

[Translation]

LANGUAGE USED IN RADIO AND TELEVISION BROADCASTING

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I have a second petition. The petitioners ask that Parliament regulate the language used in radio and television broadcasting.

They point out that often the crude language used in broadcasting conflicts with what parents are trying to teach in their homes. Finally, they state that it is not necessary to use such poor language to inform people.

[English]

SENIOR CITIZENS

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36 I have the honour and privilege to table petitions from Canadian senior citizens from across Ontario.

These petitioners complain that thousands of Canadian senior citizens live below the poverty line and that over 80 per cent of single women over the age of 65 live in poverty. They complain that the 37 cent increase in old age security pensions in April 1992 is inadequate to meet the many needs of Canadian seniors and say that the federal government has a primary responsibility to ensure the adequacy of seniors' pensions.

The petitioners call upon Parliament to urge the government to ensure that Canadian old age security pensions are sufficient to meet the basic needs of Canadian senior citizens.

This petition is presented in the two official languages.

With regard to the question of CN Rail board of directors expenses and remuneration, the following information is provided: There are 12 directors on the CN board.

In 1988 part-time directors were each paid a fee for services as a director at the rate of $5,000 per annum and additional fees of $250 per day for each day on which they respectively participated in one or more meetings of the board of directors or any committee thereof.

Between 1989 and September 1992 part-time directors were each paid a fee for services as a director at the rate within a range of $5,600 to $7,000 per annum and additional fees within a range of $450 to $600 per day for each day on which they respectively participated in one or more meetings of the board of directors or any committee thereof. The chairman of each of the five standing committees of the board of directors received an additional $3,000. In 1992 this fee was reduced to $2,000. Directors were also compensated for travel time relating to attendance at meetings.

Remuneration and expenses relating to the administration of the CN board are well within the levels found in the private sector.

(b), (c) and (d) with regard to administrative expenses, CN does not report this information as it is regarded as proprietary.

Mr. Len Gustafson (Parliamentary Secretary to Prime Minister): In so far as can be determined, Messrs. Bruce Howe, Robert Blackburn and/or Harry Rogers attended meetings at the Privy Council Office between March 1 and May 31, 1989 as identified as follows:

Question No. 408—Mr. Harvard:

Has the government undertaken a study on the impact of the proposed merger between Air Canada and Canadian Airlines and, if so, what did the study conclude in relation to a) the number of employees who will lose their jobs b) the level of services for the flying public c) the number of routes that will be dropped d) the level of air fares?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): The government was awaiting a final joint proposal from Air Canada and PWA including information on the impact on workers before undertaking any formal studies of the implications of a proposed merger. As the member is aware, the boards of directors of both companies in October rejected the draft merger proposal. Therefore no specific study on the impact on employees, level of service, reduction in number of routes or level or air fares has been conducted.

Question No. 414—Mr. Simmons:

Has any action been taken by the Department of Transport (Canadian Coast Guard) relating to the concern expressed by the Auditor General in his 1978, 1983, 1989, 1990 and 1991 reports to Parliament over "the need to define levels of service for the ice-breaking program and to determine the size of the fleet of ice capable vessels needed to provide these levels of service" and, if so, a) what was such action b) is a "needs and options analysis based on defined levels of service" now conducted prior to the approval and disbursement of "major capital expenditures" as recommended by the Auditor General?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Yes.

(a) Initial work began on Canadian Cost Guard (CCG) levels of service in the late 1970s in response to concerns of the Auditor General, Treasury Board and Transport Canada internal audit. Several program evaluations and economic impact studies were initiated by CCG and carried out by groups such as the Bureau of Management Consulting, Sypher-Mueller Int. and Hickling Management Consultants. These studies confirmed the importance of the CCG's ice-breaking services to the marine community.

The Canadian Coast Guard issued an initial ice-breaking operations levels of service (LOS) document in October 1990, with instructions that the document was to be used for ice-breaking activity management and that it would be refined for continuing application thereafter. The LOS document provides clear definitions of ice-breaking services that clients can expect. In simple terms it describes the what, where, when, how much and how fast, as well as limitations on and priorities for the available services. The LOS document is supported by data obtained from the ice-breaking Operations Data Information System (IODIS) and was refined on the basis of experience gained during the 1990-91 ice-breaking seasons in the Arctic and eastern Canada. During the fall of 1992 consultations were undertaken to make clients aware of the levels of ice-breaking services provided by the CCG and to solicit their comments on the program. Initial feedback from clients has been positive.

In order to respond more effectively to broader responsibilities in the areas of safety, statutory requirements and environmental protection, the Coast Guard has implemented a five-phase fleet restructuring plan (FRP) spanning the 1991-1994 period. The Auditor

General's comments were carefully considered and incorporated in the development of the FRP. The major points of this plan involve the redeployment of 10 ships between regions and the removal of 10 ships from active service. The outcome of the FRP is to better match ship capability including ice-breaking capability to operational demands and geographic locations to meet the client needs.

(b) A needs and options analysis based on levels of service has not yet been conducted, as there have been no major capital expenditures in recent years. However, this analysis will be carried out on any future fleet capital projects such as new vessel construction or mid-life modernizations before these projects are submitted to Treasury Board for approval.

Question No. 419—Mr. Duhamel:

With respect to the proposed merger between Air Canada and Canadian Airlines International has the government undertaken a study on the impact upon workers and, if so, (a) what did the study conclude in relation to the number of Winnipeg based employees who may lose their jobs (b) were there any recommendations to protect the consumer from harmful monopolistic practices resulting from such a merger?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): The government was awaiting a final joint proposal from Air Canada and PWA including information on the impact on workers before undertaking any formal studies of the implications of a proposed merger. As the member is aware, the boards of directors of both companies in October rejected the draft merger proposal. Therefore no specific study on the impact on employees, level of service, reduction in number of routes or level of air fares has been conducted.

Question No. 424—Mr. Comuzzi:

With respect to the 1992 referendum, for the entire referendum period has the government given contracts to companies to supply paper and/or printing for all documents for the purpose of distribution to the electorate and, if so, which companies received the contracts?

Hon. Paul Dick (Minister of Supply and Services): With respect to the 1992 referendum, for the entire referendum period Canada Communication Group awarded contracts to the following companies to supply paper and/or printing for all documents for the purpose of distribution to the electorate:

Dartmouth Free Press	Bradda Printing	Lowe Martin Co. Inc.
Interglobe Inc.	The Runge Press	Yorkville Press Co. Ltd.
Translitho	Metropole Litho Inc.	Dollco Printing
Copieurs Rive Sud	Transcontinental Prestige	Capital Box of Ottawa Ltd.
St. Joseph Printing	Kromar Printing Inc.	Ronalds Printing Inc.
Love Printing Services Inc.	National Printer Inc.

Also standing offers for the following companies were utilized: Noranda Forest Recycled Papers and Inter-City Papers Ltd.

For the purpose of this response "referendum" was presumed to mean the Charlottetown accord and the "entire period" was from October 1 to October 26, 1992.

Question No. 429—Mr. Nowlan:

With respect to the contract between Supply and Services and the Rider travel group for government travel (a) does the Rider travel group use the Sabre Reservation System and, if so, what is the charge for each reservation segment (b) what in total has been paid on a monthly basis to the Sabre Reservation System since the contract has been awarded?

Hon. Paul Dick (Minister of Supply and Services): With respect to the contract between Supply and Services and the Rider Travel Group for government travel. (a) the Rider Travel Group uses the Sabre reservation system to make reservations for government travel. There is no charge to the government for making these reservations. Both Sabre and Gemini receive their revenue from the supplier that is hosted (i.e. listed) in the system. In the case of airlines this would be on a segment basis while it would be based on the number of reservations made for hotel and car rental companies; (b) no money has been paid to Sabre for government travel by either Rider Travel or the government.

Question No. 431—Mr. Nystrom:

With respect to Canada Pension Plan survivor pensions and combined survivor retirement pensions, for the most recent period available what is (a) the number of recipients for each age group of (i) under 35 (ii) 35-39 (iii) 40-44 (iv) 45-49 (v) 50-54 (vi) 55-59 (vii) 60-64 (viii) 65 and older (b) distribution percentage for these age groups?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Distribution of survivors' pensions and combined retirement-survivors' pensions by age are as follows:

November 1992

Age	Survivors' pensions		Combined Survivors'—Retirement Pensions
	Number	Per cent	Number	Per cent

Mr. Speaker: The questions as enumerated by the parliamentary secretary have been answered.

Mr. Edwards: I ask, Mr. Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Duhamel: Mr. Speaker, I am seeking some guidance from you.

I had submitted a question to the Order Paper on December 12, 1991 which read as follows:

> What is the total amount of revenue collected by the government from the goods and services tax since January 1, 1991 and what has been the total amount spent on (a) advertising (b) tax credits (c) GST rebates (d) set-up costs (e) other expenses associated with the implementation of this tax?

A second question reads as follows:

> What is the total of GST revenue placed in the debt service reduction account and what is the current balance of the account?

I have been rather patient with the government on this. I have raised it several times in this House. It seems to me that well more than a year later I should have received a response to those particular questions. They are not extremely complex. They only require numbers. I would like to know if this is ever going to happen. Why has it not happened? What is being hidden here?

Surely those answers are available to the Government of Canada so that I can share them with the people of Canada.

Mr. Edwards: Mr. Speaker, I think that my hon. friend and I have had an exchange about at least one of these questions before.

I have done some checking in anticipation of these questions, to be honest. The second question he refers to, concerning the debt reduction account, is one that I think was answered in the economic statement of the Minister of Finance. I do not say that in order to be provocative or flip. I more or less share my hon. friend's impatience because that is a fairly straightforward question to be answered. We will get after that one with all kinds of dispatch.

With regard to the first question to which my hon. friend refers, that is a much more complex question. There are many aspects to it. There is a lot of work involved in it and a lot of work has been done in preparing the response. I am told that work is almost complete. I hesitate to give a date but I can tell my friend that there are a lot of people working on preparing a response to his question.

Mr. Speaker: I am in receipt of a notice of motion under Standing Order 52 from the hon. member for Winnipeg—St. James. I also have a similar application under Standing Order 52 from the hon. member for Moose Jaw—Lake Centre.

In terms of time received the hon. member for Winnipeg—St. James was first. I will hear the hon. member.

MOTIONS TO ADJOURN UNDER S. O. 52

AGRICULTURE

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg—St. James): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 52, I wish to propose a motion to adjourn this House for the purpose of discussing an urgent and pressing matter, namely the severe income crisis which is devastating farmers and threatening their security and future on the land.

Income is expected to plummet nearly $1 billion this year. That is a drop of over 20 per cent. The average farm family in Saskatchewan can expect only $4,000 in net on-farm income this year. I believe this to be an urgent issue and I also believe that it is appropriate for this House to set aside time to discuss this pressing matter.

Point of Order

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I also wish to give notice of my intention to move the adjournment of the House pursuant to Standing Order 52 to discuss a specific matter requiring urgent consideration, namely the plight of agricultural producers not only in western Canada but right across this nation.

These individuals and families are in desperate need of funding to see them through the winter and to ensure that a crop is planted in the spring. Some 13,000 people recently gathered in Saskatoon to express the need for immediate action in agriculture. This was the largest rally in the history of Saskatchewan and quite possibly in the country. They expressed the desperation that many farm families feel with respect to their future. It is essential that this House enter into a discussion on this disastrous situation and that this government move to take some direct action.

The situation is deep. It is wide spread and it is certainly not limited to Saskatchewan. Because of the dimension and the depth of the agricultural crisis, leadership must be initiated by the federal government.

It is my belief that if we do not immediately deal with this issue, thousands of farm families will be forced from the land, creating social and economic hardships of extreme proportions.

SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: I thank both the hon. member for Winnipeg—St. James and the hon. member for Moose Jaw—Lake Centre for their succinct but nonetheless satisfactory notices because it puts the Speaker in the position where there is no question as to what is being raised.

The Chair is not unaware at all of the matters raised and of course from what proceeded in the House this afternoon during Question Period, it is clear that the House is cognizant of the difficulties.

That being so, however, I do not feel that it is appropriate today to move on an emergency debate which would set aside the business of the House.

I thank both hon. members for raising this matter which I am quite sure is deemed as serious by the House of Commons.

The hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie also has a matter to raise.

STEEL INDUSTRY

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I rise pursuant to Standing Order 52 as well to request that the House be adjourned to discuss the crisis in the steel industry in Canada. The reciprocal trade actions in the past several days initiated by the United States and Canada bring to the forefront once again the dire circumstances of our Canadian industry.

The loss of 12,000 steel jobs in Hamilton and Sault Ste. Marie alone over the past four years reflects the situation which will only be aggravated by these actions.

The Minister for International Trade has been rebuffed in his attempts to forge a new bilateral agreement, thus leaving the industry in uncertainty and under immediate risk.

I believe an emergency debate on the status of the steel industry in Canada is both timely and essential.

SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: I thank the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie for giving the Chair notice of this matter. As I remarked with respect to the applications brought by the hon. member for Winnipeg—St. James and the hon. member for Moose Jaw—Lake Centre, I am sure that the House is aware of the matters raised by the hon. member and as hon. members will recall, the House exchanged both questions and answers on the matter today.

Under the circumstances, taking nothing away from the fact that it is of a serious matter, I do not believe it appropriate to adjourn the House for a special debate at this time.

POINT OF ORDER

MOTION OF MEMBER FOR EDMONTON EAST

Hon. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Earlier in our proceedings we agreed to a motion by the hon. member for Edmonton East congratulating Ms. lang. Obviously the entire House joined in these congratulations; however, if memory serves me well, I would like, for the future—

[English]

I look at my hon. friend ready maybe to answer, but I am talking about the future.

[Translation]

In the past we had motions under Standing Order 43. At any time members would rise at the beginning of our proceedings to ask for unanimous consent for all sorts of good causes, and it would be quite embarrassing and very difficult for members to object. Furthermore, that was potentially embarrassing for the government because of possible international implications or, if the cause were noble, consent might be refused because one or two members were not in a responsive mood that day. I thought that was unfortunate. Standing Order 43 made it possible for any member to rise on an urgent or important matter.

Members addressed the issue.

• (1620)

[English]

By the way, the new Whip of the government, like others before him, decided that maybe we should look into that rule that was abused by the House. That is where in protecting the right of backbenchers we came to the conclusion that we should have a new article 31 Déclarations de députés, known in English as Statements by Members, for 15 minutes. In this way a member did not have to beg his colleague to put something to the House, to congratulate or defend or attack. Mr. Speaker would be the master of the good taste of the statements raised by members.

Over the years we have ameliorated our practice in the House. I see it today and I have seen it earlier too. It has nothing to do with what we did a moment ago. I am thinking of the future. In the British law, precedent sometimes is so strong that it becomes the rule. If we allow too many precedents, that will become the new rule.

I do not know if it is the mood of the House not to have statements by members. As a matter of fact, there may be some reform where we may have more statements by members. I do not want a long debate, but I would like to submit to you, Mr. Speaker, for your reflection and maybe for later comments that it may not be appropriate for members.

I would have liked to know there was such a statement where I would be asked for my consent. It is difficult on a moment's notice to give consent. This may be acceptable to all members, but what if it were to be divisive? What if members are not present and they need not be present—they could be in their offices—because nobody gave them notice of a very important matter that could be raised at that time where it is not customary now? I do not need and you do not need to be there for statements by members. It is the members who choose what they want to raise in the House. I am a defendant of more rights for the member. But when I am asked for my consent I would like to know before I give it what is going on, what are the implications.

In this case, I repeat that we all agree that we were happy for Madam lang for the great honour she has given Canada. That has nothing to do with the question I am raising, but I am using this opportunity to bring it to your attention, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): On the same point of order, Mr. Speaker. I agree with my hon. friend that what was accepted as a motion might better have been put under Standing Order 31.

I did not raise an objection on behalf of the government at the time that unanimous consent was sought, although to be strictly true about it and strictly accurate, there was not proper consultation on the matter. There was a letter circulated today by the hon. member, informing the government and others of the hon. member's intent and asking for co-operation. I do not think that constitutes consultation. However, consent was not withheld from this side because I think to have done so would have been small-minded.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, as House leader of the member who first initiated this particular request, I feel an obligation to reply. I do believe that my hon. friend has raised a very important point. Considering the nature of the request and the nature of the motion today, as he said, I do not think there is any difficulty. It is not something that we would find divisive in the House. Indeed, consultation perhaps left something to be desired. I asked the hon. member whose suggestion it was to ensure at least in writing that the appropriate House leaders would be apprised of this intent.

The case, however, still remains that there were many members presumably at the time who had not been informed, were not consulted, and consequently on another issue it could be very divisive and we find certain members not being able to respond with the enthusiasm that they would normally wish.

May I suggest that the point raised by my hon. friend be simply transferred to the House management committee and have it examine this. Again, I would not want to see this practice continued and made a routine during Routine Proceedings.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: I wish to thank the hon. member for Saint-Denis for raising a matter of the utmost importance for the procedure of this House.

I noticed that he mentioned the word precedent and the importance of precedents.

[English]

I know that members would allow me to share with all who are here this afternoon what Dean Swift, the famous English author, said of precedent over 200 years ago. He said this: "Lawyers are a race of men among us who believe that anything that has been done before may legally be done again". It seems to me that his comment is perhaps apposite for the discussion that is taking place.

On behalf of the hon. member for Edmonton East, I did receive a letter from him. He did circulate it to some people in the Chamber and I think his intention was to try to get the word around that he was going to move this motion. In the result the House acceded to it.

The difficulty comes when perhaps we might be on a much more divisive matter. That puts the Chair in a very difficult position. If the Chair allows members to use motions as they once used the old Order 43, as the hon. member for Saint-Denis has pointed out, I think we may be headed for some difficulty in the Chamber because some members might get up and say that given the fact that the orders were changed some years ago to deal with this very matter, it is not appropriate that the Chair allow motions to proceed as the motion did this afternoon.

I thank the hon. member for Kamloops for suggesting that the matter go to the House management committee. I certainly understand and thank the hon. member for Edmonton Southwest, the parliamentary secretary, for his comment and I think the House probably also appreciates it. I am sure the hon. member for Edmonton East appreciates the fact that the hon. member for Edmonton Southwest did not object to this particular motion this afternoon.

However, I would ask hon. members to keep in mind that on a more divisive matter, I think the Chair would be right in the middle of the crossfire. Therefore I accept the invitation of the hon. member for Kamloops. On behalf of hon. members who are here this afternoon I will write the appropriate letter to the House management committee referring this particular rule to the members of that committee.

I thank the hon. member for Saint-Denis.

BUDGET IMPLEMENTATION (GOVERNMENT ORGANIZATIONS) ACT 1992

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Mazankowski that Bill C-93, an Act to implement certain government organization provisions of the budget tabled in the House of Commons on February 25, 1992, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Economics envelope; and the amendment of Mrs. Finestone.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): When the debate was suspended the hon. member for Ottawa West had the floor.

[English]

You have 17 minutes left.

[Translation]

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to resume my comments on Bill C-93 and more specifically its impact on the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council.

• (1630)

[English]

We hear a great deal of rhetoric from the government concerning the management of change. I do not think anybody in the Chamber would dispute that the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council is an important part of that approach to the future.

We know that the world of the future—Canada's future economically—will depend particularly on developing the service and information sectors of our economy. That depends on the expansion of knowledge in all fields. It depends on us having a commitment to the expansion of knowledge in science and research and in all fields.

It includes having a commitment to the development of expertise in a variety of fields as well as retaining the expertise that we have—our brain power—and developing international links to ensure that that can happen. Canadians must be able to learn in Canada and do research in Canada, but be well plugged in to the international scientific community and continue to practice in Canada as well.

We have been through a period in this country—I go back to the sixties for my first experience of it—when we did not have expertise in a variety of domains and continually had to import expertise and knowledge from other countries.

Now, 30 years later, we are looking at a situation where many of the people who came to this country at this time to contribute their knowledge and talents to Canada are saying to their children, who are now interested in various fields of science as well: "If you want a future as a scientist, do not stay in Canada. Go somewhere else".

We have seen what has happened to the National Research Council. We have seen the abandonment of the Science Council. I want to put this in a context because the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council plays as important a role in the development of our future as the development of the physical sciences.

The move proposed by the government to put the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council under the Council for the Arts in Canada shows a very limited view of the important role of this council. That is not in any way to denigrate the role of the Council for the Arts in Canada because it plays an important role, but it is a different role.

The science and humanities are linked in a very important way to the physical sciences. The important direction or trend in the development of human knowledge is the integration of different fields of science.

As I began to say before Question Period, the kinds of issues that we need to face increasingly mean that technical advancement does not come without repercussions throughout society. The management of technological change is more than a question of physical sciences. It is also a question of changes to the individual in society, changes fundamentally to our economy and changes to our society in a collective sense.

The importance we are giving now to the environment is a good example. Managing the problems of global destruction are more than a question of science in the traditional sense or the physical sense. It is very clear that if we are going to avoid the terrible damage that we have seen in our atmosphere, water and soils, we need to address the social dynamics as well as the physical dynamics.

In the field of biomedical science, it is not a question simply of technical advances, it is a question of how those technical advances are used. It is a question of what changes those bring to society as a whole. We only have to look at the question of reproductive technology to know that it is more than issue of developing the technology. It is also important to look at the social and personal implications of those developments.

When we talk about the development in the physical sciences of the ability to manipulate the very matter by which life is formed we know that it is not enough to deal with that knowledge as a physical science. The social implications of that science are equally important.

When we talk about a changing world in which lifelong training and education are going to be necessary, we know that more attention to society and humanity and how we adapt to change is vital if Canada is going to profit from opportunities of the future without leaving our people behind. Adjustment brings with it more than dollar and business implications. It brings with it adjustment and turmoil.

We know we have a young generation that is facing more difficulty than previous generations in finding a place in that new economy. We know that we have a rising level of violence and racism. We know that whether we are going to be able to have the brains and talent we need to have in this country in the future depends on dealing with the issues of poverty. We know that we have an increasingly aging population that is going to require a different approach in many social policy areas.

We know that the future requires bringing many different fields of knowledge together and an increasing emphasis on the social and human implications of change. That is one of the important roles of the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council. It is to ensure that we are understanding change, not just from the narrow physical science point of view, but from the broader implications for society as a whole. We are dealing with the disruption and the change to society that comes from progress in science.

We know it is important to set new economic directions. When change is occurring so rapidly, it is no longer enough to react to change. We know it is important to develop links both ways between the social sciences and the arts, as well as between the social sciences and the physical sciences.

Submerging one council in the other deprives both of the recognition of the important role they play in Canadian society. That certainly deprives the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council of its ability to reach out to all fields of knowledge and to play the important role it should be playing as we plan our future.

Dealing with these issues requires leadership. It requires an understanding that the role of government is to provide that leadership. Instead we have seen the dismantling of the tools—in other bills that have come before us—by which that leadership has been provided. I have referred to the science council. I have referred to the economic council and the council for oceans development. We have lost a number of institutions that I believe are important for Canada to seize the opportunities the future offers.

Understanding government and knowing what government is doing is an important part of that. Regrettably, one of the members who spoke earlier displayed, I think, an abysmal lack of knowledge about how government works.

The member for South Shore said something like what is the point of "the entire Government of Canada being in Ottawa?" If members of the government do not know that over 70 per cent of government offices and employees are not in the national capital region, then I am not quite sure how they expect to govern the country. If these members do not know that over 70 per cent of the people who work for the Government of Canada are in centres throughout the country, then they clearly might have a little difficulty deciding how to govern better.

• (1640)

If the member does not know, for instance, that there are 18,000 employees in the Public Service in Halifax, 12,000 in Vancouver, 20,000 in the Montreal region and 9,000 in Edmonton, he obviously is clearly uninformed about how government is operating now. I would have trouble having confidence in his ability to improve it.

The second point I want to make is that in exercising leadership the government has talked a great deal about partnership and consultation. It is all rhetoric. We have not had, in this major reorganization, the means to develop the intellect of our country, which is certainly our most important capital for the new era.

There has been no consultation whatsoever with the scientific community on these changes. What does that say about the commitment to partnership and to consultation? It undermines totally everything the government has said it planned to do in its prosperity agenda that spoke a great deal about partnership and consultation. It spoke a great deal about the need for science, research and technology development, yet we see a major change in that field without any partnership and without any consultation.

We may or may not be seeing a cost savings in this. The government has admitted as much. I think it is rather arrogant for a government in the last few months—possibly even the last few weeks of a mandate—to reorganize the structures of government and the structures by which Canadians are served.

I want to take just a few minutes to speak about the Cape Breton Development Corporation, which is another of the bodies dealt with in this bill. As I see it, one of the key elements in our future is to develop the abilities of communities to meet their own future needs and to develop their own future certainly with the partnership and the support of their federal and provincial governments.

If we believe that communities know their own strengths, people and opportunities best, then to fold an important agency like the Cape Breton Development Corporation into a larger regional agency seems to me to be going in the wrong direction.

I wanted to particularly refer to a comment made by the Solicitor General in response to one of my colleagues speaking on this very issue. It was the member for Cape Breton Highlands—Canso who was talking about the rising unemployment and the serious economic situation in Cape Breton. I am sure that situation is even worse now with the problems in the steel industry. In response to that the Solicitor General said: "That is because they vote Liberal".

The idea that a region should be punished because of how it votes is something that goes back to the day after the 1988 election when a well-known member of this House chose to say that Ottawa was going to be punished for voting Liberal. This is a democracy. People have the right to vote how they want to vote and still be entitled to the support of their government. I found that comment so offensive that I did have to refer back to it.

We see a disregard for people in this bill. We have no idea. Some people are coming from the Public Service, some people are coming from one council and some people are staying with the new council to be formed. We have again the government operating a kind of shell game when it says it is getting rid of employees in the Public Service. It is not really. It is just moving them out of the Public Service and into another agency which will continue to be funded by public dollars. This kind of diversion and pretence really does not solve the problems of the country.

I also want to challenge the idea that bigger is necessarily better. Bigger agencies often just mean more levels of administration, reporting and accounting and not more productivity.

We have before us a poorly thought out bill. It was done with no consultation with those who are most directly affected and with the arrogance of a government that thinks it knows best for everybody and does not have to listen to anybody else.

We are abandoning a number of agencies that perform an increasingly important function as we face a changing future.

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister for Science and Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a few comments with regard to the remarks just made. It is important that we be practical about what is going to happen under the various headings that the hon. member covered.

First, in terms of the amalgamation of the Canada Council with the SSHRC it is important to remember that the new council that will be formed will remain at arm's length from the government. The council will have full latitude to plan and establish its priorities to fulfil its mandate. The merger will also not affect the amount of support delivered to the two client groups. There was some intimation that might happen. That will not happen.

Funding for each group remains clearly distinct and the peer-review system for each will be maintained. The mechanism to do all this is still under discussion, but it is important that I put those comments on the record.

There will be some savings. Clearly the council itself will be smaller and there will be some other savings which I hope the hon. member supports. Her leader speaks about decreasing the deficit but I still have not found out how they will do it. This is one action that helps in a small way.

More important, she gave the impression that the granting councils are somehow under special attack. The truth is that this government has probably spent more money on native issues and science and technology than almost any other category of the federal government jurisdiction. Even the 10 per cent cuts on grants and contributions announced in the last statement will not affect the granting councils.

The granting councils are not being affected by that 10 per cent cut. They went from four to zero but they will not be cut the whole 10 per cent, as is the rest of the government. This was our way of saying that this is a very special category.

It is also important because people lose track of this historically. Since we became the government in 1984 the research budget for the granting councils has increased 60 per cent. That is a huge increase given the tremendous fiscal pressures on the government.

It is important too, and this was not mentioned, that we remember that the Canada Scholarship Program has awarded over 12,500 scholarships valued at over $30 million to encourage students to study science at university. More than half of these have gone to women. We are providing more funds to the Industrial Research Assistance Program. We are permanently extending the networks of centres of excellence program which everybody salutes as a very good way to focus research.

There is also the Canadian Space Agency, drug research and the green plan. It is important to know what we have done to stimulate R and D spending through tax incentives. We are approving R and D tax incentives which will provide further R and D support of $230 million over the next five years. We are making it easier for Canadians to use federal science programs. Finally we have set aside $400 million to correct areas in which the tax system may slow the adoption of new technologies.

Science and technology are very important to this government. It is important that these points be made during this debate.

Mrs. Catterall: Mr. Speaker, I think the minister gives credence to my comments with some of the figures he has provided. For example, there is the 60 per cent increase since 1984. That is over a period of eight years and is less than the rate of inflation. That is an effective drop in spending power.

Second, the government's total commitment to science and research has declined not increased. I would not want the minister to leave an untrue impression with anybody by suggesting that it has increased. It is also really important that the minister is now saying that they are consulting on mechanisms. The time to consult is before one makes a mistake and not after.

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, does the hon. member know that the new minister of science and technology talked a great deal about his government's policies with respect to science and made claims about its scientific expenditure and so on?

