Arthur Donner, one of our prominent economists, argues that each $20 billion of current account deficit equates to roughly 500,000 jobs. We have had six consecutive years under this administration and have had record all time current account deficits. Since 1982, Canada's current account has gone from a surplus of $2.7 billion to a deficit of $29 billion. This is equivalent to 700,000 jobs in this nation and 1.6 million Canadians unemployed at this time.

Another comparison made is between Canada's situation and that of some other industrialized nations. In fact, Canada has the third worst current account deficit of the G-7 nations. It should be noted that these figures are from the UN report that rated Canada as the best country in the world in which to live. Clearly these policies are on the wrong track to steer to prosperity.

Some of the cuts that I see here as the government tries to balance this situation are unacceptable. I spoke on this issue in the House of Commons in November and again in December. I believe that the government has over-run its mandate. The Canadian people need a new direction and they must be placed at the top of the list of priorities. There has to be a sense of pride instilled in this country. Canadian people built it and were proud of it. That sense of pride and determination has made it the best country in the world in which to live.

You have heard me speak in this House about quality standards as they relate to our food production processing as being among the best in the world. I have spoken about the U.S. media reports of the horrible sanitary conditions in the poultry and red meat slaughtering plants to the south of us. Those plants that hire their own inspectors are being severely criticized and yet our Canadian government is going to deregulate our food inspection services in Canada and claim there is no risk.

Let me tell you that on January 11 in the state of Washington, and the story appeared in The Vancouver Province on January 29, a large number of children fell victim to food poisoning by eating tainted hamburgers. This is what the result will be of deregulating the sanitary conditions in our food industry. Five of those children were in British Columbia. There were 19 cases that they know of in the state of Washington alone and one of those children died. Most of the children were under the age of 10. Now, after the horse is out, they are trying to lock the door. There are now USFDA inspectors on the job trying to find out where that meat came from.

Cuts such as these which place the health of the Canadian people, and in particular our children, in jeopardy are not acceptable and not acceptable for budget cuts. When the government brings forward this legislation to further deregulate our agriculture and food inspection industry, I will be one MP who will stand up and strenuously object to these cuts.

We need to spend money to instil a sense of pride in being Canadian. We do not needs cuts that will lower the quality of the food we eat and the lifestyles that we have built for ourselves in this nation.

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to speak on Bill C-98 that this government has introduced, asking us in this House and asking Canadians to permit the government to borrow $8.2 billion again.

I ask, Mr. Speaker, for what? For pre-election goodies? This appears obvious because the mandate of this government to run the affairs of this country has long passed.

There is nothing specific in the request. It is all mentioned in generalities for Public Works expenditures. There is nothing specific at all and yet this government is asking us to trust once more, to keep faith. However, I ask: Can we once more trust this government?

Let me first outline for you, Mr. Speaker, the magnitude of misery in Canada. This government has been the creator of a recession and the creator of high unemployment. There are 1.6 million Canadians unemployed across the country. In Manitoba alone there are some 50,000 people unemployed. The recession has led to the loss of some 28,000 jobs in the province. This is the government that has allowed the growth of recipients of social assistance, not of their own choosing but forced to receive them for survival, to some 2.3 million of them and 3.8 million poor Canadians, one million of whom are children who may never see the benefits of adulthood. Two million have been created by this government to rely on food banks for subsistence. The government is now asking us once more to keep faith and have confidence in it. Can we?

On top of that I would like remind this government that it has cut $2.4 billion from the UI benefits. It has cut $350 million from regional development. It has made cuts to farmers, to native programs and $172 million from the protection of our environment.

To add insult to injury, this government has seen fit to change the unemployment insurance rules so that employees are placed in a difficult predicament. On top of that, this government has introduced the GST and has increased taxes 32 times in its lifetime. This government has not closed tax loopholes in our tax system. It has not yet scrapped the $4.4 billion helicopter program, although I remain optimistic in light of my leader's plea, that really serves no useful purpose at this time and is an example of misplaced priorities by this government.

I should remind everyone that this government has not eliminated the federal deficit. In fact, it has increased it, particularly the proportion of debt owed to foreign countries. That is serious because if that problem is left unattended we may not even have a Canada at the end of the next century.

That this government should be asking us once again to permit it to borrow money is really asking for too much of Canadians. In my home province, Manitoba, the highway renewal program that this government has said it will give to help boost the Manitoba economy would be a miserly $6 million per year over five years. Manitoba alone spends $100 million on highways, and it is a poor province that is filled with excellent people who are determined to help the Canadian economy. Give us a chance.

This government has cut transfer payments for education and health. Education is needed to train our young of today so that they will be prepared for the future. Transfer payments are needed to pay for health care to keep us healthy so that we can be productive citizens in Canada. Add to that the impact of Bill C-91 which will allow a monopoly on the production of new drugs. That will have an adverse impact on the cost of drugs and therefore on consumers, particularly seniors, the ill, and those who need essential medications. This government has denied Manitoba the benefit of the renewal of the core initiative program. It had helped in the development of the inner city, though much yet remains to be done.

The government has not told us how we will keep our port of Churchill alive. It has not concluded a labour market training co-shared program with the province of Manitoba. It has not told us when the centre for disease control will be completed, thereby creating jobs for Manitobans. It has not even concluded an immigration agreement that will give Manitoba a significant say in determining the number of skilled new immigrants that we should welcome to Canada, to Manitoba.

The question is: Shall we blindly permit this government to once more borrow $8.2 billion? The answer is an unequivocal no. I should remind this government that Canada belongs to Canadians. They have long lost faith in this government. Call the election. Let Canadians decide. That is the prescription I will offer to this government.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Scarborough—Rouge River—Canadian Security Intelligence Service; the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell—Canada Post Corporation; the hon. member for Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke—Emergency Preparedness Canada; the hon. member for Comox—Alberni—Justice; and the hon. member for North Island—Powell River—Indian Affairs.

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, I rise in the House today to explain why I cannot support Bill C-98.

Basically, this is a bill that authorizes the government to borrow, that provides additional borrowing authority for the modest amount of $8.2 billion.

Many of our listeners or viewers may find it hard to understand why the government has to borrow this amount and why it has to keep coming before the House to ask Parliament's permission to borrow. Perhaps it would be easier if I compared today's exercise with someone using a credit card. That someone is the government. Our government has a credit card. In fact, I call Bill C-98 the MasterCard bill.

The government has just realized it overspent. Its MasterCard credit card is already up to the limit: $447 billion. So instead of cutting its spending and getting rid of the card, the government has decided to go out and borrow more money, and to do that it needs the authorization of Parliament. Of course, we in the NDP, and the Liberals probably as well, will vote against the bill, because when a government or an individual is unable to control his spending, we have to cut off their source of income and say: Whoa. You haven't learned your lesson, and until you have, we are not going to give you more money than your initial budget called for. I am sure my colleagues in the consumer movement in Quebec and members of family savings co-operatives would agree with this approach because that is what they have been teaching Quebecers for a long time. It is too bad the government did not take advantage of the advice available from the people in these grass-roots organizations in Quebec because I believe Quebecers are very good at managing their money and staying within their budget. The trouble is, the government is not.

I wanted to know what the $8.2 billion the government wants to borrow will be used for. In the economic and fiscal statement presented on December 2, 1992 by the Minister of Finance, the government made three promises, not six, about the way it would spend our money. The first promise was, and I quote: "We will continue to invest in policies that make our economy work better". Quite frankly, is giving $5 billion to Hibernia a policy that will make our economy work better? Is wasting $50 million on Canadian Airlines really a policy that will make our economy work better? I don't think so.

The government's second promise is about the way it will spend the money, and I quote: "We will further strengthen our investment in people". People, my foot. I could talk about the cutbacks in unemployment insurance. Especially in Quebec, people are very upset and that includes the Conservative caucus. The hon. member for Chicoutimi is very upset about this and in fact a number of Conservatives are upset about these cuts in unemployment insurance. We have trouble understanding how they can cut money for the unemployed but give more for various pieces of equipment like helicopters and so on for the Department of Defence.

That is not all. There is also the tough, painful dispute on labour force training between the federal government and Quebec. They say: "We will strengthen our investment in people," but that is not what they are doing.

The third promise is this: "We will make additional investments in public infrastructure". Yes, but where? When? How much? Where are some specific examples of this famous public infrastructure? Personally, I have not seen them.

I come to the fourth promise in the budget: "We will continue to invest in broadening trade opportunities". I am in favour of trade but before talking about free trade with Mexico and all that I would really like more free trade among the provinces. I remember that when I was on the Beaudoin–Dobbie committee one thing this government promised was to make Canada a country where there was free trade among the provinces. But we do not have that yet and we never had. It is really ironic to see all that in the pamphlet or brochure that the Minister of Finance distributed.

The fifth promise, still telling us how they will spend money: "We will continue to invest in sound monetary and fiscal policies". I do not think that our present monetary and fiscal policies are sound. This government has not kept to its budget since it took power. We have had two finance ministers and so far we are $447 billion in debt. That is certainly not a sound monetary and fiscal policy.

Finally, I quote the sixth promise that they say they want to keep: "We will invest in partnerships with the provincial governments, workers and business". As far as workers are concerned I have already told you about the cuts to unemployment insurance. I can tell you that is a joke which Quebecers do not find funny. There was no partnership.

When Bill C–91 on pharmaceuticals was tabled all the provinces except Quebec were against it because they knew that drugs would cost more as a result. I am not proud that my province, Quebec, was in favour of it because ultimately, this bill is at the expense of the most vulnerable people.

In closing I must tell you that this government is bankrupt, not only financially but also in terms of leadership and vision. That is even more serious because one can always find money somewhere but a government so lacking in leadership and vision deserves a slap from the voters and I hope it will get it soon in a federal election.

[English]

Mr. Jack Shields (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 26(1), I move:

That the House continue to sit beyond the normal hour of adjournment for the purpose of continuing consideration of Bill C-98, an act to provide additional borrowing authority.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Mr. Shields, seconded by Mr. McCreath, pursuant to Standing Order 26 (1), moves that the House continue to sit beyond the ordinary hour of daily adjournment for the purpose of consideration of the report stage of Bill C-98.

Mr. Milliken: I have a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I apologize but I am reading the motion. I will take your point of order after disposing of this matter.

[Translation]

I am sorry, but I am putting a question to the House and according to the rules of the House, I cannot interrupt the process that has begun.

All members opposed to the motion will please rise.

And fewer than 15 members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Since fewer than 15 members rose, pursuant to Standing Order 26(2), the motion is carried.

Motion agreed to.

[English]

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. In my view, you improperly refused to hear me Sir, when this motion was put to the House. I want to say that we earlier agreed that this motion would not be put if we agreed to allow third reading stage to proceed today.

I want to make it clear that the agreement to proceed at third reading is also null and void. I trust that Your Honour in putting the question before the House bore in mind that it was null and void. I wanted to make that point perfectly clear before the question was put.

If Your Honour has any other thoughts on the matter I would appreciate hearing them. In my view that agreement is out the window because the deal was clear concerning the motion that the government put earlier to dispense with the unanimous consent required to proceed at third reading if report stage was completed today. I said we would agree to that on the understanding that the hours would not be extended today.

Now we have an extension of hours so I assume that deal has gone by the board. I ask Your Honour to confirm it.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): After consultation, it is very clear, according to our rules of procedure, that the extension just granted by the House applies only to the consideration at report stage of Bill C-98.

[English]

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, I have a few comments I wish to put on the record with respect to Bill C-98, commonly referred to in debate as the borrowing authority.

As the House knows, and as the people of Canada know, this country is currently in the worst recession that it has experienced since the early 1930s. Indeed, it is a depression.

If it were not for such things as social assistance, welfare, unemployment insurance and so on, the visible, tangible effects would be much clearer and much more graphically displayed day after day. However, because of our social safety net in this country, people are provided with emergency income and with unemployment insurance when they are laid off or when they lose their jobs.

We know what the causes were. The government likes to think that the causes of this recession were entirely offshore: the international money markets, world-wide inflation, the money supply, overexpansion, overextention and so on.

• (1650)

The fundamental fact is clear and we have made this argument many times before. The present recession or depression began in this country and the reason it began in Canada was because the Conservative government insisted throughout the 1980s, and even into the early 1990s, on a policy of high interest rates that was designed to fight inflation and not to expand the economy in a meaningful way. At that very time when our economy was getting into trouble, they precipitated upon this country the free trade agreement with the United States and that was followed by the GST.

There was a series of deliberate attempts by this government that made the recession even worse. In retrospect we realize that all of them were detrimental to the Canadian economy. In large measure, but not entirely, these things made the recession even worse.

I want to stand here today and say something I have never said before. I am speaking primarily as a member of Parliament from the province of Ontario. In almost all the speeches I have made in this House over a course of nearly 22 years I have tried to address issues from a national perspective. Today I am going to become a little more specific and a little more insular. I am going to speak on behalf of my own province of Ontario. It is the industrial heartland of our country and it has been devastated primarily by the free trade agreement.

We have lost 275,000 jobs nation-wide as a result of that free trade agreement and most of those job losses have been in the province of Ontario.

This has resulted in plant closures and massive layoffs. As a result of the plant closures, the bankruptcies and the massive layoffs, the revenues to the province of Ontario have been severely restricted and there has been a very real decline.

The province of Ontario was always considered the richest province in Canada. It always led Canada out of recessions in the past but that is no longer happening in the province of Ontario. Our economy is sluggish. It is going through a period of adjustment, change and overhaul and it is going through this period at a time when the federal government, whose policies largely caused this recession and this industrial devastation in the heartland of Canada, has decided to cut back on its transfer of payments to Ontario, Alberta and British Columbia. If that is not bitter irony I do not know what is.

Take, for example, such areas as post-secondary education, hospitals and medical care services and the Canada Assistance Plan—which of course relates directly to welfare and social assistance—the federal government currently owes the treasurer of Ontario over $5 billion. A lot of people in the province of Ontario do not appreciate the fact that the reason the province of Ontario has had to borrow money in order to maintain social assistance is those two factors: a severe shortfall in government revenue at Queen's Park, plus a cutback of the transfer payments from the federal government to the province of Ontario based on a formula that was in effect as late as 1989 and 1990.

The NDP came into power in the late autumn of 1990 to be faced not only with a recession that was growing by the minute, but with a treasury whose revenues were declining rapidly and at a time when the previous Liberal government under David Peterson had spent its way almost into oblivion during Ontario's healthy years from 1985 to 1990.

David Peterson said during the election campaign that his government would leave a balance in the accounts at Queen's Park of somewhere in the neighbourhood of $300 million to half a billion dollars. When Bob Rae took over as premier he discovered that not only was the treasury bare, but there was a deficit of some $300 million to start off and face the recession.

The province of Ontario is in terrible financial shape. There is a bankrupt treasury at Queen's Park thanks to the provincial Liberals, a severe decline in revenues from the corporate sector and from the private income-tax sector in Ontario to the provincial treasury, as well as a decline in the rate of increase of transfer payments from the federal government to the province of Ontario which now account for $5 billion. It is not Ontario's fault. Day after day the Minister of Finance loves to hurl barbs at his provincial counterpart at Queen's Park, blaming the Rae government for over-spending. All the Rae government has tried to do is maintain a lifeline to those who have been severely affected by the recession which it did not cause at a time when the federal government has cut back on transfer payments to the tune of $5 billion.

It is fine for the federal government to offload its debt on to the provinces. However, if the federal government is really serious about turning the economy around in this country, if it is really serious about getting people back to work and about modernizing the industrial base which used to exist in Ontario, the federal government will change its attitude toward transfer payments. It will do everything it possibly can to assist the province of Ontario to get itself turned around and out of this severe recession.

I am speaking now to members from Quebec, from Manitoba, from British Columbia and Alberta. If Ontario's industrial heartland does not get turned around, if it does not get productive again, if it does not get competitive again, neither will the national economy of this country. It was Ontario that led us out of recessions in the past and if it cannot lead us out of a recession this time the whole country is in severe trouble.

Today in this very brief intervention I prevail upon the Government of Canada to enter into a new fiscal relationship with the provinces of Ontario, British Columbia and Alberta, the three so-called rich provinces, to loosen up the purse strings, to start spending some money to expand and modernize the economy, to get things turned around so that we have productive industries paying their fair share of corporate taxes. In this way we get the unemployed back to work so that they can begin to live meaningful lives again and begin to pay their taxes to enhance the revenues to the treasury of the province of Ontario. That is the way we are going to come out of this recession, not by tightening the belt over there and squeezing Ontario till the last pip pops.

We have to act and act fast or we are going to slide back into a recession that will make the 1991-92 one look pretty mild. If we slip now, if we do not move when we have the opportunity in Ontario, the industrial economy of this country will be severely restricted for the next several years.

I notice my time is up. I appreciate very much this opportunity to speak.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Call in the members.

[Translation]

After the ringing of the bell:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. Pursuant to Standing Order 45(5)(a), the Chief Opposition Whip has asked me to postpone the vote.

[English]

Accordingly pursuant to Standing Order 45(5)(a), the division on the question now before the House stands deferred until tomorrow at eight o'clock p.m. at which time the bells to call in the members will be sounded for not more than 15 minutes.

[Translation]

It being 5.10 p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 30(6), the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

INDOOR AIR QUALITY ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South) moved that Bill C-281, an act relating to indoor air quality, be read a second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Natural Resources sector.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I believe that most Canadians view environmental issues as concerning the outdoors—water, air, parks and perhaps the global issues that we are all now aware of such as climate change, et cetera. But I believe that the most serious environmental problems that now affect Canadians' health are problems related to the indoor environment.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, given our climate and the fact that it is not suitable outdoors today for humans or non-humans alike because it is so cold, it will not surprise you to realize that about 93 per cent of our time as Canadians is spent indoors. Increasingly problems related to the indoor environment are becoming more and more frequently related to the health of Canadians. Very often in recent times this has been the focus of the popular media.

I pulled out just a few recent articles that I have seen and there have been items in the electronic media as well. The Windsor Star, May 14, 1992, states: "More evidence has been gathered to show indoor air pollution is a bigger problem in Windsor than anybody, even those you would expect to know, realized. Local volunteers who carried air monitors around for a week last summer typically recorded higher readings for some cancer-causing toxins in their homes than they did outdoors, in the office or while commuting".

The Ottawa Citizen, September 2, 1992, states: "Canadians breathe a cocktail of hundreds of toxic chemicals in their homes, offices and cars, far more than they get from the worst urban pollution outdoors, a new study says".

The Ottawa Citizen, September 10, 1992, states: "Place de Ville called sick building. Public servants blame fungus for allergic reactions and sickness".

The Globe and Mail, September 10, 1992, states: "Hospital workers ailments baffling". This story reports on the Camp Hill Medical Centre in Halifax, where about 100 of the hospital's 2,500 employees are off work each day suffering from headaches, nausea and severe breathing problems they believe were caused by the air they breathed and the chemicals they used at the institution over three years.

"How to prevent your office from making you sick" in the Financial Post. "Is your office poisoning you?", it states in The Globe and Mail.

"Spooked by asbestos", is close to home. It refers to the West Block which a number of us share as our office homes. I might add that in the study that was conducted under the auspices of the Speaker's office, the only office in the West Block that was actually found to contain a fragment of asbestos was Room 408 which happens to be mine. "An environmental sleeper is roused. Employees are waking up to the major economic, health and social problems of indoor air pollution". So on it goes. This is becoming a subject about which people are aware, are concerned and are beginning to seek answers and understanding.

There are a variety of impacts of this indoor air pollution. Many of us have heard of the concept of the sick building syndrome to which several of these articles refer. Generally thought to be caused by exposure to airborne contaminants indoors, the results can be headaches, dizziness, nausea, burning eyes, fatigue and irritability. The nature of this problem is becoming more and more well known and well commented upon, as I have been saying.

It is not just comments in the popular press either. Increasingly agencies and research foundations, some sponsored by governments, have been reporting on the problems related to indoor contamination.

Dr. Stephen Barron prepared a study in 1990 for the research division of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation concerning environmental hypersensitivities. In his study he cites a number of other studies which have been done concerning these problems.

For example, the report of the ad hoc committee on environmental hypersensitivity disorders which was prepared for the government of Ontario in 1985 reported: "Our study raised our collective concern about the role of environmental factors as a cause of human illness. It seems clear that we are inexorably increasing the toxicity of our environment.

In our opinion there is good reason to believe that environmental hypersensitivity goes beyond what has already been verified and to suggest that there are a number of persons who are being adversely affected in various ways by exposure to one or more agents in our environment".

In December 1989 a study for the New Jersey state department of health entitled "Chemical sensitivity" concluded:

> Chemical sensitivity does exist as a serious health and environmental problem and public and private sector action is warranted at both the state and federal levels. Chemical sensitivity is increasing and could become a large problem with significant economic consequences related to the disablement of productive members of society.
> Acceptance of chemical sensitivity as a bona fide physical disease may also be facilitated by the recognition that it is wide-spread in nature and is not limited to what some observers would describe as malingering workers, hysterical housewives and workers experiencing mass psychogenic illness. We are struck by the fact that individuals in such demographically divergent groups as industrial workers, office workers, housewives and children report similar polysymptomatic complaints triggered by chemical exposure.

This was a study for the New Jersey state department of health.

In a report dated 1988 the Human Ecology Foundation of Canada described hypersensitivity disorder. This is very important because it addresses the claims that some critics have made that these problems are really imaginary or psychological in nature. I am quoting again from the Ecology Foundation report:

> Individuals are all sensitive to their surroundings. An environmentally sensitive person is excessively reactive to external and internal factors and reacts much more intensely than others to the substances that she or he is sensitive to and often other factors such as chilling, fatigue and infections.

> A person may develop a sensitivity at any time in his or her life. Sometimes the illness develops following a viral infection. There appears to be a genetic factor connected with environmental hypersensitivity. However, repeated and prolonged exposure to almost any toxic substance will result in hypersensitivity to that substance regardless of genetic inheritance.

What is important in that quotation is the fact that individuals who might not otherwise or previously have demonstrated sensitivity or allergic reactions can, as a result of prolonged exposure to low levels of various substances, develop sensitivity which may be debilitating to them or at least impair their ability to work in a work place.

In addition to this sensitivity reaction we also have the phenomenon of building-related disease. The best and perhaps most striking example of that is the development of what came to be known as Legionnaires' disease as a result of an incident that occurred in Pennsylvania in 1976. Members of the American Legion fell ill after attending a convention in Philadelphia.

The first one to be identified, Mr. Ray Brennan, was 61 years old. He came home from the convention feeling a bit tired. Three days later he had chest pains, fever and difficulty breathing. His sister said that he did not want to go to the hospital. That very night, on July 26, 1976, with his lungs filling with blood, Brennan died of an apparent heart attack. Three days later another Legionnaire, 60 years old, died in much the same way and so did three other Pennsylvania veterans. On Sunday, August 1, there were six more ranging from 39 to 82 years of age.

All of them had one thing in common: They had been to the convention in Philadelphia. They all came down with the same signs and symptoms of headaches, chest pains, high fevers and lung congestion. The result in all of the cases was death.

We now know something of what caused Legionnaires' disease. We know that it was spread not through contact with other sufferers but through inhalation of materials that were spread through the ventilation system of that hotel building and the results were disastrous.

We have this variety of effects of indoor air pollution, everything from the irritation caused by the sick building syndrome through to the drastic effects of Legionnaires' disease.

My Bill C-281 simply proposes that the Government of Canada recognize that the indoor environment is directly related to the health and well-being of Canadians; that the Minister of National Health and Welfare, as the minister primarily responsible for the health of Canadians, be empowered to take actions that will endeavour to ensure that Canadians in the 93 per cent of the time they spend indoors can do so in relative confidence that their health and well-being is protected.

I am suggesting that the minister be given the power to establish a national research centre. It would conduct research and studies into all aspects of indoor air contamination and would develop methods and technologies or processes for the detection, correction or prevention of indoor air contamination.

I am asking that the minister be enabled to formulate comprehensive plans and designs for the control and abatement of indoor air contamination; that he promote through public education and discussion an awareness of the hazards of indoor air contamination to human health; that he develop and disseminate information materials relating to indoor air contamination. I am also suggesting in the bill that he be enabled to carry on these activities in co-operation with and perhaps also giving financial assistance to the provinces.

We have debated this issue in this House before. I know that a government representative is going to get up and, I hope this time not sarcastically, point out that the government and various agencies are doing some of these things now.

Since 1990, when we last debated this issue in the House of Commons pursuant to a private member's motion that I put forward, in July 1991 the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation published the booklet: "What CMHC has been doing about indoor air quality". It is interesting timing that it came out after our last debate. CMHC has published numerous material relating to indoor air quality. In its consumers' series there are "Guide to Radon Control" and "How to Improve the Quality of Air in Your Home". In its builders' series there are "Guide to Residential Exhaust Systems" and the study "Indoor Air Quality Initiative at CMHC, 1980 to 1990".

All of this is good. I do not mean to criticize it by proposing that instead of simply leaving this as a builder's issue, instead of simply leaving some items being done by the National Research Council, the government should take a focus of public health and welfare on this issue. It should say that what we have here is first and foremost an issue of public health. Let us look at it from that point of view. Let us recognize that as a matter of public health. Canadians need the protection and assurance that a government-sponsored initiative can give them that is primarily focused on their health.

All of the rest is good. All that should be continued, not replaced as a result of this initiative. The research activities of NRC or CMHC can just as easily be carried on by reference to the Minister of National Health and Welfare as is the case at the moment.

I would like to acknowledge that there has been a great deal of work on the occupational side of this issue by the Public Service Alliance of Canada and for good reason.

I will not take the time to read the list of all of the buildings in which federal public servants work and about which serious complaints have been raised with respect to indoor air quality. To give an idea of how broadly spread this issue is, some of the buildings are: Les Terrasses de la Chaudière, everyone in Ottawa-Carleton knows that it is famous; Megastructure in Quebec; Taxation Centre in Sudbury; Joseph Sheppard Building in Toronto; Pavillion Central in Lennoxville; Canadian Grain Commission Building in Winnipeg; Queen's Square in Dartmouth; 12171 Horseshoe Way in Richmond; the Superannuation Building in Shediac; "F" Division Headquarters in Regina; Harry Hays Building in Calgary; Taxation Centre in Winnipeg; Canada Employment Centre in Kelowna; and buildings in Ottawa and Labrador among others. The problem is widespread and serious.

PSAC also made a lot of useful suggestions in a report "The PSAC Position Paper on Indoor Air Quality" dated 1991. Many of these should be acted upon by the government and could be under the umbrella of the kind of legislation I am proposing.

For example PSAC suggests the federal government must initiate legislative action together with the provincial and territorial governments to ensure effective and co-ordinated action on the growing problem of poor indoor air quality. It suggests a new indoor air authority must be created to initiate and co-ordinate research activity on a large scale. There are many other issues which PSAC raised.

Interestingly enough, the government's own study entitled "Public Service 2000" much criticized of course by PSAC, came to similar conclusions on this issue. Let me read from the PS 2000 report of the task force on work force adaptiveness:

> Sick buildings mean sick employees. We recommend that the Bureau of Real Property Management and the Department of Public Works undertake as a matter of urgency a comprehensive reassessment of their standards for materials, air, heat and lighting in federal buildings, and that they take the healthiest and most effective private sector examples as the norm for new buildings and the model for retrofitting existing ones. In so doing they should take account of the fact that the ability to affect one's own space is an important element of employee empowerment. Task lighting, windows that open and a modicum of privacy are all important in organizations that value productivity.

I agree entirely with that. I know my time has virtually run out. I simply wish to stress that in dealing with the problem of indoor air environment a multi-disciplinary approach is required which takes in not only the concerns of the building sector, building owners and building managers, producers of things that are potential contaminants, carpets, paint, furniture and so on, but also under the auspices of the Minister of National Health and Welfare recognizes that the primary concern has to be the health and well-being of Canadians from coast to coast.

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I want to congratulate my colleague the member for Ottawa South for his excellent presentation and very fine remarks. Indoor air quality is of prime importance to human health because of the large amount of time that all of us spend indoors.

Occupants of indoor environments may be exposed to a variety of pollutants originating from either human activities or the presence in the home of such items as combustion from heating and cooking, or vapours from consumer products, furnishings, building materials, as well as pollutants from the outdoor air.

There are a number of national agencies in Canada besides the Department of National Health and Welfare which have a role to play regarding the improvement in the quality of indoor air. These include: Department of Energy, Mines and Resources; CMHC; the division of building research under the National Research Council; Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs; Housing and Urban Development Association of Canada; Canadian General Standards Board; and the Department of Public Works.

Much of the research conducted on indoor air quality at the Department of National Health and Welfare is partially funded by the Panel on Energy Research and Development known as PERD.

The PERD program promotes information and technology transfers through various seminars and publications as well as some cost-sharing and co-operation within the departments, with industry, with the provinces, universities and other countries.

This panel is truly unique to the federal government. It is the only major program in which an interdepartmental committee recommends a package of work with the appropriate resource allocation for each of its member departments. It recommends this to a single minister, the minister of EMR, who in turn makes recommendations to the cabinet or to the Treasury Board on behalf of all departments.

The PERD program is divided into seven tasks: energy efficiency; coal; fusion; renewable energy and generic environment; alternate transportation fuels; oil, gas and electricity; and co-ordination and international co-operation.

Each of those tasks is further divided into programs. Each program is co-ordinated by the parent program committee. The Department of National Health and Welfare is directly involved in two programs, environmental and buildings and energy.

In 1987 the department published a report entitled "Significance of Fungi in Indoor Air, Report of a Working Group". This document prepared by the departmental working group on fungi in indoor air reviewed the emerging issue of moulds and fungi as indoor air pollutants and potential hazards to health. It included the participation and support of Agriculture Canada, naturally NRC which is extremely important, and Consumer and Corporate Affairs Canada.

The Department of National Health and Welfare publishes exposure guidelines for residential indoor air quality. These current indoor air quality guidelines are restricted to residential buildings. The quality of air in many offices is the responsibility of the provincial governments.

Unfortunately most of the conspicuous problems we have today deal with the air quality in non-residential buildings such as offices, schools and public buildings. As a result a federal-provincial working group has drafted a technical guide to investigate these particular problems. The guide again advises methods for investigating and correcting indoor air problems.

Funds for the project are provided by the Department of National Health and Welfare and two reports are due out very shortly. There have also been five international conferences on indoor air quality and climate. These were held in 1978 in Copenhagen, in 1981 in Amherst, in 1984 in Stockholm and in 1987 in West Berlin.

The Fifth International Conference on Indoor Air Quality and Climate was held in Toronto in the summer of 1990. The federal government was a major sponsor of the conference. The Department of National Health and Welfare also sponsored that meeting. There was one in Montreal in fall 1992 on the subjects of buildings and energy. The Department of Energy, Mines and Resources presented some very interesting and investigative papers on the exposure guidelines, specifically dealing with residences.

Other presentations on indoor air quality were made at the 92nd annual meeting of the Canadian Lung Association. The Department of National Health and Welfare does participate in many working groups specifically dealing with the air quality of the residences. We also deal with the CMHC, the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation. That group has a specific committee that examines air quality inside houses.

To better co-ordinate the federal government's activities the government has an interdepartmental committee that co-ordinates and brings forth all recommendations dealing specifically with indoor air quality. The Department of National Health and Welfare chairs this committee because it believes that health is dependent upon the air that we breathe inside residences.

During public consultations on the federal government's green plan the Canadian public truly expressed concern about indoor air quality. We intend to meet the concerns that were expressed by the public through ongoing and future projects with close co-operation and close communication with all other governments and non-governmental organizations.

My colleague from Ottawa South has outlined some very good recommendations concerning the establishment of a national research centre examining air quality in all buildings. He is talking about occupational buildings and industrial buildings as well as residential. I congratulate him on these fine recommendations but I really must point out that the federal government has a co-ordinated committee that takes specific action with regard to residential air quality. At this time, with the co-operation that exists at the government level, some of his ideas may be a little redundant.

In closing, I must emphasize once again that there is no doubt that the air we breathe, whether at work or at home, is extremely important. It affects our everyday life in terms of the increase of productivity and learning at institutions. I cannot give agreement to his bill but I do thank the member for bringing it to our attention and for outlining not only his concerns but the concerns of all citizens right across Canada.

[Translation]

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): The last time I spoke I was as much against the bill under discussion then, a bill authorizing the government to borrow $8 billion, as I am now, I think, in favour of my colleagues' private members bill, Bill C-281, an act relating to indoor air quality.

The people who are listening to us and following these proceedings may find that an act concerning cleaner indoor air is a bit strange because people think it should be clean and uncontaminated and they may find that we are somewhat paranoid, creating problems where none exist.

This bill is extremely important and there is nothing paranoid about that. It is important for us to pass this bill. The government's representative just said she cannot support the bill. I fail to understand why the government refuses to follow up on the initiative taken by the hon. member and support this kind of bill because today environmental factors are becoming an increasingly frequent cause of illness. Doctors agree that today's diseases of the 21st century are diseases we have created ourselves, whether we are talking about the connection between smoking and cancer or other problems due to the contamination of our water, our food or our environment in general.

There is not a trace of paranoia in this. This bill responds to an increasingly critical need when we consider how contaminated our environment has become today. Consumers in Quebec, in Canada and North America are becoming increasingly suspicious of products that are seemingly harmless, like a glass of water, for instance. I drink from this glass which contains water, but what else? I heard a report on the radio yesterday that a certain brand of bottled water in Quebec contains nitrate.

I remember when I was a member of a consumer protection group a few years ago and someone discovered that Perrier water from France contained benzine. Imagine Perrier being something you can drink or put in your gas tank. Mind-boggling.

So we become increasingly suspicious of products that seem absolutely harmless. I think a bill that calls on the government to develop a comprehensive strategy for improving the quality of indoor air makes good sense. I think it responds to a critical need.

Mr. Speaker, have you ever travelled and had to stay in hotels where the windows didn't open? Did you feel comfortable breathing this artificial air containing God knows what, perhaps filtered, perhaps not? I don't. I feel terrible if I can't have a window that opens so I can more or less control the quality of the air I breathe.

What is the air like here in the House of Commons right now? Does it contain asbestos? We don't know. What are the government standards for air quality right here? Have there been any checks recently? Do we have any federal standards for indoor air quality in this building? Where does our air come from?

I know the quality of air circulation varies, but of course we produce our own. Seriously, if we agree that 90 per cent of our time is spent indoors, the problem is a critical one. It is not only about contamination due to poor filtration or certain substances but about the need for clean air because it has a dramatic impact on the health of individuals who work indoors.

I could talk about radon, for instance, a colourless and odourless gas. According to the experts, radon has apparenbly been responsible for 5 per cent to 15 per cent of lung cancer cases. This is a serious problem. And I am not being paranoid about this either. These were figures presented by well-known physicians.

Now we know the problem exists and that the problem of contaminated indoor air has been criticized several times by employees and by other members, what is the federal government doing about this in a comprehensive way?

The hon. member said: We are trying to co-ordinate our efforts. Fine. I couldn't agree more. We also have guidelines, the difference being that the hon. member prefers specific standards. There is quite a difference.

In concluding, I want to say that as a member I am proud to support a bill that really makes good sense. I am proud of this bill. It does not happen very often because I get the impression that there is a lot of talk in the House about things that are not really important, except for last night, when I was also very proud to see my Conservative, Liberal and NDP colleagues support the entrenchment in the Constitution of the recognition of both languages for New Brunswick. I thought that was splendid. I was very proud indeed.

This evening I am equally proud of the hon. member's initiative in tackling a problem that is obvious, serious and far-reaching. And I wish him good luck with his bill.

Mrs. Lise Bourgault (Argenteuil—Papineau): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity this evening to take part in this debate on air quality.

We all know that air pollution has been recognized for quite some time as a serious threat to health. Air pollution has probably focussed the public's attention on the quality of our environment to a greater extent than has any other form of environmental deterioration. Since the 15th century, smoke and the odours emanating from burning coal were considered a public nuisance. Laws designed to control point source emissions have been part of the history of most industrialized countries and were passed many years ago.

Interestingly, indoor air quality did not become a subject of debate and intense research until quite recently. The recent flurry of activity proves that indoor air quality has become a major health concern, especially in this country, where we unfortunately spend up to 90 per cent of our time indoors.

Here in Canada, we had the controversy about urea formaldehyde foam insulation. You will recall the UFFI debate and the government's ban in 1980 which I think was a major factor in drawing the public's attention to the problem of indoor air quality. Reports on scientific studies which showed a higher concentration of chemical contaminants indoors than outdoors have tended to heighten these concerns. Furthermore, office employees claim that current energy conservation practices in large office buildings are responsible for poor air quality.

No single Canadian agency has full responsibility for investigating and checking the potential impact on health of air contaminants inside residences. In the case of residential buildings, the government's presence is perceived by some as an intrusion, by others as a necessity. The wide range of strategies and approaches for controlling exposure to indoor air contaminants are an indication of the complexity of the problem. Finally, controlling indoor air contaminants involves measures such as ventilation, removal or replacement of sources of air contaminants, making changes so as to avoid contaminant sources, air purification, restrictions on household use of potentially hazardous chemical products, certification programs for builders and trades people, compulsory courses for engineers and building designers and educational programs for the general public.

Corrective measures may include a balanced application of several of these approaches, which are not necessarily incompatible. Standards or criteria defining air quality levels that are conducive to health and comfort must be used to determine to what extent controls are necessary. That is why in 1987, the Department of National Health and Welfare published the following document: Exposure Guidelines for Residential Indoor Air Quality.

Mr. Plamondon: In 1985?

Mrs. Bourgault: No, in 1987. The first one of its kind to be published by any government in the world. Although provincial departments across the country approved these guidelines, they are neither compulsory nor binding. However, it is expected they will help individuals and public agencies to be consistent in their assessments of the need for corrective action. In the longer term, these national guidelines will be used as a basis for developing or modifying the building code, standards for construction materials and furnishings, and ventilation requirements.

The department developed these guidelines in June 1980 when the Ontario Deputy Minister of Health requested a federal-provincial study that would set standards for air quality in new residential housing projects. A proposal to form a task force on indoor air quality was officially tabled at a meeting in October 1980 of the Federal-Provincial Advisory Committee on Environmental and Occupational Health. I mention this so that people who are interested will realize there are a number of committees and that a number of things have been done in recent years. The deputy ministers of health subsequently approved the proposal. The advisory committee created the federal-provincial task force on indoor air quality, whose mandate would be to examine a definition of acceptable air quality, the need to establish acceptable objectives and maximum acceptable concentrations of specific substances, and standards for ventilation or air recirculation. The scope of the mandate was restricted to residential establishments and the task force was to make recommendations designed to protect the public, based on constant exposure, in other words, 24 hours a day.

When it wrote these guidelines, the department wanted to protect the health of the great majority of the general public, including groups at risk like very young children, the elderly and persons with known health problems. These groups are especially concerned with indoor air quality because, as we know, they spend most of their time indoors. The department set itself two major objectives: (1). To develop guidelines on the concentrations of particular air contaminants in homes, taking account of factors like the sensitivity of groups at risk and the sources and modes of action of the contaminants; (2). To develop as much as possible other guidelines or recommendations on measures to protect or improve air quality in domestic establishments.

The federal-provincial task force met for the first time in September 1981 under the aegis of the Department of National Health and Welfare. In the next four years it collected and examined scientific documentation on 18 substances or groups of substances before setting the guidelines and recommendations contained in the document published by the Minister of National Health and Welfare in April 1987.

The government agreed in principle to update the guidelines in 1992-93 so that is now going on. The group will consider other substances to be added to the guidelines. If it seems possible to develop guidelines on these substances the work will again be facilitated by the Federal-Provincial Advisory Committee on Environmental and Occupational Health.

That is why the very existence of these guidelines, combined with the research now under way in various federal government departments, shows that we have implemented a national strategy for reducing the threats posed by exposure to contaminants in indoor air.

Also, our government's tobacco policy is another measure that has particularly improved indoor air quality in public buildings. Nevertheless, it should not be taken for granted that everything is going well. As a member of Parliament when I was Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Health and Welfare, I had to deal with the case of a citizen who is fighting a constant struggle throughout the country with the problems of asthma and the possibility that he might have to work or even live in buildings that are insulated in different ways.

I think that we are doing many things, but fully regulating single-family homes in Canada is still a long way off. Nevertheless we must continue to work for increased protection of the health of Canadians, especially those who work in public, semi-public and even private buildings, because health is a subject that concerns all Canadians. Health costs being so high, it is obviously desirable to implement all kinds of preventive policies.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for giving me the opportunity to participate in this debate.

[English]

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to have the opportunity to speak to the motion of my colleague, the hon. member for Ottawa South, on Bill C-281, an act relating to indoor air quality.

The quality of the air we breath is essential for good health. I think that is a very basic statement and one with which we are all very familiar.

North Americans spend over 90 per cent of their time indoors. Here in Canada this is as high as 98 per cent, given the climate. I was alarmed to read of a study by the Ontario environment industry which states that Canadians breath more toxic chemicals in their homes, offices and cars than they do from the worst urban pollution outdoors.

Obviously something needs to be done to rectify this situation. Checks need to be set in place to ensure that the quality of indoor air is clean and safe.

• (1800)

In other words, this bill is long overdue. As a member of Parliament for a local riding, Nepean, many of my constituents work for the federal Public Service. My colleague has mentioned that many federal buildings across the country have contaminants seeping into the space in which the employees are working.

I would like to specifically zero in on one building in the Ottawa area—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I am sorry but the time provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired.

Pursuant to Standing Order 96(1), the order is dropped from the Order Paper.

Mr. Manley: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Given the fact that the bells rang for 10 minutes at the beginning of private members' hour we did not begin the hour until about 5.10 p.m.

I know my colleague has remarks prepared and is ready to deliver them. It does not seem right that we have an abbreviated private members' hour in this case.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I accepted the hon. member's question out of courtesy, even though the debate on the adjournment motion had begun. I do not have to receive the point of order. That being said, the Standing Orders clearly state that the time for Private Members' Business ends at six o'clock. Pursuant to the Standing Orders, I proceeded to the debate on the adjournment motion at six o'clock.

If the hon. member wants to change the Standing Orders he can always address the committee that periodically considers improvements to the Standing Orders.

[English]

Mr. Manley: Mr. Speaker, I rise on the same point of order. Perhaps there would be unanimous consent of the House to at least allow my colleague from Nepean to complete the remarks that were under way at the time. I think many of us contemplated that she had until 6.10 p.m.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I am sorry, but once the debate on the adjournment motion is under way, I cannot receive requests of this kind. It should have been done before six o'clock.

Adjournment Debate

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 deemed to have been moved.

CANADIAN SECURITY INTELLIGENCE SERVICE

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Mr. Speaker, last autumn I put a question through the Chair to the Solicitor General regarding a matter involving the Canadian Security Intelligence Service.

I was seeking from him an assurance for Canadians that intelligence gathering and analysis had not been politicized. Politicization of that type of information can cause significant problems for democratic governments. There are many examples in modern history such as the case of J. Edgar Hoover in the United States who perhaps used information for purposes other than for that which it was originally intended in the field of security intelligence.

The background to my question involved two allegations that were publicly made. The first was that the names of intelligence sources were made known to the Solicitor General and were routinely disclosed. The second was that the political staff of the Solicitor General attended meetings of the target approval and review committee within CSIS.

On the first question the Solicitor General responded that in a small number of exceptional cases names were disclosed but in none of those cases was the person a Canadian citizen or a permanent resident. In that way he perhaps got a little lucky but that does not speak for other Solicitors General prior to this one. What he did not say but should have said, and he might if he had the chance, is that any reference in the Solicitor General's routine business to persons without using a code name should only occur on an exceptional need to know basis. I hope that is what is occurring because anything beyond that risks politicization.

The second question involved the allegation that political assistants of a previous solicitor general had attended meetings of the target approval and review committee. This was not fully addressed in the question. A committee of this House reported in 1990 on CSIS and did not include that type of person at meetings of TARC. I hope that is the case. That is not to say that before 1988 such persons did not attend those meetings. I hope they did not. In any event we do not have a lot of information that they are now, and I believe they are not.

The point I want to make, and I make it on behalf of members on this side of the House for the benefit of the Solicitor General, is that disclosure of source names and attendance by political staff at meetings of TARC or any other committee within CSIS should not happen. It is a matter for continuing monitoring by the security and intelligence review committee that acts on behalf of this House and all Canadians in monitoring CSIS. The Solicitor General should always be in a position in this House to assure Canadians that the security intelligence gathering systems within CSIS are secure and have not been politicized as those public allegations suggested at that time.

[Translation]

Mrs. Monique B. Tardif (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, last June, the media did say that the names of CSIS's human sources were regularly passed on to politicians. More specifically, they said that the minister's instructions issued in 1986 described how CSIS's human sources should be treated and that the names of these informers should be disclosed to the Solicitor General of Canada.

Naturally, the director of the service keeps the minister informed on all important operational activities. The identity of human sources is a very sensitive issue and the promise of anonymity is a significant factor in obtaining their co-operation and trust. Their identity is always protected.

In this regard, Parliament gave the service an important responsibility which is found in section 18 of the Canadian Security Intelligence Service Act that reads as follows:

> —no person shall disclose any information that the person obtained or to which the person had access in the course of the performance by that person of duties and functions under this Act or the participation by that person in the administration or enforcement of this Act and from which the identity of (a) any other person who is or was a confidential source of information or assistance to the Service—can be inferred.

There are departmental instructions dealing with human sources. Here, I would like to refer to On Course published by the government in February 1991.

Page 14 of this document contains the following statement: "Sources are to be managed so as to protect both the security of the service's operations and the personal safety of sources". Nevertheless, there is no requirement in these instructions to disclose the identity of a human source to the minister or another politician.

The identity of a human source will be revealed to the minister only if it is directly related to his responsibilities which is a very rare and exceptional occurrence.

In conclusion, the media's statements that the identity of human sources is regularly revealed to the Solicitor General are unfounded.

CANADA POST CORPORATION

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, on December 9, 1992, I rose in this House to put a question to the minister responsible for Canada Post. I wanted to know why he was pursuing this policy of shutting down rural post offices. I asked in particular for his intervention in the case of the post office in Saint-Clément de Rivière-du-Loup. Post offices are closing in my riding of Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, in Martintown, just as they are closing in my colleague's riding here.

[English]

The worst thing about these decisions is that they are arbitrary. Canada Post shuts down rural post offices whether or not the post office is still needed and whether or not the post office is making money. It does not make any difference to them. The only criteria Canada Post uses is whether or not the postmaster has left. We call this the natural opportunity criteria.

• (1810)

This so-called natural opportunity is what Canada Post is taking.

I submit to you today that several post offices were not shut down. There are discrepancies in the administration of this policy. In some cases post offices are allowed to remain open in the ridings of certain members opposite even after the postmaster retired. But, in the ridings of members of the opposition it was quite another matter. I do hope that the government will answer these questions.

What I want the government to tell me today, is why pursue this policy of so-called natural opportunity to shut down rural post offices. The parliamentary secretary may argue: "We are not shutting them down. They are being converted". Go and tell that to my constituents in Summerstown for instance. When the post office was closed down one of these converted outlets was opened but it has moved three times in the past ten months. Canadians from rural areas are not provided with service at least not the level of service they are entitled to.

Today, I urge this government to reconsider its decision and eliminate immediately this criterion for shutting down rural post offices.

[English]

There is still time for this government to change its ways in regard to closing rural post offices. If the Tories will not do it, we will do it very soon.

Mrs. Suzanne Duplessis (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister for External Relations and Minister of State (Indian Affairs and Northern Development)): Mr. Speaker, the Canada Post Corporation has worked very hard to improve the efficiency and accessibility of postal services in Canada and thus meet the expectations and changing needs of all Canadians. Like other organizations offering services to the public Canada Post has had to find new ways to provide its services and meet the pressing needs of all Canadians. Canada Post continues to improve access to its postal services and products for Canadians.

For example, the corporation reaches its goal in rural Canada by using the resources and knowledge of local businesses in order to significantly increase the number of outlets which provide postal services and products. It should be noted that other businesses providing services in rural areas have reacted to changes by interrupting their services. The corporation, however, has made every possible effort to maintain its business ties in the community by consolidating its partnerships with local businesses, and it has been doing so for more than 100 years.

Canada Post implemented a program which has been misunderstood in more ways than one, namely the program to reorganize rural service by converting from an institutional outlet to one that is being taken over by a local business in a rural area. Therefore, all retail services such as postal money orders, mail collection and parcel postage, as well as items which require a signature are available at the postal outlets in rural areas.

The corporation has also developed a number of methods to continue mail delivery in a given community. For example, we can mention mailboxes in a retail postal outlet, community mail boxes or rural route delivery. In this way Canada Post makes sure that the community maintains its specific postal identity and that all customers can send and receive their mail locally.

The corporation proceeds case by case and bases its decision on criteria such as the size of the community, its commercial base, revenue, the distance to the next community, population trends and the present service. Although it is a rather rare occurrence, Canada Post will sometimes decide that it should continue on its own to provide the postal service. This is mostly the case in remote areas such as the Far North.

A survey was done—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but I cannot go much beyond the two minutes allotted to her.

[English]

EMERGENCY PREPAREDNESS CANADA

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, late in 1987 the then Minister of National Defence, the hon. member for Welland—Grey—Dufferin—Simcoe, introduced legislation in this House to set up Emergency Preparedness Canada which was to replace the War Measures Act in this country. The reason it was done was that the War Measures Act applied to the whole nation. Whatever we did under the War Measures Act, it applied all over the country, whereas under the Emergency Preparedness Canada Act we could zero in on one area of the country, one community, one province or wherever the main problem was.

I piloted that bill for the Official Opposition at the time. We totally agreed with the legislation with some minor comments on it but by and large looked upon it as an excellent idea. The Emergency Preparedness Canada organization was a government agency to stand on its own but it was to report to Parliament through the Minister of National Defence.

Shortly thereafter during the election campaign of 1988, the minister, who was then the Associate Minister of National Defence, the hon. member for Lanark—Carleton, announced that a new 120 room residence would be built at the Canadian Emergency Preparedness College in Arnprior. That location was picked as the centre for emergency preparedness because there had been emergency preparedness work going on in that centre for many years. The building was supposed to be up and in operation by December 1990 but the project has not even started. There has not even been a spade in the ground.

Along the way the previous Minister of National Defence was involved in trying to move the centre out of Arnprior. Rumours were all over the place among the civil servants and the organizations and the community. I asked the Minister of National Defence a question on June 16: "Will the Minister of National Defence tell us today when we can expect the construction of the long-promised new residential building to be built in Arnprior?" This was after the Minister of Supply and Services, who was then the member for Lanark—Carleton, had again reassured the community that it would be done in Arnprior and he sent a letter to the mayor of the town to that effect.

The answer I got from the then Minister of National Defence, the hon. member for Frontenac, on that day was this: "In the latest budget all responsibilities for civil defence were transferred to the Department of National Defence. All procedures, including infrastructure, are under review".

I was not satisfied with that because that just confirmed my suspicions that the government was indeed looking for a centre in other places in Canada. We are very proud to have this facility in the Ottawa Valley. Therefore, I asked the minister a second question: "The property and facilities on which this nationally used Emergency Preparedness Canada training centre is located is owned by Public Works Canada. Can the minister inform this House whether or not the total plans for the new residential building which was supposed to be up and operating by December 1990 are now ready for presentation to Treasury Board and are they planned for Arnprior?"

The then Minister of National Defence got up and said: "Mr. Speaker, the whole question is covered in the first answer".

I was not satisfied with that, so I am raising the question again today. I am glad to see that the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Defence is present. He was very civil in his answer the last time and I am certainly looking forward to what he has to say today.

Mr. Patrick Boyer (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, what the hon. member for Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke has said is an accurate resumé of the history which brings us again to this issue being discussed in the House of Commons. For almost four decades now, since 1954 when this centre was established in Arnprior, it has been fundamentally important to the government and the country to have the emergency preparedness programs and training carried out there.

Certainly a great many people in his constituency who are directly involved and interested in that training centre are understandably interested in its future. As he is a conscientious member, he has kept at the government to be clear as to what the future would be.

When I last spoke in the House on this it was June of last year. I indicated at that time that the plans the government had announced with respect to the facility effectively had been held up because of the financial problems that the government faces, which is the deficit problem. The facilities that do exist there now are not adequate in anyone's estimate or suitable because everyone knows that new and better and improved facilities are required. Plans have been developed for that and so on, but the money to pay for it—quite a few million dollars is being discussed— had to be reassessed.

I wish I could, on behalf of the minister, tell the member tonight that the plans are going to be announced now or tomorrow, but it is still under review. This is in conjunction with the over-all review of the infrastructure of the Department of National Defence. He is informed about this and he knows that across the country we are making a lot of changes and it is all being done in that context. I would certainly like to go with him—perhaps we could both interest other members of the defence committee for example—to visit the facilities and to keep the pressure on to get this clarified.

JUSTICE

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, my question was prompted by the death of a little six-year old girl in my riding, Dawn Shaw, who was raped and murdered by a person in the community.

The RCMP at that time were having some difficulty locating the perpetrator but a suspect has now been arrested. It was felt that the broad availability of DNA testing could have assisted in this matter. There is more precision in terms of identifying the perpetrator of the crime.

In fact rapists do not leave fingerprints but they do leave samples of tissues such as hair, semen and blood that can be analysed by forensic laboratories. Within a very narrow range those analyses can identify the perpetrator of the crime.

The people in the community were asking for the RCMP to have the right to administer DNA tests or take samples on the same basis as they would be able to obtain breath samples for driving under the influence of alcohol. This would result in a much more assured prosecution of the victims and it was therefore felt that there would be much more protection for women and children who are the prime victims of sexual assault by these people in the community.

I do not want to create the impression that all Canadians are targets of sexual assault. Ninety-two per cent of these assaults happen within the family and the perpetrator is a person known to the victim. The Ottawa Citizen at one time said you are mostly likely to be sexually assaulted by the person looking across from you at the breakfast table in the morning. Only 8 per cent of perpetrators are unknown to the victim.

I think the best way to deal with sexual assault within the family is to provide some kind of assistance to the family so that people who have a tendency to commit these crimes find out how they can stop. Many of them were victims of the previous generation.

The other way to do it is to increase the certainty of detection and conviction and that is through using such screening processes as DNA typing. I was quite satisfied with the minister's response but I would certainly hope that she would carry it through much farther to make sure that DNA sampling is available and can be used on suspects and also that it would be available in virtually every part of the country to assure the prosecution and conviction of perpetrators of sexual assault, especially those who assault children.

Mrs. Suzanne Duplessis (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister for External Relations and Minister of State (Indian Affairs and Northern Development)): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Comox—Alberni has raised an important issue. As his question indicates at the moment there is no provision in the Criminal Code which permits a judge to authorize obtaining bodily substances, including samples suitable for DNA analysis, except in limited circumstances in relation to drunk driving charges.

In response to his specific concern, DNA testing could assist in positively identifying perpetrators of crimes, particularly in cases of sexual assault or homicide where identification is often the central issue.

I can inform hon. members that the Department of Justice is now conducting an in-depth study of the legal issues related to the collection and use of bodily substances for evidentiary purposes with a view to the development of proposals for amendments to the Criminal Code.

DNA profiling undoubtedly has the potential to facilitate the investigation and prosecution of criminal offences. However, the future of the role that DNA typing will play in our criminal justice system is dependent on a number of factors and there are various issues which must be examined within this context. The issues being explored include search and seizure, admissibility, evidence of population frequencies, data banks and the accreditation of laboratories.

Ultimately legislation would be needed to set out the manner and circumstances in which samples can be obtained from suspects so that the investigation of crimes is not frustrated and the suspects' rights to a reasonable expectation of privacy and personal dignity as guaranteed by the charter are minimally interfered with.

The protection of society could well be enhanced by the enactment of legislative amendments to permit the seizure of samples of bodily substances for the purposes of DNA testing and the use of such forensic evidence in criminal prosecutions.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

Mr. Raymond Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, tonight I would like to speak about the Gwa'Sala 'Nakwaxda'wx Indian people who live at Port Hardy at the Indian reserve at Tsulquate.

One particular group used to live at Blunden Harbour, the others at Smith Inlet. The Department of Indian Affairs for its sole convenience of cost of servicing asked them to move from their communities. They promised them housing, community infrastructure, education, economic development and health services. They were virtually forced out of the community by continued harassment and the promises that things would be better at the new location in Port Hardy.

They moved. Their houses were burned behind them when they asked to go back after none of the promises were kept.

When they hit Port Hardy they were amalgamated, two different groups. They did not know each other. They had no homes. They had no community. They had no infrastructure. They were not provided with education and school services and no health services. They were at the same time put into a community that had just received several thousand single men who were building a mine at the location. Those people wreaked absolute havoc on a completely disorganized community.

What were the results? Thirty years of indescribable hell brought on by almost complete alcoholism, complete total social destruction, despicable housing and desperate poverty and unemployment.

Is there anything that can happen? Thirty years later as this community is gradually rebuilding itself, two generations later, with the people who are just youngsters in the community, the government could visit the community at the highest level. The minister of Indian affairs should visit there.

Also, the senior leaders of government departments of employment, health, and Indian affairs should go and meet with the elders and the leaders of that community to discuss the health programs they developed for social rebuilding, employment programs and the responsibilities of Indian affairs.

• (1830)

Direct financial assistance is needed, compensation for the catastrophic impact that was forced on this community in the forced move, the forced amalgamation and the broken promises.

Mrs. Suzanne Duplessis (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister for External Relations and Minister of State (Indian Affairs and Northern Development)): Mr. Speaker, as stated by the minister in the House on June 12, 1992, he is certainly prepared to meet with the representatives of the Gwa'sala-Nakwaxda'xw on one of his future visits to British Columbia.

The Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development is familiar with the situation in this community on northern Vancouver Island. For some time now, departmental representatives at the district, regional and headquarters level have been making a joint effort to resolve as many problems in this community as they can, bearing in mind budgetary restrictions and general policy.

The specific claims of the Gwa'sala-Nakwaxda'xw were first submitted in 1988, re-submitted to the department in 1991, and then put on a priority list for research and analysis. On May 15, 1992, preliminary discussions took place between band representatives and the department's special claims office. It was agreed the Band should prepare a more thorough analysis of its claims before submitting them to the Department of Justice, to ensure the presentation would be as fair and detailed as possible.

Meanwhile, the department is busy helping the community achieve its economic, cultural and educational objectives. The Band has just finished developing a comprehensive plan stating various options for promoting the community's expansion. With the 45.8 hectares added to Tsulquate Indian Reserve, No. 4, it will be possible to proceed with a new development that will include construction of 80 new homes, a school and a community hall.

Furthermore, the department plans to spend $1.6 million, spread over a certain period of time, in connection with the community's expansion. Funding totalling $200,000 will be released during 1992-93 and 1993-94, to help the Band build a community centre. Furthermore, $215,000 was spent in 1992-93 on improving sanitation in the community. Similarly, $15,000 will be spent on a preliminary feasibility study for the construction of a school; the plans should be finished by 1994-95, at a cost of $150,000, while construction is slated for 1995-96, at a cost of $1,250,000.

To help the Gwa'sala-Nakwaxda'xw find ways to resolve their financial problems, departmental representatives had a number of meetings with them. The band and the department have set up a joint committee that is now examining innovative proposals to meet the land requirements of the band.

Furthermore—and I speak on behalf of the minister—he says he is very interested in seeing the situation improve and is prepared to have discussions with the Gwa'sala-Nakwaxda'xw communities.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to Standing Order 38(5), the motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted.

INDIGENOUS PEOPLE

Mr. Willie Littlechild (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, on December 10 Canada moved a motion at the United Nations proclaiming 1993 the International Year of the World's Indigenous People. The main objective was to strengthen international co-operation for the solution of problems faced by indigenous communities, such as human rights, environment, development, education and health.

I ask this House to acknowledge and thank the many individuals and NGOs that worked so hard to make this a reality, in particular the International Organization for Indigenous Resource Development and its members, the Four Nations of Hobbema, the Council of Energy Resource Tribes, the Grand Council of Crees, the Four Directions Council and the four chiefs: Victor Buffalo, Herman Roasting, Leo Cattleman and John Ermineskin, along with the Secretary of State for External Affairs and Dennis Marantz.

The theme for this year is "Indigenous People—A New Partnership". I request all our colleagues in both chambers to support the many activities and programs that will occur throughout 1993 to ensure and secure a new and positive partnership in Canada.

STUDENT LOANS

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, the annual report of the Canada Student Loans Program was tabled yesterday indicating—this is an horrific statistic—that the number of students who graduate with a total debt load of over $15,000 has increased by 500 per cent over four years.

I ask the new Secretary of State to address the Canada Student Loans Program so that the students of Canada can in fact continue to go to college and university.

The debt load is horrific but there are also other problems. There is a 3 per cent tax on student loans which should not exist. There is the extra six months of interest which ought to be removed, and the criteria for the allocation of moneys have not changed since 1984.

HIBERNIA

Mr. Nic Leblanc (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, in 1990 the federal government presented the Hibernia project to us as the project of the century. We were told that the government had excellent reasons for investing $3 billion in it. The main reason was that it was supposed to make money. However, most experts tell us today that the Hibernia project will never be profitable, because for that, oil would have to sell at $30 a barrel, but it is less than $20 a barrel now.

They also talked about technology transfers. A $100-million contract was just awarded to Korea to make the platform, and the reason given was that Canadians do not have the necessary expertise. Exactly. They must be given time to acquire this expertise.

Once again the government lied. That is proof that the government continues to spend money that Quebecers and Canadians do not have.

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT WEEK

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, it is my privilege to draw the attention of the House to the celebration of Canada's third annual International Development Week which is being held now from February 1 to February 7.

All across the country a wide variety of events are designed to raise awareness of international development and to encourage us to take a moment to think about the world we share with more than five billion people.

The theme this year is partnership and the slogan chosen for the development week is "Together we can change our world".

1993 marks the 25th anniversary of the Canadian International Development Agency. For a quarter of a century this organization has been at the forefront of Canadian efforts to improve living conditions for less fortunate people around the world.

Thanks in part to the hard work and commitment of countless Canadians, we now live in a world where more infants see their first birthdays, more children are going to school and learning to read and write, and people are living longer and healthier lives.

I am sure the members of this House will join me in encouraging Canadians to take part in International Development Week and to see how we can help make the world a better place for everyone.

SOFTWOOD LUMBER

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, on Friday the Prime Minister will meet with President Clinton to discuss various trade issues between Canada and the United States.

The current round of U.S. countervail action against Canadian softwood exports was initiated by George Bush and it should be stopped by Bill Clinton.

When the Prime Minister meets with President Clinton we urge him to raise the softwood tariff issue and to call upon him for a show of good will to Canada by dropping the current softwood countervail action against our country.