I do not think that was really the issue raised by the hon. member. I thought the hon. member was trying to pursue the question that was not answered, which was: What is the logic, the justification for combining SSHRC with the Canada Council? Precisely, what will be the savings? Who asked for it? Whose idea was it? How do these justifications compare with the abundant arguments that were advanced in favour of the separation in the first place in 1978?

Answers to none of those questions were provided by the hon. minister. The reasons are likely clearly identified by the hon. member. The hon. minister does not know why.

Mrs. Catterall: Mr. Speaker, if I may quickly respond. I thank the member for putting very clearly the crux of the argument I made.

It is fine for the minister to stand up and say that this is going to save money. It would be rather interesting if any information might be presented to the House to demonstrate that. My experience is that when one reorganizes for the sake of reorganization one brings the work of an organization to a grinding halt and ends up spending a great deal of extra money, not saving money. If the minister or government has information to the contrary then it would be nice if it were tabled in the House.

There was a great deal of consultation in the mid to late 1970s which led to the establishment of a separate council responsible for social sciences and humanities research. That was done in broad consultation with all affected parties across this country. Now we have an arbitrary move by a government that wants to move for the sake of being seen to move. It has provided no justification whatsoever for this move.

[Translation]

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, first of all I would like to thank the hon. member for a most interesting speech.

[English]

It would seem to me that we need to stress again, and I wonder if my colleague would like to comment, that there has not been any deep reflection on this bill. The government is trying to suggest to Canadians that eight years after taking power it has finally realized that there were a number of agencies that needed to be sabrer.

Where are the dollar savings? Put them on the table. Show us concretely where the effectiveness will be realized. Why did the government not consult? Surely it should ask the people who will be affected. There are at least 15,000 social scientists in Canada. Why would they not be consulted? Could my colleague please comment?

Mrs. Catterall: Mr. Speaker, I thank the member for the question.

I will repeat what I said when I spoke about the abandonment of the Economic Council of Canada, the Science Council of Canada, the International Centre for Ocean Development and a number of others. I repeat it for this council but in a slightly different way.

The government seems to have trouble with any body that provides impartial or objective assessment of priorities and spending in this country.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The first five hours of debate on the bill have now expired.

[Translation]

As of now, there will be a 10-minute maximum for all speeches, without questions and comments.

[English]

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, thank you for this opportunity to speak on Bill C-93, which is the Budget Implementation (Government Organizations) Act, 1992. It gives force to a number of mergers and in some instances the elimination of various bodies, as announced in the February budget of last year.

Many of the windings up and mergers are unexceptionable. They include the winding up of the Agricultural Products Board, and the merging of Enterprise Cape Breton with ACOA. That is probably a reasonable thing to do, although we should be cognizant of the comments made earlier by another hon. member arguing that at least Enterprise Cape Breton had the merit of being local in its focus. There should be some effort even under ACOA and the other regional development agencies to ensure that there is local input and some degree of control over economic strategy in their regions.

It also merges the Canadian Commercial Corporation with the Department of Supply and Services. Emergency Preparedness Canada merges with the Department of National Defence. The Copyright Board, the Trademarks Opposition Board and the Patent Appeal Board are merged. The Procurement Review Board is merged with the Canadian International Trade Tribunal. The Petroleum Monitoring Agency's functions are taken over by the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources. The Veterans Land Administration's functions go to the Department of Veterans Affairs.

There are two changes which should raise some questions. The first is the merger of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police External Review Committee with the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Public Complaints Commission. The first of these two bodies deals with grievances and appeals by officers and the second deals with complaints by citizens about bad behaviour or other difficulties with the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

It is obvious that there is a significant conflict of functions involved in merging these two bodies, which I do not see justified in the arguments of the government for bringing about this change. This issue was cited by my colleague from North Island—Powell River. He highlighted the importance of the Public Complaints Commission in dealing with situations which although not common are all too common for the victims of those occasional instances of inappropriate actions on the part of the members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

Nevertheless, most of these changes are either provided with some justification in terms of functions or in terms of cost. One might find that almost all of these changes, with the exceptions I have noted, could be justified to reasonable people. However, that does not apply to Part III, which was described in the budget as a merger of the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council with the Canada Council.

Nobody asked for it. There is no justification provided for it. No explanations have been presented to justify it. We heard the minister of science and technology dance all over a justification for it. He suggested that there might be some savings but provided no specifics of what the savings might be.

• (1700)

In fact just about everyone who has any interest in the issue at all very quickly indicated their opposition to this change. They expressed their shock that the government would initiate such a change without any consultation whatever and remain mystified to this day as to why the government would embark on this peculiar little exercise of merging a body that has to do with the support of research in academic institutions in the fields of social sciences and humanities with the Canada Council, which has to do with the support of creative and performing arts in this country.

It took a long time but culminating in 1978, after considerable evolution of the research enterprise in the social sciences and humanities in the universities, we arrived at the conclusion that the activities then included under the Canada Council should be separated to form the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council. This took place at a time when the National Science and Engineering Research Council and the Medical Research Council were separated from the NRC. Everybody with an ounce of sense thought it was a reasonable change. It was a change that resulted in a development that has been successful ever since.

These folks in their reasoning, as usual shallow as a mud puddle, jumped up with an idea that they were going to save some change. It comes down very simply to a manifestation of the substantially anti-intellectual bent of this government in a time when knowledge has become more important than it ever has been in history. It must be opposed to knowledge because ignorance seems to motivate almost everything it has done in recent weeks and months.

We have opposition from the Canadian Association of University Teachers, the Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada, the Association of Canadian College and University Teachers of English, the National Consortium, the Canadian Federation for the Humanities and the Conference on the Arts. Everybody is opposed to this legislation.

Given that the government cannot in this instance, as in any other instance, be stopped in its momentum for stupidity, these various bodies have said we should try and make this legislation work somehow. One of things they noticed was that right off the bat, after reassuring the academic and arts community that the two separate identities of function would not be lost, that in fact the two would be merged, what we have in the title of the bill and the fact of the bill is in effect a subsuming of social sciences and humanities research under the Canada Council. Even the name of the new council suggests that. As you will note, the new name of this body would be the Canada council on the arts and so on, which means that just about anybody referring to it will be talking about the Canada Council as other activities will be lost in a name which will obscure this separate function.

The associations have suggested at the very least that this government rewrite the bill, not so that SSHRC is merged with the Canada Council, but the two bodies be merged together in a new unit that would not have reference to the Canada Council as the adopting agency. Rather it would give equal status to both in the name of a new agency which would not be shortened to obscure its functions.

The associations also raised the issue of the structure of the governing council.

The minister of science and technology said that the functions will continue and will be at arm's length, and all of that. First of all we have to look at who is going to go on the council of this new organization. Substantially all they have to do is have some familiarity or understanding of the activities in which the council is going to be engaged in order to be on the governing council.

There is no requirement that there be any specific number who understand research in the humanities and the social sciences, nor that they have specific experience or any reputation in the arts, or have any knowledge of the international activities of external affairs in any specific way. We suggest it should be necessary if it is going to be protected from government interference, because now we have a body that is just set up for government patronage. That is the way it is going to be.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to have an opportunity to speak on Bill C-93, legislation that was tabled in the House on February 25, 1992.

Quite frankly, the first day back after being away from the House of Commons for almost two months I find debating a bill which has to do with machinery of government so depressing. For me it does not have a heck of a lot to do with the real deep pain that is out there in the economy today.

As I was reviewing the bill I noticed in Part IV, which has to do with the Canadian Commercial Corporation, that we are moving it from the minister of industry and trade over to the Department of Supply and Services.

For those Canadians who are not aware of the Canadian Commercial Corporation, I would like to give a little bit of a backgrounder. This is a Crown corporation that assists Canadian companies in their efforts and in their ability to do medium and large international contracts. Most of them are defence related, but not exclusively. It helps small Canadian companies which do not have the ability to do some of these contracts on their own. The Canadian Commercial Corporation will come in and provide the stability and sometimes financial support, sometimes even management advice.

I am particularly interested in this agency of the government. I find it does not really matter where a piece of government machinery is located. What I mean by located is whether it is under the minister of industry or the Minister of Supply and Services, or if it is linked to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, wherever it is. It does not really matter what its location, what really matters is the attitude of the public servants to their job functions, their attitude in terms of service to the public.

We on this side of the House are not really adverse to reviewing government operations to try and streamline them from time to time. It is a normal activity. However I do not understand moving them for the sake of moving them.

In the case of the Canadian Commercial Corporation, I am really concerned that by moving it from one minister to another we are creating a situation which I am not convinced is going to improve the efficiency. In fact I had a personal case where I found just the exact opposite.

• (1710)

I have in my riding a group of doctors who invested in a Canadian corporation based in Woodstock, Ontario. The name of the corporation is Amertek. This corporation won a military contract with the United States to produce military fire trucks. The contract was for close to 300 of them. Many of these fire trucks actually served in the Persian Gulf. They outbid the American firm Oshkosh which is an internationally recognized firm. Amertek is 100 per cent Canadian owned and 90 per cent of its product is exports, the kind of company that this government is always bragging about.

In the course of doing the contract the U.S. military came in and made close to 3,000 design changes. They went from a Chevrolet to a Cadillac in terms of military fire trucks. In fact these fire trucks are so good that there is one of them stationed at Camp David and another stationed at the White House in Washington.

This is what happened. These small entrepreneurs, because they had faith in the Canadian Commercial Corporation, did all of these extras and they have been waiting for two and a half years for the Canadian Commercial Corporation to process their extras.

Four years ago this company had close to $7 million in retained earnings. All of those retained earnings have been depleted. The investors put another $2.5 million to $3 million into the company. Now this company is having a very difficult time making it from payroll to payroll. Meanwhile there is close to $15 million worth of extras that are owed to them by the U.S. military.

My point is this. Here is an example where the will of the Public Service and the political will have really looked the other way when it comes to serving this small or medium sized enterprise. This is what bothers me about a debate like today's. It does not really matter where the Canadian Commercial Corporation is in terms of machinery of government. What we should be weaving into this debate and what we should be talking about is public service, the attitude of the public servants toward this small or medium sized company.

I am concerned about the fact that bureaucrats sometimes make these machinery of government changes and we as politicians are sold on them as being essential for efficiency, when in fact quite often they have nothing to do with efficiency.

Mr. Speaker, you are signalling that I only have a couple of minutes left. I think the biggest danger when we make these changes is that we get involved in a system which I call the MAD treatment, maximum administrative delay.

Entrepreneurs who want to deal with government, who want support of government and then get involved in a contract cannot figure out why it takes months and months in order to get the proper response.

I appeal to the government, to all members over there and the minister responsible for the Canadian Commercial Corporation. If they really do believe that this bill is going to make the Canadian Commercial Corporation a streamlined, more productive unit, one that is supposed to serve the public, then I challenge them to pick up the file on Amertek on certification which has been sitting for almost two years.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I was actually anticipating that one of my colleagues to my right might get up at this point in the proceedings. I hope you will forgive me if I am not as quick on my feet as you might have hoped.

I am pleased to participate in this debate and I want to deal with a very specific area in the act. As we have already heard the act deals with many different boards and tribunals in government.

The one I wish to address is Emergency Preparedness Canada which was established I believe in 1987 to deal with emergency preparedness.

On the surface the act is a very simple provision in respect of Emergency Preparedness Canada. It simply winds it up and turns over its functions directly to the Department of National Defence. At this point Emergency Preparedness Canada comes under the general responsibility of the Minister of National Defence. Therefore, the ultimate responsibility has not changed and does not change as a result of this act.

The act does end an experiment, if we can call it that, a decision made by this Parliament after very significant thought in the early 1980s. There was considerable review of emergency preparedness in this country and the legislation pertaining to it. As a result of that consideration Parliament passed the Emergency Preparedness Act and established Emergency Preparedness Canada.

That decision is effectively being wiped out by this legislation. As far as I can tell it has done so without any public discussion or debate, without any reasons being advanced by the government for this change other than a cosmetic one to help the government politically respond to what it sees as a challenge from the Reform Party. I think the government owes it to the people of Canada and to this Parliament to explain its decision in this area far more carefully than it has.

I say that as the member for Victoria from Vancouver Island, where we have a very special concern and interest in emergency preparedness and particularly the risks and dangers to our area from earthquakes.

I wish to use this opportunity to refer the House and the people of Canada to the most recent report of the Auditor General. The report suggests that this government and therefore the Minister of National Defence who is responsible have been nothing short of grossly negligent in their responsibilities for emergency preparedness.

It is only by good luck that we have not yet had a major earthquake disaster on the west coast of Canada. The situation is that this government has left the people of that area bereft of emergency services that could effectively deal with such a catastrophe.

Emergency preparedness is the responsibility of all three levels of government and the municipal governments in our area have struggled to develop a response within their areas of jurisdiction. The Government of British Columbia is seeking to deal with it as well. However, as the Auditor General reveals the federal government has just delayed and delayed and delayed in getting to the heart of emergency preparedness to deal with the potential catastrophe of an earthquake on the west coast. We have seen five years pass as the Auditor General states it in which the government at a snail's pace has moved toward a national earthquake support plan.

• (1720)

On page 567 of the Auditor General's report he notes: "We found that general long-standing problems in federal emergency planning were not being addressed within a reasonable timeframe". Five years after the Auditor General raised the issue in 1987, part two of a national earthquake support plan is still being worked on.

The Auditor General concludes: "In our opinion the delays are the result of several factors including interdepartmental jurisdictional disputes, allocation of resources to other priorities, the complexity of co-ordinating plans with the provinces and a lack of sense of urgency perhaps due to the absence of a recent major disaster in Canada".

It is to the shame of this government and to the ministers responsible, in this case the successive Ministers of National Defence, that we are still not ready to face the consequence of a major earthquake disaster on the west coast.

I call on the government to take the necessary leadership, not to wait until we have a disaster, but in fact to act now. Give those responsible the necessary resources to move so that a potential disaster can be met.

The Auditor General's report again notes that the Geological Survey of Canada, which is part of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources, has indicated that it feels a compelling requirement to determine if there is evidence to indicate that earthquake catastrophes could take place in the immediate future on Vancouver Island. There are ways to test the chances of an earthquake happening in this area in the immediate future. However, the Auditor General says: "The GSC states it has limited funds for these and related projects".

Now this government can find funds for cold war military hardware and equipment. It can find funds for helicopters designed to deal with the cold war which is over and to hunt submarines which are no longer a threat to our security. But it cannot find the funds according to the Auditor General to deal with a real threat to the lives of hundreds of thousands of people on the west coast of Canada.

I ask the government as it puts through this so-called housekeeping legislation to take its responsibilities seriously and to hear what is being said by the Auditor General and by the people of our area before it is too late. The warning has been sounded. I ask the government to respond.

Mr. David Berger (Saint-Henri—Westmount): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address the aspects of this bill which relate to the merger of the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council and the Canada Council.

The bill would wind up SSHRC as it is known, the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council, and transfer its programs to the Canada Council. This change was announced in the February 1992 budget without any prior consultation or public study of the matter. It came as a complete surprise and shock to the communities concerned. It is important to note that both the artistic and research communities are opposed to this proposal.

To briefly review the history, in 1978 after much consultation and study the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council was established. The activities relating to research in the social sciences and humanities which were previously conducted under the auspices of the Canada Council were transferred to an independent agency. At the time, this move recognized the growing importance of social sciences and humanities research to Canada's over-all science and economic effort and gave social sciences and humanities research the needed autonomy and profile.

It is important to mention some of the disciplines covered by the social sciences. They include: economics, political science, psychology, sociology, history, law, management, education, journalism, demography, science policy and the study of languages.

We spend a great deal of time reflecting on what we have to do as a country to improve our economic circumstances and to compete in fiercely competitive world markets. One of the factors for which the Japanese have known such important economic success is the quality circle. This was not invented by an engineer or by a scientist, but by a social scientist, a professor of management. It is an indication that innovations which take place in our economy do not come solely from the fields of the natural sciences and engineering.

The government has said that the interests of the artistic and research communities will be protected. The government has not convinced the communities concerned by this bill. Despite assurances, they remain opposed.

I have received perhaps 100 letters from different groups from across Canada including: the University of Ottawa, the school of graduate research; the University of Montreal, the law faculty, the geography department, the education department; Laval, the department of political science; the University of Winnipeg, the vice-president of academics; Acadia University, the department of political science; the University of Western Ontario, the department of anthropology.

Thousands of researchers across the country are opposed to this legislation. They remain opposed to it despite the assurances the government has provided. I would like to read into the record excerpts from the letters I have received.

[Translation]

The Department of Education of the University of Montreal: "For researchers in education, complex problems such as illiteracy, dropping out of school and multi-ethnic schools require increased funding beyond present levels. We are concerned that the administrative restructuring which has taken place may cause the funding community to lose interest in subsidizing academic research in the human sciences and thus reduce the support required to ensure continuity". This letter is from the vice-principal of graduate studies and research at the University of Montreal.

From Laval University, at the department of school administration and policy, the department's director, Mr. Jean Moisset, wrote to Mr. Ricard, chairman of the Standing Committee of the House of Commons on Industry, Science and Technology, last March. He said: "I was astonished and extremely disturbed to hear about the planned amalgamation of the Humanities Research Council with the Canada Council".

• (1730)

He went on to say: "It is surprising, to say the least, that one should have chosen this crucial time in our history, marked by so many serious educational, socio-economic and political problems, to attempt to remove from the social sciences sector one of the most reliable expressions of its specific identity and one of its driving forces: its Research Council".

As I said before, I could quote from hundreds of similar letters.

[English]

While the two communities remain opposed, as I have indicated, the research community represented by the Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada and the artistic community represented by the Canadian Conference of the Arts have developed a compromise position.

Again, their first wish is that this bill would be withdrawn. In their letter of December 7 to the Minister of Communications, signed by representatives of both of these organizations, they state: "We would prefer that the government not proceed with Part III of Bill C-92 at this time".

However, if the government is determined to do so, they ask for a number of amendments. First, they would repeal the Canada Council Act and create a new agency to be known as the Canada Council for the Arts and for Research in the Social Sciences and Humanities. The second amendment which I would like to quote is that a person would not be eligible to be appointed as a member of the new council if the person does not have the knowledge or experience that will assist the council in fulfilling one of its functions.

These are just two of a number of amendments that have been forwarded to the Minister of Communications.

To this date there has been no formal response from the government, but I would certainly hope that in committee the government would study this proposal seriously and indeed accept it, if the government is not prepared to come to its senses and just do away with this ill-advised merger.

I would like to conclude in noting that we are often told that budgetary factors are at the source of a change of this nature. Again, the government has really provided no evidence that there are going to be any substantial savings as a result of this merger. On the contrary, it seems that the damage that will be created by the harm to two agencies which have well represented their respective communities could exceed any benefits that have been suggested by the government.

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, Bill C-93 has been placed before us today under the pretext of saving money and consolidating efforts. It is the old cliche: the bigger you make things the better they are. The fact is that the bigger you make them the more you lose control of what is going on.

Bill C-93 provides for the termination of certain government bodies or the merging of certain government organizations into other government bodies. By the time this Parliament is over, this government will have the management areas of the Public Service of Canada so mixed up no one will know where they are going.

I want to take a case in point. On the Emergency Preparedness Canada organization set up by the hon. member from the Wellington area when he was Minister of National Defence, he brought the bill to set up Emergency Preparedness Canada into this House with all the fanfare of the greatest thing we have seen since sliced bread.

It was a good idea. It has been a good organization in the sense that the people in Emergency Preparedness Canada are dedicated to that organization. What do they do? They train people from all across the country on safety and how to handle emergency situations of all kinds. They have operated as effectively and thoroughly as they could with very little money put in to back them up on the most important objective that any national government could put into effect, that of trying to create co-ordinated emergency measures organizations across this country.

When presenting the budget of February 25, the Minister of Finance announced on that date that Emergency Preparedness Canada would be taken out of its own single operation and would become part of the Department of National Defence. Again, Mr. Speaker, you had this great birth of Emergency Preparedness Canada with some outstanding people working in it. Their single objective was to run classes for municipalities all over this country. They brought in business corporations and taught them how to handle emergencies. They brought in provincial departments, federal departments and all kinds of agencies and ran Emergency Preparedness Canada and how to handle emergencies of all kinds.

Examples of some of the things that they were doing were Canada's emergency response system: who is responsible, taking some of the bedlam out of the organization when emergencies occur, family emergency preparedness, municipal emergency preparedness, the federal role in emergency preparedness, disaster financial assistance arrangements, emergency response and business resumption planning, emergency food and water pack, essentials of life, blueprint for major catastrophes, what the Government of Canada has done to be prepared for a catastrophic earthquake, earthquake preparedness, people with disabilities, earthquake check list, forest fires, floods. We have it all. They have been doing a fantastic job.

The Auditor General of Canada was absolutely correct in his report when he said that here we have a Government of Canada that set up this agency to do a job and then walked away from it and left it with very little to do that job. Now it is turning around and putting it into the Department of National Defence. The Department of National Defence is certainly a very favourite department of mine in government. The Department of National Defence has all kinds of duties of its own to perform and it wants to perform them well: peacekeeping, their own training programs.

It is called into emergencies of all kinds and it can play a very effective role in backing up Emergency Preparedness Canada, but what is the guarantee that Emergency Preparedness Canada is going to be given any higher profile within the Department of National Defence than it now has when it is standing on its own?

• (1740)

There is no question whatsoever but that Emergency Preparedness Canada should be left alone, left where it is now, because it has the authority and the ability to co-ordinate with all government departments, the ability to co-ordinate with the provinces and with municipalities and whatever. It should be left alone. In the interests of the safety of the Canadian people all over this country, it should be given the resources and the facilities to do its job well so that every municipality, every province, all departments of government—federally and provincially—and the territories will know where they are going when an emergency occurs because there will be a co-ordinated plan and because you will have people in that organization who have been trained in that region of Canada by Emergency Preparedness Canada to do the job when those emergencies occur.

The previous Minister of National Defence, and I say this with some regret, spent more time looking around the country for another location for the training centre of Emergency Preparedness Canada, which is presently located in Arnprior, Ontario, than he spent on trying to support the organization itself.

There is no question but that we should vote against this bill because Emergency Preparedness Canada is one of the greatest things that has happened here. The Minister of National Defence at the time, the hon. member for Wellington and about three other counties, I cannot name them offhand right now, came in here with great enthusiasm and he got co-operation from the opposition at the time to set up Emergency Preparedness Canada. We have some very, very fine public servants in that organization who are capable and have indeed proven that they are capable of working with municipalities, corporations, business organizations, provincial departments, federal departments and organizations in the training process.

What would happen today if there were a serious earthquake in Canada? Everybody would be wringing their hands and saying isn't this terrible and so on, and it would be. What would be even more terrible would be that the Government of Canada would not be able to play a major role because it is not financing the very agency which it set up to handle such training for those people, namely Emergency Preparedness Canada.

If you are going to set something up and brag about it, for heaven's sake give it a chance to do the job. That is another terminology that was thrown out at the time: We are going to set up this agency to train the people across the country in emergencies; everybody is going to know how to handle emergencies, and we are going to give them the tools to do the job.

How often have we heard the Prime Minister use this very expression: "We are going to give the people the tools to do the job"? I have been very close to the Auditor General. I piloted this bill through the House setting up Emergency Preparedness Canada for the opposition, and we co-operated very closely in setting it up because it was something good for the country. But it is only good if it is allowed to work.

I think it is a disgrace today for the government to be taking Emergency Preparedness Canada out of its own element where it can zero in and do things entirely on its own and put it in a larger government department where we do not know what kind of priority is going to be given to it. As an agency it still has the right to call upon all departments and the total forces of the Department of National Defence to help it out in times of emergency.

I am going to close on that. I wanted to say a word about the Canadian Commercial Corporation and its tremendous job but I do not have the time.

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I would also like to contribute to this debate. Given that time is short, my intervention will be likewise.

My community also has some concerns about this particular Bill C-93. The community in my riding has been informed that the existing programs under SSHRC, the budget and administrative personnel will remain intact under the new council, although the organization's function and funding of the new agency are undefined in this legislation. Therefore, our community in Hamilton—in particular McMaster University—says that the preservation of the research budget, a fair and balanced representation on the council and the provision of strong, progressive leadership with a commitment to a consultative process are key issues. The operative word is consultative.

If it is the government's objective to more effectively serve the Canadian people, as members opposite have so often repeated throughout this day, then I want to put on the record the concerns of the vice-president of research at McMaster University, Mr. Ron F. Childs. He writes:

"(1) We would urge that the budget for the research and scholarship activities of the humanities and social sciences community not only be protected, but more importantly, that it continues to grow relative to the funding for the Medical Research Council and the Natural Sciences and Engineering Research Council.

(2) We would urge that humanities and social scientists be adequately represented on the council with the appointment of internationally recognized active researchers.

(3) We would urge that great care be taken in appointing a president of the new council. The president of the council must provide leadership that unites and builds on the common interests of the arts and research communities. The result of the government's decision on the dissolution of SSHRC and the creation of a new agency has created an unsettling environment upon which the future of the arts and research communities must be built".

In conclusion, Mr. Childs writes in his letter that the decisions reached on this issue will determine the direction, health and stature of the research community in the university sector.

I cannot stand here in the House and speak highly enough about the great achievements at McMaster University in Hamilton.

Mr. Speaker, with your permission I would like to split my 10-minute time with my colleague from Ottawa Centre who would also like to make a brief intervention before this period is over.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, along the same lines as my colleague from Hamilton West, I also have received a number of representations from the University of Ottawa as well as Carleton University and from a third university in my riding, Saint Paul University. Professors from those universities have indicated their concerns about the manner in which the government has proceeded with this part of the act.

In fact, this is not the first time we have seen something like this. Both councils were joined together in 1978. Through proper consultation in 1978, the two were separated. The councils for the arts and for social sciences and humanities each served different purposes even though they are both in the field of education.

I have been told that no proper consultation has taken place and that is a concern. One would wonder why the government would not have spent a little time in order to deal with the concerns of both councils. As it is, the research in SSHRC over the past three years has been subjected to a lot of pressure by the government when it came to their budget allocation.

• (1750)

By itself, that is a big load to carry on its own. Now that both councils are combined, they are going to see even more pressures on them when it comes to budget allocations and when it comes to the representation on this new council.

For the benefit of everybody, including those who are in the industry in the educational field, maybe the government should defer that part of the act until such a time as proper consultations have taken place. The membership is in excess of 14,000 across Canada. The representative of that membership is telling us that the government has not properly consulted them and taken their concerns into consideration. It has not really reflected on their wishes. One would say that the government has done something wrong. It should defer its decisions on this matter.

I wanted to say this positively. I do not want to sound as being on the negative side of things. The government will do the right thing by deferring this part of the act because the Liberal Party has gone on the record as opposing the marriage between those two councils. It is not because we do not like streamlining, but basically we believe that those two councils serve different purposes even though both of them are in the field of education.

To that extent I would like to call upon the government for the deferral of this part of the act.

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, we have before us another example of the government making a policy decision which has the potential to have a major impact on Canada's ability to compete in the world and to function effectively as a society without any consultation at all with the appropriate groups.

This is a wide-ranging piece of legislation making large numbers of changes in structure. It brings together organizations whose interests are not necessarily the same. It puts them into larger groups rather than diffusing power and decision making in our society and making sure that decisions are made close to where they are going to be implemented and where those people who are making those decisions have the best, most up-to-date knowledge of the situations which are being addressed. Rather than bringing decision making to the communities, the government is centralizing decision making and indeed creating entities which do not very well fit together.

I would like to refer to two of these in the context of my remarks to point out how inappropriate this approach is in dealing with organizations for which the government is responsible. I will comment on the suggestion in this legislation that the Canada Council and the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council deal together as one. I will also comment on the proposal which would link the Cape Breton Development Corporation with ACOA.

Neither of these are wise moves. Neither of them will give rise to any benefits to the communities they serve. If the government's only response is that it wants to save money in this consolidation process, that may be possible, but we will not have more effective decision making and more effective organizations in Canada.

A critical point which has been raised is that there has been no consultation at all with the affected groups prior to the implementation of this legislation. There was no consultation prior to the finance minister's statement. In particular, with regard to Canada Council and the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council, this will be reversing a decision which took place 14 years ago to separate these two organizations precisely because one organization representing some 200,000 artists in Canada and the other organization representing social sciences and humanities research in almost 100 universities and colleges did not fit and work together.

The decision to split them up was carried out after much consultation and was well received by the communities themselves. Both of those communities are opposed to the amalgamation of these two quite different organizations. One deals with funding support for the arts and the other deals with funding support for social sciences and humanities. Neither of these will be well served by the amalgamation of them.

One thing we should always worry about with this government is whether or not this amalgamation is the beginning of restrictions on funding available to the organization. If this merger were to go through we would have artists, social scientists and those in the humanities making decisions over where funding dollars might go, where research dollars might go and where support dollars might go.

As was recognized some 14 years ago, there is no clear link between the arts on the one hand and social sciences and humanities on the other such that would make an organization like this work effectively. There was no consultation. It does not make sense. It is not going to give rise to appropriate concentration on the issues which are faced by both the arts and the social sciences and humanities.

As the constituencies have indicated, the most effective situation and the best solution here would be to scrap the suggestion for a merger between the Canada Council and the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council and leave them as they are.

The other merger I would like to deal with is that which will affect most deeply Cape Breton. There has not been a great deal of success in the organizations which have had the objective of generating jobs in Cape Breton. The Nova Scotia economy in general and the Cape Breton economy in particular have never really recovered from the 1981 recession. That happens also to be the case for most of the regions of Canada and certainly it applies to my province also. For example jobs in the goods producing industries in 1982 were about 87,000 in Nova Scotia. They rose to 101,000 in 1988 prior to the implementation of the free trade agreement and the ever stronger enforcement of this government's economic strategies when they fell to 86,000 in 1991; a loss of 15,000 jobs in goods producing industries in Nova Scotia.

In particular, personal income in Cape Breton was about 84 per cent of the Nova Scotia average and 68 per cent of the Canadian average. Averages have been falling in Cape Breton and Nova Scotia for much of the last decade.

Therefore the approach that this government has taken with regard to the economy in Cape Breton has not worked, neither has it worked with regard to the wider application of ACOA.

However nothing good can be served by joining these organizations together, by making them bigger and by moving the decision-making away from Cape Breton and putting it into the context of the whole of Atlantic Canada.

Once again there was no consultation. Once again this is not something that will benefit Cape Breton, the economy of Atlantic Canada or the economy and society of Canada. Those are just two examples in which there was no consultation and in which bigger bodies are being created when we should be really thinking about spreading the decision-making around.

As is so much of the case with this government's decision-making, this is wrong-headed. It will not help. It will make matters worse. The only effective thing to do with this legislation is to vote against it.

CANADIAN NATO PARLIAMENTARY ASSOCIATION

NAA ANNUAL SESSION

Mr. Bob Hicks (Scarborough East): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 34 I have the honour to present to the House, in both official languages, the 17th report of the Canadian NATO Parliamentary Association concerning the NAA annual session which was held in Bruges, Belgium, November 15 to 20, 1992.

I do not know whether anyone ever reads these reports. May I commend them to everyone listening and watching so that they can get some idea of the tremendous work that is done by these delegations, especially the Canadian NATO Parliamentary Association.

PETITIONS

ARMENIAN PEOPLE

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour and the pleasure to present a petition that the Quebec National Assembly has already passed recognizing the importance of April 24 as the anniversary of the Armenian genocide.

The petitioners call upon Parliament to urge the government to offer its sympathy to the Armenian people, especially to Canadian Armenians who survived the genocide of April 24, 1915, and support the international lobbying efforts aimed at compelling the Turkish government to recognize and acknowledge the events of April 24, 1915.

CHILD POVERTY

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, I have the privilege and honour to present a petition calling for the elimination of child poverty by the year 2000.

This petition is signed by a number of people in the province of Ontario, particularly in the city of Mississauga. It calls upon the government to make sure that its commitment of November 24, 1989 is complied with and that the government does everything in its power to work exclusively for the elimination of child poverty.

REQUEST FOR ELIMINATION OF VIOLENCE IN OUR SOCIETY

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I wish to table a petition from the Malartic School Board in Abitibi stating that films that portray violence on television are dangerous and should not be tolerated because they make violence seem desirable.

The petition says that toys that are an incentive to violent games are unacceptable and their manufacture should be banned. The petition also points out that when acts of violence are reported, freedom of the press should be restricted, and that the repeated reporting of acts of violence on TV channels and on radio may lead to further, identical acts of violence.

Consequently your petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to legislate a remedy to this problem in order to wipe out violence in our society and thus protect our children and provide all citizens with a better quality of life.

[English]

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, this first petition is a request from citizens that the GST on books and other reading materials be removed. They point out that Canada has had a zero tax on these particular items since its beginning.

They also underline that reading, literacy and education are cornerstones of democracy and make a major contribution to the increase of productivity, effectiveness and efficiency in our nation.

They ask the government to review its policies and remove this tax.

BROADCASTING

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I have another petition. The petitioners request that the Parliament of Canada be very vigilant in ensuring that the CRTC carefully regulates the use of foul language on radio and television.

They indicate that many of their efforts as parents are counteracted by what happens on radio and television. They also underline that it is not necessary to use this kind of language in order to inform or to entertain.

BILL C-93

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Finally, Mr. Speaker, I have a petition from social scientists in Nova Scotia and Newfoundland who are upset, which is perhaps the right way of saying it, with the government's impending decision to merge the SSHRC with the Canada Council.

The petitioners point out that our greatest challenges today are social problems that could be addressed by social scientists. They point out there was no consultation and that the system has worked well since its very beginning. They believe it is a step backward.

They ask that this decision be deferred until consultation takes place.

CHILD POVERTY

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to present a petition today signed by numerous residents of my riding of Kingston and the Islands, and some residents in Ottawa and Nepean, Ontario.

These Canadians are concerned about the failure of the government to take any steps to eliminate child poverty in Canada. They call upon Parliament to reaffirm and keep its commitment to seek the elimination of poverty among children by the year 2000 and to develop a plan for the implementation of this commitment.

I am sure they join millions of other Canadians in wishing there was an election so they could elect a government which would implement this and present a plan to Parliament to eliminate child poverty by the year 2000 in accordance with the expressed wishes of this House. Unfortunately the current government seems bent on doing nothing and, frankly, as it comes to the end of its mandate, it ought to get out of office and call an election at once.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased today to present a petition pursuant to Standing Order 36. The petition is being presented on behalf of my colleague, the hon. member for Kamloops, and includes the signatures of many residents of Iroquois Falls, Ontario.

The petitioners point out that the goods and services tax is an unfair form of taxation and the they call upon members of Parliament, the Government of Canada and the House of Commons to reject the current goods and services tax and reform the taxation system so that there is an effective minimum tax on wealthy individuals and corporations.

VIOLENCE AGAINST WOMEN AND CHILDREN

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour and privilege of presenting a petition primarily from the parishioners of the St. John's Presbyterian Church in Windsor outlining their concern about violence against women and children.

They ask Parliament to accept legislation designed to eliminate that violence which, as we all know in this society, is most invidious. They pray that Parliament will act to resolve this problem.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Ron Fisher (Saskatoon—Dundurn): Mr. Speaker, it is an honour and a privilege to present several petitions, all on the goods and services tax, from residents in Saskatoon and in Ontario.

The petitioners point out that the goods and services tax is a particularly unfair tax because it puts an undue burden on those who are less able to pay. They call upon Parliament to reject the current goods and services tax and reform the taxation system so that there is an effective minimum tax on the wealthy and corporations.

KILLER CARDS

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, I rise to present a number of petitions from constituents in my riding of Haldimand—Norfolk dealing with the sale and manufacture of killer cards.

The petitioners want the laws of Canada amended to stop the importation of these cards and to let the distributors of these cards in Canada know they will not be tolerated in this country.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I rise to present a number of petitions pursuant to Standing Order 36.

The first set of petitions deals with the goods and services tax, an issue which is still very much in the minds of the people of Canada.

These petitions are signed by people from all across Canada but interestingly many from the Oshawa area, formerly represented by Mr. Broadbent and at present ably represented in this House by one of my colleagues. The petition calls for a rejection of the goods and services tax and the reform of the tax system in Canada.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, the second set of petitions were gathered on behalf of the member for Burnaby—Kingsway who has been an advocate for many years for changes in the Canadian Human Rights Act.

These petitions call for an amendment to the Canadian Human Rights Act to add sexual orientation. As the House will know, a bill has been introduced but the government has still not given any sign of proceeding with it. I would hope this House will listen to the prayers of these petitioners and encourage the government to proceed forthwith with this legislation.

[Translation]

ARMENIAN GENOCIDE

Hon. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour and the privilege to table a petition that has been certified correct as to form and content.

It was submitted and signed by Canadian citizens of Armenian origin who remind us that the Quebec National Assembly tabled a similar motion recognizing the importance of the anniversary of the Armenian genocide. I therefore wish to join my colleague from Saint-Laurent—Cartierville, who is actively involved in these issues, as well as several other members but mainly the hon. member for Saint-Laurent—Cartierville, who represents a large segment of this group, as I do, but she is still the leader.

These people have been residents of Canada all their lives, have contributed to Canadian society and earnestly hope that Parliament will continue to express its sympathy to the Armenian people in recognition of what they suffered during the genocide that took place on April 24, 1915, and that Parliament will support international pressures on the Turkish government to recognize as factual the terrible events of April 24, 1915.

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C–98, an act to provide additional borrowing authority for the fiscal year beginning on April 1, 1992, as reported (without amendment) by a legislative committee.

SPEAKER'S RULING

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I have a brief decision to announce on Bill C-98, an act to provide additional borrowing authority for the fiscal year beginning on April 1, 1992.

There are four amendment motions on the Order Paper for report stage of Bill C-98.

[English]

Motions Nos. 1 to 4, standing in the name of the hon. member for Essex—Windsor, seek to delete all clauses of the bill. These motions will be grouped for debate and a vote on Motion No. 1 will apply to Motions Nos. 2, 3 and 4. I shall now propose Motions Nos. 1, 2, 3 and 4 to the House.

MEASURE TO ENACT

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor) moved:

Motion No. 1

That Bill C-98 be amended by deleting Clause 1.

Motion No. 2

That Bill C-98 be amended by deleting Clause 2.

Motion No. 3

That Bill C-98 be amended by deleting Clause 3.

Motion No. 4

That Bill C-98 be amended by deleting Clause 4.

He said: Mr. Speaker, it might logically be asked why one would attempt at report stage to simply eliminate a piece of legislation coming from the government.

There are two answers to that question. The first answer is that I believe, as do many Canadians across this country, that this government has lost its right to govern the country. This government has turned its back on so many commitments. It has failed to listen to the people. It has reached and exceeded the usual four years that people grant to even the most unpopular government when it is elected. It is now frankly living on borrowed time and is doing so without any sense of commitment, any sense of new ideas, any sense of new directions to put the 1.6 million Canadians who are out of work back into employment.

We have a government which simply does not deserve the right to continue to sit in the seats of power on the front benches on the government side. That is because this government is doing nothing. This government has had a chance for over four years to write its direction and to respond to the concerns of people but it has refused to do so.

Most recently, at what was effectively the four-year mark of this past government, in the economic statement made last December instead of bringing in a plan to get people back to work, it brought in a plan to attack the jobless. Instead of bringing in a plan to do something to make our tax system fairer, it brought in a plan to make it less fair by simply extending the tax exemption of 21-year family trusts virtually indefinitely so as to give perhaps billions of dollars a year to these trusts. We really cannot calculate it because of the lack of information from this government but it is perhaps billions of dollars a year to these tax protected trusts.

That is one reason. The fact is this government has become an illegitimate government. It simply has not got the moral authority in our view to go forward and borrow from the people of Canada and from the rest of the world the billions of dollars which it suggests it is going to borrow with this piece of legislation.

We must also point out that for the average person, for the average family, for the young person in this country the economic crisis continues despite brave announcements from Statistics Canada that the recession is over. The reality is that since Statistics Canada made that announcement the first statistics came out to show that in the most recent month for which we have data this economy in Canada actually declined instead of advanced. Some proof that the recession is over, some proof indeed.

Today we have given to us the final figures of bankruptcies for the year 1992. We see that this government has succeeded with all its brave talk about managing the economy to achieve under its direction the largest level of bankruptcies this country has ever experienced.

I say shame to this government. Shame to a government that speaks about the importance of small business and lets hundreds, thousands of small businesses go under because of the government's poor economic management.

I say shame to a government that talks about its concerns for people and yet has seen in this past year over 76,000 bankruptcies in Canada. We have never had figures like that before. We have never had statistics that have been so dramatic. Even in 1991 the previous year in which the recession was also biting deeply we had fewer bankruptcies than last year. In the most recent month, December, on the basis of which Statistics Canada said the recession was dead there were more bankruptcies than in the previous month.

We see absolutely nothing as we look at the economy in front of us that suggests this government has anything to offer, has anything but bankrupt solutions to go with the bankruptcies which it has created and extended throughout this country.

We cannot possibly support this legislation. We cannot support other legislation coming through this House as part of this same economic package from this government.

We cannot support legislation which in fact will leave women frightened and unable to react to sexual harassment in the work place as a result of the cutbacks and the elimination of unemployment insurance support for anybody who leaves a position under such circumstances and cannot prove definitively that sexual harassment was the cause even though it may have been the major factor in what happened to that woman or that man.

• (1030)

We cannot support that. We cannot support this government's plans later this week to create this vast new tax bonanza for Canadians at the top. These are Canadians who have already benefited tremendously from changes that both the Liberals and the Conservatives have brought into our tax system. These changes that the Liberals and Conservatives brought in have created the vast deficits at the federal level which are so dangerous to the future of our country.

This government and the previous Liberal government have created an economic situation which is damaging Canadians across this nation, hurting the future of not just ourselves but our children and our children's children. We in this party will do everything we possibly can to stop this government from being able to proceed.

There is just one act, one action and one decision which this government has the right to take. This government has been in power too long. This government has stopped listening. This government has failed the economy and the people of this country.

The responsibility now exists for this government to call an election, to give the people of Canada the right they have been waiting to exercise for over four years. That is the right to kick this government out and the right to create a new direction in Canada.

Mr. Gustafson: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the hon. member would entertain one question with regard to his comment.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): According to the rules, there are no questions or comments. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Len Gustafson (Parliamentary Secretary to Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member states that the government really has no right to continue.

I read here according to The Gazette that Statistics Canada's figures project Ontario's net debt will reach $53 billion by the end of this year. That is a 63 per cent increase in debt in two years. It also speaks about the federal situation in which we have dealt with the debt.

How can the hon. member stand in this House and compare what an NDP government has done in Ontario by increasing the debt? He also said for example that the NDP government is considering tough welfare reform, possibly forcing recipients to take job training or do voluntary work which is a move that one time would have been unthinkable for a socialist government.

How can the hon. member stand in this place and make the statements he has made in view of the reality and the facts of what has been happening with governments run by the NDP?

Mr. Langdon: Mr. Speaker, it is quite true that the New Democratic Party in all three provinces where it has been elected has had to clean up the mess left by previous governments. The Liberals and Conservatives who created the mess chuckle.

The reality in the province of Saskatchewan for instance, from where the hon. member who just spoke comes, is that the banks were very clear that Grant Devine, the previous Conservative premier, had taken the province to bankruptcy.

In the province of Ontario, you may remember—you may not have been perhaps as close to the Ontario situation as some of us who come from there—the Liberal government went into an election and went through an entire election campaign saying: "Yes, we have a deficit from the past, but so far as the present is concerned, we are running with a surplus of $25 million". The new New Democratic government came into office and was told immediately by the very civil servants selected by the Liberal government that the deficit for that year which the Liberals had started was going to be close to $3 billion.

An hon. member: Oh, that is wrong. Mr. Speaker, how can you allow this? How about Ontario?

Mr. Langdon: Mr. Speaker, the New Democratic Party Government of Ontario has had to clean up this mess. It had to clean it up in Saskatchewan.

Mr. Milliken: They cleaned it up? They tripled it.

Mr. Langdon: It had to clean it up in British Columbia. The reality is at the federal level at this very moment, for every single tax dollar which a Canadian citizen pays, 35 cents is taken out of that dollar to spend on the federal debt created by Liberals and Conservatives.

New Democrats have never run the federal government. In the province of Ontario, for each dollar taken in taxes from the people of Ontario, only 12 cents goes to pay for the debts which exist in that province.

It seems far more responsible to be in a situation where you lead a government and are able to take 88 per cent of the tax revenue and put it to good use than to be in a situation such as the Liberals and Conservatives have created here at the federal level where 65 cents is all that is left out of each tax dollar to actually spend for services and benefits to the people of the country.

Let us hear no more from Conservatives and Liberals about deficit difficulties and New Democrats because what has happened is that Liberals and Conservatives have taken this country nationally to virtual bankruptcy. Frankly, it will be up to New Democrats after the next election to clean up the mess here just as it has been in the provinces.

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, I would love another question, but I have to speak to this amendment.

I sat here and I listened to this give and take between the people across and the hon. NDPs to my left. I heard the gentleman to my left talking about how the Ontario NDP dealt responsibly with the debt in Ontario. I guess my way of dealing with debt and their way of dealing with debt is not quite the same. I always thought that dealing responsibly with debt was eliminating it, not tripling it. Now I do not even know how much bigger it is going to be, but the line we are hearing is that the Ontario deficit will be well in excess of $10 billion. When they took over, despite all the bad things that the Liberals did in Ontario and all the things that of course the glorious NDP did shortly afterward, they were only able to come up with a $3 billion deficit at the end of that one year.

Mr. Speller: It was actually $2 billion.

Mrs. Marleau: Okay, it was actually $2 billion. I stand corrected. All of a sudden we have these people who really know how to deal with deficit and debt trying to tell us how great things will be after they take over. I am very worried about that.

• (1040)

As members can all remember, and I remind Canadians, in 1983–84 in the period leading up to the election of a massive Conservative majority government here in Canada and subsequently, we heard about how Conservatives were going to deal with deficits and debt over and over and over again. They also had all the answers and they were making all these wonderful predictions and all of the other things.

I must admit they were not quite as successful at tackling the debt as the NDP have been in Ontario. I have to admit that. They did not triple it in one or two years. I mean they really did not. I have to give them credit for that. They did double it though in the space of eight years. Perhaps they should be listening to my colleague from the NDP. They might learn how to do it better, I do not know.

That is not my way of dealing with debt and deficits. I of course am very well aware that there is no real easy answer except hard work and trying to create economic growth. One of the ways of tackling debt and deficit is to create more growth within the economy. We have been through some very trying economic times.

I read an article in today's Toronto Star by David Crane. I quote from the article:

> Pyongyang is the isolated capital of North Korea where politicians and bureaucrats are the last people in the world who still believe in communism.
> Ottawa is not so isolated, but it's probably the last capital in the Western world where politicians and bureaucrats still cling to the idea that free markets by themselves will guarantee full employment and prosperity.
>
> Certainly, that's the view in such citadels of Ottawa power as the Department of Finance, where any idea of an industrial strategy is shot down the instant the words are mentioned.
> Fortunately, some provinces are not waiting for Ottawa to tune into the 21st century. Instead, they are actually working together to see what they can do without Ottawa.

This, ladies and gentlemen, is an example of what we have governing this country. Do we wonder why Canadians have lost faith in government? No small wonder. We have a Minister of Finance who in the midst of one of the most terrible years in terms of job losses, high unemployment rates and bankruptcies who on a television program the other day had the nerve to say that we have created the most jobs of any G-7 country. What he neglects to say is that we have also lost more jobs than anybody else and the jobs that the government has created are low paying, part-time jobs that a person is lucky to have.

The Conservatives are tired. They have had it. They have had it with us criticizing them. They have had it with Canadians criticizing them. They have just plain had it. The time is up, ladies and gentlemen. It is time to call an election. They are tired. They deserve a rest. Canadians are very ready to give them that rest. Many of them may retire and lead a very nice restful life after the hectic days of destroying the economy of our country.

I offer them the opportunity, and Canadians will give them the opportunity whenever they say so. Of course, they are still all debating and watching our Prime Minister as he fiddles with his future. He fiddles: "Am I staying? Am I not? Am I staying? Am I not?" It is for them to guess. That preoccupies their minds. They are really busy worrying about whether he is coming or going, but they are not doing anything for Canadians. We can joke about these things but this is very serious. They have created paralysis in Ottawa where the people wait for some direction from this government. Step down. Call an election or try something; anything.

If you have been laid off and are looking for a job you do not want Statistics Canada to tell you: "Oh, by the way, we are out of the recession". Go and see the people who have just lost their jobs. There are many of them everywhere in this country.

Statistics Canada can say there is a slight upturn in the economy. We are very happy with it but what we want to see are jobs. We do not want to see just a slight upturn in the economy. We want to see an upturn where people will be able to get good jobs. We want to see a government that can focus on people. We are witnessing the price of inaction. We must take some action. Any action is better than what has been happening here. I would ask everyone to defeat this bill.

An hon. member: The amendment.

Mrs. Marleau: No, not the amendment, to defeat this bill. I support the amendment because I want to defeat this bill and that is what the amendment will do. I will do anything I can to convince those opposite to step down. I think it is very important that an election be called, and the sooner the better.

An hon. member: Give yourselves a break and vote for the amendment.

Mrs. Marleau: If voting for the amendment means that we are going into an election, by all means let us go to it.

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, I wish I could speak for half an hour today. There is so much one could say in response to my hon. friends opposite. However, I will not do that.

With all due respect I must say this is a phoney debate. It is a waste of taxpayers' money. It is a waste of the House of Commons' time because these amendments, while in order—Mr. Speaker, you must rule them in order because they are in order—are amendments that simply propose to delete the bill and force this House to debate an extra stage on this bill.

What hon. members opposite should do if they are against the bill is simply vote against it. They should simply speak against it and vote against it. By putting frivolous amendments like this, we have an extra stage of debate which is of no benefit to the Canadian people whatsoever. It is a considerable cost to the taxpayer. Let us be perfectly clear about that.

My hon. friend from the New Democratic Party says this government has lost its right to govern. Does he not know his basic political science? Does he not know that a mandate in this country is five years? Certainly he should have learned from the former premier of Ontario, Mr. Peterson, that a mandate is five years. The Liberals have learned that lesson.

If one looks back one could chronicle the different circumstances. I remember, for example, that during the last two decades the Liberals had two majority governments. In 1974 and 1979 Mr. Trudeau went five years before calling an election. From 1980 to 1984 Mr. Trudeau went four years and, I believe, seven months, from February until September. Let us not get sucked in by this phoney nonsense about a term being four years.

A term is five years. This country has problems that need to be addressed. Last fall there was an incredible uncertainty in this country with the referendum and the constitutional situation. The last thing this country needed was the uncertainty of an election so let us not deal with that nonsense.

Regarding the economic crisis, my hon. friend from Essex Windsor says: "Woe is me, woe is me, woe is me". This is the essence of this man's conversation every time he stands up in this House. Yet earlier this morning he and I attended a joint meeting of the external affairs, finance and environment committees in which we heard one of the leading officials of the United Nations say: "I find it interesting to come to Canada and hear Canadians talk about how tough it is in Canada when in fact in any other country in the world the people would give anything to trade their problems for the problems of Canadians".

Sure we have problems in this country. Sure the recession has hit us hard. Sure it has hurt individual Canadians and families. One person unemployed is too many. One bankruptcy is too many, but my goodness let us put things in balance.

• (1050)

The fact of the matter is that this is the best place in the world to be. Why is it that this is the country more than any other that people from other countries in the world want to come to? If they listen to my hon. friends opposite nobody would ever want to come to this country, but I am not sure who listens to my hon. friends opposite, except maybe the media, when they go on about all this nonsense.

I listened to my hon. friend from the Liberal Party talk about debt. There is the pot calling the kettle black. When this government came into office the Liberal Party had left a $38 billion deficit. How much different is that from the $32 billion we have today? The difference is that they had an operating deficit. They were running the country on $16 billion more than they were taking in and they only had $22 billion in debt.

Mrs. Maheu: That was 35.

Mr. McCreath: Today this government is running this country in the black. There is a $6 billion surplus on the operating side. Meanwhile the compound interest on the over $200 billion debt, the legacy of the Trudeau government to Canadians, has taken us up to a point in excess of $400 billion. By running the country in the black for the last four years this government is returning some of that deficit money and paying down the national debt. Let us stick to the facts and not hear this malarkey opposite about debt and deficit. My goodness, what nonsense.

The bill before the House would be eliminated by the proposals of my hon. friend in the NDP. It provides for the financial needs of the government. Unlike my friends opposite, this government does not like to see the Government of Canada operate on borrowed money. The philosophy of this party is that we should live within our means. That is why we have had a program of deficit reduction, a program, I might say, consistently opposed by my friends opposite who fought against every cost cutting measure of this government: spend, spend, spend.

We have seen what the Ontario New Democratic Party has done. There is an interesting article in The Montreal Gazette today that talks about debt across the country. It notes that in the last two years provincial debt has increased 50 per cent. What do we see in Ontario? We see a 63 per cent increase.

What is the record of this government? This government's debt has increased by 16 per cent. That 16 per cent is too much but it is a hell of a lot better than the 63 per cent the Ontario New Democratic Party has given the people of that province. It is a heck of a lot better than the 50 per cent the provinces from coast to coast have generally given.

It is interesting to note that the only province that has operated consistently in the black for 20 years is the province of Alberta which just happens to have been governed by a Progressive Conservative government during the same time. I suppose that is coincidence.

We need this borrowing authority to keep the affairs of state going. Revenues are down because we have been through a difficult recession.

Mr. Milliken: A Tory induced recession.

Mr. McCreath: UI and transfer payments are up. They talk about capping the transfer payments, yet Canada Assistance Plan payments and UI payments are up. That is the way we govern.

We have had other precedents. We had a precedent in 1982 when the Liberal government came to this House looking for an $11 billion supplementary borrowing authority.

This is a realistic situation. We have no choice. It is the way we have to go. If this government continues in the way it has we are going to get that debt situation completely under control, and we think that is what Canadians want.

Our friends in the New Democratic Party have offered more spending. More spending means more borrowing and more debt. As the Prime Minister said yesterday, at least the NDP offers something. Our other friends over there have nothing to offer. We heard their leader the other day say: "I am going to scrap the GST. I do not know where I am going to get the money to replace it, but if you elect me I will tell you then in my first budget". How stupid do they think Canadians are? It cannot possibly be the case. We have no choice.

I will conclude with this remark: We have no choice but to get on with the business of the day and not use up the time of this House in frivolous debate. Let us get on with the business of government. Let us get on with the legislation that is necessary and will benefit Canadians. Let us get on with passing this borrowing bill.

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, I find it ironic that members on the opposite side should stand and applaud their economic record. Let us try to return to the facts because, I put to the House, Canada is in terrible economic shape. Canadians are worried and they have every legitimate right to be worried about our current economic circumstances and our economic future.

Let us look at the record of the Tories. With respect to our ability to compete in 1989, we were fourth among all OECD countries. We have fallen to eleventh place today. Since 1984, when the Conservatives took over government, the Canadian share of world trade has fallen from 5 per cent of Gross Domestic Product to 4 per cent, a 20 per cent decline. Our trade surplus with other nations during those eight and a half years has gone down $12.4 billion.

I will refer to what is probably the most alarming figure to me in terms of the future for young Canadians and for our ability to sustain high paying, value added jobs in Canada. In 1984 Canada had a high-tech trade surplus of $1 billion. Today we have a deficit in high-tech trade of $30 billion. If that is not a sign of a declining ability to compete and create wealth through innovation in the industries of the future, I do not know what is.

Turning to some more bad news, in 1984 manufacturing accounted for 20 per cent of wealth production in Canada. Today it is down to 17 per cent. We have seen how since the early 1980s Canada's manufacturing productivity has grown at only about half the rate of all G-7 competitors. In other words we are falling behind in our capacity to do what we have to do to sustain a high level of income for Canadians.

This Tory government has told us that it has put the fundamentals in place, that it has given us the fundamentals to compete. The fundamentals are going down and have gone down consistently since 1984 because we are above all else a trading nation: 30 per cent of our wealth comes from trade and exports. If all of these indicators of our ability to compete are going backward under this Tory program of getting the fundamentals right, what hope are we trying to give to our children?

We have seen the results in terms of unemployment. Today 1.6 million Canadians are without jobs and these are just the ones who say they are still in the job market. It does not include the many other Canadians who are so despondent about their prospects of getting a job that they no longer even try to find one. They know those jobs just are not there.

Probably even more alarming is the fact that since January 1989 Canada has lost 365,000 or 18 per cent of its manufacturing jobs. This is deindustrialization of the highest order. No Canadian believes what the Tories have been trying to say, that this was simply a result of previous governments in Canada. This government has been in office now and has had control of the reins of power for more than eight years. It has been its responsibility to set the directions.

• (1100)

What we have seen is a decreasing ability to compete globally, a decreasing ability to be productive, and finally the deindustrialization of Canada. The Tories will also say that what is happening in Canada is a result of globalization, international restructuring, and even the world recession, all factors beyond the control of Canadians.

If these apologists for our present sorry plight are correct, how do they answer the following question? If these are factors beyond Canada's control, why is it that during the same period Canada has lost 18 per cent of its manufacturing jobs and the U.S. has lost only 6 per cent of its manufacturing jobs? How do they explain that unemployment in Canada is at 11.5 per cent and in United States unemployment is at 7.3 per cent?

This is not the result of forces beyond our control, beyond the purview of this government's responsibility to Canadians to set an environment in which we can prosper and compete. This is a direct result of policies introduced by this government. This government gave us a made-in-Canada recession. Even many Tories admit that their single-minded economic measures to get inflation under control cost Canada thousands and thousands of jobs and created a made-in-Canada recession. Why else did our recession start before the international recession and why did it have to last longer?