We expect that when the Prime Minister returns to Canada he can tell the people who live in the over 300 communities dependent on the forest industry that the softwood action has been dropped and, if not, that this government will get the courage to scrap the free trade agreement and not proceed with NAFTA.

VIOLENT CRIME

Mr. Lee Richardson (Calgary Southeast): Mr. Speaker, the people of Calgary Southeast are shocked and appalled at the outrageously light sentence handed out to cult leader and mass murderer, Roch Theriault. The message that this sentence sends is not acceptable to the vast majority of Canadians.

Violent crime, especially crime of the particularly brutal and sexual nature of this case, must not go unpunished. In a mere seven years this man will be eligible for parole and if released he will again be a threat to the communities and people of Canada.

The criminal justice system must be toughened to deal with dangerous offenders such as Mr. Theriault. I join with thousands of Calgarians in urging the government to take the necessary steps to ensure that this individual and those like him remain behind bars.

METROPOLITAN TORONTO

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, for the last three years the Conservative government has been promising Torontonians that economic prosperity was just around the corner. However we see that this Conservative government's political rhetoric has not matched up to economic reality.

Although the government continues to declare that the recession is dead and that its policies are working, regrettably the facts indicate that in metro Toronto the recession continues alive and well.

More than half of all jobs in Canada lost during the recession have been in the metropolitan Toronto area. There were 74,000 lost jobs last year and 150,000 lost jobs in 1991. Furthermore, recent figures reveal that last year there was a record number 13,000 business and consumer bankruptcies in metro Toronto alone with liabilities adding over $3 billion.

In these times both the Mulroney and Rae governments continue to ignore the problems and needs of metro Toronto and are stalling on projects worth more than $9 billion.

The country deserves a national government which recognizes that a strong metropolitan Toronto economy is a plus for the nation.

VIOLENCE

Mrs. Edna Anderson (Simcoe Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wish to raise an issue that was brought to my attention by the PC caucus committee on family issues. It is killer cards and killer board games.

Glorifying notorious assassins and allowing into Canada a game with an objective to collect as many dead babies as possible is not only obscene but immoral.

We as members of Parliament are derelict in our duties if we do not act in concert to stop the spread of such violence. Surely there must be a way to ensure this kind violence is stopped.

The options put forward by the caucus committee on family issues are worthy of serious consideration. I urge the Minister of Justice to review this matter and take the necessary steps to correct it.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Mr. Bob Wood (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, on December 2 the government announced major changes to the Unemployment Insurance Act to take effect on April 1. Among the changes are the reduction of benefits from 60 per cent to 57 per cent and the disqualification of individuals who voluntarily leave their present employment or are fired with just cause.

What is just cause? It is an incredibly ambiguous term. This particular measure will place an unnecessary burden on insurance agents who will have to determine if a person is eligible to receive benefits. Furthermore appeals will increase and the processing of claims will take longer, which can only mean more hardship for the claimants.

Finally, what disturbs me the most is the unfortunate situation of individuals who will be denied unemployment insurance benefits. Where will they go? The answer is simple: welfare and food banks.

I wish the government could tell Canadians and the people of Nipissing how they intend to save money with this scheme. Maybe, with all the speculation of the Prime Minister leaving, he should do so before April 1 if he wants to apply for UIC because after that date he will not be eligible even if he has paid into it.

VIOLENT CRIME

Mrs. Louise Feltham (Wild Rose): Mr. Speaker, many people across our country are angry about the number of violent crimes committed by people on parole. They feel that law abiding members of society are being placed at risk by the parole system.

Canadians feel that protection of the public should be the most important factor in all decisions relating to the treatment and release of inmates.

• (1410)

Acts must be changed, parole boards must be directed and ways must be implemented to be certain that violent offenders who continue to pose a danger to society are kept behind bars for the full length of their sentences.

TRADE

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, Canadians deserve a straight answer from the Liberal Party. Do the Liberals, like the Conservatives, support the proposed North American free trade agreement or do they oppose it?

Since they elected their leader the Liberals have played an annoying game of flip flop on this issue.

A recent example arose when the Liberal women's critic, the hon. member from Halifax, spoke in Kingston. The Queen's Journal of January 22, 1993 read:

> Clancy says she supports the North American free trade agreement.

She is quoted as saying:

> It is much better than the bad deal negotiated by the Tories with the U.S. in 1988.

She goes on to say:

> It puts Canada in a good position.

Clearly the women of Canada do not agree with the Liberal women's critic. The Liberals must stop having it both ways. It is time for the Liberals to stop insulting the Canadian public by offering two separate positions on FTA and NAFTA.

S. O. 31

TAXATION

Mr. David Bjornson (Selkirk—Red River): Mr. Speaker, we are all looking for ways to spend tax dollars wisely. I call upon all members of the House to rationalize the use of taxpayers' dollars.

I applaud the steps this government has taken in cutting grants to special interest groups because these groups must become self-sufficient in order to carry out their activities. The Canadian taxpayer should not bear the burden of their agendas.

I commend the government for steps taken in fiscal responsibility. For example, post-secondary students are being asked to repay their overdue loans. This money was given to them in good faith. For these people and others it is now time to take responsibility for their previous commitments.

VIOLENT CRIME

Ms. Beth Phinney (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, for well over a year, in the aftermath of the murder of Nina de Villiers, I have presented the signatures of hundreds of thousands of petitioners asking that Parliament recognize crimes of violence are abhorrent to society and asking that the government amend the Criminal Code of Canada, the Bail Reform Act and the Parole Act accordingly. After all this time and after the many interventions that have been made in this House, Canadians are still afraid to walk the streets.

The Minister of Justice has stated that he intends to act some time in the future to amend the Criminal Code to protect women from harassment. In the cases of crimes committed by violent sex offenders, the Solicitor General said he would look into toughening up the parole laws to deal with violent offenders.

We all know there is a problem. We do not need studies. Why does the government not act now? Words are not protection; actions are. Canadians need to feel safe again. The government must act now to bring in legislation that will ensure a safer Canada for all of us.

SMALL TOWN CANADA

Mr. Arnold Malone (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, on February 1, this House unanimously recognized k.d. lang for winning the Favourite New Adult Contemporary Artist category at the American Music Awards. k.d. lang comes from Consort, Alberta, a town of 609 persons located in my constituency.

This may also be an occasion to celebrate small town Canada. I have served two constituencies in Alberta. The present constituency of Crowfoot has about the same number of square miles as New Brunswick. It is comprised of 113 towns, villages and hamlets.

Many Canadians have not heard of Craigmyle, Alberta, with a population of 52 persons. Most Canadians have heard of Lanny McDonald from Craigmyle. Very few Canadians will know of Donalda, the home town of 226 people. Yet Tricia Helfer, the 1992 Ford Agencies World Supermodel, hails from there. Pauline Gedge from Ribstone, population unlisted, is an internationally respected poet. Katherine Greenly from Three Hills is building a North American reputation in country and western music. The town of Viking is home for the Sutter brothers who are highly respected National Hockey League players.

Those six communities added together have a population of less than 4,000 persons. Yet they are root communities for persons who have reached national and international stature.

Mr. Speaker: I must interrupt the hon. member. His time has expired.

FOREIGN AID

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, rumour has it that this government intends yet again to cut aid to developing Third World countries in favour of providing concessional assistance to east European countries. Nothing could be more short-sighted and nothing could highlight more the hypocrisy of this government. A leaked government document suggests forsaking the world's poorest and development commitments to the environment, human rights, human resource development in favour of a me first support of middle-income countries which have a strategic, read lucrative, export trade value to Canada.

Mahbub ul Haq, the author of the UNDP development report much quoted by our Prime Minister says that "such a choice in policy would be an unmitigated disaster for Canada".

The Children's Summit, Rio summit and human rights declarations are meaningless if this government further decreases current aid levels. This government must put people first with a priority on the poorest, both here and abroad. Not to do so guarantees this government's electoral defeat.

FOREIGN AID

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, yesterday before a special meeting of the House of Commons committees, Mr. Mahbub ul Haq from the United Nations explained the vital link between developing and developed countries.

Mr. ul Haq who was instrumental in preparing the UNDP's human development report told us that reducing Canadian assistance to the Third World would be disastrous.

Mr. ul Haq pointed out that unless we in the industrial world take steps to divert it the Third World poverty will visit us in forms like increased drug trade, terrorism, pollution, increased human migration, AIDS and other diseases.

Only long-term sustainable development aimed at basic health care, education and nutrition can help us to avoid these problems.

These problems will be exacerbated by reducing our assistance to Third World countries. Canada has been a leader and the government will ignore ul Haq's wisdom at Canada's great peril.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the Minister of National Defence.

Will the Minister of National Defence table in the House of Commons all contracts signed by the government with respect to the $4.4 billion helicopter contract purchase?

Hon. Paul Dick (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, it would be very difficult.

Maybe the Leader of the Opposition would know the structure of government and that contracts are signed by the Department of Supply and Services.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the question we have asked the government is very simple: Does the government intend to table in the House of Commons the contracts signed to date?

[English]

Hon. Paul Dick (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. gentleman already knows there was a signing of contracts on October 8, 1992. One contract was for $1.4 billion with Paramax and one contract was for $1.4 billion with European Helicopter 101 Limited. Those are the two contracts that we have.

To my knowledge no contracts have ever been tabled in the House throughout its history, not when the hon. Leader of the Opposition was in government in the cabinet of Mr. Trudeau or in this government because there is some commercial confidentiality in those contracts.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, is it true that some contracts have not been signed yet and there is a big rush going on with the subcontractors to make sure that the contracts are signed before there is a change of government?

Hon. Paul Dick (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, most of us will be very surprised if there is any change in government but the fact is that because he reads what Tim Naumetz has to say in The Toronto Sun and The Ottawa Sun he should know that Tim Naumetz was wrong on that and there were three other points in that short article on which he was wrong.

He ought to get some better research.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Supply and Services.

The new chief of the defence staff has indeed confirmed that contracts have been signed with Paramax and with EH-101, but with respect to a specific question about contracts being signed with the main consortium, Westland Augusta has said that it cannot comment.

I want to ask the minister very specifically whether all contracts have been completed with the main contract supplier, Westland Augusta.

Hon. Paul Dick (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, Westland is a British corporation which is a part owner of EH-101. Augusta happens to be an Italian corporation which is also part owner. Those two joined and made up EH-101, the contractor, the person who has designed the company which manufactures this aircraft.

We have signed a contract for $1.4 billion with the contractor which manufactures the goods, that is EH-101, for 50 air frames. We signed that on October 8, 1992.

• (1420)

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, it seems reasonable to us that if the former senior policy adviser to the Prime Minister and the government can have intimate knowledge of the details of this contract and whatever provisions were inserted to ensure that the contract goes ahead no matter what happens after an election that the people of Canada have a right to know what penalties, if any, this government built into a contract to ensure that the contract supposedly goes ahead notwithstanding what happens in the election.

I ask again, will the minister table those contracts and all the provisions that have been inserted in them to try to force that deal to go ahead notwithstanding the democratic will of the people of Canada after the next election?

Hon. Paul Dick (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, it is unfortunate that the opposition reads an article by a reporter who is usually wrong. I read his articles every now and again because I have to correct the mistakes in it. He has four errors in this article and he keeps on perpetrating those mistakes.

He has already said that the senior adviser to the Prime Minister was a lobbyist. They are not the lobbyists and are not registered as the lobbyists for EH-101. Therefore, that picture in the article was absolutely false as well.

If those members would get their facts correct and do the research properly then maybe we could answer the questions intelligently.

TRADE

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

What has happened to the workers at Port Hawkesbury, Nova Scotia, who worked for Premium Automotive Tanks is surely just another in a series of Canadian tragedies and tragedies for working people. It is also stark evidence that the Canada-U.S. trade deal has been a disaster and those who say that you can renegotiate this deal are either naive or misleading Canadians. I want to say that you cannot renegotiate a disaster.

My question for the Prime Minister is this. This plant slammed its doors in the face of its workers one month after the tariffs were removed from the products that it makes, a direct result of the Canada-U.S. trade deal. Why does the Prime Minister persist in pursuing a NAFTA arrangement, taking a bad deal and making it worse? Will he do something for Canadian workers and stop NAFTA now?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, let me comment briefly on the actions taken by the company. We deplore the way it has done this. We do not think there is any basis whatsoever for it to follow the steps that it has taken.

With specific regard to the question that my hon. member has asked, the change in the tariff from 1992 to 1993 was .26 of 1 per cent. Surely even my hon. friend would understand that that is not sufficient reason to throw out the free trade agreement.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary for the Prime Minister.

The government is responsible directly for what is happening to workers in this country as a result of the bad trade deal that was negotiated for Canada. The government has a responsibility to do something about it. The government knows that U.S. states like New Hampshire where this factory is moving has no income taxes. They have lax regulations and no universal health care and yet this government negotiated a trade deal that did not have any provisions for workers. This government intends to repeat this through NAFTA.

I ask again, why will the Prime Minister not stand up for the workers of Canada, for the people of Canada and stop NAFTA now?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, of course I agree, as I am sure all members of the House would, with the comment made by my hon. friend that no one could in any way approve of the apparent method of conduct of that particular employer in Cape Breton.

That is exactly the kind of action which from time to time lends such opprobrium to business conduct that brings about strong measures from various governments because they are richly deserved. This kind of conduct, taking off in the middle of the night, is a fly-by-night attitude unworthy of any self-respecting employer small, medium sized or large.

My hon. friend would I think agree that this is not only unacceptable conduct by an employer, but fortunately in Canada is most exceptional. Canadian employers do not do this.

With regard to the trading arrangements themselves, the Minister for International Trade has just indicated the dimensions of the change in tariffs from 1992 to 1993, which certainly did not provoke in any way this kind of action.

In point of fact, trade with the United States is up $17 billion since the free trade agreement was signed and trade with Canada increased 11.2 per cent last year. That is good news. This is the kind of result on which we propose to build to ensure durable economic security for Canadian employees.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): A supplementary, Mr. Speaker. It is unfortunate that another major export of Canada has been jobs.

A study done in the United States by the International Trade Commission on the impact of three-way free trade says that the number of jobs in textiles, electronics, industrial machinery and auto parts will increase in that country. Those are just the industries most affected in Canada. I would like to ask the Minister for International Trade a question. Are there studies here proving that the result will be good or bad for Canada? Where are the studies on the impact of three-way free trade for Canada?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, studies by the C.D. Howe Institute confirm the importance of this initiative and the benefits for Canada. There are other research organizations, including the International Trade Commission in Washington, which this very day, I think, indicated the growth in trade between our two countries as a result of this treaty. I will point out to my friend, for example, another study done in Alberta and released as recently as yesterday—

[English]

The headline in the Edmonton Journal indicates: "West's trade with the United States on the rise". It indicates that the value of total exports from western Canada rose five-tenths of a per cent per year over the period and in Alberta value of exports increased to both the United States, up 8.47 per cent, and to other markets, up 3.15 per cent.

It is free traders in Alberta, for example, in western Canada, like the premier of Alberta who is with us today, the Hon. Ralph Klein, whose presence I underline and congratulate, as opposed—

PREMIUM AUTOMOTIVE TANKS INC.

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister responsible for ACOA and it concerns the closure of the Premium Automotive plant in Port Hawkesbury, Nova Scotia.

After accepting nearly $3 million in federal grant money and tax credits, this company in a cowardly move has carted off its assets to the United States, leaving 79 workers jobless and without so much as an explanation.

How could the minister's department have let this happen and what is the minister going to do to prevent these jobs from being hijacked to the United States?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, my department does not have a guard on every enterprise that we have made loans to or given assistance to, so let us just be reasonable.

The first that we knew of this event was in a phone call the morning after the company at 4.15 in the afternoon gave their employees notice that they were terminated and gave them minimum severance pay and rushed in a group of trucks to remove the equipment. They called the ACOA office in Cape Breton to say that they had done this and they were sending a messenger over with a cheque to pay off the balance of the ACOA loan. The messenger has not yet arrived. I do not know what happened to the messenger.

An hon. member: He got laid off.

Mr. Crosbie (St. John's West): The position is that in 1986 and 1988 the company was given assistance, in 1988 from Enterprise Cape Breton. At that time the policy was a policy of unconditional grants that they did not have to pay back. They also received a loan. There is $500,000 still owing on the loan transaction, but the control period ended on December 31, 1991. That is the period during which the company is obliged to continue operating at the site for which the loan was given and in connection with it.

The control period is over. We have our lawyers looking to see what other means we may have with respect to that company as to the transaction they are now engaged in, which I agree is completely reprehensible.

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, not only does this incident leave my constituents feeling betrayed and angry, it also illustrates the serious flaws in his department's policies and procedures.

What will the minister do to preserve the taxpayers' investment in Atlantic Canada and the interests of my constituents?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman's constituents were not betrayed by ACOA or by anybody in the Government of Canada. The jobs were in Cape Breton, some 70 jobs for five years are at this location because of the assistance given by the Government of Canada and by Enterprise Cape Breton and ACOA.

If there is blame, and there is certainly blame to be ascribed, it is to the people, who by the way are Canadians and, in fact, the principal shareholder is from Nova Scotia. The principal blame has to be ascribed to them that they would try this kind of a tactic and not recognize the obligation they have.

Mr. Dingwall: Name them.

Mr. Crosbie (St. John's West) The name of the person has been in the papers, a Mr. Alton Toole who I am told is from Truro. We cannot blame anyone else. It is a Canadian who is attempting this manoeuvre to get out of that obligation.

I have instructed ACOA today that I want to see far more effective terms and conditions with respect to loans in Atlantic Canada if this is the pattern of behaviour we are going to have to deal with.

FISHERIES

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the minister of fisheries. His decision to tamper with the Atlantic groundfish licensing system, I think he will want to admit in retrospect, it is a foul move. It kicks fishermen when they are down. The reason they caught no fish for the last two years is there are none out there to catch, thanks to his bungling of the fisheries issue.

Why should these people be punished for a crime they have not committed? Why will the minister not stop putting the screws to fishermen in Newfoundland and the maritimes and call off this mad scheme while there is still time to do so.

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, one of the main reasons that the fishery in Atlantic Canada is having severe difficulties is the kind of approach taken by the hon. gentleman who does not want to see the situation improve.

On December 18, in response to the state of the fish stocks in Atlantic Canada, we had to institute reductions of 60 to 70 per cent of the total allowable catches. The fishing industry and the provincial ministers of fisheries have agreed with me and have agreed with the Atlantic groundfish management plan.

We have to reform completely the fishing industry as it exists in Atlantic Canada. As part of that, I announced a non-renewal of inactive groundfish licences. We cannot have thousands of licences outstanding, not being used, not reporting any fish caught so that when the stocks do come back suddenly these licences become active again out of the blue. The system has to be changed.

I stated today in the release I put out that we are reviewing the situation carefully. We know it is a sensitive and complicated area. I will be making another statement in about a week's time as to exactly how we intend to proceed with inactive licences. We will proceed in a way that is fair and just. The Atlantic fishing industry system has to be changed and it will be changed. We have no choice.

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, I say to the minister, if people have opted out of the fishery that is one thing. However, if fishermen through no fault of their own have not had landings that is quite another thing. He is making those people the target. He is making those people the victim and that is the basis of our appeal to him.

Will the minister come to his senses and put in place a proper conservation plan and a proper assistance plan to address the 18,000 fishermen and plant workers in Atlantic Canada that he has left out? Will he stop victimizing the victims?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, there are a number of thousands of groundfish licences which did not report any catches in 1990, 1991 or 1992.

Mrs. Campbell (South West Nova): Why? No fish and bad management.

Mr. Crosbie (St. John's West): It was not because there were no fish there, tens of thousands of tonnes of fish were caught. It was because they chose to go into other fisheries or whatever their reasons were.

If such licences were not used by fishermen, through no fault of their own as the hon. member says, then that will be dealt with. We are not going to continue issuing licences that are not used in the fishery in Atlantic Canada. We are going to reform the licensing system.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

Recently the Canadian Immigration and Refugee Board granted refugee status to Mario Rojas Albas, a doctor and former Mexican congressman, holding that Rojas who was beaten and threatened with death last year had, "proven that his most fundamental rights had been violated by Mexican authorities and that his safety and that of his family would be in serious danger if he were made to return to Mexico".

Will the Prime Minister now explain to this House and to Canadians, given the Prime Minister's stated commitment to linking human rights and Canada's international economic relations, why Canada is entering into a trade deal with Mexico, a country that has been found by Canada's own refugee board to be persecuting its own citizens?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I cannot comment on the specifics of the case my hon. friend raises. If he would give me the details, I would be happy to look into it.

On the broader point, the Mexican government has made significant strides in dealing with a number of the problems with which my hon. friend is concerned. A human rights commissioner has been appointed who has taken action on a number of issues, in some cases against the police and in other cases against other authorities in Mexico.

The bottom line of all these issues is that as the standard of living in a country rises, the human rights abuses decline. That is precisely one of the reasons why the Mexican people want to get into a NAFTA, to improve their standard of living and in that way see a decline in this type of abuse which both the hon. member and myself would oppose.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, it is not the Mexican people, it is the multinational corporations that are pushing this deal.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Robinson: My supplementary question is also for the Prime Minister. In another decision of the same board last year, Mexico was described as "the best-disguised dictatorship on earth in 1992".

Since more than 50 Mexicans, including former congressman Mario Rojas Alba, have been granted refugee status in Canada since 1990, and given the lack of environmental standards and the poor working conditions in that country, will the Prime Minister finally respect the will of Canadians and inform Bill Clinton on Friday that Canada will not go ahead with this agreement that would be disastrous for Mexicans and Canadians and the citizens of both countries?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member just said—I do not know whether he was quoting someone, but he quoted it approvingly—that Mexico could be considered the "most efficient dictatorship on earth, the most pernicious dictatorship on earth".

Some hon. members: The best disguised.

Mr. Mulroney: The best disguised. What a stupid, senseless statement. How stupid to repeat such nonsense in the House of Commons, to say that Mexico is the most efficient or best-disguised dictatorship on earth. What ignorance. You do not know global political realities.

What a comment on the New Democrats' intelligence and judgment if they peddle such falsehoods in the House of Commons.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Mulroney: Mexico is a developing country—

• (1440)

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Mulroney: Apart from the unacceptably pejorative nature of that comment on the people and the Government of Mexico, one of Canada's friends and allies, quite frankly, what astonishes me most about the NDP and the socialists is this. They always ask that we give more and more aid to countries seeking to achieve social justice by way of development. They want us to write cheques to developing countries, and I understand that, and we have done so in record amounts.

The people of Mexico are saying they do not want any handouts. They want an opportunity to trade in a developed market so that they can raise the living standard of their people, so that they can become more prosperous and share in North American prosperity. We are saying to the people of Mexico, yes, we are going to help you toward greater prosperity and the NDP is saying no.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Last year the Prime Minister told Canadian farmers that he would be seeking world support for Canadian supply management.

Now Canadian farmers are being told that Canada had no support and they are going to just have to accept tariffication. Why did the Prime Minister cave in at the GATT? What concrete action is the Prime Minister going to take to help support our Canadian farmers?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the simple answer to my hon. friend's question is that we have not changed our position at the GATT.

Our position on article XI is to "tarify"—

Some hon. members: Tarify?

Mr. Crawford: You blew it, Mike.

Mr. Dingwall: I want my money back.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Our position on article XI is to clarify and strengthen article XI consistent with what the supply managed sectors have agreed with us on.

My colleague, the Minister of State for Agriculture and I met with the dairy farmers and the dairy council in Calgary a week and a half ago. We stated that position clearly to them. They fully support and fully agree with the position we have taken.

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, I think the minister's Freudian slip tells all. My supplementary question is for the Prime Minister.

Surely the Prime Minister is being told by his advisers that American multinationals can flood the Canadian market, even paying the tariffs, and in that way damage Canadian farmers and put them right out of business.

What commitment can the Prime Minister give this House today that in his meetings with President Clinton this week he will try to get American support for an exemption for supply management and a solution to the question of further processed goods from any GATT deal?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, possibly my hon. friend cannot hear. That is precisely the position of the Government of Canada and that is precisely the position we have stated to the Americans, to other negotiating partners at the Uruguay round and will continue to do so.

STEEL INDUSTRY

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister for International Trade who was quick this week to insult Canadian steel companies.

Does the minister think it is helpful to blame 10,000 jobless steel workers for his trade mistakes? Does he think it is helpful to play into American hands by blaming the Canadian steel industry? Does he think it is helpful for the Canadian cause to tell Canadians that our problems are strictly domestic when he knows that the real problem in the steel industry is the lack of access that was not negotiated in his trade agreement?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I said on Monday and I will say it again, that is a gross distortion of the facts.

What I said on Monday, what I said later, I will repeat today. For my hon. friend to blame the whole world on the free trade agreement with the United States is absolute nonsense. I pointed to the loss of competitive position that the Canadian industry has suffered in relation to the United States of about $100 per tonne or about 20 per cent of the cost of the product. That is at the heart of the problems of those thousands of unemployed steel workers today. It has nothing whatsoever to do with the United States–Canada Free Trade Agreement.

In fact, the steel companies have greater access to the United States market and the protection of the dispute settlement mechanism so that when there are disputes, such as we have right now, they can be handled under the rule of law without the pressure of politics. This is precisely the gains they have been able to obtain under the free trade agreement.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, if that is the case, can the minister explain to me why the president of Canada's largest steel company has indeed identified deficiencies in the current free trade agreement as part and parcel of the problems being faced by the Steel Company of Canada? Is Fred Telmer distorting the truth, or is the minister not coming clean with the Canadian people about how his trade deal was badly negotiated and does nothing to protect Canadian steel workers?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): My hon. friend is participating in another distortion. The free trade agreement with the United States has nothing to do with the problems suffered by the Steel Company of Canada today.

The trade of the steel companies into the United States increased from about 3.2 per cent of the market to 4.1 per cent last year. How can she say that they do not have access to that market?

I do not understand why the member for Hamilton East does not stand up and talk about Procter and Gamble. It invested $5 million and created 140 new jobs in Hamilton and said: "We see the impact of free trade being characterized by additional growth for Procter and Gamble in Canada". GE Canada said: "Free trade and globalization have been good for GE Canada. Our investment in Canada—"

Mr. Speaker: Time dictates that we move on. The hon. member for Selkirk—Red River.

COMMUNICATIONS

Mr. David Bjornson (Selkirk—Red River): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Communications.

As the House knows, there is a significant problem in the cable television industry in that licence holders only service the areas of high density and are refusing to allow the other areas they are not interested in to be serviced by their competitors.

Is the government considering reviewing these licences to make sure those that have the licences live up to their obligations?

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, the CRTC has the responsibility for licensing cable television companies and for ensuring that the terms of their licences are met.

I share my hon. friend's concerns and will be glad to convey his representation to the CRTC.

I would indicate to my friend as well that as of the beginning of March of this year the CRTC will be holding structural hearings including looking at the whole question of competition.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

This morning he said on Canada AM that the Innu have to be full participants in discussions about the situation at Davis Inlet and that he cannot impose a solution on them. However, if he rules out relocation he is imposing an unacceptable solution, one that is no solution at all.

The cost comparisons referred to in this morning's The Ottawa Citizen show that the relocation will cost 10 per cent less over 20 years, 22 per cent less over 50 years, and will create 88,000 person-weeks of employment for the Innu in the area.

Will the minister offer some hope to the people in Davis Inlet by announcing that he personally supports their relocation to Sango Bay and that he will fight for those funds in cabinet?

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I know we are all deeply concerned about the situation at Davis Inlet. As one of several ministers who have been working on this file, I certainly do intend to take recommendations to cabinet.

I think it would be inappropriate for the hon. member or anyone else to conclude that relocation has been ruled out. In fact, it is very much an option and was the focus of the study which I commissioned with a direction to the consultants that they specifically look at that possibility.

I think the hon. member would recognize it is not his place here today to make that decision. Through consultation between both governments and the Innu people we will arrive at an appropriate course of action to deal with the long-term challenges facing that community.

• (1450)

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, every year the government offers money to build houses at Davis Inlet and the Innu turn it down saying: We want to relocate. Two years ago, the Government of Newfoundland and Labrador offered $4 million toward the water and sewer system on the island. The Innu turned it down saying: We want to relocate.

When the minister refused to join with the Innu last year in a public inquiry, the Innu held their own. The report said that relocation is the number one priority.

If the minister refuses to believe the Innu, will he at least follow the recommendation of his own consultant, namely that the community of Davis Inlet be relocated to Sango Bay?

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I am afraid the hon. member is not listening. I said quite clearly no option has been ruled out. In fact that was the purpose for which the study was commissioned.

The hon. member should recall as I indicated yesterday that the community of old Davis Inlet, three miles away on the mainland, had to be vacated because there was inadequate game and support for the people who live there. It would be very inappropriate for the government to make the same mistake twice. That is why we are taking this decision very carefully.

SHIPBUILDING

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister of industry, whose department just gave $9 million to Canadian Shipbuilding to consolidate its business in Port Weller.

This $9 million gift means that 110 full-time workers at Portship in Thunder Bay in the wholly-owned subsidiary of C. S. and E. will be losing their jobs starting today.

I believe it is the minister's duty to use the resources of the Canadian taxpayers to create jobs in Canada rather than to eliminate them. How could the minister consider using this type of corporate welfare to eliminate these 110 jobs at Portship in Thunder Bay?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I can only comment that I hope my friend has cleared that question with the hon. member for LaSalle—Émard.

I know my hon. friend is aware that there has been a considerable amount of rationalization of the shipbuilding industry on the Great Lakes. Obviously this process has continued in the past year.

The company put up a proposal which we responded to. It was its decision as to what that proposal should be and we responded within the parameters of government policy.

I know my hon. friend would not want to lose this opportunity to thank the government for the support it has given to the Ankara subway system. A large amount of the work for that will come to the community of Thunder Bay in the form of the construction of rail cars.

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, yes we do appreciate the work given to UTDC in Thunder Bay to produce those railway cars. I did not check with the hon. member and as the Prime Minister has said many times, you do not make many friends in politics. Perhaps this is one of those instances.

I wonder in this particular instance why an outright gift and not a loan has been given to this company when the minister knows full well that on his desk there is a proposal for a loan of about the same amount of money to the softwood lumber industry in northwestern Ontario.

The minister knows very well that this particular proposal would create 900——

Mr. Speaker: I think we have the question.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I know there are some differences within the Liberal caucus. I did not mean to aggravate those differences on my left today.

I would be happy to look into the proposal my hon. friend has referred to. I have not been made aware of it myself. Possibly my colleague responsible for FEDNOR is more aware of that particular issue than I, but I will look into it.

TRANSPORTATION

Mr. J.W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, my question is for either the Minister of Transport or the parliamentary secretary. It is about freight transportation policies.

In most parts of Canada the Trans-Canada Highway system is overburdened with trucking volumes. In places like New Brunswick it is making the highway virtually unsafe for passenger cars. At the same time both the CP and CN main corridor rail lines are vastly underutilized. In some places, for example again in New Brunswick where the Canadian Pacific Railway has filed for abandonment, consideration is being given to closing the rail lines.

Has the department considered measures that would redirect major volumes of freight traffic from the highways to the railways through piggy back concepts or related services? Would it not make good sense to use economic incentives or disincentives to motivate the trucking industry more aggressively toward the rails instead of the roads?

Mr. Lee Richardson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the member's concerns about the future rail operations in Atlantic Canada and the positive suggestions he has proposed.

This government brought in tax measures which provided relief in relation to excise fuel taxes. Also the replacement of the manufacturers' sales tax with the GST was of benefit to the railways. CN announced double-stack service linking Atlantic Canada with markets throughout North America in large part due to the commendable co-operation of the Nova Scotia government.

This might be a good time to call on all provincial governments to look at their own tax regimes. They could certainly provide some real relief to the railways.

TIOXIDE CANADA

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa–West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of the Environment. Tioxide Canada is the worst polluter of the St. Lawrence River, a fact that has led to fines totalling $36 million for repeated pollution offences.

Yesterday when Tioxide Canada announced it was leaving for the United States, the government was still committed to an interest free loan of $8 million to that company.

If back in October the government had enough evidence to impose fines totalling $36 million, why did it not cancel the interest free loan of $8 million it had negotiated with Tioxide Canada?

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, the Tioxide Canada story is a very long one. The short answer to the hon. member's question is that there are two separate issues.

In one case we are talking about legal proceedings following an investigation that went on for some time. Evidence was collected and legal proceedings were started against Tioxide. It is now up to the courts to deal with the matter. We cannot comment any further.

As for the other matter the investment this was a modernization plan which is quite different. However, we should realize that just because a company has decided to make an investment, that does not mean it cannot be charges in connection with the other activities in which it is involved. Consequently, charges may be laid, even if an investment decision was made with the possible participation of both levels of government.

[English]

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, Canadians have a right to know that not one penny of their money is going to companies that continue to poison the St. Lawrence River.

Will the minister agree today to table all information on any money given or promised to companies that are continuing to pollute, including dealings with Tioxide since 1988?

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, this specific project was a modernization project and an investment of I think in excess of $170 million. The information I have is the proposed help by both levels of government was for an interest free loan. No money has been spent by any other level of government as far as I know with regard to this project.

Since the company itself has now announced publicly that it intends not to pursue the project itself, I can only assume that the offer will be revised as a consequence of the decision of the company.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Lac–Saint–Jean): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. In response to those who have been urging him to stop his attack against the unemployed in Quebec, the Prime Minister has asked for suggestions on other ways to save $600 million. I merely want to point out that in Quebec alone, the government could save nearly $300 million annually by putting an end to duplication of manpower services. The remainder of those $600 million could easily be recovered by implementing some of the recommendations in the Auditor General's last report.

• (1500)

That being said, I want to ask the Prime Minister why he is so anxious to target the unemployed, when with a little common sense that could easily be avoided.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member's statement that a particular action taken by the government could be considered an attack against the unemployed in Quebec is, I would say, unworthy of the hon. member, and is along the same lines as the statement made by the hon. member for Vancouver about Mexico. Usually, even when what he says is unacceptable, the hon. member shows some restraint.

The phrase "an attack against the unemployed in Quebec" is unworthy of the hon. member who just spoke, but what should be done about the unemployed is a very valid question. In Quebec, I think he will find the answer in the figures for December. While in Canada, 57,000 new jobs were created, which is very encouraging in the circumstances, 45,000 were created in Quebec.

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I may explain that I was referring to an attack against all unemployed workers, including those across Canada. In any case, the people concerned know what the situation is like. Today most members from Quebec see the unemployed and the poor coming to their offices to express their concern and outrage. They are right, because the bill would eliminate 5 per cent of current unemployment insurance benefits.

Why does this government, before it leaves the scene, not make a grand gesture to help people who are in need, and why does it not take the money from the rich instead of from those who do have enough to feed their children?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, in his first question, the hon. member clearly referred to an attack against the unemployed in Quebec, but now he is trying to skate around that difficulty by saying: "No, I meant an attack against all the unemployed in Canada". I think he should read some of the headlines that have appeared in Quebec. On January 23: "Expansion of a research centre in Pointe-Claire"; on January 16: "$5 million for the Montreal Cardiology Institute"; on January 12: "Ottawa and Quebec invest $7 million in applied software"; on January 15, 1993: "Teleglobe to invest $278 million"; "Bombardier, Belgian contract for $856 million confirmed"; "Molson O'Keefe invests $15 million in its plant on Notre-Dame Street".

That is how we deal with the problems of the unemployed and the workers in Quebec. Not with nationalist statements but with tangible results.

QUESTION PERIOD

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, during the course of Question Period the Prime Minister was responding to a question by the hon. member for Burnaby—Kingsway who apparently did not like the response. The member chose to express his displeasure by walking across the aisle, confronting the Prime Minister and slapping a document on his desk.

I am sure the Speaker would recognize that for us to accept that kind of behaviour as normal and reasonable within our rules of decorum would be to bring about a state of disorder in the House.

I would simply ask the Speaker to perhaps ask the hon. member to reconsider whether that was appropriate behaviour and to seek to ensure that type of behaviour does not occur in the future.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, on a point of privilege I would like to say that, as the House leader has indicated, the member for Burnaby—Kingsway came over and slapped down a piece of paper. A few years ago one of his colleagues came over and slapped down an 11-pound fish.

All I am asking for, and I am not asking for much, is that they just give me written notice. I will be happy to be here to receive it.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, on the same point, I am willing to let the issue go but I think the government House leader should remember his own actions of many years ago.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: I think we can deal with this quickly. I would ask hon. members to carefully reflect on their actions in this Chamber.

The right hon. Prime Minister referred to an incident which he said happened a few years ago. Actually it happened many years ago. We have not had a fish on anybody's desk for quite some time.

The incident complained about is of course a breach of order and I am sure the hon. member realizes that. I am sure the hon. member will not repeat it. I think we can leave it at that.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, I just want to respond to the hon. member for Churchill. I have a video that he might discuss with the member for Kingston and the Islands. I will send him a copy of the video, which shows that the accusation made about me in the press to which he refers was false. I have a video to prove that it was false.

I would appreciate it if he would look at the video before he raises the issue again.

Mr. Mulroney: Mr. Speaker, I apologize and I certainly will not raise it again. However my question is: Who is Tim Naumetz?

Mr. Speaker: I am sure the right hon. Prime Minister does not expect me to get into that debate.

THE LATE HAROLD EDWARD WINCH

Mr. Speaker: I want to remind the House that we have news of the death of a former member of this place who served the city of Vancouver, the province of British Columbia, and Canada with great distinction for many years.

I would ask the hon. member for Vancouver East to rise and commence tributes.

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, Harold Winch, member of Parliament for Vancouver East from 1953 to 1972, died on February 1 at age 84.

He had a long history of public service, having also served as MLA for Vancouver East from 1933 to 1953. Along with his father, Ernest Winch, another outstanding political activist, Harold Winch lived several lives. He was a dynamic and colourful man and an eloquent speaker who never forgot the hardship of his own childhood poverty and the experiences of the unemployed during the 1930s.

As an unemployed electrician he began his political activism when he was hit on the head by a police baton. His leadership qualities were evident when he quelled a riot at a huge gathering of unemployed workers in downtown Vancouver in 1938.

As editor of The Western Clarion he refused the King's Jubilee Medal in protest of the government's inaction on economic problems.

Harold joined his father in the B.C. legislature, and in 1938 he became leader of the CCF. One of the things that he often mentioned to us and that he was most proud of was that during those years the CCF was the only political party to press for voting rights for Asian Canadians.

Father and son travelled and organized throughout B.C., laying the foundations of the socialist movement in B.C. and eventually across Canada. They elected many MLAs. Harold Winch resigned as leader after the CCF narrowly missed governing in 1953.

He ran successfully to represent Vancouver East in the Parliament of Canada, joining J. S. Woodsworth, Stanley Knowles, Tommy Douglas and Grace MacInnis as an outstanding parliamentarian and orator who spoke out eloquently and often for social reforms.

He was an early opponent of capital punishment, advocated reform of penitentiaries and the Criminal Code, argued persistently for low cost housing, demanded government action on unemployment and unemployment insurance and spoke often on the concerns of workers, veterans and pensioners. The problems of Vancouver East and of his constituents were his top priority.

Harold Winch retired from the House of Commons in 1972. He survived two life-threatening illnesses and enjoyed many happy years in retirement following his marriage to Jessie Winch.

He helped to found the Immigrant Services Society of Vancouver and chaired the Boag Foundation. He was my mentor when as a very nervous novice I was asked to run for Parliament in 1977. I always remember his advice. He said: "Margaret, speak up and never be humble". With his endorsement I won.

Harold's last public speech at the memorial for his lifetime friend Grace MacInnis was as eloquent and witty as ever. Harold Winch is an important part of B.C. history. He was a founder of the CCF-NDP and a dedicated public servant for almost 40 years.

On behalf of all my colleagues in this House we extend condolences to his beloved wife Jessie, his sons, Donald and Gerald, and his daughter, Shirley Dray.

Hon. William Scott (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to remember the life and parliamentary contribution of a former colleague who represented Vancouver East from 1953 until 1972, Harold Edward Winch.

An electrician by trade Harold was very proud of his work and role as a founding member of the New Democratic Party and the CCF before that.

I served with Harold from the time I came here in 1965 until 1972. Although I have not had the pleasure of talking with him for many years, my memories of him are of a jovial, hard-working member who cared deeply for his constituents.

On behalf of the Progressive Conservative Party, I join with all members in this House and the former members who knew him in expressing my condolences to his friends and family.

Those who contribute so much to others are always missed in the community but they are never forgotten.

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, I want to join with my other colleagues in the House in paying tribute to Harold Winch. From time to time we rise in this House to pay tribute to former members of Parliament. Some have been away from here for some time but that does not in any way diminish the fantastic records they built in their own day.

Today we are paying tribute to a member of Parliament, Harold Winch. He was the member for Vancouver East and served in this Parliament of Canada for 19 years, from 1953 until 1972. Prior to coming to this House he served in the British Columbia legislature for a total of 20 years, from 1933 to 1953. Imagine what it must have been like to be elected to the B.C. legislature in 1933 in the midst of the Great Depression and the great problems that faced elected politicians of that day.

I can say with total sincerity that my memory of Harold Winch since I came here in 1965, along with the member for Victoria—Haliburton, is that of a strong-willed, dynamic frontbencher of the New Democratic Party. He spoke with great conviction at all times and was known as a silver-tongued orator long before he came to this House.

He was a man who had a very difficult youth, difficult times. He was an electrician by trade, as has been mentioned, and he was what one would call well read, which really means that he was to a large extent a very successful self-educated person.

He won elections to this House of Commons in 1953, 1957, 1958, 1962, 1963, 1965 and 1968. His memory is well planted in the minds of those who knew him in those days as a silver-tongued orator at the peak of his political career.

In 1952 he came within one seat of being premier of his home province of British Columbia. In that year his party of which he was leader won a total of 18 seats and W. A. C. Bennett won a total of 19 seats. There is a lifelong debate on this because the preferential ballot system was blamed for his defeat. In that year Mr. Winch's party received 34 per cent of the popular vote and the government that was formed under W. A. C. Bennett won the election with a total of 30.2 per cent of the popular vote.

I suppose I, like the late Harold Winch, am one of those people in this House who never wants to see our Parliament elected by any preferential ballot system. The system that we have here is one that Harold Winch would sincerely believe in as I do and as most members of this House I think are dedicated to.

To this dynamic individual, Mr. Harold Winch, who spent 39 years in the public life of his province and this Parliament of Canada, we extend today our condolences to his family, to his wife, Jessie, to his sons, Donald and Gerald, and to his daughter, Shirley. We want to say to them that we feel enriched having known Harold Winch as long as we did and thank him for his service to Canada and to British Columbia.

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Mr. Speaker, my first memory of Harold Winch in the midst of his many struggles on behalf of ordinary people of this country was his statement that he was proud to be a Canadian, Canada was his country, but British Columbia was his home.

It is on the focus of his home that I wish to make these remarks, Mr. Speaker, because as you know every one of us who comes to this Chamber has immense pride in the region which we represent in this great nation of Canada.

Within the province of British Columbia Harold Winch's name and his father's name will be implanted in the provincial history forever. This is a man who had a natural impediment that he had to overcome before he could become a speaker. He was a silver-tongued orator by determination. He entered politics with a speech impediment that forced upon him a stutter that by sheer will he overcame in his process of development as a politician.

Where I grew up in the city of Vancouver had always been represented in my memory by the Winch family. I must say this with no rancour that when we went to a local movie theatre for the matinee on Sunday afternoon we saw pictures of Adolf Hitler and we booed; we saw pictures of Mussolini, we booed; we saw Mackenzie King, we booed; we saw George Drew and we booed. We saw Harold Winch and we erupted in cheers.

We should not reflect that we of course put Mackenzie King or George Drew in the same category because they were great Canadians, but that was the essence of the identity within the community of the east end of Vancouver toward what everybody in that part of town considered their champion.

Harold Winch loved Parliament. Harold Winch was defined as a radical socialist which can be said to be a correct definition in the framework of being a loyal monarchist, strange as it may seem, and a devoted parliamentarian, not so strange.

This man who was committed to the monarchy in terms of parliamentary reform and parliamentary roles was the one man who went out impassioned during the debate on the flag and demanded that the Union Jack be retained. Some symbol for a so-called radical socialist.

His commitment to Parliament, his commitment to the rules of this Chamber, his commitment to this vehicle as an outlet for legitimate aspirations of social and economic justice were unmatched anywhere in our province.

His enemies were legion but that did not include personal friendships. Harold Winch had friends in the Conservative Party, the Liberal Party and every other adjunct to form a coalition that those two parties put together in British Columbia, sometimes known as Social Credit, thrown against the Democratic Socialists.

Harold Winch was respected yet loved by the people of our province.

His death is also the death of an era. The Social Democrats of his era were demanded to set an agenda to meet an unusual set of economic circumstances. The same challenges are now before the party that he left behind, the Social Democratic Party of Canada. His death is a reminder of the leadership given the Social Democrats to chart a new path in a troubled country.

I say, through you, Mr. Speaker, to all Canadians that we do not have a monopoly on the truth or a monopoly on all the answers to Canada's problems, but Harold Winch's demonstration of willingness to work through those problems, the finances for all Canadians, is still the same commitment by every one of us who call ourselves Democratic Socialists.

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Mr. Speaker, I am one who felt very privileged to have worked with Harold for 44 years in the CCF-NDP.

One month ago I visited him at his home. We had a meeting of three people. After telling us that his mind was starting to let him down, he went on to prove that he had not forgotten a single thing for the last 80 years.

The election of 1953 has been mentioned. I had some small part in that. On the first count when Harold was premier-elect by quite a substantial number of MLAs, I was ahead by 923 ballots in Nanaimo and the Island. By the time the final counting had taken place some three weeks later, I was behind by 18 votes. Harold might have been premier had that result been different in Nanaimo.

He was a derelict. He was proud to be called a derelict. The Prime Minister in 1933 said those people on welfare, those people unemployed were derelicts and he was not prepared to put any more public money into looking after derelicts. Then Harold was elected and was proud to be one of these derelicts and represented them very carefully and very well in the House. I am proud to have known him as long and as well as I did.

Mr. Speaker: The House always views tributes with great dignity and I would ask the hon. member to wind up with some short remarks.

Mr. Lyle Kristiansen (Kootenay West—Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, the home I was born into in downtown Vancouver was called the CCF house. I was the only child in a house that saw many raging debates. The first voices I can remember through the swinging doors between our common living room, parents' bedroom, dining room and my closet-sized bedroom were those of Harold Winch, Ernie Winch, Wallace Lefaux and a number of other early leaders in the socialist movement in British Columbia.

I want to add my words to those of the member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca when talking about Harold's overcoming of his speech impediment. Sometimes he would stand before a crowd of people and his mouth would be open for almost a full minute without a sound coming out. The only way he overcame that was through sheer determination and by learning to shout dramatically. That is the way he got the sound out, that is the way he got the word out. He was later billed across the country as being one of the 10 leading orators in Canada.

Following the riot and the occupation of the post office, it was my father's shoulder and a lamp post that served as his platform when he stopped the communist inspired attack on the Vancouver police station, which would have resulted in many deaths had it been allowed to go ahead. So I have a personal interest.

My condolences go to his family, and particularly Jessie Mendels who was provincial secretary of the CCF when Harold was leader of the opposition. They had a crush on each other but Harold was married. His wife was very disabled, and it was a very touching moment for many of us when we saw Harold, long after his wife died, return from a vacation in Hawaii with Jessie on his arm as his new bride.

He was a man who gave everything, along with his family, to the defence of working people and ordinary people in British Columbia and in Canada as he saw it. We owe him and his kind a great debt.

ORDER IN COUNCIL APPOINTMENTS

TABLING OF REFERENCE

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to table, in both official languages, a number of Order in Council appointments which were made by the government pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 110(1). These are deemed referred to the appropriate standing committees, a list of which is attached.

CRIMINAL CODE

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing) moved for leave to introduce Bill C–396, an act to amend the Criminal Code and Customs Tariff in consequence (child pornography).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Pursuant to Standing Order 68(2), the motion is deemed adopted.

Mr. Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, over the last perhaps 20 years there has been a good deal of debate and effort to make child pornography a crime. To date that has not met with any success, but I put forward this private member's bill in the hope that the government and the members in the House will see fit to support it over time.

The bill provides a definition of child pornography. It proposes amendments to the Criminal Code and to the Customs Tariff which would create new offences concerning the possession of child pornography, dealing in child pornography, and using children in pornographic performances. It introduces new legislation that makes the possession of child pornography an indictable offence. It sets out roles for defences. For example, it deals with the issue of artistic merit and it adds child pornography to the list of prohibited goods so that it is illegal to import or attempt to import child pornography specifically.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Mr. Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing) moves that the bill be now read the first time and printed.

Pursuant to Standing Order 69(1), the motion is deemed adopted.

Bill read the first time and printed.

CANADA ELECTIONS ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface) moved for leave to introduce Bill C–397, an act to revise and consolidate the Canada Elections Act, the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act and related acts and to amend and repeal certain other acts as a consequence.

• (1530)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Pursuant to Standing Order 68(2), the motion is deemed adopted.

Mr. Duhamel: Mr. Speaker, this bill is being put forward with a number of ideas that could help to correct many of the flaws which have prevented people from voting in the past.

It responds to the disenfranchisement of those in the past who were unable to vote and had a legal right to do so. For example people out of the country, either living or travelling would be able to vote. There are more opportunities for women in the political process. There is the possibility of aboriginal constituencies; a $1,000 cap on contributions from interest groups and lobbyists; improved guidelines for election expenses; lengthening of the voting date to permit more people more access to voting. Those are the main points. Finally the bill includes a reduction in the length of the campaign to 47 days.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Mr. Duhamel moves that the bill be now read the first time and printed.

Pursuant to Standing Order 69(1), the motion is deemed adopted.

Bill read the first time and printed.

MURAL CAPITAL OF CANADA ACT

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan) moved for leave to introduce Bill C–398, an act declaring Chemainus the mural capital of Canada.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Pursuant to Standing Order 68(2), the motion is deemed adopted.

Mr. Stupich: Chemainus is a little town on Vancouver Island in my riding. It was condemned to death when the only real industry in the town decided to close up shop and leave.

The town did not accept the death sentence. The citizens got together and decided to make Chemainus important for other reasons and they did. It became a very important tourist destination by having a large number of murals created in the town, some 32 to date with more on the way, large ones and small ones, far more than any other community in Canada.

This bill would recognize Chemainus as being the mural capital of Canada.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Mr. Stupich moves that the bill be now read the first time and printed.

Pursuant to Standing Order 69(1), the motion is deemed adopted.

Bill read the first time and printed.

MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT RETIRING ALLOWANCES ACT

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East) moved for leave to introduce Bill C–399, an act to amend the members of Parliament Retiring Allowances Act.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Pursuant to Standing Order 68(2), the motion is deemed adopted.

Mr. Redway: Mr. Speaker, this bill deals with the pensions of members of Parliament. It prohibits double dipping, that is, the receipt by former members of Parliament of pensions from the Government of Canada or an agency of the Government of Canada or a Crown corporation. It would also prohibit a former member of Parliament from collecting a pension until they reach the age of 60.

This is a matter of great concern and interest to all members of this House. It is also a matter of great concern and interest to all Canadians. This bill is essentially the same as the amendments I put last June, at a time when the President of the Treasury Board indicated he was going to be appointing a review committee to look at the pensions of members of Parliament. That has not been done as yet. I trust that this bill will deal with the matter once and for all and bring it to a head.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Mr. Redway moves that the bill be now read the first time and printed.

Pursuant to Standing Order 69(1), the motion is deemed adopted.

Bill read the first time and printed.

PETITIONS

SIERRA LEONE

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to present a petition, pursuant to Standing Order 36, signed by residents of the provinces of Quebec and Ontario.

The petitioners address this House complaining that the rebel incursions into Sierra Leone have displaced and killed thousands of innocent civilians in the south and eastern provinces of the country.

The petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to bring their concerns both to the United Nations and to the Commonwealth of Nations; to push for immediate humanitarian aid to Sierra Leone to help with the urgent medical needs of the civilian population and to help improve the refugee problems within Sierra Leone; assist on humanitarian grounds for Sierra Leoneans to sponsor immediate family members from the war-torn and devastated areas of Sierra Leone; grant amnesty on humanitarian and compassionate grounds for Sierra Leoneans now living in Canada; and urge the government to join the world in condemning these inhuman acts of killing by the Sierra Leone government.

The petitioners will ever pray and ask your honourable House, Mr. Speaker, to provide a remedy.

HAITI

Mr. Joe McGuire (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have the honour to present a petition from residents of Prince Edward Island. It was presented to me by Mr. Paul D. Gallant and Miss Pam Gallant who have requested this Parliament to ask the UN to intervene in Haiti in order to restore democratic power and peace.

The coup in Haiti, that unfortunate country, has made the population endure death and torture at the hands of the new dictators.

This petition is signed by people from Charlottetown to Tignish who belong to the co-operative movement in Prince Edward Island. They request immediate action on this petition.

SERIAL KILLER BOARD GAME

Mr. Doug Fee (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to present a number of pages of petitions which have all been certified correct as to form and content under Standing Order 36.

The signatures on this petition were gathered in the cities of Red Deer and the surrounding communities of Blackfalds, Sylvan Lake, Lacombe and Innisfail. These people express concern that violence has become an ordinary part of our children's lives. Contributing to that violence is a game called Serial Killer board game.

The petitioners call upon Parliament to amend the Criminal Code of Canada so that violence and degrading material such as this serial killer board game can be kept from being distributed in Canada.

It is a privilege not only to present this petition on behalf of those who have signed it but to indicate my personal support for it.

BILL C-93

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, these petitioners lament the fact that SSHRC is to be merged with the Canada Council. They point out that Canada's major problems such as economic stagnation, poverty, unemployment, social assistance, increased reliance upon food banks and domestic abuse need the attention of social scientists.

The petitioners point out that the government is about to eliminate a program which has worked well since 1977. They indicate it is a step backward and that there was no consultation. They ask that this decision be deferred and there be consultation and then a decision made.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I have another petition where the petitioners ask that the goods and services tax be eliminated on books and reading materials.

These petitioners point out there has been a 0 per cent tax since Confederation. They accentuate and emphasize the fact that reading is the cornerstone of democracy, education, literacy, productivity and competitiveness.

BROADCASTING

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Finally, Mr. Speaker, I have petitioners who request that Parliament be extremely vigilant in regulating the use of inappropriate language on radio and television. They feel that it counteracts the efforts of the family. They point out that inappropriate language is not necessary in order to inform or entertain Canadians.

BILL C-91

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I have two sets of petitions. The first petition is from people in Hendon and Biggar, Saskatchewan who call upon Parliament to repeal Bill C-91 and repeal Bill C-22 which was passed in 1987 so that Canadians will have the full benefit of lower priced generic drugs. In this way provincial and private drug plans can serve Canadians without being forced to charge higher fees and/or provide less coverage.

CHILD POVERTY

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition from a great many Canadians from Toronto, Thorold, Brampton, Scarborough, Willowdale, Downsview, Pickering, Ajax, Mississauga, Don Mills, Agincourt, who remind the House of a motion that was passed here unanimously on November 24, 1989 expressing concern for Canadian children living in poverty and seeking to achieve the elimination of poverty among children in Canada by the year 2000.

These petitioners call upon Parliament to reaffirm that commitment and to immediately develop a plan to implement that commitment by the year 2000.

• (1540)

Mr. Bill Domm (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister for Science): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition to present similar to the one just read. It lists the names of Peterborough federal riding constituents who remind Parliament that on November 24 the House of Commons unanimously passed a motion stating:

> That this House express its concern for the more than one million Canadian children currently living in poverty.

Therefore the undersigned petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to take the actions necessary to reaffirm its commitment to seek the elimination of poverty among children in Canada by the year 2000.

KILLER CARDS

Mr. Bill Domm (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister for Science): Mr. Speaker, I have another petition with some 36 pages of signatures from the Peterborough area. This particular petition is in support of the efforts of Mrs. Debbie Mahaffy in her quest to have killer cards seized at the Canada-U.S. border to stop their importation and distribution in Canada.

She is calling upon us to consider amending the laws of Canada to prohibit the importation, distribution, sale and manufacture of killer cards in law and to advise the producers of killer cards that their product, if destined for Canada, will be seized and destroyed.

REQUEST FOR ELIMINATION OF VIOLENCE IN OUR SOCIETY

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I would like to table a petition from people in Val-d'Or and Sullivan in our riding, Abitibi, who say that violent films on television are dangerous and therefore unacceptable because they incite more violence.

The petitioners say that all toys that incite violent games are unacceptable and should not be made. They also say that the freedom of the press to report acts of violence should be limited and that information on violent acts which is repeated too often on all television stations and on radio can incite others to commit the same acts of violence.

Therefore, the petitioners humbly ask Parliament to legislate on the above-mentioned points in order to eliminate violence in our society, so as to better protect our children and give all our fellow citizens a better quality of life.

PARKS CANADA

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition signed by several residents of the constituency of Edmonton East, most of whom are of Ukrainian heritage. They point out that during World War I the Rocky Mountain parks were the site of several detention camps where individuals were unjustly interned, especially those of Ukrainian background.

They humbly call upon Parliament to pass a resolution directing Parks Canada to act in accordance with the National Parks Act, 1930, and to include the internment experience in its interpretive program for the benefit and education of all Canadians.

SEXUAL ASSAULT

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I have two petitions to present today. One is from 235 residents of the Comox Valley who are petitioning in memory of Dawn Shaw, a little girl who was raped and murdered in my riding just a few weeks ago. They feel that the present justice system fails to protect our communities, especially our children, from increasingly becoming the victims of sexual assault.

They call for a number of measures to be implemented that will increase the protection of children in our community. They talk about not permitting judges to drop charges against people because of delay in bringing cases to trial and lengthening the sentences for sex offenders.

They also call for the taking of DNA samples from persons suspected of sexual assault and a series of other measures that they feel will increase the protection of children in our community from those who have a propensity to commit these types of crimes.

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, my second petition is from a number of people in my riding calling on the government not to proceed with Bill C-91, the drug patent legislation, and to repeal Bill C-22 passed in 1987 so that Canadians will have the full benefit from lower priced generic drugs and so that provincial and private drug plans can serve Canadians without being forced to charge higher fees or provide less coverage.

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Mr. Speaker, it is my privilege to rise today to present a number of petitions on behalf of a number of people from across Canada who are very upset with the government proceeding with Bill C-91, even as the government side in the Senate is invoking closure to push it through. I might add that even Dalton Camp says that those who vote for Bill C-91 are voting for greed and exploitation, and they know it.

These people are asking Parliament not to proceed with Bill C-91 and to repeal Bill C-22 passed in 1987 so that Canadians will have the full benefit from lower priced generic drugs and so that provincial and private drug plans can serve Canadians without being forced to charge higher fees and/or provide less coverage.

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, it is my duty and honour to rise on behalf of 300 people who have signed petitions from Victoria to Brantford, to Saskatchewan and Alberta.

These petitioners call upon the government not to proceed with Bill C-91 so that provincial and private drug plans can serve Canadians without being forced to charge higher fees and provide less coverage. They call upon the government not to proceed with Bill C-91 and to repeal Bill C-22.

VIOLENCE

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I wish to complete the presentation of my second petition which comes from the Codette—Nipawin area of my riding.

It says that many studies have shown a link between violence and entertainment and desensitization to violence in our society. Part of this new culture of violence is a game called the Serial Killer board game, the point of which is to murder as many defenceless children and adults as possible.

Therefore the petitioners request that Parliament consider amending the Criminal Code of Canada so that violent and degrading materials such as "The Serial Killer" board game can be kept from being distributed in Canada.

Mr. Edwards: Mr. Speaker, I note, just before dealing with Questions on the Order Paper, if I may, that today we have a less glamorous mace than usual on the table. I was puzzled by that as was the Minister of the Environment who notices these things.

We have determined that there is a reason for it. This is the mace which was the substitute for the mace destroyed in the fire of 1916. On February 3 of each year this is the mace that is on the table rather than the shinier one.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk)

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 440 and 447.

[Text]

Question No. 440—Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre):

With respect to the Northern Flood Agreement (a) does the government intend to call for a construction audit to independently assess contract performance regarding cost, quality and quantity requirements of the agreement and (i) if so, when will it be completed and made public (ii) if not, for what reasons (b) who has received contracts under the provisions of the agreement and, in each case, for what amounts and when were they granted?

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): In so far as the Department of Indian Affairs and Northen Development is concerned, the response is as follows:

(a) The Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development does not intend to call for a construction audit of the Northern Reconstruction Authority (NFCRA).

An extensive technical evaluation was conducted by Public Works Canada and Indian Affairs and Northern Development in 1989. The evaluation stated that the NFCRA met or exceeded all Treasury Board requirements called for in the article 6.1 agreement regarding construction standards.

In addition, annual unqualified audits have been submitted by the NFCRA. This process provides effective accountability to both the bands and the federal government.

(b) The names of NFCRA contractors and the amounts of the contracts constitute commercially confidential third-party information and, as such, cannot be released.

Question No. 447—Mr. Manley:

How has VIA Rail spent the three additional appropriations as outlined in the supplementary estimates of March 31, 1992: $27,036,000, a transfer of $21,591,516, and $5,444,484 in new appropriations?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): The total amount of $27,036,000 outlined in the Supplementary Estimates of March 31, 1992 is in support of the following two government initiatives:

—$21,100,000 identified was required in order to comply with 1992 amendments to the Financial Administration Act, initiated by the Office of the Comptroller General. These amendments have altered the Payables at Year-end (PAYE) process for government departments and Crown corporations. This amount does not represent an increase in VIA Rail's expenditures for 1991-92, but rather, the government's recognition of VIA's account receivables for prior year expenditures that could not be recognized under the previous PAYE mechanism.

—$5,936,484 was required in support of VIA Rail's current level of passenger train services in remote regions. Transport Canada serves as a source of funding until such time as the future of these services is decided by the government.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The questions as enumerated by the parliamentary secretary have been answered.

Mr. Edwards: I ask, Mr. Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, would you be so kind as to call Notice of Motion for the Production of Papers No. P-22, in the name of the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell.

P-22—Mr. Boudria:

That an order of the House do issue copies of all import permits authorizing the bulk import of milk since April 1, 1991.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I notice the hon. member is not in the Chamber. Would he want to leave it for another date or transfer it for debate?

Mr. Edwards: Transfer it for debate.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Transferred for debate.

SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY S. O. 81—UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE BENEFITS

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government's policy of denying unemployment insurance benefits to workers who quit their jobs or who are dismissed is "too severe", "too tough for people", "puts people in a desperate situation", "goes beyond fairness", is "extremist" and "right-wing" and is, therefore, unacceptable to the Canadian people.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in his economic and fiscal statement tabled in the House of Commons on December 2, the Minister of Finance announced changes to the Unemployment Insurance Program. Indeed the government will no longer pay any UI benefits to persons who voluntarily quit their jobs without just cause or are dismissed for misconduct. The changes announced also specify that as of April 1 all new UI recipients will get 57 per cent of their insurable earnings, compared to 60 per cent now. As the minister explained in his economic statement, the government's objective is to save $900 million to help reduce the deficit.

At this point, I would like to remind the House, my fellow members and all Canadians listening that a couple of years ago, when this same Conservative government introduced Bill C-21 and completely withdrew from the Unemployment Insurance Program, we had a program to which employees, employers and the government each contributed one-third. The government decided to completely get out of funding the program and took $850 million with it besides. At that time, the government said that it would invest this money in training programs. I am sure that all members have cases in their ridings where, because of these training programs over which the government has totally lost control, some people are mixed up.

Again, the government always tries to make those in need, namely the unemployed, pay. Instead of attacking unemployment, it attacks the unemployed who are the victims of its own policies.

Not only opposition members, oppose these measures, but also a number of Conservative members. I would like to quote a few comments made by these Conservative members when the House was adjourned. For example, I read this in La Presse on January 15: "Come to think of it, you have to be darn rich to quit your job and be able to put up with a 7 to 12 week penalty. Now, instead of a 7 to 12 week penalty, there will be no more benefits. This is an extremely punitive measure considering the few who may have abused the system. It is overkill. In this case the one who gets it is the ordinary citizen." This quote from the January 15 issue of La Presse is said to be from the Conservative member for Jonquière.

I hope that this evening, when we vote, the member for Jonquière will be here, will speak in the debate in the same way that he did on January 15, and will vote. It is all very well to talk to the media and to make statements, but what counts is the vote and I hope that the member will be here this evening for the vote.

The same issue of that newspaper also quotes another Conservative member, the hon. member for Beauce, as having said: "The elected members of Parliament must try to attack the conditions which create unemployment and not the unemployed. They must go after the causes, not the victims."

I would also like to quote for you something that my friend, the Conservative member for Abitibi said, which was published in the Journal de Montréal on January 23, just a few days ago: "The reduction from 60 to 57 per cent of insurable earnings may seem insignificant, but when you are on UI, every dollar counts. For those making a good salary, $20 a month is not much, but for those who have nothing else, it is very important."

I say to that hon. member, "Right on. Come here to the House to debate and convince your other colleagues to withdraw these measures that are unacceptable to Canadians." I hope to see him here debating with us this afternoon and voting in favour of my motion tonight.

As I said earlier, the government has already taken $800 million from the system. What is the government up to? It is trying to act gradually, a little at a time, but if it continues that way it will completely destroy the unemployment insurance program. I will dwell on the provision that deprives people who quit their job voluntarily of unemployment insurance, and for my colleagues and all our listeners, I would like to give a brief historical background.

What was the situation before 1990? If someone quit his job voluntarily, without justification, or lost his job for misconduct, he could be excluded from benefits for one to six weeks.

In 1990, with Bill C-21, this penalty went from a minimum of seven weeks to a maximum of twelve weeks. Today, with this measure that the Minister of Finance proposed on December 2, the penalty for someone in the same situation will be total exclusion from benefits. He will no longer be entitled to collect UI. The minister of employment tells us that this is all meant to correct abuses. Do you think that someone would quit his job to be penalized, under the present rules, and not collect a cent in benefits or any salary for three months? Are there really so many people who do that?

Is it not rather a way for the government to evade its responsibilities in a period of severe economic crisis like this? In Quebec, unemployment in the construction industry alone is 60 per cent. Instead of being honest in an economic crisis and contributing to the Unemployment Insurance Program, the government is cutting benefits and penalizing people who need UI and are the victims of its bad economic policies.

As I said earlier, not just the Liberal and opposition members are opposed. The Quebec Liberals, for example, are also against it. Perhaps we in the opposition could be accused of playing politics on this subject. Maybe all the labour unions, the Quebec Federation of Labour, the Confederation of National Trade Unions, the Quebec teachers' union, the Mouvement Action-Chômage, the Montreal and District Labour Council, the Quebec Provincial Construction Trades Council, could even be accused of politicking, but what about the Quebec Bar Association? Will the motives of the law professors at the University of Quebec in Montreal and other organizations that have spoken out against this bill be questioned?

Why is the Quebec Bar Association opposed to the changes? It says that thousands of genuine unemployed people will be penalized by the measures proposed by the Conservative government. Paul Carrière, president of the Quebec Bar Association, said, "The proposed changes are unrealistic in view of the conflict situations that arise in labour relations."

Have you thought of how many thousands of Canadians are afraid of losing their job in such a difficult period? Today, as we speak, can you imagine how many are afraid not only of losing their job but also of not even being able to collect unemployment benefits as of April 1? Imagine what that does to our fellow citizens, who are not responsible for the severe economic crisis we are in, which is due to the government. Instead of helping them, the government takes it away. It acts like a reverse Robin Hood, so to speak, taking from the poor and giving to the rich.

Mr. Carrière believes that the proposed measures may deprive thousands of unemployed workers of their unemployment insurance benefits, with no consideration for the specific circumstances of their voluntary departure or dismissal for misconduct. Everyone is in the same boat. It just shows how cruel and insensitive these changes are.

Under the present system, when someone leaves his job voluntarily or is dismissed for misconduct, the Unemployment Insurance Act imposes a disqualification period of 7 to 12 weeks. However, there are some reasons that may be justified in the course of an appeal process, such as sexual or other harassment. How do we prove this?

A person may have to accompany a spouse to another place of residence, for instance. Monday, I put the following question to the Prime Minister: What happens to an employee in James Bay who has to—

An hon. member: He is covered.

Mr. Gagliano: The hon. member says he is covered. How? It is easy to say he is covered. An employee gets a phone call from his wife, who says: Listen, you have to come home because we have some problems here. When the employee decides to go home, the employer says: No, you are going to stay here, and if don't, you won't be entitled to unemployment insurance benefits. This situation is not covered in the act. If the member for the Conservative Party is so sure it is covered in the act, as the Prime Minister was, I suggest he read the letters they got from the Quebec Bar Association, and then maybe he will rise in caucus and in the House and tell the government: You are wrong, withdraw these measures because they are unfair.

Of course there are cases of abuse in any system and under any legislation. We have to correct this. We should not try to correct abuse by creating another kind of abuse. We must find a way to use our laws to deal with certain situations if there is abuse. I am sure the minister and his officials have never been able to determine the extent of abuse, if there was any, in the dismissal process.

Instead of treating everyone exactly the same, he could have taken a different approach and ensured that in these difficult times, when, unfortunately, a person loses his job, or in case of incompatibility, which does happen, or when there are certain reasons not covered by the Act, that a person can explain his position and receive benefits.

The Quebec Bar Association and a professor from the University of Quebec in Montreal say that if the government goes ahead with these changes, the judicial system will be flooded with cases, so much so that it will cost more than it does now. We saw what happened in the immigration sector with the refugees, because that cost a fortune. There are still many problems. Why not listen to people like the president of the Quebec Bar Association, since he has some very valid reasons? I repeat, we can hardly be accused of political partisanship since the Quebec Bar Association itself says these measures are unfair.

I see a number of my colleagues from Quebec who have made statements—I quoted some of them—who will take part in the debate this afternoon and will vote on the motion and stand up for their convictions. To give them some encouragement, I will quote the Minister of National Health and Welfare, the Conservative Quebec lieutenant, who told members and reporters, and I quote: "Conservative members are not just there to vote with the government, without saying a word. They have their own opinions and they can express them". Express your opinions, express your convictions, and vote accordingly. I am sure that this evening, Canadians from coast to coast will be watching and will remember what you are about to do.

[English]

I just want to leave a few numbers with the House. It is inappropriate to have these measures at this time. I will relate my figures to the province I represent, which is the province of Quebec.

The number of beneficiaries in Quebec rose by 28,200 between October and November. It was 407,110 according to Statistics Canada, which is a government agency. One in three Canadians receiving UI benefits is a Quebecer. In Montreal, the ranks of UI beneficiaries swelled by nearly 4,000 in November according to Statistics Canada. There were 160,650 Montrealers on benefits in November. That was 3,960 more than in October and 2,050 more than in November 1991.

Montreal's long-term unemployment has meant that there will still be 25,380 more Montrealers collecting UI benefits than Torontonians in November. Nearly one in seven Canadians on UI is a Montrealer and those are just the official statistics. What about those who are not on the UI list anymore? What about those who are on social welfare or those who do not even qualify for social welfare who are trying to sell their houses and cannot even do that because the market is not there?

At the same time when everybody is crying and in difficulty, the government has the guts or the courage to propose an unjust program. It should never have been presented in the House. December 2 was just before Christmas. This shows the insensitivity of this government. That was its Christmas gift to Canadians. The government said that for any reason one quits a job—valid reasons but not necessarily justifiable in the law—one will not get any unemployment insurance.

I think this measure should be withdrawn immediately. This has been recommended not only by different unions, opposition members and a good dozen of Quebec Tory MPs, but also by the Quebec Bar Association that has no political interests and speaks in terms of its members and the law. The association says clearly in its statement that this law should not be implemented and that those rules should be withdrawn. I hope that the government will do that tonight by withdrawing those measures or as soon as possible.

In order to do that, I implore the Quebec members who spoke against these measures to vote on my motion tonight so that we can send a message to the government. Perhaps tomorrow morning, or in same the evening, the minister of employment could withdraw those measures and let Canadians hope to have some relief by receiving unemployment insurance benefits if they have some misfortune.

Mr. Yvon Côté (Richmond—Wolfe): Mr. Speaker, I am surprised to hear what my colleague from Saint-Léonard is saying. I can hardly question his being a sensitive person, but he claims that the government has just destroyed unemployment insurance and is preparing to literally kill our unemployed people who are indeed in a very frail condition.

I would like to set the record straight on certain points, and this is very important because our fellow Canadians are listening. According to what I am hearing, it is obvious that unemployment insurance is about to be abolished. I must admit that, based on what my colleague just said, we are left with the impression that our unemployed are being "killed" by the government. I want to correct those two impressions.

First of all, I want to point out that the purpose of this bill is to bring discipline to the system and to put abusers in their place. The government certainly does not have the dangerous, diabolical, sadistic intention of penalizing the unemployed who voluntarily quit their job. I insist that it is a matter of taking advantage of new conditions and setting new parameters to keep abusers from bilking a system that is basically sound. Do you know that last year 225,000 people quit their jobs voluntarily and, in addition, 40,000 were dismissed for misconduct? Those are not the frail, sincere, honest unemployed he was referring to.

We must therefore set the record straight. Besides, the bill does not give any new reasons. They are the same as before. Nothing has changed from Bill C-21. Reasons for leaving like sexual harassment, dangerous conditions, child care, moving to follow a spouse to another location and discrimination are all there already. Absolutely nothing has changed. We just want to target those who take advantage of the system. Saying that you agree with protecting the abusers, if you allow me, is like letting a bandit continue to move around freely or letting a thief continue to steal, on the pretext that it would cost too much and they should be given the benefit of the doubt. Mr. Speaker, you and I and all hon. members are contributing to the $1 billion that goes to those who abuse the system. Should we put up with it? No.

I regret that my colleague's sincerity is tainted by back-room games that I do not agree with.

Mr. Gagliano: First of all, Mr. Speaker, my hon. colleague challenged my statement to the effect that his government's ultimate aim is to destroy the UI program. He says it is not so.

My hon. colleague will know that, with these measures which have not been enacted yet but are about to and those taken in 1990 through Bill C-21, within two years, this government has totally withdrawn from Unemployment Insurance, taking away money that is not even its own, since the program is actually financed by employee and employer contributions. It took away $850 million in 1990 and $900 million in 1992. When you tell me that you want to protect the Unemployment Insurance Program, I think that you are doing a fine job.

In the figures he quoted about people who are said to have quit their jobs voluntarily or on grounds of misconduct, my hon. colleague failed to mention how many of those have appealed and won, and how long that process took. They are not all defrauding the system.

The problem with this government is that it puts everybody in the same bag. Some people do have reasonable grounds, but with this bill they will not be able to defend themselves. They will have to go to court, use the judiciary system, and that will be very costly and time-consuming. The UI arbitration board is an internal process. It will go by a legislation with clear provisions relating to an employee who quits his or her job voluntarily. Any employee who does not qualify under these provisions will not receive UI benefits. Even the bar says that will clog the judiciary system. They say so, not I.

My hon. colleague should read the letter the Minister of Finance received from the Quebec Bar Association, signed by its president, and look at the specific arguments set forth there.

I would like to add that not all those who quit their jobs are trying to defraud the UI system, as my hon. colleague was referring to.

Mr. Speaker, 43 per cent found work within 10 weeks in 1991. Certainly those are not the ones who have abused the system. There are of course some in every system, but to claim that there are over 200,000, that is a bit much. When the minister says that, of the $600 million he wants to save, over $200 goes to people who abuse the UI system, I think that is an exaggeration. As the hon. member for Jonquière said: "You are out to kill a fly with a gun." I think it is a fine choice of words. Perhaps the hon. member could consult his colleague from Jonquière.

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the hon. member for Saint-Léonard about his motion. I know the Quebec Bar Association said: "In the light of the jurisprudence". Currently, the act covers five valid grounds for voluntary departure. Jurisprudence provides another forty. It says here: "It would appear that in a number of situations where the employer demonstrated there were valid grounds for voluntary departure, as opposed to any justification, the umpire was able to impose the minimum penalty".

In his speech, the hon. member said it would create a considerable backlog in the judicial system. The hon. member is right, because we have no idea of the number of appeals now before the umpire. I know that in Abitibi, in Val d'Or, there are 16 appeals pending. The umpire may hear the appeals in six months or a year from now, or it may even take two years. It is a lengthy process. We know that Bill C-105 will increase the number of appeals before the umpire.

By the way, this evening I know I will abstain from voting on this motion, for the simple reason that in 1978, the Minister of Finance at the time reduced unemployment insurance benefits from 66-2/3 to 60 per cent. However, I do have the following question: Could the hon. member tell me how many appeals are now before the umpire in Montreal and Quebec generally? Does he know how many?

Mr. Gagliano: Mr. Speaker, first of all, I am sorry to hear the hon. member will abstain this evening. As I said at the beginning of my speech, it is all very well to make statements to the media in our ridings, but where it counts is here. I have great respect for the hon. member, and I really regret his decision. I hope that by eight o'clock he will have had time to reconsider.

The Montreal region is a large one. He repeated the point I made that these measures will flood the system with cases, at a time when the system is already overloaded. In the Montreal region, there are about 200,000 appeal cases pending. Considering the number of unemployed workers today the figures for which are constantly changing because there are always new cases, some cases are dealt with and other cases come back, and so forth. I cannot give him a specific answer right now. After April 1, when these measures are implemented, it will be a disaster, and for that reason alone, I ask the hon. member to reconsider and to vote in favour of the motion.

Mr. Jean-Marc Robitaille (Terrebonne): Mr. Speaker, as far political rhetoric goes, this takes the cake. The opposition motion says: "That, in the opinion of this House, the government's policy of denying unemployment insurance benefits to workers who quit their jobs—". That is just not true. Bill C-105 contains no reference to cutting off unemployment insurance benefits to those who quit their jobs. It says "to those who leave their employment without just cause". Right from the start, this motion fails to reflect the real situation and misrepresents the facts. For these reasons I urge all members of this House to vote against the motion.

I have a short question for the hon. member. He alluded to some of my colleagues in the Conservative Party who expressed reservations about the bill. I can inform him they did so to improve the way the Unemployment Insurance Act is administered. Today, government members are making a number of very practical and valid suggestions for improving the way the Unemployment Insurance Act is implemented. What is the opposition prepared to suggest? Instead of this constant criticism, what are those members prepared to suggest to improve the Unemployment Insurance Act? Instead of criticizing and condemning this legislation, it is high time the opposition and the Liberal Party decided, once and for all, to suggest some concrete alternatives for dealing with the problems of this country.

Mr. Gagliano: Mr. Speaker, I am glad to hear the hon. member has a few questions and is critical of the wording of the motion.

Perhaps he should talk to his colleague from Jonquière, whom I quoted literally. Those are not my words. Everything in quotes was said by his colleagues and, more specifically, his colleague from Jonquière. If he does not agree with the hon. member for Jonquière, it is not my problem. My motion expresses what his colleague said. The hon. member is laughing. He just doesn't get it. His colleague from Jonquière is condemning the government. If anyone accuses me of political rhetoric, I can say it was said by a member of his own caucus. Maybe he should talk to him.

[English]

Hon. Pauline Browes (Minister of State (Employment and Immigration)): Mr. Speaker, this is the first opportunity I have had to speak in the House of Commons since being appointed to the position of Minister of State for Employment and Immigration. I am very pleased to join my colleague, the Minister of Employment and Immigration, in this ministry and I want to thank Prime Minister Mulroney for appointing me to this position.

I am pleased to respond to the motion concerning the government's policy on the unemployment insurance changes. As we know, Canada's unemployment insurance program has been in existence for some 52 years. We have offices across the country. We have excellent employees who administer this program. Canadians are really quite familiar with this program and it serves as tremendous purpose.

I suppose each of us in our own communities has heard of or knows of someone who has abused the unemployment insurance system, who simply quit because they did not want to continue to work.

Is it fair for those who pay UI premiums to support people who choose not to work? What is equally important is that the government will demonstrate that the proposed changes will be administered fairly with the benefit of the doubt continuing to be the rule of the day.

Here is the real question. Do Canadians who are working—some 12,240,000—want to support those who quit their jobs for no good reason? I believe that Canadians are fair-minded people who find it unacceptable to support those who do not want to work.

Ask Canadians who believe that UI is there for protection against unemployment and not a substitute for employment whether they believe that the amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act are too severe, too tough, unfair, extreme or unacceptable. The answer would be a resounding no.

Canadians would reply that it is unfair, tough, and unacceptable to support people who do not want to work. What is fair is to ensure that UI is there for those who need it. The government believes and has repeatedly stated in recent days that it is unfair to ask Canadians to subsidize those who quit their jobs voluntarily in what is a very tight job market today. It is even more unfair to misrepresent these changes.

As members of the House of Commons are aware, these changes to the unemployment insurance provisions affect only those who voluntarily leave their jobs without just cause or who are fired for misconduct.

Through the UI program our government remains committed, as always, to supporting those who leave their jobs with just cause. Thanks in part to the self-serving hand wringing or plain misinformation coming from certain quarters the question, of just cause is one of several areas of these constructive changes around which unjustified fears have arisen.

Just cause has always applied and will continue to apply to five specific areas set out in the UI legislation. These areas that constitute just cause include leaving a job because of discrimination on a prohibited ground of discrimination within the meaning of the Canadian Human Rights Act; an obligation to accompany a spouse: if someone is accompanying a spouse to another part of the country that is just cause; an obligation to care for a child; working conditions that constitute a clear danger to health and safety; and sexual harassment: if someone is sexually harassed in the work place and leaves his or her job that is just cause.

Just cause in cases of sexual harassment is very sensitive and is an important issue for us to discuss but one where unfounded fears have been propagated. The truth is that these changes will bring more sensitivity than ever before to the situation of people, usually women, who feel that they have been sexually harassed on the job.

We are outraged that persons are sexually harassed. Those persons who take the option of quitting will receive all the benefit of the doubt when they make a claim for UI.

The government recognizes that these new measures go further than any previous penalties imposed on volunteer quitters. The Canada Employment Centre staff members who deal with UI claimants are experienced professionals. They are sensitive to the circumstances of the situation. We know that we will have to administer these provisions with great care. I can assure my hon. colleagues that as well as drawing upon their years of experience CEC staff members will receive additional training and assistance to respond to and implement these new provisions.

To ensure that every claimant is treated fairly and equitably before the legislation becomes law all staff members will be trained in how to deal with the implementation process. The instructors will ensure that staff members understand the letter and the spirit of the legislation. Specific training will include how to process claims under the new legislation, how to zero in on the relevant facts of each situation, how to apply the principles and the practices of adjudication and how to evaluate the information when making a decision.

We know that it is not enough for staff members to simply understand the new law. It is equally important that they are aware of the sensitivities around these issues. For this reason all staff members who will work with claimants will be given awareness training in the area of human relations and to enhance understanding of claimants who fall under one of the five areas of just cause. This is particularly true in the area of sexual harassment.

I want to stress that the directive of the CEC staff is absolutely clear on the issue of sexual harassment as just cause. The guidelines for field officers state:

> In cases where all things are considered equal, the benefit of the doubt will be given to the claimant and, thus, tip the scale in his/her favour.

The directive could not possibly be clearer. This means that UI benefits will not be denied because of a dispute between an employer and an employee. When a woman goes to a UI office she will be assured of having a woman claims officer if she so wishes. It is worth noting that 75 per cent of UI claims agents are women, and that is very reassuring for the women who are making those claims.

It is also worth noting that since Bill C–21 was introduced in 1990 there has not been one written complaint about the department's administrative rulings regarding sexual harassment. In that time there has been only one appeal and that was from an employer who disagreed with approval of a sexual harassment claim. The employer lost the appeal.

Despite the impression created by the opposition's misleading claims the UI agent's role is to collect all the facts necessary to make a fair decision. The agent will first get all the information possible from the claimant and find out what steps the claimant took to remedy the situation before taking the final step of quitting his or her job. The agent will then endeavour to hear the employer's side of the story.

The evidence the agents collect will not always be clear–cut. Clearly, there will be occasions when the evidence from one side will contradict the evidence from the other and it may be impossible to tip the scales one way or the other. In such situations the agent must draw on experience, judgment and common sense to reach a conclusion. As I have already stated, the benefit of the doubt will go to the claimant. This policy applies not only to people who quit their jobs voluntarily but to those whose employers claim they were fired for misconduct.

This commitment to making a fair decision may come as a surprise to some of the opposition party members who drafted the motion before the House tonight. They would have the House believe that the UI agents accept at face value any apparent evidence which could result in a person being denied their rightful benefits. This is just not the case.

There is also a comprehensive system of appeal and other services available to a claimant who may be denied benefits. If benefits are denied the claimant is given the reason in writing. The claimant is also told how to appeal to the board of referees. A pamphlet explaining the appeals process is automatically sent to the claimant. If the claimant asks for help the Canada Employment Centre gives it willingly.

The staff will explain the reason for the decision, the appeals process and its time-frames and give advice on preparing arguments before the board of referees. Copies of the Unemployment Insurance Act regulations, court decisions and commission policy on adjudication are available to claimants at CEC offices. Claimants are not faced with an adversarial or accusatory atmosphere when they indicate why they quit their jobs.

Giving the benefit of the doubt to claimants who believe they have just cause is a firmly established tradition within the administration of the UI program.

Any member of this House or anyone else who has taken the time to actually look at the administration of the UI act would be aware that it is interpreted fairly and in favour of claimants. Now the government has, particularly in the case of sexual harassment, come out even more vigorously on the side of those who leave work with what they feel is a just cause.

To characterize these amendments as regressive or unfair to those who quit with just cause or who lose their job through no fault of their own is to do a great disservice to what are carefully considered and necessary changes to our UI program. These changes are not an attack on the unemployed. They are an attack on unemployment. The only losers will be those who choose to be unemployed, not those who are unemployed through no fault of their own.

The changes reinforce the UI program's fundamental mandate to provide Canadians with temporary income and the option of special training while looking for work. Let there be no misunderstanding. It is these Canadians, including those who leave their jobs with just cause, who deserve to remain the priority of a more focused, more cost-effective unemployment insurance program.

I believe that the opposition is doing a great disservice to the country by using this mechanism of the House to propagate erroneous and misleading information.

Mr. Ken Hughes (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, I very much appreciate the opportunity to ask questions and make very brief comments on this important issue today.

Watching what is going on here today intrigues me. It is quite clear that the Liberal Party of Canada is playing a very transparent, shallow game of shameful, partisan politics. It is shocking and not worthy of what was once a great party in this nation. It is clearly stooping to very low measures.

When I went home to my riding in Alberta after the December 2 statement by the Minister of Finance, who also happens to be an Albertan, I heard from many people about the initiatives regarding the unemployment insurance system. The remarkable thing is that the most common comment I heard was: "You mean we pay people when they quit voluntarily?" Many people did not know that. They thought that was something which should not be done.

We are talking about the unemployment insurance fund. It is not for people who choose to cease working for a company or who choose to become unemployed simply because they want to. It is an unemployment insurance fund that should be there for people during times of need. There is plenty of need out there. This government is trying to ensure that the support is there for people who need it if the time comes and they lose the opportunity to be employed. It is a question of fairness, a question that is very important.

I am glad that we are debating this matter today. I wonder if the minister could add to the comments she has already made about what circumstances there are to protect people and make sure that they are dealt with fairly under the existing provisions. Could the hon. minister respond to those concerns?

Mrs. Browes: Mr. Speaker, I welcome those comments. We had a few weeks to be back in our constituencies to hear firsthand from Canadians how they feel about various issues. I have to agree with my colleague that I received the same kinds of comments that he did in Alberta.

People were surprised that people actually got paid when they just quit their jobs. The hon. member is quite right. People are saying: "Well, listen. It is a pretty tough market out there. I value my job and I am not prepared to pay for somebody who just decides that they are going to quit".

A person who does quit his or her job for those reasons I outlined—discrimination, mobility, looking after a child, sexual harassment, unsafe conditions in the work place, health reasons—do so with just cause. If you leave your job for any of those reasons and believe you should be getting unemployment insurance, you will. An application for a claim is made to the unemployment insurance office. As I mentioned, you are entitled to have an agent of the same gender to speak to so a woman who has been sexually harassed in the work place will be able to give her story to a female agent.

The claim is made. If there is a dispute with the employer, the benefit of the doubt goes to the claimant. If there is a denial, there is an opportunity to appeal. We are finding that the vast majority of cases can be handled with the agents. A very sensitive approach is taken in our unemployment insurance offices. The public servants administering this unemployment insurance program need to be commended for their outstanding work.

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the minister could tell us what is wrong with the present restrictions imposed by this government back in 1990.

If someone quits or is let go, or quits without just cause—which is not synonymous with just reasons, what is wrong with the present law that says that you lose your unemployment insurance from seven to twelve weeks and your benefit also drops from 60 per cent down to 50 per cent for all of these borderline cases, some of which have been reversed by the Federal Court of Canada? What is wrong with the present restrictions? Why simply remove for all time unemployment insurance benefits for all of these borderline cases that are determined in our courts, a great many of which are under debate today in appeal to the Federal Court or to the Supreme Court of Canada?

Mrs. Browes: Mr. Speaker, it is interesting that the member brings this up. I was looking back at the Hansard debates at the time Bill C-21 was being debated, when the issue of just cause was being brought forward.

I notice that the members of the Liberal Party voted against the just cause issue. They voted against this being included in the bill, which I was really quite surprised about. I notice from Hansard that the member who asked the question did not vote that day. Perhaps he did not agree with his party on this issue, but the members of the opposition did not want to include just cause in Bill C-21, which is quite an unbelievable situation.

Mr. Baker: Supplementary, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I am sorry, questions and comments are now terminated. Debate, the hon. member for Timmins—Chapleau.

Mr. Cid Samson (Timmins—Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to enter into this debate to discuss the Liberal opposition day motion. For the record, in the opinion of this House the government's policy of denying unemployment insurance—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Order, please. I have just heard a comment from one of the members that the Chair is defending somebody. I am not defending anybody. The time was 10 minutes in questions and comments and she had her 10 minutes.

Mr. Samson: Mr. Speaker, I ask you to note the time on the clock and that my time would start now as opposed to a few minutes ago.

I rise in support of the Liberal opposition motion this evening because I feel that there are some great deficiencies in what the government is proposing to introduce. I would like to state for the House the wording of the motion we are debating.

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government's policy of denying unemployment insurance benefits to workers who quit their jobs or who are dismissed is "too severe", "too tough for people", "puts people in a desperate situation", "goes beyond fairness", is "extremist" and "right-wing" and is, therefore, unacceptable to the Canadian people.

It is interesting—more than anything else—to note where these quotations and adjectives came from. They came from the Quebec backbenchers of the Conservative Party. They are the members for Jonquière, Beauce and Abitibi, to name only three. There were others.

Of these three members—some of whom were here—one said: "Well, I am going to abstain from the vote". The other has risen to defend the position that we have to do something to "catch these cheaters", as they like to refer to them.

As far as I am concerned, when we talk about cheaters in a system I think we had better be very careful how we choose our words because in the majority of cases where these so-called cheaters have appealed their cases, the decisions have been overturned. In fact they were not cheaters at all.

This government, with the legislation that it is proposing to introduce at second reading, is going to cast a huge net into the ocean of workers. It might catch two fish.

Unemployment insurance is just that. It is a safety net for workers who become unemployed. They pay into it and they should expect and be entitled to get something out of it when the need is there. I do not think there are very many people in Canada who quit their jobs without just cause.

Let us talk about just cause. Is it just cause if a person wants to increase and better their lot in life by moving on to other employment? They leave their current employer and they go to another employer who perhaps is offering better opportunities for improvement, better wages, better benefits and better conditions.

Let us say an employee goes to a new employer and for some unforeseen reason is not there long enough to establish the number of weeks required to collect unemployment should the case arise. Let us say he does become unemployed. He cannot apply for unemployment under those terms because he has not been there long enough. He cannot go back and claim on the old claim from his old employer because he left without just cause. That is not covered as one of the five or six reasons for leaving for just cause. It is not covered. Shake your head all you want, but it is not there.

Employees do not have the right to try to advance themselves. Under the current conditions, they can do it because at least they will only be penalized 7 or 12 weeks. Under the other conditions, they will lose all benefits.

• (1650)

In terms of sexual harassment, the minister was here a few minutes ago and pleaded emphatically that the benefit of the doubt will go to the worker. However, for goodness' sake, what does the worker have to go through in order to state his or her case?

An hon. member: One must prove it.

Mr. Samson: Absolutely. The minister is back in the House and I am glad that she is. It is very important that we establish what it is that this worker has to go through. A person is sexually harassed by the employer. The employer sees that the employee no longer wants to co-operate with the sexual harassment and does not want to put up with it any more so he says: "You are gone. You are fired". Who fills out the separation papers? Oh my, gee whiz, it is the employer, is it not? It sure is. What do they put on there? They say: "I sexually harassed this employee and this employee no longer wanted to put up with my nonsense so I fired her for sexual harassment". Do you think the employer is going to do that? Of course not. Let us not be silly.

The employer will fill out the separation paper and write "fired". The counsellor at the employment office will look at this when the person applies for unemployment benefits and will say: "You were fired. Why were you fired?" This person now has to go through the indignation, the embarrassment and the degradation of having to bare his or her soul to a complete stranger and explain why they were fired or why they quit.

An hon. member: Shameful.

Mrs. Browes: It is embarrassing for the employer too.

Mr. Samson: The minister states that it is embarrassing for the employer. However, the onus of proof is on the employee, not the employer.

Therefore, we go through the whole appeal process which takes aeons. Ask anybody who has ever had a UI appeal. This person has to bare his or her soul again and again and again to any number of strangers. Give me a break. There is no way that a worker should have to go through that kind of indignation and embarrassment to file an unemployment insurance claim. It is insurance.

I would ask the members on the other side a question. How many constituents have come to your office and said: "I and my employer have paid into a long-term disability insurance plan and I am being deprived of it."? What do you do? You get on the phone and you start making calls on behalf of your constituent because this constituent is entitled to benefits from an insurance plan that he or she and his or her employer have paid into and you expect them to get benefits. If you say you do not expect them to get benefits, then I venture to say that you are not telling the truth. Therefore, why is it any different with unemployment insurance that people pay into?

Why are this government and these members trying to tell us that the victims of unemployment are the bad guys in all of this? They are victims. They do not want to be unemployed in most cases—in all cases as far as I am concerned—because if they quit or are fired the employer decides the reason and the employee has to prove otherwise. They are entitled to the benefits.

I held a press conference today in 130-S. I had witnesses at this press conference from my riding who have been victims of the unemployment insurance system. They have appealed the decision. Let me tell you that the whole process started last May and their first appeal was in November. That appeal has been denied. Now they have to appeal to the umpire. Their appeal, along with those of others, will go on the waiting list.

There is another case where I am entering into my second anniversary of waiting for a hearing with an umpire. These constituents are here. They are parents. They have five children and they have no income. The husband has been denied benefits. He has been denied welfare because he is on an OSAP loan. It was not a grant but a loan. He cannot collect anything. Fear not, the appeal system is there for you. Thank God there are not that many more waiting for an appeal. The fact remains there are far too many who have to wait two years for an appeal.

We had witnesses at this press conference today from Action Chômage in Montreal who brought four typical cases with them that they talked about. The people went through the appeal system and the original decision was overturned. They won the appeal.

It was asked at the press conference what the percentage was of wins and losses on appeals. They said they won about 80 per cent of them. In the meantime, the point is that people have to wait. They have no income. Also, as a result of being denied UI they are being denied welfare because the welfare system cannot subsidize UI.

One other witness there—a very important one—was the president of the unemployment insurance employees' union that represents the front line workers who have to administer these kinds of legislation. They are the ones who have to answer the constituents who come in and say they have case. The front line workers have to apologize and say their hands are tied. They have to cope with the legislation.

The minister said tonight that we should not fear. These people will be trained, coached and taught to cope and deal with these cases.

The problem is that their work force has been reduced by about 25 per cent. They are overworked. They are under extreme stress. They lose patience. They get short tempered. Let me tell you that they are people and I do not blame them. They are experiencing a lot of difficulty right now. There is massive unemployment in this country.

When we look at this piece of legislation and when we look at what is going on in the country, I think we should stop attacking the unemployed. The reason they are unemployed is thanks to the current government and its economic policies. Why does it not spend as much effort in job creation?

It wants to take shots at the unemployed. It wants to change legislation. It wants to reduce benefits from 60 per cent to 57 per cent. It is attacking the unemployed. Why does it not attack the problem of a lack of jobs?

There is another announcement from CP that they are going to lay off another 1,600. How many more companies are going to close? How many more thousands of people will be laid off?

I wonder what it is that this government really wants to do.

I heard two petitions being presented this afternoon and they interested me. One was from the Peterborough area, and one was from the Toronto area. The petitions were to encourage and ask the government to live up to its commitment of November 24 though unanimous consent in the House to seek the elimination of poverty among children. Two Conservative members tabled these petitions.

How can this government say on the one hand it is trying to eliminate poverty for children and then turn around and say that it is going to cut UI benefits for recipients from 60 per cent to 57 per cent?

What is that going to do to the buying power of those poor people who are on unemployment insurance? What is that going to do to my constituents who have five children and are losing 3 per cent? The real impact is 5 per cent.

• (1700)

In their words that means a bag of milk less or they would have to make a decision. Who is not going to eat this week?

Sounds pretty drastic. To us in this House, 3 per cent may not mean a whole lot. It might mean $20. To those people who are getting less than $300 a week, with families to support, rent to pay, it is an awful lot of money. Let us not downgrade the importance of maintaining the benefits we have.

Let me state one thing. Although I support this motion tonight, I do not forget the impact of the Liberal motion back in 1978 when the Liberals reduced benefits from 66.75 per cent to 60 per cent, with the full support of the current government. That was even more drastic than the present reduction.

We have to look at ways of trying to make things better for Canadians. We have to look at ways and means of ensuring that Canadians have an opportunity to work. The reason I am supporting this motion this evening is that these changes to UI will not do anything to create employment.

I have heard it said and I have read in Hansard from previous debates that this is a form of encouraging people to stay at work. Can you imagine, this is a form of encouraging people to stay at work because we are going to penalize them now. We are going to penalize them because they want better working conditions. They want to change jobs. They are being sexually harassed and they have to tolerate totally undesirable conditions. Now they are going to be forced to stay in those conditions.

It is true simply because of the indignation that they are going to have to go through to prove their case. You have to understand that. If you do not understand that you do not understand anything. They have got to go through the process. Tell me, show me and introduce me to an employer who will admit to sexual harassment and I will kiss your feet.

What about another case where an employee works and—

Mrs. Browes: That's not true.

Mr. Samson: Only the feet. What about the case where an employee in a unionized shop stands up for the rights of a fellow employee. He knows that his fellow employee is being discriminated against or for whatever reason, the employer is throwing a barrage of insults at him, totally uncaring about the employee's feelings. He stands up for that co-worker's rights. As a result, he gets fired. Do you think the employer is going to say on his separation slip that he stood up for the rights of his fellow employee. He is going to say: "Okay, give him his benefits". There is no way that an employer is going to admit that he or she was wrong.

I urge and I plead with all those Conservative members who believe as we do that there are strong wrongs in the language of the current Bill C-105. I urge them to support this motion to ensure that there is some fairness and some equality for unemployed workers in this country.

Mr. Jean-Marc Robitaille (Terrebonne): Mr. Speaker, I listened carefully to the comments made by my colleague from the New Democratic Party and I must say that I am very surprised by some of his statements which I consider totally unfounded and which could be misleading for the public. I heard these allegations today and I am surprised to see my colleague participate in this sort of exercise.

For example, he made a statement to the effect that a worker who is employed for a period of eight weeks, then decides to change jobs to improve his lot or for any other reason and after eight more weeks, is laid off because there is no work or for any other reason, would not be eligible for UI benefits. I ask my colleague: Is he really serious when he makes such a statement? So far as we know, this is totally unfounded. This is not a true statement; it is utterly false. I trust that the hon. member was mistaken when he said that, perhaps because he is not familiar with this issue, and did not do this intentionally. I would appreciate it if the member gave us an explanation, because this is a totally unfounded statement.

Second, there is the idea that we are after the unemployed. Earlier, my colleague said, why are you going after the unemployed? Why not tackle the problem of unemployment instead? Has my New Democrat friend forgotten that, thanks to the initiatives taken by this government since Bill C–21, more than $3 billion are now available to the unemployed in this country for training which will help them find a better job? Those are concrete measures, not just empty words. Why have we done this? We did it because we believe that unemployed workers do not necessarily want UI benefits. Rather, they want to find a good job through proper training and this is what we, as a government, are trying to provide for these workers.

I now come to the third and last point. If my colleague was serious when he talked about sexual harassment, he would not insult the victims.

Basically, what the NDP proposes as policy to fight sexual harassment is to pay unemployment insurance to the victims so that they will shut up. The NDP wants to pay those people to keep silent. If my colleague was at all serious when he talked about sexual harassment, he would ask the minister to implement a process so that from the time UI benefits are paid to a victim of sexual harassment, this process would enable us to go to the root of the problem. If the causes of this sexual harassment are not dealt with by the employer, if no corrective measures are taken, then penalties should be imposed.

It is totally revolting to use the victims of sexual harassment to oppose Bill C–105. Incidentally, when my colleague asks us to reject Bill C–105, he is also asking us to vote against his salary freeze.

Mr. Samson: Mr. Speaker, where do I begin? We are not talking about my salary here this evening; we are talking about a part of this bill. You have included this in a bill which covers several issues, in order to hide the impact of this legislation on the workers.

You asked me a question at the beginning. I am not sure if I understood well but I will try to give you an answer. If I did not understand correctly, I apologize. For several years, the person I was referring to had a job where there was discrimination of one kind or another. That person decided to change jobs to get a better quality of life, better working conditions, better wages or whatever. For one reason or another, that person was laid off at the second place of employment, before having accumulated enough weeks to be eligible for UI benefits. On the one hand, the person could not work the required number of weeks in the second job to be eligible and on the other hand that person cannot go back to the first job because of leaving it without just cause.

Mr. Robitaille: That is false.

• (1710)

Mr. Samson: Well, if it is false, I apologize, as I said, but I do not think it is false. This is the situation as it exists.

[English]

An hon. member: It carries on.

Mr. Samson: No, it does not carry on. The fact is that if he does not, he cannot qualify in the second job because he did not work long enough. He did not leave for just cause. He has to prove that he left for just cause.

It is true. We can say it is true. It is not true forever and we are not going to agree.

[Translation]

That is the reason.

[English]

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased that the hon. member for Timmins—Chapleau is supporting this motion. He gave his reasons why; because many of the quotes in the motion are quotes from hon. members of the Conservative Party. They made these quotes in their home province of Quebec and elsewhere. I think this speaks very highly of them. It means that there are some members on the other side who do care for the unemployed. To show credibility, I hope they will stand up with us tonight and vote for this motion.

I am pleased the hon. member gave the example of someone shifting to another job for a higher paying job or to improve themselves on the job. It shows he studied the motion and UI bill very carefully.

A young constituent came to me just last week. She is working in accounting. The employer very subtly is just adding on a number of hours. She is being asked to work in the evening. She is being asked to work Saturdays. She is now putting in 70 and more hours per week. She is at the stage where she wants to leave. If she does not, she may have a mental breakdown or something, the stress is so high. There is no union that will guarantee her time and a half after 40 hours. Here is a person is being forced to leave by the employer, a good worker, but she is afraid now that she will not be covered.

The minister did give us the five categories. I looked at the five categories and this person would not fall into any one of those five categories.

I wonder if the hon. member for Timmins—Chapleau sees a category that would cover this constituent who really is being harassed and persecuted by an employer, really has to leave and she will leave without any UI compensation.

Mr. Samson: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question. He is absolutely right. As we have pointed out time and time again, this is the case. One has to prove just cause.

The five conditions the minister outlined do not cover that particular case. It is going to be left up to the discretion of the counsellors when the employee applies for unemployment insurance. Those counsellors in some cases are working under a lot of stress. They are working long hours. They are trying to do their best. They have legislation. They have thousands of workers that they interview over the period of a year. They will not be able to cope. As the minister tried to indicate, they are going to give them training to cope with these situations. They are going to try to help them. It is not going to work. The people are overworked. They need more help. They need a break. They need some assistance in the legislation. They need some flexibility.

I can bring you cases, Mr. Speaker. If you want cases, I will give you cases, case after case after case, and you can settle it.

I am offering this to the minister: put your money where your mouth is. Help these people. Give some legislation. Give a break to the workers to help them. Do not sit there and try to convince us that they will be able to appeal, they will go through the system and they will qualify simply because they are trying to improve their lot in life and that will be covered under the UI bill. I am sorry, write it down. Put it in this legislation and then I will believe it, when it is written down. Until then, no deal.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, we have heard a lot of talk in the House today about how the unemployed will have a process of appeal. We heard a minister in the government defending her government's insidious attack on women and on minorities by saying if you are sexually harassed, you can lay a complaint.

They can go through the process. They can add their names to the list of 191,000 people who have already appealed under the unemployment insurance changes passed by this government only three years ago. The reality is that employees who are sexually harassed on the job often do not dare to put their careers and their futures on the line by laying a complaint.

I have a very good friend who was sexually harassed on the job. She worked for a very large multinational company in a senior position and was sexually harassed on the job on a daily basis. She went to the president of the company to lay a complaint, having documented with human resources all of the elements of harassment: including four-letter words on a regular basis, bum patting, et cetera.

When she went through the process and went to the president of her company she was told point blank: "This man is a good worker for our company. He produces and I am sorry but there is nothing I can do". That woman is now working for a different company. Her boss, who sexually harassed her on a daily basis, is still working for that company.

People might ask: Why did she not go and lay a complaint, which she had every right to do? The reason she did not lay a complaint is the same reason that there are probably women employed by members of Parliament who do not always lay complaints. They fear for their careers and want to avoid being labelled as whiners and complainers.

An hon. member: That's true.

Ms. Copps: That is what we are up against. I do not know if any men here in the House have suffered sexual harassment, but I am sure that most of the women would be able to describe specific incidents. One thing is certain. It is easy to say go ahead, lay charges and go to court, but there is no guarantee, first of all, that they will believe you. Second, if you are trying to make a career for yourself, do you want to have a reputation as a complainer?

[English]

They want to be team players. They do not always want to be the ones coming forward with complaints.

The suggestion on the government side of the House that women are protected under this legislation is absolute nonsense.

[Translation]

There are many reasons why people may have to quit their jobs. Did any members here ever have to quit their job? My father became ill and never recovered. I left my job because I was working in a city far from home and my father was dying. Was that a good reason? Should I have gone to court and waited three, six or nine months or a year to explain that I wanted to be with my father at that painful time in his life?

Some hon. members: No problem, that will be taken care of.

Ms. Copps: Some members are saying: No problem, that will be taken care of. After Bill C-21 was passed, 200,000 Canadians filed complaints, and it has taken months and months to settle them.

It is interesting to listen to the speeches of Conservative members who admit they will fight this bill to the very end, and I am thinking of the hon. member for Jonquière.

An hon. member: Oh, he is a real sob sister.

Ms. Copps: He said it was like using a sledge hammer to crack a nut, the nut being the average citizen. When the hon. member for Saint-Léonard proposed this motion, it was intended to highlight suggestions made by Conservative members during the parliamentary recess.

• (1720)

The Conservative member for Beauce said that MPs should attack the conditions that create unemployment and not the unemployed. I agree. We must attack the causes and not the victims. The Conservative member for Abitibi again said that he would abstain. He can be for or against, but he should have the courage to take a stand. Otherwise Mr. Speaker, he will remind me of a little dog that barks, but when the time comes, cannot bite. He is a little lapdog. The member is a little lapdog who cannot say either yes—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. The hon. member for Terrebonne on a point of order.

Mr. Robitaille: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Hamilton East has just called my colleague a dog and a lapdog. You should consider that unparliamentary. I would ask you to ask the member to withdraw what she just said.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): On the same point of order, the hon. member for Saint-Denis.

Mr. Prud'homme: Mr. Speaker, we must not exaggerate. I was here. I listened closely to the hon. member. She did not say what the hon. member for Terrebonne just said. What she said may not be nice, but it is certainly not against the rules. She did not say that the hon. member was a dog. She has too much respect for all members. She said that he reminded her of a barking dog. That is not the same and it is certainly not unparliamentary. I admit that it may be embarrassing for the one who is the subject of the comparison, but it is not unparliamentary.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): On the same point of order, the hon. member for Abitibi.

Mr. Saint-Julien: Mr. Speaker, further to what the member said, I want to tell Canadians that I do not listen to criticism from people who have a bad attitude.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): On the same point of order, the hon. member for Richelieu.

Mr. Plamondon: Mr. Speaker, it is quite rare for me to fully agree with my colleague from Montreal who just spoke, but this time I fully agree, and no doubt—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I am sorry, the hon. member for Richelieu has too much parliamentary experience for me to take his remark, which is not a point of order.

[English]

Mr. Shields: Mr. Speaker, with great respect, we have all learned in this House to recognize that the member for Hamilton East does not live by the criticisms she makes of others.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Would the hon. member for Hamilton East have something to add?

Ms. Copps: Yes. I do not want to insult dogs. I take back everything that has to be taken back.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Ms. Copps: I think first of all that we absolutely must talk about it and deal with this issue. The reason I mentioned the comments of the members for Abitibi and Jonquière and others is that I was glad to see when Parliament was recessed that some Conservative members were going to join us in solidarity to fight this bill which is so unjust. Several of them—perhaps even a dozen—were going to vote against the government, but now that they have the opportunity here in the House, they do not have the courage to take a stand for or against. That is the important thing. The members for Abitibi and Jonquière cannot be professional crybabies. They must be here to do their duty for the unemployed.

[English]

The member says I am on my broom. When I read in the paper that members on the government side were coming to their senses and recognizing that this particular law penalizes women and the under-employed I was very happy to hear that at least six, eight, or possibly a dozen members of the Conservative Party might break ranks to join us in opposing this legislation.

An hon. member: Dream on.

Ms. Copps: The member says dream on. That is true, because one of the members who was the chief spokesperson of those in the Conservative Party seeking change has wilted before our very eyes.

He now tells us that he is not going to be for this amendment and he is not going to be against it, that he is going to abstain. I say to Conservative members that on this issue they either line up with the workers or ride with General Motors, to paraphrase a great Liberal who understood Liberal principles. On this issue, I am happy that my party can absolutely and categorically disassociate itself from the comments and attitude of the minister of employment.

An hon. member: They cannot have it both ways.

Ms. Copps: The minister of employment said:

[Translation]

"Some people want to vacation in Florida and I do not want to pay them for that." Another member, this one from Montreal, said right out that he had seen unemployed people from Quebec cash their UI cheque in Florida.

An hon. member: That's impossible.

Ms. Copps: Well, if it is true, they should charge them under the Criminal Code. That is fraud. If they have evidence, they should declare it instead of politicking. In Montreal, they say openly and on the record that they are totally against this bill. Then they come back here but stay away when the time to vote comes.

[English]

What is really sad about this initiative is that when the government introduced its economic statement we were looking for a new economic direction. We know right now that Canada has the highest level of unemployment of the G-7 countries. We know that the number of chronic unemployed in this country, the long-term unemployed, has doubled to almost a million people, 806,000.

We also know that the number of part-time workers who would like to work full time and who want to work has increased from 400,000 to almost 700,000. Therefore, the issue is not about penalizing those people who may have to leave a job for good reason but about creating an economic climate in which people who want to work have the right to work.

When the Minister for International Trade commented in the House of Commons on the 10,000 people in my area who have lost their jobs as a direct result of his bad negotiations he did not attack the source. He did not attack the unfair complaint levelled by the United States. He blamed the Canadian workers. He blamed the Canadian workers who he characterized as being unproductive and behind the times.

The Steel Company of Canada, the largest steel company in Canada, happens to be one of the most productive companies in the whole area of steel manufacturing, no thanks to this government. It is a result of the hard work of ordinary people and the policies of the previous Liberal government, which paved the way for modernization.

It sickens me that when the Prime Minister is going to Washington this week, and he should be equipped with the facts to protect Canadian jobs, his own Minister for International Trade is undermining our position before the ITC and is undermining our international position in that area.

The hard part is that it reflects a mentality. The minister of employment characterizes the unemployed as people who want to spend all their time in front of the TV or go to Florida and do nothing. The Minister for International Trade blames the workers for his lack of judgment in the free trade negotiations. This evening, another minister said that women would have every recourse in the appeal process for cases involving sexual harassment. That is false.

All we want from the Conservative members tonight is that they face reality, namely that the failure of their economic policies has brought us to this situation. The unemployed cannot be blamed. We must blame those who are responsible.

• (1730)

I am happy, that the members of the Bloc Quebecois, as well as the NDP, will be joining us this evening, especially because I am wondering if their leader protested when this government of which he was a minister introduced Bill C-21.

An hon. member: He did.

Ms. Copps: Did he speak against it?

An hon. member: Yes.

Ms. Copps: He did not do a thing at the time, because he was a minister in the government that introduced the first batch of bad changes to the unemployment insurance policy.

Bloc Quebecois members were even there for the vote, as I recall: Mrs. Venne, Mr. Plamondon, Mr. Leblanc, every one was there. They all voted in favour, and I am happy they have changed their policy. I hope that, with them and all the hon. members, we can all vote together. Let the whiners, if they are through whining, come and vote with us this evening to make sure that unemployed men and women cannot be blamed for our current economic situation.

Mr. Gilles Bernier (Beauce): Mr. Speaker, I would like to start by pointing out that members opposite—regardless of their affiliation, opposition members—have put my name forward as the member for Beauce who has taken a stand against Bill C-105, dealing with certain measures regarding unemployment insurance.

I must tell members right away, to dispel any concern or fear, that tonight I intend to vote against the motion in amendment of the opposition. Allow me to tell you why, Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member for Richelieu could find it in him to be polite and listen, because for one thing the wording of the motion is completely wrong, and I will explain why.

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government's policy of denying unemployment insurance benefits to workers who quit their jobs—

They have failed to specify, as the legislation does, "who quit their jobs without just cause". That is not mentioned in the motion.

Second, they add:

> —or who are dismissed is "too severe",—

They omitted "or dismissed for misconduct". That little phrase is extremely important. They go on to talk about a policy too tough for people, that puts people in a desperate situation and goes beyond fairness—> —is "extremist" and "right-wing" and is, therefore, unacceptable to the Canadian people.

This motion is not aimed at improving this bill. My position is quite simple.

Over the past week, the Conservative members who are dissenting on certain aspects of the bill, have managed—the hon. member for Hamilton East can tell me if we were right as far as that is concerned—to call a special party caucus, a special meeting with senior officials and to defer second reading of the bill in the House of Commons for a week. It was essential to allow members of Parliament to sit down with those who devised this bill and to help improve it.

My concerns and reservations about this bill are still here. This evening we will simply be voting on a motion specifically designed to overthrow the government.

I am not interested in overthrowing this government. I am interested in improving a bill. Therefore, I will vote against it with pleasure. I am perfectly comfortable with that. I mentioned it to the media, at home, this morning and again at lunch time, and the reaction was: "Well, Mr. Bernier, you are absolutely right. Let us give them a chance to improve their bill." Would the hon. member for Hamilton East not say so?

I will never vote for the Leader of the Opposition and his party. I know his track record too well for that.

Ms. Copps: Mr. Speaker, this reminds me of those people who say: "Sure, I have strong principles, but if these do not suit you, I have others." What the hon. member said today runs directly counter to what he said on January 15, 1993, when he told—

An hon. member: Listen to this.

Ms. Copps: —the press: "Elected members of Parliament must strive to tackle the underlying causes of unemployment instead of attacking the unemployed." We must attack the cause, not the victim. Today he has an opportunity—

Mr. Saint-Julien: Not Liberals and bitches.

Ms. Copps: —to stop attacking the unemployed, but he will not take it. Why? Because he is a yes-man and a whiner and will not stand up for his principles. If I am wrong, he should at least support this motion which sends a clear message and repeats what was said by his own colleague, the hon. member for Jonquière, who now claims they do not make sense.

Those words were taken directly from a statement by the hon. member for Jonquière. If he has any trouble with reading or pronunciation, he should talk to his friend, the hon. member for Jonquière, who made all the statements reproduced today in the motion. It says clearly and distinctly that we are against this bill because this policy is "too severe" and "too tough", "puts people in a desperate situation", "goes beyond fairness", is "extremist" and "right wing" and is therefore unacceptable to the Canadian people.

[English]

If the member finds fault with the wording of the resolution he should find fault with his colleague, the member for Jonquière, who actually spoke these very words only two weeks ago.

Mr. Plamondon: Mr. Speaker, I heard the hon. member for Abitibi use a term that was entirely uncalled for. He said: "Not Liberals and bitches", while looking at the hon. member who had the floor. I think such language is unacceptable, and the hon. member should withdraw.

Mr. Saint-Julien: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. You can check the blues. I have nothing to withdraw. When I referred to "chiennes", we can talk about a "chienne de travail", which is something you wear at work. A "chienne de travail" is a smock. The hon. member, however, is never in the House, so he does not know the meaning of the word "work".

Mr. Plamondon: Mr. Speaker, that is pretty far-fetched. What connection is there between a smock and this debate?

As far as my attendance is concerned, I have been here every time the House was sitting. I think my attendance compares favourably with his. In any case, the kind of language he used in referring to a great lady like the hon. member who was addressing the House is entirely unacceptable.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): In any case, if these terms were used, they were part of an aside, and I did not hear them from my chair. We will check as soon as we have the blues.

Mr. Jean-Marc Robitaille (Terrebonne): Mr. Speaker, as far as inappropriate language is concerned, I must say I deplore the terms used by the hon. member for Hamilton East, and I wanted to repeat what I said before. I know that in the past the hon. member for Hamilton East did not appreciate certain things that were said on this side of the House. I would have thought that subsequently she would have set a good example.

The hon. member for Hamilton East says we are doing nothing to fight unemployment. Is the hon. member aware that in 1983, her Liberal government spent $225 million on manpower training? Ten years later, this government is spending more than $3.5 billion on training. These are specific measures to fight unemployment which benefit the unemployed, so we are not just giving them an unemployment insurance cheque. The Liberals would rather keep people on unemployment insurance, give them cheques and keep them poor, because people are easier to exploit that way.

However, this government has decided to provide the programs and resources to help people who often have trouble entering the job market owing to a lack of training. We have allocated the necessary funding and resources to give them that chance. That is a concrete measure that was not mentioned by the hon. member for Hamilton East. That is all I have to say.

Ms. Copps: Mr. Speaker, I remember that during my first year in the House, the first thing this government did was to cut the unemployment insurance program by 30 per cent. The last year the Liberals were in power, the unemployment insurance fund had $1.3 billion, and the first thing the former finance minister did was to cut it down to $700 million.

This works out to a 30 per cent cut, at a very difficult time for Canadian workers. Enough of these falsified figures. The fact is that 30 per cent of the cuts were already right there in the farmer minister's first budget in 1985.

Mr. Robitaille: Mr. Speaker, a point of order. The hon. member accused me of falsifying figures, but I want to make it clear that these are official figures and that I could table them at any time in the House of Commons.

[English]

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, I would normally be pleased to participate in a debate in this House but I am not so sure about what is going on here today.

When I hear the volatile language going back and forth, I cannot help but wonder if there are people across Canada who are unemployed today, what they think about what they have been listening to here. They would be pretty destitute to be still listening, given the level of discussion that we have been hearing.

I do not know what this motion is doing, taking up a day in the House. I cannot help but see this motion as nothing but a cynical exercise in mischief making by our friends on the other side. Reportedly the motion includes quotes from a member of this side of the House who articulated some concerns with respect to proposed legislation. I would have thought it was the right and responsibility of that member.

The member raising the discussions has sat down with the minister responsible and discussed the proposed legislation which I would remind this Chamber has not even come before this House. That member of Parliament should be commended for speaking publicly and strongly about areas of concern that he has articulated. I am sure, when the legislation comes to this House, it will be very significantly improved because of the initiative of that member and other members in coming forward with their concerns.

What about this motion? How many people will this motion put back to work? Perhaps it is going to provide a day's employment for all the people here today, but that is not going to be of much benefit to Canadian taxpayers. There are a lot of serious issues which I would have thought an opposition that was genuinely concerned about this country might well have brought forward for debate today.

As I listen day after day in Question Period, those members are reaching in all directions, trying to convince Canadians that the country is falling down around us, notwithstanding the fact that this is probably the finest place in the world to live. Most of us are proud to be Canadians. Most people in Canada are anxious to find employment opportunities, if they do not have them. Most unemployed people are pleased to have the opportunities that are created through some of the measures of active unemployment insurance which this government has brought forward in the last few years, measures, I might say, that were opposed by my friends opposite.

I am sure members from every single riding are delighted to assist people in their communities to take advantage of section 25 programs, for example, which provide good work opportunities for unemployed people and the training and various other programs which have been made available through the Labour Force Development Strategy. They take full advantage of these programs in their ridings and then come here and scoff them.

The fact that the Liberal Party has brought forward this motion today is not only a manifestation of its mischief making but quite frankly, a manifestation of the bankruptcy of its own intellectualism and lack of substantive policies to bring forward to this House today.

We saw that when watching the Leader of the Opposition. I am looking forward over the next few months to seeing his policy pronouncements. He made one the other day that was a real winner. He told us that after two years today, he is going to scrap the GST. Then he told us that maybe he will not scrap the GST, maybe he will modify it. Then the next day, he will say, I guess the GST has got to stay. Now we have the definitive announcement that the GST is going.

Stay tuned, folks. One of these days, if he gets to be Prime Minister—that is a fantasy idea if ever there was one—he will tell us in his first budget where he is going to get the $15 billion, $16 billion, $17 billion worth of revenue that the GST is providing. Stay tuned, folks, we can have only one idea a year. That is it for now. Scrap the GST. It will take him another year to come up with an idea of what on earth we are going to do to replace it.

If we believe what we read in the news, what he is going to replace it with is a hidden tax on food. That is kind of a neat idea. It will go over really well, I am sure, with people from coast to coast. If my friends opposite were seriously interested—

Mr. Wappel: You're being a hypocrite, Peter.

An hon. member: They are scared, Peter.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. McCreath: Mr. Speaker, I thought I had the floor and I say to my hon. friends: withdraw.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. I ask the hon. member for Scarborough West to show more restraint. I heard the word hypocrite and I believe this expression to be unparliamentary.

Does the hon. member for Scarborough West wish to add anything else?

[English]

Mr. Wappel: If your ruling, Mr. Speaker, is that that is an unparliamentary term, then I of course withdraw it. I will let the people of Canada decide when they go to McDonald's and pay GST on their food to reflect on the comments of the hon. member.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I appreciate the hon. member's reaction.

I now recognize the hon. member for South Shore.

[English]

Mr. McCreath: Mr. Speaker, I was not at all offended by my friend's little bit of enthusiasm. I was digging a little bit too close to home with my comments. That might have been the problem.

In any event, to get back to the subject, since we have the subject of unemployment insurance before the House today, we might as well try to talk a little bit seriously about it. My friends opposite have made a great deal of noise about the whole business of voluntary quitters, for example, and sexual harassment.

I have not seen exactly how many cases have been brought in the area of sexual harassment. I understand it is a very limited number. What is important when we look at this issue is that we remember that what is exempted from that is the concept of just cause.

I believe the Minister of State in her remarks made reference to this question. Having sat many months on the committee on Bill C–21 and travelled coast to coast to hear a lot of people come before that committee and express their concerns with respect to the need for a definition of just cause, the committee, and I might say to give credit where credit is due on the initiative of the member for Ottawa West, brought forth an amendment. When that amendment which provided for that definition came before this House, what did my friends opposite do? They voted against it.

Earlier I heard the member for Hamilton East talk about members over here abstaining. She said, and I quote her directly: "You have either got to line up with the workers or with General Motors". When it came before this House to define this concept, where was she? She abstained or at least she did not vote for it. She did not vote against it. I have it here, the amendment and the definition. I guess she did not line up either with the workers or with General Motors on that particular occasion. It will be interesting to see when the legislation comes forth again where she lines up.

Why are changes needed? What is unemployment insurance? What has unemployment insurance become in this country? Originally the idea was to provide assistance to people should they lose their unemployment unexpectedly to tide them over financially until such time as they could find a new job. It is insurance in the unanticipated event of unemployment. In fact, unemployment insurance in Canada has gone away beyond that.

I remember some years ago when I was active in the teaching profession in the early seventies when changes were brought forward that allowed leave from your employment for a maternity benefit. It was something that was very much welcomed by the teaching profession which at that time was about 52 per cent women. It was a welcome benefit.

It really went against the concept of unemployment because the minute we start paying unemployment insurance to somebody who is on a leave of absence from their job, we have gone long beyond the concept of insurance against unemployment. There are a number of other circumstances for which unemployment insurance is paid to people. I guess we have to admit that what has happened in our society is that we have taken what was supposed to be an insurance scheme and really turned it into an income security scheme.

There are large sections of the country, like the one from which I come in Atlantic Canada, where in fact people who are employed part time for part of the year manage to sustain themselves and have their income supported in part by unemployment insurance throughout other parts of the year. This, of course, is true in the fishing industry where people cannot fish all year round, by decree of the government. That is how unemployment insurance got into the fishery in the first place. The government which ran the fishery closed it from time to time. Then, to make up for the fact that it was the government that would not let people work, it allowed them to draw unemployment insurance.