These people deliberately set about to drive up the dollar from the mid-75 cent area to 90 cents at the same time they gave us free trade. That 25 per cent increase in the value of our dollar was a far greater barrier to our export than any of the tariff restrictions that we negotiated out of the United States in terms of increasing our access there.

How can we compete with a 25 per cent added burden over those years on our backs? It was totally unfair. It was totally unrealistic. It was a trade driven policy, an inflation driven policy which the government chose rather than concentrating on what it is we can compete with and how we can get more of those goods into foreign markets so that we can have more and more Canadians working in our plants, factories and service industries which are dependent upon our exports.

Canadians realize that this government has set these policies, that it is responsible for them. This is why Canadians have shown consistently through their polling that these Tories had options, that they could have done things differently but they did not, and that they were wrong.

I only hope in the last gasping breath of this government that it will try to reverse its policies and that it will try to deal with some of its long-term problems that it has neglected in the past, such as increasing literacy, creating an educational system that is responsive to our job needs, increasing funding to science and technology and a renewed commitment to research and development.

Can the government not see what it has done? At least, can it not start to change it or say: We will not change it, we will give Canadians a chance to decide and let Canadians go to the polls.

Mr. Raymond Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, during this debate on the borrowing authority I would like to spend a bit of time talking about the role of the government and its treatment of the Public Service of Canada. The cuts it has undertaken within the safety infrastructure provided by Transport Canada on the coast of British Columbia I feel endangers the lives of Canadians who live and work in that area.

A rather misguided approach by the Auditor General in some of the criticisms of the Canada Coast Guard I believe has led to a number of ill-conceived programs by Transport Canada.

I would like to start with a basic policy of Transport Canada that seems to be a response to the government's demand for cuts in the services provided to the public, to the people who live in the small communities along the coast of British Columbia, on northern Vancouver Island, the west coast of Vancouver Island, probably a line from Gibsons right up to southeast Alaska and beyond, as it moves up the east side of the panhandle in British Columbia. It is my opinion and the opinion of many British Columbians that this area is very poorly serviced when it comes to transportation safety infrastructure.

Transportation safety is not the responsibility of ships at sea, of privately operated aircraft, commercial aircraft or of locally organized search and rescue groups of various types, whether they be the marine search and rescue group that is under the sponsorship of the Coast Guard or the volunteer air search and rescue group or the ground search and rescue parties. These people do an enormous job and are a tremendous service to their communities. It must be remembered that in that area, the prime deliverer of transportation infrastructure services is the Government of Canada.

Probably the primary one is the helicopter service out of CFB Comox. For years that service has been totally inadequate. They have some of the best trained crews in the world. They have some of the best equipment in the world, contrary to what the Minister of National Defence and this government would like us to believe. It is my understanding from discussions with people who work at the base, who maintain those aircraft, that the airframe of the Labrador helicopter never wears out. If it is refitted properly and fitted with proper engines, it is one of the most stable vehicles to work with, especially in mountainous terrain.

The problem with the helicopters at CFB Comox is that they have in some instances a two-hour callout time. A member of the Billie family of Comox drowned off Quadra Island. Apparently the boat caught fire. The base, which is about six minutes flying time away, could not get a helicopter out there within two hours. It is absolutely useless if you cannot deliver a primary search and rescue vehicle into that area within a shorter period of time when the base is that close.

In the United States, in southeast Alaska and in the state of Washington, they operate on a totally different principle. Their helicopters are ready to go immediately. There are crews on site. They fire up their machines and they are gone. That is the kind of service that is needed on the coast of British Columbia. It is the kind of service that every British Columbian has to a right to expect, as they do in other areas of Canada.

Ultimately the government has decided that the saving of money is more important than human lives or a legitimate attempt to rescue and save human lives. That is an absolutely clear statement. The example of the Billie family drowning off a fish boat off Comox is a clear example. There are also others.

One of the great things that Transport Canada and the Department of National Defence brag about is the tremendous job they do and the assistance they were able to render to the Princen Dam which was a cruise ship which caught fire off Prince Rupert and southeast Alaska. They were absolutely blind lucky that there was not a storm blowing and that it was not the middle of winter. They could never have reached the ship in a situation like that.

• (1110)

The reverse situation occurred with the sinking of the freighter Lee Wang Zin off that area. By the time you leave Comox, if you get the report after twelve o'clock, you cannot reach that area in daylight hours. The distribution of equipment, callout times and a whole host of other money saving initiatives of the government make sure that the safety equipment is not delivered in a period of time that is useful for searching and for saving lives.

Let us put aside the saving of money in areas that endanger human lives. I say that is completely unacceptable. The helicopters at CFB Comox should be distributed along the coast in a more effective fashion so that those extremely well trained, dedicated crews and that upgraded equipment can be delivered to people in a timeframe which is meaningful. Otherwise we might as well not even have them arrive in time.

Transport Canada had decided that it too was going to get into the saving of money in response to the government's demand. If it had to save money by endangering human life, so be it. It got some solace from the Auditor General who I think in a very misguided fashion said: Let us close all the lighthouses on the coast of British Columbia.

Those lighthouses have provided safety services to mariners, aviators, tourists and people in the commercial marine environment for years and years. Contacts were made and the lines of communication were opened even though they were not formally established. Because some of those lighthouse keepers were not provided with radios, they bought their own so that they could talk to passing ships, give weather reports about local sea conditions in the area and advice on what was happening. They provided that service.

On a large number of occasions, the lighthouse keepers effected their own rescues. They bought their own boats.

Mr. McCreath: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order I have been listening with great interest to my hon. friend. We are speaking on an amendment which would delete borrowing authority from the government and deny cash resources.

Can my hon. friend tie in his remarks to taking financial resources from the government. Would that enable the government to do what he is advocating?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I am not sure that is a point of order.

Mr. Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, what affects the area that I represent, 300 miles of the coast of British Columbia, affects the south coast of Nova Scotia where five fishermen drowned recently.

I am sure the hon. member is interested in exactly the same points I raise. This is affected by borrowing authority and the way we go about it. Borrowing authority involves the money of the Government of Canada and that money should be spent in areas that are extremely relevant. Perhaps he would be prepared to listen to the remarks and I will draw them together to make the relevant point that he is concerned about.

If I could return to these remarks, the policy of Transport Canada and the Auditor General in scrutinizing the funding of the Government of Canada has led to an impression in Transport Canada that there should be cuts to the lighthouse services. The point I was making is that those lighthouse services provide an important safety service to the people of British Columbia.

Those people have affected rescues and they are not provided with vessels to do that. They are not provided with training and they are not provided with proper equipment. When somebody is in a desperate situation and in danger of losing his or her life and the lives of their family members, there is no choice. Names have been submitted and forwarded in the hope that these lighthouse keepers can be given the Canada 125 medal in recognition of the tremendous service they have provided in an isolated environment without resources.

The government finally talked to people in the field including mariners, aviators, tourists and commercial users of the service. They have been told not to cut out those lighthouse services but to upgrade them so they can provide weather reports, radio contacts and provide them their own vessels.

As a result, the Coast Guard turned around and did a study. It was called "The Future Use of Lighthouses Report" and made some very positive recommendations: not shutting down the lighthouses, providing them with radios, providing them with some training for giving weather broadcasts, which is absolutely the most crucial need.

When one gets so far up the coast of British Columbia, one cannot leave without a weather report. One cannot get a decent weather report because they are not provided. Only the lighthouses do and they are so sketchy they are hardly useful. "The Future Use of Lighthouses Report" stated these people should be given the skills they need and the equipment they need to get this rolling. Now they are under the gun again.

I would just like to draw the conclusion together. The government has also cut back fire-fighting services at Port Hardy Airport. It has done it with flight service stations. It has done it with the closure of Bull Harbour, the closure of the Cape St. James lighthouse. It is talking about removing the hovercraft from Parksville. Ultimately that involves endangering human life. We cannot tolerate the removal of these infrastructures.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Your time has now expired.

Mr. Peterson: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I was wondering if the House would be in agreement to give unanimous consent to asking questions of the hon. member who just spoke.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is there unanimous consent to give the hon. member the opportunity to raise a question?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, the previous speaker for the New Democratic Party, the member for Essex—Windsor I believe, was making the point that this government has no legitimacy to carry on because it is so low in the polls. Would the hon. member apply that same standard to the New Democratic government in the province of Ontario and ask Mr. Rae to step down and call an election?

Mr. Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that another Mr. Peterson was holding on at the same level of legitimacy as the government across the floor.

I think the member's question missed the point. Obviously he was not paying much attention to my speech. The point I was trying to make is that even beyond politics there is a far more important issue. That is the responsibility we all have to protect human life. This government's financial cuts to the Public Service and what it has done to a dedicated group of people by completely demoralizing them, has created a tremendous amount of uncertainty. To the government, saving cash is more important than serving people, even if it is to save its own life.

For the benefit of the hon. member from the Liberal Party I mentioned the question of removing the hovercraft from Parksville, the shutting down of the Cape St. James lighthouse, the closure of lighthouses, the closure of the Bull Harbour lifeboat station, the purchase of inappropriate but certainly cheaper equipment, the failure to end the callout time so that crews are on site at CFB Comox and are able to depart immediately with well-trained crews and good equipment.

All of this really seems to stem from a much greater concern about saving money rather than saving people. That is what I think is going to be the end of the Conservatives.

I should point out that the closure of the lighthouse stations and the shut-down of many of the search and rescue equipment was the fault of the previous Liberal government. Otto Lang, a previous Minister of Transport, was one of the most serious offenders against concern for the lives of people who work on the west coast and I am sure the east coast as well. That Liberal government was certainly the precursor of this government and the terrible cuts that have come in. The Liberals are really no different from the Conservatives.

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, I want to lead off in this debate by making a few preliminary comments on some statements that were made that I certainly would like to clarify for the benefit of anybody watching the debate here this morning.

First of all, the penultimate speaker from the NDP said they would not really know about deficits and all that sort of stuff because federally they have never been in power. I would suggest that if they continue going the way they are going right now they will never be in power. I think this was a precursor to some of the concerns that they have. When people are frustrated they lash out. Therefore I take a certain amount of what the NDP say about my party's record with an understanding of their frustration at never forming the government.

• (1120)

My good friend the Conservative member for South Shore was accurate in one sense when he said that the Conference Board forecasted that Canada would grow 3.3 per cent this coming year. I cannot quarrel because that is what it said, although whether or not it happens is another thing. What he did not mention is that it also said that we would have the highest unemployment rate among the G-7 countries, except for Italy, at 11.3 per cent. Italy will have 11.5 per cent and Canada will have 11.3 per cent.

The whole point of this discussion, the whole point of the government's attempt to get its act together, and the whole point of one of the things that we have been doing with our platform is to try to get jobs back in this country and to get people working.

I come from a riding where not many people are working as a result of mismanagement of the fisheries, poor employment opportunities and a litany of other things that I have talked about in this House, as have other members from Newfoundland and Atlantic Canada. I am not here to reiterate those things. I will be doing that at a later time.

I want to more closely examine the over-all context of what we are discussing this morning, which is the government's business of borrowing money to run the country. The Tories are stretching their credibility when they continue after eight and half years in power to blame another government, whatever government it is. It happens to be the party that I represent. To continue year after year with the same litany of excuses is not only irresponsible but it shows that they are giving little importance and little credibility to the intelligence of the viewers who hear this litany. People would have to be very dedicated Conservatives to really believe all these things.

I like to deal in facts and figures. It is good to be qualitative from time to time but it is very difficult to argue with the facts and figures which are available to any member. Nobody can dispute them. They are available.

When this government came into power in 1984 there was a certain debt and a deficit. The deficit was $38 billion. After eight and a half years in power, 33 tax increases and after saying in every budget that the name of the game was to reduce the deficit the government has not reduced the deficit much. This was at a time when the economy was growing. In the first four years this government was in power the economy of the world, and particularly the economy of Canada, was buoyant and the government had an opportunity to reduce the deficit as it kept promising to do budget after budget.

What was the government doing? Program spending was increasing at the rate of 4 per cent a year. The government talked about cutting the deficit by increasing taxes, although it never really talked too much about increasing taxes. The government talked about reducing the debt. Yet every year the government would increase its spending by 4.1 per cent, which is the average over the last eight and a half years, and the interest on the annual deficit grew at 9 per cent, which is about three times the rate of growth of the economy. If it does that in periods of growth and a good economy and it cannot control the deficit what on earth is it going to do in a recession or depression?

The government has run out of tools. It has run out of tricks. It has taxed the middle class, sometimes at the expense of the rich, sometimes at the expense of corporations and sometimes at the expense of certain business interests, to the point where the middle class cannot pay any more.

The interest payments on the debt when the Tories came to power in 1984 totalled $27.5 billion. It is double that today. Yet they say it is the fault of the Liberals.

Where have the taxes gone? Of the $122 billion that was taken in by this government to run the country, which is the subject we are talking about today, 50 per cent came from income taxes. The middle class pays most of the income tax. Twelve per cent was from the goods and services tax, which is the most hated and most unique tax in the world. Thirteen per cent came from UI contributions, to which the government no longer contributes and so it comes from the working class, the middle class, and business. Thirty-seven per cent came from sin taxes on gas, alcohol, cigarettes and those kinds of items and 8 per cent came from corporations.

I regret that I have not been able to get the exact figures for 1984. I have been told by the research effort that I was able to mount yesterday and today that if we include the GST the ratio paid by the middle class compared to other classes is 60:40. In 1984 it was more like 40:60. It has reversed. The middle class proportionately is paying almost double what it was paying before.

Economists agree on very little but one thing they do agree on is that we cannot just talk about the debt we must talk about growth as well.

The amount of goods and services, of anything that is worth anything that is produced in this country is the Gross Domestic Product, which is essentially what we earn as a country. Our debt is what is owed as the national debt.

The ratio of one to the other in 1984 was 46.4 per cent. In other words our debt was 46 per cent of what we produced. It is as if an individual earned x dollars and would be paying 46.4 per cent of everything he or she was worth on interest payments.

That figure has gone up 30 per cent. In other words the ratio of Gross Domestic Product to debt is now 62.7 per cent. That is an incredible rise. In other words an individual owes 62.7 per cent interest on what he or she has borrowed as an individual. That means an individual would have less than 40 per cent of his or her income to spend on delivering the goods, on raising a family, on sending kids to university and everything else.

More important, that individual is worse off by 30 per cent than she or he was eight and a half years ago. Would that individual blame that on somebody else? One would have to take responsibility for that oneself.

In the closing moments of my presentation I must mention one thing that has arisen in my riding time after time, and I am about to meet with the community. At a time when spending has been increased by 4 per cent and people are being taxed they feel they are not getting value for their money.

One of the areas that has been of great concern in my party and for a lot of my constituents is the way in which rural people have been treated with respect to postal services. In 1986 this government came up with a plan to reduce 10,000 people and 3,221 post offices in rural areas. It has done so despite countless speeches in this House, tens of thousands of people presenting petitions, admonitions, letters to ministers, and meetings at town halls. I cannot tell the House the number that I have attended. I am about to attend another one in a couple of weeks time. The community is very concerned that it is paying all these taxes and it is not getting the postal service that it feels it should get.

I am particularly concerned about this because about 83 per cent of those who work in the post office are female. There is great concern about jobs for the female part of our population and that is another concern.

I have given just one example but it is a universal example that concerns people. Quite frankly the government has no right to be proud of its record and it should be very much ashamed of where it has us today.

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to speak on this borrowing bill which arises out of the mini budget that the government brought down in the fall. It really outlines the direction this government wants to take our economy in the next few years, before an election in the fall.

• (1130)

Neither I nor the people in my riding support the economic direction in which this government has been taking the country. This country is really facing an economic crisis. There are 1.6 million Canadians out of work and many of those Canadians reside in my riding of Haldimand—Norfolk.

The government talks about economic growth. As the hon. member said earlier, it plans for 3 per cent economic growth. However in all those discussions the government does not talk about jobs. Although it talks about economic growth it hides the fact that even though we will have economic growth over the next few years no more jobs will be created.

The government likes to talk about competitiveness, saying proudly that we will grow. However it says to the unemployed Canadian or the unemployed person from Haldimand—Norfolk, for example in the steel industry, that there will be no jobs for steel workers who are being laid off because Canadian steel is being unduly and unfairly attacked by our counterparts to the south.

This government made a commitment during the free trade debate that our steel industry would have open access to the American market. As we have seen over the last few weeks, this has not been the case. The government does not seem to be prepared to do anything about it.

There are no jobs for farmers in this economic statement. Farmers are devastated by low commodity prices and must deal with a government that does not seem to want to represent them internationally. It does not seem to want to stand up against the unfair trading practices of the Europeans and our neighbours to the south who constantly use export enhancement to send grain that should have been Canadian into our previous markets.

Farmers in the supply managed areas of dairy and poultry are extremely concerned about this government's representation of them at the GATT negotiations and the way in which this government has caved in at the negotiations with regard to its position on article XI.

There are no jobs for our youth. Youth unemployment is at 19 per cent. Canadian youth, whether in Vancouver, Montreal or my own riding of Haldimand—Norfolk, see no hope for their future. They do not see an economic plan that gives them a chance for a job, or even a chance to become trained and to be able to compete for these new jobs that the government talks about.

I and the former youth critic, the member for York North, travelled across this country and talked to young people about their hopes and about their needs if they are to compete in this changing economy. We found a real lack of hope. In many cases it seemed that young people have given up because they have been faced with a government that seems not to have listened to their ideas for economic change.

A few weeks ago we presented alternatives to the Canadian public. We presented future directions that we thought the government might take and future directions that we as a government will take in order to include young people in this economic plan, in the economic future of our country. We hope to be able to present these ideas in a general election, which hopefully will be sooner than later.

We can no longer put blame on past governments. I sat here listening to the government blaming the provinces, the NDP blaming the Liberals and the government blaming the Liberals for our economic woes. The time for blame has stopped. The time to take action is now. I wish that hon. members on all sides of the House would quit blaming each other and get on with the action that is needed. I know it is easy to criticize. As a member of the Official Opposition, my role in may ways is to criticize government policy. We do that in order to try to keep this government responsible and keep it aware of the problems being faced by ordinary Canadians. At the same time we must be willing to offer solutions and alternatives. I am sure my hon. friends across the way were listening very closely when my leader gave a speech last week at the University of Ottawa, which was very widely accepted by the young people there, outlining alternatives, the Liberal's position and the directions we would like to take this country economically.

My leader, I thought, outlined very clearly the alternatives we would be bringing forward in an election and those are the directions we would be moving in once we became government.

The simple fact is, as my leader said, we have to make economic growth and job creation the top priorities in this country. We cannot have economic growth without jobs. Strangely, these days we seem to hear from the gentlemen across and from many Canadians how we have to become competitive. However, we must be willing to build a more highly educated and skilled work force. This government is not giving Canadians the tools which would enable them to compete globally.

It talks about competitiveness but at the same time it does not talk about how Canadians can be competitive and where these jobs are for Canadians to compete in. In order to be competitive we have to put Canadians back to work. We have to be able to meet these so–called global challenges of the 21st century. We must be committed to new initiatives to promote labour force training, research and development and marketing support. Ultimately, as I heard when I was at the University of Calgary last week, this country must be committed to education.

Unfortunately, nothing in this government's economic policies and the economic statement by the minister really outlined in any meaningful way any sort of government commitment. It just promised to fulfil old promises and make new ones while sneaking in cuts on the side. Canadians can see through these empty promises and they are not going to buy them any more.

One thing I have learned since I have been here over the last four years is that government really needs to regain the confidence of Canadians. I do not mean the government across but we as parliamentarians need to regain this confidence or else this economy will not build. I believe the way to regain this confidence is to show them a direction, show them they are important as individuals and give them the tools that are necessary for them in order to compete in this changing economy. Those tools include training and retraining. That is why my leader has announced a co–operative program in which governments, businesses, educators and all involved in this process work together to give not only our youth but all unemployed Canadians an opportunity to be able to compete.

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, I rise today as a member of Parliament from Saskatchewan on the second sitting day of Parliament in 1993, exactly one week, seven days after 12,000 to 15,000 farmers and concerned Saskatchewan residents rallied in Saskatoon to bring to this government's attention their desperate situation. That rally with that many people strongly indicates that their call for help is not idle chatter. Their situation is very serious. Their situation is serious and demands immediate attention.

It points out that 1993 will be one of the most challenging years that Canadians have ever witnessed. Certainly it will be one of the most challenging years that Saskatchewan people have ever witnessed or will have to go through.

When we look at what the agenda is for this government in 1993, we see an incredible amount of attention regarding issues that directly affect Saskatchewan people. We see possible changes to the Canadian Wheat Board, the transportation system for agricultural production, a desperate need for a third line of defence funding and deficiency payments that have not been met for two to three years.

We see changes to the way in which credit will be offered by this government to farm people and residents of rural Saskatchewan. We see changes to the supply management system being negotiated at the GATT that will be a direct threat to many of the residents of rural Saskatchewan.

While those are related to agricultural issues, the people of Saskatchewan also face the same challenges that other Canadians will be faced with as well. There is the continuing attack on them from an unfair taxation system and a North American free trade agreement that is threatening jobs and the security of Canadians from coast to coast. The disputes that concern steel, pork, fish and other matters in our fight with the United States are also matters that will greatly affect the people of Saskatchewan.

I want to bring a number of matters directly to the attention of this government during the course of debate on this bill in which the government is asking permission to borrow more money to carry on with more of the same failed programs and policies that it has had over the last few years.

At that Saskatchewan rally the producers had a number of important things they wanted this government to hear. It was not just a matter of the need for immediate cash, but that was certainly what prompted many of those people to be there. The farm crisis is quite desperate. The numbers are quite overwhelming, indicating that without deficiency payments for the last two years, Saskatchewan producers are already behind $1 billion to $1.5 billion of where they would be if there was a fair trading system in this country and this world related to agricultural products.

Deficiency payments, a third line of defence payment, is a very immediate need of Saskatchewan producers, an industry that is very important to this country, to all of the people who live here, whether they are in Vancouver, Winnipeg, Halifax or St. John's. The crisis in agriculture affects all of us.

The first message out of that farm rally was that we have to get some cash into the hands of the Saskatchewan producer immediately. The producers went much further than that, indicating that we have a long-term problem. Obviously if we have a problem now it is because existing programs have failed us dismally.

The first year of the 1991 GRIP program has just ended. It is that program which has helped to produce the shortfall in cash that we have on the farm today. We can project that there will be further decreases in agricultural income over the course of the 1993 crop year that will result from the 1992 GRIP program but the current crisis is related to the existing program that was put in place by this government in agreements with the provincial governments prior to 1991.

We have to correct the long-term program as well. That long-term program is a very important one for all those producers who can survive the immediate financial crisis that we have now.

There were other matters that the producers raised at the farm rally that I want to bring to the attention of this government. The overwhelming majority of those 12,000 to 15,000 producers had four other important things they wanted to say to this government.

The first one is very specific: Oats must be put back under the jurisdiction of the Canadian Wheat Board. This government must maintain and enhance the powers of the Canadian Wheat Board because it is the only way that Canadians are going to have the opportunity and the ability to stay involved in the international marketplace in the long term. This government is contemplating removing barley from the jurisdiction of the Canadian Wheat Board, leaving only wheat under its jurisdiction.

The message from that farm rally was very clear. They want barley maintained under the jurisdiction of the Canadian Wheat Board. Under no circumstance should barley be taken out from the jurisdiction of the Wheat Board.

There are two very important messages from that farm rally right off the bat. They do not want cash just today. In the long term they enhanced and strengthened powers of the Canadian Wheat Board. Keep barley there and put oats back under the jurisdiction.

Therefore, the Canadian Wheat Board has to be our central desk selling method, which is a very important matter. This government is contemplating changes to the way in which grain is transported from the farm gate through the elevator system to the ports.

The Western Grain Transportation Act has certain guarantees to producers. The government wants to change that. It indicated after talks across the prairies last year that it is seriously considering changes.

The message from that farm rally in Saskatchewan is do not change the method of payment. Maintain the Western Grain Transportation Act, the Crow benefit and if nothing else, ensure that all Saskatchewan producers are treated fairly in the method of payment by ensuring that the status quo is maintained. That was a very important message that came out of that farm rally.

When this government talks about looking at its programs and policies and ensuring that it is looking after the interests of the Canadians it is supposed to represent, it has to take those messages into account. These are very important matters to Saskatchewan producers. We cannot forget that many of the problems on the prairies are a direct result of the continual off-loading of federal government problems on to the provinces.

The Canadian government has a minister of grains and oilseeds. At one point the grain sector was a national responsibility. In 1988, 100 per cent of farm programs relating to grain and problems like the drought that affects the farm situation were carried by Ottawa. The financing was carried by Ottawa. Today only 57 per cent of agricultural support is carried by Ottawa.

Saskatchewan, with 40 per cent of the farms and 4 per cent of the population, is having to carry the costs of 47 per cent of those farm support programs for which Ottawa just four years ago had 100 per cent responsibility.

We have to find ways of ensuring that the national dollar is directed at some of these resource based economies. I, speaking as a Saskatchewan member of Parliament, spoke directly about grains and the agricultural sector. I know my colleagues can talk about fisheries and other resources based economies from their parts of the world.

I have one last point as far as Saskatchewan is concerned. I attended the Saskatchewan Urban Municipalities convention yesterday in Saskatoon. The premier of our province indicated that agricultural support is costing every single Saskatchewan taxpayer $200. The Government of Canada that taxpayers support is just $20. Saskatchewan is paying its way. It is time that Ottawa supported the work of all Saskatchewan producers in an industry in desperate straits.

Mr. McCreath: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, an agreement has been reached among the parties with an undertaking that we will adhere to the normal daily hour of adjournment.

Therefore, I think you will find that there is unanimous consent to move to the third reading stage of Bill C-98 today when report stage is completed.

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, on the same point of order. We would be prepared to allow the government to proceed with third reading but we understand that there is also an accord that the hours of sitting will not be extended this evening between four o'clock and five o'clock. That is part of the deal, and on that understanding we give our consent.

• (1150)

Mr. Taylor: Mr. Speaker, I also confirm there have been discussions to this effect. We are quite willing to co-operate this early in the sitting.

I just want the hon. member to understand that we in this party are very anxious to see the government get on with agricultural support legislation as quickly as possible and, as soon as that is completed, call the election and let the people decide which party they want to have govern this country.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

[Translation]

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Mr. Speaker, last year the Minister of Finance presented us with a budget that did absolutely nothing to revive the economy. The Conservatives' financial measures have once again overlooked all those Canadians who are without work today and probably will be without work for a very long time; 1.6 million people are unemployed, and it goes on.

Where are the retraining programs for all these people who want to work? Where are the job creation programs? The Conservative government seems to be short of ideas, short of initiative and especially short of creativity. It is doing nothing, absolutely nothing, to put Canada back to work. That is not how one builds a strong, competitive economy. Above all, it is not the way to be seen as a great nation in this period of increasing globalization.

This government is really good at making promises that it regularly forgets to keep. How can our young graduates hope to fulfil their dreams and ambitions if they are unemployed when they graduate and have to pay back their student debts? How will our adults and, unfortunately, many of our teenagers who are illiterate or barely literate survive in our society if no program is being considered and given priority? How will this 40 per cent of the population overcome this problem?

This government seems to have forgotten all those who have major economic problems, all those who can no longer make ends meet. How will children living in poverty be able to develop physically and mentally if they are not healthy and educated?

In 1991, 700,000 children lined up at food banks. Is that acceptable? Is that right in a country which is supposed to be rich in resources? How can these children escape their predicament if their parents do not find work?

To quote my colleague from Willowdale who said in another speech: "Canadians were counting on this government to give new direction to the economy in order to help with a real recovery. Their decision to stay the course does nothing for the 1.6 million unemployed Canadians who are looking for work, to say nothing of those on welfare".

Canadian small business people who have been going bankrupt at an increasing rate get only crumbs which are barely enough to keep up with inflation. The measures taken to control cross-border shopping do not seem to be enough to stem the flow of millions of dollars to the United States. There is nothing to reassure Canadians about their economic future.

[English]

The Conservatives simply do not care about average Canadians. They simply have not been listening to their constituents who are desperately seeking relief from these tough Tory times. Canadians are asking for this government to listen for a change. They want a federal government to lead them to economic stability and security. This is a fundamental argument for national unity. Economic instability in Canada only fuels the drive for sovereignty. That is why we must find a way to get Canada working again.

What I find incredible about the Conservatives is that the amount of money allocated for training adjustment has been cut by $110 million. It is incredible that at a time when 1.6 million Canadians are out of work this government is doing absolutely nothing. We are borrowing money to increase the debt. That is either cowardice on the part of the Conservative government or intellectual bankruptcy.