Now we have a whole scheme of unemployment insurance in the fishing industry. There are problems with that. I have had a number of people who know that I represent a constituency with a substantial number of people in the fishing industry say to me: Well, fishermen can go out and make a lot of money for a part of the year and then still be eligible to draw unemployment insurance, and that is not right. Certainly if a person makes a lot of money it is questionable whether they should be drawing unemployment insurance.

I think the point should be made in this House that there are an awful lot of fishermen in Nova Scotia who are eligible but do not draw unemployment insurance because they say their income is at a level where they should not. There are an awful lot of fishermen and plant workers who are seasonally employed who need that unemployment insurance in order to get by.

That is the way the thing has become. If we are going to have a scheme like this, should it be one that provides incentives or should it be one that provides disincentives? This is an issue that is often raised. I frequently have been approached by Christmas tree growers in my constituency who say they cannot get anybody to work, that they would rather sit home and draw unemployment insurance. That may be true or that may not be true, I cannot comment on that because I do not know. I do know that they would not come to my office if they were able to find people willing to work. Yet there are people in the same area who are in fact on unemployment insurance. Clearly there are problems with the system. It needs to be improved.

One of the improvements that this government made which I think is extremely important was the gradual shift of the concept from strictly a passive unemployment insurance system to an active one; the notion that somebody who was unemployed should just sit home until such time as they get a job. They visit the employment agency looking for work, but in the meantime they do not have an opportunity to improve their skills or develop further experience that will assist them to relocate themselves within the employment system. That lateral approach to me is a good one. That was the concept behind Bill C-21. Today we hear people talk, sometimes even from the other side of this House, about the need for adjustment programs as we as a country come to grips with the structural changes that are taking place in the world.

Some parties in this House do not want to acknowledge those changes, but the fact is they are there. This government has tried to move Canada toward the 21st century. That is why we have had the initiatives in the area of trade that are so debunked across the aisle. That is why we have restructured the Canadian tax system to improve the productivity and the competitiveness of Canadian industry.

Another element of that is providing support for employment adjustment for the people who, as my friends like to tell us on a daily basis, have had their employment disrupted or indeed lost because of the changes in international competition in marketing and selling in business and so forth. This move toward active unemployment, providing opportunities for people to prepare themselves for opportunities that will exist in the future, is the direction in which we need to go. We think this approach of constantly opposing, opposing, opposing is a sort of head in the sand approach that does not make any more sense than the approach they have taken with respect to coming to grips with world trade and with the need to move our economy in a more competitive direction.

That is the reality of the situation. The approach that this government has taken with respect to unemployment insurance is quite consistent with this concept of trying to make the system work to assist and support Canadians to prepare them for the 21st century.

The reality is that we have been through a real tough recession. A recession means that everybody has less money to work with and the government is right in there with everybody else. Government revenues are down and unemployment rises during a recession. That is a reality of the situation, not a pleasant reality but it is a reality. More people unemployed means more draw on the unemployment insurance system.

What the Minister of Finance was faced with a couple of months ago when he brought in his economic statement was how we would pay for that. I know our friends opposite oppose every cost-cutting measure made by the government. They come up with a thousand ways the government should spend more money but they are a little bit short when it comes to ideas as to where the government gets the money to spend.

We know what the current Leader of the Opposition did when he was President of the Treasury Board. He did not worry about it. In the two years he held that office he managed to hold rising government spending to a mere 29 per cent, a record of which he was quite proud. I may have to check my math but I do not think government expenditures have grown 29 per cent since this government has been in power. The average growth is about 4 per cent. My math may be a little off but actually I think that is pretty darn close.

We know that the solution of the Leader of the Opposition to these problems is to not worry about it. Just like scrapping the GST. I love that one. Scrap the GST and some time in the future we will figure out where to get the money. That is not the approach this government takes.

This government's approach is if expenditures go up such as the draw on unemployment insurance, we deal with it either by holding the line on expenditures or by increasing the premiums. That is what insurance companies do, is it not? This is supposed to be an insurance scheme, though as I said earlier it has also become an income support scheme.

One of the things this government felt would stimulate small business and would help the regeneration of our economy coming out of this recession is of course to try to make more money available to the business community by holding the line on UI premiums. That meant there had to be some cost-cutting measures.

I received a letter today from a gentleman by the name of Ron Burgess of Rose Bay, Nova Scotia. I have never met Mr. Burgess but he writes me frequently. I have to say in fairness and honesty to him he is usually pretty critical of me and the government and that is his right as a citizen. I always write him back because he usually has a good point and I try to present our point of view.

In his letter he was scorching me pretty good because he said we were cutting back the unemployed with this proposal to reduce the percentage from 60 per cent to 50 per cent. What Mr. Burgess does not understand and what a lot of people across Canada do not understand is that the amount of money to be received by the unemployed is not being reduced at all because the contribution ceiling is going up and the percentage drops a little bit. The net result is that the recipient gets the same amount of money.

That is called a freeze and the government has imposed a freeze on wages and salaries in the Public Service of Canada, on members of Parliament and indeed on the Prime Minister.

I was accused of nasty things by my colleague opposite. The fact of the matter is it is kind of bizarre when the people receiving payments from the Government of Canada but are not working get an increase and the wages of those working for the Government of Canada are frozen. Now is there or is there not a freeze?

Mr. Harvard: What is the difference in pay?

Mr. McCreath: My hon. friend from Winnipeg—St. James asks as to what is the difference in pay. Well obviously there is a substantial difference in pay. One understands and recognizes that. That is why the ceiling on UI grows on an annual basis.

I think it is important that we try to convey to the public the truth of what is going on and not try to mislead or distort the reality of the situation. When we talk about moving from 60 per cent to 57 per cent it is important at the same time to point out the rise in the ceiling so that people will understand what is actually taking place with respect to this situation.

The issue of fairness comes up and we hear a lot of talk about fairness. Is this fair? The proposed changes I would suggest are fair. They are fair in that they represent but one element of the minister's measures to restrain the deficit and finance new initiatives. They are fair in that they help to free up money for activities such as training and development for unemployed workers. They are fair to employers who will be able to hire new workers thanks to the UI premium holiday for small business. They are fair to premium payers who cannot be expected, particularly in these tough times, to support people who choose not to work. They are fair as well to future UI premium payers who without these changes would have confronted an extra $1 billion of UI deficit, a deficit which can only be paid up in the final analysis with their premiums. I would suggest that there is quite an element of fairness.

I would like to say a few words on the issue of voluntary quitters about which there has been so much discussion. There have been a lot of misconceptions sent across the land about this issue—is that all the time I have? What a shame, I am doing so well.

• (1800)

I want to reiterate what many of my colleagues have said. Voluntary quitters who quit with just cause will not be penalized by these proposed measures. Any suggestions to the contrary are mischief making. When my hon. friend from Scarborough West accuses me of hypocrisy I would suggest that one take a look in the mirror. If anybody is suggesting that people who quit with just cause will be imperilled by this legislative proposal they are wrong. The reasons are spelt out in the act. The Liberal Party voted against them. There have been a multitude of decisions by the Supreme Court of Canada and the Federal Court listing reasons. There are 50 pages of valid reasons, of just cause spelt out and binding.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): We now move to questions and comments for 10 minutes. First I will recognize the hon. member for Laurier—Sainte-Marie and then the hon. member for Winnipeg North.

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, I want to raise three points briefly so that my colleague can make more elaborate comments on Bill C-105.

First, it seems that work relations are somewhat ignored in this legislation, and this is evidenced in a letter sent by the bar to the Minister of Finance which says: "The outright denial of the right to benefits in all cases where workers voluntarily quit their job without just cause in the legal sense or in cases of misconduct would show a lack of realism regarding the conflictual situations that occur in the context of work relations." This is what the Quebec bar had to say.

Second, I want to submit the case of a CIP worker in Trois-Rivières, for example, who, after working and contributing to the UI program for 25 years, loses his job because the plant closes down. This worker does not want to be unemployed, he knows he must find a job. He does find a job by chance—I mean by chance—and works for three or four days before quitting because the work conditions are really not suitable for him. He then goes to the unemployment insurance office where he is told: "You quit your job, therefore you are not entitled to benefits." Do you not think that because of situations like this people will say: "I am not taking any chances; I would rather be getting UI benefits than make an effort to find a job and risk losing it all"?

My last point is this. It seems to me this bill is an example of two types of justice. Here is why. People accused of misconduct or of leaving without just cause are automatically denied any benefits. Therefore, these people are sentenced before being judged. They will have to appeal the decision and it will take weeks if not months before they are told that they were right or wrong. The sentence is imposed before a judgment is rendered.

Under the Criminal Code or the civil code, a person is not sentenced before judgment. For example, there are a number of Conservative members accused or convicted of fraud who still get their full salary and enjoy all their privileges because a judgment has yet to be rendered or because they have appealed the verdict.

Is the member not a little uncomfortable since, on the one hand, he wants to arbitrarily cut off thousands of workers, while on the other hand he is sitting here in this House next to people who have been accused and convicted of fraud and who still receive their full salary? Is this not an example of two kinds of justice, one for the rich and one for the poor?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I ask the hon. members to be cautious when they refer to events or issues which are still before the courts. Again I recognize the member for Laurier—Sainte-Marie.

Mr. Duceppe: Mr. Speaker, I want to point out that I did not mention any names. Those are established facts and I did not presume that these people were innocent or guilty. Consequently, in no way have I violated the sub judice rule. Absolutely not.

Therefore, I believe my comments were pertinent because they refer to facts.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I take note of the comment made by the hon. member but the Chair does not want to take any chance and is simply advising members to be careful in this respect.

Mr. Robitaille: Mr. Speaker, I wish to point out to the Chair that my colleague did suggest that some members had been convicted of fraud and were still sitting in this House. This is absolutely not true.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I do not want this issue to drag on. I believe what I said earlier puts an end to this discussion. I simply want to say that it is a matter of being cautious and, as far as the Chair is concerned, the comment made by the member for Laurier—Sainte-Marie ended the debate.

[English]

Mr. McCreath: Mr. Speaker, I think I understood the intent of the hon member for Laurier—Sainte-Marie in that he was trying to illustrate his argument.

I noticed his reference to Bill 105, which in my understanding is not what is before the House. I too picked up his reference to purported allegations against members of this House and in particular, the reference he made to members of this party.

Some would suggest that there are many kinds of impropriety, one being to run for public office under the banner of a political party that stands for a strong united Canada, then walk away from that party, draw a cheque and represent a party that seeks to destroy and take apart this country. Some would suggest that is a fraudulent activity. I will not say that because I would not want to transgress the rules of this House.

I want to deal with the issue that my hon. friend raised. I think all members of this House are concerned about the fact that just cause is a meaningless concept if, when individuals leave for what they believe to be just cause, in fact end up not receiving the benefit to which they are entitled.

As I indicated earlier, my colleague from Ottawa West of the Liberal Party brought forward an amendment to Bill C-21. It was a good amendment in my judgment and I supported it, unlike her colleagues. It set out a series of categories. Since that time, we have had an abundance of decisions, 50 pages of decisions. I would be glad to make a copy of this available to my hon. friend who is raising what are legitimate concerns from his perspective.

These are binding definitions provided by the court. There are 50–odd different ones covering a tremendous variety of topics, which I would be glad to delineate for the record. Members may as well avail themselves of a copy because it is very interesting. The important thing is that we recognize what is here. If the system does not work, then we challenge it.

If people leave their jobs for a legitimate reason, then they should be supported. If they do not get satisfaction from their CEIC office, I would hope, if nothing else, they would go to see their member of Parliament and complain. Part of the function of a member of Parliament is to see that individuals get fair treatment from the system. That is what we are here about, however let us not throw the baby out with the bathwater.

I want to tell members that I have many constituents on the south coast of Nova Scotia who think that people who decide that they want to quit their jobs to go home and do something else, or as the minister suggested, go somewhere else, it is not on. It is not what the system is for. The system is to protect people who lose their jobs who do not want to lose their jobs. It is the voluntary quitter that is key. Just cause is a different ballgame altogether, and let us not forget it.

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a very short comment and pose a few questions.

When 19,000 of 191,000 UI applicants who were initially held to have quit their jobs without just cause subsequently were found to have just cause, could we accept a 10 per cent error in the magnitude of error in judgment? Could we? Is it fair?

Second, I ask the hon. member if it is fair that years of prior contribution by the employee will go down the drain under the clause without just cause. Is it fair? Is it fair that the burden of proof will be on the workers who cannot avail themselves of representatives and perhaps lawyers to argue their cases before a quasi-judicial tribunal. Is it fair?

Is it fair that the balance of power will be tilted to favour the employers and to the detriment of the employees? I ask: Does this member know how much it would cost to administer this particular change in the UI act?

Mr. McCreath: Mr. Speaker, I am not sure how much time I have to respond but I will certainly do my best.

With respect to the first point, and I am not sure exactly what he is talking about, but if the appeal process turned around 19,000 of them, then one must conclude that maybe the appeal process works. Maybe some others might conclude something else.

• (1810)

As for the business of prior contribution, every year I pay a considerable amount of money buying myself auto insurance. My wife thinks that with the way I drive it is a darn good investment.

I hope to never collect a nickel of it. I hope I never have to collect my life insurance either. The bottom line is that we pay into insurance schemes with the hope that we will never collect a claim from them. The system must be a fair one. My hon. friend from Winnipeg North may find that his constituents totally disagree and they think that anyone who wants to quit his or her job should be able to draw unemployment insurance to the end. That is fine if that is what his constituents think. It is not what mine think.

My constituents think that people who quit their jobs voluntarily should not be eligible for unemployment insurance. That is what my constituents think. As for the question of prior contributions, it is similar to any other insurance premiums. I pay and I think most people pay hoping not to collect.

I want to comment on his allegation that the balance of power is with the employer. That is a tough concept to deal with. How do I know that is true? How do I know that is not true? I do not. My hon. friends would have it so that people would walk into the office and say: "My boss sexually harassed me and he or she is guilty". There would be implied guilt to the employer with no opportunity to respond. It would be automatic. If someone walks in and says it is sexual harassment or any of the litany of other reasons it is supposed to be taken on faith. Nobody would ever scam the unemployment insurance system, would they? Everybody who goes in tells the absolute unequivocal truth. Why should there be a process to hear the other side of the story?

I do not know, maybe my hon. friends are against that. It is the same with the concept of the burden of proof. Is there not some expectation that if we are going to make allegations against others we should be able to sustain them? I submit that we should.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, in this motion we condemn this Conservative government—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but I want to be informed. Will he split his time with another member?

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, excuse me. I am splitting my time with the hon. member for Kenora—Rainy River. I will speak for 10 minutes and then there will be a five minute period for questions and comments and then my colleague will do the same.

We are condemning the Conservative government in this motion for its proposal to completely deny unemployment insurance benefits to those who quit their jobs supposedly—I emphasize the word supposedly—without just cause. The government would completely deny unemployment insurance benefits to those who are fired supposedly with just cause.

This is where I take issue with the Conservative member who just spoke. If workers who have left their jobs can prove that they quit the job for just causes then they will get their unemployment insurance benefits. If people who are fired can prove that they were fired without just cause, for frivolous reasons, then they would get unemployment insurance benefits as well.

What is the problem? The problem is that workers who leave their jobs or who are fired are presumed to be guilty. They are presumed to have quit without just cause or to have been fired fairly. Workers then have the burden of proof. They must go through the very costly and time consuming appeals process to prove that they really had just cause. This could mean that the average delay may be two to three months.

People may have just cause for leaving a job. They might leave because of a personality conflict or a very subtle type of harassment, and not necessarily sexual harassment. It could be for a great number of reasons. It is not always completely black and white. They have just cause but they are presumed to be guilty as soon as they leave the job. They must go before the board of referees, which is a costly and time consuming process, and they then have two to three months with no benefits at all until they are able to prove just cause.

It is for this reason that we condemn the government. We think that completely denying benefits to people in that sort of situation is an excessively cruel and unnecessary penalty. I will go on to show it is also counterproductive economically.

I want to mention that in the package the government put forward in the economic statement before Christmas it is also reducing the benefits from 60 per cent to 57 per cent. We are at a time of excessively high double-digit unemployment for over a year and it brings in these kinds of measures which are against the unemployed. It makes it much more difficult for the unemployed. Benefits are reduced and it is much harder for those who are forced to leave their jobs and who are fired unfairly.

So that the Canadian public can be informed, we should point out that there have always been penalties in the law for those who totally abuse the system, who leave their jobs without just cause, or who are fired for misbehaviour. The penalty when we were in government was of one to six weeks and the average penalty that was given was usually about two or three weeks. This meant with the two-week waiting period there were about five weeks if you left your job without cause.

In Bill C-21, which we opposed, this Conservative government in 1990 increased that penalty from seven to twelve weeks. We opposed that for the same reasons we are opposing this. This is excessively harsh. We said that penalty was excessive. This penalty is excessive as well, especially when you consider that just cause is not always totally black and white. It is very often in the grey area and it is often difficult to prove. Because it is in a grey area and difficult to prove, to completely deny unemployment insurance benefits to those who have paid contributions for years and years is unfair, harsh and unacceptable.

We can all think of situations where you are working in a large shop, in a factory, or in a plant and you have a personality conflict with the boss, your superior. He is making you do this, picking on you, asking you to do things perhaps beyond the job description. A large number of people in this country do not have unions to fight for them. In a situation like that, finally the person quits. He is psychologically burned out, beaten down, and he quits. He is denied unemployment insurance under this law. First of all he goes to the Canadian Employment Commission and says he really had just cause and starts to prove his just cause.

If he is turned down at the CEC, he has to go to the board of referees. The average delay is about two to three months if you go through the entire process.

Mr. Della Noce: No, no.

Mr. Allmand: The hon. member will have a chance to make his speech. I checked with the government officials today and these are the figures from your government. I checked this afternoon. The average delay is two to three months.

Mr. Della Noce: You listen to my speech. You may learn something.

Mr. Allmand: I have not learned very much from you and you have been here nearly eight years.

There have always been penalties. I want to make clear that we believe in a reasonable penalty. We accepted the penalty of one to six weeks which we thought was reasonable. In 1990 when the government brought in the seven to twelve week period it was getting a bit more excessive. We opposed that. To completely deny benefits to people who have paid premiums is harsh and unacceptable, especially if it is not easy to prove and it is not clear-cut both on the firing side and on the quitting side.

What is going to happen to these people? They have to live. We do not live in a country where we let people starve to death. This government, and it has done it before, is shifting the burden to the provinces and the municipalities. These people will have to go on welfare. The government is doing that all the time, shifting the burden down. In Ontario and Nova Scotia the municipalities will have to pick up the bill to pay for these people who need to support their children and so on.

By the way, the figures show that with the quitters, the people who quit, who believe they have just cause or not, get jobs in a very reasonable period of time when conditions are good for employment. When conditions are bad such as during the last year when we were in a deep recession and unemployment is over 10 per cent people just do not quit their jobs. I have them in my office all the time looking for work.

There may be examples of people who goof off and abuse the system, but there are many more people who want to work. They come to our offices all the time asking us if we can help them find jobs. They do not frivolously leave their jobs. Most people do not do absolutely ridiculous things which will have them fired for cause, for reason of misbehaviour.

I described the process in the law. It came about as a result of an amendment from this side of the House, because I was the critic at the time. When the penalty was increased from seven to twelve weeks, we asked the government to at least put in a definition of just cause and it did. It put in certain things. It was not entirely what we wanted, but at least it was a step in the right direction. Now there are five reasons set out in the law.

That is good, but it is still hard to prove and the burden of proof is still on the unemployed person. In many cases it is very difficult to prove and to go to this excessive penalty is not acceptable.

Mr. Speaker, my time is nearly up, but let me say that these measures by this Conservative government are just another step in the gradual destruction of the unemployment insurance system.

We said during the free trade debate there would be a lot of pressure on Canada to harmonize social programs with those in the United States. Everybody knows that many states in the United States do not have any unemployment insurance. In some they have very low unemployment insurance. At the request of business this government has been trying to push down our social benefits, including our unemployment insurance system to make it similar to those in the United States.

In this bill the government is acting unilaterally in changing the program. In 1990 it did away with its contribution to the fund. Until 1990 the unemployment insurance fund had three contributors: the workers of the country, the employers of the country and the government which contributed 20 per cent. In 1989 the government had contributed $2.8 billion to the fund. It cut that out entirely. Now the fund is solely contributed to by the workers and the employers. They should have some control over the fund. They did not have any say whatsoever in the changes we are discussing today. The government did not discuss them with the workers and the unions. It did not discuss them with the employer association.

This is another example of this government totally disregarding the rightful interests in certain programs and policies in this country.

In my final remarks, let me say this. Unemployment insurance is good for the workers. In times of unemployment it sees them through. It helps them pay for their food, their rent and their basic necessities during hard times when they are not working. It also helps business because it keeps money in circulation. It reduces the number of bankruptcies. It means that people are spending money, money they get from unemployment insurance for the basic things of life.

It is not like the Great Depression of the thirties when there was no unemployment insurance, but that is the direction in which this government is going.

Mr. André Harvey (Chicoutimi): Mr. Speaker, I was in the habit of listening respectfully to the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce when he spoke, in view of his long experience, but I can only deplore hearing him make comments such as those we heard a moment ago. It is absolutely unbelievable to claim that the federal government is passing its responsibilities for social assistance on to the provincial and municipal governments.

An hon. member: Demagogy at work.

Mr. Harvey (Chicoutimi): When you think that Gérald Larose used to say that our government should be criticized for being antisocial. The numbers speak for themselves: since 1984, this government has increased its social commitments by 50 per cent. These are the exact figures, the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce will know there is between $44 billion and $66 billion to help the provinces meet their commitments for education, health, welfare, and so on.

Someone also stated this afternoon on behalf of the leader of the Bloc Quebecois that he was very sorry for the poor. To this gentleman who has a sporadic, intermittent concern for the poor, I might offer this piece of advice: do not live 500 kilometres away from your riding; visit your riding regularly, weekly, to address the issues affecting your riding; look after your municipalities.

It is our duty. These people having voted for our party, I feel under the moral obligation to do a good job at representing them in government, because the leader of the Bloc Quebecois is illegitimate.

I have also heard folks from the FTQ say that we should go after the companies. You may be assured, Mr. Speaker, that since our government came to power, 50 000 companies are paying their taxes regularly. We have brought the rate down from 2.7 per cent to 0.7 per cent, and this 0.7 per cent is made up of small businesses with 5, 10 or 15 employees who have had the misfortune of having deficits and which are amortizing them over a few years.

Let me tell you something, Mr. Speaker. Without trying to outdo the Official Opposition in wild statements, I can tell you some people will vote against Bill C-105 because of the freeze on their salaries. They will not admit it, because the bill does contain some very progressive measures. Let me tell you something else. The FTQ says that an area like ours will lose $60 million, but they left out a couple of things. They failed to mention that $4 billion, 20 per cent of the total amount, as taken from the unemployment insurance fund to also be invested in areas like ours. They also failed to mention that the contributions of many small businesses have been frozen, and that they will get tax credits when they hire new employees—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member. The length of speeches being limited to five minutes, I must, in all fairness, give the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce the opportunity to respond.

[English]

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, no wonder the government is at 18 per cent in the polls when you get the kind of statement we just heard from the hon. member. No wonder the government's credibility is almost zero in this country.

Who is the member trying to fool when he suggests to this House and to the Canadian people that the government has increased transfer payments to the provinces? There is no doubt in our minds that the decrease in transfer payments to the provinces is in the millions of dollars.

Mr. Harvey (Chicoutimi): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Chicoutimi on a point of order.

Mr. Harvey (Chicoutimi): I am sorry, but I think that we are operating under a highly advanced system of ministerial responsibility and, to be as popular as the hon. member, all we would have to do would be to increase government spending by 15 per cent year after year, and the debt would rise to $850 billion in no time—

Mr. Prud'homme: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Saint-Denis on a point of order.

Mr. Prud'homme: I simply want to submit to the Chair that a point of order should indeed be one. The arguments being put forward may be interesting and make for a fascinating speech, yet they do not constitute a point of order. It is the continuation of a speech. I would ask that my colleague be allowed to continue—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I thank the hon. member for Saint-Denis, but the Chair had already realized that it was a matter of opinion. I shall give the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce one more minute.

[English]

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, as I was saying, the statements made by the hon. member are totally false.

As a result of Bill C-21 in 1990, unemployment insurance coverage for Canadian workers was reduced from 70 per cent to 58 per cent. What happened to those workers who were not covered? They had to get welfare from the municipalities and the provinces of Canada. Welfare bills went up, and that is a fact. Ask any province. The government cut transfer payments for education, it cut transfer payments for health care and it cut transfer payments for social services. It is a farce. Nobody believes it anymore.

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Kenora—Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to enter this debate.

I would like to start by reading the opposition motion which I think is very significant and should not be taken very lightly. The motion reads:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government's policy of denying unemployment insurance benefits to workers who quit their jobs or who are dismissed is "too severe", "too tough for people", "puts people in a desperate situation", "goes beyond fairness", is "extremist" and "right-wing"—

Those are very damning statements to make about any particular government. I want to put this debate into context for a moment. It seems the debate we are having today is one dealing with quitters. Because we are entering into that debate it is necessary for us first to put into perspective how many people we are really talking about.

In 1992 the total of claims delayed or denied was 132,800. Out of that total 2,740 people were fired for misconduct and 16,710 quit their jobs. For the sake of this whole debate we are talking about 20,000 people.

One of the interesting parts of this whole debate is that out of the 20,000 people we are talking about 50 per cent of them quit their jobs because they were on their way to another job. As the mathematician that you are, it means that 10,000 people are removed from this debate. Of the remaining 10,000 people 43 per cent found a new job within 10 weeks. Therefore the whole amount we are debating today is 6 per cent to 7 per cent, in essence roughly 2,000 people.

If we are talking about 2,000 people in the whole system who are legitimately going to have to go through the process of dealing with just cause, we should put it into perspective. The reasons for these people quitting their jobs should be looked at. There are some very good reasons.

Let me give a good reason. The minister opposite who spoke not too long ago said simply that we were prepared to look at sexual harassment and the proof of sexual harassment. I checked this afternoon and last year in the city of Thunder Bay alone 10 cases of sexual harassment were reported to the UIC office. The fact remains that if a small town like Thunder Bay had 10 reported cases, one can suggest that across the board the number must be a lot higher. If we are only talking about 2,000 people in this whole process then I must question just what it is that the government has in mind.

If the government is serious about dealing with people who should not be on unemployment insurance for legitimate reasons then we should not be talking about the quitters. That is because statistics and our own people whom we hire for their professional abilities are saying that the amount of dollars saved by bringing in legislation to not give unemployment insurance to quitters is almost nil.

There is another interesting statistic and the government will confirm it. We lose roughly $200 million a year by people classified as cheaters. Obviously that is what seems to be the problem with the system and why certain members of Parliament are quick to jump to their feet and say: "Well, I know somebody who went to Florida and was on UI", or "I know someone who has a night job or is working on the side and is collecting UI". They of course are a different kettle of fish. That is the debate we should be having here today and not this one about quitters.

If you believe in fairness and if you believe that people as human beings are decent and care about society, themselves and their families certainly they are not going to quit for no reason.

Therefore this motion is something we should be very conscious of simply because of the roughly 2,000 people who are classified as quitters are quitting for very legitimate reasons. Now we are asking as parliamentarians through legislation which is going to be brought forward in the next weeks that the onus be on those people, that they are in essence guilty until proven innocent. Those 2,000 people we are talking about in this scenario are those being sexually harassed and are afraid in an unsafe work place.

It is important for members across the way to know another statistic. These are the latest figures from Statistics Canada. In 1990 for fatal occupational injuries there were 809 deaths. There were 592,824 non-fatal occupational injuries resulting in lost time and 438,449 non-fatal occupational injuries with no lost time.

One might ask what that has to do with this debate. The fact remains that there are a lot of people getting hurt and a lot of people dying on the job in this country. Now, for someone to go to a higher authority and suggest that there are unsafe working conditions, they are at risk of losing their job. If they are at risk of losing their job without some sort of ability to find another social safety net while they go through this process, they will be more reluctant to talk about the unsafe conditions in the work place.

I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, without blinking an eye that I believe with legislation like this we are going to see fatal occupational injuries in our country rise. Men and women need to survive. They need to pay for their children's education and put food on the table. They will, as they did in the past, allow for certain occupational risks in order to make a living. I am concerned that for roughly 2,000 people we are putting Canadians in these situations of risk.

We are one of the G-7 countries foolish enough to make these changes. Germany does not do it with quitters. Italy does not do it with quitters. Japan does not do it with quitters. The only countries I can find in the G-7 that deal with quitters the way we are proposing are France, and Heaven knows why, and some of the United States.

Let us go back to what I think this government is really doing. This is a very empty gesture of saving money by penalizing quitters and not letting them collect UI. As I said before 93 per cent or 94 per cent of them get a job right away or within 10 weeks. We are really talking about a very small number of people in desperate situations. That is the reason they quit in the first place.

If that is the case then really what the government is doing through the back door is creating a smoke-screen, why I do not know. It is reducing the amount of unemployment insurance people are allowed to collect from 60 per cent to 57 per cent which is going to save $2.5 billion. Of course we are so busy debating about quitters, about 2,000 people, that we are not talking about the roughly $90 a month this government is prepared to take out of somebody's unemployment cheque which is so small already that the day to day costs of living cannot be met.

If this is the best this government can do to improve its position in the polls, I think the party on this side of the House really does not have anything to worry about. People really see through this when they look at the numbers and realize that these changes do nothing for us as a country except pit worker against employer. It makes Canadians feel that they cannot be trusted, that there are bunch of quitters out there who really do not care about Canada. That is a misconception all Canadians are going to see through once they have an opportunity to look at the numbers as I have tried to state them today in the short period of time I had.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Laval-Est, on a question of privilege.

Mr. Della Noce: Mr. Speaker, if you will allow me, I heard the hon. member say, and if I am mistaken, my colleague can correct me.

[English]

When he talked about voluntary quitters, he said 4,000. My numbers are that in 1991 there were 225,000 and 80 per cent did not have a cause for leaving.

• (1840)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but this kind of mutual correcting is not, strictly speaking, a point of order but a matter of opinion or debate. The Chair cannot accept this as a point of order.

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, I listened with great interest to the hon. member's comments. I think he deserves to be commended for his even temper and the fact that he insulted no one. Furthermore, I thought he quoted some very interesting statistics.

We cannot deny the fact, unfortunately, that there are people who abuse the unemployment insurance system. It is a fact, and I think if I were convinced it was a serious and urgent problem, I would have no hesitation in voting with the government. But that is not the case. Actually, I was glad to hear some statistics, because they confirmed more or less what I read a few days ago in Le Devoir. This newspaper concluded that abusers of the system represented only 1 per cent of claimants. I was delighted to hear the statistics quoted by the hon. member.

One of the questions I would like to ask him is this: Instead of penalizing everyone, should the government not have put the emphasis on manpower training? Instead of paying people to do nothing, to stay home, because I assume Canadians would rather work, why not put the emphasis on manpower training as they do in other countries, especially in Scandinavian countries where I believe more than two-thirds of the amount is allocated to manpower training? Would he agree this would be a better way for the government to invest its money?

If the answer is yes, how does he reconcile that with statements by his leader to the effect that we need to increase centralization?

[English]

Mr. Nault: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the comments of my colleague. First of all, I emphasize that this legislation in essence removes $2.5 billion out of the system, out of the hands of Canadians who of course spend that money. When we talk about unemployment insurance, I am sure not a portion of it goes into savings accounts. It goes right back into the economy.

With the talk about coming out of the recession and looking to stimulate the economy, this government has done something quite interesting. It has removed $2.5 billion out of people's pockets. Even though they are unemployed, they still spend that money.

It is difficult for me to understand why the government is doing what it is doing. Looking at the numbers, to me it is a smoke-screen to deal with the bigger issue. That is, this government lacks policy to deal with the unemployed.

There are a large number of unemployed Canadians. What should be asked and what we should be debating tonight are our suggestions as members of Parliament to get that large population of Canadians, 1.6 million who are unemployed, back to work. I would love to have that emergency debate, which is what we need in this country.

Instead we are pushed by this agenda of the government that there are so many cheaters, quitters and people who have to be pounded down to the ground by the government because they cannot be trusted. As opposition we fall into the trap of going with the agenda of the government.

We are spending our time talking about roughly 2,000 people who really are in desperate need of UI because they quit for sexual harassment reasons, they quit because they felt it was unsafe in the work place or they had tensions and pressures on them that are hard to explain to UI or a referee board or anything like that. Instead, we should be talking about how to create employment. I say to the member that I look forward to the day when we can have discussions in this House with more than a few members of the government sitting listening to us so that we can discuss in legitimate terms just how we can make this country a little better for all of us.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Resuming debate. I give the floor to the hon. member for Laval–Est and ask that he indicate to the Chair whether he wants to use all his time or share it with a colleague.

Mr. Vincent Della Noce (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State and to Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship): Mr. Speaker, I will share my time with the hon. member for Abitibi and I will take my 10 minutes. I thank the assistant whip who also gave me his speaking time.

First of all, I would like to say at the beginning that these things interest me and I want to talk about them. Unfortunately, we only have 10 minutes. I want to get to the point right away. As you know, almost all members' offices were invaded today by unions and groups that naturally came into our offices without appointments, without calling, by surprise. I find it very unfortunate that union members paid by the union, as was confirmed, who are not unemployed did that to the detriment of many colleagues and employees.

Nevertheless, I must point out that in my office, there were wonderful, polite, nice people who were surprisingly courteous with my staff. Still, they have taken over our riding offices and are deciding themselves when they will arrive and how long they will stay. I find that really deplorable.

The worst part is that at the offices of some of our colleagues here on this side of the House, there were violence and arrests, believe it or not. I find that even more deplorable. That was in Ahuntsic, to help you get an idea. I have just spoken with the police and I received confirmation that there were violence and arrests. I find that too bad because those people to whom I myself spoke today told my assistants that they left more enlightened than when they came in.

Perhaps some of my colleagues have not had a chance to talk or explain, since we were meeting in caucus this morning. We discussed all the points for two hours and we are finding the best possible solutions for our workers. We must not forget that the government has a big problem. This is also a question of dollars and cents.

I must tell you that now that we are at this point, there have even been threats against our homes and families. I called and asked the RCMP, who seemed unaware of certain things, to do their job. I must tell you that if there is no protection tomorrow, probably I will not be able to come to sit here. This is a notice to those concerned! When our families are affected because of a bill, we realize that members are no longer free to act in the House of Commons. Groups are now dictating to the government what to do. That is too bad. I am ready to meet those people at any time, but at least on my time, by appointment.

I also have in front of me a newspaper article where we see that there will be demonstrations and even violence. Some completely wrong announcements are made, and in the five or six minutes remaining to me, I would like to analyze them with you.

"Bill C–105 is one of the worst attacks on our rights." That is totally false. It is a measure to protect all workers and employers who finance our plan, and you and me who work. Our measures protect them from people who choose not to work. The unemployed will continue to benefit from our unemployment insurance plan. That is guaranteed.

Second, "the changes give employers too much power", the "damn" employers. I hear that again and again. It has reached the point that employers are blamed for everything, but they pay $4.25 for every $100 of salary and the employee pays $3. As someone who was an employer for 25 years, I personally had to deal with the blue forms. I find it rather a shame that it is always blamed on the employer. Once again, this is a false claim. The bill does not grant any power to employers. This is just not true. When a claim for benefits is submitted, UI officers give to both the employer and the claimant the same chance to provide the required information. The officer must hear both sides, that is the employer and the employee.

Moreover—and I did not hear this from the other side and I am sure some will intentionally avoid mentioning it—we give the benefit of the doubt to the claimant. Right now, things are not going well with the UI program. Bill C-105 will not solve all the problems which already exist. In his demagogic speech, the member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce, who has been here for 25 years, said that employers could drastically change the conditions of employment for workers. That is false. It is false to claim that those measures will have that consequence. Such circumstances are already recognized in precedents as valid reasons for quitting a job.

All those who came to protest in our offices—and I must repeat that those who came to my office were extremely nice; in fact, I will meet them again on Monday—said that they were better informed when they left than when they arrived. They will probably come to see me more often. It is a pleasure for me to meet these people, as long as there are not 200 of them arriving together, because our offices cannot accommodate that many, not to mention the disturbance for our personnel.

Another one said all week that employers will be able to fire union people. This is what the ad says because it is those people who organize the protests. That is false. Any person fired for those reasons is entitled to UI benefits. Under the Unemployment Insurance Act, such union activities are not defined as misconduct. Unionization is a right. It is wrong to make such claims. It is in today's ad. In fact, it is in today's issue of Le Devoir and it says: "Let's fight unemployment, not its victims." That is pure provocation.

A fifth claim says that the victims of harassment—I often hear that one—and low income workers will not be able to leave their jobs to find a better one. That is false. Any victim of sexual harassment will be eligible for benefits. This protective measure was put in place by our government. When a person quits her job for a better one, it is not a voluntary termination of employment. Listening to all those who have spoken on this issue in the past week, you would think that all employers now engage in sexual harassment. I wonder about an employer who has 2,000 people working for him. He must really be busy. Sexual harassment is the only thing they can come up with. It existed before and it will probably continue to exist after Bill C-105 is passed. We only hope that there is less and less of it and that people do not make abusive claims of sexual harassment. It is always the bosses. Do you think that an employer with 2,000 employees has control over absolutely everything? He probably does not even know his employees. I was a boss for 25 years and I can assure you that I often did things to please my employees, even though at times we were at the limit of legality and the legislation protected the employee more than the employer. You know, sometimes you have to buy peace.

Certainly there has been abuse. I have witnessed it in my life. I was an employer. What can I say? That is how things were done. Some will say, like the hon. member for Winnipeg who has left: "It is a form of insurance." Or they will argue: "I have paid UI all my life. You have to pay me benefits even if I do not qualify." That is not true. You pay your life insurance premiums, but if you commit suicide, the insurance will not pay up. It is dreadful to hear people say things like: "I have been contributing to the UI plan for 25 years, and now I have been cut off. I have been paying fire insurance on my house for 25 years. Since there has never been a fire at my place, I never collected on the insurance. I inquired of my agent, and he told me: "Set the place on fire and we will pay up." He also warned me: "You better not get caught."

Mr. Speaker, I think the bill is sensible. The thing is to interpret it correctly and not to worry about it.

The government has a problem. It is collecting $15 billion, but has to pay out $22 billion. That is indeed a problem. I caution the unions looking to muddle the whole thing to be careful not to threaten our families which have nothing to do with this, our wives who have been alone for seven or eight days and our children who are truly defenceless. To these people, I say: "Watch out. Do not dare cross the threshold of my house, just in case—" One thing is sure, my family is not responsible for this bill.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): A five-minute question and comment period. The hon. member for Parkdale—High Park.

[English]

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, I compliment the hon. member for Laval-Est, not for his contribution to this debate, but for being a good employer if he practised what he told us he practised. That is an employer.

The complaint I am getting from the chairman of metropolitan Toronto, Mr. Alan Tonks, is that the city is being killed economically by having to pick up the welfare costs, whether it is for the refugees that are coming or whether it is for people who are caught between jobs and unemployment. I have heard about that field process here and I heard about the just cause and not just causes. There will be people who either because of a waiting period or because they are not eligible have to live off something. They cannot starve to death in Canada.

In the Montreal area, just as in the Toronto area, I am sure these people will have to go on social assistance. I would like to hear from the hon. member whether the cities in Quebec are making the same complaint, that the federal government has abandoned its responsibility and is trying to shift the burden on to the local municipalities while at the same time it is looking very good because it says: "Look at what an efficient country we are running".

Mr. Della Noce: Mr. Speaker, I thank my hon. colleague. I must tell him that the same exists in all the cities in Quebec. In some places it is worse for many other reasons. I do not know if they have the same demonstrations with the unions that took over the issue.

"They are going to control" said the people who came into my office this morning. They have orders to stay there. I said, who do you represent? Are you unemployed? I was told: "I represent everybody who works in the union from your riding". They came from 50 miles north of my riding, which was a little bit surprising.

They said what about the people who do not work and that we should take care of? They are not the workers. The workers are responsible because they pay the invoice. It is the same question which I ask people in the city. Of course the city mayor complains on many issues not only on this issue. They always need more. They have their problems too.

We have to be careful because this UI system is not an insurance which will solve all the problems. We collect $15 billion and we need $22 billion. Where will we get the money? The deficit we can always play with, but that is not our intention. To pick up the tab from the city, of course there is some, but this is not due to what the government is going to do. Before we had people who were starving on the 17 or 12 weeks period. Are we now trying to tell the people that everybody who leaves their job will be penalized? Wrong.

This morning in our caucus meeting, without giving all the details because we do not know what could be changed, I heard a lot of good news. The benefit of the doubt is never given to the employer. It is given to the second party which is the employee. If the employer says that the employee went out because of misconduct and the employee says it is because the employer changed his hours or because of other reasons, I can guarantee my hon. colleague that I will fight for this person and he will not be penalized, he will not be starving. On the other hand I can say I am fed up with waking up at 5 a.m. A lot of my people and a lot of employers have said they want to pay for the people who really need it. They say it is 1 per cent. It might be a little bit more. It does not matter how much it is, it is still too much. My employers said they pay $4.20. To solve the problem what would it cost? I said $8 and they do not like it, "We are going to freeze that there and we have to pick it up".

In the city it is the same problem with the employers who are fed up paying the UI unless they really need it. I am in agreement to pay UI for the people who are really starving, who need a job or they have lost their jobs and not quit their jobs voluntarily.

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, to start with, I would like to respond to the unflattering comments the Liberal member for Hamilton East made about me. Usually, I do not pay attention to the criticisms coming from people who are misinformed, but today I will make an exception. It is true that I am not here to dodge criticisms coming from Liberal or other members, but I want to tell Canadians that I forgive the hon. member for Hamilton East for what she said. Forgive her, Lord, and let your light shine on her so she mends her ways. I consider the incident closed.

To come back to the motion of the Liberals which was tabled at the very last minute, this is not something which was proposed two or three weeks ago, or before the holiday season, this is a motion—and I want every Canadian to know it—which was tabled last night, five minutes before midnight, not fifteen, no, five to midnight. It reads as follows:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government's policy of denying unemployment insurance benefits to workers who quit their jobs or who are dismissed is "too severe",—

Before Christmas, when Bill C-105 was tabled, I had consultations by phone from my office. During the holiday season I met in Amos, on December 23, people from la Boîte à Copains, ladies who were worried about Bill C-105. With my political assistants from Senneterre, Val-d'Or and Amos, we conducted a telephone survey and so on. During that period, I was quite apprehensive about Bill C-105. Therefore, I decided to tour my riding, and more precisely on January 12, 1993—

Mr. Prud'homme: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I must say to my hon. friend that I have known him for a very long time and I know he would not want to mislead the House or the Canadian people. The motion he referred to was tabled in accordance with our rules. It became official yesterday evening at six o'clock pursuant to the Standing Orders. Maybe the member read it at five to midnight yesterday, that is always possible in our offices, but the rules are very specific: pursuant to the Standing Orders, a minister of the Crown announced at the beginning of the week that Wednesday, therefore today, would be an allotted day. Consequently, according to our rules, we had until five o'clock yesterday evening to prepare for this opposition day.

If there were any surprises, they came from the hon. minister. That is also in the rules. In accordance with the Standing Orders, the minister of the Crown announced only Monday that today would be an opposition day. We had until five yesterday evening to study the question we would like to debate. It was tabled. I see the clerks of the House; they know this motion was tabled before six o'clock in accordance with our rules; otherwise it would not have been admissible. Therefore, whether we agree or not with what you said does not matter; we must not mislead the Canadians.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I am sure the hon. member is perfectly right. It is a point of order. We have resolved that. I will carry on with debate.

Mr. Saint-Julien: I took note of the hon. member's speech; he is very experienced in the House. I also note that this motion was tabled after December and January, in fact it was tabled at the beginning of February, on February 1, two months later. Lord forgive the Liberals for being late in presenting this motion.

As I was saying, I held some consultations. Before I did, I informed the local media, the unions and the workers what were the issues concerning eligibility for UI benefits. I explained to them, in several pages, what the bill was about and what the position of the government was. In this January press release, I even told the workers of my riding that in 1978 the Minister of Finance of the time, who is now Leader of the Opposition, had reduced the benefit rate of insurable earnings from 66 2/3 per cent to 60 percent. This was a reduction of 6 2/3 per cent. It was a regressive measure because it applied immediately to everyone receiving UI benefits and all new claimants.

I also explained UI costs, the reduction of UI premiums for new jobs and that we had to invest in resources. I also mentioned just causes for dismissals and the reduction from 60 to 57 per cent. After these consultations, I said that I would check on all those things in my riding while continuing a tour of Amos, Malartic, Senneterre, Matagami, Joutel, Val-d'Or and Barraute. The tour lasted a few days. I listened and met people, workers, unemployed people, mothers, residents of my riding who told me: "We would like you to write a letter to the minister and tell him what we want him to know."

I would like to pass on to you some of the comments made by people of Abitibi to the effect that the federal government is not contributing a penny to the UI fund; that, as early as 1990, with Bill C-21, the federal government had extended the waiting period from 1 to 6 weeks to 7 to 12 weeks; that bringing the rate of benefits down from 60 to 57 per cent of the eligible earnings will severely penalize the middle class and the working poor; that the provisions of Part IV of the bill have to be amended; that it is the employers who fill in the reason for leaving on the record of employment, without any input from the workers; that the federal government will have to find another way to penalize those who abuse the system, perhaps with a system similar to the one for drunk drivers all these are things people told us.

I consulted the people in my riding, and my riding is the largest in all of the 10 provinces of Canada. I did not take any holidays. I spent my time in the field, because I wanted to hear what the people had to say and I will keep listening. They told me that the federal government should have consulted the people of Canada before introducing Bill C-105, that some employers, taking advantage of the fact that they receive piles of applications because of high unemployment, do not hesitate to give the boot to employees if they make the slightest mistake. The fact of the matter is that, in isolated areas north of Matagami, a foreman can summon an employee who is on his way out and assign him extra work to do before leaving. This happens. Five just causes are mentionned in Bill C-105. We learned this morning from the political assistants of the employment and immigration office that case law recognizes no less than 40 other just causes for quitting voluntarily.

Today, I did read the Liberal motion which was tabled two months late. The Bloc Quebecois did not even table a motion and the same goes for the NDP. On the other hand, we hear them criticizing us on television, like the member from the other side of the river who comes here once in a while. We did not see the member for Hull-Aylmer today. We did not see him rise in the House. He was not here.

I have been mandated by my constituents from Abitibi, whom I have met and listened to. I have been asked to have Bill C-105 amended at second reading, in the legislative committee and at third reading, because of the workers as much as the employers and the unemployed but not because of a Liberal motion which was tabled yesterday at the last minute. I am not bound by a Liberal motion, a motion from the opposition. I am going to tell you why I will abstain from voting. It is because this motion is false and demagogic. Tonight, in deference to my constituents, concerns in Abitibi, I am going to abstain from voting because I am looking forward to the study in the legislative committee and third reading. I am not doing it because of the Liberal Party of Canada, which has been out of the Abitibi riding for the past eight years.

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau—Saint-Michel): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to intervene to ask the member for Abitibi a question.

Before asking him my question, I would remind him that I had the pleasure of receiving in my office Mr. Paul Robert, the provincial director for the reinforcing-steel erectors of the construction branch of the Quebec Federation of Labour, together with members of Local 777 who came to tell me about their total and complete opposition to this government bill which is very unfair to Canadian workers who, unfortunately, are losing their jobs.

I did tell Mr. Robert that the Liberal Party of Canada was opposed to this measure and when the bill is presented to the House, we will express our objection and opposition to it on behalf of workers in Quebec and throughout Canada. We will vote against it. We are not like some Conservative members who make statements denouncing this bill, but who go away so as not to be here for the vote.

I ask the hon. member for Abitibi this. How come he is trying to have the people believe today that this motion before us should not be? He should know very well that the opposition parties have only a few very limited opportunities to express their point of view, on opposition days designated by the government. Only when the government lets us decide what we will talk about in this House can we do that.

I ask the member, who sits on the government side, who determines the agenda. He knows very well that very often the government limits discussion on a bill. Why does he not let us vehemently oppose this bill? On behalf of the workers who may be affected in his own riding, will he have the courage to vote against this bill and support us this evening by saying that this motion condemning the government for this bill deserves the attention of this House and the support of all members, whether in opposition or on the government side, who really care about the interests of workers who at any time in their lives can become unemployed?

Mr. Saint-Julien: Mr. Speaker, I have not seen the hon. member for years. I am pleased to meet him tonight.

Further to his question, I would like to say that the motion now being debated fails to mention that the government's policy was not to pay unemployment insurance benefits any more to workers who quit their jobs or are dismissed. I remember that we voted on Bill C-21 a few years ago. Even some members of the Bloc Quebecois voted in favour of just cause, on Division No. 104. They forgot to mention just cause in their motion tabled several days or weeks later in Parliament.

The hon. member has a great deal of experience. Five reasons qualify as just cause, but they forgot to talk about those reasons. They tell the people, "If you leave your job, you won't get unemployment insurance."

I am not tied to a Liberal motion. I am not a partisan of the other party; I am a member of this party. I did say that I would be vigilant on second reading, in the legislative committee and on third reading for the people of Abitibi and not for the people in the Liberal Party of Canada.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are now terminated. He had a 10-minute speech and five minutes for questions or comments.

The hon. member for Papineau on a question of privilege.

[Translation]

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member started his comments by saying he had not seen me in a very long time. You know very well that in this House nobody is supposed to impute motives to members who may have responsibilities which take them outside the House of Commons.

I remind the hon. member that for months, with his colleague behind him, the hon. member for Outremont, I sat at the Bélanger-Campeau commission, and then at two parliamentary committees set up by his own Prime Minister to try to solve the constitutional issue, the Beaudoin-Edwards committee and then the Beaudoin-Dobbie committee.

I say to the hon. member—

An hon. member: Baloney.

Mr. Ouellet: —that his comment was quite improper. It denotes an ignoramus of the worst kind.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I believe that is sufficient. The hon. member for Abitibi.

[Translation]

Mr. Saint-Julien: Mr. Speaker, on the same point of order. I respect the hon. member. I am pleased to see him here. I apologize. I can see he is quite upset, he is furious. I absolve myself.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments and points of privilege are now terminated.

Mr. Sid Parker (Kootenay East): Mr. Speaker, I will be sharing my time with the hon. member for Nickel Belt.

I welcome the opportunity to enter into the debate. We support the opposition motion. It is unfortunate that we must talk about unemployment insurance when we should be talking about employment programs. However we must do so because of the severe attack unemployment insurance has taken. It is especially directed against women and people who have left their jobs for various reasons. That type of attack is one that none of us from this side of the House can support. It is deplorable that the government should even consider it at this time.

Canada faces a severe unemployment crisis and I am shocked that this government has decided that the unemployed must suffer even more. The change to UI is a blatant attempt to blame workers who are scrambling for jobs in this difficult time of economic restructuring. Clearly the government should have instead focused its efforts on creating new and lasting jobs by investing in people through training and skills upgrading. To simply cut people off from income support that they themselves have contributed to is not only unfair but it also places an enormous additional burden on the already strained unemployment insurance system.

There are more efficient ways to stem abuses in unemployment insurance than this blanket change, which will only cause more problems than it solves. Perhaps the government fails to realize that this change in UI is counter-productive. Such a policy option clearly reveals the Conservatives' short-sighted approach to economic development. The people who are cut off from UI will have less purchasing power, will pay less tax, and many will probably seek social assistance from the state.

How will this help build the future of the country? How will this measure save money and reduce the deficit? Shifting the burden to the provinces which must administer welfare from decreased federal transfer payments is a pretty weak and transparent strategy.

I would like to share with the House today the situation in my riding of Kootenay East. I am sure that the story in my riding reflects the larger picture across the country.

Since being elected in 1988, my constituency office has had over 800 complaints about the UI system. Such a statistic is by itself quite an indication of the serious problems that exist. Let me elaborate. These hundreds of constituents have needed to ask their member of Parliament for assistance with UI because there are major delays in simply processing their claims.

Some claims have taken up to 12 weeks to process. Other cases involve multiple requests from bureaucrats for the same information. Everyone in the House knows that there is a serious overload in the unemployment insurance system already. The effect of this latest change will only add even more appeals and the unemployed will have to wait even longer to find out their status. Such stress and confusion are the last things Canadians need right now.

I have asked the Minister of Employment and Immigration many times to increase the staff in my riding's manpower centre in order to deal with the increasing caseload. However the minister has failed to act and the situation worsens every day as more and more people find themselves unemployed.

It has even removed the toll-free telephone number so that people living 500 kilometres away from the manpower centre cannot even phone in to get the information that is required. It has cut back in the services at the desk. Adding this kind of bureaucracy over and above it is going to create even more for those who are entitled to their benefits.

In the Elk Valley area in my riding, there has been an economic shutdown for the last nine months. Radical restructuring in the coal mining industry has thrown hundreds of people out of work. The B.C. Supreme Court prohibited one company from reopening its mine because of bankruptcy. However, when the workers applied for UI benefits, the federal government ruled that they were ineligible. Finally, some months later when the company dissolved, the workers were given UI.

These workers then appealed for the lost benefits for the time the company fell into bankruptcy protection. Now, several months later, they have won their first stage of the appeal. The final resolution will take much more time because the government is going to overrule that appeal.

The government sent its top representatives from Vancouver into that area. One thousand workers lost benefits for over two and a half months and have been told by unanimous decision that they were entitled to it. I saw the member for Macleod get up. His riding adjoins my riding and has 300 of those workers. He stood up and agreed with the minister of state when she said the benefit will be given to the applicants.

I say to that member: "Why are you representing those 300 workers?" Those workers are having their houses foreclosed. Those workers have now lost their jobs, holiday pay and severance pay and the plant has gone into bankruptcy. A new buyer has come in and has said that it is not even going to rehire some of them. They are advertising in Alberta for new people and there are 1,000 of them sitting without unemployment insurance.

It was said that it was not a bankruptcy. The courts ruled that it was a bankruptcy. I wrote to the minister who oversees unemployment insurance and said that these people qualify. The minister said that they do not qualify. Finally, after the period from May 24 to August 25, it was decided that these people were entitled to it. They have now appealed and they have been notified that their appeal has won a unanimous decision. Now the government is going to appeal that.

When I see and hear the Minister of state say in this House that the benefit of the doubt will go to the workers, I say to that minister and the member from Macleod that those 300 workers in the Macleod riding do not feel that they have been given the benefit of the doubt. This is a situation where this new bill is being brought in to deal with probably 1 per cent who are cheating the system. The whole unemployment program will become stagnant because people will be dealing with all those at the desk to find out whether they qualify or not. I say to each member of Parliament that they are going to have more and more of the unemployed coming into their offices and asking for assistance because of the delays that are taking place.

That is not acceptable. Canadians need a government that understands that the best way to increase productivity and competitiveness is by providing security and not by eroding the safety net. I implore the government to reconsider and retract this ill-designed measure.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Marc Robitaille (Terrebonne): Mr. Speaker, I listened with great interest to the NDP member who said with much emphasis and emotion that this government was pushing the unemployment insurance system into bankruptcy. In fact, it is quite the opposite. According to the figures, if we set aside the proposed measures, the unemployment insurance fund will have a $8.5 billion deficit. If we do take these measures, we limit the deficit to $7.5 billion. We take this type of measure to keep the unemployment insurance system from failing.

It is very well for the opposition to rise and talk about bankruptcy. If you want to talk about that, you should look at what the New Democratic Party is doing in Ontario, a true example of a province about to go bankrupt. If you examine the measures taken by the NDP Government of Ontario, you will find that in some respects they are not all that different. When you assume power, you must make decisions and take on responsibilities. It is easy enough to come here and tell us that our measures are inadequate, that we must vote against Bill C-105.

Furthermore, let us not forget that Bill C-105 will also freeze the salaries of members of Parliament and civil servants. My question is quite simple. Since the hon. member states in this House that this initiative is unacceptable, the other option would have been to raise by 20, 30, or 40 per cent all the contributions of workers and the employers. It is all too easy to stand in this House and tell the Canadian people that what the government did is bad. How would the NDP members solve the problem? We have a real problem on our hands right now, but you never talk about that. My colleague never says a word about the unemployment insurance fund deficit. It is quite obvious that this government will never let it run out of control like the Liberals did.

[English]

Mr. Parker: Mr. Speaker, surely the member must realize that if these people do not get unemployment insurance they are going to go to their municipalities or to the province to request some assistance. They have paid for this. These workers I am talking about have paid for this unemployment insurance for the past 10 or 12 years and never collected it. Now they have an opportunity to collect their insurance.

Mr. Robitaille: Give us a solution.

Mr. Parker: I will tell you where the solutions are. When the member's government brought in Bill C-21 and removed itself as a contributor to the unemployment insurance scheme and put the burden on the workers and on the employers, you created the problem of the deficit of that situation. It had no right to turn that over to the municipalities and the provinces to provide social assistance to fulfil the unemployment insurance program that is supposed to be in place as a safety net. We should be creating employment opportunities for workers and not unemployment.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are now terminated. Debate. This is the second half of the 20 minutes.

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I came to this House the same year you did in 1972. I am quite sure you remember. It is very important to have an historical perspective on unemployment insurance.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I would just like to tell the hon. member that I came here in 1968, but that is okay.

• (1930)

Mr. Rodriguez: I thank you for the correction, Mr. Speaker, but you were here when I came here and remember 1971 very vividly. There was a Liberal government and, Mr. Speaker, you sat on the same side of the House that I am now sitting on. Bryce Mackasey was the Minister of Employment and Immigration and was responsible for the Unemployment Insurance Act. Do you remember that well?

He sat there on the front rows, the right hand to Pierre Elliott Trudeau, and in 1971 he introduced a very comprehensive and expanded universal unemployment insurance program. It not only expanded the coverage for unemployment insurance to include the Armed Forces and school teachers who were not previously covered, but also expanded the social programs covered by the UI program.

That was when we got maternity benefits. We got sick benefits. Guess what? The program was funded by employers, employees, and the government.

Under the 1971 act the federal government picked up unemployment insurance costs when the unemployment rate was above 4 per cent.

At that time 4 per cent was considered full employment and the government picked up any costs to the unemployment insurance fund over 4 per cent. The member for Gander remembers that very well.

We had a very progressive program, probably one of the most progressive unemployment insurance programs in the world.

The Liberals were in power from 1972 to 1974 and from 1974 to 1979.

Mr. Marchi: We are coming back, Johnny.

Mr. Rodriguez: That is what really scares me, brother.

This is a swan song for a bunch of dead ducks over here. I am not concerned about them. I have my eyes focused on the Liberals and they are who really concern me because of what they have done to the UI program.

I have watched the debate on this motion, which calls this action of the government too severe, too tough for people and on and on. I want to put this in historical perspective because none of what is being done now came out of nowhere. In fact, as unemployment started to increase to 6 per cent there was a whole series of changes to the act. Bryce Mackasey was removed from the portfolio and given another one, the post office. Lo and behold because the unemployment rate was increasing to 6 per cent they introduced an amendment that said they would pick up the costs of the unemployment rate beyond 6 per cent. When unemployment went beyond 6 per cent they introduced another amendment to the act so that instead of requiring eight weeks of insured earnings to collect UI benefits they introduced a variable entrance requirement ranging from 10 to 14 weeks.

The member for Gander remembers that very well. He was there when they made the arguments that they were penalizing those Canadians who lived in single-industry towns or in parts of the country that were economically depressed.

Then in 1978 they appointed Bud Cullen to be Minister of Employment and Immigration. He was responsible for the unemployment insurance fund. That is when they started to stick it to the unemployment insurance fund. The Liberals started to cut the program back. I want Canadians who are watching to understand that.

The Liberals can saw on the violin all they want but Canadians must recognize that they are masters at cutting back the unemployment insurance fund. The Liberals were just as cruel to the unemployed at the time as the Tories are today.

What did Bud Cullen bring in? He brought in the change which said that the benefit rate was reduced from 66 2/3 per cent to 60 per cent. He went from 66 2/3 to 60 per cent. The Tories only brought it down 3 per cent. The Liberals brought it down a full 6 per cent.

I am glad the member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce is here because he and I sat as the UI critics against this government in 1984, 1985 and 1986. All of the ideas to chop the UI did not start with Tories and Forget. They started over here. Once Bryce Mackasey left the portfolio, they started to chop the unemployment insurance program. Then they brought in Bud Cullen. He really brought in the changes to the Unemployment Insurance Act. He reduced it from 66 2/3 to 60 per cent. Then he required higher entrance requirements. Anyone who did not have 14 weeks of insurable employment in the year preceding the qualifying period was now required to have 20 weeks. We will remember the 20 weeks.

I have to make sure that people understand that the Liberals are not going to restore anything to unemployment insurance. Let us understand that perfectly.

The Whip for the Liberal Party is looking at me. I say to him: "I know, brother, you want to win and you are prepared to say anything and do anything". We saw that with the GST: "Do not call me now, call me after the election". They want to put a tax on food. We have got to reveal them for what they are. Chameleons, that is what they are. They started the cutback on the unemployment insurance program.

A repeater now had to work the variable entrance requirement plus one week for each week of benefits received in excess of the variable entrance requirement up to a maximum of six weeks. They dealt with the repeaters and here they are beating their breasts and being so farcical about their attempt to cut off workers who quit. In fact, the Liberals are the ones who started decimating the unemployment insurance fund.

I say to people who are watching tonight: "Look, they are the masters. Put the cameras on them. Let us reveal them for who they are. Let us show them up for who they are". They made sweeping changes from 1978 to 1979 with Bud Cullen. I remember the member from Gander and I shoulder to shoulder, cheek to cheek, fighting in the trenches, fighting these changes. The Tories on the committee were in favour of them. They were tacit in their opposition. We carried the fight against those changes.

I am here to see an amendment or a motion brought by the opposition Whip condemning Tories for all the things that they did. All the language that I used, if you read my speeches, Mr. Speaker, going back to 1978, said that the changes the Liberals were bringing in were too severe. I said that they were too tough for people. I said it puts people in a desperate situation. I said it went beyond fairness. I said it was extreme and that it was the right-wing Liberals that were gaining ascendancy in the Liberal Party and it was unacceptable to the Canadian people.

I said all those things about the Liberal changes to the Unemployment Insurance Act back in 1978. They have some gall. How can they look themselves in the mirror?

Mr. Speaker, I move:

That the motion be amended by adding the following words after the words "who are dismissed is", "an abandonment of the principle that unemployment insurance is an insurance program and thus is".

• (1940)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The Chair has no difficulty with this amendment.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I want hon. colleagues to observe that yesterday a member of the NDP asked us whether or not we would change a particular piece of legislation once we got into power.