The Liberal Party is ready to meet this challenge. That is why my colleagues and I cannot wait for the writs to be issued and an election to be called. We will offer the people of this country a real alternative, one that is compassionate and understanding, one that will listen to Canadians, and an alternative that will provide the poor and the unemployed with the tools they need to be active, to prosper and to regain pride and confidence not only in themselves but in the country in which they live.

The Conservatives, fearing an attack from the ideological right, are cutting the programs that have helped build Canada. They want to co-op the Reform Party's agenda because they have no ideas of their own.

The cuts to ministers' salaries and the proposal to eliminate first-class travel in Canada that only existed for a few special ministers of this government were largely symbolic. This government really hurts average Canadians by cutting back on certain agencies that give Canadians non-partisan advice and alternatives in such areas as economic and scientific policy. In an astounding move the government eliminated the Science Council.

Canada is trying to become the world leader in science and technology. It is trying to leave behind the attachment it has had to the exploitation of the environment, and this government is blocking that progress. This action is counterproductive and will limit Canada's ability to be competitive in the global market.

As the Official Opposition spokesperson on multiculturalism and citizenship I must comment on the government's cuts in this area. It is absolutely shameful this government is welshing on a promise made to the Canadian Japanese community. The Canada Race Relations Foundation, which this budget shelves indefinitely, was announced as part of the Japanese Canadian redress settlement. The foundation was established with a grant of $24 million, $12 million of which was donated on behalf of the Japanese Canadian community in commemoration of the suffering of Japanese Canadians during World War II.

The Conservative government, which during the last election claimed to support multiculturalism and made a promise that it would do something about it has made a complete about-face by shelving both the Race Relations Foundation and the Heritage Language Institute. The Conservatives are reneging on two-thirds of their legislative commitment to multiculturalism. At a time when intolerance and bigotry are on a rise throughout the world the federal government should be contributing more rather than less to this program.

The final issue I would like to raise is that of the cancellation of the Court Challenges Program. We have talked about it before. It is reprehensible that this Conservative government would remove funding, and thereby access to the courts, for people who need protection under the charter of rights by cutting the budget on this program and then borrowing again to increase the debt. The government is attacking the rights of citizens to challenge present and future legislation that unjustly infringes on the rights of Canadians. If this government still believes in the principle of equality of the individual, I urge it to reverse this decision and reinstate the Court Challenges Program.

This government's economic and social agenda simply does not reflect the real needs of Canadians. It is something that the vast majority of my constituents and I oppose. It is time for new ideas and new alternatives. The Liberal Party is ready to give them.

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise on behalf of the constituents of York West to speak to this borrowing bill which is one of the centrepieces emanating from the recent budget presented to this House and to this country.

One gets the feeling, and it cannot be helped, that through serious and long-standing economic turbulence this government and the Conservative Party opposite simply prefers to put on the automatic pilot and pretend that economic turbulence does not exist.

• (1200)

This latest parliamentary pause was long enough for members of Parliament to enjoy their families and certainly enjoy the benefit of touching base with their constituents in their ridings to try to get the pulse of a country. They will try, as best as they can, to reflect that pulse, that concern, those aspirations and those dreams in this place.

Members on the government benches should have talked to Canadians about their taxes, about the GST, about the record number of unemployed that is reaching almost two million Canadians, and about the fact that with their policies they prefer very much in a bravado sense to attack the unemployed rather than to attack unemployment.

They should have stopped to think about the consequences of the trade deal and the impact it is having on our work force and on some of our key sectors, as witnessed recently by the attack on our steel industry. They should have talked to the increasing number of people who have to rely on welfare or other social assistance programs or the growing number of people in the line-ups at food banks.

If they cared to talk to Canadians about these concerns they would transmit a message to the country through Parliament that they were willing to change, that they were willing to modify, that they were willing to minimize the hurt, that they were willing to admit without fear of being uncourageous or shamed that a number of policies had not worked, and that they were prepared to change course.

We would have thought, if they cared about real Canadians and their families in the regions, the cities and the farms in all our constituencies, they would not have put Parliament on automatic pilot and that they would not have put shutters on and pretended that things were proceeding in a very hopeful and enthusiastic way, because they are not.

It is not because we on this side of the House enjoy the litany of statistics or of causes that we quote. No one takes pleasure in talking about those problems, but it is the responsibility of governments, legislators and elected representatives to solve those concerns and to solve those problems on behalf of a nation. It is not the responsibility of this House to be insignificant or indifferent to what is going on in real Canada.

Canadians in greater numbers are beginning to be indifferent and cynical toward our institutions because they do not believe, when they turn on their television sets, that we are anchored in reality. They do not believe that they make a difference. They do not believe that their concerns are being heard. If they are not being heard, how can those concerns and problems be addressed?

We are discussing the remnants of a budget that is already antiquated. It is not working. It is not addressing the concerns we see day in and day out.

Rather than presenting the traditional budget during the month of February which has been a long-standing practice we have a knee-jerk reaction by the government and Minister of Finance to postpone the budget. We have a knee-jerk reaction to postpone the throne speech which would have set a new course and created a new agenda. Why postpone a budget and a throne speech? Because the Tories are engaged in a navel-gazing exercise, trying to decide who should be the captain at the automatic pilot controls at the front of the plane. The country is becoming subservient to this exercise.

I submit, and other colleagues have been suggesting, that the country deserves better. It is not that any one party is holier than thou. It is not that any one party is perfect and has all the answers. We must strive to find those answers.

We are dumbfounded that the Conservative Party and government opposite have failed so miserably in even recognizing that hurt, that pain and that desire for economic stimulation, for economic change, for economic renewal, for economic assistance, for economic hope and for economic confidence.

You cannot go into your riding without discussing with people the economic climate of the day. It is a strait-jacket on our country. It is a strait-jacket on both the young and on the old, on those who are working and those who are unemployed. It is a strait-jacket that prevents us from being what we can be. We want to help this government and this country in shedding that strait-jacket.

We marvel that this place has become so insignificant. It does not speak to the problems of Canadians who wake up early in the morning to get on with life and who are speaking to us in our offices or our churches or our school gymnasiums or wherever we meet them.

Mr. Mills: No connection.

Mr. Marchi: There is not, as my friend from Broadview—Greenwood says, a connection. That is why people are indifferent and cynical about this institution. It is not our institution, it is theirs. This is the forum of Canadians. Therefore we eagerly anticipate the election that is coming.

Canadians during the Christmas and New Years break, after they wished you the best, eagerly suggested that judgment day is approaching or that finally 1993 is here. It is the people, not the Liberal opposition or the New Democratic Party, who have finally concluded that the only way this place will once again be connected to their concerns is by allowing them to exercise their judgment on election day.

It is for the people to set the agenda and a future government to pursue that agenda with vigour, with honesty and with a sense of compassion. We have a parliamentary majority which amounts to a parliamentary dictatorship. The shutters are on. The automatic pilot is on. The turbulence continues and people are hurting. It is time this came to an end.

Mr. Ron Fisher (Saskatoon—Dundurn): Mr. Speaker, as we debate this bill which allows the government to borrow more and more money I cannot help but get the image of the interchangeability between Bay Street and the House of Commons, particularly on the opposite side. I have this image of the Campeau Corporation and I have this image of Olympia & York. There are many other examples. Of course they are examples of the abject failure of the neo-conservative, monetarist theory which this government is so hell-bent on following and has been following so assiduously ever since it got elected in 1984. With the interchangeability of it, I guess I am in a bit of a conundrum as to whether we should be saying there but for the grace of God go the people who would have trashed the Campeau Corporation and Olympia & York. I suppose if one was on Bay Street, one would say there but for the grace of God go the people who have trashed the Government of Canada and Canada as a whole.

It is no wonder, as many other members have stated, the Canadian public is absolutely distressed with us as politicians. The Canadian public is cynical about the institute of Parliament. I would like to confess to the public of Canada right now that I certainly join them in that. I do not blame them for being cynical about politicians. I have certainly become cynical myself.

We have a government which was elected in 1984 with all kinds of promises: jobs, jobs, jobs. We have a government that was re-elected in 1988, when I came into this House of Commons, with the promise that with the free trade deal with the United States this country would go into prosperity like we had never seen before.

What I have seen is that we have become impoverished as a nation because of these monetarist theories that they have been so firmly following. I as a working person can relate very well to the majority of Canadians. I have a bit of trouble relating to those from Bay Street, but I can certainly relate to those who do not come from Bay Street.

My memory is that in the late seventies and early eighties we were a prosperous nation before the previous government brought in wage and price controls, before it brought in six and five. It was going to fight inflation to the ground. It did not work, but that is beside the point. It did not work. This government which came in on the heels of a very unpopular government was going to turn things around. Of course it made it worse in spades.

I do not want to dwell too much on that. I want to address a few of the specifics of what has happened in this country, particularly under this government. I come from Saskatchewan. Other members of my caucus have spoken about the farm situation. Certainly the province of Saskatchewan, not to exclude the provinces of Manitoba or Alberta, is in dire straits.

While the member for The Battlefords—Meadow Lake was speaking one member, I think from Willowdale, was laughing. He thought it was rather funny that we were sitting here talking about oats and barley. I guess he really could not relate to anything that went on in agriculture.

I would like to remind anyone who is watching and I certainly would like to remind the members opposite and those to my right as well—I know there are some people in the Liberal caucus very knowledgeable of the farm situation, but some of them obviously are not and can certainly stand some education along those lines—as well as the Canadian public, those who do not have anything to do with farming, those who think that there is no relationship between themselves and the agricultural people of this land, of this thought.

If you eat, you are involved in agriculture. It is high time that everyone in Canada took notice of that, paid attention to it and realized that the people in the agricultural communities of this country, whether they are growing grain, potatoes or apples, certainly do make a contribution to this country. If they do not succeed, the rest of us suffer enormously because of that.

I made reference earlier to the free trade agreement with the United States and how it was supposed to bring prosperity. It certainly has not brought prosperity to Canadian farmers. Our present government has made only a shadow of an effort, if it can even be given that much credit, of trying to defend our agricultural community in the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade negotiations.

Aside from that, under the free trade agreement there is a clause which says specifically that in this instance—unlike the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade where there are 108 countries, the free trade agreement with the United States has only two countries, little Canada and the gigantic United States—neither country will use any kind of practice which would in traditional trading areas be to the detriment of the other country.

The main problem that agricultural people in this country face, particularly the grain growing ones which are in such dire straits, is precisely because of the United States' deliberate violation of that supposedly friendly agreement between themselves and Canada. They have used an export enhancement program to the extent of hundreds of millions of dollars to steal from the Canadian agricultural producers traditional markets. As a result, our ability to sell grain abroad has certainly been reduced, to the detriment of our agricultural producers.

The North American free trade agreement, signed already, hopefully will never be implemented. Certainly as a New Democrat I can assure you that we will be doing everything we can to make sure that it is never implemented. In reference to some of the things involved in the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade our government is saying: "Well, it's okay, folks, we will go to tariffication if we lose the ability to have our marketing boards in Canada. Marketing boards are really our first stand but we can always fall back to tariffication and then the farmers will be protected that way. We can put tariffs in place to protect the farmers on that". Generally the reference is to the tariff protocol referred to in the free trade agreement with the United States but not referred to at all in the NAFTA. There is specifically an exclusion of any kind of tariff protocol for agricultural products within the North America free trade agreement.

With reference to the wheat board, which is such an absolutely essential institution brought in by a Conservative government during the days of the Depression, absolutely essential to the farmer in getting a fair return for his products on the prairies, this government has done almost everything it can to gut the wheat board. It has removed oats from the wheat board to the detriment of the price of oats.

I see that I have only a minute left. Let me just say that the experience is that with the removal of oats from the wheat board, the price has suffered. Now barley is going to be removed from the protection of the wheat board. We can certainly conclude that the same will happen there. Organization after organization after organization is saying please, do not do it, begging the minister responsible for the wheat board not to do that, after him having said that the best thing he ever did was to remove oats from the wheat board. Well, no more favours from the minister; please leave the wheat board alone and put it back to its former glory.

There are many more things I could refer to. Poverty in Saskatoon, the city I come from, is the second worst in the country behind Manitoba. For heaven's sake, we are behind Newfoundland which for so long had been considered to be an impoverished province. That is what the legacy of this government has been to this nation and my constituency.

Yes, the people have been calling for an election. Please call an election and relieve us of this torture.

Mr. Joseph Volpe (Eglinton—Lawrence): Mr. Speaker, my hon. colleague from the prairie province of Saskatchewan has spoken and has ended with great eloquence.

It is an eloquence that can only be repeated by the constant plea of my own constituents in the great city of Toronto. I would have said that magnificent city of Toronto, but unfortunately we have had to use more humble adjectives over the course of the last several years, in large measure and in fact almost completely thanks to the government opposite.

The city of Toronto is that great engine that drove much of the economy of Ontario and contributed in its munificence through taxes and revenues to the greater glory of all Canadian industry and social programs. I do not speak with any blushing for the constituents of Toronto who have done that so willingly as Canadians.

They find themselves today, thanks to the government opposite, with an unemployment rate that has seen close to a quarter of a million Canadians from the Toronto area on the unemployment rolls. Think about that. There is the winging of 250,000 people. My colleagues opposite might do a little geographical research very quickly to see how many cities in Canada number 250,000 people. There are 250,000 unemployed in that place in Canada that used to drive the economic engine of the nation.

That is drastic. So tragic is the outcome of the government's economic policies in its tenure in office that even the banks, the great bastion of profitability, have taken to laying people off. The economic financial centre of Canada is close to being no more. My colleagues opposite are suggesting that perhaps we should be serious on this side of the House while they go about their business of cutting the deficit, reducing government operations and employing other types of techniques which remain a mystery in the way they will function to all Canadians but those who sit opposite on that side of the House.

I have with me my colleague from Broadview—Greenwood who has presented on many occasions suggestions for tax policy, economic policy, industrial development or assistance to the entrepreneurs who used to highlight the character of Canada that was symbolized by its innovation, its risk-taking desire and its willingness to take that extra challenge in order to produce wealth to be shared by all Canadians.

A few moments ago, my colleague could not help but wonder where the ideas that should have emerged from the administration offices have gone. They probably went the way of our trade balance. Over the course of the eight years of this administration, we have gone from a trade balance of $19.8 billion to a mere $7.4 billion.

This is from a nation whose dependency on international trade is recognized by each and every one of us. This is by a government that says that close to 35 cents out of every Canadian dollar earned is earned from international trade. This is from a government that says that the future lies with the growth of international trade. It says this while it increases the dependence of Canadian goods on one client. Imagine what would happen to anybody running a business and counts on 80 cents for every dollar earned on one client alone. What shoddy planning. What absolutely abysmal near-sightedness. Just this week on an international platform in an international environment in Davos, Switzerland we see that our trade people are bereft of any representation by senior members of government. They are getting snookered by the Mexicans who are part of the North American free trade agreement.

Mexicans are in Europe looking for and pursuing new clients for products that are going to be coming out of North America. They are looking for new investment and new investors and are trying to create opportunities. Where is our government?

An hon. member: Where are others?

Mr. Volpe: Try not to defend the government by asking where are others? Take a look at what has happened. It is nowhere to be seen. In the richest market in the entire world it is nowhere to be see. It is content to continue to reduce Canada to an exporter of resources only and to one client. Is it any wonder then that over the course of the administration of the government opposite our current account balance has gone from a surplus of $3.4 billion in 1984 to a deficit of $24.7 billion just this last year? Shame. That is an absolutely horrid shame.

This is a government that came into power with the stated desire to create jobs, to cut taxes, and to create a better environment for Canadians. It says it is trying to create wealth for Canadians. What did it do? Since 1984 direct income taxes have gone up from $37.5 billion to $73.5 billion just a year and a half ago.

Corporate taxes have actually decreased over that same period of time. They have decreased from $11.3 billion to $10.8 billion. This is a government that does not understand how to use tax policy to create wealth. It does not do anything for trade. It does not do anything for planning. Planning is a misnomer for anything that it has done with respect to the GST.

The government initially planned on garnisheeing in the range of $25.5 billion to $28 billion with a 7 per cent tax based on an exchange of goods and services of approximately $400 billion. That was the value of that exchange. That should have brought to our treasury approximately $28 billion.

Last year the government was able, or at least this is what it reports, to collect $15.5 billion. Either it has succeeded in driving 50 per cent of the market underground, and experts admit that the minimum that has been driven underground is 15 per cent, or its estimates were wrong all along, or, and I hate to say it, it is deliberately deceiving everybody with the figures it is putting out. Right now on the basis of revenues collected so far this year it is again another $1.3 billion short.

This is a government that has used taxes to whip Canadians into submission. Since 1984 indirect taxes have increased from $18.12 billion to $28.57 billion. When it is taking this kind of money from the marketplace, from Canadians, what is it forcing them to do? We have seen some of them go underground. Others have moved south. Enterprise has diminished and risk-taking has been discouraged. Even worse it has also forced municipalities and provinces to assume the burden that exists among the general electorate.

• (1230)

I see that some of the members opposite have difficulty dealing with the reality of the statistics that come from their own department. Perhaps this is yet another indication that they are not only tired but insensitive and, dare I say it, unable to read the signs. They should leave and leave today.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, as I was looking over the statistics that I received from my colleague from Eglinton—Lawrence I could not help but wonder how the government could possibly think it could get away with these incredible tax increases.

In 1984 the federal revenue from income tax was $37.5 billion. In 1990 it was $73 billion, and that figure does include inflation. As well in 1990 there was close to $15 billion in GST revenues. That money came out of the system and came from individuals. Therefore, we are talking about a comparison of about $37 billion in 1984 to almost $90 billion in 1990, if we include the GST.

That is one of the reasons there is very little confidence or spirit in this country right now. I do not want to ignore the reality of there being absolutely no inflation in this country. However the ratchet the government has used on inflation has been too aggressive. It is nice to talk about there being absolutely no inflation in this country. Yesterday the Prime Minister said in the House that we have the lowest inflation in 30 years. However he must recognize that there must be a balance. When there are so many people on unemployment and welfare Canadians would rather have a little more inflation and have people in the work force with the dignity of a job.

The same goes for interest rates. We could say because of the lower inflation that we have the lowest annualized interest rates in 20 years. I recognize that. However the problem is that there is no confidence. There is no will to move ahead. Surely the government is not stupid. There are intelligent people over there. They are hearing the same things that we are hearing. How long are they going to let this torture continue? It must drive them as crazy as it is driving us. It must be the same torture for them as it is for us. What are they waiting for?

There are ways of igniting the entrepreneurial spirit in this country. I want to mention the Small Businesses Loans Act which the Minister of Finance presented in his financial address before Christmas. The Small Businesses Loans Act is a good piece of legislation. There are areas for improvement in it. The $5 million ceiling for eligibility is a little low. The fact that we have an instrument that will force the financial institutions of this country to loan money to small businesses, and that 85 per cent of the loan is guaranteed by the Crown, is a good thing.

I am hearing two things from the small businesses in my riding.

First, I am hearing that most of the bank managers are not aware of it or do not want to get involved in the paper work. The government must use its force and influence to force the financial institutions of this country to implement this piece of legislation. We give the financial institutions of this country all kinds of tax preferences and legal loopholes. We are hearing from these bank managers right now. The president of the Bank of Montreal says that he has ways to ignite the economy. Let us challenge him.

How many small business loans has he given out under the Small Businesses Loans Act? Why does the government not use its influence to bring these banks to a state of accountability? I read a speech the other day by the president of the Royal Bank in which he said that small business entrepreneurship is where it is at in terms of getting people back to work.

I say this in a constructive way. Why do we not take the Small Businesses Loans Act, a piece of legislation that all of us in this House support, and force these bankers to use it. The greatest hope of new job creation lies with the small businessmen and women of this country, with people who want to have a home-based business. Today with the new technology and the new economy people can start businesses right from their own recreation rooms or homes. However, they need access to capital. We have an instrument in this House but we are not using it.

The government cannot say that what I am saying is not constructive. It is totally constructive. However the government is not acting.

It is really sad to hear the glib comments over there when there are so many people who are having a tough time making it from payroll to payroll. There are so many people out there right now who are in such pain, who are in real pain. What are we doing here? Are we making a real connection in this room? We are not really making a great connection. All we can do on this side of the House at this time is try to make the government accountable and try to push it and motivate it.

There are instruments right under its nose and it is not using them. What would be wrong with the Minister of Finance calling in the senior bankers of this country and telling them to implement the Small Businesses Loans Act and put some capital into the system.

The greatest hope for new job creation in this country lies with the small and medium-sized businesses. We do have an instrument that can put capital back into the system, back into their hands, quickly.

I would make one other suggestion. The float for the Small Businesses Loans Act is around $4.5 billion and if it needs more than that we should make sure it gets it. The cost to the Treasury of servicing the Small Businesses Loans Act in the last three years has only been approximately $25 million to $27 million. That is a very inexpensive price to pay for an instrument that can be so successful in mobilizing the spirit and the will of this nation.

Once again I implore this government to use the power of the Minister of Finance to call all these bank managers in for one of those cabinet discussions and tell them to implement this piece of legislation which the duly elected members of this House of Commons support. Let us get people back to work.

• (1240)

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, the members of this House are using this debate to put on record some of their thoughts on the government's economic policy and on the course of action we in this country should be taking to try to achieve full employment and to get the economy of this country back on track.

I would like to join in that effort and to discuss with the members of this House some ideas that I think should be looked at by the people of Canada if we are going to get our economy right.

Here is the first question. What is the goal of government economic policy? Over the last eight years, and particularly with the dominance of John Crow as the Governor of the Bank of Canada, this government has focused on the objective of reducing inflation to zero. The Governor of the Bank of Canada, along with the Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister, has made much of the gains they have made in reducing inflation to zero. They have placed this goal ahead of the goal of achieving full employment and keeping Canadians working and expanding the base of work across this country.

The result of these policies, of course, has been disastrous for Canadians. What we we hear from the government is that they are now bereft of new ideas. They continue to persist in the assumption that the free trade agreement and NAFTA have been good for Canada when in fact it is evident to every Canadian that the free trade agreement has failed and has caused miserable unemployment. This is particularly so in central Canada. It has deprived our legislatures right across this country of the capacity to deal with the economic problems we face.

The government has added to the deficit, rather than decreased it, as the natural result of its policies. If one reduces economic activity, which has been the government's set purpose, government revenues decline. If you do that through the device of high interest rates, the government cost of borrowing increases. Therefore, we have had the phenomenon of this Conservative government, and other Conservative governments across Canada, running higher and higher deficits. Year after year these people come back to Parliament or to the legislatures to explain. "Oh my goodness, we're sorry, we were out of line last year. We underestimated the deficit. The deficit has actually increased when we meant to decrease it".

Caught in this desperate mix, these governments continue to follow the same policies. They continue to cut back on public investment. They continue to scare private investment out of the market. They continue to keep interests higher than they should be. They continue, therefore, to add to the deficit rather than detract from it. They are caught in the spiral and Canadians are caught in the spiral with them.

Let me suggest that there are alternative economic policies that the people of Canada should be considering and that this Parliament should consider. First, we must get our goals right. The goal of an economic policy for our country should be to encourage employment for its people. That must be the objective and it must be the prime and overriding objective. It is through employment that people participate in society. I see it as a moral and ethical obligation on government to provide the opportunity for work for all its people. I believe other governments have demonstrated that it is possible to do so. If we had a government that would co-operate with provincial governments—rather than fight with them—perhaps we could pull together in this country to achieve the objective of full employment for our people.

Specifically, I would suggest the following. First, we need tax policies which focus on getting private capital investment moving again, particularly in small and local businesses.

Second, government financial priorities must focus on job creation. All government expenditures should be judged on that basis. We need to encourage public investment rather than discourage it. We must be encouraging the development of social programs which in turn provide jobs for people. We must be encouraging rather than discouraging the arts, culture and heritage because these are job creators in themselves.

Government financial policies should not focus on cutbacks, but should focus on maintaining employment in the public sector and in related sectors.

Third, the government must move to reduce interest rates even further. The Canadian public will be seeing interest rates that are lower than they have been but the public must also understand that our interest rates still remain substantially higher than they should be when related to the rate of inflation. There is significant room to further reduce interest rates in this country.

Fourth, the government must be prepared to allow the Canadian dollar to fall further. There has been a drop over the last period but it should fall significantly further. We are an export economy. We depend on tourism exports for our livelihood. This will stimulate and help our economy.

Fifth, we should encourage Canadian investment. It is critically important that we begin to regain control of our economy. Under this government, more and more of our economy has continued to be owned by outsiders. It is important that we begin to change the direction of investment so that Canadians increasingly can regain control of their own economy.

This of course applies to trade policies, which is the sixth point. Clearly the government's trade policies have failed. It is essential that we should cancel the free trade agreement, that we should not proceed with NAFTA and that we should develop a totally different set of trading relations with our partners than this government and its Liberal friends have agreed to.

Seventh, we must put a real emphasis on training and education. Training and education are at the heart of where we are as a country. We have one of the worst over-all records in terms of training and education policies of all industrial countries. We spend more and receive less. We do so because the central government, the federal government, has failed in its role of pulling together all of those involved. It is not just provincial governments but school boards and local governments, universities, colleges, the private education sector, business and labour across this country that are needed to develop a unified education and training policy in this country.

Let me give the government credit in the area of the competitiveness study or the prosperity initiative. The educational side of that study produced a number of significant ideas and it is time this government acted on those ideas.

Eighth, we need community-based economic planning. We had an economic workshop in my riding. I convened people from every sector of the community. We sat for a day and looked at ways in which the federal government can encourage job creation in Victoria. This workshop came up with a number of very good specific ideas: an ocean engineering centre, a community learning council, heritage arts and culture policies which would be of assistance, regional economic planning and a harbour that can be at the heart of job creation in Victoria. These are ideas which do not depend on substantial federal government largess, but do depend on government being ready to encourage local initiative and community ideas.

Ninth, it should reduce the deficit on a step-by-step basis rather than attempting to do it overnight when, as I showed earlier, that produces the opposite reaction.

Tenth, there should be a willingness to accept a moderate rate of inflation. It is clear that a zero rate of inflation is bad for the economy. Our economy, as has been shown since the end of the Second World War, functions most effectively with a moderate rate of inflation.

An hon. member: What is that?

Mr. Brewin: It is inflation of two, three or four per cent, in that order.

An hon. member: How about one per cent to one and a half per cent?

Mr. Brewin: My friend says one per cent to one and a half per cent, but he knows that that in fact for most people is effectively zero or minus zero inflation. We have an economic policy. It is important that this country proceeds with it. We can achieve full employment under these policies.

• (1250)

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I am of course not enthusiastic at the prospect of speaking in this debate. We have said many times that we have a tired, old government in Canada, but I must say that when it comes to economic matters even the opposition is getting tired. They are tired because the government does not seem to respond to the criticisms of its economic policy.

The hon. member for Victoria who has just spoken has put forward some policies that are quite sensible. Not all of them are sensible, but the vast majority of them are. As I listened to his list I thought perhaps he was reading from the Leader of the Opposition's speech at the University of Ottawa last week that outlined some of the policy suggestions that my friend has put forward. I know it will be followed up by him in subsequent speeches.

When he got on to free trade and tearing up the agreement and things like that, I realized that this was one of the Bob Rae crowd speaking. I note that the premier of Ontario is on a campaign against the free trade agreement that will probably ensure the agreement will likely stay on.

The hon. member is interested in my views on the free trade agreement and he will hear them in due course. I was not proposing to discuss free trade today, but I support our party's position which is to renegotiate the free trade agreement.

I may say this that the hon. member will be interested in knowing. We recognize that after almost five years of having had the free trade agreement in place, we assume that the damage the agreement was going to do to the Canadian economy is largely done. We assume that sooner or later we are going to see some of the much trumped-up benefits from the free trade agreement. We feel that it is going to be very difficult to come into office at this point and rip up the free trade deal.

We do think it is important for Canada to get a better deal out of it. We are anxious to take over as a government and do the negotiating because as he knows, and he must agree, this government is totally inept when it comes to negotiations. It has botched almost every negotiation it has entered. It comes up with a deal, but it is a deal at any price.

We Liberals have some principles and some bottom lines that we will not abandon. Unfortunately this government was prepared to abandon the entire country to the United States in an effort to get a free trade deal in 1988. It was prepared to give away all the powers of the federal government in order to get constitutional deals. This government has a complete lack of backbone when it comes to sensible and intelligent negotiating. Canadians have seen that repeatedly during the eight years that it has occupied the treasury benches.

This morning we were treated to a speech by the hon. member for Essex—Windsor. He engaged in a creative rewriting of the economic history of Ontario in an effort to show that the New Democratic Party somehow was not responsible for the huge debt that the province of Ontario is now encumbered with thanks to Mr. Rae's government. The Minister of Supply and Services was here and heard this balderdash this morning when it was suggested, apparently quite seriously, that the reason there is a $10 billion deficit in Ontario today is because the NDP inherited a $3 billion deficit when they took over from the Liberals in 1990.