Today, with the passion of the member who just spoke and admitting that the Liberals are likely to form the government, I take it that the NDP has conceded. I would want everyone to note that.

I wonder if my hon. colleague would care to comment on this. It seems to me that when I last looked at the policy of the NDP with respect to tuition fees, it was that they should not exist in Ontario. Could my hon. colleague tell me what Premier Rae did to students? Would he also refresh my memory—

Mr. Whittaker: A point of order.

Mr. Duhamel: No, no, I am asking him some questions. Please calm down.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Order, please.

Mr. Whittaker: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The member for St. Boniface is talking about something I cannot see has anything to do with unemployment insurance and I am sort of concerned about where it will lead us.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I am sure he was going to get to that point.

Mr. Duhamel: You are quite right, Mr. Speaker. My logic is sound. His intellect may not be, but I was about to get to the point.

I wondered whether my colleague would be kind enough to tell us what Premiers Harcourt and Romanow have done with respect to hospitals, colleges and universities.

My question to the hon. member, after he has taken the time to answer those very serious questions about the performance of NDP governments now in power and cut out the baloney and the crap, does he think that after all of the counselling that we have given the government, it will take some of the advice from both his party and my party with respect to unemployment insurance benefits for workers who need them? I hope he would be very serious in his response.

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Speaker, I know this is the way the old line parties do it: They ask a question, they answer it for you and then tell you, you are wrong.

I am going to answer his question. He prefaced his question by talking about the polls and how they are ahead in the polls. The arrogance of Liberals. I want you to know that after my speech tonight your polls are going down.

An hon. member: What?

Mr. Rodriguez: Your polls are going down. He asked me something about tuition fees. Let me put it this way. I am the federal member of Parliament for Nickel Belt. This is the federal Parliament. Liberals have sat over there. Liberals have had their hands on the levers of power for the best part of the last 25 years. Now they are over here and the Tories are there. When we get to power, if we do what you fellows have done then we deserve to be criticized. In the meantime, I do not want the hon. member drawing these red herrings.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It being 7.45 p.m., it is my duty to interrupt the proceedings and put forthwith every question necessary to dispose of the business of supply pursuant to Standing Order 81(14).

The question is on the amendment. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the amendment?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those in favour of the amendment will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Call in the members.

The House divided on the amendment, which was negatived on the following division:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to Standing Order 37, the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS

[English]

INFRASTRUCTURE IMPROVEMENTS

ESTABLISHMENT OF TRI-LEVEL FUNDING PROGRAM

The House resumed from Monday, November 16, 1992, consideration of the motion of Mr. Benjamin (p. 13363).

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to speak at this late hour on the motion by the hon. member for Regina—Lumsden on the subject of infrastructure development. The motion, to remind the House, is that in the opinion of this House the government should join with provincial governments, and I presume municipal governments, to establish a tri-level program for the funding of infrastructure improvements, including improvements to sewage and water treatment facilities, road and bridge repair, and the construction of grade separations at railway crossings.

This proposal to develop a tri-level funding for a municipal infrastructure program has been the Liberal commitment for some time. Indeed, before the last election our former leader, the right hon. member for Vancouver Quadra, committed our party to a five-year $5 billion contribution to a program to cost share with provincial and municipal governments to rebuild roads, sewers, water mains and install anti-pollution equipment in towns and cities right across Canada.

That pledge was made to the Federation of Canadian Municipalities in a speech in 1986 and was a Liberal response to the growing recognition expressed by our municipal towns and counties across Canada that our municipal infrastructure was in bad need of repair. All across Canada our sewage systems, water mains, roads, bridges and anti-pollution equipment was falling apart and was badly deteriorated. For example, a study by the Federation of Canadian Municipalities found that in 1985 the average age of facilities was 20 years for roads and bridges, close to 30 years for water mains and sewers, about 20 years for storm sewers, 20 years for water treatment plants and 13 years for sewage treatment plants. Clearly, the municipalities were unable to meet this growing burden which was being imposed on their ratepayers.

Our party committed itself before the last election to work with the provinces and the municipalities to correct this growing deficiency in our country. Since that election we have continued to work on this program. Indeed, following the election our party carried out a national Liberal task force on municipal infrastructure under the chairmanship of my colleagues, the hon. member for Ottawa Centre and the hon. member for Nepean. These two members worked very hard to produce a report, travelling all across Canada and coming to my constituency of Cape Breton—Highlands—Canso to hear first-hand the views of our municipal leaders on the need for this infrastructure investment. Their report contains a long list of projects which are desperately in need of being carried out in our country.

That commitment was renewed as late as last week by our current leader. In a speech at Ottawa University last Wednesday, a week ago, he committed once again the Liberal approach to governing in the nineties which will begin to correct some of the gross deficiencies in the Conservative approach to governing in the 1980s. One of those deficiencies will be the lack of attention that has been given to the infrastructure needs of this country. The government has consistently denied this important responsibility and this opportunity to assist in creating jobs in this time of recession.

I am getting a lot of heckling from the Minister of Transport. If he was doing his job we would not be witnessing the deterioration of Canada's airline and railway systems.

Government members laugh but they will not laugh much longer. When the next election comes, as it will very shortly, they will be laughing, but not here in this House of Commons. Most of them will be paying the price for their negligence.

Mr. Corbeil: We have heard that twice before.

Mr. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): You will hear it this time I assure you.

Mr. Corbeil: With the same result.

Mr. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): We shall see.

We know that carrying out these improvements to the nation's infrastructure will not come cheap. It is a major investment program. The Federation of Canadian Municipalities estimated some years ago that the cost was in the order of $20 billion. I do not know what the bill is now but clearly there is a major price tag involved.

There is also a major price tag in not doing it because sooner or later, the work will have to be done. Because of the significant cost of this program whenever it is finally undertaken, one is inclined to say: "Well, we will put this off to another day". We should look at the opportunity that is inherent in dealing with our infrastructure problems and the opportunity to not only create jobs but also to create a new industry in this country.

One of the most prominent management thinkers in the United States, Mr. Peter Drucker, who has been writing on management for many years, has recently been saying that the industry of the future, the industry that will be the engine of growth in the 1990s and into the 21st century is going to be the rebuilding of the infrastructure, the communications, transportation, environmental infrastructure that exist not just in Canada but around the world. This is going to be the industry of the future.

In a report in The Canadian Business of last December, there was a very interesting cover story entitled: "Infrastructure: Why the World Will Beat a Path to Canada's Door". That story enumerated the hundreds of billions of dollars in investment opportunities around the world which are waiting for those companies enterprising enough to take on the challenge of repairing the existing infrastructure.

Let me quote some of the investment possibilities that exist. For example, in Taiwan, the government will spend $300 billion over the next six years. In Germany, $340 billion U.S. will be spent in transportation infrastructure. In east Asia, again it is the same story. In the United States, where the road system and communications are in disarray, there are plans to spend hundreds of billions of dollars on infrastructure. All of these are identified in this report.

This is an opportunity for Canada. If the government would take advantage and prepare Canada for this opportunity, we have a challenge to create jobs, investment and technology for the future. That is what we should be doing instead of the carping the Minister of Transport opposite is doing.

Mr. Robert Wenman (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, the globe is our house and our home. From it and within it we seek shelter, nourishment, refuge and security. The globe is a vast storehouse of rich diversity interlinking and interconnecting the chains of man's and nature's existence and very survival.

The earth summit looked to protect and preserve our home through atmospheric and biodiversity treaties. The new challenge is to find ways to live together in that global home to find shelter and protection within cities where traditional country values of clean air and water, green open space, product efficiency and productivity and transit can find a sustainable development balance and quality of life.

Faster than ever before the world is becoming an urban one. Near the end of this decade it is expected that more people will live in and around cities than in rural areas. In fact today 80 per cent of Canada's people live in or around cities. Explosive population growth and a flood of migration from the countryside are creating cities that dwarf the capitals of an earlier world.

By the turn of the century it is expected there will be 21 mega-cities with populations of 10 million or more around the world. It is necessary that all developing and developed countries keep this in mind. Infrastructure systems around the world must begin to adapt to meet the increased needs of the world's population explosion moving faster and faster into the major cities of the world.

The motion makes two basic points. One is about infrastructure, the other about co-operation between federal and provincial governments. Infrastructure implies appropriate structure. Before one can build infrastructure one needs the appropriate basic structures which are no longer really available for the next generation in the next century in the way our people live together.

Before we throw more money and ideas at infrastructure we need to recognize this is not just a problem for the Government of Canada. This is a global problem. In fact we in turn need to relate both our problems and our solutions to that global reality.

Old structures invented in 1867 to serve a rural nation are outmoded and outdated. These structures must now relate not to spanning Canada in the case of transportation but in fact to interlinking the world. Each of our major mega-cities are but terminals in that process.

We must work together with the United Nations and with other national governments to find these solutions. This newly emerging reality was clearly identified at the earth summit in Rio and more particularly when local governments met in Curitiba, Brazil. Canada again showed top leadership.

Mayor Doré of Montreal brought the mayors of all of the world organizations together and they in common, city by city, country by country, recognized the commonality of all outmoded government structures trying to deliver into the next century into a society totally different from the one we have built so far.

I am very pleased that sustainable cities programs are emerging. Local government authorities provided focus on that just last week by gathering at the United Nations. Sustainable cities programs are emerging at the World Bank, the UNDP and the UN Human Settlements Commission.

At the last session of the United Nations it was decided to follow up the earth summit with Habitat II in Turkey in 1996. It will examine the success of programs, such as human settlements programs, initiated at Habitat I in Vancouver, British Columbia, Canada.

The thrust of Canada's initiatives at the conferences last year in Toronto, Montreal and Vancouver and the recent appointment of Canada's Elizabeth Dowdeswell as the under-secretary for UNEP assures further Canadian leadership on these issues. As we move to Habitat II we need to learn the lessons that the members of this House have mentioned about the state of structures and infrastructures in Canada. We need to move co-operatively toward Habitat II and bring Canada's leadership from Habitat I into the world. We must bring our technology and our capacity, our human services and so forth, to the international community.

The motion needs to be expanded somewhat in its thought process. It must call for this global linkage of infrastructure resulting from new structural approaches in the relationship between international, national and local governments attempting to deliver, sustain and improve the quality of life for the burgeoning world populations pouring into our major cities.

The maintenance and upgrading of infrastructure is such a large problem, not just for Canada but for the world, that it cannot be financed under our current and existing structures. That is the reason that we must not only make our structures more efficient and more effective but also must make these structures more relevant to the electronic highways of the world and the interconnection of our mega-cities.

We also need to relate this global interest, need and demand back to where it counts, to those who are homeless in developed and developing countries, in the streets of New York, Vancouver, Toronto, Montreal or Bombay. In the new world we must work for the Shelter 2000 program and try to find basic shelter for the people of the world that is adequate and appropriate. We must relate this to homelessness, poverty and so forth.

In Vancouver we passed a charter outlining some of these problems. We presented it again to global parliamentarians on human settlements and development at the earth summit in Rio and we look forward to presenting it next month at the United Nations as we move toward the preparations for Habitat II.

This is the right kind of motion. It says:

> —including improvements to sewage and water treatment facilities, road and bridge repair, and the construction of grade separations at railway crossings.

These are significant problems but they are a small part of the larger problems of structure and infrastructure.

Certainly the intent of this motion is worth while and appropriate in this House of Commons. We should certainly study it further in our committees and work with governments through our committees to recognize the problems of local governments and international infrastructures and structures as we move into and demonstrate continuing leadership in the world.

Hon. William Rompkey (Labrador): Mr. Speaker, I too welcome this bill and congratulate my colleague for bringing it forward. I think it is a very important bill and I underline what my colleague from Cape Breton Highlands—Canso said about the attention that has been paid to this topic of infrastructure across the world, including in the recent U.S. election by the present President of the United States who emphasized the importance of investing in infrastructure.

Indeed, it is an investment that must be made and an investment that really can only be made as a public investment, although there is a role for the private sector even in public investment.

I want to point to an example of this which has been brought forward by the party across the way which presently forms the government and that is the fixed link to P.E.I. The fixed link to P.E.I. is an example of private and public co-operation in infrastructure that not only aids cities and municipalities but indeed provinces and knits together the country.

That model I hope to show is one that can be used elsewhere in the country. I am glad to see the Minister of Transport here this evening. I hope he will listen to what I have to say because I have some suggestions that I want to make to him. They involve a subject that is very dear to my heart, a very important matter of infrastructure that I want to talk to the Minister of Transport about if I can get his attention, and that is the trans-Labrador highway.

The trans-Labrador highway was mentioned by the government in the last economic statement by the Minister of Finance in the list of highways that the government is funding across the country. Unfortunately the only moneys that the government has committed to this so far is a paltry $10 million over two years shared on a 50-50 basis with the government of Newfoundland.

The government of Newfoundland is one of the less well off governments in this country. To force it into a 50-50 partnership seems to me is unfair. It is unfair because the government that is going to reap the most benefit from this road could be the Government of Canada.

Again I wish I had the attention of the Minister of Transport because I want to propose to him that a comparison between the trans-Labrador highway and the fixed link to P.E.I. is very interesting.

For example, the Minister of Transport now funds along the Quebec north shore $4 million to $5 million a year in subsidies for running ferries. On the Goose Bay to Lewisporte service he pays about $4 million to $5 million a year to run ferries. On the south coast service of Labrador he pays about $6.5 million per year to run ferries. On the Blanc-Sablon to St. Barbe run across the Strait of Belle Isle he pays $.6 million per year to run ferries. He pays subsidies on the gulf service and he pays a subsidy of about $14 million per year on the marine Atlantic service in northern Labrador.

If all of those subsidies were taken over a period of 25 to 30 years, as in the case of the fixed link to P.E.I., it is possible for the Government of Canada to fund that infrastructure, that highway, and to realize savings for itself. It can provide infrastructure. I say to the Minister of Transport if he were to take the model of the P.E.I. fixed link and apply it to the trans-Labrador highway, he could build that road. He could knit together provinces. He could have lower cost goods coming in. He could provide access for forestry development. He could increase immensely the potential for tourism by bringing traffic out of Quebec, through Labrador, down to the island of Newfoundland and back again to the mainland of Canada.

All these things are possible with that kind of infrastructure and it can be financed in the same way as the P.E.I. fixed link if the Government of Canada were to look at that along the model of using creatively subsidies that it is now paying out in ever-increasing costly marine subsidies.

These are things that can be done if the government is serious about and if the government is prepared to use its imagination.

These are important investments to be made. Only if we make investments such as this, shared equally and shared fairly across the country, are we going to put in place the kind of services that are needed to develop not only social transportation, but indeed transportation of an economic nature.

It is very important that the government take cognizance of this. I hope that it will take this bill seriously. I hope it will be studied seriously by the committee. I hope the House will approve the bill because it is something that we can build on and use to put forward plans such as the ones that I have mentioned tonight.

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to speak on the motion by my good friend, the member for Regina—Lumsden.

I think it is very appropriate that he has announced his retirement and suggests that he is having a few physical problems. His infrastructure is not as good as it used to be. I do not want to take the analogy too far, but the infrastructure of the country is also having its problems. We are confident that the member for Regina—Lumsden will make a comeback, rehabilitate himself and be as good as ever.

We are not nearly as confident that the government has any confidence or any foresight to get involved in a tri-level government funding of the rehabilitation of the infrastructure of this country. I know that the Minister of Transport is here this evening even though he is not paying great attention. However, I know that as an ex-president of the Federation of Canadian Municipalities, he was a staunch defender of the municipalities.

An hon. member: He was a former mayor.

Mr. Butland: He was a former mayor, indeed. He used to fight for the municipalities of this country on the forefront. He would say that it is important that we renew the infrastructure of this country. Now that he is a minister, there is not a whimper. We are somewhat disappointed.

Nevertheless, the member from Regina—Lumsden puts forth a proposal that has been put forth year after year after year. The price tag only gets larger. It was called the big fix. It was a $12 billion job that we could do to rehabilitate the sewers, the roadways and the bridges of this country so badly needed 15 years ago when we could have afforded it.

We could not do it in the good times. We cannot do it in the bad times. When exactly are we going to do it? We have missed the boat. It requires co-operation, which is something that is sorely needed among the three levels of government. We all say we cannot afford it. The municipalities certainly cannot afford it, but they are saying if the federal and provincial governments come on side, then we will find the money to participate.

It is a crime. We see the plight of the Innu at Davis Inlet, but I should point out that over 130 towns and cities in this country still pour raw sewage into the various waterways of the country. It is a crime in this day and age.

Regarding co-operation, the federal government has said to the province of Ontario: "Despite the fact that you put 40 per cent of your revenue into federal coffers, we will offer you a program and give you 15 per cent. You pick up the other 85 per cent of the tab". That is the kind of co-operation that this federal government has offered.

It is a historical problem. The federal government has always said that municipalities are the children of the province. The federal government should not have an involvement in funding municipal infrastructure, but it has chosen to do so over the period of time when it saw fit. It would do it on an ad hoc basis and take as much credit as it possibly could.

Now is not the time to say that it is his job, his responsibility or her responsibility. Now it is time for the three levels to get together and say it is the responsibility of all to make this better. How bad is it? I am reminded of Johnny Carson. Just how bad is it?

In Yellowknife, massive decay is not unique to old cities or to large ones. In the late 1940s in Yellowknife, the federal government installed a corrugated metal sewer system lined with moss for insulation. In the early 1980s work crews dug down to the pipes and found nothing left but a gelatinous tube of moss through which sewage still flowed, so we had a good system. Eventually we have to replace it.

In Halifax and Dartmouth raw waste streams through clay and brick sewers straight into the harbour, as it has for the past 100 years. Winnipeg needs $145 million to improve preventive maintenance at its sewage facility. It goes on and on. There are horror stories right across the country.

Why now? We have not come forward in the past with an obligation to improve the infrastructure. Why now? It is essential because people are looking for some kind of hope. It is one initiative that everybody agrees on, except for the federal government.

I can just see it. What a psychological lift it would be if we began to invest in infrastructure. It would create 63,000 new jobs every year for five years. I can hear the hum of activity across the country. Not only would it be an investment but it would be a psychological lift for people. These people would be back to work, not on a make-work job creation project, but on a real investment, something that when we were finished, is there and ready for the new prosperity that this government has said is coming soon.

I certainly hope it comes, but when it does come, after the Tories are gone, we have to be prepared to deal with it. We will only be prepared if we have the infrastructure to deal with it. People say it is going to be too costly. FCM says it will cost $400 million over five years. That is what it will add to the deficit. If we put 63,000 people back to work every year for five years, they will become taxpayers. They will become involved in the economy of the country. It is not too much to pay.

What are other countries doing? One of President Clinton's major platforms during the election campaign was an investment in infrastructure. The Japanese are investing $1 trillion over a 10-year period. Their debt is just fine, thank you. In fact there is no debt at all.

What does this government say? We have to get the fundamentals right before we proceed, before we spend any more money. God forbid. I was a teacher for 28 years. If anybody cannot get the fundamentals right in eight years, we have problems. Eventually we have to tell the student, in this case the government, it has failed, no more. It has failed and it does not have time to get the fundamentals right.

In maintenance versus reconstruction, investment is important. The longer one delays, the greater the cost. It is 10 times more costly to reconstruct than to maintain. What costs $15 billion now will cost $150 billion in 10 years. We will not be able to afford it then.

Everybody is at the ready. All we require is the government. Every municipality in this country is saying: "Just give us the go ahead". The projects are in place. The engineering is all set to go. In my municipality of Sault Ste. Marie it takes $15 million every year just for the maintenance of the infrastructure.

I beg the government to come onside and as an appropriate parting gift to the member for Regina—Lumsden join with everybody in this country and say yes to this motion.

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, it is with great pleasure that I rise today to speak to the motion moved by my honorable friend, Motion M-281 which reads as follows:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government should join with provincial government to establish a tri-level program for the funding of infrastructure improvements, including improvements to sewage and water treatment facilities, road and bridge repair and the construction of grade separation at railway crossings.

We cannot expect that a federal contribution for repairs to infrastructures will make workers more competitive. This is not a panacea. It is not going to solve all our problems. It is not just a way to create jobs, because these jobs will be a relatively short-term proposition. The main purpose is to help the provinces and municipalities that desperately need to repair their infrastructure. Today, those repairs would cost about $20 billion, according to the statistics of the Federation of Canadian Municipalities. Five or six years ago, it was about half—not quite $10 billion. We have nothing to gain by delaying repairs to Canadian infrastructure.

It is not going to get any cheaper. This may seem incredible, but as the hon. member said earlier, it costs ten times as much to rebuild an infrastructure as it does to repair one. Ten times. Today, this is a Canada-wide problem. Across Canada, municipal and provincial authorities are asking us to help them repair their infrastructures.

It is a pleasure to see the former mayor of Ville d'Anjou in the House. In fact, not many people know he is the former mayor of Ville d'Anjou. His role is not that of a former mayor. He is now Minister of Transport, and I am sure that when the Minister of Transport was just a mayor, his people would ask him: Could you help us do something about the infrastructure in our town? I am sure that as a responsible mayor, the minister would say: In that case, we need federal assistance. We need the federal government. Today, however, the mayor is the Minister of Transport, and as such will share the responsibility for implementing a highway improvement program across Canada. He should help us set priorities. He should also support Motion M-281 presented by my hon. friend, because when he was mayor, his people trusted him to help them.

Today, his perception is no longer that of a mayor but of a Minister of Transport, and as Minister of Transport, he should have a very good grasp of what is involved because of his experience as mayor. I am very pleased he is here tonight, although it is nearly 9.30 p.m., and I know he is dedicated because he is listening very carefully.

This motion is a good thing for Canada, at a time when we see a certain tendency by the government to dump its responsibilities on to the provinces and municipalities.

I think this is the right time to support a private member's motion, even if it happens to be a motion by an opposition member, because it reflects the most elementary and most important aspect of a bill, and I am referring to common sense. It made sense to U.S. President Clinton, who said in one of his election speeches that he would provide for repairs to U.S. infrastructure.

I am sure the government, whether it is this government or the next one—it will probably be an NDP government, or maybe another government, who knows, it might be a Liberal government—but sooner or later, it will have to deal with the problem of our infrastructure. If it is a New Democratic government, Mr. Speaker—I see I have your attention—it will be sooner rather than later. The problem is that every time a New Democratic government comes to power and opens the treasury to see what is inside, there was always either a Conservative government, as in Saskatchewan, or a Social Credit government, as in British Columbia, or a Liberal government—dare I mention it—as in Ontario, which had left the cupboard bare.

Even if the cupboard is bare, the problem still has to be dealt with, which is what they did in British Columbia, Saskatchewan and Ontario.

I know we will be blamed for not punishing people for the mistakes of the Liberals, the Conservatives and the Social Credit. I know they will say that, but the fact is, we have to do something about infrastructure. We cannot go on like this.

I think it is important to point out tonight that not many people said they wanted to vote against the hon. member's motion. They did not say they would vote against the motion. One Conservative member said it needed something more. One Liberal said: "We said this before. We already said this had to be done". Recently, another Conservative said: "It makes sense but I do not think now is the right time".

Good grief, if now is not the right time, then when is the right time? If their party cannot make the right decision, they should move over and let us make the right decisions. Come over here, and we will make the right decisions.

In concluding, I want to say that the hon. member's motion was not criticized by either the Liberals or the Conservatives. This goes to show there is a very real need to provide funding for infrastructure improvement. The benefits are threefold: First, for the environment, by cleaning up our waterways; second, for residential construction. People will still be able to own homes in locations with convenient access. Finally, there is a definite benefit for industry. Industries want to locate in places with excellent infrastructure.

It is really in our best interests to support a motion I see as a common sense motion, and the hon. member is to be commended for presenting it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I declare the motion lost.

[English]

Mr. Murphy: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I know that this is a private member's motion on infrastructure in our municipalities across the country. It was a motion that all three Whips, including the Liberal Whip, knew about ahead of time. I would like to ask if the Liberal Whip informed his caucus as to whether or not this vote was going to take place tonight, because they are not here.

[Translation]

Mr. Prud'homme: Mr. Speaker, I must object vigorously to what my excellent friend is doing. He knows very well that the Standing Orders of the House expressly forbid commenting on a vote that has just been taken. However, I think that he has now gotten his message across, as usual, of course.

[English]

It is unbecoming of a member of Parliament. He knows the rules better than anybody else. He cannot comment. The vote was taken. He cannot comment on votes in this House. We shall see what took place. It is unfair and unbecoming of a gentleman to comment tonight just to make political points.

Mr. Murphy: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, the member for the Liberal caucus challenged me in terms of being a gentleman. I am not challenging him in terms of being a gentleman. I am asking this. Did his Whip, did the Liberal Whip inform the Liberal members that we were having a vote tonight on the infrastructure motion?

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I think that, the vote having been taken, the question is settled, over and done with.

It being 10 p.m., the House stands adjourned until 10 a.m. tomorrow, pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

TOBACCO SALES TO YOUNG PERSONS ACT

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-111, an act prohibiting the sale of tobacco products to persons under the age of 18.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 68(2), the motion is deemed adopted.

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval) moves that the bill be now read the first time and printed.

Pursuant to Standing Order 69(1), the motion is deemed adopted.

Bill read the first time and printed.

COMPETITION ACT

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-400, an act to amend the Competition Act.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 68(2), the motion is deemed adopted.

Mr. Blenkarn: Madam Speaker, this bill amends the Competition Act as it pertains to the advertising of the price of goods.

When goods are advertised for a certain price and someone goes into the store to buy them, they do not know what they will have to pay because invariably there is at least the GST on it, there may be a PST on it, there may be a tire tax on it and there may be another charge on it of some kind. The charges go on and on and a person has no idea what they have to pay for the goods.

This bill requires merchants to declare the dollar value of every tax or charge on every item sold in the marketplace unless the item is declared to include all taxes and charges. In other words, if you want to sell you specify the taxes all the way down the line in dollar amounts or you sell tax included.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Mr. Blenkarn moves that the bill be now read the first time and printed.

Pursuant to Standing Order 69(1), the motion is deemed adopted.

Bill read the first time and printed.

TERMINATION OF ASSISTANCE TO INDONESIA ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-401, an act to terminate Canadian assistance to Indonesia.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 68(2), the motion is deemed adopted.

Mr. Heap: Madam Speaker, because the invasion by Indonesia of East Timor which was condemned and still is condemned by the United Nations, and the subsequent massive violations of human rights in East Timor by the military of Indonesia, I have presented this bill which would terminate Canadian governmental assistance to the Government of Indonesia until Indonesia ceases illegal occupation and human rights violations in East Timor.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Mr. Heap moves that the bill be now read the first time and printed.

Pursuant to Standing Order 69(1), the motion is deemed adopted.

Bill read the first time and printed.

PETITIONS

MENINGITIS

Hon. William Rompkey (Labrador): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition that was circulated by Mrs. Wanda Quigley of Wabush, Labrador who is in the gallery with us today.

Mrs. Quigley had a son who died from meningitis. She has circulated a petition all across the country calling on the Government of Canada to immediately put on the market a test for meningitis. In this way children can be diagnosed early and this dreaded disease can be stopped from spreading across our country.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Madam Speaker, I am delighted to present petitions today on behalf of thousands of Canadians who call on the Government of Canada to take every possible measure to ensure that a test kit for the detection of meningitis is developed and made available to Canadians as soon as possible.

These petitions have been certified by the clerk for presentation in the House. They represent large numbers of signatures from my own city of Windsor, Toronto, Petawawa, Thunder Bay, Marathon, Grimsby, Hamilton, Orillia and Ottawa.

In tabling these petitions, I also pay tribute to Mrs. Wanda Quigley for her splendid initiative.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Madam Speaker, I wish to present petitions today on behalf of residents of Lumsden, Newfoundland, Summerside, Springdale, Catalina, Port Union, Corner Brook, Point May, Deer Lake, Grand Bank, Grand Falls and Fortune who join with the petitioners as represented by the members for Labrador and Windsor, calling upon the government to seek as soon as possible to develop and to distribute a test kit for the detection of meningococcal disease.

I too wish to pay tribute to Wanda Quigley of Wabush, her colleagues and confreres who raised this petition of 25,000 names right across this country.

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Madam Speaker, it is my privilege and pleasure as well to table similar petitions to those to which my colleagues have made reference. These petitions are on behalf of many thousands of Canadians, in this case people from communities in the province of Newfoundland, Gambo, Springdale, Stephenville, Sop's Arm, Jackson's Arm, Raleigh, Glovertown, Fortune, South Brook, Wesleyville and Burin.

A great deal of credit is due Mrs. Quigley of Wabush and her friends who have taken this important initiative on behalf of all Canadians to encourage the government to ensure that a test kit for the detection of meningitis is developed and made available as soon as possible.

This disease has taken quite a toll on the lives of Canadians. A test kit is now being developed that could detect meningitis. The government through the Department of National Health and Welfare must ensure the kit is available to Canadians.

I take great pleasure in supporting the petitions.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Madam Speaker, I too wish to join with my colleagues in presenting a petition which has on it the names of thousands of Canadians, this time from Nova Scotia.

This petition was organized by Mrs. Wanda Quigley from Wabush. In this petition the citizens of Digby, Bridgewater, Pictou, New Waterford, Trenton, Sydney, Dominion, Scotsburn, Lunenburg, Dartmouth, Halifax and Sackville have joined to plead that the government take whatever steps necessary to ensure the test kit which is being developed is made available to Canadians so that lives may be saved.

I too compliment Mrs. Quigley for her work and everything that she has done.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre–Dame–de–Grâce): Madam Speaker, I also wish to present a petition on behalf of thousands of Canadians who call on the Government of Canada to take every possible measure to ensure a test kit for the detection of meningitis is developed and made available to Canadians as soon as possible.

Meningitis has taken and continues to take the lives of many Canadian children. Last year in particular, it was a serious problem in the city of Montreal as well as in Ottawa where several lives were lost.

A test kit is being developed that could detect meningitis and the government, through the department of health and welfare, must ensure that the kit is available to Canadians.

CANADA POST

Mr. Jim Jordan (Leeds—Grenville): Madam Speaker, I wish to present a petition on behalf of over 400 residents in the little community of North Augusta, Ontario.

After 152 years, the community's post office closed at the end of January. Closing post offices and turning their back on rural Canada is not something new but this closing is a little different.

Closing was bad enough but Canada Post failed to abide by its own guidelines of allowing 90 days for community dialogue. This really is a protest against cutting back on service and failing to respect the 90–day dialogue to which the post office was committed.

It is my pleasure to present this petition, this form of protest, on behalf of the citizens of that little community.

CANADIAN ARMENIANS

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint–Laurent—Cartierville): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, once again I have the pleasure of presenting petitions from the Armenian community of Montreal and indeed of Canada.

The Quebec National Assembly has introduced a motion that recognizes the importance of April 24 as the anniversary of Armenian genocide. Your petitioners call upon Parliament to urge the government to offer its sympathy to the Armenian people and especially to Canadian Armenians who survived the genocide on April 24, 1915, and support the international lobbying efforts aimed at compelling the Turkish government to recognize and acknowledge the events of April 24, 1915.

OLD AGE PENSIONS

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint–Laurent—Cartierville): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition on behalf of the seniors right across our country and have presented many other petitions prior to today.

The present pension payments, even with the supplement, add up to a figure well below the poverty line. Overwhelming numbers of our senior citizens are living below the poverty line and are confronted with an immediate crisis due to the inadequacy of their incomes.

The petitioners are calling on Parliament to urge the government to re–evaluate Canada's old age pensions so that they truly reflect the needs of our Canadian seniors.

MENINGITIS

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Madam Speaker, I am sure that you and other members will recall the outbreak of meningococcal disease in Ottawa in December 1991. Sadly the first death in this region was at Hillcrest High School which is in the heart of my constituency of Ottawa South.

I am pleased to present additional petitions today signed by petitioners not only in Ottawa and Gloucester which I represent but also Sudbury, Pickering, Marathon, Nepean, Petrolia, Arnprior, Mississauga, Toronto, Hamilton and Whitby, all in the province of Ontario and a few from the province of Quebec as well, especially close to the national capital region.

The petitioners urge the government to take every possible step to ensure that the test kit for early detection of meningococcal disease is made available for use to people in Canada so that lives may be saved.

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton): Madam Speaker, I too rise pursuant to Standing Order 36 to present a petition on behalf of thousands of Canadians, particularly Canadians in New Brunswick from Saint John, Rothesay, Oromocto, St. Stephen, Perth, Andover, Fredericton, Woodstock and the great city of Moncton.

The petitioners call on the government to take every possible measure to ensure that a test kit for the detection of meningitis is developed and made available to Canadians as soon as possible.

SERIAL KILLER BOARD GAMES

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton): Madam Speaker, I would also like to introduce a petition pursuant to Standing Order 36 with respect to serial killer board games.

The petitioners request that Parliament consider amending the Criminal Code so that violent and degrading materials such as serial killer board games can be kept from being distributed in Canada.

CHILD POVERTY

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I would like to introduce another petition from constituents.

The petitioners call upon Parliament to take the necessary action to reaffirm the commitment to seek the elimination of poverty among children in Canada by the year 2000.

MENINGITIS

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Madam Speaker, I too would like to present petitions from the citizens of Canada, particularly from Newfoundland.

• (1020)

Meningococcal disease is very serious and can cause death if not diagnosed early. Hence the key is to develop an early diagnostic test. The key to prompt treatment is a test kit that will be safe and effective.

I therefore support this petition and ask the federal government to eliminate all barriers to the full and speedy development of this test kit. Human lives, particularly children's lives, are at stake.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, I would ask that all questions be allowed to stand.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Shall all questions stand?

Hon. Doug Lewis (for the Minister of Finance) moved that Bill C–98, an act to provide additional borrowing authority for the fiscal year beginning on April 1, 1992, be read the third time and passed.

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to speak in support of Bill C–98 at third reading. I would like to have done it the other day but we had some amendments put forward by the New Democratic Party that would have eliminated the bill. Evidently under the rules of the House that was in order so we had to spend a day debating whether or not we should have the bill.

Today we can again debate whether we should have the bill. I do not know the logic or value of that but perhaps it is some indication of the degree to which my friends opposite really want to get on with the business of the nation.

Borrowing authority is extremely important—

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): Point of order, Madam Speaker. The hon. member is complaining that a day was taken to debate amendments to this bill offered by members of the House. I think it is against the rules of the House to reflect in this way on a vote.

I would respectfully request, Madam Speaker, that you remind the hon. member of that point.

Mr. Edwards: Madam Speaker, on the same point of order I am sure my hon. friend from Windsor West listened with care as we all did to what the member for South Shore was saying. I do not think he was suggesting that anybody was wasting the time of the House.

I think what he was suggesting was that it seemed peculiar that four amendments, each of which would have eliminated one of the four clauses of the bill would have been debated for an entire day. I think that is what he was suggesting.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The Chair would want to hold that nobody would be impugning motives to anybody else and that members would be careful in not giving the impression that they are impugning motives.

Mr. McCreath: Madam Speaker, I certainly would not wish to do that, but I do believe I am entitled to my opinion that what constitutes a waste of time is nevertheless a waste of time. I would submit that quite possibly there are many Canadians who would agree with me that our job here is to get on with governing the nation and not to debate the same thing twice.

I would suggest that people who disagree with this bill or any other bill brought forward by this government should simply speak and vote against it rather than force extra stages in the debate that are of no productive consequence whatsoever.

Speaking to the bill, which is what I intend to do, the specifics of this legislation will ensure the government can meet additional borrowing requirements of $8.2 billion over those granted by this House in April of last year.

The reason for these increased requirements is no mystery. The slow pace of economic recovery in Canada, the result of a global recession, has combined with lower than expected inflation to significantly reduce government revenues from what we had forecast. At the same time our spending obligations under unemployment insurance and transfer programs to the provinces have been pushed higher due to the same economic weaknesses.

I will expand on the details of the bill in a few moments, but first I want to address the broader issue of government borrowing and the vital importance of deficit and debt control.

Deficit and debt control are not subjects of great interest to my hon. friends opposite just in some of the suggestions put forward a few minutes ago. We continually hear suggestions from the other side as to how the government can spend more money.

At the same time we hear the Leader of the Opposition in an absolutely remarkable statement suggesting that he is going to eliminate the GST. He has absolutely no idea whatsoever where he is going to get the $15 billion to $17 billion in revenue that it accrues, unless of course it is through this hidden tax on everything including food and medical services that we understand is being considered. However, that is for next year because they can only come up with one idea a year it seems.

Meanwhile our hon. friends in the New Democratic Party seem to have no sense whatsoever of the concept of controlling expenditures. I sat here in the House the other day when the leader of the New Democratic Party got up and proposed that the way the government could accrue a whole lot more revenue was to eliminate expenses being claimed by businesses for things like lunches and dinners and hospitality which has been a long-standing practice in this country. Maybe my hon. friend is right, maybe those things should be eliminated. I might say I was rather amazed last night when I attended a reception hosted by the Canadian Food and Restaurant Association. I noticed virtually every member of the New Democratic caucus there, including the leader, enjoying themselves to the fullest.

Mr. McDermid: They were at the trough.

Mr. McCreath: Right there just having the most enjoyable time. I wonder what that says about the seriousness of those intentions.

The point I am making is that this government takes very seriously the idea of debt and deficit control. That is why this government has brought forward tough measures. These have made this government very unpopular at times because everybody likes to have services but nobody really wants to pay the taxes which pay for them.

Our predecessors found a solution to the problem. They did not pay for them. They let the debt and deficit simply grow. In fact, if the measures brought in by this government had not been put in place, this country's deficit would be approaching $100 billion today. That would be totally unacceptable by those of us on this side. I know that they have voted against every cost control measure brought in by this government during the four years plus that I have had the privilege of being here.

It is important for people to understand as we bring forward this legislation that there are different philosophies in this House. The guiding philosophy of our party is that painful as it sometimes is, you have to pay your way as you go. Really in the final analysis the idea that governments should spend and spend and spend and let their grandchildren pay the bill is simply not one that is acceptable to us.

In his statement, my hon. colleague, the Minister of Finance, powerfully summarized why this concern is so justified. He pointed out and I quote from his remarks of that day:

"Excessive government deficits, both federal and provincial, have contributed to a level of net foreign debt far higher for Canada than for any other G–7 country. This large net foreign debt, public sector and private, means that Canadians paid more than $22 billion in net interest last year to foreign lenders. That is money that Canadians cannot use to develop our economy. This adds up to the economic damage done by the higher interest rates and higher taxes that resulted from higher government deficits".

Harsh foreign indebtedness. Severe restraints on government's ability to assist people and build economic strength. Higher interest rates and higher taxes. These make up the painful price Canadians are paying today because previous governments put deficit and debt control on the back burner or ignored it altogether.

That is why since coming into office the keystone of this government's policies has been spending restraint and deficit reduction. This has meant taking firm and sometimes unpopular actions and decisions, such as closing military bases, privatizing organizations as the post office has been doing, reducing the number of employees on the federal payroll and putting limits on the growth of some provincial transfers. Now that is not to say that governments cannot learn to be more sensitive sometimes in the way these things are done.

It is extremely important, for example, as Canada Post carries out its conversion process that there be full and adequate consultation with the people in the communities. A moment ago I heard an hon. friend opposite present a petition with respect to an impending closure in his area. As a rural member I can say it is a cause of great anxiety in small rural communities when the big machine comes in and says: "Guess what? Your postmaster or postmistress is retiring and your post office is gone". It is important for Canada Post to be sensitive to those communities, to listen to what the people have to say and to provide them with the reasonable assurances they are looking for that in actual fact they are going to be provided with the same quality of service under the new approach as under the old. That is the key thing.

The same thing is true with respect to base closures. We have an overcapacity of military bases by some 40 per cent to 50 per cent. We cannot ask the Department of National Defence to use up its budget completely by maintaining antiquated equipment or infrastructure. However, the government has to do some planning. If there is going to be a base phased out the government must know what ameliorative measures or plans it is going to put in place so as not to devastate the economy and social life of the community.

That is critically important in rural areas like southwestern Nova Scotia where there is tremendous concern today about the future of CFB Cornwallis. I was very pleased to see the new Minister of National Defence recognize this point shortly after she took on that important responsibility. I want to say to her and to the House that there are many people throughout southwestern Nova Scotia concerned about the future of Cornwallis. I look forward to some early indication from the Minister of National Defence and the government with respect to what the plans are for Cornwallis in the short and long term.

As I was saying before, the actions the government has undertaken have been difficult but they have produced results. Last year's deficit was still significantly lower as a share of our economy than that in 1984–85. That is even despite the impact of the recession. Between 1984 and 1990 we had the lowest real program spending growth of any of the G–7 countries. I might also say that it was significantly below the growth levels of any of the provinces in this country. Most important, we have achieved a major turnaround in the basic structure of government spending.

When this government came into office in 1984 it was the beneficiary of a $16.1 billion operating deficit that was a legacy of the predecessor government. It was paying another $22.5 billion in interest costs on the national debt for a total deficit of $38.5 billion.

As I mentioned before, had there been no change in the course, today that deficit would have just naturally grown. Following along with the inertia that had developed over those years it would have been close to $100 billion. This is totally, totally unacceptable. We would now be approaching the point where the World Bank would be saying: "We are taking over".

It is really an issue of sovereignty in the final analysis. The difficult measures this government has taken on in tackling the deficit problem is a defence of Canadian sovereignty.

At that time the government was spending $1.33 for every dollar of taxes it took in. Imagine how a household would do when a pay cheque of $500 is brought home every two weeks but $700 is spent. Boy, where would that leave you in the long term? That is what the previous government was doing.

In 1987–88 however we eliminated the operating deficit and transformed it into a surplus to the point that today the government is operating in the black to the tune of $6.6 billion a year.

We hear a lot of talk about deficits and about the amount of the deficit but it is important to understand and to recall the structure of that deficit and the structure of the debt. Our friends left not only a $16.1 billion operating deficit, but also a debt of over $200 billion.

While this government has been working to bring the operating deficit down to the point where it crossed the line and is now operating a surplus, the interest has still been accumulating on that $227 billion debt that was the legacy of the Trudeau government to the children of future generations of Canadians. If the interest that has accrued on that debt is combined, it is up to something in the order of $450 billion. This government has been operating in the black for the last four years. In fact we have been able to control the growth of that national debt to the point that it is more than $30 billion less than it would have been otherwise.

This is complicated stuff. Sometimes it is even difficult for members on the other side to understand, but it is not very hard for any Canadian to understand that if we annually spend more money than we are taking in then we will get ourselves into serious trouble. We can all understand and relate to that.

That is precisely what the Trudeau government was doing for years and that is precisely what has burdened Canadians not only for this generation and for the next generation but for our grandchildren. That is what it has come down to.

If the programs and the approach to deficit control that have been put in place by this government stay in place, as they will after this government is returned for its third mandate some time during the course of this year, we will eventually get out of that cycle and Canadians will live with money in the bank in future generations as they should. A country with the wealth and resources of this country has no excuse for having to operate in the red at all.

Meanwhile we still have to pay interest payments on Mr. Trudeau's debt. That means further deficits, still growing debt and the interest charges that the debt imposes. We face the added challenges of pursuing fiscal responsibility at a time of slow economic recovery when Canadians are looking to government to do what it can to bolster new growth and job creation. This means we need to do more to break that vicious deficit–debt cycle and also to free up resources for new government investment in Canada's economic growth and competitiveness.

As the Minister of Finance announced last December we are pursuing those investments. We are taking concrete action to aid small business, to improve R and D incentives, to lever better working training and to expand national investment in infrastructure.

To fund these investments while restraining this year's deficit and bringing it down more sharply next year we must reduce government spending in other areas. This too is being done. Let me remind this House and all Canadians of some of the actions announced in December's economic and fiscal statement. These are spending control measures that will contribute to savings of nearly $8 billion over the balance of this fiscal year and the next two.

Let me list a few. For two years salaries will be frozen for public servants and employees of non-commercial Crown corporations. A similar regime will be applied to commercial Crown corporations that depend on federal funding. This does not mean that our public servants do not deserve increases and it does not mean that they do not need increases. However the reality is that we have to pay from within the resources that are available. I suspect that we have the best quality public servants of any country in the world. They are dedicated people who serve Canadians. The reality is that we must cut the cloth according to the pattern.

Salaries will also be frozen for two years for the Governor General, Lieutenant Governors, the Prime Minister, cabinet ministers, members of Parliament, senators and the federal judiciary. Everybody is involved in this.

Operating budgets of government departments will be cut by 3 per cent. They are not getting an increase in their budgets. They are decreasing by 3 per cent. Including the wage freeze federal operating budgets will be 5 per cent lower than planned levels in each of the next two fiscal years. They are going to have to work hard to to do the jobs they must do with fewer resources available to do them.

The UI benefit rate will be reduced from 60 per cent to 57 per cent to ensure a freeze in the average benefit that is received. Nobody will get less money than they are getting now but there will be a freeze.

Grants and subsidies to most organizations and interest groups will be cut by 10 per cent in each of the next two years.

These actions will bring the estimated deficit down to $34.4 billion this year and $32.6 billion next year, compared to our budget forecast of $27.5 billion for 1992–93 and $22.5 billion for 1993–94. That is a result of the impact of lost revenues.

This slippage will totally be the result of the weaker than anticipated economy on revenues. With the action we are taking program spending over the next two fiscal years will be similar to that projected in the February 1992 budget. The government is not spending any more. This undesired and certainly unwelcome increase in the deficit is not a result of this government spending more nor is it a result of the dollar being out of whack because of the spending guidelines set down by the minister a year ago. It is a result of the revenue side being down. That is what has really put things out of whack and created a higher deficit. This is a result of weaker than anticipated revenues.

Again let me remind the House of what the minister said last year. He said:

> The expenditure reductions announced in this statement provide a considerable reduction in the structural component of the deficit. As such, the deficit should decline rapidly through the medium term on the basis of the tight control over spending in place, stronger economic performance and lower interest rates. It remains the government's objective to attain zero financial requirements over the medium term.

Let me turn to the main provision of the supplementary borrowing authority bill. First, the amount of the supplementary borrowing authority being requested is based on currently estimated financial requirements of $30.5 billion for the year, up $10.8 billion from the February budget. This reflects the impact of the economy on revenues. There is an additional $1.8 billion requirement for loans to the CDIC but at the same time our total requirements have been partially offset by $4.4 billion relating to foreign exchange operations. As a result, the final net additional borrowing requirement is $8.2 billion.

Let me provide some additional information on the $1.8 billion that the CDIC will likely borrow from the Consolidated Revenue Fund. This reflects the financial difficulties experienced in recent years by two member institutions.

Some $500 million represents what CDIC paid out to cover insured deposits held at Shoppers Trust when it was liquidated last year. The remainder has been used for loans in respect of Central Guaranty Trust. This is to help fund the acquisition of certain Central Guaranty assets and all deposit liabilities by the Toronto Dominion Bank. The loan for Central Guaranty covers the shortfall between assumed liabilities and assets and is secured by the remaining assets of the firm.

Let me briefly review the impact of foreign exchange operations. These have worked in two directions. On the negative side there has been a requirement of $1 billion to cover gains in foreign currencies held in the exchange fund account and another $3 billion to replenish foreign exchange reserves. However, these additions have been more than offset by $8.4 billion in intervention operations. This has resulted in a positive balance that has reduced borrowing requirements by $4.4 billion. Therefore the final net need is $8.3 billion.

I should also explain that this bill contains two concluding clauses dealing with unused borrowing authority that was previously granted by this House.

Clause 3 ensures that all unused borrowing authority in excess of $3 billion granted under this legislation will be cancelled on March 31, 1993. This is a standard clause and allows a non–lapsing $3 billion contingency reserve to be carried forward into the next fiscal year.

Clause 4, the concluding clause, ensures that all unused borrowing authority granted under legislation earlier this year will also be cancelled on March 31, 1993. This provision makes certain that only the one non-lapsing reserve for $3 billion can be carried forward into next year.

I firmly believe that the government's expenditure control measures, those we have taken in the past as well as those announced in December, offer solid evidence that we are continuing to handle the nation's finances prudently and well.

It is also important to remember where so much of the government spending supported by this bill actually goes. Transfer payments to individuals, including unemployment insurance and old age security, represent the single greatest share of government program spending. These are followed by transfers to provinces, which include support for social welfare programs and education.

This is spending that plays an important part in helping disadvantaged Canadians deal with the difficulties imposed by slow recovery and widespread industrial restructuring. This bill will ensure that the government can meet its obligations while remaining committed to the action needed to bring Canada's fiscal situation back in balance over the medium term.

I apologize to the translators for speaking so quickly at times, thank the House for its indulgence and commend the bill to all members.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to be able to respond on behalf of the Official Opposition to the speech by the parliamentary secretary moving third reading of this bill.

In commending this bill to the House the hon. member attempted to blame the high level of borrowing authority sought in that bill on the weak government revenues which he said came about because of the weak economy. In this case, he has said something with which the House can be in agreement.

The weak economy has not only devastated the lives of more than 1.6 million Canadians who are out of work, it has not only devastated the lives of thousands of small business people who have been forced into unwanted bankruptcy, it has not only caused the loss of billions of dollars of production, but also all of this has meant weaker government revenues. People who are out of work do not pay taxes. Businesses going into bankruptcy do not pay taxes.

In trying to excuse the weaker than anticipated government revenues, to find an excuse for these revenues because of the weak economy, my hon. friend reminds me of the individual who was brought before the court accused of murdering his parents and then pleaded for mercy on the grounds he was an orphan.

This economy is weak and government revenues are weak because of the deliberate action of the Conservative government. This government boasted through the words of the Prime Minister that it had deliberately induced the current recession. If my memory is correct the Prime Minister not only said that the government deliberately induced this recession but he said that was as clear as spring water.

Canadians will agree that this was in large part the deliberate action of the government due to its high interest rate and high dollar policies. These policies brought this country into a recession ahead of the rest of the world. They also continued the recession longer than might otherwise have been the case.

At the same time that the hon. parliamentary secretary was in effect saying that he and his government deserved mercy for the higher borrowing authority being sought on the grounds of lower government revenues, he was also saying that he and his government deserved credit for what they had accomplished in carrying out their major objective of debt and deficit control.

It is true that when the Conservatives took office they said that bringing the public debt and the deficit under control was among their principal objectives. However the numbers show that in this, as in so many other things, the Conservative government has nothing more than a record of failure.

What is the accumulated public debt today? I was going to say it was $420 billion but I thought I heard the parliamentary secretary say it was in the area of $450 billion. That is more than twice as much as it was when this Conservative government took office. How can this government claim it has achieved its objective of bringing the public debt under control when after eight years of Conservative government that public debt is more than twice as high as when it took office?

What about its plea for praise on the grounds that the deficit, the annual difference between revenues and expenditures of the government, is being handled better than when this Conservative government took office?

In his December economic statement the Minister of Finance admitted that the budget deficit for the fiscal year 1992–93 would be $34.4 billion, some $6.9 billion more than had been forecast only a few months previously in his budget of February 1992. The Department of Finance is also saying that the deficit for 1993–94 will be some $10.1 billion above the $22.5 billion estimate contained in that budget of February 1992. If I am not mistaken, the budget deficit at the present time is at about the same place it was when this Conservative government took office. So this government has put the Canadian economy and the Canadian people through a high degree of pain for no real gain.

The government says: "Well, the reason that we have this increase in the public debt and this increase in the deficit is because of the high interest we are paying on our borrowing". Why does the government have to pay such high interest? Why did it have to pay such high interest on its borrowing? It was due to the policy that it helped put in place and supported and sustained for years, a policy of high interest rates which did tremendous damage to the economy of this country and also damaged the fiscal activities of the government itself.

I submit that it is not an accurate and open way of describing the operations of the government for its supporters to say that if we did not look at the interest being paid we would be doing okay. I doubt if that is really accurate, but even if it were, does this make sense to the average household or the average business? They would not say they were doing okay if they did not have to pay interest. Interest is a cost of doing business just as much as is the cost of merchandise or the cost of salaries. Interest is a cost that a household has to take into account, a household that has to make mortgage payments or payments on credit cards. It is just nonsense for the government to try and claim credit from the Canadian people and seek to be praised by the Canadian people if, as it claims, it would be doing all right if only it did not have to pay such high interest.

In recent months interest rates have, fortunately, come down, but we have to remember that they are still very high in real terms after deducting the rate of inflation. Our interest rates are still very high compared to traditional spreads between interest rates in Canada and interest rates in the United States. While they have come down since the jump up last fall, they are still higher than the low level they reached at the beginning of September. So there is still a long way to go in bringing interest rates down in a way that will bring some real encouragement to this all too weak Canadian economy.

This government is trying to take credit for something which the record shows as an abject failure. When you look at what it said was its primary objective when it took office, the control of the public debt and the deficit, then obviously it has nothing to praise itself for. It stands a failure by the very criterion it set for itself, by the very premise on which it asked to be judged by the Canadian people.

The government, according to the parliamentary secretary, is concerned about the ratio of debt to our gross domestic product. It is now in the area of about 65 per cent. At the time it took office, the ratio of debt to gross domestic product was only 42 per cent. Even looking at this very key measure, we see a serious deterioration in our position compared to the position that existed when this Conservative government took office.

The parliamentary secretary talked about the views of financial institutions and borrowers outside of the country. One of the ways in which this government has made our debt and deficit problem worse than was the case when it took office is the extent to which our debt has come to be held outside this country. When the Conservative government first took office, the debt of the federal government was at least held almost entirely by Canadians. Canadians owed that debt to themselves. Now some 20 per cent or more of that debt is held outside this country, certainly making us more vulnerable than we want to be to outside pressures.

This is another reason to criticize this Conservative government when examining its claim for praise on how it achieved its primary objective of bringing our debt and deficit situation under control.

Let me say again that if this government, through the parliamentary secretary or through anyone on the government side of the House, tries to take credit for what has happened with our debt and deficit situation, in effect it is turning reality completely upside down. If this government through the parliamentary secretary or anyone on the government benches attempts to be excused by the Canadian people for the degree of borrowing it needs on the grounds that the weak economy has caused a weakness in government revenues, again I say they are exactly like the person in the story I heard who, when accused of murdering his parents, came before the judge and pleaded for mercy on the grounds that he was an orphan.

What is the effect of Conservative policies on the prospects for the Canadian economy? If we look at the executive summary of the winter Canadian outlook of the Conference Board we will see that while the Conference Board predicts growth in the economy of some 3.3 per cent next year, it also says that our unemployment rates will remain very high. They will remain well above the 11 per cent rate.

The Conference Board says that the most recent economic statement of the Minister of Finance, rather than having a positive effect on the economy, will be of a restrictive nature. The Conference Board said: "The mildly restrictive nature of Finance Minister Mazankowski's most recent economic statement will also pull back on growth in 1993".

The Conference Board report goes on to say: "The over-all impact of the measures in that statement will be slightly contractionary, lowering real GDP growth by roughly 0.1 per cent in 1992 and by 0 per cent in 1993". The Conference Board also says: "Consumer spending will be the hardest hit as the most important cost-saving measures were cuts in unemployment insurance benefits and a freeze of Public Service wages".

As the Conference Board points out, when employment growth is weak this obviously discourages people from spending. Surely this helps explain why the recovery is so slow and so weak compared to recoveries from past recessions.

The Department of Finance in its background paper to the budget of last February confirmed that the recovery from the current recession is much weaker than has been the case for any of our previous recessions. It pointed out that the recovery period from the recession of 1981-82 saw growth rates of from 4 per cent to 6 per cent and certainly by 1984 strong recovery had already been having a positive effect on the Canadian economy.

In order to make a real dent in unemployment, in order to bring down unemployment substantially to create the substantial number of new jobs that we must have in order to get well below the 11.6 per cent level we have been seeing and to put hundreds of thousands of Canadians back to work, we need rates of growth well above even the 3.3 per cent predicted by the Conference Board.

We have to get up to the 4 per cent level of growth and above, otherwise we are going to go along as we have been with 1.6 million Canadians out of work with the damage that is doing to their lives, the lives of their families and the lives of their communities across this country.

By the way, it is interesting that while the Conference Board spoke of a forecast of 3 per cent growth next year, this is far more optimistic than the government itself. The Department of Finance in a forecast connected with the economic statement of December by the Minister of Finance talked about growth only at the 2 per cent level. Also, the Canadian Chamber of Commerce in a forecast a few weeks ago said that it looked to growth being only at the 2.5 per cent level.

Even if the more optimistic view of the Conference Board turns out to be correct, this will not be enough to bring down unemployment in any substantial way. We see therefore the cumulative and ongoing effects of Conservative economic policy not only in the continued all too high levels of unemployment and the all too low levels of job creation, but also in the figures we saw a few days ago regarding bankruptcies in this country.

The year 1991 was a record year for bankruptcies. Yet this Conservative government outdid itself because the total number of bankruptcies for 1992 set a new record. It was even higher than the record year of 1991.

The government says things are not that bad. Bankruptcies went down in December compared to what they were in November, the lowest level in four months. When you compare the number of bankruptcies in December 1992 with the number of bankruptcies in December 1991, they were actually higher than they were a year ago.

How can the government claim any real improvement in the business sector of this country when bankruptcies in December were no better? In fact, they were worse than they were a year ago. This government's policies are causing this country's economy simply to spin its wheels when the economy should be moving forward.

What is troubling about these bankruptcy figures is that the number of business bankruptcies has gone up much more than personal bankruptcies. This is serious. All of these represent tragedies. The increase in business bankruptcies does not augur well for a strong, quick recovery for the return to health of our business sector.

Something else troubling about these numbers is that we see that bankruptcies have actually gone up in three provinces which in the past have been engines of growth for the entire economy. We see that bankruptcies have gone up in British Columbia, Alberta and Ontario. These are provinces to which the rest of the country has often looked for support and strength in terms of a recovery for the entire economy.

These most recent figures for bankruptcies in this country are really troubling. They are really a matter of concern when one looks not only at what has been happening but what could be and may well be happening now and over the course of the next year in this country.

We have had some other numbers produced by Statistics Canada. Statistics Canada yesterday published its help wanted index. The help wanted index is often looked on as a bit of a forecast as to what is going to happen to employment in this country. This Help wanted index showed no improvement in January at all. In fact, it dropped eight points in Ontario and as well in western Canada. This help wanted index, as members may know, is a survey of help wanted ads in a sample of newspapers across this country. This survey, as I have said, does not indicate any real increase or improvement in employment over the coming months.

Similar results can be drawn from a look at the survey of manufacturers which Statistics Canada carried out and published recently. Statistics Canada questioned thousands of factory operators and owners. The conclusion of this survey, according to a report by Southam News, was that they expected more lay-offs during the next three months.

I want to remind the House that we have already lost 350,000 manufacturing jobs in this country in the past three years. The manufacturing base is crucial not only as a source of employment but as a foundation for the health of the entire economy.

To be fair, I should say that those surveyed expected increased output. More expected increased output than those who expected production to go down, but I repeat, on balance, according to the Southam News report, they expected employment would continue to fall during the next three months, although happily at a slower pace.

This Southam News report by Eric Beauchesne raises a very interesting point. It states:

> The survey results again raise questions about claims that a shortage of skilled workers is as big a problem as the shortage of jobs.

When we question the minister of employment about what is being done to create more jobs, he points to vacancies which need to be filled by skilled people. Certainly there are vacancies which need to be filled by skilled people. That is why we have been pressing the government to take more meaningful action to provide training and upgrading for our work force. However, if every one of those jobs requiring higher levels of skills would be filled, I think it is true to say that there would still be a million or more people out of work in this country and that is simply unacceptable. This is something that this government will have to deal with in the remaining few weeks or months that it is in office. Certainly, because it has not dealt with this problem, when the next election comes it is not going to continue in office.

What we have to recognize is that we not only need higher degrees of skill on the part of our work force, we need more jobs. There simply are not enough jobs in this country for the hundreds of thousands of people who want to work. We need policies whereby the government will work with the provinces and the private sector to create more jobs. We have to get away from the destructive policies of this government which have destroyed jobs rather than created them, which have driven businesses into bankruptcy rather than helping business to be healthy and to expand and move forward.

We need different policies than the policies of this government which have driven this country into the worst recession since the 1930s and have taken away hope and optimism from Canadians and replaced it with despair about the future. Canadians deserve better from their federal government, even from this Conservative government. They deserve much better than they obviously have received.

This government has asked, through the parliamentary secretary, for approval of a higher level of borrowing. I suppose it is true that as with business, government revenues do not always match the timing of its expenditures and governments have to borrow. However the parliamentary secretary has certainly not made a convincing case on behalf of the economic record and economic policies of this government.

A few weeks ago we were startled to hear an announcement by Statistics Canada that the recession was over. Canadians reacted to that announcement with consternation. Were there still not 1.6 million people out of work? Were businesses not announcing day after day thousands more lay-offs in coming weeks and months? Were businesses not announcing that they were going into receivership and closing factories and stores? No wonder Canadians were astounded by this announcement. No wonder there was no dancing in the streets and throwing hats in the air.

While technically it may be that the recession is over, the fact is that this is unfortunately only in the most technical sense, in the sense that perhaps the economy is no longer contracting and there are some signs of growth and movement.

How can we say we are in a recovery when there are still more than 1.6 million people out of work? Some of the so-called experts on the government side say that yes, it is a recovery but unfortunately a jobless recovery. What a contradiction in terms. How can there be a recovery in the economy of this country while there are still 1.6 million people out of work?

For the people who are out of work the recession is not over, in my own city of Windsor or anywhere else in this country, until people are back to work at permanent and satisfying jobs. For them, no matter what the government says or any of its experts and spokespersons say, the recession continues and the recovery is not really here while we have so many people out of work.

I would like to see a strong recovery under way. I take no real satisfaction out of noting the despair and the lack of hope on the part of hundreds of thousands of Canadians. I take no real satisfaction out of noting the continued statistics about unemployment, bankruptcy and economic weakness, but this is the reality.

I have an obligation on the part of the people of my community and on the part of Canadians generally to say what is really going on. The government can take no satisfaction from any declaration by Statistics Canada that the recession is over while more than 1.6 million people are out of work and respected forecasting organizations like the Conference Board say that they have little or no prospect of going back to work for a year and more.

We need a different approach to government, an approach which recognizes problems of debt and deficit but which at the same time has a commitment to economic growth and which recognizes the contribution which only economic growth can make both to the creation of jobs and yes, the containment of our debt and the controlling of our deficit.

As even the parliamentary secretary admitted when he presented third reading of this bill to the House, when you have recession and worse, governments must spend money on things like unemployment insurance and welfare and at the same time government revenues decline because people are not working. They have no salaries so they pay no taxes. At current levels of growth government revenues decrease. Businesses do not make profits and they do not pay taxes either. However, in a context of economic growth governments spend less on things like unemployment insurance and welfare. People who are working and businesses that are making profits, without any higher tax burden, are the source of higher revenues for government. Economic growth itself is a major tool, a major instrument in the control and containment and ultimately the rolling back of the public debt and the deficit.

At the same time economic growth provides the jobs required for satisfying lives for Canadians. Economic growth provides the basis for hope for the future, the confidence that there will be a better future for Canadians and their families.

This government deserves a severe indictment and, more important, a severe penalty from the Canadian people because, getting beyond the statistics, getting beyond the numbers, the fact is it has robbed millions of Canadians of their hope for the future. It has robbed millions of Canadians of the confidence they deserve to have and better lives for themselves and their families.

I say that we look forward to an early election so that the Canadian people will pass judgement on this government, remove it from office and give a new and better government a place in this House and this country. I believe it will be a Liberal government, one that will bring back hope and confidence for Canadians and help us to build a country worthy of its past and worthy of its future.

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Madam Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to speak in this debate. The Conservative government is asking the people for authority through this House to borrow another $8 billion.

This debate offers a rare opportunity to talk about the continuing tragedy of the Canadian nation. What we have just witnessed today is a speech from the finance critic of the Liberal Party that could be found in the library, given by the Conservative Party when it was in opposition. This back and forth of blame between Conservatives and Liberals in the history of this country politically was once explained as the difference between, as Tommy Douglas said, tweedledee and tweedledum.

When they are in government they are tweedledum. When they are in opposition they are tweedledee.

Mr. McDermid: The tweedledummers are in opposition.

Mr. Barrett: The tweedledums are in government and the tweedledees are in opposition.

Mrs. Maheu: You have not got a hope.

Mr. Barrett: No, it does not matter. The cast of characters are essentially the same old record of attacking each other without offering positive alternatives or explaining to the Canadian people how they will get out of this mess.

An hon. member: Tell us about Bob Rae.

Mr. Barrett: I appreciate the interruptions made by both the Liberals and the Conservatives. It is guilt motivated and were I one of the priesthood, I would say forgive them for they know not what they do. In actual fact they indeed know what they do and they continue to repeat the same errors over and over again.

When the Conservatives ran for office they damned vociferously the debt and the deficits left by the Liberal Party. They promised that they would reduce the debt and the operating deficits. Just vote for a government under the Tories and all the problems will be resolved. Eight years later the same annual deficits are cropping up plus more demands for borrowing.

The gall is even worse for the Canadian taxpayers when they hear the Liberal Party suggest it has the answers when it left a massive debt and massive deficits when it was in power.

Tweedledee or tweedledum, take your pick. Neither has shown the innovation that the Canadian people demand. Less than 30 million people in this great nation have a cornucopia of resources, a cornucopia of wealth in terms of the ordinary people, the labour force, entrepreneurs and no leadership that is dramatic or imaginative enough to put together a package to pull this country up by its own bootstraps.

It is well enough for the members of the Official Opposition to look at the Gallup polls and see that they are leading. They decided the best approach is to come into this House and attack the government and say: "we will do better, trust us". They need to do more than that. It is the obligation of the Liberals to say exactly what they will do, not just stand up in this House and condemn the government. I too will present some ideas.

It is a dereliction of duty for the Liberal Party to come into this House and not tell us exactly where it stands on the GST, on the free trade agreement and on NAFTA.

The Liberals need to be concerned and heckled but I want to say right now that any suggestion that the Liberals go into the next election without defining where they stand on the GST and leaving the impression they will tax food must be put in writing as either a truth or a lie. They cannot escape the obligation to tell the Canadian people where they are coming from before the next election.

We know that the Tories have been failures. We know that they have philosophically pursued a course of action that has brought about devastation in this country. Built on that failure is a tacit implication that the Liberals will follow most of the Tory policies with minor changes. If we are going to make that suggestion then what we end up with is exactly this: A vote for the Liberals is a vote for the Tories.

A deficit of $35 billion caused by what? Yes, part of the explanation in my opinion was correct by the Liberal finance critic. Economic growth has been stifled. Yes, there has been a recession. However, part of the reason for the stifling of that economic growth has been the free trade agreement which has allowed Canada to lose jobs in the manufacturing base at three times the rate of what the Americans have.

Did the Liberals say they will cancel the free trade agreement? No, they will tinker with it. I will say right now that we would give the six months' notice of abrogation and that is on record. That is what politics is all about, to say clearly and honestly where you stand. I stand here and say that the New Democratic Party would cancel the free trade agreement by giving the six months' notice.

One must say honestly that the Tories are touting this as their policy and they support it. The New Democrats say it is wrong and we would cancel. What is more dangerous is that the Official Opposition refuses to say what side of the issue it is on with the free trade agreement.

The Canadian people have a right and an obligation to know exactly what they are voting for and voting against. If you want the free trade agreement, vote for the Conservatives. If you do not want it, vote New Democrat. If you do not know what you want except licking your finger and holding it up in the wind, vote for the Liberal Party.

I want to talk about the North America free trade agreement. I think the Tories are wrong. We agree in principle that they are wrong on this issue. There will be further erosion of the job base, causing more borrowing such as this bill. Where does the Liberal Party stand on the North American free trade agreement? Traditionally where it always has: North American free trade if necessary but not necessarily North American free trade.

Contradictory statements allow the Liberals to play both sides against the middle. We have a disillusioned public that is fed up with politics and politicians and they want a change of government.

Instead of giving leadership, the Liberal Party is back on the fence again. It created these debts and deficits. Now members make these swan-song speeches about how terrible it is, the Tories have done wrong but do not worry, big business will carry on the same old policies.

There has been a massive shift of taxation in this country away from the business sector, away from the corporate sector and on to ordinary people. Did the Liberals say they will put it back in a fair tax policy? In a pig's eye, they will. We cannot get three logical words of commitment from the Liberal leader when asked about tax policy. Have you ever heard of a man running for prime minister who stands up publicly and says he will tell us what he is going to do after he has won? That is like playing dice with the Damon Runyan character Harry the Horse. He throws the dice in the hat, holds it up over his head and calls out the numbers.

We do not need pig in the poke policies. We need honest statements by everybody in this House of what they intend to do to get this country out of the mess. The Tories have failed. They are gone. Nothing is going to save them.

The Liberals have an obligation to be honest with the Canadian people. Up to this date they have not been. They have an opportunity on this bill to tell the truth and they have not done so.

If you want Tory policies, vote for the Tories. For goodness' sake do not have a Liberal Party hiding behind Tory policy saying: "Oh, they are bad. Oh, they are wrong. When the Liberals get elected they will not change a darn thing.

Why do they not take memberships out in the Tory party because the Tories are doing the Liberals' dirty work for them while the Liberals are hiding behind the curtains on these issues.

Why do we not have a clear-cut statement from the Liberal Party? January 1, 1994 is the implementation date of the North American free trade agreement. Regardless of how the Liberals vote in this House, regardless of talking about renegotiating or abrogation, we are talking about a new feature, implementation date January 1, 1994.

The election will be held before then. The people of this country have a right to know. If you vote Liberal will they refuse to implement the agreement on January 1, 1994? We know where the Tories stand. They will implement. However, this polling is directly related to the loss of jobs because of those trade agreements and we have not had a statement from the Liberal Party to the Canadian people that it will not implement on January 1, 1994.

Liberals cannot hide forever. The Canadian people are fed up to the teeth with duplicity, dodging and weaving. As much as I disagree with the Tories, as much as disdain their policies but like them as persons, it is in my charitable nature to love all people. It is my charitable nature to love all people and respect the rules of this House more than anything else. Even though I love some Liberals as individuals, hypocrisy cannot and must not be allowed to play a part in the forthcoming election in this country.

We hear the Liberals saying naughty, naughty to the Tories. Do we hear the Liberals say that the corporations must pay their fair share so that we avoid this kind of debt? Not on your life. Do we hear the Liberals saying we will never take 10 cents from a big corporation so that we can implement policies?

We read the records of who gave money to the Liberal Party. It is listed in the accounts of corporations and banks that gave money to the Liberal Party. It is all there.

My dear friends in the Liberal Party think they can have it both ways. This government has been a failure. It is going to be thrown out of office. You cannot be thrown in on the basis of fooling the Canadian people. Come clean and tell us where you stand on the GST. Where do you stand on the free trade agreement? Will you implement the North American free trade agreement in 1994?

An hon. member: How about wage controls?

Mr. Barrett: What are some options? I have a few comments to make. My friend mentioned wage controls. I was the only premier in Canada who refused to accept the Liberal policy of wage controls. I went back to British Columbia and implemented a policy of price controls—under a Liberal government, and we should never forget that. Price controls on food and energy, so that ordinary people could be protected from rapacious federal governments.

• (1130)

Let us look at the expenditure of public funds. This bill forces us again to borrow and add on to the debt for our children and our children's children. It is the same old kind of borrowing that both the Liberals and Conservatives are committed to: making offshore lenders wealthier yet based on the 27 or 28 million taxpayers in this country who are indebted offshore and internally in massive amounts.

There has never been a serious attempt since the Second World War to mobilize indigenous Canadian capital to work in Canada for Canadians. Canadians are among the best savers in the world. During the Second World War, capital as an instrument was mobilized just as much as manpower and arms were mobilized to fight for the success and survival of democracy. Everybody sacrificed, everybody contributed. Imaginative options were created in the financial sector during wartime which permitted this country to move rapidly out of the depression into measured and sustained growth.

I know it is a four letter word that frightens the Liberals and the Conservatives plan. The Japanese plan an economy, the Germans plan an economy and the new administration in the United States is now going to plan an economy. The new president admitted it yesterday. Not the Liberal Party or the Conservatives—laissez-faire forever.

What are the options? One is to examine those Canadian savings. This government finally opened up a very small window of access to those accumulated savings. A very good policy initiating self-responsibility in savings with tax benefits was opened to the Canadian people under the RRSP program. Good for the Liberals, they brought it in. It gave ordinary people an option to protect themselves against both inflation and devaluation of their own hard-earned money in high tax times by moving it into RRSPs.

Currently there is $105 billion in RRSP money in this country. Half of it is in self-directed funds and the other half is not.

There are ideas out there begging to be implemented that have absolutely nothing to do with the Tories, the Liberals or the New Democrats. They are strange to politicians, they are under the heading of common sense. One of those common sense ideas has been presented by the Canadian Federation of Municipalities calling for access to low cost funds to rebuild the infrastructure of this country; roads, sewers, sidewalks, all jobs that do not require a Ph.D.

An hon. member: The Liberals did not show up for the vote.

Mr. Barrett: I talk about the need for higher education for jobs. Just recently the most highly skilled work force in all of Canada was laid off in Ottawa in the high-tech industry. The high-tech myth is a Lorelei that is used by politicians to suck people along into thinking there is a great future there. Not everybody has a Ph.D. Thank God for that. Not everybody has a university education. Simple, clear-cut manufacturing jobs and industrial related jobs are the foundation of a resource based economy such as we have in Canada. However, it takes leadership.

Of that $104 or $105 billion that exists in the RRSP funds, as I pointed out, half of it is not directed. With wisdom, prudence, caution and leadership, using the Canadian municipal federation's own plans, municipal bonds could be issued tax free based on the United States model of the Fannie Mae municipal bonds.

The municipalities have said that there is $15 billion worth of work that should be initiated right away. We should allow people the choice, the freedom and the option to subscribe to a government bond that pays two points less than the going rate available in treasury bills or other securities and allow them to buy those bonds directly from their RRSP funds. We should allow them to give 10 or 20-year commitments to those bonds, within the shelter of the RRSP, to protect all interest they earn on those bonds and allow them to take that interest out tax free at the time the commitment is over, be they either 20-year bonds or 10-year bonds.

Further, we would allow a bonus amount of approximately 50 per cent of the value of the interest earned on the money they loan the government for those bonds to be taken out in a lump sum. It would be one and a half times the interest they earned on their own money that they could take out of the municipal bond and then use the cash tax free any way they want.

It would allow the Canadian taxpayers access to billions of dollars at a low interest rate. They would be designated funds to create jobs and build roads, sewers, sidewalks, parks and other parts of the infrastructure across this country.

We would make money back in increased taxation and increased internal purchases and in procurement here in Canada. That would be part of the whole plan of the structure. We would mobilize Canadian capital and would begin to pull ourselves up by our own bootstraps in our own country.

Why borrow offshore? Why continue this tweedledee and tweedledum between the Liberals and the Conservatives? Why throw one out only to have the other come in to replace them? My challenge is to the Liberal Party. In the face of the Tory failure are we going to get the same old mess from the same old Liberals or are we going to begin to get some honest alternatives? Are we going to get some definite statements on the GST, some commitments to cancel the free trade agreement and to say no to the implementation of NAFTA on January 1, 1994 or are the Canadian people going to be fooled again by the Liberals as they have been in the past?

It is time for Canadians to reject both tweedledee and tweedledum and let us do things for ourselves.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Madam Speaker, I cannot believe what I just heard. I have many close friends who voted for the NDP in Ontario a year or so ago and they are the most disillusioned people in the world. If we want to talk about flip-flops on policies, if we want to talk about cutbacks—I see the hon. member is leaving the Chamber because he cannot listen to the response.

Many people of goodwill voted for the great NDP in Ontario. They have made fumble after fumble and gaff after gaff. They have cut back on promises and so on.

Talking about hypocrisy, this is a party that when there is no chance of achieving government says that everything is black and white. If it was honest with the Canadian people, and the hon. member was premier at one time, it would find that once it takes control of a government there are many grey areas. That is the reality. That is the truthful situation of life. Some things can be presented in extreme positions. If the NDP wants to be fair and honest with the Canadian people and it achieves office, as Mr. Rae has and as Mr. Harcourt and the NDP has in Saskatchewan, it would admit that there are many grey areas.

I fought the last election on the free trade agreement. I do not know where the NDP was in that battle. I was at all-candidates meetings in Montreal and NDP candidates were talking about other things. They were not talking about the free trade agreement. He talked about fighting free trade but it was our party, the Liberal Party, that fought the battle against free trade.

During the referendum campaign last fall the premier of British Columbia took off. We did not know where he stood on that issue. He took off on a holiday to the United States or somewhere and left the battle to one of his ministers. The people in British Columbia did not know whether the NDP Government of British Columbia was for or against the agreement. For God's sake, let us be honest with the Canadian people.

There are many things in the NDP platform that I support, but when the member talks with a holier than thou attitude, as he does, he is talking like someone who is not in touch with reality.

We have now seen NDP governments in Ontario, Saskatchewan and British Columbia. Look at the polls. The people who voted for those governments know that they have backed down on their promises and that they are not the great holier than thou paragons of virtue that they pretend to be. When I listen to that kind of speech I think I am listening to something from the 1930s.

Mr. Barrett: Madam Speaker, when the Liberal Party wants to get votes out of the centre-left population in this country it relies on the old cliché about the CCF/NDP just being Liberals in a hurry. When it appeals to the centre-left it always says: "Yes, the CCF initiated such things as medicare ideas and other social ideas". Part of what I said today included an idea about mobilizing Canadian capital. Is the member opposed to that?

To give the House a ranting diatribe against the Ontario government ignores the fact that the Ontario Liberal government lied about a deficit that was close to a billion dollars before it went into an election and only acknowledged it after election day. It left that mess for Bob Rae. Will the member talk about that? Will the member talk about the mess it left concerning Sky-Dome? The Ontario NDP government had to clean that mess up.

We can exchange insults and we can say "You said" and "I said" and everything else. We are facing an election now. I offered an economic alternative to this borrowing but the member did not comment on that offering. I also clearly said that the Liberal Party must state now, as the right hon. member for Vancouver Quadra bravely did in the 1988 election, its position on NAFTA. The right hon. member for Vancouver Quadra bravely said that he would abrogate the free trade agreement. I returned to politics because I was opposed to free trade. I spoke against it everywhere and had I been invited to Montreal I would even have tried to speak against it in French.

This is 1993. This is a borrowing bill by a government that has nearly bankrupted this country. The Liberal Party wants to be the government. Where does it stand on the GST? Will it cancel it? What will it replace it with? Will it answer those questions? Where does it stand on the free trade agreement? Will it abrogate that or has it abandoned its 1988 position? Where does it stand on NAFTA? Will it implement it on January 1, 1994? We can spend a lifetime saying "You said this" or "You said that when you were in government". This government is finished. The Liberals may be the government. People are not interested in what they did in the past or what I did in the past. What in the world do they stand for now? They cannot go into an election and lie to Canadians. Tell us where they stand. All of us have a right to know.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Madam Speaker, I have heard of lot of hot air being hissed around in this place in the past but today's example has been one of the worst I have ever heard.

The hon. member got up and for 13 of his 20 minutes attacked the Liberal Party. He stood up there so high and holy and he neglected his own past. He led a government in the province of British Columbia that was dumped very quickly. It was one of the most destructive governments that the people of British Columbia have ever seen. In British Columbia he led a government that was not only incompetent but was a government of chaos. It was a government that governed not by the light of the day but by the light of the moon. He knows exactly what I am talking about.

In British Columbia the NDP which this man led into power, into the provincial house in the province of British Columbia, and its ideology were so soundly and roundly rejected that the New Democratic Party had to rebuild from the bottom up. He sanctimoniously stands in this House today and says that he knows what is right and that he has a plan. That hon. member led a government that did the impossible. His government's record makes Bob Rae look good in Ontario, and that is a heck of a hard thing to do.

The member is very good on his feet. He is one of the greatest orators in this place. However, when he starts to give lessons to the Liberals and even the Tories by God, about how to run a government and about how to put forward plans then he has no credibility.

The hon. member opposite said he had a plan. I would ask him on behalf of the people of Ontario if he has such a good plan could he please call up his colleague the premier of Ontario and tell him what it is. Then maybe, just maybe the people of Ontario would give him the respect that the people of British Columbia did not give him when he had his last chance to implement the plan, because the people of Ontario know that the New Democratic plan has cost them $11 billion in the deficit this year.

Mr. Barrett: Madam Speaker, I enjoy listening to my colleague from the maritimes.

It is a selective memory but since he wishes to talk about it let us put the matter straight. The Liberal Party in British Columbia elected five MLAs. Within a year and a half it walked over and joined the Conservatives and Social Credit in representing big business in British Columbia against our government.

The Liberal Party abandoned its principles and changed its coat just by walking across the floor. Now it has dumped them with the coats.

I predict that the same coalition will emerge in British Columbia. The Liberal Party will coalesce under big business money with the remnants of Social Credit and the remnants of the Conservative Party and again form a coalition in British Columbia. Name one other provincial government that received 48.5 per cent of the vote and lost an election. That was my experience when the Liberals formed a coalition with the Social Credit Party.

Did the Liberals in British Columbia advocate abandoning our land policy, our tax policy, or our car insurance? Not on your life. They never abandoned one single policy except to change the labour code against ordinary working people. That is what the coalition in British Columbia did.

Let the record be there. Let us understand one simple thing in politics. Whoever pays the piper calls the tune. The same piper pays both the Liberals and the Tories and calls their tune.

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Madam Speaker, the intervention by the member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca brings to mind the famous adage that when people sit in glass houses they should be careful when they throw stones.

That desperate intervention by the member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca brings to memory some of the issues that arose in British Columbia when he was premier. This opportunity cannot be missed considering the holier than thou attitude which permeated his intervention this morning.

I could not help thinking back to the times when the member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca was premier and about the way in which the forests of British Columbia were allowed to be pilfered under his administration in the same manner as they were pilfered before him and again after him. His record on that matter is not something to write home about.

The record of the former premier of British Columbia, now the member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca, is not great either when one remembers the opportunity he had while in office to rearrange land use planning in British Columbia to reduce the pressure on forest cutting in his own province and his failure to do so.

He did not pay attention to that key issue which has plagued the viability of forests on the west coast.

I am also reminded by the member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce, who was a very distinguished minister for Indian and northern affairs, about the fact that when the member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca was premier, he did not keep the promise on the Nishga settlement. He was such a cause célèbre in the provincial legislature of British Columbia that the member for Nishga who had been elected as an NDP member, if I remember correctly, decided to sit as an independent as a sign of protest with respect to the then premier and now the member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca.

In his attack on the Liberals, the member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca is conveying the clear impression that after all he prefers the Tories, which is rather amazing considering the agenda of the NDP. However, that is his problem. He seems to be very upset about the fact that on the GST there is no clear statement being given by other parties. In our case, that statement certainly does not apply because our leader on behalf of the Liberal parliamentary group has taken the very clear position that if the Liberal Party is elected to office, the GST will be replaced by another tax.

At that point you can proceed in two ways. You can decide on the alternative tax as a government, as a decision made by cabinet on its own, or you can do that by way of consultation with the public through parliamentary means. It is the Liberal way to adopt a process whereby we would consult the public. We would engage in an over-all tax reform in which the GST would be analysed against which alternatives would be studied. The consultation process would be extensive and would then lead to the alternative to the present tax system which as you know, Madam Speaker, is tilted very much in favour of the haves and is heavier on the have nots.

In other words, what we intend to do after the next election is have a more progressive taxation system with hopefully less flat tax rates applied regardless of income and with rates of taxation which are heavier on those who have more and which are of course progressively lighter as incomes decrease. That is the Liberal view on the approach to taxation. We know that can be done.

Since 1984 there have been over 30 tax increases introduced by the present government. We will have to look at all of them and reorganize the taxation system in a fair and progressive manner.

The member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca also produced a lot of synthetic indignation on the subject of NAFTA and the free trade agreement. We had a debate in the House on that subject a few months ago on a Liberal opposition day. We took a very clear position. I do not know where the member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca was on that day. That position is on record. It states quite clearly that a Liberal government will want to examine the NAFTA proposal if it is in place in a manner that will ensure an improvement both on the labour side and on the environmental side of that particular agreement. This position has also been taken by President Clinton. We think that in co-operation with the present administration in Washington that approach will be possible and will be successful.

There is on the part of the Liberal Party a very clear position that has been taken in this regard. It is a reasonable one that will appeal to the majority of Canadians. It has been thought through because, as everybody knows, the weak aspects of the NAFTA agreement are definitely those aspects related to the environment, labour standards and labour input.

In this debate today we have to look at the performance of the government on a variety of fronts. We cannot of course spend too much time on calming down the boiling spirits of the hon. member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca. The agenda is much too important. We have to look at the bill as it stands before us today and say that there are a number of areas in which the performance of the government which is now seeking additional funds leaves very much to be desired.

A couple of days ago I attempted to deal with the social aspects of the government's performance. Today I would like to devote the few minutes available to the approach by this government to our natural resources. I will attempt to divide these remarks between water and energy, fully aware of the fact that the subject is so immense that it cannot be covered adequately by way of just one intervention.

We find not just anomalies, as in the case of the GST application and its effects on the environment, but some very serious conceptual faults in the performance of the government.

First let me deal with the question of the GST and one specific example. I was stunned to receive on March 10, 1992, a press release issued by Treasury Board in which we were informed about the suspension of the goods and services tax, the GST, from certain products. On this list of products were fertilizers and pesticides.

The pesticides are as a result of a decision made by this government regarding packages costing $500 or more. If they are labelled in accordance with the pest control products regulations, having a purpose that includes agricultural use, they will be exempt from the GST.

I ask why on earth the government would take a step of this kind. Certainly it is a measure which will facilitate an increase in the use of pesticides. We know that some of the pesticides in commercial use are extremely damaging to the environment and particularly to the water systems.

One cannot help but ask this question. Why should books not be exempt from the GST when chemical fertilizers are exempt? What is the rationale behind this initiative? Why would the government do that when in the green plan, which is certainly not under the jurisdiction of Treasury Board but nevertheless is part of the over-all long-term approach of this government, there is a profound concern about the preservation and the protection of the environment. Here we have an indirect subsidy, an exemption from a tax which applies to a product which we all know ought to be used extremely carefully and possibly phased out in the long term. However, that is only a detail.

I would like to stress that after eight years of Tory administration we can begin to notice the emergence of initiatives that have been promised but not carried out. For instance, let me refer for a moment to the 1987 water strategy.

The federal water strategy was in a way launched by way of an initiative by the Liberal government before the 1984 election which set up a water commission under the leadership of Professor Pearse at UBC.

I believe that commission reported in 1985 or 1986. In 1987 a federal water strategy emerged and we welcomed it. We thought it was a good idea. It is a good idea because we need a federal water strategy for a variety of reasons. The only unfortunate aspect of that strategy was the fact that it remained silent on water diversion and water exports. That was because at that time some members of the Conservative government were in favour of some of the crazy ideas being proposed for massive water diversions between Canada and the United States.

That federal water strategy has remained virtually unimplemented. A federal water bill has been promised by several successive ministers of the environment. Six years later we have not seen any legislation introduced. What is going on? Why is this federal water strategy, admittedly a good concept, not being implemented? Evidently the chickens are coming home to roost. I do not doubt the intention at the time, but promises which are made must be kept.

Here we see an increasing need for a policy to be implemented in the interest of public health of Canadians and the long-term use of water which is being recognized increasingly as a commodity of increasing and substantive importance, not just in Canada but around the globe. A legitimate question to be raised during this debate would be when will this promise be delivered?

Again on the subject of water, I must raise the question of the abatement of persistent toxic chemicals entering the Niagara River and Lake Ontario.

In 1987 an agreement was signed between the then Minister of the Environment and his counterpart in Washington whereby a promise was made that 50 per cent of the persistent toxic chemicals entering the Niagara River would be cut in half. We do not know whether that promise will be kept with regard to the Niagara River.

At a meeting in Niagara Falls, New York, a few weeks ago scientists at that meeting indicated that this promise might be kept but it is not quite certain. At that time it became publicly known that 1,500 kilograms of persistent toxic chemicals are entering the Niagara River daily. Among them are arsenic, lead, PCBs and DDT. You name it, a soup of the most incredible variety of chemicals is still entering that river. We learned that of these 18 toxic chemicals, eight are still unregulated. In other words, there is no regulation affecting eight of these 18 persistent toxic chemicals as of today.

We thought the highly publicized Canadian Environmental Protection Act was a good measure as a whole. It could have been stronger. It was debated in committee but we certainly felt that it was a measure that ought to proceed, although in four areas it could have been considerably improved. Yet that legislation is not used as expeditiously as it should be used in order to regulate toxic substances entering the environment.

While the legislation is there and the instruments are there, the government is reluctant to make the resources available to the Department of the Environment and to the scientific communities in order to broaden the scope and the coverage of the Canadian Environmental Protection Act so as to regulate more toxic chemicals the environment, the water system and the atmosphere.

This situation is going to reach emergency levels if it is not dealt with soon. Measurements in the Niagara River, as they are made right now by the scientific community, are to the extent of 1,500 kilograms per day of persistent toxic chemicals entering the system which includes a very high figure for arsenic which we all know is not something one drinks every day for breakfast. There is lead and DDT, as I mentioned earlier, and other dangerous substances.

I might add on that subject that while there is at least on paper an agreement between the two countries on reaching a certain target by the year 1996, namely by reducing the water pollution or the amount of toxic chemicals entering the system by 50 per cent, there is not a similar agreement or at least a target related to Lake Ontario.

In other words, we have an agreement for the river, but we do not have an agreement for the entire lake. This is a very important and urgent matter because reducing the entry of toxic chemicals into Lake Ontario has an important significance for the health of eight million people living along the shores of that lake, as well as the health and the condition of people living along the St. Lawrence River downstream.

Madam Speaker, you are indicating that my time is up. I regret very much that I am unable to continue my presentation.

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Madam Speaker, I listened to the dissertation on the environment and water resources by my hon. friend from Davenport. While I found it very interesting, I had some difficulty drawing a connection between his dissertation and the bill that is before the House which is for borrowing authority.

In the initial part of his remarks he did speak a little bit about his party's approach to taxation. It is in that regard that I would like to ask him a question.

I must first compliment him for having developed the art of obfuscation to a level that has only previously been achieved by his leader.

He said that although they are going to get rid of the GST, that is for sure, they are going to wait and consult with Canadians before they decide what to do, if I understood him correctly. I am not sure whether this consultation is not also obfuscation, designed to get away from the fact that they really have not figured out what on earth to do, or if it is because they do not want to tell the public what they are going to do.

We are told they are considering a secret, hidden, business transfer tax that would be applied to everything, like food and medical services. That may or may not be true, I do not know.

I notice that in his references to the GST, he says that the taxation policies of this government have been targeted at benefiting the haves rather than the have nots. Therefore, I would ask him to explain how that coincides with the fact that this government in its income tax reforms has taken 800,000 Canadians off the income tax rolls. I wonder how he could say that about the GST, given that Canadians with incomes of less than $30,000 are in fact shielded from the GST by the GST credit. So his comments simply do not make any sense at all in that regard.

I would ask him about his own party's policy. Why will the Liberals not come clean with Canadians and say what they are going to do to replace the revenues now provided by the GST. Is it because they simply do not know, or they simply will not say?

Mr. Caccia: Mr. Speaker, this is a very fair question by the member for South Shore, for whom I have great respect, both for his intellectual and oratorical skills. I would be glad to offer him an answer.

First of all, on the borrowing authority and my intervention, the member for South Shore knows very well that whenever the government asks for money, you can deal with the over-all policy of the government in any way, shape or form. In this case it is a substantial amount, mind-boggling actually but understandable. I chose to focus at report stage on the social policies. Today at third reading I focused on natural resources.

Unfortunately I could not go on enlightening the hon. member further on the subject of the depletion of natural resources and the poor policies of the government. I could not cover, for instance, forestry for which this government has a pathetic record. We are now being haunted in Europe for our poor reputation in forestry management.

I could not deal with the question of the Canadian Environmental Protection Act in depth, as I would have liked to. I could not deal with the energy policies of this government. It has completely abandoned, in its vision for the future, the potential and the desirability of alternative energy resources, and the necessity of reducing our dependency on fossil fuels.

One has only to look at the estimates of the Ministry of Energy, Mines and Resources to see what has happened over the last eight years. There is a virtual decline, if not elimination, of grants and subsidies to renewable energy sources. The energy policy of this government in terms of the long-term outlook for Canada and the globe has been a complete disaster.

In answer to the other two questions of the hon. member for South Shore, perhaps he was not listening very carefully because I said that our position is one in which we say clearly that there will have to be an alternative to the GST. We know that the revenue of the state has to be assured and we think that the search for those alternative sources of revenue should be conducted in a transparent, visible manner, rather than behind closed doors. Therefore, we would engage in a public consultation by way of parliamentary and other means after the election, in order to find the alternative sources of taxation that will be necessary to replace the GST.

As a true democrat, the member for South Shore would applaud an initiative of this kind on the part of the Liberal Party. That is the way we prefer to do things. We do not want to impose our will and our preferences, but to do it in consultation with the people affected, as one should particularly in taxation methods. We can have a debate on the merit of that measure on another occasion.

The member is quite right when he says there are segments in our society that can qualify for a GST credit. I can tell him that there is increasing resistance, objection and criticism, particularly on the part of the seniors in Canada, to the fact that they have to fill out an income tax form which they did not have to do before and to the fact that their revenue is being scrutinized every year in order to qualify for this GST tax credit. They would prefer not to have to do it and they would prefer not to have to pay the GST.

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Madam Speaker, I was interested in the public consultation aspects of the hon. member's answer. He said that the Liberals are going to have public consultations.

As I remember correctly, four parliamentary committees and two royal commissions held wide public consultations from coast to coast, over a 40-year period as a matter of fact. In each one of those reports it was recommended that the manufacturers' sales tax be abolished and that a value added tax be brought in. In those 40 years the Liberals were in power most of the time and most of those committees and royal commissions were brought to fruition by the Liberal Party.

What did that public consultation mean to the Liberals? Obviously nothing because they did not take any action at that time. This government did take action on the recommendations and brought in a value added tax which was the recommendation of those commissions and committees both of Parliament and of the Senate.

What different consultation does the hon. member think he is going to have this time? Why should the Canadian people believe that they will do anything after they have been consulted because they did not over the 40-year period to which I referred?

Mr. Caccia: Madam Speaker, you have no idea how glad I am for this question. It reveals that light does not penetrate the limited grey matter of the hon. minister. He has never been famous for shining very much, but today he has demonstrated his utter stupidity. I will explain why. It has not dawned on him that Canadians do not like the GST. This is the point. Canadians do not like the GST. That is a fact of life. That is a political fact. It now requires a public consultation in light of the experience of the last few years. It is as simple as that.

We have gone through several years of GST and Canadians do not like it. Therefore a consultation is essential. In a democratic system would the hon. minister not want to have a consultation? Is he against it because we had consultations in the past? We must have consultations all the time. We must go to the people frequently, particularly on the subject of taxes. Otherwise we lose touch.

This is why this government is so low in the public opinion polls. It has lost touch. It thinks it can govern when the public is mad at it. Obviously there is a need for public consultation. I am astonished that the minister would ask such a silly question.

Mr. McDermid: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

I am willing to debate the hon. member any time in this House of Commons, but the quality of the debate is lowered when he stoops to calling names. It is unbecoming of the hon. member and totally weakens his argument.

Mr. Simmons: That is not a point of order. It is against the rules.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Burin—St. George's will please abstain. The hon. member for Burin—St. George's should know that screaming at the Chair will not change anything.

• (1220)

The hon. member for Davenport has used some terms which Beauchesne's may or may not consider parliamentary or unparliamentary. However, when the use of terms creates problems inside the House normally the parliamentary thing to do, the honourable thing to do, is to withdraw words which the hon. member does not normally use in the House. I am sure he would want to withdraw words which have been used in the last minute or so to enable us to continue with debate.

Mr. Caccia: Madam Speaker, I would—

Mr. Simmons: Point of order, Madam Speaker.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I have heard the hon. member. The floor had first been given to the hon. member for Davenport. I will certainly recognize the hon. member afterward. I cannot recognize two people at the same time.

The floor had been given to the hon. member for Davenport and he had risen to answer. The hon. member for Davenport has the floor.

Mr. Caccia: Madam Speaker, accuracy should prevail in this debate. The way in which I described the mental capacity of the hon. minister of state reflects an accurate statement on my part, which I do not think I can withdraw.

That is the assessment that I can make in all honesty from the minister's intervention and from the calibre of his question.

Therefore my statement stands.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I will hear the hon. member for Burin—St. George's and I will continue after.

Mr. Simmons: Madam Speaker, on my point of order my intervention was not directed at the Chair. The minister was clearly abusing the rule. I flagged that to him and made no aspersions to the Chair, so save me the lecture.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I do not recall giving a lecture to the hon. member. I simply reminded him that screaming "point of order", which he did, was unnecessary. I could certainly hear him and I had given the floor to the hon. member for Davenport.

I would like the House to understand what I have said before. I agree with the hon. member that if we look at Beauchesne's the words "stupid" and "stupidity" in debate are not considered unparliamentary as such.

However, when we talk about decorum in this place I think it has been agreed among all members of the House that if an accusation or something that can be construed as an insult causes a disturbance then normally members do withdraw that statement.

Mr. Caccia: Madam Speaker, in commenting on what you have just said I would like to assure you that mine is not an accusation. It is simply a statement of fact.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I will read the "blues" and if necessary come back to the House on this point.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Madam Speaker, it is with a certain amount of chagrin that I rise to join in this debate today. It is an honour for me to follow such experienced and illustrious members of this House as the hon. member for Davenport and the hon. member for Windsor West.

Mr. Lewis: Excuse me.

Ms. Clancy: I do not know why the hon. Solicitor General wants to be excused, but I will excuse him if he wishes.

In a discussion with the hon. member for Windsor West earlier this morning he made a point that I agree with whole-heartedly. He said in a borrowing bill such as the one we are debating today it is tantamount to irresponsibility of the highest order to give the government that has so mismanaged the Canadian economy over the last eight years another crack at it by giving it any more money. This government should realize what it has done and is doing to the Canadian people. Throw in the towel and do what the Canadian people want, which is call an election and call it today. No more borrowing bills. No more money to the government.

Mrs. Maheu: Increasing the debt.

Ms. Clancy: Issue the writ.

Mr. Bjornson: The public knows this is not an alternative.

Ms. Clancy: The Canadian people do not mind. I love the way the hon. member from Manitoba hurls an insult and leaves just as I love the way the hon. Solicitor General keeps wanting to be excused. I have excused him. He can go.

Let us look at some of the things this government has done to the people of Canada over the last eight years. In this year of grace alone the deficit has been revised from $27.5 billion to $34.4 billion. For average Canadians worried about their jobs, worried about their children's education, worried about whether their children will ever have a job, worried about whether they are going to have a job next week and worried about the economy generally, it is really wonderful to hear that the deficit has been, and I quote those anaemic not to say banal words, revised upward. It sounds so unthreatening to say that something has been revised upwards.

If we take $27.5 billion from $34.4 billion then we have a huge increase in the deficit from a government that has told us from the day of its arrival in power, a day that shall live in infamy, September 4, 1984, that it was going to deal with the deficit. It certainly dealt with the deficit. Oh, yes. We cannot deny that it has dealt with the deficit, revising it upward and upward every year, every day, every month. Every morning Canadians wake up and they are another $100 million in debt.

An hon. member: Shame. Shame.

Ms. Clancy: This is the government that wants to borrow more money and take us further into debt. This is the government that is looking for voters' confidence. It is amazing. This is a government that with this kind of record could not get a car loan from a chartered bank.

This same government over eight years has attacked and attacked the fabric of this country and the dreams of Canadians. It has attacked the simple things that every Canadian thought were his or her heritage.

It is absolutely appalling to look at the fiscal record of this government. It is appalling to think that in the 1990s Canadians are as ill-prepared for the future and in as bad a position financially as they are when we are facing the exigencies of the globalization of our economy.

It is beyond belief that a government that has created this snafu, that has created situations in which Canadians no longer feel that there is any hope for the future or that they can trust their government, then comes out with a whole load of theories that are tired and do nothing for individual Canadians. The government does not do the one thing that every Canadian from coast to coast to coast wants it to do: deal with the economy and create some real jobs.

That is what Canadians want in every riding in this country. Whether it is one of the major Toronto ridings, such as Broadview—Greenwood or Scarborough, smaller ridings in Ontario, ridings in the greater Montreal area, such as Saint-Laurent, Halifax, western Canada, central Canada, northern Canada, urban or rural does not matter.

What do Canadians want? We know what they want. They want jobs. They do not want jobs at fast food outlets that pay them minimum wage. They want jobs that give them hope for the future. They want jobs that give them a chance to provide for their families. They want jobs that give them a decent standard of living. That is the birthright of Canadians. What has this government done? It has taken away their birthright.

Not to pour oil on the fire, I am afraid that attitude is a stupid attitude. In this House, no matter where we sit, we must understand, as our neighbours to the south have understood and as maybe the Solicitor General who still needs to be excused will understand some day, that it is the economy.

There was a phrase said in the United States that I hesitate to use here in this House. I think we all know what it was. It is the economy. It has been the economy. It will continue to be the economy. It is the economy for every man, woman and child in this country. It has become a truism that the best social policy is a job.

In this country today young people come out of training courses, universities and vocational schools and they cannot get jobs. Whether they are trained to be skilled workers, whether they have a Ph.D., a law degree, an MD, an MBA, or a degree in engineering they cannot get a job. There are young people in this country today who have gone five, six, or seven years without anything that remotely approaches a real job. That is a disgrace.

That is something that every one of us should be giving our best efforts toward solving. In this country young people work hard, study hard, learn everything they can and get themselves trained but then there is nothing for them when they come out.

I do not know how many of us in this House have ever gone through a significant period of unemployment. I did once, very briefly. It was about a three-month period. I well remember the feeling of not being able to find a job. I remember the depression when one realizes that with one's skills and education one still cannot find a job. In this country today there are millions of people in that situation.

What is their government doing for them? Zip. Nothing. What is it doing for those people who have looked to the government for assistance? Nothing. This is not something that any Canadian of whatever political stripe can deal with. This is not something that they should have to deal with. This is something that calls for immediate action.

It is interesting watching our neighbour to the south, the things that happen, the desire for change that is roiling across this country as it roiled across the United States in the most recent election.

We look at President Clinton's announcement yesterday that he is going to immediately introduce an infrastructure rebuilding program. Is that not interesting?

Mr. Butland: You should have been here last night to vote.

Ms. Clancy: I was here to vote.

An hon. member: There were eight Liberals.

Mr. Lewis: A family feud.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Ms. Clancy: Get out of here. There were more than eight Liberals. There were 80 Liberals here last night.

The hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie cannot count, among other things. The hon. member from Saskatchewan and, again, the hon. Solicitor General should not interrupt. It is rude.

The point is that the President of the United States will introduce an immediate infrastructure package. Who has been saying that in this House for two years? It was the hon. member for Beauséjour, the hon. Leader of the Opposition. He has been saying that, as have all of us in the Liberal Official Opposition—as opposed to those persons who have no official status and keep interrupting, and I promise the hon. Solicitor General that it will become more official as the sparks fly upward or should I say as the flames engulf—they are burning in Orillia right now.

At any rate, the point is that jobs, jobs, jobs are the answer. We know that is the answer. The time has come to do something about it. The time has come to relieve the anxiety and the out and out fear that is grabbing Canadians by the throat. The time has come for this government to do what governments are supposed to do in this country.

An hon. member: Resign.

Ms. Clancy: I agree with that too. However, if this government is not going to do what it should do, which is issue the writ now as we are four years and two months past the date of the last election, then it should create jobs for Canadians. That is what this government should do. Creating the climate for a good economy is what Canadian governments—

Mr. McDermid: Climate.

Ms. Clancy: I do not disagree with the hon. minister. He is saying to me "climate" and he is shaking his finger. I agree with him. Do it.

Mr. McDermid: Not create jobs.

Ms. Clancy: You could create a few jobs too. It has happened in the 126-year history of this country that now and again the federal government has tried to create a few jobs, though I admit not often in the last eight years.

Other governments have created jobs. The sky has not fallen and the capitalist system has not fallen into the ocean. Creating jobs, if it happens to be a by-product of creating the climate to create jobs, is not necessarily a bad thing for the people of this country, particularly when the people of this country are attempting to wend their way out of the worst recession since the Great Depression of the 1930s.

We are sitting here in this House today in one of the coldest winters physically and economically that Canadians have ever seen. There is rank and abject suffering out there in this country while we sit here in this House and see no programs being developed to assist people.

Instead we see the creation of institutionalized attacks on Canadian citizens. I refer to Bill C-105, which I understand is not going to be debated today. One can only hope that the government is seeing the error of its ways. I want to talk about that because if the government is not seeing the error of its ways maybe it needs a few stories with human faces about what this bill could do to the people of Canada if it is left as it was originally introduced.

When I first questioned the government on this bill before Christmas I mentioned the horrors facing Canadian working people who will no longer have the opportunity to be protected by the Unemployment Insurance Act if they quit "voluntarily".

From 1980 to 1984 I chaired the unemployment insurance appeal board in Halifax. I saw many cases of people who quit because of horrendous working conditions. The one I remember most was a man who was working—

Mr. McDermid: That is justification.

Ms. Clancy: I am getting to that.

I understand about justification. If the member will just be a little patient he will see the point to my story.

There was a man who quit his job and was disqualified by the Unemployment Insurance Commission. He came before us as the appeal board to explain the reason that he had quit. He was working on an underground project. Subterranean piping was being put in. It was winter and it was cold. He was wearing rubber protective clothing but because of the temperature in the hole in the ground in which he was working the rubber would freeze and it was very difficult to move. On top of that water from some place or other was pouring down his neck while he was working. He said that he just could not stay there. He was sick every night, he was getting a cold, he was going to get pneumonia and on and on.

In that particular case we allowed the appeal. It went on to the umpire and it lost. The umpire did not want to deny the appeal but said he was forbidden to allow it because of the provisions of the act.

If that situation is not sufficient to create just cause everyone of us can think of thousands of other situations in which working people are going to be at a disadvantage because of employers.

In the entire UI appeals process employers do not even have to show up. The person who has left his job goes to the appeal. If the employer does not want to show up, and it is nothing to the employer, he does not have to come. What about—and I am not going to discuss it to any great extent because I have talked about it before and I will talk about it again in a different context—the whole question of sexual harassment?

The Minister of Employment and Immigration responded by saying that sexual harassment is just cause. That is cods wallop. It is not just cause.

This government, this country and this culture do not yet truly recognize that sexual harassment is a creation of offensive behaviour against women. The vast majority of men still do not understand the point. The fact that women are forced to deal with what can only be described as an unfair burden of proof means that they are not going to get their just desserts under this bill. This is just another example of the way in which this government carries on cavalierly in the face of evidence to the contrary and attacks working people rather than creating the right climate, as much as the minister might not like it, and creating some jobs so that people can have a decent life.

Mr. Crawford: They do not care.

Ms. Clancy: I am afraid the hon. member for Kent is absolutely right. The Conservatives do not care. They will care soon. Within the next six months they will care, but by then it will be too late.

There are so many tragedies developing in this country from coast to coast. In my region of Atlantic Canada tragedies in the field of employment, and the lack thereof, are becoming so much the order of the day that they almost do not have any impact any more. People are becoming callous because tragedy is something they deal with every day.

The situation in Port Hawkesbury—am I out of time? I will leave the situation in Port Hawkesbury and just say that this is something the government could work on as well.

Hon. Doug Lewis (Solicitor General of Canada): Madam Speaker, I was probably one of the few people in the House who listened to my hon. friend's remarks. I did so because she represents a maritime riding and the estimates include moneys which will go, in part, toward the purchase of the new helicopters.

We have all sat here and listened in amazement as her leader attacked the fisherpersons of this country and attacked the military by saying that the Liberal Party when it is elected would eliminate or cancel the plans for these new helicopters.

In view of the fact that these new helicopters will be used in search and rescue missions, which is very important to my hon. friend's electorate, and in view of the fact that she has a military component among her electors I wonder if my hon. friend would like to take this opportunity to disassociate herself completely from the remarks of her leader, or does she want to suggest that her electors want to fly about in these 30-year old helicopters that will be 35 years old by the time they are replaced? This has been a devastating attack on people who require helicopters for rescue.

I notice my hon. friend did not participate in any of the questioning on the helicopter issue. I would have thought she would have, unless she really rejected her leader's position on this purchase. It would be good for her to set the record straight. She should start her personal election campaign by abandoning that position. Those helicopters are so old they have almost served longer than the Leader of the Official Opposition and they run the very real risk of becoming older than some of her leader's ideas.

I thought it would be appropriate to take this time to put on the record the fact that the member should abandon her leader's old ideas, abandon this nonsense about the helicopters and stand up for her electors in Halifax.

Ms. Clancy: Madam Speaker, it always gives me great joy to be questioned by the hon. Solicitor General because he gives me such wonderful material.

I am going to deal with the helicopters, but let me first say that I stood up for my electors about the possibility of putting the women's prison in the greater Halifax-Dartmouth area, where the facilities are. However the Solicitor General put it in Truro, where there are no facilities. That is all right. I am sure the hon. member for Cumberland—Colchester was happy but I do not know about the hon. member for Halifax West.

Allow me to deal with the helicopters. Disassociate myself from my leader? Never. First, Liberals do not do that and, second, my leader is right.

In my riding there is not just a significant military component, as the Solicitor General called it, but the largest military base in the country and we are very proud of that. We are proud of the search and rescue and we are proud of the Sea Kings, which may be old but they do the job. If they were refit and refurbished they could continue to do the job. It is only elderly solicitor generals who have a problem with being over 35.

Another very interesting point is that I have another component in my riding. In my riding and close to my riding I have five universities with the highest tuitions, the oldest physical plants and the lowest salaries in Canada. Why do we have this problem in our universities in Atlantic Canada and in my riding of Halifax? One of the reasons is the cuts this government has made to Established Programs Financing, and more so the cuts it has made to R and D.

The five universities in the greater Halifax area heard the Leader of the Opposition say that we would priorize moneys that would have been wasted on nuclear search helicopters that we do not need. I have a news flash for the government: the nuclear threat has reduced and the cold war is over. My leader said that he would priorize that spending and direct it into, among other things, research and development at Canadian universities.

At Dalhousie University, the Technical University of Nova Scotia, St. Mary's University, the Atlantic School of Theology, the Nova Scotia College of Art and Design and at my Alma Mater, which is outside my riding but on the edge of it, Mount St. Vincent University, people cheered when they heard that because they want more research and development. That is what we need and that is what this government will not give us.

If the Solicitor General is so interested in the helicopters can I also remind him about the submarines. His government was going to give us all these submarines.

When I was nominated in 1988 I built my nomination speech around the fact that we did not need or want submarines. Lo and behold I got elected and I am here now. It did not hurt me then and I suggest to the hon. Solicitor General that the people of Halifax know what is smart defence spending and what is not smart defence spending. They will be very happy when we have control of those kinds of budgets and we spend the money in places where it can be best utilized.

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Madam Speaker, the Liberal Party and our colleague from the Liberal Party have trotted it out yet again: the Liberal policy is municipal infrastructure.

Ms. Clancy: You bet.

Mr. Butland: It is very important. They suggest that it is solely a Liberal idea.

Ms. Clancy: Of course it is.

Mr. Butland: It is the whole country's idea, with the exception of the people opposite.

Last night the Liberal Party had an opportunity to say in a vote that they support a tri-level, municipal infrastructure rehabilitation, yet the New Democrats were home alone. There were seven Liberals here to vote for the policy, a very important platform in the Liberal policy.

I know in questions and comments the response is often evasive so I am going to ask a specific question of the member and not get off track. Why were the Liberals not here last night to vote for a very important part of their platform, municipal infrastructure?

Ms. Clancy: Madam Speaker, it is very true I was not here last night. When I heard about it this morning I was at first horrified, but then I discovered that the vote last night was on a private member's bill of the New Democratic Party. That is fine. I am glad that party picked up our idea.

It is our idea. We have had motions and private members' bills, votable motions and opposition days on infrastructure. Indeed we even had the government accept some of our policy on the new home ownership project.

I remind my honourable, very kind and truly gallant friend from Sault Ste. Marie that I am awfully sorry we were not here last night. Believe me, if ever in the history of the world right after pigs fly they form a national government, I will be happy to support their infrastructure project.

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Madam Speaker, I would like to ask my hon. friend a very brief question.

The Liberal Party is laying claim to what was instituted by the Minister of Finance with regard to housing policy as its ideas. Might I remind the hon. member that the ideas did not come from the Liberal Party or from the Conservative Party. They in fact came from the Canadian Home Builders' Association and the Canadian Association of Real Estate Boards. They did not come from the Liberal Party.

I wish she would quit standing up and taking credit for them. She should give credit where credit is due, to the associations that brought the ideas both to the opposition and to the government, and this government listened to them and brought them into effect.

Ms. Clancy: Madam Speaker, I say to the hon. minister that I am delighted to give credit where credit is due. I have even given some of it to his government.

I would like to add in closing that I wish the Conservatives would steal some more good ideas from anywhere so we could have a few decent programs that the people of this country so desperately need.

The hon. minister could steal a couple more good ideas. I will give them to him, and if he would implement them quickly and create some jobs I would not care if he ever thanked me. As a matter of fact I would not care if he did not even mention my name.

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Madam Speaker, we are obviously debating the borrowing authority bill. It is quite interesting from the contradictions in the speech of the member for Halifax that she represents the party that is famous for its spending and overspending and famous for not attacking anything or going after any measure that would reduce our debt as a country. The Liberals are for spending more; they are never for spending less.

With regard to some of the specifics she mentioned when she talked about the government creating jobs, I think it is worth mentioning that the point we on this side of the House should make more often is that a government puts in place policies and legislation that create an atmosphere or a climate wherein jobs are created. Her solution is to borrow more money and throw more money at the problem, without attacking the very shaky policies they have had over the years that have created some of the problems we now face. If borrowing more money was a solution to the problem all governments would do it.

There is failed logic in the speech just given by the member for Halifax. She attacked the very thing they have supported for years and years.

A government has to get the fundamentals correct. It has to create a climate wherein people want to invest, businessmen want to take chances, and real jobs are created. I will go through some of the elements that must be present to create real jobs.

I remind the member there are 1.3 million more Canadians working today than when we took office. That is an established fact. There are over 12 million Canadians in the work force. Incidentally those 12 million Canadians in the work force—Canadians who are working today is the way I should phrase it—represent 89 per cent of all Canadians eligible to work who are working. We do have an unemployment rate which is higher than any of us in this House would like to see, but we still have 89 per cent of all Canadians working.

Obviously we would like to achieve 100 per cent. Can we achieve it? Maybe we can, but we achieve it by supporting the types of programs and the types of strategy we on this side of the House support. I want to remind the member what some of those programs are and what we have done with regard to the fundamentals.

Interest rates would be a good place to start. Some 10 years ago perhaps all of us in the House were in the work force, but Canada had 20 per cent interest rates under the leadership of a Liberal government. Interest rates went through the roof; inflation went through the roof.

In Canada today we have the lowest inflation rate we have had in 20 years. We have the lowest interest rates we have had in 20 years. This fosters a climate for investment and is why Canada is predicted to lead the G–7 nations in economic growth this year.

The fundamentals are there and they are working. They are going to create real jobs and real opportunity. That is what we on this side of the House believe.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member. He can continue his presentation after Question Period.

FIXED LINK PROJECT

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, it may be possible that I will not be here to participate in the debate on the fixed link project so I want to make my views and my strong support known for this 13-kilometre bridge.

As a member of Parliament and businessman in Atlantic Canada for years, I know for sure that the key to Atlantic Canada's economic future lies in the best possible transportation system available. Without proper highways and without this direct connection to the Island, we will never achieve our potential and share in the wealth of Canada.

Currently Prince Edward Island has an unemployment rate almost 40 per cent higher than that of New Brunswick or Nova Scotia. It also has a much lower average income. I believe that when the fixed link is completed, Prince Edward Island will be able to compete on a level playing field with the other maritime provinces. This, combined with a proper four-lane highway throughout the region, will allow the entire area to compete with anyone.

Not only will this project provide a competitive infrastructure, it will also attract hundreds of thousands of tourists to our area during construction and after completion. In the meantime it will create thousands of jobs throughout the Atlantic region in a time when we need them the most.

For those of us in the immediate area it is hard to believe that the project is actually about to begin. The concept of a fixed link has been talked about for a hundred years and even as late as two decades ago approaches were—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's time has expired.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE REFORM

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): Mr. Speaker, Progressive Conservative members from Quebec have once again ignored the needs of their fellow citizens by voting against a motion condemning as unfair, inequitable and far too severe a government policy that introduces cuts in unemployment insurance.

They continue to add to the already heavy burden on people who are in greatest need. They forget they have a duty to defend the interests of their fellow citizens who are barely coping in these difficult times. We must remember that when people lose their jobs and are not eligible for benefits, they have to go on welfare, which means the burden is shifted to the provinces.

We must also remember that the government administers a fund to which it does not contribute one penny. Since only employers and employees pay into the fund, they should at least have some say in the matter and have a chance to consider their future.

NATIONAL INFRASTRUCTURE

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, when the talking stops and action is required Canadians cannot find the Liberal Party.

The Liberals have changed their position on free trade. The Liberals have changed their position on the GST. On the gulf war they had three different positions over three different days.

Last night, when the House voted on an infrastructure and highways program, the Liberals did not attend the vote. The Liberals knew about the vote. Only six Liberal MPs showed up to support the motion presented by the NDP member for Regina—Lumsden, calling for a national infrastructure program and a highways program.

On 15 occasions since last November the Liberal Party has asked for such a program in this House. Yet last night, when there was a vote on this motion, the Liberals did not attend. Had they attended last night's motion, it would have passed.

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, today Le Devoir reports that the École supérieure de danse du Québec in Montreal has informed its teachers and accompanists that there has been a change in policy and they will be obliged to work during a summer course held from June 21 to July 23.

The existing jurisprudence and unemployment insurance manuals refer to section 6.2(5): failure to renew a job contract. According to this section, most teaching contracts are automatically renewed from year to year. A teacher quits voluntarily if he decides not to renew his contract for the coming year.

Fifty per cent of the income of the École de danse du Québec comes from provincial subsidies. Here we see employers already tightening the screws before Bill C-105 has even been adopted. They are trying to intimidate employees into signing a contract for the summer so they can make more money. At this rate, we must have some amendments to Bill C-105.

ABORIGINAL AFFAIRS

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, children and adults in Davis Inlet have reached the depth of despair when attempts are made to end their lives.

There are 100 of these communities in Canada. We have a Third World problem within our own country. The pattern of disease among Canada's aboriginal people resembles the main killers of the developing world.

As Canada's legislators in this House of Commons we have a moral responsibility to take serious constructive action to address these critical problems. I cannot accept members in this House declaring that this situation is the fiduciary responsibility of a certain province or another. We can no longer allow the aboriginal community to be the ping-pong ball in the jurisdictional debate between the federal government and the provinces.

For years we have been hearing what needs to be done and how we can do it, yet we have continued to procrastinate. The economic and cultural base of native communities needs strengthening immediately. Action is needed now, not further study.

Mrs. Louise Feltham (Wild Rose): Mr. Speaker, I would like to commend our government and the province of Alberta for their co-operative efforts in signing the Canada-Alberta Environmentally Sustainable Agriculture Agreement.

The goal is to facilitate the conservation and protection of the natural resources that agriculture uses to minimize the impact of agriculture on the environment.

As the member for Wild Rose I applaud both the spirit of co-operation between the two levels of government and the long-range view toward protecting the agricultural environment of Alberta.

INNU

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Nunatsiaq): Mr. Speaker, this government just does not get it. The Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development keeps saying relocation of the Davis Inlet Innu is not the answer.

The minister does not understand the difference between a relocation forced on a people and a relocation requested by a people. Sending the children outside their home territory for treatment when they have to return to the same despair and hopelessness they are trying to escape is no solution.

Why will the government not believe the Innu when they say relocation to the site they have chosen on the mainland is their best hope for the fresh new beginning they so desperately need in order to heal themselves?

Time and time again aboriginal people in this country have suffered the consequences of government presuming to know what is best for their interests. This attitude has to stop now.

The government does not know what is best for the Innu. I urge the government to trust the Innu to propose the right solutions for their people. Listen to them and respond. Do not impose outside solutions. The Innu cannot take it any more and we will not stand for it.

OFFICIAL OPPOSITION

Mr. Jean-Marc Robitaille (Terrebonne): Mr. Speaker, yesterday we saw the spectacle of an Official Opposition depending on political rhetoric and disinformation to satisfy its own partisan ends.

Just now we heard the hon. member for Gatineau—La Lièvre say that the federal government does not participate in any way in the Unemployment Insurance Fund. To a certain extent this is true, but it is not the whole truth, because the federal government has an obligation to make up the fund's deficit.

Even more obvious is the opposition's capacity for condemning and criticizing, without ever suggesting concrete solutions to the problems we are facing in Canada today.

The Leader of the Official Opposition is a case in point. One day he supports free trade and the next he condemns it. One day he supports the GST, the next day he is against it, and the day after he wants to introduce a value added tax. You can never tell what side of the fence he is on.

These people ignore reality and will not face the facts. Above all, they are abysmally ignorant about the taxpayer's ability to pay. And even worse, by spreading false rumours they help create crisis after crisis in this country.

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, just when the new Clinton administration in the United States is starting to consider ways of controlling escalating drug costs including limits to patent protection, this government pushes ahead with the Senate passage of Bill C-91.

In Bill C-91 the Tory government has complied in advance with the North American free trade agreement. It has been aided and abetted by the Liberal Party that continues its waffling on free trade.

Last night in the Senate only 30 Liberal senators bothered to show up to vote against Bill C-91. If their full complement of 91 Liberal senators had turned out, this bill would have been defeated.

By their absence the Liberals ensured passage. Liberals once again followed Judy Erola, former Liberal Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and now chief lobbyist for multinational drug companies.

Canadians deserve better representation to protect their rights to affordable health care.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Mr. Larry Schneider (Regina—Wascana): Mr. Speaker, I call upon members of this Parliament to abide by the expectations of our constituents wherein they require that this place be a more respectful place. My constituents have heaped scorn upon all political parties for their behaviour.

• (1410)

As we enter into an election period the tendency will be more and more to achieve recognition by the media and hence our constituents, no matter how silly it may be. Exhibitionist acts that appear to defy authority will likely be tempting some.

This Chamber has seen fish, crows, suggestive gestures, profanity and poor acts of righteous indignation, and I question, impressing whom?

If one is incapable of making one's point through the use of intelligence then surely silence should be considered. In respecting this place perhaps it would be wise to consider respecting those from whom we expect respect.

LITERACY

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, in September 1988 the Prime Minister announced a $110 million initiative aimed at funding literacy activities over a five-year period. At that time he stated:

The time is now long since past when government can sit on the sidelines and leave the issue of illiteracy to the efforts of the voluntary sector.

These programs will come to an end in 1993. So far there is no commitment of government intention to continue funding these literacy programs. As we know, literacy is directly linked to poverty and to unemployment.

The government must act to remove the barrier facing the poor. It must ensure a proper funding policy is in place. The government must recognize that literacy is a right of Canadians and not a privilege.

I call upon the government to do the right thing and continue funding literacy programs in Canada.

EATING DISORDERS AWARENESS WEEK

Mrs. Monique B. Tardif (Charlesbourg): Mr. Speaker, this is Eating Disorders Awareness Week, with the theme "breaking stereotypes, celebrating a healthy weight".

The National Eating Disorders Information Centre and other groups all across Canada will tackle the problem of the obsession with slimness and appearance, especially among women. The purpose is to draw attention to the social factors that contribute to eating disorders, like anorexia, bulimia or obsession with slimness. Information on eating disorders will be given to the public to dispel the myths and indicate where to find the appropriate resources.

I am pleased that the messages being conveyed this week are in keeping with this government's efforts to promote the concept of healthy weight. A healthy body can take many different shapes. Having a healthy weight does not necessarily mean being slim.

I want to congratulate the National Eating Disorders Information Centre for all its efforts to draw attention to this important health problem.

VIOLENT CRIME

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, I rise today on behalf of the families of Sherri-Lee and Maurice Paul and Terri-Lynn Babb, three Manitobans who were murdered in the last month by men whom our justice system could not seem to stop by restraining orders from stalking them and killing them.

I also rise on behalf of Mrs. Sharon Jensen, my constituent, whose daughter Marilyn was killed under similar circumstances last year and who despairs about the political system ever reacting to the work that she has done to try to get this government and the Manitoba government to do something about these crimes. She has fought hard to prevent another mother from going through what she has.

On behalf of these families and all Canadian families whose relatives have been taken by or who live in fear of these kinds of acts, I call upon the Solicitor General to take action now to amend the Criminal Code of Canada to ensure that restraining orders are actually worth more than the paper they are written on, and that we as a society do everything we can to ensure that the system does not fail another family in this way.

CRIME PREVENTION

Mr. Brian O'Kurley (Elk Island): Mr. Speaker, one of the most important concerns expressed by Canadians is the need for effective crime prevention in our communities.

In the riding of Elk Island citizens from all walks of life have joined together in organizations such as Rural Crime Watch in an effort to make our homes safer and more secure. As a result of many months of hard work these volunteers have set up a province-wide rural crime watch workshop which will take place this weekend in the community of Nisku.