Of course we know that in 1990 the recession began. Certainly economic projections both in Ontario and nationally changed as a result of the recession that began in that year. The campaign in Ontario was conducted during August. By September it was apparent that what had been projected to be a surplus in the accounts of the province of Ontario for the financial year ending in March 1991 was rapidly deteriorating and turning into a deficit.

The new government increased the deficit by fiddling the books. It changed accounting practices part way through the year to include in the 1991-92 year certain figures that would not normally have been included. It took the view that it might as well get the deficit up so it would not look quite so bad the next year. It also had a pot or a contingency fund that was allowed for in the estimates. That had not been spent when it took office in September 1990 and it promptly spent that money.

The Ontario NDP government increased the deficit by about $1.5 billion from what it otherwise would have been—in effect doubling it that one year—and claimed that that was the Liberal deficit. It was not. The NDP took over responsibility halfway through the year. It ran up the costs by fiddling the books and charging this extra money to the accounts. Then it said: "We inherited a $3 billion debt". Then the hon. member for Essex—Windsor, with a straight face, said it set to work to fix up that mess but somehow managed to increase the deficit from $3 billion to $10 billion in one year, and that was after its own budget. It introduced a budget supposedly to fix the problem and it fixed it all right. It tripled the deficit in one year.

It was an unbelievable performance by the hon. member for Essex—Windsor. The hon. member for South Shore was quick on the uptake. He figured out there was something wrong with what was being said but he went on a show and tell routine. As my colleague from Bonavista—Trinity—Conception will well recall, we referred to his speech as his swan song. It was apparent that he is getting very nervous about his chances in the next election. I know that the Minister of Supply and Services is getting the same feeling. There are so many people campaigning to be Liberal candidates in Lanark—Carleton that he must be quaking in his boots by now.

The hon. member for South Shore began his remarks by blaming the Liberal government back in 1984, as this government has been wont to do, for all of the government's financial woes. What a performance it was. Imagine blaming a government that has been out of office for eight years for everything that has gone wrong. It is still doing it.

Mr. Dick: It is the truth.

Mr. Milliken: The hon. Minister of Supply and Services says it is the truth. He knows that it is not. He had eight years to do everything right. The minister was part of that group that was elected in 1984 that had all the answers. It told Canadians throughout the campaign that it was going to solve the deficit and that it knew how to fix all of Canada's economic woes. It said that if we can just create jobs the trickle down effect will be so great that everybody will get rich. We know that is not the case. We know that during the eight years the Conservative government has been in place the relative wealth of Canadians has declined in absolute terms. It has been a tough eight years. Tory times are tough times and Canadians have experienced that. They know that. I keep getting told that everywhere I go in my constituency.

The Minister of Supply and Services laughs. He thinks that expression is—

Mr. Dick: That is 1930s jargon.

Mr. Milliken: —1930s jargon. The hon. member is right. It is 1930s jargon and it is still true today. It was true with Mr. Diefenbaker's government in 1958 to 1962. Tory times are tough times. That has been illustrated at least three times this century and the hon. Minister of Supply and Services knows it perfectly well.

The thing that was surprising, and I will grant the minister this, is that for the first four years there apparently was some kind of economic miracle in Canada and things went reasonably well. I can tell the minister, and I suspect that he secretly knows this in his heart of hearts, that it is because of the policies introduced by the previous government before it left office in 1984 that things went so well. Since then the policies that he has pursued have in fact put the economy into a recession.

The hon. member knows that his Minister of Finance stood in this House and said he was going to slow the Canadian economy down. It was the government's announced and avowed policy. It was going to slow the Canadian economy down, slam on the brakes and induce a recession in order to take the heat off the inflationary spiral it claimed we were locked in.

That is what he said. The Minister of Supply and Services must have been in cabinet. He must have been privy to the discussions that led to that incredible statement by the Minister of Finance. He put the brakes on all right and instead of taking them off once the economy started to slow down he held on.

The minister said: "We are holding the course, we are steering the course". Surely the minister remembers those statements. He said: "We are holding the course, we are doing the right thing for Canada, and if we just hold on long enough everything will work out fine". The government held on long enough and brought the whole economy to a grinding halt. The record number of bankruptcies in 1992, even higher than in 1991 which had been the highest year ever, are testament to the suffering that this minister and this government has inflicted on Canadians for at least the last four years, and I would suggest really the past eight.

The difficulty we are facing today is compounded by the government's continued insistence on eliminating inflation and pressing for a zero rate of inflation. By doing so it is driving Canadians out of work. It is keeping them from getting jobs. While the goal may be an extremely laudable one in pure economic theory the pain that the minister and the government has inflicted on the Canadian economy goes far beyond what is reasonable or necessary.

A Liberal government would not have engaged in such dogged pursuit of such an illusory goal as zero inflation. This government has badly served Canadians by its policy. It is unfair, it should not have happened. I suggest that in the proper course what Canadians need and deserve is an opportunity to express their views about this policy and the other policies the government has pursued.

We have a mechanism for doing so. That mechanism is an election. I think Your Honour knows that an election is what should happen. It should be called at once. The government has gone beyond the time—

Mr. Whittaker: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I understand that there is an opportunity to wind up debate on the report stage of this bill if the House would simply extend for a short time longer.

I understand that there is a disposition in the House to give myself and the member from Moose Jaw—Lake Centre the opportunity of making our remarks. We would then be able to wrap up report stage debate prior to coming back after Question Period. Do we have that agreement?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is there unanimous consent to extend debate now?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): There is no unanimous consent.

It being one o'clock p.m., I do now leave the chair until two o'clock p.m. pursuant to Standing Order 24(2).

The House took recess at 1 p.m.

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

INDUSTRY, SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to strongly condemn the decision of the minister of trade to close the Whitehorse and Yellowknife offices of Industry, Science and Technology Canada.

This decision could not come at a worse time. Northern economies are struggling to diversify, to seek new markets for local products, and to train local business people and workers so they have the skills to take them into the 21st century.

It is absolutely the opposite of what the government says it wants to do. Ironically these are the very same goals that the government's own prosperity agenda consultation sets out for northerners and for all Canadians. In fact it was the ISTC staff that organized the consultation in Yukon.

The employees of ISTC understand the unique problems faced by northern businesses. That understanding cannot be replaced by a 1-800 number from Vancouver. In the name of restraint the trade minister is silencing a strong voice for trade and business in the north. Northerners want to know: In whose interest does this government serve?

RACISM

Mr. Vincent Della Noce (Laval East): Mr. Speaker, I am here today to speak about recent happenings in southern Florida. As many are aware, for the second time in two years a local tabloid thought it would be humorous to attack Quebecers in a racist manner.

Because of our government's reluctance I flew down at my own expense to support the efforts of our community and their local voice, the newspaper le Soleil de la Floride.

To those who supported me and sent me off with such strong words of encouragement, my thanks. I am happy to report, for the record, that because of the unity shown by the government of south Florida and religious, ethnic and civic leaders we emerged victorious.

When people stand together against injustice every one wins.

[Translation]

Unfortunately, by its merciless mocking of Quebecers, this publication did considerable harm to our community.

After apologies and promises that it would never happen again, as far as we are concerned, the incident is closed, and what is important now is for us to live together as harmoniously as possible.

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT WEEK

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, International Development Week gives all Canadians an opportunity to reflect upon the importance of our efforts to promote global development and peace.

To this end Canada must provide its aid more directly to the world's poorest in the world's poorest nations. World population growth must be addressed to priority spending on women's programs including health and education. Environmental degradation is directly linked to human poverty and threatens the globe's survival, our survival.

Aid must be directly linked to decreases in military spending and human rights protection in recipient countries. The international assistance efforts of non-governmental organizations on behalf of civil societies must be encouraged and supported.

Government policies must be people centred with a focus on direct poverty alleviation. Poverty demands justice here and abroad. Focusing away from direct poverty alleviation to a me first economic trade focus for aid will contribute to a security disaster in this country and rejection of the government that supports such policies.

TIOXIDE CANADA

Mr. Jean-Marc Robitaille (Terrebonne): Mr. Speaker, yesterday we heard that Tioxide Canada has decided to cancel its plans for a new plant in Bécancour and go to the United States.

For years, the company and its president, Mr. Jean-Marc Turcotte, have dumped massive amounts of pollutants into the St. Lawrence River.

For years, they have made commitments to governments and residents, without ever meeting those commitments—just like the Liberals, as a matter of fact. After spending all that time polluting the river, they have now decided to go to the United States.

They just violated the principle of sustainable development set out in the green plan. Destroy the environment and leave, letting hundreds of jobs fall by the wayside.

The damage this company has done to the St. Lawrence River adds up to billions and billions of dollars, paid by this country's taxpayers. The company's sole response was to get out and ignore its responsibilities.

This is entirely unacceptable, and I ask the people—

[English]

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

Mr. George Proud (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, Canada's veterans and the employees who serve them at the Department of Veterans Affairs are very concerned. It is time this government made a clear and definitive statement about the future of the department and its plans for it.

The recent cabinet shuffle which resulted in the combining of the responsibilities of veterans affairs and national defence only heightened the concern so many people feel. At the present time there is not even a permanent deputy minister of veterans affairs. Employees fear that their department has been quietly downgraded.

Veterans fear that without a full-time minister to look after their concerns they will be forced to take a back seat and that the programs which have been up to this time the envy of the world will be allowed to deteriorate as the government pursues its relentless cutting of social programs.

I call upon the government to make a clear and definitive statement about the future of this department so that employees can get on with their job and veterans can rest easy knowing that there is genuine concern for their welfare.

FEED FREIGHT ASSISTANCE

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, as a result of the December economic statement the Feed Freight Assistance Program will be reduced by 10 per cent for two years. The principle behind this program is to equalize the cost of feed freight to all farmers. However the current plan to implement the reduction by 10 per cent for each farmer means that farmers in Atlantic Canada will have their costs increased as much as $6 per tonne while others have insignificant increases.

The Atlantic Farmers Council has proposed a more equitable formula which increases the cost of feed to all farmers by approximately $1.30 per tonne instead of the inconsistent formula. This approach maintains the original principle of equalized costs of feed for all farmers. I call on the Minister of Agriculture to adopt this formula or one very similar to it.

TRADE

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, if Conservatives in transnational corporations have their way Canadians would be stuck with another disastrous trade agreement in 11 months.

The Conservatives are attempting to tie the hands of future generations of Canadians by restricting the right of Canadians to make decisions that affect their lives. Social programs, employment and jobs, water exports, energy sales, provincial government powers and economic programs have all been sacrificed in the Canada–United States Free Trade Agreement and now the North American free trade agreement.

The Liberals refuse to stand up to defend either Canada's heritage or its future. Canadians can stop this new trade deal with Mexico and the United States because we must have a federal election before January 1, 1994.

Canadians know that only one political party, the New Democratic Party, will defend their rights to make their own decisions, to decide about jobs in their communities, to decide how their children will be able to find work, and to decide on the future of their social programs. New Democrats say no to NAFTA and we will offer our alternatives to Canadians.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, for several months, Mr. Robert Maltais of Amos has been a victim of serious injustice as a result of an administrative error when the unemployment insurance computer processed his file.

Mr. Maltais met all the requirements to be eligible for unemployment insurance benefits and was attending a training program recommended by the Unemployment Insurance Commission.

The commission's mistake resulted in an overpayment of more than $6,000 and was extremely prejudicial to Mr. Maltais. The Canada Employment and Immigration Commission has appealed the decision of the board of referees to the umpire.

Today Mr. Maltais gave a moving description of his case on the radio program Contact Jean Lapierre. We all hope this matter will be cleared up soon as possible.

METROPOLITAN TORONTO

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, how many more jobs must be lost in metro Toronto before the federal government will finally do something? The latest unemployment figures indicate that 11.8 per cent living in the greater Toronto region are looking for work. That is even higher than the national rate.

The unemployed in my riding are telling me that opportunities for job retraining are virtually nil, yet the only game plan of this government is to punish the unemployed by reducing and restricting UI benefits. Everybody knows the best way to reduce UI expenditures is to create more jobs. Food banks are growing. We will never eliminate food banks in Canada until we give people good jobs instead of bad cutbacks.

The Leader of the Official Opposition has recommended good job creation programs but the Prime Minister ignores constructive suggestions. Today in metro Toronto 250,000 unemployed people are asking when they will have a chance to elect a new government.

Let us get Canada working again. Let us have a federal election.

ANTI-SEMITISM

Mr. Jean-Pierre Hogue (Outremont): Mr. Speaker, in the past few weeks, there have been a number of shocking incidents aimed at a specific group of Canadian citizens. Recently synagogues were attacked. A few days ago it was a school bus.

We all know how valued some symbols are and what they represent in a society. When symbols are violated it means a violation of what is most profound and most important to that society. In this case the targets were religion, education and small children. Children are defenceless, and most are innocence itself.

• (1410)

The Jewish population in the riding of Outremont and elsewhere is an integral part of Canada and Quebec. They are citizens with full rights and privileges. We cannot let such occurrences go on. It is an attack on the integrity of a society and also a form of blackmail. By protecting them, we protect ourselves.

CANADIAN UNITY

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, what more needs to be said about Jacques Parizeau's recent statements except that they do not reflect reality?

The PQ leader's fictional, exclusionary view of Quebec simply ignores the truth for we are a rich, diverse society, respectful of those who are different from ourselves. We are the Canadian people.

With so many challenges facing us, with our economy in bad shape and with so many young people looking for jobs or, worse, thinking of leaving Quebec, how can Mr. Parizeau advance his society by setting out divisions among Quebecers? His view that independence could be achieved without the non-francophone vote sends a disturbing message that must be turned back, for if we have learned anything from history it is that we cannot remain silent in the face of such xenophobia.

Instead of Mr. Parizeau's view of a house divided, we need to work diligently toward a more embracing, integrating society where difference and diversity are appreciated.

There is no place in our kind of Canada for his approach. We are equal citizens regardless of race, religion or gender, whether we speak English or French, whether we were born here or have chosen to live here in Quebec, in Canada.

THE CONSTITUTION

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): Mr. Speaker, in an interview with La Presse the hon. member for Hull—Aylmer claimed that the dinosaurs from the west did not take part in last night's vote on New Brunswick's request for a constitutional change.

Although the hon. member either could not or would not identify a single dinosaur, let me assure him that all government members from the west who were in town were present and voted in favour of the amendment.

This is in sharp contrast to the pink elephants of the Quebec bloc that helped block the passage of this legislation in December because it showed that Canadians from coast to coast want to build a stronger and more tolerant country, a country which the hon. member apparently wishes to see torn apart by rhetoric.

ARMENIA

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Mr. Speaker, over the past couple of weeks I have received hundreds of letters from constituents deeply concerned about the situation in Armenia.

In December, President Ter Petrossian declared the republic of Armenia to be in a state of national disaster. I have written to the Secretary of State for External Affairs and to the Prime Minister urging them that Canada contribute to easing the suffering in this corner of the world.

[Translation]

The lives of four million Armenians are threatened by famine and epidemics. Energy shortages have paralysed daily life. Schools and factories are closed and more than 500,000 refugees are facing a harsh winter, without shelter.

The situation in Armenia is disastrous. Canada must do everything it can to end the conflict between Armenia and Azerbaijan and relieve the suffering of the Armenian people. We have a moral duty to do so, Mr. Speaker.

PROPERTY TAXES

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, all elected representatives of the Montreal urban community have asked the Minister of Finance to cancel his decision to freeze grants-in-lieu-of-taxes paid to municipalities.

Michel Hamelin, chairman of the Montreal Urban Community, believes this decision will mean a major loss of revenue for 1993, especially since it was announced after the municipalities had adopted their budgets. The impact of this measure will be felt more and more in the years to come and will seriously affect the MUC's financial situation.

Considering that the cost of municipal services was increasing steadily, the MUC chairman pointed out that the federal government was subject to property tax, the main source of municipal revenues.

That is the crux of the problem. By not paying its taxes, the federal government is not acting like a responsible citizen. It also sets a bad example for the rest of the country. This attitude puts municipalities at risk by increasing their tax burden. It is just another example of the incompetence and irresponsibility of this government.

ELK ISLAND NATIONAL PARK

Mr. Brian O'Kurley (Elk Island): Mr. Speaker, one of Canada's most important natural resources is our national parks.

Alberta's national parks have played a key role in economic development by attracting tourists from all over the world. Elk Island is one such park that invites those who appreciate species like bison, elk and beaver.

Although the National Parks Act clearly includes in its statement of purpose that parks are for the people of Canada for their benefit and enjoyment, a recent proposal has revealed intentions to limit human access and experiences within Elk Island. By closing a key access road from the Trans-Canada Yellowhead Highway 16, 75 per cent of the traffic that visits the park via this highway will be affected.

The Government of Canada must ensure a reasonable balance between isolating national environmental treasures and offering opportunities for a variety of human experiences within our parks.

Let us work together to improve roads and responsible recreational opportunities in our national parks. Let us all work together for an improved environment and a better Canada.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. David Bjornson (Selkirk—Red River): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to voice the concerns of citizens of the city of Winnipeg regarding the safety of the city's water supply.

The NDP government of Ontario has given leave to a mining company to start a project on the shores of Shoal Lake, which is the source of drinking water for the city. This has been done without any public environmental review of the K.P.M. project.

I am not about to prejudge the results of an environmental review but I want to acknowledge to the House the hypocritical environment policies of the NDP government of Ontario.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

THE ECONOMY

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the Prime Minister said that the triple crown was just around the corner. This morning we received some statistics and we understand what he meant. For the third year in a row we have seen a record number of bankruptcies in Canada. That is the real triple crown nobody should be bragging about.

How can the Minister of Finance say that his economic policies are working when, for the third year in a row, we have seen an increase in the number of bankruptcies in Canada?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, it is true there have been a large number of bankruptcies in Canada this year. Some of them are due to the slow-down of the economy and some are due to the adjustment, the restructuring and rationalization that is taking place in the Canadian economy.

I remind the hon. member that the figures for December show that bankruptcies fell to the lowest level in four months, the lowest level since August. Obviously there is a turn around and some of the effects of the policies of the Government of Canada, the adjustment that is taking place, the restructuring that is taking place are starting to settle in.

The fundamentals are in place. It is noted that today the interest rates fell further. That is encouraging news. As I indicated, there has been new job creation in seven of the last eight months. We have had growth in the last six consecutive quarters. Therefore there are some positive indicators.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, it is a bit amusing because on February 4, 1992 the minister said there was a decline in December of the previous year. Using the same argument, he concluded that it would be better in 1992.

He is serving us the same argument that did not work last year. There was an increase last year over the previous year. Another promise the government cannot keep is a reduction in the number of bankruptcies in Canada.

[Translation]

I would like to put a question to the Minister of Finance because this morning he asked Canadians to give him suggestions for a budget that should normally be presented in the month of February and has now been postponed indefinitely, for all we know.

I would like to tell the Minister of Finance that we suggested to him over a year ago that an infrastructure program be created in conjunction with provincial and municipal governments. This would result in immediate job creation and produce infrastructures that would be useful to all Canadians in the years to come.

Why does the Minister of Finance refuse to accept our suggestion? Is it because it comes from the opposition?

• (1420)

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, that suggestion made from time to time by the hon. member has been discarded because quite frankly, he has not been able to outline to the Canadian people and to the House where the money would come from.

He said billions of dollars would be spent by the federal government, the provincial government and the municipal government. All of that money would have to be borrowed or raised in the form of taxation. He has not fulfilled his undertaking to explain just how that would be financed.

Speaking of suggestions, I am rather enamoured with the suggestion the hon. member made yesterday. As a substitute for the GST, he is talking about a hidden, secretive and sneaky tax which would tax food and would be buried so that Canadians would not know how he was going to tax the Canadian people. What a sham. We are not going to buy that.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, we have always said that when there is a program that the municipalities are asking for, they have their financial problems, but they believe that to have an economy that works we need growth. There are 1.7 million people unemployed and the country wants growth. When will the minister stop fighting inflation? The economic policies of his government are completely bankrupt. That is why we have statistics on that today.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, it is interesting how the hon. member evades the very salient issue which has been raised. I asked the hon. Leader of the Opposition to come—

Mr. Chrétien: Call an election, chicken.

Ms. Copps: That is what you said in 1991.

Mr. Mazankowski: Are they ever sensitive over there. Are they ever sensitive about this issue. I asked very simply that the hon. Leader of the Opposition come clean. Is he proposing a hidden form of secretive, sneaky tax to replace the GST? Is he proposing a tax that would tax food? Yes or no?

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

Twelve months ago the minister when faced with record bankruptcies had a choice: change his economic policies or do nothing. He chose the latter. The result is 77,000 additional economic casualties of this government's fiscal policies.

Was it just plain incompetence or typical Tory arrogance that allowed the Minister of Finance to sit and do nothing while 77,000 Canadians were pushed beyond the brink into bankruptcy?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, in my December statement outlining an economic plan there are clearly a number of very positive initiatives that will bolster growth, that will create jobs, that will generate economic activity particularly in the small business sector.

There are a number of initiatives that will beef up the small business sector and encourage the growth of jobs and strengthen and enhance that very important job creation sector.

It is interesting to note that the Liberals opposite oppose any solid initiative. What they want to do is tax and spend and borrow. That is not our policy.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, let us talk about the business climate in Canada for a minute. In the minister's own province of Alberta business bankruptcies are up by 12 per cent. In the province of Ontario they are up by 16 per cent. In the province of Nova Scotia they are up by 25 per cent. That is this government's record of inaction in dealing with the business community in Canada.

How can the Minister of Finance feel anything but shame with the fact that under his direction and stewardship thousands of Canadians, 77,000 Canadians, have been driven belly up into bankruptcy?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated there have been a number of business casualties. I have not ignored that fact. I also indicated, and it is fair to acknowledge, that bankruptcies in the month of December fell to their lowest level in four months.

The hon. member asks me what we are doing. Well, if he would just listen for a few minutes, last December we announced initiatives that froze UI premiums to provide a premium holiday for new employees. There is the 10 per cent investment tax credit for new purchases of machinery so that businesses can become more competitive and more productive. We have improved access to capital, announced improvements to R and D, improvements in the treatment of capital cost allowances and high-tech equipment, renewed funding for the IRAP, announced an extension of the home buyers plan and provided assistance for the oil and gas sector and assistance for the mining sector.

Those are all positive initiatives that are now starting to have a pay-off for Canadians and for the economic activity and particularly for the jobless.

[Translation]

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance.

The minister has said that his policies are a great success. Today we have just learned that the number of bankruptcies last year broke all Canadian records. This government's policies are a total failure.

Yesterday the Prime Minister asked for alternatives and suggestions. I have a suggestion for the Minister of Finance: eliminate the tax shelters, created by the Liberal government, for rich people family trusts. This is a good suggestion.

It was unjust then, and it still is. Why does the government not close this loophole and use the money to create jobs and save small businesses?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, that is precisely what we are doing. We are closing the loopholes so that these trust beneficiaries will not evade capital gains tax.

This government's record in terms of closing the so-called Liberal loopholes is very dramatic in fashion. I would be glad to document it and send the hon. leader of the New Democratic Party an itemized list of every initiative we took which closes the loopholes left by the previous administration.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, the reality is that this government has closed more factories than it has closed tax loopholes and has lost more jobs than it has created.

There are many things the Minister of Finance could do. He could close the private family trusts for the wealthy. He could close that tax loophole as well as the business entertainment expenses deduction, the capital gains exemptions for the wealthy and the interest deductibility for offshore companies.

I say to the Minister of Finance that if he wants to get revenue to support the creation of jobs and the future of Canadians, why does he not close these loopholes? Why does he not do it now?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, what the hon. leader of the New Democratic Party is suggesting is that she would like to make it more difficult for the small business sector to do business in this country. We do not subscribe to that.

With respect to trusts, I ask her to read the legislation again. She will find that the loophole is being closed.

I could name 20 different items that we have addressed. We ended the abuse of the scientific research tax credit. We eliminated tax shelters based on investments in yachts, recreation vehicles and similar projects. We halted income splitting. We stopped the so-called carve-out transaction.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, it is always amazing that the great successes that are listed just create more devastation for Canadians. So I will make another suggestion to the Minister of Finance.

In a positive vein and with good intent I want to say to the minister that independent analysts have said the elimination of the GST could create over 300,000 jobs in Canada. Unlike my hon. colleague, the Leader of the Opposition, I am prepared to talk about alternatives before the election, not after. Clearly the elimination of the GST would create jobs in Canada. Why will the minister not look at this option?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. Leader of the New Democratic Party is really stretching her credibility. What would she substitute it with? It generates some $15 billion to $16 billion.

We know what the Liberals want. They want a hidden, secretive and sneaky tax. What does the NDP want? She will have to come clean and tell us.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence. In the November 1992 report to the House of Commons, the Auditor General reported that the defence program management system was, to use his term, expensive and ineffective.

Considering the magnitude of major projects involved, about $3 billion a year, this is a very serious indictment. I would like to ask the Minister of National Defence what action she has planned either to refute this serious claim or to take immediate corrective actions.

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, in the course of my briefings at the Department of National Defence, I have been very interested in the question of fiscal management throughout the department.

It is important to assure Canadians, simply because of the magnitude of the budget of the Department of National Defence, it is a department that is managed to the highest standards possible. I would be very pleased to discuss with the hon. member any approaches which he may have.

I am looking carefully at the Auditor General's report and I hope to be able to report further on this subject to the House of Commons as initiatives develop.

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question for the minister. While it is not just my concern, it is the concern of the Auditor General and I would be happy to talk with her at any time at all.

I would like to get more specific now. One of the specific concerns of the Auditor General was that most of the problems observed with the major capital programs were generated in the project life cycle, early in the project initiation or in the very early stages of the project. He went on to say that none of the projects examined were directly related to defence policy and that most of the equipment failed to meet the operational requirements. That is what the Auditor General said.

Given the seriousness of this claim and the fact that the program we are looking at now is going to be one of the largest in Canada and probably one of the largest ever in DND, second or third anyway, could the minister tell this House how this charge of the Auditor General applies to the Sea King replacement program or more specifically to the $4.5 billion EH-101 helicopter program.

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, the program for replacing the Sea King helicopters was discussed at some length in a standing committee of the House of Commons.

I do not have time in Question Period to go into enormous detail as to how the specifications were developed and the contracts drawn up. I would be very happy to offer to the hon. member and any member of his caucus or any member of the House of Commons, a thorough briefing on how the specifications were developed and the decision made to enter into the contract with the EH-101. I would be very pleased to provide that information to any member of the House of Commons.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

Hon. William Rompkey (Labrador): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. As do many Canadians, he knows of the tragic situation at Davis Inlet, Labrador.

I want to ask the minister today what is his response to the cry for help that has come from Davis Inlet. What does he intend to do immediately, both for the short term and the long term, to respond to that community and particularly to the children whose lives are threatened?

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, members of this House, indeed all Canadians are saddened and deeply troubled by the spectre of young children resorting to gasoline sniffing and substance abuse and the unacceptable conditions in Davis Inlet in which they and their parents are living.

I have discussed this matter extensively with my colleagues, the Minister of National Health and Welfare and the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans from Newfoundland and Labrador. Yesterday I called the acting premier, Mr. Winston Baker, in Mr. Wells' absence about what the two governments collectively might do to deal with the immediate problem of the human condition in Davis Inlet.

It is important for members of the House to recognize that the community, which was established some 25 years ago, is totally inadequate for the present population. It is some four times larger now than the infrastructure which was designed when the Government of Newfoundland and Labrador moved those people there a quarter of a century ago.

We have contemplated the relocation of the community to another location on the mainland. A consultant's report received on December 18 recommends that the government seriously consider that option. That is a long-term solution.

If we bear in mind that the previous relocation 25 years ago has led to the present circumstances, relocation in itself is not the solution to the problem.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare is in Halifax today meeting officials and will in all likelihood meet Innu representatives tomorrow while he is there. Officials of both governments—

Some hon. members: Time.

Mr. Siddon: Mr. Speaker, I thought the House wanted an extensive report on this very serious question.

I will conclude by saying this. Representatives of both governments have invited the Innu to sit down later this week and among options decide what to do about the immediate problem of substance abuse and inadequate conditions in that community.

Hon. William Rompkey (Labrador): Mr. Speaker, the immediate problem is substance abuse.

I would like to ask the minister a very specific question, a question I think the people of Davis Inlet would ask if they were here today. Can they have their own treatment centre and their own treatment program near Davis Inlet, culturally based and in their own language? This is what the people want. I ask the minister today if he is in a position to respond to that serious and important request from the people?

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I spoke to the Minister of National Health and Welfare this morning. I am assured he will be making a statement on this matter before this time tomorrow.

I should also point out that these children are wards of the province of Newfoundland and Labrador which has clear legal jurisdiction for health care and welfare. Any decision on whether they are to be removed from the present community either to a near location or a centre further away will be taken in consultation with the Innu leadership and with the Government of Newfoundland and Labrador.

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

The social disintegration of the Innu community at Davis Inlet dates to its forced relocation to a remote island in 1967 by the Government of Newfoundland, assisted by a local priest. Those people were cut off from their traditional way of life and subsistence, left without promised housing or running water and abandoned by the federal government which knew it had the constitutional responsibility for them.