Participants include representatives from municipal, provincial and federal governments, as well as police, judges, prosecutors and farm organizations. In addition student winners of essay and poster contests will be recognized. The theme of the workshop is working together to prevent crime. Let us all work together for safer communities and a better Canada.

NORTHUMBERLAND

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, the major concern of people across this country is the unacceptably high unemployment rate and the persistent economic recession.

Despite the government's insistence that good times are just ahead of us, my riding of Northumberland continues to face new job losses, business closures and bankruptcies. Federal government cutbacks to social expenditures and provincial transfer payments have resulted in Northumberland municipalities from Trenton across to Cobourg and Port Hope scrambling to meet new demands on social assistance programs.

Home owners and small businesses are already strangled by numerous federal tax increases. Consequently, our municipalities feel forced to cut necessary services such as day care, dental care, family counselling services, emergency child services and seniors care services.

This government's insistence on dealing with debt through the cutting of programs has increased hardship across this country. People are our nation's most important resource. The government must introduce programs which will encourage wealth creation in this country, introduce people-centred policies and stimulate a sense of hope in a nation with a great future.

Mr. Speaker, we cannot wait.

COMMEMORATIVE MEDALS

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, one of the first and most significant events to take place in my riding in this or any other year was the presentation on January 3 of 101 Governor General's 125th anniversary commemorative medals to citizens of Fredericton—York—Sunbury who have distinguished themselves by their contributions to making Canada a better place in which to live.

These 101 medals were intended to honour not just those citizens selected to receive them, but also to reflect real tribute to the thousands of other men and women who regularly help to build our community and our country. In their own way each of them is truly an unsung hero.

It is fitting that this medal was commemorating our 125th anniversary and hopefully it will help us to dedicate ourselves to Canada's rich destiny in the 125 years which lie ahead.

I want to express my respect and appreciation to His Excellency, the Governor General, for his wise and sensitive judgment in striking these Canada 125 medals.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

TRADE

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the Deputy Prime Minister.

The Prime Minister will be meeting with President Clinton tomorrow. President Clinton said he wants new agreements on the environment and on labour conditions to the NAFTA deal before proceeding with NAFTA.

Will the Prime Minister agree with President Clinton tomorrow that he is right in demanding changes to the NAFTA deal?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I think my hon. friend has got it wrong. President Clinton has said the NAFTA deal will not be changed. He is seeking supplementary agreements to the NAFTA which have nothing to do with the text itself. These have to do with the environment and labour relations.

It also has to do with an arrangement he wants to make with the United States Congress that we have nothing to do with at all. He will ask Congress to increase the amount of labour adjustment policies that they have. That is with good reason because on a per capita basis the Canadian labour adjustment policies such as training and related matters are about two to three times better than those of the United States.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, when the President of the United States says that he will not proceed with implementing the agreement between the United States, Mexico and Canada until they have obtained satisfaction on the environment and working conditions, it is quite obvious that he wants changes to this agreement.

Since the President of the United States is asking for changes to the agreement, will the Canadian government take advantage of these discussions to ask that Canada obtain the same conditions as Mexico got with respect to energy policies?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the President has said quite specifically that he is not seeking, repeat not seeking, changes to the agreement. He is seeking some side agreements, what he has called supplementary accords, with Mexico and to an extent with us. He is concerned as much about Mexican cross-border environmental problems as anything else and those will not change the text of the NAFTA agreement.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I do not understand why the minister is trying to be technical. The President has said the United States will not proceed with NAFTA as long as it is not satisfied that it has the proper conditions concerning the environment and the labour conditions. It is clear that the United States wants some changes.

Will this government take up this occasion to make sure that in the matter of energy Canadians will be treated the same way the Mexicans are being treated by the Americans in that deal?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I repeat again, the NAFTA text is not subject to change.

The President has said he is seeking changes with the environment and labour elements that are outside of the text. He is also looking for, as I said a minute ago, changes to the labour adjustment policies in the United States of America. It has nothing to do with Canada.

The fact is that we had been talking about the same type of accord on labour and on the environment with the outgoing administration. We are seeking to continue those discussions with the incoming administration when they are ready to discuss what the specifics might be.

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, given recent U.S. trade actions against pork and steel we assume that the Prime Minister in his conversations with the President will seek from him assurances that that sort of trade harassment is now going to end.

Since President Clinton has said that he will seek two parallel or supplementary accords on the environment and on labour standards will the Prime Minister, for his part, now seek a parallel or supplementary agreement on subsidies and anti-dumping which would prevent the sort of harassment we have been seeing in Canada for the past month?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I responded to that question to my hon. friend two days ago.

What we have achieved through the Uruguay round negotiations, which I know he and I both sincerely hope will be completed successfully very soon, is a substantial improvement on the countervailing duty and subsidy arrangements that would affect all countries.

As regards the anti-dumping which is the subject of the steel problems, we and many other countries have tried but there is no willingness on the part of the Americans to change their anti-dumping laws. Their anti-dumping laws are the same as our anti-dumping laws. I am sure my hon. friend is not standing up saying that he wishes to see a reduction or elimination of the protection we have against some actions on the part of American companies hurting Canadian companies.

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, the minister knows in the Uruguay round, the long delayed Uruguay round which we would all welcome, there is provision for a subsidies code.

Will the Prime Minister seek from the President of the United States an assurance that the President will urge an early conclusion of the Uruguay round or if not, that the subsidies code in the Uruguay round be transplanted to NAFTA so we can end this sort of trade harassment we are getting in Canada?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend can be assured absolutely that the Prime Minister will be urging the President to proceed with a satisfactory conclusion of the Uruguay round as soon as possible.

That has been our position for some time now and I will be taking that message to Mr. Kantor when I meet with him. I am sure my hon. friend will be very pleased that will be the position of the Government of Canada.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, my leader is in Port Hawkesbury visiting the most recent victim of the Canada–U.S. trade deal.

While the Prime Minister said yesterday that the move by Premium Automotive was atypical of Canadian companies, he knows full well as does the Minister for International Trade that since the trade deal was signed over 400,000 manufacturing jobs have been lost in this country. He also knows that the United States administration is harassing Canada on softwood lumber, on steel and on hogs, simply to name a few.

When our Prime Minister visits President Clinton, will he indicate that the Liberal policy of renegotiating the contract is simply not on and that based on the FTA's dismal record Canada will cancel this deal and will not proceed with the North American free trade agreement?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, let me just quote from an objective analysis of the free trade agreement by the C.D. Howe Research Institute:

"It seems clear that the recession has not been due to factors directly related to the free trade agreement. Indeed, the facts so far are more consistent with the optimistic scenario of free trade supporters than with the views of detractors", like my hon. friend. "Free trade with the United States has helped the development of higher value-added industries that are crucial to Canada's economic growth. In particular, many of Canada's manufacturing sectors seem to have performed remarkably well on the United States market under the free trade agreement".

If my hon. friend needs any proof of this he need only look to the last Statistics Canada trade results for the first 11 months of last year when our exports to the United States were up 11.9 per cent compared to the year before.

If he goes back to 1988 when the free trade agreement started he will see that Canadian exports are up about double the rate as those from Japan, Germany or the United Kingdom into the United States market. Canadian companies are performing well. They are succeeding under the free trade agreement.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, the minister can say anything he likes but he should recognize that Canadians believe the real way to measure the effectiveness of his policies is by the number of unemployed which continues to escalate in this country.

The minister also knows that again and again we have heard that the Canada–U.S. trade deal was not going to lower our social programs to the lowest common denominator. However, we have an auto parts company in Nova Scotia that may be going to New Hampshire, a U.S. state with no income tax, lax environmental and labour standards and worst of all, an unemployment insurance system just like the one the government is proposing.

Is it a coincidence that this government's Draconian UI reforms conform to states like New Hampshire, or does FTA and NAFTA have something to do with it?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the mind boggles when it hears all the inconsistencies riddling the hon. member's question. If he goes right to the heart of the issue he will find that the company in Nova Scotia makes steel gas tanks. Not many companies are using steel gas tanks now. They are using plastic gas tanks. That is the fundamental problem that company has faced. It has not kept up with the marketplace.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the same minister. The minister is always quoting favourable articles with regard to free trade and NAFTA. Can he explain how an American expert has said that the recent U.S. ruling on steel was an example of harassment, corruption and I quote: "reveals the hypocrisy and absurdity of U.S. dumping off"?

While he is on his feet can he also explain how Canadians can get a fair deal in Mexico when IBM officials say they were told to offer a $1 million bribe in order to get a contract that a Canadian company did not get because of the corruption in that country as well?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend and his colleagues in the New Democratic Party do not want to see the NAFTA proceed. They would like to see a country like Mexico kept at low levels of economic performance and low levels of wealth so that it cannot raise its standard of living, its standards of environmental protection, its standards of health care, not through hand-outs from other countries but through its own sources of wealth that will be generated by the free trade agreement.

Surely my hon. friend can take the blindfold off his face and try to look at the positive elements of this agreement on Mexico. Or does he want to see Mexico stay down so that the New Democratic Party can lord themselves over that country?

PHARMACEUTICALS

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister of health. Yesterday the Tory majority in the Senate rammed through Bill C-91 which effectively harmonizes Canadian drug patent laws with that of the United States. At that very same time in Washington, a Senate committee issued a scathing indictment of U.S. drug patent laws, singling out those laws as the prime reason for escalating U.S. health care costs.

• (1430)

I want to ask the minister of health: Since it is clear that the U.S. Senate says that its system is flawed and since President Clinton of the United States says their system is flawed, why on earth are we adopting the very system that they are about to abandon?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I believe we had that debate a few weeks ago and we gave the arguments that should be given in terms of intellectual property.

When my friend talks about the health care system in the United States, he knows very well that it is not a question of drugs management. He knows very well that we do not talk about universality in the United States. We know that even if the Americans are not covered, the Canadian system remains exactly the same.

Once again, we had that debate. We showed the evidence that Bill C-91 was good and fortunately the Senate confirmed the decision of the House.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister.

Arkansas Senator David Pryor, senior adviser to President Clinton, in commenting on this report yesterday said: "Well, what can we do about this situation?" In short, he says that we can shorten the patent life of drug products in the United States. In other words, they could adopt the Canadian system of compulsory licensing, the very system that this government killed last night.

Now that the deed is done, now that the government has killed compulsory licensing, whose interests was this government serving since it is clearly obvious now that it was not the interests of the Canadian public?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I would like to answer the member by what was said to me yesterday in his own province by a researcher at Dalhousie University. He told me that fortunately Canadian researchers will now be able to keep the property of what has been found in Canada and use it in terms of the way we work. In clinical trials, it will work in terms of the application of that research. It will not go to the United States; it will remain in Canada.

This is exactly why all of the science community is happy with Bill C-91. It represents a big victory for researchers in Canada.

PREMIUM AUTOMOTIVE TANKS INC.

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister.

The rantings yesterday of the Prime Minister about the owner of Premium Automotive may make good TV but they do nothing for the unemployed workers who are left out in the cold as a result of his government's incompetence.

Will the Acting Prime Minister instruct the minister for Atlantic development to begin negotiating today with the province of Nova Scotia and with local authorities a plan to create lasting jobs in the Port Hawkesbury area and indeed in the entire strait area?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I am advised that officials from the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency as well as the province are meeting right now to discuss possible ways of seeking new investors and new ways of keeping that facility open.

My hon. friend and I are of the same mind, that if there is any way that we can keep this facility open and maintain those jobs then that is the objective that we both have.

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, that is not good enough. The people in Port Hawkesbury deserve action from this government.

I ask the Acting Prime Minister again: Will he work with the local authorities to create a comprehensive plan to restore the economic health of that area which has been so sadly neglected by his government over the last eight years?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, now we have gone from the sublime to the ridiculous. I think my hon. friend must have a very, very short memory. He does not remember that the Cape Breton investment tax credit has been one of the important ways that we have seen jobs created in that part of the country. It has been a very generous tax credit that has generated jobs and has generated opportunities for the people of the country. I think my hon. friend should be reminding his constituents of this because this government has not ignored the plight of those people in his part of the country.

Mr. Cid Samson (Timmins—Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, this morning Le Devoir reported that employers have already started to use Bill C-105 to tighten the screws on their employees.

My question is directed to the Minister of State for Employment and Immigration. When will she realize she has just opened the door wide open to employer abuse of employees and when will she withdraw Bill C-105, once and for all?

[English]

Hon. Pauline Browes (Minister of State (Employment and Immigration)): Mr. Speaker, yesterday we had a substantial debate on this issue. Bill C-105 has not come to the floor of the House of Commons for debate to this point.

Let me just remind the member that when we speak of this bill we are looking at whether it is fair that people who are working should be paying for people who choose not to work. Is it fair to restrain the deficit with these measures in terms of people who choose not to work? Is it fair for new workers that come on that employers are able to get those persons without paying UI? Is it fair that more training should be done because of the UI?

I say that this is quite fair.

Mr. Cid Samson (Timmins—Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, through you, I want to say to the minister that unemployment insurance is something we all pay for and should not be used as an excuse to impose this burden on the unemployed. It is because of this government's policies that they are being laid off in the first place.

Furthermore, since the beginning of this debate we have heard the government say time and time again that the appeal process will restore the balance. I wish the minister would realize that—

Mr. Speaker: Please put your question.

Mr. Samson: —the process takes months and even years.

Again, I want to ask the minister: When will she withdraw the bill? That is the only thing we are waiting for.

[English]

Hon. Pauline Browes (Minister of State (Employment and Immigration)): Mr. Speaker, Bill C-105 will come to the floor of the House of Commons with an opportunity to debate. We look to the members of the House of Commons to make any improvements that need to be made at that time.

I want to stress to the people watching today that what this bill is all about is that those people who choose not to work will not get unemployment insurance. There is just cause. There are many reasons why people choose not to work and that would be covered under just cause and those persons would get unemployment insurance. There will be ample opportunity for the discussion of this.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

Hon. William Rompkey (Labrador): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

There is still no resolution to the tragic situation of substance abuse at Davis Inlet. Local people feel that flying children to the United States is not a long-term answer.

I want to ask the minister today to tell the people of Davis Inlet whether he agrees that a treatment program must be culturally based and must be in the Innu language. If he agrees with those principles, will he respond favourably to a request that will come forward from Davis Inlet today or tomorrow based on those lines?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, what I announced yesterday was an immediate answer to an emergency problem with the kids who were involved last week in the gas sniffing problem. Obviously we are waiting for the community. As I said yesterday, no decision will be made which would be contrary to what the community wants to do.

I heard the vice-chief say this morning that they would prefer to have a treatment centre within—not the reserve because they are not reserve Indians—their community.

I do not turn down that proposal. However, tomorrow morning we have people from the federal level and the provincial level who will discuss with people in Davis Inlet. They will certainly come up with a proposal. If the nature of the proposal is the same one that my friend proposes, I will certainly consider that option.

Hon. William Rompkey (Labrador): Mr. Speaker, there is a location called Border Beacon just west of Davis Inlet which has an airstrip and facilities and which could be put in place at relatively little cost.

That I believe is the preferred option of the local people. I want to ask the minister whether he believes that is the best option with a holistic approach to treatment. When that proposal for a Border Beacon treatment centre comes forward, will he see that the finances are put in place immediately to fund such a treatment centre?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, my officials have been instructed to discuss that option with the people tomorrow.

However, I want to raise in the House the question of gas sniffing and the problem of suicide, particularly within the aboriginal community. In December I met with the chiefs from different provinces. I will again meet with them in March. The problem is one of the major mental health problems we have with aboriginal people in Canada.

The decision we make for Davis Inlet is very important for those people. We have to keep in mind that the problem goes beyond the people we are talking about. We have to consider all the communities we deal with across Canada.

IMMIGRATION AND REFUGEE BOARD

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the acting minister of immigration.

Earlier this week, there were serious charges from members of the Immigration and Refugee Board in Montreal that they were pressured by senior officials to make decisions on refugee applications contrary to the facts. This is a repetition of similar incidents in Toronto last year.

Considering that the Immigration and Refugee Board is supposed to be an independent tribunal, will the government initiate an independent public inquiry into these serious charges and take steps to stop these incidents immediately?

Hon. Pauline Browes (Minister of State (Employment and Immigration)): Mr. Speaker, the comments that the hon. member makes are serious. I would expect that he would be providing details himself of where there are incidents of some wrongdoing.

The Immigration Appeal Board and the Immigration and Refugee Board are independent bodies. They make decisions weighing the facts of the matter. If there is some specific information that the member wishes to share with the department or with me, I would be pleased to review it.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, the minister has not answered the question.

Last November, Dr. Sam Ifejika resigned from the board in Toronto, alleging that board members were under political pressure. There were also instances of racist remarks, ridicule and mismanagement.

When will the government start cleaning up this very important board and stop its appointments of incompetent political friends?

[English]

When will the government take these matters seriously?

Hon. Pauline Browes (Minister of State (Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, you know that each of the members who are appointed to boards and commissions have the opportunity to be reviewed by standing committees.

I would say there are very few members who have been appointed to such commissions that members of the opposition have taken the opportunity to review. It has been the position of the government that there is an opportunity to review the qualifications of Immigration and Refugee Board members. You will find that the qualifications of those persons who have been appointed by Orders in Council to independent bodies have been excellent appointments. Indeed, we are very proud that so many women have been appointed to those boards as well as representatives of visible minorities in order to have proper representation of the Canadian population.

Hon. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture. First, I want to congratulate him on his new post. I see members scurrying about in their seats over there. That is how you get action in the House, Mr. Speaker.

Many of us, including the minister, were in Saskatoon last week for the rally of some 13,000 Saskatchewan farmers. The minister's own department says that Saskatchewan farm income last year was at the lowest level in constant dollars since 1938. I wonder if the minister can tell us whether he is ready to make an announcement on a third line of defence, an emergency payout to western farmers which would help not only the farmers but people in jobs in small towns, villages and cities across the prairies.

As a new minister is he willing to look at a new farm policy where farmers are paid a price based on the cost of production with a cap of 7,000 or 8,000 bushels of wheat? This would help the small farmer more than the large farmer. I am asking about the emergency pay out and a new farm program.

Hon. Charles Mayer (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, what the hon. member did not point out was that the members who were scurrying around were from his side, rushing back to sit behind him so it would look like he had some support for what he was saying.

The member raises a serious question. No doubt there is concern in the farm community, especially on the grain and oilseeds side of agriculture, as Saskatchewan is the biggest producer of these commodities in the country.

If you look at the programs that the federal government has put in place, the majority of the money that has gone into special programs has gone into the province of Saskatchewan. He might be interested in knowing that the anticipation is that close to a billion dollars will be paid out in farm programs in this calendar year in the province of Saskatchewan.

It is not all bad news. Cattle prices are very strong. We had a larger than anticipated final payment go out from the Canadian Wheat Board at the beginning of the year. We will be monitoring the situation. We are always willing to look at new programs. What he is suggesting is that we adopt the NDP farm policy. We are not prepared to do that, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the same minister or the Minister for International Trade.

We heard the minister indicate there is no longer much interest from the government in maintaining its third line of defence policy which has been part of the agricultural promise for the last couple of years.

I want to ask what became of the support levels for the supply managed part of agriculture, which was made very firm last February 18 to a very large group of farmers in this capital. Now the international press reports often that Canada's position is tariffication. What became of the promise to those farmers who were gathered here last February? The government said it would not support tariffication but would support a strengthened article XI.

Why do all of our negotiators—

Mr. Speaker: I would ask hon. members to perhaps put some constraint on the length of their questions. The hon. minister.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the position has not changed. The position is precisely the same as has been stated for I think over two and a half years now. It is a balanced position in support of a clarification and strengthening of article XI, together with the position taken in support of the export interests particularly in the grain and red meat sector.

This is precisely the position our negotiators in Geneva have taken right up until the present time and will continue to take.

YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT

Mrs. Louise Feltham (Wild Rose): Mr. Speaker, my question today is addressed to the Minister of Justice.

Many people in Wild Rose are concerned about the Young Offenders Act, particularly as it relates to age and repeat offenders.

I would like to ask the Minister of Justice if consideration is being given to revising the Young Offenders Act to lower the age from 18 to 16 years and to deal more severely with repeat offenders.

• (1450)

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, my colleague raises an important point. As we all know, this House approved Bill C-12 last year where young offenders who have committed crimes like first degree and second degree murder could be transferred to adult court. We have addressed that point.

The other point is repeat offenders, not only for young offenders but all criminals who repeat offences. There is a sense in the country that we should look at this more closely.

I should be ready to get back to the House later this spring to address the specific issues and make sure that people will feel more secure in their homes.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Supply and Services.

Yesterday the minister flatly denied in Hansard at page 15326 that the former chief policy adviser to the Prime Minister was the lobbyist on the EH-101 helicopter contract.

I have in my hand a copy of the registry of lobbyists with the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs where Fred Doucet Consulting International is registered as a lobbyist. In addition, on checking the files I have discovered that the same company has written to no less an authority than the director of the Liberal Research Bureau last June lobbying on behalf of the EH-101 contract.

Given that the minister was flatly wrong in his assertion yesterday with respect to the former senior policy adviser to the Prime Minister, I suggest that perhaps he was wrong as well in his assertion that all contracts had been signed.

Is the minister now willing to correct the record with respect to the senior lobbyist and also to table the contracts on this questionable expenditure at this time?

Hon. Paul Dick (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for putting this question. I reiterate and confirm what I said yesterday and what in fact he said today.

As a matter of fact Mr. Doucet is not a lobbyist for EH-101 but is a lobbyist for Paramax. That is a different thing.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Dick: If the hon. member wants to be accurate, why does he not try to be accurate for a change instead of trying to mislead people.

If the hon. member would like to know about the contract, as he indicates for the record on television, since the contracts were announced or the announcement that they were going this way on contracts signed last October, why have you never asked for this matter to come before committee? We could have discussed the contents of the contract in general before committee any time, but you only do your grandstanding here.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: We have a long tradition in this House of not addressing members or ministers in Question Period or any other time personally, but through the Speaker. I know that the hon. minister would want to stay consistent with that. The hon. member, a supplemental.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, we have a saying in Newfoundland that that kind of an answer really takes more nerve than a masked toothache to produce.

For the minister to suggest that Fred Doucet, the former senior policy adviser to the Prime Minister is not a lobbyist for EH-101 but is a lobbyist for Paramax, which is the main Canadian contractor on EH-101, is somewhat ridiculous and insulting to the intelligence of Canadians.

I want to ask the minister this. The Leader of the Opposition asked yesterday and I have asked again today for the government to table the contract, specifically to table whatever clauses have been inserted to try to impose upon a future government an obligation to carry on with this contract.

What is the minister afraid of? It is the taxpayers' money. They have a right to know.

Hon. Paul Dick (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, I agree with your comments earlier and I will of course try to direct all comments through you.

It is unfortunate that the histrionics put on per usual by the hon. member who is asking a question derogate from the seriousness of the matter. If he was serious he would ask us to come before a committee and he has not. As far as I know, there has never been a contract tabled in this House of the type he has been asking for in the 20 years I have been here. He is aware of this fact. He is acting only for the television show.

CANADA POST CORPORATION

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister and concerns the administration of the postal service in Canada.

Can the Deputy Prime Minister say why the post office in Martintown, Ontario, with a population of 1,500, and the one in Saint-Clément de Rivière-du-Loup, with a population of 1,200, had to close when the postmaster retired, whereas Saint-Joseph-de-la-Rive, with a population of 600, and Bras-d'or, with a population of 121, still have a post office after the postmaster retired? Is it because they are in the Prime Minister's riding or is that a coincidence?

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell knows very well that Canada Post makes its decisions without any intervention from the government. However, I might remind him when he refers to the Prime Minister's riding, for example, that Canada Post changed the service in five municipalities in that riding. So that riding is not an exception; it is like all the other ridings in Canada.

[English]

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. In one town, population 121, Canada Post tried twice to advertise to hire a postmaster. Nobody applied and the post office is still open.

I want to ask the minister, is that not a two-faced policy on the part of Canada Post? Why is there a set of rules for the Prime Minister and one for the rest of Canadians?

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows full well that the government does not intervene in the operations of Canada Post. We do not intervene for any constituency, even for the constituency of the Prime Minister. If we did intervene the hon. member would be the first one up on his feet to blame us.

EXCISE TAX

Mr. Gabriel Fontaine (Lévis): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Revenue and concerns Hibernia. We now know that some supermodules might be built outside the country. In that regard, Revenue Canada has already made a ruling that a 25 per cent tax which is normally payable would not apply. This decision could hurt our Canadian manufacturing companies. Can it be appealed?

[English]

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, an extensive survey was conducted, including sending out formal questionnaires to the industry, some time ago to determine whether Canadian companies were able to comply with the made in Canada provisions of the Customs Tariffs Act.

After careful consideration it was determined that the Canadian companies which had responded—and all were contacted—had indicated they were not. Only then was a decision and ruling made.

Having said that, I can assure the hon. member that if Canadian companies come up with new information I would be very happy to instruct my officials to meet with them to review their case and look at the situation again.

HIGHWAYS

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport.

The economic future of Atlantic Canada depends totally on transportation. The most important aspect of transportation in Atlantic Canada right now is the completion of a four-lane highway. This is not a road issue, it is just simply our future because we cannot compete without it.

The commitment of the government of over $2 million to cost share and considering the urgency of the matter to the region, will the minister deliver this $2 million program over two years?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows the Government of Canada has made generous contributions—if he allows the expression—to provincial highways over the past few years. As a matter of fact during the past 10 years we have devoted $230 million to provincial highways.

Out of the economic statement of my colleague the Minister of Finance in December, we have allocated $200 million to be spent in both maritime provinces. The discussions are ongoing as to the spending of this money over what period of time and in what provinces and we hope to make an announcement shortly.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Supply and Services concerning the helicopters.

In a letter to me dated October 14, 1992 the minister advised me that the prime contracts with Paramax were still under consideration and discussion so he could not tell me what the terms and conditions were. However, yesterday he told the House that the deals were completed on October 8. Even then the minister was trying to hide the facts on this misguided deal.

Will the minister not agree that whatever the cancellation costs on this deal, they are but a fraction of the costs to the Canadian people of this misguided transaction and that the deal should be cancelled now before more billions of dollars of public moneys are wasted?

Hon. Paul Dick (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, in November 1990 the standing committee on national defence reported on maritime sovereignty.

In recommendation No. 9 the committee recommended that the Sea King be replaced. In recommendation No. 10 it recommended that air surveillance capability of the Canadian forces be increased. In recommendation No. 11 it recommended that the better equipment needed for search and rescue be provided.

I want to point out in a separate aside that the hon. member who just asked the question supported the replacement of the Sea King helicopter. Has he changed his opinion?

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, the minister will be quite aware that reference was to the deep sea fleet and since that report the cold war has ended. The Soviet Union has collapsed and is no longer a military threat to this country, a fact apparently the minister was not aware of when he signed this deal in October 1992.

Will the government not now concede that the Department of National Defence in seeking to justify this has misled Canadians and that the pilots who use these Sea King helicopters in search and rescue have advised the government that they are far better helicopters than these multimillion dollar helicopters the government is wasting its money on?

Hon. Paul Dick (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, in reply to the hon. member's question I want to tell him that as far as I know the cold war was over long before 1990 when he agreed that we needed these helicopters.

All the evidence and all the options are here and the hon. member will get them in his briefing tomorrow. All the options are just as expensive as the option which the government has followed.

The government has not misled the people. We have talked consistently about the EH-101 since 1986 when it was one of two options then put before the government by those submitting tenders. The government announced its proposal in 1987.

Business of the House

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader with regard to the business of the House for the remainder of today and Friday and Monday and Tuesday of next week.

Perhaps while the parliamentary secretary is on his feet he might want to indicate what date the government is contemplating proroguing the House to bring in a new throne speech.

In addition I note that the Minister of Finance has left the Chamber, but perhaps the parliamentary secretary would share with the House the date the budget will be announced.

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I will answer my hon. friend's question on behalf of the government House leader. This afternoon we will be continuing with third reading of Bill C-98, the Borrowing Authority Act. If time permits and with the co-operation of my friend and also my friend from Kamloops we have a number of pieces of legislation lined up: second reading for Bill C-93, the government organization bill; third reading of Bill C-69, the air and maritime safety act; and second reading of Bill S-8, the motor vehicle safety act.

Tomorrow we will continue with unfinished business from today, after which we will deal with the Senate amendment on Bill C-54, the farm products marketing act, and report stage of Bill C-73, the Canada Post Act.

On Monday we hope to complete second reading of Bill C-110, the Northumberland Strait Crossing Act, and second reading of Bill C-99, the small businesses loans act.

Tuesday will most likely be an allotted day and discussions will continue with the House leaders with regard to the business for the remainder of the week.

With regard to the other two questions asked by my hon. friend, to my knowledge there are no plans to do these things in the immediate future.

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the hon. minister a question. He knows that we worked for a long time together on amendments to the Parliament Act, but two other bills took a great deal of time of some members on all sides of the House. The first is on conflict of interest, which we have reported; the second, a very important one, is the amendments to the Elections Act which we reported in December.

Can the minister give us an indication as to whether the government intends to present at least one of these bills to Parliament, but especially the first part of our suggestion on amendments to the Elections Act, tabled in late December, at the last minute, when we were given all kinds of indications that we could expect this bill to be submitted to Parliament very soon and that it would be sent to the appropriate parliamentary committee so that we could have at least some of those amendments in place for the next election?

Mr. Danis: I thank my hon. friend for his question. Like him, I hope that hon. members will be presented in the near future with a bill to amend the Elections Act. My hon. friend knows very well that this kind of legislation requires a consensus of the political parties, and that is what we are working on now. But I am hopeful that we should be able to present a bill, as he suggests. I thank him for his suggestion.

[English]

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, earlier my colleague the opposition House leader asked specific questions regarding the throne speech and the new budget. Before Christmas we were told that this would likely occur in early February. Because of the uncertainty that exists around this issue I also pose the question to my friend. Could he at least give us some general indication when the government will introduce a throne speech and a new budget in the hopes of establishing some new direction for the country?

Mr. Danis: Mr. Speaker, as I told my hon. friend the opposition House leader my answer is the same for the NDP House leader. To my knowledge the government has no plans to proceed with that in the immediate future.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, my House business question relates to the motion passed by the Standing Committee on Aboriginal Affairs earlier today which asks that the government not proceed with legislation on the Nunavut land claims settlement until the minister has had a chance to go before the committee and also to discuss this issue with the representatives of the Dene in Saskatchewan and the Dene in northern Manitoba.

I would like to hear from the government House leader that there are no plans to proceed with this legislation in the very near future.

Mr. Danis: Mr. Speaker, I will take the question of my hon. friend as representation and certainly pass it along to the government House leader.

[Translation]

Mr. Louis Plamondon (Richelieu): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the same minister a question. We know that Bill C-88 to amend the Copyright Act has been long awaited by all Quebec and Canadian authors. It only has to pass report stage and third reading. Can we hope that this will be done in the very near future?

Mr. Danis: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for Richelieu for his question. As with the previous question, I will certainly pass the hon. member's representations on to the government House leader as soon as possible.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Mazankowski that Bill C-98, an act to provide additional borrowing authority for the fiscal year beginning on April 1, 1992, be read the third time and passed.

• (1510)

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, this morning I was going over some of the things we have done as government in terms of the fundamentals. I suggested that we have those well in place and positioned to do very well as the economy continues to grow.

I mentioned interest rates. Interest rates are the lowest they have been in 20 years, as is inflation and our productivity has grown remarkably in the last couple of years. In terms of the fundamentals we are in a position that our economy can grow. It has been suggested by the G-7 nations that of all the G-7 nations, and most economic think-tanks including many Canadian think-tanks are telling us that in 1993 Canada will lead the rest of the world in growth. It is simply because of the fundamentals we have in place that will allow our Canadian economy to grow.

Today we are debating a borrowing bill. We are talking of borrowing somewhere in the vicinity of $8 billion in borrowing authority. Those on the other side of the House are appalled by the fact that the Government of Canada has to borrow $8 billion. That is about the only thing we agree on, because none of us can take a whole lot of pleasure in knowing that the Government of Canada has to borrow money to keep going.

That is where our agreement ends because since I have been in this House, the other side has never offered any suggestions that would eliminate the need to borrow. That is what we want to do. We do not want to borrow money, but the reality is we are in the position that we have to. In fact, if the spending habits of the Liberals when they were in power had continued when we took office, we would not be talking about borrowing $8 billion today. We would be talking about borrowing $16 billion to just compare our numbers with theirs.

In other words, the amount of accumulated Canadian debt today would not be in the order of $400 billion. It would be pushing close to $900 billion, in fact close to $1 trillion if we had continued in the same line the Liberals practised during their regime back in the late 1970s leading into the early 1980s right up until the time we took office in 1984.

None of those individuals on the other side of the House have ever supported any of our measures in attempting to trim or reduce the size and spending of government. They are talking out of both sides of their mouths on this issue.

What comes to mind are some of the positions the leader of the Liberal Party has taken in the last number of weeks. I would like to read the entire editorial in today's The Ottawa Sun. It is entitled "Vanishing act". I think it very well sums up the position of the Liberal Party under its leader:

> Jean Chrétien has come up with his own Liberal brand of voodoo economics by promising taxpayers that a future Liberal government would simply wave a magic wand and make the nasty old GST disappear.
> Trouble is, when you see through the smoke and mirrors you discover the Liberals would actually replace the unpopular tax with a brand new business transfer tax of their own.

In this article he calls it a sort of Grit sneaky tax. He says:

> Make no mistake: This scam is little more than a hidden tax intended to fool taxpayers.
> Under the plan, businesses would be required to total their sales, subtract their costs, and then pay a percentage back to the government.
> The poor consumers would still have to pay higher prices, of course. They just wouldn't see it spelled out in bold print on their receipts at the checkout counter in the form of a 7% tax.

It goes on to say:

> Taxpayers aren't about to be tricked by the sleight of hand, not when their money rides on the cards.
> If Chrétien is to replace the GST, he must find a credible way to raise the $15 billion in lost revenue.
> But if a hidden business transfer tax is his idea of tax reform, then Chrétien had better do his homework before hitting the hustings.
> Taxpayers' memories aren't that short. They remember the GST was intentionally not buried into the price of goods and services so as to stop future governments like his from hiking it every time they need a fresh injection of cash.
> That was the one modest concession taxpayers received—an assurance that no future government of any political stripe could raise the tax without immediate hell to pay from the taxpayers.

In conclusion, it says:

> Putting the tax out of sight won't put it out of mind for voters, no matter what Chrétien thinks.
> For that reason he should think again.

Getting back again to the point which I am attempting to make, we do have a huge debt problem in this country. It is not going to go away by simply waving a magic wand. The Canadian people know that, the Liberal leader does not. If he is talking about eliminating the GST, he is fooling no one but himself.

There are only three basic ways for governments to tax. It can tax income, it can tax capital and it can tax consumption. If one of those areas is eliminated, which the leader of the Liberal Party is suggesting, the consumption tax, there are only two other areas in which he can tax. That is what he has to grapple with and that is why I am suggesting the Canadian people will understand when it comes time to vote. They do not want any more smoke and mirrors, they want the truth. The truth is the Government of Canada cannot forgo $15 billion in tax.

That is not the only thing the Liberals have said in regard to the tax over the last number of years. Originally they condemned us for having to deal with the idea of taxation. I guess they believed that if we did go ahead with that tax and if we did bring in a new GST that our political life would be threatened. They could march into office without having to say anything and without having to show their hand. That is exactly what they are doing.

A $400 billion debt is a problem for any government. It is a problem for ours. I am suggesting that if we had followed the course laid out and that is being laid out now by the Liberal Party, that debt today would have doubled and we would really be behind the eight ball.

There are many ways to measure debt. The way I would like to measure it today would be the measure of debt that we have in this country in relation to the goods and services produced in this country. In other words let us measure our debt against our gross domestic product and find out where we stand.

• (1520)

In 1984 when we took office, the debt or deficit when measured against the goods and services produced in this country was in the area of 9 per cent. In the last eight years, we have reduced it to the level of 4.5 per cent.

We are on the right track. It is going to be a long and painful recovery but we are not going to achieve results by attempting to fool the Canadian people and in a sense, fooling ourselves.

We will continue to attack the problem and we will continue to take the political heat for having done it. At the end of the day, the Canadian people are going to figure it out. They are going to tell us that we on this side of the House have done what was necessary. It was not popular but it was necessary.

I am going to leave it at that. I know that we have 10 minutes of questions and answers. I will be pleased to answer any questions from the other side of the House.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): There are no questions or comments.

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I know the previous speaker is very sincere in what he says. We believe that it is the wrong and inappropriate course to take. We will continue to attack. I suggest that they are attacking the wrong things. The Canadian public acknowledges the fact that the attack is on the wrong places.

His demeanour is a little bit better than the tenor of the debate this morning. It got a little bit rancorous when a pre-election type of mood was prevalent in the Chamber. This morning one hon. member indicated to the hon. member from Brampton that he was stupid. That is totally inappropriate. There is no place for that in debate. It continued to get worse and worse and really debased the House. At least I acknowledge that the hon. member is sincere in what he says even though he is probably totally incorrect.

An hon. member: And misguided.

Mr. Butland: I should add totally misguided. This is the borrowing authority where the government wishes the authority to borrow another $8 billion to expend in areas which it should not. Its priorities are totally misguided. We are talking big bucks here. Yet to bring it into total perspective, I was totally shocked that the Minister of Labour, in response to a letter from a constituent, came to tell me that the federal minimum wage is $4 an hour. Very few people know that. I could not believe it at first. I am incredulous that the federal minimum wage is $4 an hour.

In Newfoundland, the minimum wage is $4.75; in P.E.I. it is $4.75; in Ontario, not surprisingly it is $6.35. However the federal government's minimum wage is $4 per hour. The minister says he is going to take a look at it.

We are talking about borrowing millions of dollars and we cannot afford to raise the wages of those very few people who earn as little as $4 an hour. The government should give a late Christmas present to these people and give them an instant raise to about $6 an hour. We are looking to borrow millions of dollars and we cannot afford to give a person who is making $4 an hour any kind of increase. The last increase was from $3.50 to $4 in 1986. We are talking about priorities. That is the kind of misguided priority this government has.

We talk about deficit. We have a certain amount of sympathy for deficit reduction, but at the same time on whose back does the deficit reduction have to fall?

I know that Ontario has been hardest hit by the recession. Seventy-nine per cent of all job losses have been to Ontario; 54 per cent of the increase in unemployment is in Ontario; 37 per cent of Canada's population is in Ontario; 39 per cent of total bankruptcies are in Ontario. The federal government has continued to pass the buck but not the bucks. They have passed the buck to the province and the province in turn, without choice, has to pass the buck to the municipalities.

The latest initiative by the federal government, which has not come forward yet because there are discussions, are the grants in lieu of taxes. Federal buildings and properties in municipalities across this country are not taxed. The federal government will pay a grant instead of taxes. It may very well be appropriate.

However, right now the government is saying it might have to cut back on the grants to the municipalities. As a result, the buck will again be passed to the municipalities. This time the province is bypassed. The municipalities will have to increase the tax base within the municipality and the local politicians will have to take the heat for that. Once again the federal government chooses to pass on the responsibility. It is letting someone else take the heat of its actions.

I suppose there is a ray of hope. Government members say the recession is over, and I would be very happy if I completely believed it. One gentleman on Bank Street at the Camera Exchange has been in that location for 12 or so years. I do not think he would be concerned that I am mentioning the name of the business. He has a big sign saying: "I am sorry, I did not know the recession was over but I am now bankrupt". Many Canadians can relate to that.

Statistics Canada says the recession is over, but certainly we have no indication that it is. Statistics may say one thing, but reality says something else. There are a number of bankruptcies at present and the number continues to escalate. The number of unemployed remains at 11.8 per cent. In my community it is about 16 or 17 per cent. I suggest in some communities it is probably a lot higher than that. There is always somebody worse off than you.

I want to go back to priorities. The government continually looks for villains. It says to the unemployed that if you quit your job or leave it under circumstances which it does not approve, then it is going to have to cut your unemployment insurance. The villain in this case is made out to be the people who leave their jobs for one reason or another, but no one in this government ever talks about those other villains. Perhaps the terminology is inappropriate. Erase the word villains. Other individuals who could be responsible for part of this deficit that we have accumulated, all of us.

No one in this government has yet responded in any sensible way at least about the family trusts. The wealthiest families in this country are able to set aside millions and millions of dollars for their children. The previous government said it was going to give them 25 years and they could pay taxes on those millions and millions and millions of dollars in 21 years.

This government said that 21 years was not long enough to get their finances in order, so it is going to wait until the last child of that family passes away. They may need another 21 years. If you are a multimillionaire you may have 35 years to get your finances in order.

What happens when a constituent calls my office and says that Revenue Canada is breathing down his neck? Let us say he owes $1,200 and he cannot pay it. Revenue Canada is calling his place of employment saying if he does not pay soon he will be in trouble. That is the problem. We are not pointing to the people we should. Come on, get involved with the deficit reduction. We do not hear from this side.

Certainly not one of our big fans is Diane Francis who has written a book called Controlling Interest. I recommend this reading for the Conservative members who are here and those who are not here. It talks about the wealthiest families in this country. Canada has one of the greatest concentrations of wealth in the whole world. She says that fewer and fewer people are controlling more and more of the country's finances and if we do not force them to pay any income tax, they will continue to get richer and richer.

They are the paper entrepreneurs. There is not even any money exchanged, it is just paper, but they get wealthier and wealthier. This government says it does not want to tax them at this time. It wants to give them a little while longer.

One of the reasons the government gave was they may have a disabled child and want to provide for their future. If you are a multimillionaire and you have a disabled child, I would hope that you would care for that child. To say that you have to pass this legislation to protect this child is just not acceptable. It is incredulous. You would perhaps put a small little adjunct to a piece of legislation to say okay, if there is a disabled child in the family, allow them to do this but not to exempt everybody.

I would recommend this book. This is good reading because Diane Francis is a big supporter of these folks, a great friend, but in this she says something is dramatically wrong.

The government continually says we have got to have our fundamentals. The Prime Minister says every day we have to get our fundamentals right before we move forward. I keep repeating that after eight years of just about anything, if you do not have the fundamentals right you have obviously failed. It is obviously time to change direction. You have to get beyond the fundamentals.

An hon. member: Falling flat on them.

Mr. Butland: Falling flat on your fundamentals.

I was a teacher for 28 years. If I could not teach the fundamentals to somebody in eight years, I would have been on my head. You are an absolute failure as a teacher. Therefore you are an absolute failure as a government. You cannot blame the student and you cannot blame the residents of this country for your failures. Please get off that fundamental kick. You had better change the fundamentals.

I want to talk about Hibernia for a few moments. Hibernia is a massive project, $5.2 billion. We support the project but Canadians are saying we want our fair share of the contracts. The government is a shareholder and an investor. Last year Algoma Steel lost a contract to a Belgian steel company. I went to St. John's. Believe me, they were very hospitable. I think they had very good explanations at that time, but we were convinced that Belgium was dumping steel in Canada.

This past week MIL Davie of Quebec said it was not even allowed to bid on a contract for steel. It went to South Korea. It was not even allowed to bid.

The minister is up on this. He said yesterday that there are steel companies that are going to benefit from a rebar contract next week. I have been told on many occasions that if any other country had a megaproject of that size, there would be an absolute guarantee, not a target, a guarantee that there would be jobs created in that country because of such a project.

Trade deals? Obviously miserable failures. We are losing our manufacturing base. In 1990, of the jobs created in Canada, I believe 91 per cent were service oriented. I have nothing against service oriented jobs, but you cannot base a country's future strictly on service oriented jobs.

I am going to recommend more reading: The Work of Nations by Robert Reich who is perhaps the main architect of President Clinton's new economic policies in the United States. He is an individual with a very refreshing sense of a new direction for the country. I listened in on his confirmation hearings. He talked about labour law. He said he was going to introduce anti-scab legislation and there was not a whimper, not a whimper from Republican congressmen.

Yet the Ontario government talked about that and, lo and behold, we thought for sure the sky would fall and every business would leave Ontario, we could be assured of it. Surely, Mr. Speaker, you see the irony of this.

In The Work of Nations Mr. Reich talks about why the rich get richer and the poor get poorer. In the United States he said fewer and fewer people are in control of more and more money. That left the poorest fifth of Americans by 1990 with 3 per cent of the nation's total income, down from 5.5 per cent 20 years earlier. It is called the old trickle down economics. If we just leave it to the market to decide, it will indeed decide. It will decide to keep it to the upper level of the country, not to the bottom group. We have to learn to be more equitable in everything we do in this country.

The GST is the most hated tax ever brought about by any government. I did a survey of all the businesses in my community. I thought businesses were big supporters of the government. No. They said: "Scrap it. Scrap the GST because we cannot afford it, it is an administrative nightmare. Everybody who buys something from me says I am at fault for this." It has created more underground trade than ever before. It just was the wrong tax at the wrong time. It is a hated tax. Every single day and with every single purchase people are reminded. They have a genuine distaste.

Of course the government is going to say: "It is a lot of money. We make a lot of money out of the GST. What are you going to do? How are you going to get it?"

Neil Brookes of Osgoode Hall, a renowned economist, has identified a series of tax breaks that cost the Canadian treasury more than $8 billion a year and primarily benefits business and the rich. He said that we could scrap them without harming the economy. Rather than demanding lower taxes, Canadians should be demanding fairer taxes and a better social welfare system.

Again, if people are on any government assistance they are painted as being a freeloader, they do not want to work, they have no ambition and we should not be paying them what they are receiving. I say in many other countries in this world, in countries which have economies that are doing quite well, they do not point out these people as being free loaders. They say it is just fine. It is an acceptance and I give them credit. However, through a continual barrage of negativism we bring the load from those up here to those down here. It is misplaced, misguided, unfortunate and inappropriate. One would wish that we would stop on that kind of bent.

Municipal infrastructure I know has been a random shot. Let us get on with it. I think everybody but the government says: "Let's go for it". Sixty-three thousand jobs created almost instantly. It says it is going to cost us too much. It is going to cost us $400 million in the deficit over a five-year period. That is not too much.

I could see the psychological lift. People have given up hope. They say that if they get the fundamentals right any longer we will all be gone. There will not be a country, there will not be an economy left. For God's sake, do something. This is one thing that is a very positive step. Everybody is ready to go ahead. They have all the engineering. Every municipality is saying they have problems but they are prepared to get involved. The provinces are prepared to get involved.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to speak on this bill.

I want to begin by referring to some remarks that government members said repeatedly during their speeches today. I refer specifically to the member for Carleton—Charlotte and the member for Brampton who kept saying that the government is creating a climate where jobs can be created. They kept repeating that phrase "creating a climate where jobs can be created". The other sentence they repeatedly used was: "We are making sure the fundamentals are right; we are putting the fundamentals in place".

I say to the government that inflation, and I cannot debate this point with them, is under control. I give the government credit for that. I have said before in this House that I think its ratchet on inflation is too aggressive. I think that the expense in terms of the number of people who are unemployed is too severe. Having said that, I acknowledge that the almost zero inflation in this country is something that the government should get recognition for. I would also say that because of that we have lower interest rates. That is as far as I go with this government.

I happen to believe that the fundamental issue that the government has ignored has been the tax system of this country. This government came to power in 1984 with a very strong commitment to comprehensive personal and corporate tax reform. Here we are nine years later and we still have probably the most complicated, most complex tax act in the world.

Even the best tax lawyers and tax accountants in this country will readily admit that this tax act is an unmitigated disaster. The rules, regulations, exceptions and the exceptions to exceptions make it an instrument that only very few can use.

I believe, and I have believed this for three years, that this tax act is one of the most fundamental reasons why there is absolutely no trust and no confidence or spirit or very little spirit or confidence left in this country.

A tax act should be considered something that is good. The tax act is mostly built on trust and has to meet certain tests. It must be fair, it must be simple and it must be efficient. This tax act does not meet any one of those tests.

In fact, last year 80 per cent of the tax returns filed in this country had mistakes in them and they had to be returned to be corrected. What a waste of money. What an inefficient instrument. The only people who really know how to use this instrument are the corporations whose wealth, sales, profits and retained earnings are so large that they can afford expensive tax lawyers and tax accountants.

A senior official of one corporation in this country whose sales are in the billions of dollars told me: "I have 40 tax lawyers working for me. With this tax act I have orchestrated a situation so that I have not had to pay tax in 10 years". It is all legal. There is nothing illegal. It is just this 20-year document from budget after budget, Liberal and Conservative budgets. I am not saying that we have not played a part in building up this complex and archaic instrument. The bottom line is that this tax act has now broken the trust we have with average Canadians.

That is the reason that for the last three years I have been trying to advance debate with a constructive alternative to this tax act. The idea I have been proposing is the single tax system. This is not an idea that I created. It is an idea that has been debated for 15 or 20 years. Some would argue that the idea goes back 40 or 50 years.

My initial source of information on this idea came from respected economists at Stanford University, Dr. Robert Hall and Dr. Alvin Rabushka. They are Americans but the same basic principle applies here. In their presentation of the single tax system they basically argue that because the tax act has reached such a level of unfairness, complexity and inefficiency we must get back to basics. We must stop running the economy of the country through the tax act. We should go back to using the tax act as an instrument just for collecting revenue for the treasury, for collecting the amount we need to ensure that our health care system and our social security systems are all looked after.

The tax act should not be used for other economic instruments. In other words we should flush out all the loopholes, flush out all the corporation loopholes and all those exceptions and those exceptions to exceptions. If a particular corporation needs money from the Government of Canada, regardless of whether it is in the energy sector, the forestry sector or a manufacturing sector, let it come to the respective department of government and put forward its case. Make the corporation justify it in terms of job creation and let the line department grant it the money, whether through an interest free loan or a grant, and link it to job creation. Let the political fathers decide whether that taxpayers' money should go out.

Right now, we have a tax act under which between $30 billion and $40 billion worth of grants are going to business with absolutely no accountability. There are corporations in this country that are using tax preferences, some of them 15 years old. They were given it for a policy objective that was maybe relevant 15 years ago but is no longer relevant today. It is buried in the act and so they get that tax preference. It is nothing more than a grant to corporations.

We on this side of the House talk about examining alternatives to the GST, and my leader has stated unequivocally that we are going to scrap the GST. We are going to scrap the GST because the GST was a very poorly designed tax implemented at a very bad time. The concept of a consumption tax is not a bad idea but this government has designed the tax so poorly that it has really been the straw that has broken the camel's back, in terms of the spirit or the attitude of Canadians toward tax policy in this country. Nothing less than the scrapping of the GST will be acceptable to Canadians. Make no mistake about it, my leader is not fudging on this particular commitment. He is not fudging. It is not going to be a maybe yes and a maybe no. The GST is going to be scrapped.

The government is always asking, as are journalists and other so-called experts, where we are going to get the $15 billion to replace it. There are many areas in which we can pick up $15 billion.

An hon. member: Name a few.

Mr. Mills: I am going to name many right now. First, as a result of the current unfairness, inefficiency and complexity of this tax act, which this government supports, we right now have an underground economy in this country second to Italy. It is over $100 billion. If members do not believe me then they should phone Professor W. E. Diewert at the University of British Columbia. He has spent the last 10 years of his life studying the underground economy in Canada. If we have a fair, simple and efficient tax system in this country some of that underground economy will come back on stream. That is one source of funds.

Second, I support the NDP 1,000 per cent with respect to trust funds. There are guestimates that there are anywhere from $20 billion to $50 billion in those trust funds. I actually know some people who have those trust funds and quite frankly I do not think some of them would mind. That law was an Edgar Benson law, it was a Liberal law made 21 years ago. Do not nail me today for something we did 21 years ago. We must change that trust law. There is probably $2 billion or $3 billion that we could take out of those trust funds without affecting those people in any way, shape or form. That is the second area from which we can get some revenue.

Third, last year taxpayers paid about $69 billion in personal income tax. Corporations paid about $11 billion to the treasury, and of that figure $8 billion was paid by small business. Only about $2.5 billion came from large business, mostly foreign multinationals. I cannot believe there is not a member on that side of the House who does not believe that we can find some tax preferences hidden in that $40 billion which we could redirect and redistribute without losing a single corporation.

Ultimately it is not corporations that pay tax but people who pay tax. The trade minister's point is that we must increase productivity. If we treat people fairly productivity will go up because people will make better products at better prices. That is where our exports come in and that is how we are going to reduce our current account deficit.

The only instrument this House of Commons has left with which to mobilize the will of this country, the only instrument this country has left with which to galvanize Canadians and to show Canadians that we are going to treat them fairly is the tax act. We do not need a pro-business tax policy but a pro-people tax policy. That is where the single tax comes in.

Are those enough examples of where we could get the $15 billion? I will just repeat them.

I want to repeat my examples of possible sources of the the $15 billion: One, the underground economy; two, the trust funds; three, let us look at the tax preferences; and four, efficiency and increased productivity because people feel they are being treated fairly.

I have had members on this side of the House and people on the street ask: "How come your party and your leader do not endorse the single tax?" My leader has said repeatedly that he is looking at the single tax idea as one of the options. However, I cannot stand up here today and say that the single tax is perfect because I do not have access to all the books and records on that side of the House. However, it is a doable instrument. It is something that can be done but we need political will to do it.

I am not even saying that the single tax is perfect but it is a viable instrument that allows us to advance debate. Canadians are no longer going to accept the status quo. The status quo is gone. I predict that if this Minister of Finance—and I happen to like this Minister of Finance, I like his style and his attitude and everything about him so this is nothing personal—brings in a budget with anything less than a pro-people tax policy then I guarantee that he is history.

• (1600)

Mr. Al Johnson (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, first of all I would like to congratulate my hon. friend on the work he has done on the single tax, and particularly for coining the phrase single tax. This is a very important contribution to work in this area.

Although he may find it difficult to believe that members on this side may occasionally agree with things said by the other side, it is very important that we develop some kind of simple, visible, fair rate of tax, and particularly a system which is not a flat tax.

He may have noticed in The Ottawa Sun of February 4, there is a particularly ridiculous article saying that a flat tax is wrong, and it goes on to talk about work that he and I have been doing from time to time, completely misrepresenting it. It is an article by Rick Gibbons of The Ottawa Sun. I wonder if he could explain to us how his concept of the single tax would be a progressive or gradual tax.

In my own studies I have found that the principle of having an income support system connected with the single rate of tax and integrating those two is a very succinct and straightforward way of having a progressive tax system that takes people from the income support or welfare system right through to the highest incomes in a very fair and visible way. I wonder if he could tell us how his concept deals with progressivity.

I think there is a lot of misunderstanding about a single tax or a single tax system being simplistic. In fact many people say that things like RRSPs, the Canada Pension Plan, charities and child care, all of the things that we need to consider in a tax system, are not properly considered in these systems. I wonder if he could give us his ideas on those aspects as well.

I believe that is all I have to say, but I would like to again congratulate him for the work he has done in bringing the Hall–Rabushka ideas very much into the Canadian context.

Mr. Mills: Mr. Speaker, it is tough to accept a compliment from the government. I had better be careful.

An hon. member: Go ahead, take a bow.

Mr. Mills: I want to begin by saying that we have shared ideas on many occasions and we are committed to comprehensive reform. I thank the member again for his support and encouragement.

I want to first of all react to the article by Mr. Gibbons in The Ottawa Sun. A year ago the Sun organization and The Financial Post were the only two papers in Canada that substantially endorsed the work on the single tax. Maybe the Sun organization has switched its position.

For starters, he should not be calling it a flat tax so we are not even talking about the same thing. The single rate of tax is a concept which basically says that we are going to throw away all of the massive numbers of tax preferences that are in the act, but not without being sensitive to the notion of progressivity.

In the single tax that I have designed, and there is room for debate on this, there are progressive features for making sure there are very generous credits for senior citizens, families with children, charitable donations. We have not disturbed the RRSP structure. On the corporate side, we had a very progressive feature by making sure that the first $100,000 on the corporate side is a tax credit, which is extremely beneficial for small business in this country.

The original idea of a flat tax did not have any of those progressive features built into it. I have not read the article by Mr. Gibbons so I really should not comment.

Let us go to the hon. member's point. I know he is ahead of me on the notion of linking it to an income support system, which I totally support. I must confess that I have not figured out how to do it. Can he imagine if we could have an income support system which would do away with all the duplication and all the bureaucracies in all the provinces across this country.

I think we could win respect overnight if we ever did something like that. Once again the political will for this kind of reform is now the government's challenge. If it does not do it, then it will be ours.

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, let me begin by congratulating my friend and colleague from Broadview—Greenwood, not only on his remarks in the last few minutes in this Chamber, but equally on the persistence he has shown on the single tax idea or more generally on the need to simplify, not make less effective, but make more understandable our tax system. I want to congratulate him and encourage him to keep up the work.

I have done my part rather publicly in spreading the gospel and taking his very excellent pamphlet on the single tax and distributing it to a number of people, to school groups and other groups that have a particular interest in this subject, including some groups that can promote the idea. I say to him, hang in there. It is a question of time.

We have before us another bill looking for more money. Can you think, Mr. Speaker, of any crowd that more deserves yet another licence to print money than the group which sits opposite as the government? It wants to borrow more money. I will come back to that.

Let me share a thought with you, Mr. Speaker. I suppose I do not have the right to have any real contempt for anybody or any group of people, so perhaps the word I am looking for is pity. If I do not have contempt, I at least have pity for a couple of groups of people in society.

My friend from St. John's East can rest easy. He is neither one of the individuals I am thinking about nor is he in any of the groups I am thinking about.

If I were capable of real downright contempt it would be for a couple of groups of people: those who trigger false fire alarms and those who make obscene phone calls. Both come from a discipline of cowardice, of meanness, not to mention that they inflict some pretty unfair cost on society when they pull that false fire alarm. They trigger a whole sequence of events, all of which cost money and in some cases a fair amount of anguish. Of course the obscene phone call is in a class by itself with respect to the human cost, the anguish that it causes.

Mr. Speaker, being the astute gentleman that you are, you are sitting there saying: "What does this have to do with Bill C–98, the borrowing bill". I do not want to suggest that anybody on the opposite side is either of the ilk that would make obscene phone calls or trigger false fire alarms. That is not my point. I wanted to get the attention of the House to a couple of the characteristics, rather disreputable characteristics, despicable characteristics involved in those two activities, the attribute of unfairness of inflicting undue cost, the characteristic of cowardice.

I want to put before the House a couple of very specific examples that have a lot to do with this borrowing bill. For example, take the matter we have just dealt with and will continue to deal with in this House, the unemployment insurance changes.

In particular, take the government's proposal that henceforth people who quit their jobs will forfeit their eligibility for unemployment insurance. I know the fine print and I know the nice words that accompany it. I will do the government a favour and I will mention those words too. It says if they quit without just cause. That is fair if it is stopped right there but that is not the signal it sends out.

We come back to the other two activities I mentioned. It comes back to the question of being unfair and mean. The government's intention to do that sends a far larger signal. If it wants to catch the work interloper, the person who only works when he or she has to in order to get a few bucks or a few stamps, if that is who it wants to catch, there is a way to do that. The government does not have to use a sledge–hammer. It does not have to cause a lot of anguish. It does not have to set up circumstances whereby people will be obliged to stay in occupations despite harassment.

I could set up examples where people whose basic instinct is to work have been put in situations where despite their best efforts, the relationship in the work place has been such, either from the standpoint of personal harassment or sexual harassment, that it has become untenable to work in that place.

Under the bill they have the option of quitting because as the rhetoric on the other side says: Well, it is only a matter of time and they can prove they had just cause. But in the interim, who buys the groceries during that month or that year when they are proving just cause?

I could equally talk about the category of people who get fired and the provisions for them under that bill. Again, without going into detail, that goes straight to the issue of cowardice on the part of the government. It puts the employers in the driver's seat and it lets the employee fend for himself or herself. It is cowardly and it is mean.

Let me give another example. I was talking with my friend, the minister of fisheries, only yesterday about this issue. We had an exchange here in the House during Question Period on Wednesday. I raised with him the circumstances involving people who have lost their groundfish licences because of a very arbitrary, a very cowardly, a very costly and a very mean stipulation about inactive licences.

As I have said to the minister privately, in a letter and in the House yesterday, I basically understand where he is coming from. He is again using a sledge–hammer. If the licence is inactive—emphasis is on the word inactive. If it is inactive groundfish licences he is talking about, these people who live in the Gaspé, the Magdalen Islands in Quebec, New Brunswick, P.E.I., Nova Scotia and Newfoundland, those thousands of people altogether totalling 2,800 to 3,000 people who will be directly deprived of their licences if this measure goes through unchanged.

What does the minister mean by inactive licences? He has defined it as if they have had no catches during the past two years, 1991 and 1992, then the licences are inactive. Well, are they?

Perhaps a couple of other circumstances apply. Perhaps there were people like those living in the Rose Blanche area or Isle aux Morts who have had a winter fishery for many years, dozens of years. During the last five years, starting in 1988 through to this year, they have found that their landings have dropped off. In the case of the community of Rose Blanche it is from four million pounds in a three month fishery down to 100,000 pounds.

Some of them in their wisdom and looking after their own pocket-books came to the conclusion it was not worth spending $50 on gas and food to go out and catch $20 worth of fish so they did not go. They kept in touch with a neighbour or two in the community who went out. They found out Joe did not get any fish yesterday or the day before so there was not much point in their spending the money on gas and food to go out and go further in the hole, or as the song says "another day older and deeper in debt".

So they did the prudent thing from the standpoint of their family budget. They stayed ashore. Why? Because they were lazy? No, because they were smart. They were smart enough to figure out that if you spend $50 to make $20 you are even further in the hole than you were before you went out that morning. So many of them elected to stay home, not to stay home because they were lazy, but to stay away from fishing.

They had no landings for those two years. Some of them because they had some initiative went a step further and said: "Since I cannot go fishing, since it does not make sense to spend $50 to make $20, maybe in the meantime I will look around for a job driving nails, painting buildings, working ashore for a few months". Does that mean they had abandoned the fishery? Not quite. The fishery had somewhat abandoned them at least temporarily, or the fish had abandoned them. So they went off and got other seasonal jobs and they had no landings during those two years.

Now had the minister said before the fact that if they did not have landings over a certain period of time then he would consider the licence to be inactive, that is a matter of fairness. However, to write the rules after the fact is very cowardly and unfair.

Mr. Speaker, if you think that is a graphic example let me give you a really graphic one. I spoke in the last 24 hours by phone to a gentleman in my riding in the community of Petites. Now Petites is an isolated community. You cannot reach it by road. It is literally a 15-minute boat ride from the community of Rose Blanche, Harbour le Cou which my hon. friend from St. John's East will know very well.