Why has the federal government refused to acknowledge its constitutional responsibility for aboriginal people in Newfoundland when its own legal opinions from the Department of Justice have confirmed this responsibility since 1950?

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, later today we will be releasing a full statement and account of the background to this tragic situation.

I remind the hon. member that he should read the history because if he did he would discover that the community of old Davis Inlet which existed prior to 1950 was but three miles from the present community of new Davis Inlet. There was another relocation north in the late 1940s which failed. It is a fact that on the island where both the old Davis Inlet and the modern community are located, there is an inadequate supply of wildlife and natural resources to support the people who live there.

From the time of Confederation, Newfoundland has accepted legal and jurisdictional responsibility for the Innu people who are not registered and not status Indian people. Therefore they are not entitled to the benefits of my department directly and have chosen to remain as not registered, non-status Indian people under the care of the province of Newfoundland.

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, on February 19 last year I asked the minister to relocate the Davis Inlet Innu. Since my question the federal and provincial governments and the Innu themselves have all studied relocation and found that relocation to the mainland is the best and cheapest option for this community.

When will the government finally accept its legal and moral responsibility, commit the necessary funds and begin the process of moving the Davis Inlet people to a new community on the Labrador mainland?

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I might repeat what I said to the hon. member for Labrador a moment ago. We would not want to repeat the mistake that has already been made. That is why an extensive consultant's study was undertaken at my request. It found that a relocation could be desirable but might not solve the human and social problems that exist in that community.

• (1440)

Therefore, in consultation with the Inuit leadership and the Government of Newfoundland and Labrador which has legal responsibility for the care and well-being of these people, we will find an appropriate solution.

STEEL INDUSTRY

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister for International Trade.

On Friday the Prime Minister is visiting President Clinton in Washington. Presumably the current steel dispute will be discussed between them. Could the minister tell the House whether the Prime Minister will take the view, as the minister said yesterday the problem lies with the Industry in Canada, that it is a management and labour problem".

Will the Prime Minister protect and defend Canadian interests by seeking a continent-wide steel pact or, more fundamentally, seek negotiation of what is a subsidy?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, what I was doing yesterday was correcting a distortion that the hon. member for Hamilton East had put on the record. She was blaming the total problems of the steel industry on the fact that it got hit with the anti-dumping duties last week.

The point I was making is that there is a significant reduction in the competitive advantage of the steel industry amounting to $100 a tonne or 20 per cent of the value of the product. That is the problem.

On the question that my hon. friend puts, yes, I propose as I have already done, to raise the question of a Canada-U.S. steel pact with the Americans. The Prime Minister has already done that with the previous president and I presume he will be doing the same thing this week.

Our approach is to establish a blue ribbon panel to develop the framework for such an agreement and then see whether we can negotiate an agreement at a later stage.

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, the minister knows that a U.S.-Canada steel pact, like the U.S.-Canada Free Trade Agreement or the North American free trade agreement, would be essentially flawed unless there is an agreement on what is a subsidy, unless there is an anti-dumping code. That is the void in the free trade agreement. That is the black hole in the North American free trade agreement.

Will the minister tell the House not about a blue ribbon commission but when this government is going to address that fundamental question with the United States and now with Mexico of what is a subsidy and how we can achieve an anti-dumping code. Then the problems in the steel industry will be finally resolved.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, this is precisely what is being addressed in the Uruguay round of negotiations in Geneva.

If my hon. friend will review what has been decided to date on the definition of a subsidy and how the anti-subsidy disputes can be settled, he will see that there has been significant progress.

On the question of anti-dumping, my hon. friend is quite right. The United States has been absolutely adamant. Even in the Uruguay round, with a large bulk of countries trying to encourage the United States to change its anti-dumping regime, there has been no support for that within the U.S. industry or the U.S. Congress. We continue to press the Americans and I appreciate the support of the hon. member in that direction.

It is difficult to move the United States even in the multilateral negotiations with so many other countries on our side.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg—St. James): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture.

The minister knows that farm income is expected to drop about a billion dollars this year. That is a drop of about 21 per cent. Today we learned that bankruptcies in agriculture and related service industries reached 421 last year.

The situation for thousands of producers is desperate and that explains partly why over 13,000 farmers attended a rally in Saskatoon last week.

What does the minister plan to do to help farmers stay on the land and maintain rural life?

Hon. Charles Mayer (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, it is not all bad news. The hon. member will know that the Canadian Wheat Board just raised the additional payment for barley and he will know that we reached an agreement with Saskatchewan about two weeks ago that will see additional money flow into Saskatchewan. In total he will see some $260 million additional flow into farm safety net programs this year.

He will know that even though prices are not expected to improve very much, there are good prospects for grain sales and over all on a net basis government programs, federal and provincial, will put over $2 billion into farmers' hands this calendar year.

What we intend to do is work very hard at all levels of government, especially as the Prime Minister has done in the past, to see what we can do about improving international grain prices.

To say again, while there are and will continue to be concerns until we reach some agreements on international trade, the news is not necessarily all bad as far as income is concerned for farmers for the coming year.

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg—St. James): Mr. Speaker, I want to pick up on that aid package that was negotiated for Saskatchewan. There is only about 20 million new dollars of federal money in that aid package. While farmers are grateful for anything they get, it should also be noted at the same time that under the WGTA freight assistance has been cut by this government this year to the tune of $70 million. It is give with one hand and take away with the other. That kind of hypocrisy underlines the agricultural policy of this government.

Again I ask the Minister of Agriculture what his government intends to do to keep farmers on the land and maintain rural life.

Hon. Charles Mayer (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, again, the hon. member cannot have it both ways. We have done considerable to control over–all government expenditures that sees a reduction in interest rates to farmers. He should know that every percentage point reduction in interest rates for farmers literally means hundreds of millions of dollars of saved expenses.

He will also know that in some areas farm input costs have not gone up and in some cases they have gone down. There are five chemicals that will be less in price this spring than they were last year.

Again, it is not an easy situation to address. We are putting out a considerable amount of support. He will know that in the economic statement of last December one of the three areas that the Minister of Finance did not touch was an over–all reduction in safety net programs. They stayed the way they were.

You can take from that that the government is very committed to doing what it can to support farmers through a very difficult time.

STEEL INDUSTRY

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister for International Trade.

Since the free trade agreement, 12,000 people have been laid off in the steel industry. Recent trade actions will surely increase that number. A sectoral steel agreement which we support and proposed has been rejected and rebuffed by the United States.

Now the minister is suggesting a blue ribbon committee but no concrete proposal has been put forward. The government initiatives are obvious failures.

If the minister has such faith in the dispute panel mechanism, why is he creating a blue ribbon committee to study a problem that he already knows?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the dispute settlement panel is there to deal with the issue at hand, the anti-dumping findings of last week. Surely my hon. friend would say that is an improvement in the free trade agreement over what was the case before.

My hon. friend says he wants to see a U.S.-Canada steel agreement. I agree with him. I would like to see that too. So would the industry. We are all in agreement here. But we have to find agreement with the other partners, the United States industry and the United States government.

As a basis for developing that agreement we have proposed a group of people, a blue ribbon panel of experts, to study the proposal and get through that study an element of support in the United States so we can achieve the objective that he and I would like to see achieved.

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, while the dispute panel is waiting to settle the dispute and the minister is creating his blue ribbon panel, the steel industry will be gone.

My supplemental is for the minister of energy. It is with regard to Canadian jobs in steel and generally in the Hibernia project since Canada has become a major investor and in fact a shareholder in Hibernia.

In 1992 in a letter addressed to me his predecessor said: "I have directed that a systematic review be conducted to ensure that Canadian companies and workers have the fullest opportunity to participate in the management, design, construction and operation of the project". Last year Algoma Steel lost a contract to Belgium.

• (1450)

Mr. Speaker: I wonder if the hon. member could put his question, please.

Mr. Butland: Will the minister table the review that his predecessor talked about and act immediately to fulfil the promise to maximize Canadian content and Canadian jobs in Hibernia?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is fully aware, I am sure, of the action that was taken by the Hibernia Management and Development Corporation in addressing some concerns that were identified in specifications regarding steel, Canadian specifications versus European.

As a result of the investigation by my predecessor and the Hibernia Management and Development Corporation, virtually all rebar that will be used in the construction of the Hibernia gravity based structure will be Canadian rebar purchased in Canada.

As the hon. member is fully aware, there is a target of 55 per cent to 60 per cent Canadian content, Canadian supplies, and Canadian work in the $3 billion of contracts that will be let by the Hibernia Management and Development Corporation in Canada.

Where Canadian companies have the expertise, the ability and deliverability, which is very important, they will be able to bid competitively for contracts in Hibernia. That is what has taken place in the past. That is what will take place in the future.

COMMUNICATION-QUÉBEC

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Supply and Services. Since 1986, Quebecers have been able to obtain answers for their questions about federal programs and services by contacting Communication-Québec. Today, the Canada Communication Group wants to abolish this service without consulting the Quebec MPs.

Can the minister tell us today whether he is the one who asked the Canada Communication Group not to renew this agreement and to abolish this service? The members from Quebec, especially the Conservatives, ask you to put this lousy decision on hold.

Hon. Paul Dick (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, I can assure my colleague that I never asked my department to abolish this model agreement.

[English]

As a matter of fact, my department has agreements with all the provinces and territories and all of these are being examined. I have asked them to put on hold all the changes they might like to make until we can see which is the best way to go to make sure we can give a better service to Canadians at the cheapest cost to the Canadian taxpayer.

COAST GUARD

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): Mr. Speaker, for many years the west coast has been well served by three Coast Guard hovercraft, but like our Labrador helicopters these are now near the end of their life expectancy and are frequently not available due to mechanical breakdowns.

During the recent cold snap, which of course is rare on the coast, only one hovercraft was available and the authorities were afraid to let it out because it might be damaged. Does the government plan to replace these aging craft and, if so, when?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I would like to reassure my colleague that the search and rescue capabilities on the west coast and anywhere else in Canada are not being undermined at present. We are in fact going through an analysis of the requirements for vehicles for search and rescue. We are examining the suitability of the hovercraft. We know it is well thought of in most areas of this country. We are conducting a review at the present time to make sure that we have the best equipment possible at a cost that is bearable by the Canadian taxpayers to continue ensuring proper search and rescue activities in all parts of the country.

JUSTICE

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Justice. The Canadian justice system is failing to protect women from former boyfriends and husbands who follow, harass and threaten them.

In three recent murder cases in Manitoba and in others across the country, the murderers were actually in possession of restraining orders telling them to stay away from the victims. In at least two of these cases the system failed to take away firearms which were in the possession of the murderers. These firearms were actually used in the killings.

When is the minister going to do something? Why will he not bring forward changes to the Criminal Code to protect these women from this harm?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Justice, Attorney General of Canada and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, I think that my colleague raises a rather important point. Indeed, the Criminal Code has provisions in sections 177, 264, 372 and 423 that allow police officers and the courts to intervene.

I realize that the administration of justice is left to the provincial governments. It is therefore important for us to make sure that we know the reasons behind this system and the sections of the Criminal Code that may apply in some cases like the one he just mentioned. Unfortunately, such incidents happen.

I said yesterday, and I repeat today, that our government intends to act quickly on that. We are now reviewing those sections of the Criminal Code and if necessary, we will act quickly to bring legislation on it to the House.

[English]

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, the police say that they cannot do anything until the victim is harmed. These who are being stalked are living in terror.

Just assuming that the provisions were in the Criminal Code now, which certainly not everyone agrees with, how is the Minister of Justice going to force all the attorneys general in Canada to do something.

Why does the Minister of Justice not just amend the law so there is no question, and the lives of more women in this country are not risked? Will he bring forward these amendments immediately, certainly before a prorogation of this House?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Justice, Attorney General of Canada and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, I already said that I was as concerned as he is about these unfortunate events. I trust that with the co-operation of the hon. member and the other parties in this House, we will be able to present amendments, if necessary, so that people can feel safe. I quite agree with my colleague but we must also ensure that individual rights are respected.

I assured my colleague and I reassure him that we will react. I have asked my officials to examine all these provisions of the Criminal Code to see where improvements could be made.

FISHERIES

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister of fisheries. His announcement in December that fishermen who did not use their groundfish licences for the last two years will have these licences taken away has shocked and angered inshore fishermen across Atlantic Canada, so much so that they feel compelled to take his department to court in order to get this astonishing decision reversed.

Will the minister now admit that this decision in December was an unfortunate mistake and will he assure bona fide inshore fishermen today that they will not lose their licences as a result of this absurd policy?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, I believe that all of the provincial governments and those who have some knowledge of this matter agree that there is a great deal of over-harvesting capacity and over-processing capacity in the Atlantic fishery. That is surely obvious to anyone.

When the Atlantic groundfish management panel was announced and accepted with great approbation by all those who were present, one of its provisions was for groundfish licences not used in the last two years, licences where not one pound of fish had been reported as being caught by the holder of the licence, that we would not reissue licences of that nature this year because we have to attempt to get under control the chaotic licensing situation in the Atlantic Canada fishery.

As always, matters are far more complicated than they appear on the surface and that is the case in this particular situation.

Some hon. members: Time.

Mr. Crosbie: If you don't want to hear what I have to say, don't ask me a question.

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, nobody is arguing that there is an excess capacity in harvesting in the fishery.

• (1500)

The minister knows that the reason why these licences were inactive was because there were no fish to catch the last two years. These fishermen were merely applying the government's own bona fide licensing policy the way it was intended.

To the fishermen, this policy constitutes no less than a breach of trust. This insane decision will actually increase—

Mr. Speaker: I wonder if the hon. member, given the time, would put his question.

Mr. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Only a full retreat is acceptable. Will the minister reverse his decision to take away these groundfish licences today?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is cerebrally challenged if he thinks I am going to go into a full retreat. I have never gone into a full retreat in my life and I do not intend to now.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Crosbie: If the yahoos on the other side will let me say—

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry but we are going to move on.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture.

It concerns the Feed Freight Assistance Program which was originally designed to equalize the cost of feed to all farmers in Canada.

The current plan to implement the 10 per cent decrease will distort that concept of equalized feed cost to farmers. Some farmers will lose $6 a tonne and some will lose nothing.

Will the Minister of Agriculture adopt the alternative proposal which is a fair proposal and will cause each farmer in Canada to drop the same amount of money from the equalization program?

Hon. Charles Mayer (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, this question was raised with me by the New Brunswick Federation of Agriculture. We said then and say now that we are prepared to look at that type of proposal with the idea of seeing that the reductions in expenditures are carried out in a way that treats everybody as even-handedly and as fairly as we can.

I thank the hon. member for his suggestion. We will certainly be prepared to consider it.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Hamilton East on a question of privilege.

PRIVILEGE

COMMENTS DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, earlier in the Question Period the Minister for International Trade suggested that I had distorted the facts yesterday in Question Period when I said that 10,000 people—

Mr. Speaker: First of all, the question of privilege should have been raised immediately after the remarks were made, if it was said yesterday. Second, it is very difficult for me to see how it is a question of privilege even today.

Ms. Copps: Mr. Speaker, he said it a few moments ago. I am raising it at the earliest opportunity.

Mr. Speaker, 10,000 people in my riding who have lost their jobs in the last three years do not appreciate the misinformation spread by the minister on this subject. The members on the opposite side may think it is a big joke but to those 10,000 people it is not a joke.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is complaining about the word "distortion" in debate. I certainly cannot find, under the circumstances, that it is a question of privilege.

The hon. member may have a complaint but there are other places to take it.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed consideration of Bill C-98, an act to provide additional borrowing authority for the fiscal year beginning on April 1, 1992, as reported (without amendment) from a legislative committee; and Motions Nos. 1, 2, 3 and 4.

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to enter into this debate today.

I want to refer to some areas that are not always discussed in this House. That is mainly the areas concerning agriculture and in a broader sense, rural Canada.

We spend approximately a billion dollars on agriculture every year. In the last eight or nine years, something like $16 billion has been given in direct payments to agriculture. Although huge sums have been paid out, the fact is that in Saskatchewan alone some 1,500 farmers are leaving the land every year and similar numbers are quitting in other provinces.

The question that has to be answered is this. In what direction are we heading with respect to agriculture in this country? The government has not given any clear direction other than it is willing to spend money on agriculture, usually at times when it is convenient for the government to help members get re-elected or when it is going to help an agribusiness that is going to remove farm families from the land and destroy rural communities.

This government does not understand, does not have an appreciation of what is happening at this time. This was made abundantly clear yesterday when I asked the Prime Minister about the problems in agriculture. I want to quote from Hansard of yesterday when the Prime Minister in his response to my question stated:

> This government brought in the GRIP program. This government brought in the NISA program. Both programs are greatly admired by Saskatchewan farmers.

I do not know of anyone in Saskatchewan or in this country who admires the GRIP. The answer shows a complete lack of understanding, a complete ignorance in this area. I do not blame the Prime Minister. He is obviously getting bad advice from his new Minister of Agriculture.

Up until the last cabinet shuffle we had three Ministers of Agriculture. What happened after that last shuffle? We lost one outright. The Minister of State for Agriculture, who is concerned with agriculture in Quebec, is now the Minister of Justice. I doubt very much whether that minister is going to be spending very much time on agriculture. He is going to be spending more time on justice. It is a major portfolio in itself. There are many areas of agriculture that have to be dealt with. Therefore, we are left with one Minister of Agriculture.

I would suggest this government is taking a new direction. It is abandoning the concerns it has with agriculture. To leave one member as a Minister of Agriculture, with all the needs and requirements there are in this area, certainly does not bode well for the future of agriculture in this country.

The Prime Minister went on to state in response to my question:

> I would like to tell my hon. friend this. This government increased aid to agriculture including western agriculture, over the eight year period by 650 per cent.

That is also true. However, the way money was spent on agriculture, farmers should be upset, rural people should be upset, urban people should be upset, Canadian taxpayers should be upset because money was wasted. Billions and billions of dollars were wasted. Yet the Prime Minister can say that farmers in Saskatchewan adore NISA, they adore GRIP. Patently that is not the case.

What is needed is not spending more money on agriculture, it is to spend money more wisely on agriculture. The GRIP we have today is like putting a farmer on a step ladder with a noose around his neck and every year forcing him one step down the ladder. It is slowly going to destroy the family farm. When we have a program that gives some farmers a GRIP cheque big enough to buy a half section of land and other farmers a GRIP cheque that will not even pay their fuel bills, there is something wrong with that program.

We in this party have been saying that what we have to do is first of all state our objective clearly. That objective is that we want to maintain viable farm families, viable rural communities in this country. This is not going to be accomplished with the set of programs which the government opposite has been promoting. It was made very clear last week when over 13,000 people came to Saskatoon. They were not all farmers, some were from urban areas; they were not all from Saskatchewan, there were some from Alberta and some from Manitoba. They made it very clear that they did not like GRIP, whether it was Saskatchewan GRIP or Alberta GRIP or Manitoba GRIP. It made no difference. The fact is that the agriculture programs that are in place now are not the ones that we require.

• (1510)

The Prime Minister yesterday gave me, with all due respect, a glib answer, an answer that people in this country who have any knowledge of agriculture would mock. It is unfortunate that this is apparently the advice he gets from his Minister of Agriculture.

We have to pursue three underlying points with respect to agriculture and rural Canada generally. First, we have to realize that the primary resource sector in this country, the key sector, depends on maintaining rural Canada, whether that sector is agriculture, whether it is the fisheries, whether it is forestry or whether it is mining in those regions of Canada where there is mining.

This government has not recognized that fact. We have seen the destruction of the fishing industry off the Newfoundland coast, which is wreaking havoc in Newfoundland. We heard the remark made by the Prime Minister showing a complete lack of knowledge of what is happening in western Canada.

Until we recognize that the primary resource sector is the key sector, there is going to be problems and the government is going to be called upon to make emergency payments and come up with money to help people in those areas. Agricultural policies have to be developed with a view to maintaining those communities and maintaining farm families.

If somebody wants to farm 10 or 12 or 15 sections of land, go ahead and farm it but do not expect the government to help you keep that land and buy out other farms. We want programs that will spend money wisely. We do not have a lot of money to spend in this country and we spend far more than we should right now with the deficit we have. The money we spend now on agriculture could be spent in a much better way, where it would produce much better results and provide a much stronger infrastructure if we recognize that the primary resource sector is the key to rural Canada, and if we develop a program with a view to maintaining rural communities and farm families in western Canada.

Another thing we need is the co-ordination of programs. We have the Community Futures Program which is under the Department of Employment and Immigration. We also have the Western Diversification Program which is now under a separate minister. These programs sometimes work at cross purposes. There is an overlap, an overlap of bureaucracy, an overlap of money that is going back and forth, and oftentimes at cross purposes

What we really need in this country is some real co-ordinating of programs. In fact, what we need is a minister who is responsible for rural affairs. Under that minister should be the Minister of Agriculture, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, the Minister of Forestry, a minister of mining and northern development. That is what we should have, because when you stand in this House you cannot point to anyone who is responsible for rural affairs.

When this government, or any government, comes to its senses, that is the direction we will have to go. I see my time is starting to run out.

The third area where we have to make some changes is that federal governments in the past sat in Ottawa with bureaucrats or other politicians and developed programs and shoved them on to the regions. I know that when we were holding hearings on developing our rural policy and our rural paper for the New Democratic Party we heard time after time groups saying that they wanted to use program A or program B but they had to change the rules or adapt them in order to get the money, and after they got some money it never went to the full purpose and the full benefit it could have had they had more control over the money.

We need a government that facilitates and assists communities and grassroots organizations in developing their programs and helping with that development. The development of programs has to come not from Ottawa but from the regions. That is where the initiatives should come from. It is only logical but that is not what this government is doing.

In conclusion we need to ensure that the primary resource sector is primary to the future of rural Canada. We need to co-ordinate our programs. We should have a minister of rural affairs and a government that is a facilitator and not a director of federal programs. In that way this government could save money, could cut the deficit and provide better jobs and a better lifestyle for all of rural Canada.

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, in debating this appropriation bill by the Government of Canada one cannot help but think for a moment that we are heading for an election in a few months. This government is going to leave Canada in a very sad condition when it dissolves this Parliament soon.

This bill is asking Parliament to approve $8.2 billion. That is a substantial amount of money. It raises questions as to how the government is administering the public good and the human and natural resources of this nation.

One cannot help but compare the Canada of today and the way we see it on the eve of dissolution of this Parliament with the Canada this government inherited in 1984. At that time Canada was buoyant and on the upswing. Canadians were in a positive frame of mind. They were confident and looking forward to the future. On the whole, Canada looked good. In less than nine years the Conservative government has managed to change the picture dramatically.

Of course what first comes to mind in this analysis of where Canada stands in 1993 compared to 1984 is the economic condition created by this government where at least 1.5 million people are on unemployment insurance and the number of people seeking jobs is greater than that. It is a terrible waste of human resources.

This government does not seem to have the intellectual aptitude, the compassion, the heart or even the sensitivity to address this in an adequate and appropriate manner. We have an increasing number of people exhausting their unemployment insurance. We have an increasing number of people turning to welfare for economic assistance. There is a picture of despair. Unemployed heads of families go through the ads in the newspapers daily. They go consistently knocking at the doors of potential employers only to return home at the end of the day exhausted, disappointed and disheartened.

That is the Canada of 1993 according to the model and the matrix imposed by the present Conservative government. It has been made worse by the latest measure being introduced for approval by Parliament to make unemployment insurance tougher to receive for those who are unfortunate enough to become unemployed.

• (1520)

One cannot understand why the Government of Canada would fight unemployment by pursuing the condition of the unemployed rather than by job creation programs which would at least temporarily alleviate the unemployment situation in the country. Those measures being proposed under unemployment insurance from the human, social and economic points of view are abhorrent and repulsive.

Coupled with that, if one looks beyond the importance of the development of human resources on a daily basis, one can notice another disturbing pattern. Frequently statements are made about the importance of training and retraining, skill development and the acquisition of better education and higher skills on the part of the Canadian public. However, when it comes to having access to such training, retraining and apprenticeship programs the answer at the street level, at the counter, to the individual attempting to take advantage of these policy programs is that the funds have been exhausted.

On the one hand there is encouragement to do the right thing. On the other hand when it comes to taking advantage of that opportunity, when an individual turns to the Canada Employment Centre for retraining or an apprenticeship position, the answer is that there is a waiting period of six months or longer because there are no funds. Ottawa says one thing and another thing happens in Toronto. The gap between the two is widening. It is frightening.

There is a deterioration in the social and economic fibre of our communities. Discouragement is creeping in. People are giving up. It is no wonder that against this background violence and insecurity are putting members of our society frequently in danger, as we learn from newspaper reports every day, particularly the safety of women and children.

Evidently, something is going wrong. Something is being missed by this government which apparently is not capable of seeing that there is a link between the economic and social condition of the country and its population. Never before have we seen the high incidence of violence, murder and rape we are seeing now. Generally, we have not seen violence between individuals in relationships as we are seeing today.

To make things worse, weekend conversations in our riding offices and visits from people who drop by give us a picture of our youth. Our youth are fairly well-educated and well prepared for life having received good training in community colleges and universities. However, when they complete their education they cannot find their first jobs.

There is nothing more depressing for a young person after completing his or her studies than not being able to find employment. It is demoralizing and depressing. Here again this government with its economic policies does not seem to be able to come to grips with the fact that for the first time probably in many decades our youth cannot confidently look to the future of our country and cannot hope to build an economic and social life as the preceding generations have managed to do.

As part of the economic policies of this government we have also seen the decision to eliminate institutions which have served the country very well. Time does not permit me to go into the details but certainly I must mention the cancellation of the Court Challenges Program, the Economic Council of Canada, the Science Council, the Law Reform Commission and the Institute for International Peace and Security.

I would like to be given a few more minutes but you have given me the signal, Mr. Speaker. I would like to deal with the matter of natural resources, but I will have to wait for third reading.

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, it is now February but last December I rose in my place to point out the failure of the so-called mini budget to address some of the needs of Mount Royal riding. The circumstances have not changed from then until now.

I rise again today as I look at this government's borrowing bill in which it wishes to borrow $8.2 billion which is required for public works and general purposes. It is not going to answer many of the needs that were expressed by my constituents who have come into my office or whom I have met in the stores, on the streets or in their buildings.

I rise again today to remind this government it has still not met many of the real needs of the real people in Hampstead, Côte-St-Luc, Snowdon, Côte des Neiges, or the town of Mount Royal. That sign "à louer", which I and others refer to as "Monsieur à louer", still has a lot of property in my riding. Thousands of jobs have been lost in the last few years and they have not been returned.

Young people are still thinking about leaving the province because they believe they are going to remain poor and without jobs. I advised them not to lose hope. I told them to get out and do some volunteer work while they looked around for a job because to lose hope was to lose faith in the future. That was my message then.

The big mistake in the mini budget was that it failed to change any of the Mulroney government's programs in the sense of a trickle-down economy. More important, long before it was in fashion, long before Mr. Clinton used the phrase that now seems to be current in the language and politically correct, I talked about hope and I talked about putting people first.

I talked about the fact that it is important always to have a sense for the future and that this government lacks a sense of vision and a sense of purpose for the future of people, for the unemployed who want to work, for seniors and families who simply want to make ends meet, for young people who seek only a chance to start to work and to make a living in this country.

I do not think we can be a country of little more than balance sheets where the federal government is concerned. This government has ignored the human debt and deficit in the name of fiscal debt and deficit. Giving up on social priorities not only weakens the social fabric but it also weakens the sense of belonging and the sense of participation. It reduces that sense of hope and does not make one feel that the government has put people first. People are less able to compete when they feel so diminished in and for a new economy.

In this election year the story will be told of this Conservative government, how it failed to meet the test of compassion, of putting people first, of giving Canadians the tools, not just rosy words, but the tools to win the economic competition. I said to my constituents then and I say now: "Have hope, keep hope, and move forward". It is not too late to hold on to a caring, compassionate and, yes, competitive Canada. These goals go hand in hand and they make sense.

• (1530)

Once again, I want to address the particular question concerning the arts and cultural community which is under attack by this government. In its first economic statement in 1984 this Conservative government cut culture by $122.5 million. In what we hope is its last economic statement, there will be a further cut of $80 million over the next two years. This comes just two weeks after the sector suffered a 2 per cent blow by the Treasury Board president to the tune of $11.8 million.

It is really a shame when Treasury Board dictates the cultural and entertainment future of Canada.

Also, all government departments and agencies, including those dealing with the cultural sector, are facing a 3 per cent cut in their operating budgets. What does all this mean? The Canadian Conference of the Arts estimates that the federal cuts mean a loss of 8,400 jobs over the next two years. They estimate this based on the premise that, according to Statistics Canada, every $1 million pumped into the cultural sector, on average, creates 105 jobs. Therefore a loss of $80 million in grants and contributions will likely result in a loss of 8,400 jobs. Plus—let us not forget this—people such as printers, electricians, and engineers, all of whom earn their living indirectly from the arts and cultural groups, also stand to lose.

This means that granting programs such as the cultural initiatives program, book publishing development program, museum assistance programs, as well as the Canada Council and Telecom grants are being subjected to the 10 per cent knife of the Tories.

Two years ago the Minister of Communications, when tightening his belt, cut $2 million to the non-theatrical film fund. After a lot of lobbying he found a way to put that program back into place.

The Tory knife also hit loans. The Cultural Industries Development Fund, which provides loans rather than grants to the film industry, book publishing and sound recording, has been affected. This program has been in operation for roughly two years and is being administered by the Federal Business Development Bank. Over two years there have been approximately 130 loans and very few defaults. The program has exceeded beyond expectations.

It is my understanding that there will be an evaluation. I hope the minister will take a good look at this because these types of loans are a way of leveraging and increasing funding to the film industry. I think it is a very important program. This has also been cut by 10 per cent and I think that is rather sad.

Regrettably, organizations that speak for the arts and art interests, such as the Canadian Conference of the Arts and the Canadian Museums Association, have suffered a 10 per cent loss.

When you have a constituency out there of artists, creators and entertainers, most of whom earn less than $1,400 a month, you need some way of empowering their speech and empowering their concerns. Those organizations, the NGOs that were there to help them, have now had their voices cut and I think that is very sad.

Let us for a moment look at this government's support to culture since 1984 since it took office. I would like to point out that the numbers I am about to place on the record here are the government's own spending estimates. From 1984–85 to 1991–92 there has been a 24 per cent cut in direct and indirect federal cultural spending in real terms. If direct and indirect cultural support had grown at the same pace as the total federal program spending, an additional $500 million would have been provided.

I realize this amount is unrealistic in today's economic environment, but this drastic cut is unconscionable if we truly believe in nation building and giving voice to Canada's artistic expression in its many forms.

It is also interesting to compare the trends in cultural spending with that of the defence budget. I do not want to start a war between Canada's defence community and Canada's arts and culture community because they are both defending our country, our shores and our people. It would seem to me that where there is a rise of $8.8 billion to $12.2 billion in the defence budget, that a nation that should be so proud and independent should really also concentrate and share its interests in the arts sector.

The economic impact of the cultural sector should not be underestimated. It employs 432,172 people. This is more than the agricultural sector alone. This represents a 58 per cent increase in 20 years. It generates $17.2 billion for the economy, which is an increase of 124 per cent in 20 years. Over the last 20 years, the cultural sector has outperformed the whole of the Canadian economy by 83 per cent.

In terms of the gross domestic product, the cultural sector accounted for 2.7 per cent in 1989, which was up from 2.2 per cent in 1981. This is big business. Entertainment, films, books, music and sound recording is big business. It is time that this government and all the people in Canada recognized that it is an important aspect of our daily life.

Culture includes entertainment and going to the museums and the libraries. This is the very essence of our national identity and the bedrock of national sovereignty and national pride. It gives meaning to the lives of every Canadian and it enriches this country socially, politically and, yes, economically. It is a business. It gives us pride in our country.

It is cultural defence for Canada that I am calling for. I am addressing not only the Minister of Communications and Culture who is good enough to be sitting here in this House today, but it goes to all ministers, all potential ministers and to every member in this House. They should remember that when people go to the fair and the library and when children are exposed to graphic arts or to any of the other arts and crafts, that this is part of living in this land and it is worth investing in if you want to have a place on the global map of this world.

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Mr. Speaker, the bill before us today is the borrowing authority where the government is asking authority to borrow $8.2 billion as required for public works and general purposes.

I think the crucial part in looking at any borrowing bill is in looking at where the government has been, where it is planning on going and where it is at the present.

If we look at the economic outlook given by the Minister of Finance in November, we see the projections of the government and how accurate they have been. It was stated this year that the deficit will rise to $34.4 billion, which is $7 billion higher than what the government said it was going to be in its budget of last spring. It is $10 billion higher than what it had projected only last year. It projected that next year's deficit will be $32.6 billion, which is twice the amount it was projecting last year. It appears the projections of the government's finance department have not been very accurate in the past. I would suggest it probably will not be very accurate in the future.

It was interesting to listen to the Prime Minister just prior to Christmas when he talked about economic growth in Canada and the OECD, the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development. He stated that economic growth in Canada is expected to increase by 3.2 per cent in 1993 and 4.2 per cent in 1994. This is the highest growth rate of any of the G-7 countries. He continued to emphasize that we were going to be the top G-7 country as far as growth went.

There was an article by Don McGillivray of Southam News that was published in The Vancouver Sun on December 28, 1992. It was interesting when Mr. McGillivray looked at the OECD record. He said that it has not been too great so far:

• (1540)

In its December 1988 forecast, the OECD said the Canadian economy would grow in 1990 by three per cent.

A year later, on the very brink of the recession, it forecast growth of two per cent in 1990.

In 1990 itself, near the end of the year, it said growth that year would be 1.1 per cent. In other words, as it sat in the midst of the recession, it did not see any recession.

By the time the December, 1991 report was issued, a year after the end of 1990, the OECD still saw nothing but positive growth for the year, estimated at half of one percentage point.

It was only in 1992 that the organization was prepared to say that the economy failed to grow at all, in fact, that it shrank, in 1990.

Its record is similarly flawed for 1991, the second year of the slump. In its 1990 report, with the country already in recession, the OECD could see no downturn.

This shows that by the OECD forecast the recession never happened. It only shows up in hindsight. That is an example, I would suggest, of exactly where this government has been. It would not admit that there was a recession until we were well into the recession. However, when it was announced by Statistics Canada that we were finally coming out of the recession, it was quick off the mark to say that the recession was now over.

I think this shows where its economic, fiscal and monetary policies have taken this country.

I would like to point out that a number of their policies with respect to privatization and whatnot are part of the over-all problem of where we have been and where we are going and why we have been in such a deep recession, why there are such massive unemployment rates and why the small business community is having such a tough time.

Look at the bankruptcy figures for 1991. There were 13,496 bankruptcies. In 1992 there were 14,317 bankruptcies. Our small business community is having a tough time making it with things like the GST, the free trade agreement and the increased cost of unemployment insurance. I could go on and on and on about the problems that this government has handed out to the small business community.

I would like to turn my attention for a minute to one of the problems that is not just in the small business community. Regular citizens are having problems out in rural Canada with respect to the privatization of Canada Post. The government has pushed Canada Post into making a profit in spite of the lack of service.

When I was in business eight years ago, we used to have guaranteed delivery overnight into every major city in the country and second-day delivery between little places like Osoyoos, Oliver or Penticton or any other place in the province. Quite frankly, we were getting almost overnight delivery between our small communities.

I got a letter from some people in Okanagan Falls in my riding just three or four days ago. They tell me that a letter was mailed to them from Penticton on January 12, 1993. It was to be sent to Okanagan Falls, which is some 15 miles away. It arrived on Wednesday, January 20. It took eight days to get 15 miles between communities where it used to take one day for delivery and takes a simple 10 to 12 minutes to drive between.

That is not all. Look at what they are doing to the community of seniors. Seniors depend on the mail in order to get their communication back and forth between themselves, their families, their children and their grandchildren. It is taking longer and longer. I am getting more and more complaints.

The most recent one that really struck me was how low we can go when it comes to Canada Post. An intermediate care facility in Oliver called Sunnybank pointed something out to me. Under the new guidelines of Canada Post, when people who previously had been on intermediate care are transferred out to extended care, or in fact are deceased and mail has to be forwarded to their estate, they are now required by Canada Post to add postage to their mail before Canada Post will allow it to be sent. Further compounding the problem, most intermediate care facilities in my area have always taken the mail in one box at the post office, sorted it and presented it as a daily routine to the seniors in that facility.

Canada Post says that it can no longer do that. That is not its policy. These places are now being required to put up postal boxes for each one of their tenants and Canada Post will then put the mail into these postal boxes.

It is an added cost to these facilities. It is money that the facilities could better use for the care of the seniors in those areas.

The direction this government has moved shows that it does not care for people. It does not care at all for seniors. It is making it almost impossible for facilities that are trying hard to create a home away from home for our seniors who can no longer care for themselves. Canada Post is putting another hurdle in the way of places like Sunnybank, the retirement centre in Penticton; Trinity Centre in Penticton; Coquihalla-Gillis House in Merritt; and Sagebrush Lodge in Osoyoos.

The direction of Canada Post and this government is a profit oriented one. It talks of competition. I say nonsense. It simply does not care about people. All it cares about is the bottom line.

We must look at where we are going in the future. We must look at our seniors. We must look at our small business community. These are the people who make up our communities. These are the people who matter to me. I would suggest that it is important that the government pay attention to those people because they are the people who will throw it out of power the next time around and vote for those who will pay attention to their needs and the needs of other Canadians.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I want to address this particular legislation today and make a number of points that are important to my constituents in particular. However I will begin on a slightly different note. While I should be critical, hopefully in a constructive manner, I want to point out that there were elements in this economic statement with which my party agreed.

[Translation]

I want to say at the beginning that the good parts in the economic statement and the budget are as follows: the extension until 1994 of the Home Buyers' Plan, a plan which the Liberals proposed. We find that quite commendable.

IRAP. In 1991, the Liberals suggested increasing the funding for the Industrial Research Assistance Program. Of course, we are pleased with that and we congratulate the government for listening.

CNARIE. Despite the lack of a national telecommunications policy, the government has committed itself to establishing a high-speed national electronic highway, which my party has called for. It is good to see that good suggestions like that are accepted from time to time. Frankly, they should be accepted more often, I think.

Mr. Speaker, I know that you are a very honest member, but no doubt you noticed something interesting during question period today.

[English]

It was interesting because I could not help but listen to my colleagues to the left who kept suggesting that they had clear-cut policies. Of course, they did not put them on the table so that we could debate them.

I would like to see their clear-cut policy with respect to economic developments so that they could share it with the Canadian people. Whenever I talk to Canadians that is one of the great concerns they have about my colleagues to the left, the NDP.

During Question Period today I also observed another interesting thing. The government has desperately tried to suggest that we have no economic plan. That is unfortunate. Either it is trying to mislead Canadians to try to increase its popularity or it has not understood what we have been saying. That is equally serious. Clearly if this government that has been in power does not understand what we mean by stimulating the economy or by building the infrastructure of our cities and towns then we have a large problem.

The problem is, and this economic statement makes the point, that it is bogged down in an ideology that prevents it from being creative. This is a continuation of the disastrous and growth stifling economic policies of the past.

Cabinet has collectively decided, not just the Prime Minister, that this government's ideological position is such that it wants to stay on course. It wants to stay on course and give us the same economic policies that got us into this recession, that have made this recession, as some people would suggest, a depression. They have failed to get us out of it.

There are about 1.7 million Canadians unemployed. Almost five million Canadians are living at the level of poverty or below, most of whom are women and over one million of whom are children. There are two to three million people, or perhaps more, who are receiving social assistance. There are about two million Canadians in our country, one of the richest in the world, who will be fed in food banks this year.

These are the kinds of policies that created those conditions in large part and these policies will be continued. What does one expect? It is not an assault on unemployment as the government would have us believe but rather an assault on the unemployed.

Canada has been in its worst recession since the 1930s. I have provided statistics about all of the people living in great difficulty and yet there is a continuation of those policies.

[Translation]

I find that quite deplorable. I understand that choices and decisions are made, that people prefer certain options and policies, but when you realize that it is not working, I think that you should try something new. That is why you are there, to govern, to try to make sure that your policies are working and to change them if they do not.

[English]

The Liberals want to stimulate growth through policies that will create jobs and encourage the private sector to expand. We are not advocating spending recklessly, as some people would suggest. We believe that very thoughtful, sensitive, and moderate spending would be good for Canadians because it would provide jobs for many of those Canadians who want to return to the work force, whose greatest desire when they wake up in the morning is to be able to find a job and to be able to fully contribute to the Canadian economy, to Canadian society and to their families.

While the government has accepted some of our proposals my leader and our party created a five point emergency economic plan designed to help create jobs and promote economic growth. That was given to the government to use if it had chosen. If it had it would not be in the mess that it is in today. As a result of the fact that the Conservatives forgot or simply ignored it they will have to pay the price, and pay it very shortly.

Canadians and Canada cannot afford the cost of inaction. Each unemployed Canadian costs the federal Treasury roughly $15,000 and about another $7,000 in the loss of tax revenues. That is really unconscionable and totally unacceptable when many of these people could be working and contributing to their own personal development and to the development of their families, their communities, their provinces and their country.

The infrastructure program that was suggested, and it was a Liberal idea, would have been so much better if the government had taken the idea without diluting it.

[Translation]

But they have diluted it so much that only 4,000 to 5,000 jobs will be created. This is much less than half the jobs that will be cut at CN alone.

[English]

I could have spoken of many other companies that will be downsizing in a significant way. Downsizing is a polite word for dismissing people and removing jobs. Therefore the infrastructure program is inadequate.

There is the assault on the unemployed. What an assault it has been. The government will say that the premiums have been frozen, but at what cost? Many people who needed to leave their jobs for legitimate reasons will not be able to do so without paying a heavy penalty and there will be fewer benefits. What kind of an assault on unemployment is that?

That is not an assault on unemployment but rather an assault on the unemployed.

[Translation]

These people are often powerless and feel very bad because they are out of work. Any jobs that do exist are short term and low-paid. Frankly, it is totally inadequate.

[English]

I have mentioned the small business measures. They are a step forward but they are certainly not enough. Business people say that the payroll paper work is immense, that it is crushing them and draining their resources to the point where some of them want to abandon their businesses.

Today we talked about all the bankruptcies. They are at a record level. My next point is that there are no economic projections with this. If we examine the government's projections, whether about the deficit, real growth or unemployment, they are always in the wrong direction.

[Translation]

So as I just said, even if I agree that some small steps have been taken, which we think are good, there is still much that is bad. I did not even talk, although of course I could have, about the old people who are very unhappy in our society today. My colleague mentioned the post offices and a small community called St. Germain. They were promised better postal services. What did they get? Much less than they deserve. I will have to go there to see whether it can be corrected. I did not even talk about our young people who are often desperate because of all the cutbacks imposed on them, when all they want is just to go back to school or university so that they can contribute fully to society.

So I, like all my colleagues, reject this whole policy outright and we hope that there will soon be an election that can give us some hope.

[English]

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to participate in the debate on Bill C-98, the borrowing authority bill.

Some of my colleagues have pointed out that it seems bizarre to be faced with a request for authority to borrow up to $8.2 billion when this government has given us absolutely no indication as to what the money is to be used for. All we have is a vague description in the bill that the funds are to be made available for the purposes of public works and general purposes.

This government is five years into its mandate and paralyzed with indecision. It is exhausted, demoralized, and bankrupt. Its only interest is in determining which candidates have launched what campaigns, which backbenchers have joined which frontbenchers in what leadership campaigns. We would have to be completely foolish to give our permission to submit with enthusiasm to this government's request for an additional $8.2 billion.

The people who live on the great northern peninsula of Newfoundland, on the Strait of Belle Isle, and along the Ste. Barbe coast and the fishermen whose livelihoods depend upon the gulf fishery, and who have seen that fishery destroyed by the mismanagement of this government which not only has a moral obligation but a constitutional one to manage that fishery, do not want me to give this government permission to borrow $8.2 billion when it has not defined in any way, shape or form what that money is for.

More important, there is no indication whatsoever in this bill that even one penny, that even one dollar of the $8.2 billion will be put to use to assist those fishermen who have been driven out of their boats and those plant workers who have been driven out of their fish plants as a result of the lack of any substantial fisheries policy on the part of this government.

Those fishermen on the great northern peninsula are asking themselves what kind of government introduces a compensation program, and we applauded it, for fishermen affected by a northern cod failure but refuses to provide any level of assistance for fishermen in the Gulf of St. Lawrence, in Newfoundland and Labrador, New Brunswick, Quebec and Nova Scotia who have also been negatively affected by a fisheries failure. They have been offered no assistance whatsoever. Mr. Speaker, I will tell you what kind of government does that. A government that says it is important during a time of restraint, important during a time of failure for example in the fishery area, in the agricultural area, a government that is looking at 1.7 million unemployed across Canada, that announces a $4.5 billion program to purchase new helicopters for Canada, $4.5 billion.

• (1600)

As my friend from Bonavista—Trinity–Conception, an admiral in the Canadian navy, a citizen who has made an outstanding contribution to this country both in his military capacity and now as a member of Parliament, now as one of the most sane and reasoned voices in this place, has said and said again and again and again, yes, it is important to ensure we have a good top notch search and rescue helicopter, and yes, it is important in the next period of time to replace the Sea King that is 30 years old, but if you can replace it with a vehicle that has 90 per cent of the capability of the new EH–101 being proposed and do it for only half the cost, then common sense dictates the government do the responsible thing.

Has the Minister of National Defence listened to the representations of this Admiral, the member for Bonavista—Trinity—Conception? Has the Minister of National Defence and this government listened to representations of many others who have said let us do the job efficiently in a cost efficient manner and let us free up those funds over the long term to provide other necessary services for Canada? No. This Minister of National Defence now has turned a blind eye to the people of Canada who at this time are in great need.

We do not buy, we do not believe, we do not subscribe to this line by the Minister of National Defence that this purchase at this time is absolutely essential, that this $5 billion expenditure must go ahead as planned.

This is the same government that announced a $10 billion nuclear submarine program and said it was absolutely essential, the same government that then cancelled it.

This is the same government that announced a $800 million northern terrain vehicle program just before the 1988 election, a massive joint venture project to be carried out in the province of Alberta, just before the last election. Immediately after the election the program went from 800 vehicles to 400 vehicles and finally the contract was cancelled.

This is the same government that announced a nearly $1 billion Polar 8 ice–breaker program for the province of British Columbia, great work, years of work, tens of thousands of manpower work years for the shipyards of British Columbia, and announced it with great fanfare. Whether there is ice these days off the west coast of Canada as there has been recently with the cold snap or not, Mr. Speaker, you will not see a ripple of the Polar 8 ice–breaker because it was never built.

This government has announced with the same intensity, the same sincerity, the same conviction this new Cadillac helicopter fleet that it announced the Polar 8, the nuclear submarines and the northern terrain vehicles.

I am convinced that just like those other great promises so necessary at the time that this one will also disappear as soon as an election is past.

We in this party say to that kind of promise it shall not proceed. It is a question of priority in Canada at this time. The priority now in 1993 for the people of Canada is not a Cadillac helicopter fleet. The priority is not the dreams of a new Minister of National Defence opposite. The priority is not to be found in the briefing note of the slick, multi–million dollar lobbyist who sold this hare–brained scheme to this government. The priority for Canada at this time is to be found in the face, the eyes, the conscience, the soul and the heart of the 1.7 million people walking the streets of this country, feeling the chill of unemployment in February 1993. That is where the priority is.

Until this government once again demonstrates, indeed it is questionable that it has ever demonstrated, that it knows where it wants to take Canada, that it has a plan to put Canadians back to work, that it understands the real pain that is being felt by those who are dislocated daily in this country, that it understands the true meaning of a record rate of bankruptcies three years in a row in this country, until it demonstrates some compassion, some understanding, some small measure of humanity, we can never say yes to this request for authority to borrow another $8.2 billion.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have an opportunity to speak on Bill C–98 which as my friend has just pointed out is to borrow $8.2 billion. I take the opportunity to speak this afternoon having spent this morning and the lunch period with Dr. Mahbub Ul Haq, the special adviser to the administrator of the United Nations Development Program, in relation to his most recent report which was provided to members of this House today, a very important report called Human Development Report 1992 published for the United Nations very recently.

What we do know is that this government will probably use all of that $8.2 billion as a pre-election slush fund. Regrettably most of that money will probably be used to put up more "for sale to the lowest bidder" signs and more signs saying "sorry, closed, moved to the U.S." because this government has shown no signs since 1988 of concerns about poverty in this country, unemployment, regional disparity, the half million Canadians who worked in the manufacturing sector whose jobs were lost under the free trade agreement and transferred to the United States or to the couple of hundred thousand more Canadians who lost their jobs during the recession related to the economic policies of this government.

It is certainly not going to deal with the question of the homeless. One does not have to be a rocket scientist to realize how dire the situation is and the consequences are from the economic policies of this government.

More than $100 million a day goes out of this country as dividends and payments to foreign owners of the means of production in this country and for payments of interest on our debt, principally to Japan, Germany and a handful of other countries.

This is the same federal government that during its term in office under this Prime Minister has given over $200 billion in grants, subsidies, tax breaks and loopholes to large profitable corporations, the majority of them owned by people outside this country.

What kind of government would do that? One of the things that drew my attention in the report tabled today by our friend from the UN is the idea of setting up something called Honesty International. It would contain several hundred journalists who are particularly good at what they do, investigative reporting. They would dig out and monitor corruption at both national and international levels because it is now going on at the rate of billions of dollars every day.

What has this government done recently in terms of off-loading debt, debt that historically was programs that were federal, dumping them off on to the provinces? We can see quite quickly that by the end of next month the net debt of the provinces and territories will be $127 billion, an increase of more than 50 per cent in two years, almost entirely directly related to the off-loading of debt by this government so it can shift all of the benefits, all of the largesse, all of the extras, all of the loopholes over to its corporate buddies.

We have seen it happening and those who try to deny it are intellectually and factually dishonest.

The federal debt has now risen to $447 billion. Not a single Conservative Minister of Finance has risen in this House and made a prediction on the deficit or on the debt that they lived up to. They have misled Canadians every single time.

• (1610)

My friend from Newfoundland who just spoke pointed out that the government promised a gigantic ice-breaker to protect sovereignty in the Canadian north. Absolute hokum. It never intended to do it, it was just to trick the public through deceit and dishonesty. The government promised it for British Columbia and never delivered. It promised hundreds of millions of dollars in rapid deployment rubber-tired vehicles for the Canadian north, again sheer hokum.

The government promised frigates, it promised F-18 contracts, it promised this, it promised that. One of the stupidest procurements that there has ever been in the history of Canada is probably tied to Bill C-98, the purchase of $4.5 billion in EH-101 helicopters. Not a single frigate in the Canadian fleet can have an EH-101 helicopter land on it. Supposedly they are for chasing subs. There is a worthless approach that the Minister of National Defence continues to peddle as one of the reasons they are being purchased, or because polling tells them it might be popular to sell them as a vehicle for search and rescue. Every single serious search and rescue expert in the country knows that they are absolutely worthless for search and rescue because the downwash is too strong. You would blow people off a cliff face and you would drown them in the ocean and you would kill them on the land, trying to rescue them with an EH-101.

This is just straight graft and corruption at its very worst, these kinds of acquisitions. We need international bodies like Honesty International to start looking into these kinds of national skulduggery.

What kind of debt have these Tories led us into, $21,259 per person? How many Canadians would want to be born today knowing that that is what has been bequeathed to them by this government, this government that is always saying: Oh, the socialists; oh, the spending; oh, this, oh, that. These are the most incompetent deranged financiers that there have ever been in this country, ever on this continent.

Let us take a look at where this is leading. Our witness today, Dr. Ul Haq, made it very clear what the dimensions of this are at the global level. There should be a peace dividend of $1.5 trillion by simply reducing the military budgets by 3 per cent during the 1990s. In fact, since 1987 global military spending has gone down by $258 billion cumulatively.

What about Canada? Page 87 in this UN report points out that it is dropping in the United States, it is dropping in eastern Europe. But what about NATO and Canada? It stayed exactly the same during this period. In Canada this Conservative government rises with pride to say that it is giving more money to the Canadian military, more than a billion dollars a month, whereas all the intelligent countries in the world are going the opposite direction.

It is appalling when one thinks of the kinds of expenditures that this government has allowed to go on under eight years of its administration. I refer those who are interested to a speech I gave following the release of the Auditor General's report.

The Prime Minister likes to travel around and say that on the human development index Canada is number one in the world. We heard from the author of the study today who wanted Canadians to think about a few other things: Canada is number one in the industrialized world in terms of drug crimes, 308 per 100,000. This is the same Prime Minister who proudly announced and crowed when Ronald Reagan said he was initiating a war on drugs and said that he was going to launch a war on drugs in Canada. Well, his war on drugs has made Canada number one in the world in terms of drug crimes. Who is fooling who? I think there should be an investigation into just who is allowing the major drug networks to operate with such great ease in this country.

How about Canada being number one in the industrialized world on automotive accidents and deaths, 976 per 100,000? We do not hear the Prime Minister crowing about that or doing anything about it either.

The highest per capita release of greenhouse gases in the world of any country, this one. What about Canada's foreign aid, something that Canadians do care about? Only 30 per cent under this government. It has been reduced every single year. Now 30 per cent of Canadian aid goes to the poorest countries and twice as much goes to the countries in the world with the highest military expenditures.

What is going on? One need only refer to Dr. Ul Haq's study on page 87 which points out that the highest military to social spending ratios in the world start with Iraq at 511. Then it goes to Somalia at 500 per cent. If one wanted to look at the soldier to teacher ratios in the Third World, Iraq is 625 per cent and Somalia 591 per cent.

There is a direct link between the kinds of expenditures made by governments like this one in relation to military expenditures, in relation to tax breaks, grants and special deals for large corporations. What happens to the poor, homeless and unemployed here in our country? If we cannot bring focus to dealing with these issues in our own country, we have damn little chance of finding ways to help the developing world out of the crisis that is coming.

There is one other statistic that is well worth thinking of for the moment. In 1960 industrialized countries had 30 per cent of the world population. By the end of 1992 industrial countries had only 5 per cent of the live infant births. The 21st century is soon to come upon us and what is happening in terms of the populations in the developed countries must be reflected in terms of how we deal with international debt and the debt in our own nation. We must halt the kind of expenditures this government pursues.

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I am taking part in this debate to increase the borrowing authority of the Government of Canada by $8.2 billion.

I have gone back and made some comparisons over the years. It is $8.2 billion of initial borrowings and all we know is that it is to be spent on public works and general purposes.

I looked back 10 years. In 1982, in a recession, the shortfall between the people receiving unemployment benefits and the total number of unemployed was 170,293. By this year, October 1992, that shortfall had more than doubled what it was in 1982 and we were in a recession at that time.

In Canada last fall there were 378,240 people unemployed who were ineligible for unemployment insurance payments. This was directly due to the continued attacks on the unemployment program by the government and the made in Canada recession that may not be over yet.

The government's reactions to these figures tabled in its December economic statements make it that much harder to get unemployment insurance benefits. It should also be noted that in 1981 the gap between the unemployment rate in the United States and Canada was only 1.3 per cent whereas in 1991 the gap was 4 per cent.

Going back again to 1982, the deficit of $14.9 billion was 4.2 per cent of the gross domestic product in Canada and the national debt was 28.2 per cent of the gross domestic product. Those are the true measuring sticks as to our ability to pay.

After eight years of Conservative mismanagement, this government claims it is attacking the deficit and the national debt. The 1991 budgetary deficit and the national debt had both increased compared to the gross domestic product. The budgetary deficit of $34.6 billion was 5.1 per cent of the gross domestic product. The national debt of $423 billion was 62.7 per cent of the gross domestic product. That national debt will be close to $450 billion at the end of this fiscal year and we will seriously look at our ability to service and repay that tremendous debt.

Regarding foreign investment, Canadian government bonds to cover the yearly budgetary deficit increased dramatically between 1982 and 1991. In 1982 just under $12 billion in Canadian government bonds were held by persons or institutions outside of Canada but by 1992 that had increased by $14.4 billion or 120 per cent to $26.4 billion.

• (1620)

Including all sources in 1984, the foreign debt of the federal government was $16.1 billion. Today, after nine years of this government, the foreign debt federally is $80.9 billion. In other words, in 1984, 92 per cent of the borrowings of the Government of Canada was from the Canadian people through Canada Savings Bonds or Canadian lending institutions.

Our ability to make decisions and control our future will be severely compromised if we must operate at the whim of the foreign corporations and investors. They will be calling the shots in this country.

In 1981 the government collected $29.2 billion in taxes from individuals and $9.3 billion from corporations. By 1991 under this Conservative government, taxes on individuals had increased by 160 per cent to $75.8 billion. For corporations, between 1981 and 1991 taxes increased by only $100 million or 1 per cent. It was 160 per cent to individuals but only 1 per cent to corporations.

In 1982 the interest on the national debt was $27.1 billion but by 1991 it had increased by 142 per cent to $65.6 billion. In 1982 there was a shortfall between the interest charged against our national debt and the interest payments of $10.4 billion. In 1991 the shortfall had increased 228 per cent to $23.8 billion. If this gap, which has increased dramatically under the administration of this government, is allowed to grow unchecked, we will never be able to balance our books in this nation.

I have spoken on this before but I want to put it on the record again. In the early 1980s, Canada had a surplus current account position. Since 1985, Canada has had a negative current account. The current account measures the balance of international payments. It is a measure of trade accounting for the difference between the export of goods and services as well as the inflow of cash and imports of goods and services along with outflows of cash.