For the last 12 or 13 years this gentleman in Petites, every morning save maybe Sunday, but five or six days a week has gotten out of his bed at three o'clock or four o'clock in the morning and has taken the 15-minute trip over to Rose Blanche to join a boat crew of four other people. A total of five people. They have fished together for a number of years.

Now keep in mind that my friend from Petites is not the skipper of that boat but is one of five members who crew that boat. There is the skipper, my friend I spoke to yesterday, plus three others; a skipper and four crew. They have fished every year for many years, in the case of this fellow for the last 12 years.

For example, in 1991, one of the two years that the minister is using as criteria for cancelling a licence, that crew caught about 150,000 to 180,000 pounds of fish over a 10-month period. Last year they caught roughly the same. In the two year period they caught just over 300,000 pounds of fish.

The fish plant manager or the collector buying the fish knows when the boat comes in, it has one great pile of fish in the hole. There are five men on board. Who owns which fish?

The convention that has grown up over the years is to sell the fish in the name of the skipper. It makes a lot of sense. Another way to do it I suppose if you follow the Crosbie dictum is to say: "Okay fellows. Count all the fish out, we want five equal piles here". That was not the way it was done. If that was the way he had wanted it done I suppose they would have done it that way. God knows fishermen have done sillier things at the direction of the government. They made the mistake of selling it all in one pile in the name of the skipper.

Now then the question. If DFO bureaucrats go out to find how much fish the other four fellows caught, they are going to find the answer real fast. Not one single pound. Not an ounce.

Now then let us go back to the minister's brave words of December 18. "If they did not catch any fish we are going to take their licence". What he really said is: "If you cannot prove you caught fish we are going to take your licence".

So you sit there and think that example cannot be real. I will tell you how real it is. Just by coincidence this man called me three or four days ago and I just got back to calling him yesterday afternoon.

In the meantime, yesterday morning he had been visited by DFO. DFO went into the community and said to various people that some qualified for a licence and some did not. It said to one man standing beside my friend that DFO records showed he had caught six pounds last year and he qualified. Another man, my friend, was not on the list. He explained he was part of a crew that caught 150,000 pounds. That does not apply. He did not qualify for a licence.

It is now February 4. We are already one month into the year. DFO answers not to worry about it because he will be able to appeal it. He will and six weeks or two months down the road there is no doubt he will have his licence, come March, April or May.

Returning to my earlier comment about those who make obscene phone calls and those who trigger false fire alarms, this act is every bit as despicable because the sledge-hammer approach has inflicted unnecessary pain. This man I spoke to on the phone last night told me that if they took his fishing licence after 12 years, after fishing 10 months a year for 12 years, they might as well cut off both his arms. That is the kind of anguish that these cowardly, mean, costly policies of the government are inflicting.

So far, these are only my words on all of this. Let me give one other line of information.

I mentioned that these five people were fishing together and the fish were sold in the name of one person. All of that is true. Let me speak of something else that is true.

The Unemployment Insurance Commission over the years has actually figured a way to deal with this. It simply said the fishermen did not have to count their fish out in five piles. It was assumed if there were five people fishing together they each had one-fifth of the effort so the total value of the landing would be divided by five. Each one would be given credit for one-fifth of the landing. On that basis the men would be paid unemployment insurance.

Over the years the men I am talking about have regularly fished for 10 months. On the basis of that fishing activity they have drawn UI for a couple of months. What better proof does one need?

What do we have here? One arm of the government, UIC, acknowledges not only that they have fished but that they have done such a good job they qualified for UI for a couple of months so they can get back in the boat. Another arm of the government, in this case fisheries, is saying because there is no record they have fished they will be deprived of their licence to fish and will be caused anguish. A sledge-hammer will be used on them.

Government is about collecting money. It is about spending money. But surely there has to be more reason to have a government than that.

Government is also about reflecting our values as a people. We are not a mean-spirited people. Government should not get its jollies out of making life miserable for fishermen or people who are seasonal workers, or people who are in the work place and have to make agonizing decisions because of harassment. Government ought not to be in the business of reflecting that kind of meanness of spirit. That is not the values we project as a society, that we hold as a people. Government ought to set the tone. This government is setting a tone but what an awful tone.

One of our values in society is that we have a work ethic. You would never know it by listening to the rhetoric of this government. This government has the idea that somehow there are 27 million lazy hangashores, as we call them in Newfoundland. A hangashore is a person who stays ashore because he is too lazy to go fishing.

The government has the idea that there are 27 million hangashores and it has to be the policeman guarding them. It has to make sure they get out of bed in the morning. It sets their alarm clocks for them, gets them out to work and hustles them off because they might all stay home and get beer bellies.

It might come as a shock to that crowd over there but some of those people, about 99 per cent of them, actually do want to work. I know people on welfare. I know people on unemployment insurance. I know people who are just scraping by. The litmus question to them at all times is: "Would you rather be doing what you are doing or working?" Every time the answer comes back: "I would rather have a job 12 months a year".

Until we get a government that believes in people, that reflects the values we hold as a society including the work ethic, until we can get rid of a government that gets its jollies out of putting people down, of denigrating people and suggesting that people are lazy hangashores, until we can achieve that it does not matter whether we give this crowd another whit of authority to borrow. They are going to spend like drunken sailors anyway.

All we can hope is that the time comes sooner rather than later that we put people on that side of the House who reflect rather than undermine the values of Canadian society.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank my colleague from Burin—St. George's for his generous remarks in the earlier part of his speech.

I want to pick up on his point that there seems to be a lack of understanding about the way the dignity of people is affected by some of the programs and systems coming from this government.

One of the problems this government has is that it is really in the hands of the officials. I may be wrong on this but the political will has dissipated to a point where I get the feeling that the officials in finance are basically running this country. The lobbyists are the ones influencing these ministers and this government in terms of its direction.

I have worked with officials before. There are many fine bureaucrats in this government, but they have this favourite expression in officialdom, especially in finance: "It is not doable. It cannot be done". I think one of the problems is that this government has become a captive of officialdom and it is basically the people who end up getting the short shrift. I wonder if the hon. member could comment on that.

Mr. Simmons: Mr. Speaker, my friend from Broadview—Greenwood and I agree on many things, but I am not sure. I had better have a talk with him on this one. I hear where he is coming from. I will come back more directly to the point he just made. I basically believe that public officials are a pretty good lot. Some get led astray.

Mrs. Sparrow: But they are human.

Mr. Simmons: I hope all of them are human. I do not know why you are so shocked. I hope they are all human. On one occasion I named an official in this House. He is in the Public Service but is no longer working directly for the government except at arm's length. I will not name him again but he knows about whom I am talking. I thought he had forgotten he was a public official and began thinking he was a water boy for the Tories.

When they cross that line then there is a problem. I do not think the bulk of them are across that line. I believe my friend is talking about others who stray across that line, or cannot find the line, or do not know where it is.

This morning I was in a meeting where we were being briefed on some fisheries issues, specifically the issue of groundfish licences. I know the minister of fisheries. He is a man for whom I have a lot of respect. He is intelligent and quite fair. I tried to figure out why he got bamboozled—and that has to be the word—into this policy because this is really a sledge-hammer policy. When he wakes up he will realize what the officials have done to him. I do not believe this was of his own volition. If he had thought this through, he would not have done what he did the way he did it on cancellation because he caused a lot of pain.

I found myself saying, and I might as well say it because I have already burnt my bridges with that crowd anyway: I will tell you one thing. When and if we become the government the first thing we are going to do is run IQs on the whole crowd of you because somewhere among you there is a raving idiot who came up with this cock-eyed scheme. When we find who it is we are going to get rid of you because that type of person is doing a great disservice to this country and to those fishermen who are out there today anguishing and in emotional pain wondering if their livelihoods are being cut off by some person who is using a sledge-hammer to kill a fly, as it were.

Mr. Ross Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I have been trying very hard to work on a paper here prepared by one of my colleagues which I think has the potential to address some of the real problems that the families in this country face. However, even though he is an Albertan, he will understand I am unable to sit here and pass on it.

The comment that I would like to make relates particularly to the fisheries program. The member quite rightly comments on the intelligence and the dedication of the current minister of fisheries. While one may not agree with a number of the things that he proposes to do, he certainly had the courage to take action to address the concerns of the fishery.

One of the criticisms in the past has been that government has not consulted or discussed with those directly in the fishery the proposals that it puts forward. This is a flaw. This has been a flaw of all governments, including this one. I would argue that the current Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development attempted to change that process in responding to the crisis that we saw in 1989.

I would like my friend's comments on my observation that the licensing policy has been worked out in direct consultation and with very strong approval of what we call the union, the president of which I may point out is the former Liberal member of Parliament for St. John's West. I use the word former in terms of Liberal as opposed to member of Parliament I think to be fair and accurate. Certainly there has been broad consultation.

I say absolutely that there are parts of the licensing policy that I do not like, as it pertains to part-timers for instance. I do not think we fully understand part-timers. The current president of the union and I disagree on this and he has attacked me publicly on it. God knows he has attacked me enough times. However, I just want to point out to this House, and I know my friend will agree, that these licensing policies have been developed in consultation with the representatives of the fishermen.

The one point that I would add is that I think the emphasis here is to take the licence out of the system if the licence has not been used. I would share the concern that if the licence has been used and there has not been fish caught that we have to be very careful, but I think it is important to recognize that this process has been developed in consultation with a number of people and a number of people who have a long history in this industry.

Mr. Simmons: Mr. Speaker, I thank my friend from St. John's East. I hope he heard what I said specifically on the point he just addressed.

Let me repeat myself. I understand that there is a need to retire inactive licences. Where I disagree with the minister and the government, and I used the term before, is they used a sledge-hammer to get at a fly. They had a relatively small problem. They had ways, through their records, of finding out which licences were really inactive and instead of that they sit in Ottawa and they issue a blanket press release which causes more pain than it creates solutions.

The member talks about courage. The minister has got a lot of courage on many issues but on this one I would not classify it as courage to sit in Ottawa and put a press release out and cause the pain that it caused.

The member mentioned the president of the union, Mr. Richard Cashin, a good friend of mine over many years. Yes, he is a former Liberal member of Parliament. I think these days he has gone a bit astray and got tangled up with the NDP crowd and that kind of stuff, but he is also fairly close to that crowd over there. He was only recently honoured by being admitted to the Privy Council. As the member will know, not everybody gets in the Privy Council, but some do. He got in there on July 1. He has friends in all parties.

Cashin does a reasonably good job of protecting the interests of his members. I say to him publicly, and I will say it to him eyeball to eyeball as soon as I get a chance, if he was part of this scheme that has caused pain to men like those in Petites and Rose Blanche—they are just examples, there are many others—if he condoned that he needs his head examined. Richard, you need your head examined if you condoned this. But I do not think for a second you did. I think what you did is what I have done. You have condoned the idea of getting rid of inactive licences. I do not think Cashin is being properly represented here if it is suggested that he gave his approbation to the minister going out and causing the kind of pain to full-time fishermen in Petites and Rose Blanche that has been suggested. I do not believe it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Order, please. It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Halifax—Transportation; the hon. member for Don Valley East—Cyprus; the hon. member for Bonavista—Trinity—Conception—Government spending; the hon. member for Saint-Laurent—Cartierville—Visible minorities; the hon. member for Kootenay East—Water.

[English]

Mr. Dave Worthy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I think every member in the House today recognizes that this has been an interesting debate. It is probably because it is a borrowing authority bill. As such it has such a wide scope that members can get into their pet topics and really get some interest from both sides of the House. To ensure that we can accommodate all those who do want to speak on the bill, Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 26(1), I move:

> That the House continue to sit beyond the normal hour of adjournment for the purpose of continuing consideration of Bill C-98, an act to provide additional borrowing authority.

Mr. Dingwall: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I heard the suggestion which was made by my hon. friend with regard to extending the hours. There have been no consultations with members of the Official Opposition with regard to this. In point of fact I was going to raise it during the regular question but the government House leader was unavoidably absent. We were given indications at an earlier time that the government would be proceeding with a bill other than Bill C-98, which is the borrowing bill.

Notwithstanding that I do wish the record to show that the hon. government House Leader did verbally indicate to me late yesterday that they would be proceeding with Bill C-98, but I have to tell the Chair and, through the Chair, members opposite that we were prepared to proceed with Bill C-93 as opposed to Bill C-98. As a result, I do not think we could give consent to the provisions that the hon. member has made reference to in terms of extending the hours today.

• (1640)

And more than 15 members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Pursuant to Standing Order 26(2), the motion is deemed to have been withdrawn.

The member who has just moved the motion loses his place as far as debate is concerned.

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I would like to say a few words on Bill C-98, the borrowing authority, by which the government seeks authority to borrow an additional $8.2 billion which is in addition to the budget that was laid down last fiscal year, the fiscal year we are still in, and the additional borrowing that took place last fall.

This will bring the government's borrowings above the budgeted amount by the $10 billion or $11 billion that the government goofed in its estimates in the last budget. This is not the first time that it has messed up in its estimates of the deficit. The deficit this year is now predicted to be $34.4 billion, $7 billion higher than what it said it would be at budget time.

This deficit is $10 billion higher than it should have been using the projections the government used in the budget before last. According to the estimates from two years ago the deficit that we now have is twice what it was projecting. The projections have been away off. Ever since 1988 the ministers of finance have been predicting lower and lower deficits and every year when the year comes to an end we discover that we are still in the low $30 billion range and we have not shaken out of that in all of those years.

Yet the Minister of Finance, the member for Etobicoke, who was the Minister of Finance for most of that period was unshaken. He said that he has the fundamentals right, he understands the economy and he has the solution. Yet every time he makes a prediction he is wrong. He has been so busy getting the fundamentals right that we now owe twice the national debt that we owed when he first became finance minister in this country. The debt that we are all paying as a result will now be in the neighbourhood of $40 billion worth of interest every year to sustain the debt that he has brought upon the people of Canada.

We have listened to some of the government members say that opposition members and backbenchers are wasting the time of the government by this discussion because really all we have before the House is a piddly little idea of borrowing more money and they should not get excited about that.

The fundamental reason that members of Parliament are in Parliament is to watch over and agree to the expenditures of government and the taxation that governments levy. If we are going to stand idly by and not say anything when governments come to us for further borrowings, we are falling down in our duty. The only way that that further borrowing can be paid is by future taxation and that is right within the ambit of every one of these backbenchers, whether they are on the government side or the opposition side. Our duty, the main reason we are sent here, is to overview and give approval or otherwise to the government's estimates for expenditure and its methods of creating that expenditure and paying for that expenditure through taxation.

This has been the reason for parliaments since before 1215 and the Magna Carta and it continues to be the basic right of parliamentarians. To imply that we are wasting time by discussing a mere borrowing bill misses the point precisely. I cannot understand why a government member would be so callous as to raise that as a legitimate argument.

This government has been sitting with its eyes closed to a great extent, if we listen to its view of what it has done for the economy. I in my riding and many others across the country who represent different regions saw 76,000 individuals and small businesses go bankrupt last year. It was a new record. We have never before had that proportion of bankruptcies, even at the height of the Great Depression in the 1930s.

It is only recently that the government has even been able to say the r word for recession, but the sad fact for most Canadians is that they have been in a depression for quite a long time. The government has been busy fighting inflation and through that it has to a great extent induced the recession and the depression.

We have been hearing about averages, and we all know the problems with averages. A wit once said that the economist and the statistician do not seem to understand the pain of an average. For instance, if a person had one foot in boiling water and another foot in freezing water they would say that on average the man should be comfortable. We know that is not the way comfort works. We also know that using averages does not tell very much about the fight against inflation.

I represent a constituency in prairie Canada. I have watched the fight against inflation and I must say that it has been devastating. When I first came down here in 1980, farmland in my part of the country was considered to be worth about $800 or $900 an acre. Then governments began to discover inflation and decided that to fight inflation they would use extremely high interest rates, which they did. They put a lot of farmers out of business. They put a lot of villages out of business. They shut down a lot of farm suppliers. They depopulated parts of rural Canada. In the process they have managed to force the price of farmland and the value of all assets of the community from about $900 an acre down to less than $300 an acre.

The people I represent have paid a huge price in fighting inflation. The value of their assets has been cut by two-thirds at least. It does not matter whether they were home owners in one of the small towns or cities of my riding or farmers out in the country. If their assets were worth $1 million in 1980 and they have not increased the size of their business, farm or property, they are now worth $300,000. That is a tremendous contribution to inflation. In making that contribution they have less assets to borrow against and less assets to raise capital from.

The government has taken the view that everyone has to pay for inflation, and my friends and neighbours accept that. However they think they have paid a rather high price. They have paid an even higher price than just losing the value of their assets. They have paid a high price by losing their very incomes. For those who make their living on the farm there are numbers of ways of showing the losses in their farm incomes. I will use two methods that were put forward recently by the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool.

The first method of discovering what losses farmers have put up with in the province of Saskatchewan alone would be to take the realized net farm income between 1980 and 1984 on average—and we use adjusted prices so that we do not have to worry about inflation; these are in 1992 dollars—and compare it with the realized net farm income for the years 1992 and the estimates for 1993. The shortfall would be in the neighbourhood of $880 million to $1.1 billion; a $880 million shortfall already realized for 1992 and the estimates for 1993 would indicate a $1.1 billion shortfall from the average realized net income of the early 1980s for Saskatchewan farmers.

We could use another test. We could take the average net farm income for farmers in the years 1980 and 1981 and compare them per worker against the realized average industrial wage per worker in Saskatchewan at the same time. We would find in 1980 and 1981 that those figures were almost the same. The farm worker received $13,500 and the industrial worker received $15,500. They were almost the same, just a few thousand dollars difference.

When we make that same comparison now after all the farm support that has gone into the farm community, we find that the average farm income in 1991 amounted to $6,700.74 per farm. How did the industrial worker make out in that same period? In 1991 his or her average industrial wage was $24,197. There was a vast change in that period of time.

I submit that part of the reason for that vast change was not only the trade war which occurred but also government policy which struck out all or most of the assets farm people had with which to refinance or to finance other ways of making farm income.

The fight against inflation and trying to get the so-called fundamentals right has really been harmful to rural people in my constituency and across the country.

I have discussed a little about the income shortfall as seen on a farm-by-farm basis and when compared to the average industrial wage in my province. If we look at the effect of the trade war on those incomes, we can extract some of the costs that have occurred because of the trade effects of that war as a result of various actions of both the European Community and the American government.

In 1985 the President of the United States introduced a farm bill which included the right of Americans to grant export enhancement funds to exporters. This had the effect of driving the competitive price of international grains down as much as $80 per tonne. Right now farmers in my community do not net $80 per tonne for most of their grain. We have an idea of how devastating this action by the Americans was and what it could do.

If we use the pre-trade war average price of grain in Saskatchewan alone and superimpose that trend, we see that because of the actions of the Americans and the response of the Europeans farm income in Saskatchewan shows a shortfall. Even with the government assistance that has been provided there is a shortfall of $6.7 billion from 1985 to the present. In those seven years we have had a $6.7 billion shortfall of income from the kind of income we normally are used to out there. It was almost $1 billion per year on average.

We have seen farm debt increase from $21 billion or $22 billion in 1986 or 1987 to in excess of $24 billion. I cite that because the Europeans and the Americans have not had the same kind of news to deal with. They are our two largest competitors. We are among the third largest exporters of grain and oilseeds, yet our farm incomes are falling behind the net farm incomes of those countries because frankly those countries care more about their farmers than do Canadian governments.

Using 1981 net total farm incomes as a base, European incomes fell over the decade of the 1980s by 16.5 per cent. American farm income over that same decade rose by 23 per cent at the same time as Canadian net farm incomes fell by 51.4 per cent.

We can see that farmers in the United States have been much better cared for by their governments than has been the case here. Their net incomes over the decade rose by 23 per cent, while ours fell by 51 per cent. This was done in the name of getting the fundamentals right and in the name of fighting inflation.

Government policy has continued to put pressure on farmers and their families. In the financial statement before Christmas the finance minister said there would be even further reductions to the government expenditures on grading and inspections in meat plants and in processing plants. That was accompanied later by announcements from some officials indicating that it was to be the intention of the Government of Canada to reduce grading and inspection standards to standards equivalent to those of the country to which we might be exporting.

In other words we would lower it to Mexican standards if we were thinking of selling to the Mexicans, or even lower if we were exporting to some country with standards lower than those of the Mexicans.

There was no explanation of how to separate product that had been so graded if it did not go to the particular country but instead ended up in the refrigerator of a consumer in Canada. There was no explanation of how we were to respond when some of our international customers said: "We used to buy your product because you had such high grading standards and we could always count on Canadian product meeting those standards".

Those good customers will start looking at our changed grading standards and say: "We might as well buy from the Americans who have a much looser arrangement than you have. We used to prefer your product because we could be sure that the standards would stand up and that we were buying quality. But if you are going to abandon that then I guess we will find another place to get our product". We will have to start looking for other customers.

This is a stupid way to become world competitive, all in the name of having the fundamentals right. I have spent some time showing how misguided some of the fundamentals were.

In that economic statement as well we heard the Minister of Finance say that the Crow benefit which western Canadians used to think was almost part of our constitutional heritage was to be degraded a bit more. We watched in the early 1980s as the Liberals backed away from their commitment to freight rates to an area that is land-locked and was developed on the basis of a secure transportation system. They backed out of that and have been presenting some money to the railways each year. At the moment it stands at about $730 million. The government has shown that it is no longer considering that a firm commitment. It has decided to back off bit by bit. It is taking 10 per cent away this year. That will mean about 8 cents to 10 cents a bushel less in the pockets of farmers next year, thanks to that little announcement.

It also sends a signal to farmers that the Crow rate is no longer anything that can be counted on. If a minister of the Crown who is in charge of finance can stand up and take 10 per cent of it away on a whim with an announcement in the House then there is nothing to stop him from taking 100 per cent of it away at some future date.

The residents of rural Canada are feeling less and less secure with this government. They see that this government does not have the fundamentals right. It cannot produce projections. It cannot guess right. It cannot do anything right. It is then time we made it very clear that the government should resign so we can have an election and find a replacement.

SMALL BUSINESS SECTOR

BUY CANADA PROGRAM

The House resumed from Tuesday, November 17, 1992, consideration of the motion of Mr. Whittaker:

> That in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of developing a healthy small business sector in Canada by targeting more federal contracts to the small business sector and establishing a more aggressive Buy Canada program.

Mr. Fernand Jourdenais (La Prairie): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to speak today in this debate on the motion of the hon. member for Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt.

The motion reads as follows:

> That the government should consider the advisability of developing a healthy small business sector in Canada by targeting more federal contracts to the small business sector and establishing a more aggressive Buy Canada program.

First, it must be said that the motion tabled by my hon. colleague is acceptable in principle. This government is always striving for a strong and diversified small business sector.

The government will always do its utmost for the thousands of hard-working business people who create thousands of jobs that benefit all Canadians. Earlier in this debate, an outline of this government's many reforms concerning government procurement was given.

I must go back briefly to this outline so that we can clearly understand what the motion before us today means and, I might add, better realize the remarkable work done by the Minister of Supply and Services.

It is with the needs expressed by small businesses in mind that more than three years ago the Minister of Supply and Services decided to undertake a major reform of his department. Today, we are proud of our very fruitful co-operation with Canadian business people.

The new business practices of the department are based on five major objectives which I will briefly describe.

First is the use of a procurement system which is accessible and competitive. I am of course referring to the open invitation to bid, which allows any business person to tender for the contracts of his choice. Indeed, it is our small business people who select contracts based on their priorities and their potential, and do this using a personal computer.

The second objective has to do with the implementation of an impartial process to hear the complaints of suppliers, namely the Procurement Review Board, which is now part of the Canadian International Trade Tribunal. The board allows any contractor who feels he has been wronged to make representations. Some have successfully made their case.

Third, the support provided to the Canadian industry is confirmed by the new policy on Canadian content. Supply and Services Canada gives priority to procurement in Canada by limiting the competition to qualified Canadian suppliers of goods and services when there are enough of them to ensure competitiveness.

Fourth is a greater social and environmental responsibility. We are referring here to the employment equity, environmental protection and energy conservation requirements in dealing with suppliers.

Our fifth goal is to provide first-rate customer service, as is expected from a department like ours.

Our business partners are demanding and so are we of them. They understand our new approach and have expressed support for it.

In fact, this is the kind of offer that is hard to refuse: greater accessibility, improved efficiency, top-notch service and more chances of tendering for federal government contracts.

The competitive bidding system we have can be considered as a good tool for economic growth.

I am not saying that all suppliers should deal with the federal government. What I am saying is that those who choose to, for one reason or another, will be surprised to see how easy it is and will be able to improve their competitiveness.

As I read over my hon. colleague's motion, I must point out a minor aberration which shows the weakness of the motion being debated as it relates to public procurement.

My hon. colleague would like the small business sector to get more contracts. Fine, but let him know first that 80 per cent of our suppliers are small and medium-sized businesses at this time. That is right, 80 per cent. If you factor in contracting-out, it would be closer to 90 per cent. This goes to show that small and medium-sized businesses are truly major players in the area of federal government contracts.

I could emphasize other highly positive aspects of our reforms which are intended to be forward looking. The main thing is that Canadian entrepreneurs wanted a chance to compete and the government responded swiftly to this perfectly legitimate request.

This debate is an opportunity for me to reaffirm that this government is making every effort to assist our small and medium-sized businesses in looking for new markets, to promote their competitiveness by giving them more opportunities to compete for federal government contracts and to assert themselves on the international markets.

Therefore, the motion put forward by the hon. member for Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt runs counter to measures that have been in place for over two years. Worse, it suggests that our small and medium-sized businesses lack vitality, that our entrepreneurs lack initiative and that risk is never rewarded. It also suggests that government ignores the demands of the Canadian small-business sector, when nothing is further from the truth.

This attitude does not surprise me but I must say that it does not at all suit the economic challenges facing this country. By the way, I want to assure the hon. member that any suggestion of his will receive due consideration, provided that it can foster the financial security of our fellow citizens.

Supply and Services' initiatives have been given a warm welcome throughout the country, and I can tell you that civil servants themselves are happy to work in a setting considerably more stimulating, although more demanding.

Day after day, we are happy to demonstrate that the Government of Canada can innovate and be efficient. This is great news for the taxpayers as well as for us who administer their tax money. The future depends on it.

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to rise today to speak to this bill that has been brought to this House by the member for Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt, a seat-mate of mine in the Chamber. He is the NDP critic for the small business sector.

The member for Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt has been a very strong spokesperson for the small business sector in this House and to the government on quite a number of matters. The issue in this motion today is just one of the many that he has been able to raise. I am very glad to be able to speak both in support of this motion and in support of the small business sector that is being promoted in the member's motion.

The member for Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt in presenting this motion to the House had a couple of very astute things to say, and I just wanted to briefly quote him before I enter into my own remarks. The member for Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt said: "This government has given lip-service to improving the business climate in Canada and this would be an ideal time for it to show some positive action for the small business sector through its support of a buy Canada, buy small business program".

The member also said: "It is only by opening the bidding process and guaranteeing that contracts are awarded to small Canadian businesses through a buy Canadian, buy small business program that we will ensure small businesses continue to create jobs in the economy and help bring us out of our continuing recession".

Those are very important words for us and for the government to hear today as it is contemplating the various actions that can be taken to assist the small business sector in the work that it is doing.

I would also like to indicate to this House how important this matter is. I know, Mr. Speaker, that you are a very strong supporter of the small business sector and are aware of its importance to the Canadian economy. More than 97 per cent of businesses in Canada are small businesses with fewer than 50 employees.

In 1989 small businesses maintained a labour force of more than 3.75 million people, equivalent to over one-third of the total private sector employment in all of Canada. From 1981 to 1989 small businesses created 81.5 per cent of new jobs in Canada. At the same time this has been a very difficult time for small businesses.

Just yesterday the newest bankruptcy figures were released. In 1992 there were 14,317 business bankruptcies in Canada. That is an increase of 821 over the 13,496 businesses who declared bankruptcy in 1991.

The recession is very hard on the small business sector, which is a large employer and a major stabilizing factor in many of our small communities and major cities.

The Government of Canada can play a very important role in the development of programs that would be of some assistance to small businesses, and that goes beyond tax measures and other matters. We all know there are negative and positive tax measures that can be utilized to assist businesses.

The most negative tax measure has been the implementation of the goods and services tax that small business people right across the country have said has harmed them significantly. That is something that could be eliminated as soon as possible. It would certainly be eliminated if the New Democratic Party were elected after the next federal election.

There is another side to all of this too, and that is what the member for Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt is getting at in the motion before us today. The Department of Supply and Services purchases about $8 billion in goods and services every year for the Government of Canada; 60 per cent on a competitive basis and 40 per cent on a non-competitive basis. This is a very important and significant component of the way in which government money, which is being spent anyway, can be targeted toward small businesses in Canada.

The buy Canadian program suggested by my colleague is a very important way for the government to adapt some of its current policies to assist the small business sector. Earmarking just a portion of this supply and services' contracted money specifically for Canadian businesses would be of great assistance, particularly to those businesses that operate in rural and remote areas.

I want to give a couple of examples from my own constituency about how significant this might be. Economic development in rural constituencies is a difficult task at the best of times. Sometimes the stabilizing force of a contract is all that is needed to get a rural business, particularly a manufacturing or a processing business, under way. A lot of activity is taking place on the drawing board in northwest Saskatchewan that could utilize some of this sort of kick-starting that is available from government policy and program development.

The Western Diversification Office has indicated that a program it would be able to fit in is one to assist with the production of ethanol from grain stocks on the prairies. The government should make a very strong commitment to ensuring that ethanol product is available for purchase by producers. It is the same thing with the production of energy. Governments can play a very important role in ensuring that the energy produced from co-generation facilities by independent producers in rural and northern isolated communities is purchased by the utilities.

More important is the whole area of aboriginal economic development. The government has paid a lot of lip-service to this area and in fact has put some programming in place to ensure that aboriginal communities can be involved in generating revenues which would be useful in helping the people who live in the aboriginal communities.

The most negative aspect about economic development in aboriginal communities is that the money can be put in place for capital but it is not in place for operations. You can buy equipment and set up a manufacturing or processing operation but the problem comes in being able to maintain that operation while the business person in the aboriginal community is out searching for markets, et cetera.

If this government established a set-aside program under a buy Canadian umbrella for aboriginal economic development, ensuring that 10 per cent of certain budgets, for example the national defence budget, was being used to purchase products from these aboriginal manufacturing plants, it would have a stabilizing effect on that aboriginal community and that aboriginal business. It would certainly ensure that all of the activities engaged in at that manufacturing plant would be enhanced and allowed to grow. We would have a guaranteed contract in place to produce the duffle bags for the armed forces or whatever the purchase might be. They would have the ability to finance operations while they are looking for the other contracts that would expand and ensure the success of those aboriginal businesses. To me that is a very important matter.

We have to make sure the rural business infrastructure is maintained. We have to ensure that we do have the ability to purchase at the local level.

Most members of Parliament in this Chamber will realize that we have very little ability to utilize our budgets for purchasing locally. Most of our stationery, as you are aware, Mr. Speaker, is purchased centrally in the House of Commons. It would be nice to be able to support local businesses through local purchasing.

I am quite concerned about the free trade agreement and the North American free trade agreement and how they affect the ability of the Government of Canada to enter into a buy Canadian program. The free trade agreement with the United States currently hinders the ability of Canada to have a buy Canadian program, a Canadian sourcing program of some kind, a Canadian government policy, a Canadian value-added profit policy, et cetera, because the free trade agreement prevents purchases over $29,000 from being set under those guidelines.

One of the very first things that this government has to do is cancel the free trade agreement so that we can have in place a complete buy Canadian program. It is even more important because we are about to enter into a new agreement with Mexico and the United States, the North American free trade agreement.

I was just having a look at the North American free trade agreement and found that article 1004 prevents Canada from having a buy Canadian policy. In fact, the effect of 1004—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret the hon. member's time has expired.

[Translation]

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): Mr. Speaker, this issue of small and medium-sized businesses is frequently discussed here in the House of Commons, as it was in Quebec's National Assembly when I had the privilege to serve there as MNA. As years went by, unfortunately, alot was said but very little was done for small and medium-sized businesses across the country. The facts show that small and medium-sized businesses create more jobs than all corporations put together. In fact, the number of jobs is even three to four times higher. But when we look at industrial subsidies in the country, we realize it is easy for big businesses to get all sorts of benefits from the government. However, the government keeps saying that it is encouraging small and medium-sized business which is creating jobs.

I would like to draw to your attention the fact that in the past organizations were established to defend small and medium-sized businesses. There was one in particular which I remember. It was called Business Warriors and was based in Toronto. I recall that they had the opportunity to defend their opinion that small businesses received comparatively less tax benefits or grants than large corporations. And they made their point with supporting evidence that small and medium-sized businesses were indeed penalized.

So, the case before us is still the same. How can we help small and medium-sized businesses? And the motion presented by one of the opposition parties brings back to the surface the kind of program we could set up in order to really help small and medium-sized businesses develop themselves and compete.

Competitiveness is the in word today. If companies, no matter how big, cannot expand, we cannot expect them to make great progress in being competitive. The suggestions I would like to make, after listening to numerous debates on this matter concerning small businesses, is that we should focus on programs in a concrete way and not on bills or regulations 200 or 300 pages long. The first thing we should do is visit small businesses. Some associations and individuals that are very articulate could tell us about the needs of small businesses, about the tools they need to expand and be really competitive. That is what they are asking for.

Just because they make those suggestions does not mean they will get carte blanche for everything they need. There is always some leeway. They know that. They can tell, with the evidence to prove it, what they need in order to expand. But if they do not have a chance to speak out on these things, we will never be able to find out what would help small businesses to grow.

Some of them have been very successful in this country. Over the Christmas holidays, I read Mr. Bombardier's story. It is amazing to think that he two of his brothers began the business in his garage. That gives you an idea of how important all that can be. I also read that many inventions do not come from laboratories at a cost of millions of dollars. In the past 50 years, most big discoveries, like Xerox, for example, were made by people working in their own basement or in a garage.

Entrepreneurship exists, but one must be watching out for it. I am convinced that if those people could say what they need, we on our side with the resources, experience and statistics available could easily show that there is some room to manoeuvre and we could write up in a few pages what is needed for them to develop.

That is extremely important, not only for confidence or competitiveness but also for encouraging other people. They would feel supported. You know that confidence is extremely important in international affairs or in other things.

I would like to give you an example of this. One of our colleagues here from the Liberal Party, the hon. member for Lambton—Middlesex, did a terrific job on the possibility of using grain to make ethanol and derivatives. Research has been done on this and it has been shown that this industry, which is now very small, given the required resources could become a major industry in our country, not only for the environment but also for the tremendous spin-off benefits.

However, if they do not have government resources to help them start up, we cannot expect miracles. Times are pretty tough, so that is all the more reason to give them moral support, financial support, of course, and technical support. Luckily, we have the National Research Council which has an international reputation and can help them.

We could talk about it for a long time and we know that there have been many discussions and debates on small and medium-sized businesses. First, because they belong to associations, they must speak out on the issue because they are out in the field, they know the needs. We can be guided by what they can do, what they know and especially what they want in setting up a real program. With that, I am convinced that the "Buy Canada" program mentioned in the motion could follow automatically, because if we enter a new field where no one has been before, we will certainly be the best and over time we will be very competitive. So we would buy Canadian not just out of pride but because it was a rapidly growing field and we would have the necessary skills and entrepreneurship.

Many ideas could be submitted. A famous saying of Einstein comes to mind: Imagination is more important than intelligence. Of course, we take it for granted that a certain amount of intelligence is required and I am sure it exists, but imagination is the key to advancement. Small and medium-sized business is the most important engine of our country's development. We are a nation of 27 million and we have shown that we can play an extremely important role on the world stage with our inventions and developments and so on. We have proven ourselves.

I could give examples of technologies, like fibre optics, where we were world leaders. However, that technology has been sold and today it is the Japanese who are developing it secretly. But that is another matter.

In conclusion, are should call on those who are in the field. We have public moneys to supplement what they do not have at their disposal in terms of research and funding. That program will be the real beginning. It will be the basis. I am convinced that it is the only answer, and the most needed one.

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Whittaker (p.15463).

Mrs. Gabrielle Bertrand (Brome—Missisquoi): Madam Speaker, I would like, first of all, to thank the hon. member for Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt for introducing this motion about the contract awarding system of the federal government or, in other word, its procurement system .

Through the Department of Supply and Services, which awards $8 billion worth of contracts every year, the federal government gives small businesses the opportunity to prove their capabilities and to develop new expertise.

Like the abolition of the manufacturers' sales tax, like the free trade agreement, which was intended to create a larger and freer market for our small and medium-sized businesses, the policies of the Department of Supply and Services are specifically meant to develop a more accessible and more competitive Canadian market.

Like all my colleagues who participated in this debate, I think that the hon. member for Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt underestimates what this government is doing for our small businesses.

My colleague should not consider solely the details of our policies, he should consider the whole consistent package they represent. I will not repeat what others have already said about the importance of the small-business sector for our economy.

Every single member of this House could elaborate on that theme, because small business is really part of everyday life. What is more important is to underline the consistency of our policies taken as a whole.

Supply and Services Canada has restructured its policies to take into account the need to find new prospects for small businesses with the constraints of a more demanding national and international economic environment. The department helps give our small businesses a chance to excel in this country and elsewhere in the world.

Since 1989, the minister has tried to give better access to federal contracts, to streamline its policies, to modernize its systems, to encourage competition and to give Canadians the opportunity to question the department's system for awarding contracts.

You can see that it was no easy task, but it was carried out, and small businesses know how to take advantage of it. Recently, for example, I had the opportunity to announce, in my riding—

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Whittaker (p. 15463).

Mrs. Gabrielle Bertrand (Brome-Missisquoi): Madam Speaker, when the debate was interrupted, I was about to say that last week, in my riding, I had the pleasure to announce that a contract for $1,974,987 had been awarded by Revenue Canada Taxation to Imprimerie Montréal-Orford in Magog.

This is a reminder that more than 80 per cent of our suppliers are small businesses that can take advantage of these opportunities.

We have already heard detailed descriptions of the open bidding process which is the main component of the department's reform.

I would, however, like to stress two aspects that are a tremendous asset to the process, and I am referring to the Procurement Review Board and the Canadian content policy which some people seem to overlook.

The integrity and fairness of the procurement process must, in the final analysis, be able to stand up to a detailed review by an independent third party.

In the case of contracts covered by the free trade agreement between Canada and the United States, suppliers who feel they have been treated unfairly can bring their case before the Canadian Procurement Review Board. The board has proved to be a quick and inexpensive way to deal with complaints.

If the supplier wins his case the board may award costs and recommend compensation, including payment of a certain amount, or order a repeat of the procurement process on a competitive basis. This is a precedent for Canada.

When we talk about government openness, I think Supply and Services Canada and the Procurement Review Board are a case in point. I would even go so far as to say that it is up to us as members to inform small businesses of these mechanisms.

Many industrial businesses and associations have said that such a redress mechanism should be made available to Canadian suppliers for more goods and services purchased by the federal government.

Consequently, the government intends to introduce a bill expanding the mandate of the Procurement Review Board. Once passed, this bill will allow the board to review the purchasing of goods, and later the purchasing of services, in order to determine whether access to information was fair and if the evaluation criteria were clearly defined.

I am convinced that hon. members of this House will vote in favour of such a bill.

I want to draw the attention of the hon. member for Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt to our Canadian content policy. We favour a "Buy Canada" approach, as evidenced by our Canadian-content policy.

For a long time now government procurement in Canada and elsewhere has been considered an instrument for industrial and regional development.

Supply and Services Canada is convinced that these goals will be better served by an open and competitive purchasing process. Competition on the domestic market ensures that Canadian suppliers can make it on the world markets. Government procurement will not be used to favour or support non-competitive suppliers.

Canada has played and continues to play a leading role by applying stricter business practices relating to preferential purchasing on the domestic market.

However, subject to our obligations under GATT and the FTA, Supply and Services clearly favours buying in Canada. This is done by restricting the competition to qualified Canadian suppliers when there are enough of them to insure that there is competition.

In order to take advantage of this preference, suppliers must be able to guarantee that the goods they have to offer are entirely made in Canada or, if they are made up of both imported and Canadian components, that the final product complies with the rules of origin.

Generally it means that a significant proportion of the manufacturing or processing must take place here in Canada in order to make a new product out of these various components.

In the case of services, the value of the work done in Canada by staff located in Canada must generally account for at least 80 per cent of the bid value. For big public projects or large purchases, review committees still make a detailed evaluation of the possible regional and industrial benefits.

• (1750)

I hope that my colleagues opposite will be able to appreciate the impact of the measures I just talked about. Personally, I am convinced that such a policy benefits our small businesses.

I will say again that the government is doing everything it possibly can to help our small businesses.

What I wanted to stress is how coherent, dynamic and innovative our economic policies are. Supply and Services Canada illustrates our commitment to meeting the present and future needs of our small businesses.

Consequently, I cannot but oppose the motion before us today as it contradicts the thrust of our policy on contracting.

Soon, the government will introduce a North American free trade agreement in Parliament.

Here is another example of a policy which, together with all the other existing policies, will provide better opportunities for small Canadian businesses, allowing them to reap the benefits of international trade and to grow and create stable employment for Canadians.

Mr. Jean-Marc Robitaille (Terrebonne): Mr. Speaker, like my colleagues on this side of the House, I am happy to take part in today's debate on the motion of the member for Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt. Let me remind the House that the hon. member's motion, as worded, seeks to develop a healthy small business sector in Canada by targeting more federal contracts to small businesses and establishing a more aggressive Buy Canada program.

Like all my colleagues in this House, I favour the development of a stronger small business sector in this country. However, the second part of the motion, the targeting of more contracts to small businesses, raises many questions, as we could gather from the comments made earlier by my colleagues.

I would like to stress one aspect of the debate that has been ignored until now. I mean the divergence of opinions when it comes to choosing the best way to support small businesses. There are two contrary opinions stemming from different points of view about today's economic realities.

My colleagues have detailed the policies in question. I will therefore refrain from repeating data and figures already known.

There is no doubt in my mind that the government is making all the necessary efforts to meet the needs of our small businesses in Canada. Everybody knows that this government's priority is economic growth and the creation of secure jobs.

Small businesses are largely responsible for the vigour of our economy and consequently for job creation in general.

Therefore, I remind my colleague opposite that the present restructuring of the Canadian and international economies turns out to be a major test both for the government and for our wealth-producing small-business sector.

This government has managed to put in place structures and programs adapted to the needs of our small businesses.

In an ever-changing environment, we have acquired what if takes to compete internationally and gain access to the most promising markets.

As the hon. member for Brome—Missisquoi indicated, the free trade agreement, the abolition of the manufacturers' sales tax, the North American free trade agreement and a host of policies and programs are all designed to help our small-business sector, and their consistency is striking.

Indeed, the government offers our small business sector the chance to become more competitive, to excel on lucrative markets, to develop new expertise and new technology, in short to thrive.

There would be no point in granting contract quotas to our small businesses. It is an outdated principle as our daily experience confirms.

Now more than ever, Canada must preserve and assert its status as a trading nation which can provide high-quality goods and services at competitive prices. To do so, we will have to face tough competitition and prove we are the best. Our small businesses know that and act accordingly. They have to if they want to survive. It is a harsh reality from which there is no turning back. The world will not wait for those who cannot face the music.

Protectionism still creates much tension between the major trading countries, but it is undeniably losing ground as more multilateral and bilateral trade agreements are negotiated. As far as I am concerned, I would rather believe that an increase in present and future business opportunities for our small businesses will bring us prosperity.

I want to commend the government for its efforts on behalf of our small businesses. I also want to congratulate in particular Supply and Services Canada and the hon. Minister of Supply and Services for the contract awarding system. In a situation where you are always asked to do more with less, the hon. minister was able to align his priorities on the needs of our businesses. Under his leadership, Canadian government procurement has become a more competitive, fair and accessible one. No doubt our business people will use this as a springboard to reach foreign markets. I do not think it would be going too far to call the hon. Minister of Supply and Services a reformer and innovator.

Right now, I doubt that my colleagues on the other side would agree with me. Their philosophy on change and economic growth points them in a direction leading nowhere: protectionism. As if Canada could isolate itself when it is one of the most powerful and most respected countries in the world. There is no reason to be afraid. We should be confident and rise to the greatness of this country.

Rejection and a wait-and-see attitude should be banished forever. Canada is a young country, it is vigourous and it has a great future provided it remains open to the idea of profound political and economical changes both on the domestic and international levels.

I would like my colleagues opposite to take note of the policies of Supply and Services, including those of the Procurement Review Board and then I would like them to meet the management of small businesses in order to hear their comments concerning those policies. The only way to really establish the value of a policy is to confront it with everyday reality.

Let me say that small businesses all over the country approve the actions of the Minister of Supply and Services and those of the government. They only want a chance to compete, to test the realities of the market and to be treated fairly. They trust themselves and want us to give them a real chance.

The motion debated is based on an outdated perception of economic development. It implies that the government can control economic development as it wishes and act as if other countries do not exist. I object to a statement that denies, yes, denies, today's reality. We should not conclude that the present government fully meets all the expectations of our small businesses. No government could attain that objective. But I say that the direction and the specifics of our policies are meeting the challenges of the day, and that the Department of Supply and Services is a concrete example of the common sense that guides this government with regard to awarding of contracts.

As you will have guessed, Mr. Speaker, I think that the motion as presented does not reflect what we should do to help our small businesses.

Therefore, I will vote against the motion of the member for Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The time provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired. Pursuant to Standing Order 93 the motion is dropped to the bottom of the list in the order of precedence on the Order Paper.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 deemed to have been moved.

TRANSPORTATION

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I rise pursuant to a question I put to the Minister of Transport on November 19, 1992.

On November 17 of last year Canadian Pacific Railway announced its intention to abandon all its rail lines east of Sherbrooke, Quebec. This decision means the loss of 358 kilometres of rail line in Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and eastern Quebec. It will also mean the loss of more than 300 jobs in a beleaguered region.

On the date in question I asked the minister to use his discretionary power through section 23 of the National Transportation Act to reverse this decision. The minister refused to act, stating he would wait until after representatives from all sides of the debate had made their opinions known.

Section 23 also stipulates that the minister's discretionary power must be exercised before these hearings take place. The move indicates the government is ready to forsake its already tattered commitment to regional development. This is not a local rail line into the maritimes, it is a lifeline to the rest of Canada.

The National Transportation Act is the key to regional and economic development and it is under this act that viable transportation links to all regions of the country are recognized. The minister's refusal to act signals his department's abandonment of Atlantic Canadians and it also shows something that we have already known for a long time, that this government has a dearth of a transportation policy.

Although CP Rail is a private corporation, it is still regulated by the federal government. The federal government has the responsibility to maintain essential links. Under the NTA regulations, once abandonment is applied for, the National Transportation Agency must decide whether or not the operation of a line is of economic benefit to the affected region.

Given the fact that this is the main artery into the maritimes, it is without doubt of vital economic importance. Without it Atlantic Canada must depend on the region's rapidly deteriorating highway system.

I once again call upon the Minister of Transport to take the initiative and reverse CP Rail's decision and maintain the federal government's commitment to regional economic development. The government's reluctance to act is yet another illustration of its lack of a coherent national transportation policy, one that is creating difficulty in my region and across the country.

Given the past investments made in CP Rail, the time has come to invest in the workers of this company and Atlantic Canada. Save the railway and save the jobs. Creating jobs entails saving jobs.

Mr. Lee Richardson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I rise to respond to the motion from the hon. member for Halifax.

Railway companies under federal jurisdiction have a legal right under the National Transportation Act of 1987 to apply to the National Transportation Agency for authority to abandon operations of any of their lines.

The legal and logical extension of that right means that the agency must accept and process all such applications for abandonment of rail line operations submitted in accordance with the rail line abandonment provisions.

It is also true that sections 23 to 26 of the act provide the Governor in Council with the power to issue binding policy directions to the agency. However, the hon. member opposite can appreciate that neither the Governor in Council nor the Minister of Transport can order the agency to ignore its statutory responsibilities. By giving notice of intent to apply for abandonment, CP Limited has initiated the statutory review process.

Those concerned over the effects of that abandonment or any abandonment of CP's lines may have on Atlantic Canada should, and I am sure will, use the provisions of the act to present their views about the continuation of rail services. Every party must also understand that the railway will and should have the right to equally represent its case.

CYPRUS

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Mr. Speaker, have you ever been to Cyprus? I was there last November with the Canada–Cyprus parliamentary committee and I had an opportunity to walk the green line. The green line is the name of the United Nations buffer zone that runs through the city of Nicosia, which is a divided city. In fact it is the only divided city in the world. It used to share that honour with Berlin but now the only divided city in the world is Nicosia.

On one side of this green line there are some 35,000 Turkish troops and some 8,000 Turkish Cypriot national guards. On the other side there are some 10,000 Greek Cypriot national guards and about 900 Greek troops. Right in the middle are the UN peacekeepers including some 575 Canadians.

It is a really weird feeling to walk along that green line in Nicosia because it is as if time stopped in August 1974 when the fighting stopped. That was almost 20 years ago. There are abandoned buildings pock-marked by 50-calibre machine gun bullet holes. There is a car dealer with dozens of new 1974 automobiles. There are abandoned houses that have been vandalized and littered with 1974 newspapers. It is a very weird sight indeed.

What is the solution to the problem? I think the solution is a new federal constitution for Cyprus, a return of the property or some compensation in lieu of that for the refugees who have been expelled from northern Cyprus, the settlement of the boundary line reflecting the fact that in 1974 80 per cent of the population were Greek Cypriots and only 18 per cent were Turkish Cypriots, and the withdrawal of all foreign troops.

Is that achievable? The United Nations is about to sit down and try to negotiate such a settlement just 30 days from now. However, without waiting to see what the results of those negotiations will be Canada has decided to withdraw all of its peacekeeping forces this year. Are we just going to walk away from Cyprus after 30 years of trying to help keep the peace there? What else can we possibly do? Constantine Georgiadis, an associate professor of philosophy at McMaster University, wrote to me saying that it is time for Canada to put genuine pressure on Turkey to renounce its 18-year occupation of Cyprus.

I agree with Dr. Georgiadis and tonight I want to hear whether the minister agrees.

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, my colleague is quite right. Last December we did announce that we would withdraw our troops from Cyprus beginning in June 1993, after 18 years of service there during which time thousands of Canadian men and women have made us very proud. They have done so under very difficult circumstances. After 28 years of both sides having an opportunity to come to some sort of an agreement—maybe they are unable or maybe they are unwilling, we cannot answer that right now—they have been unable to negotiate a political solution. It is really time that Canada withdrew from Cyprus.

Parties in dispute, whether in Cyprus or elsewhere, must understand that there are limits on the duration of peacekeeping operations for all countries.

The basis for any peacekeeping operation has always been and always will be, within the immediate future, an agreement by the parties involved that they will try to the best of their abilities to work out a settlement.

Our withdrawal does not mean an end to our involvement in diplomatic efforts to resolve the dispute nor does it mean an end to the UN peacekeeping missions in Cyprus. This is a decision for the UN to make.

With regard to the negotiations my colleague mentioned that they would resume again this spring. We look forward to attempts by the UN through diplomatic negotiations to try to resolve the effort. However, Canada has been there 28 years and neither side has been willing to come to some agreement. We feel that our commitment to international peace is so strong that perhaps it is time our troops served in other missions, either in Cambodia, Bosnia, Croatia or Somalia.

GOVERNMENT SPENDING

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a follow-up question regarding the EH-101 helicopter program. This is the program, as you know, that replaces the Sea Kings on our destroyers and our aging search and rescue fleet.

I asked a question of the minister when the program became a public interest and I was not very happy with the answer.

The program was approved in July for an expenditure of $4.5 billion. The position of the Leader of the Opposition was that we supported the replacement of these aging helicopters, the Sea Kings and the search and rescue helicopters, but we had major concerns with the expenditure of $4.5 billion, given that the economy was in rough shape, 1.5 million Canadians were unemployed, bankruptcies were at a record high and the federal debt was mushrooming.

What has happened since then has only exacerbated the problem. This is one of the reasons we are mounting this major attack, because of the concern that the public is showing and the concern that we have in the opposition.

In November the Auditor General issued his report and in the section on national defence he made two points relevant to this program. One was that the defence management program system that manages programs of this nature in his terms was ineffective and expensive. That is a serious indictment for a system that looks after $3 billion worth of capital acquisition programs a year, $3 billion a year.

The Auditor General made another observation that was more troublesome and certainly more relevant to this program. He said that of all the programs he looked at, none of them was directly related to national defence policy and those that had problems, most of the problems occurred in the early stages of the project, where the EH-101 project is now.

Another red flag was raised recently at the turn of the year when the Minister of Justice became the Minister of National Defence. She stated to the media that she had major concerns about this program when she was Minister of Justice and she sat in cabinet and presumably was privy to all the information that was discussed regarding purchase of these helicopters for $4.5 billion. If she was not convinced, how do we expect the public to be convinced that this is a good expenditure of taxpayers' money?

I questioned the minister on this and the Auditor General's concern. It is not necessarily my concern. It is a concern expressed publicly by the Auditor General. The minister did not respond to the Auditor General's concern, but she made reference to the fact that the EH-101 helicopter program was discussed at large and at length, was her term, by the defence standing committee.

The minister was not a member of that committee but I was and it was not discussed at length. It was not discussed at all. It appeared in the minutes of the report and the recommendation of the committee was that the Sea King helicopter is being replaced.

I want to make it clear that it is the position of the Official Opposition that the helicopters be replaced. But the expenditure of $4.5 billion right now is at a time when we have 1.5 million people unemployed, when we are closing hospital beds, shutting down transportation, cutting transfer payments and the deficit is still the same as it was eight and a half years ago.

When that report was put together the deficit was projected at $27.5 billion. Today it is going to be $34.5 billion. That is $7 billion more. That is one and a half of those programs.

If the government thinks that it can ram this program through at this particular point in time when it has the economy in its worse shape ever and the program has concerns of the public at large, the minister herself and the Auditor General, if the government thinks that it can push through a program like that and expect the opposition to roll over and play dead, it is living in a state of advanced disillusion.

The public is looking for answers. It deserves answers. The opposition is looking for answers and we deserve answers. We are going to pressure the government until we get those answers.

Mr. Ross Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure for me to be able to respond to my colleague. I find the juxtaposition interesting however and I promise him that he will certainly get it.

It is my pleasure to respond. I think there is no one in this House more capable of understanding these issues than the hon. member, considering his past involvement in national defence. He certainly knows the role that this helicopter would play, particularly in its relationship to the frigates which have been such an important part, not only of our naval defence program but our over-all defence program and also in areas of search and rescue.

The jobs these helicopters will do in terms of environmental protection, drug interdiction, fisheries patrol and others are well known. I know the member would agree with me that it is incumbent upon us to provide the best equipment available to our service men and women serving on land and at sea.

I recognize that $4.4 billion is a lot of money. It should be recognized, though, that it is over an extended period of time. In fact the $358 million a year which it averages out to be is just over 10 per cent of the entire Department of National Defence capital budget, to which my friend across the way has just alluded. While defence expenditures reduce we are still capable of making this purchase.

It is obviously important to recognize that the purchase of the EH-101 will provide somewhere approaching 45,000 person-years of employment. That is not a small number. It is recognized that these jobs will be right across the country. Canada spends a little less than 2 per cent of its Gross National Product on defence spending when many countries are spending something approaching 4 per cent.

I do not think that anyone in the House would disagree, for instance, that the area of search and rescue is one of the fundamental purposes of this purchase; 15 of these helicopters will be allocated to protect those who make their living by the sea. This helicopter with its ability for longer distances, its greater capacity in terms of ice and inclement weather and its ability to stay in the air longer gives us that added edge we have so sadly needed for such a long period of time.

It is a big decision for this government and this Parliament to make. It is an important decision for all Canadians in terms of our over-all national and collective defence policy and it is not one that is taken lightly.

VISIBLE MINORITIES

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Mr. Speaker, I rose in the House last June to ask the government about the appalling lack of members of visible minorities and ethnocultural community members on the bench. My complaint is still relevant today.

Canadians are tired of endless studies on the relationship between visible minorities and the justice system. We know that the problem lies in representation in the system.

We need judges who share the experience of young people and visible minorities in our big cities. It is essential that our multicultural population be represented in our country's judiciary so that judges can understand the real situation in this country.

Last June, the Minister of Justice answered that Canadian judges are taking sensitivity courses on race relations and on women's issues.

However, that is not enough. Education programs are a good start, but the federal government can and must do better.

[English]

It is no longer acceptable that one of the most important segments of Canadian society remains almost exclusively the domain of white men. It is time that the judiciary and indeed the entire Public Service reflect the population they are meant to serve.

Employment equity cannot be shoved off to the side or equated with multiculturalism. These two policies are not the same.

Yesterday at the Standing Committee on Multiculturalism and Citizenship, the Department of Finance sent its administration ADM. While I am sure the assistant deputy minister felt he was the appropriate person to appear before the committee, he was there to talk about employment equity instead of multiculturalism.

Employment equity is not an end in itself. It is a means of making sure that the government is truly reflective of the population so that it can serve the citizens of this country more efficiently.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, even according to the figures given in June by the President of the Treasury Board, women and visible minorities are vastly under-represented in the Public Service. When will the government stop dragging its feet and take the necessary steps to improve the representation of visible minorities as well as women in the Public Service and in the judiciary?

[English]

Mr. Lee Richardson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the hon. member for Saint-Laurent—Cartierville for her continuing commitment to the equality of all Canadians.

It is common knowledge that Canada's racial, ethnic, religious and linguistic diversity continues to grow. Already according to the 1986 census the visible minority population of Canada is over 6.3 per cent of our population.

A changing society presents Canadians with both a challenge and an opportunity; a challenge to develop inclusive policies and programs and an opportunity to draw on the strengths of a diverse society.

In working toward a more inclusive system of justice and in keeping with the Canadian multiculturalism act the Department of Justice faces a major challenge. This challenge consists of ensuring that all Canadians enjoy equal access to justice by identifying and meeting the special needs of multicultural groups where appropriate.

Lawyers and judges, indeed all justice system professionals must be sensitized to the various ethnocultural clientele they will encounter. The laws and legal process must be clear to all Canadians regardless of their first language or country of origin.

In order to achieve this goal the Department of Justice supports the National Judicial Institute and the Western Judicial Education Centre in their efforts to provide judges with training to sensitize them to the cultural differences of minority groups and their implications for contact with the judicial system.

Recent ministers of justice have worked hard to try to expand the range of people who sit on the federal bench. The commitment of this government when it comes to judicial appointments and visible minorities is clear.

For one, the Minister of Justice welcomes the advice of the special interest groups and informed individuals on particular appointments especially on the furtherance of the government's commitment to appoint more representatives of Canada's ethnic and cultural minorities to the bench.

In addition it is a clearly held and practised principle of the new judicial appointment process developed and implemented by this government as of January 1, 1989 that the judiciary should represent a broad cross-section of Canadian society. To achieve this the appointment of women and individuals from cultural and ethnic minorities is specifically encouraged.

With regard to the Department of Justice, which is a huge stakeholder in the provision of legal services in Canada, in October 1989 the departmental advisory committee on visible minorities was established. The mandate of the committee is to recommend the development or modification of departmental policies, procedures and initiatives as they relate to the recruitment, retention and career development of visible minorities.

Recruitment efforts have been expanded in the Department of Justice to include visits by members of the management team to the indigenous, black, and Micmac program of Dalhousie University.

An employment equity guide has recently been approved by the department executive committee and will be distributed to managers across the country. The purpose of the guide book is to inform and guide employees and managers in particular on the nature, operation and over-all aim of the employment equity program.

Awareness training concerning multiculturalism is also being provided to Department of Justice managers in order to enhance the notion of inclusive justice which means making the justice system more accountable, more responsive and more reflective of the interests and values of all Canadians.

WATER

Mr. Sid Parker (Kootenay East): Mr. Speaker, last summer I asked the government a question about the problems my riding of Kootenay East was facing because of the Columbia River Treaty.

I pointed out that under this treaty B.C. and Canada already have an alarming lack of controls over the Columbia River flow. This has caused serious economic and environmental damage in my riding.

I asked the government whether it would specifically exclude Canadian fresh water as a goods subject to export in the free trade agreements with the U.S. and Mexico. The minister chose to evade my serious question.

The NAFTA text has now been released and it unfortunately fails to exclude fresh water although some other items are notably excluded.

The government continues to claim that because the free trade agreements do not mention fresh water exports, water is therefore protected. However, a growing number of experts believe that this glaring absence of a written guarantee in the trade agreements leaves the door open for future water exports especially under the national treatment terms for resources in times of shortages. The NAFTA also allows non-energy pipeline transportation.

Constituents in my riding know exactly how the diversion of water severely affects local tourism, recreation, fish habitats and water quality. They understand that water is not just like any other resource for sale.

This is happening now. Canada's economic and environmental needs are already being affected under an international water treaty signed with the Americans in 1960.

I recently attended public hearings between Montana and Idaho concerning new proposals for their Columbia River reservoirs. I was surprised to learn that the multi-use plan far exceeds the original intent of the treaty which was simply for the purpose of flood control and hydroelectricity.

The Americans are taking major steps to increase irrigation, protect their fish and enhance their recreation and tourism. They want to reduce power production and increase environmental benefits. Such changes will reduce Canadian sales of power to the Americans and affect the environmental conditions on our side of the border.

Clearly, the Americans are already very much involved in sharing control of Canada's fresh water resources and are planning increased and different uses for it and the federal representative on the permanent engineering panel has done nothing to protect our interests. This is the situation now.

The NAFTA contains no specific provisions prohibiting large scale water exports. Under international law, international treaties supersede any domestic policy. These treaties are entrenching American rights to Canadian water.

Can this government which negotiated the free trade agreements please tell the Canadian people exactly how this country will be able to protect our precious fresh water in the face of growing demands on it? The citizens of Kootenay East who depend on the great waterway of the Columbia River want a real answer this time.

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I hope that my comments will help ease the fears of the hon. member for Kootenay East.

The Columbia River and its tributaries of course cross the international boundary between Canada and the United States. Our two countries have long shared water and hydraulic resources, as the Boundary Waters Treaty officially recognized in 1909.

Water flowing to the United States from the Canadian part of the Columbia River is not covered or affected by the free trade agreement and will not be affected by the North American free trade agreement either.

The dams on the Columbia River are managed under the terms of the Columbia River Treaty by B.C. Hydro, the Bonneville Power Administration and the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers.

The Columbia River Treaty manages a common resource so as to ensure the most flood prevention and the most energy production. It does not deal with water exports.

As for water exports, Canada's position is clearly stated in the federal water policy adopted in 1987. This policy forbids large scale water exports from Canada through the diversion of lake or river water.

Furthermore, section 7 of the law implementing the free trade agreement between Canada and the United States clearly states that the agreement does not apply to water, except for bottled water to be drunk or stored in reservoirs. This law has been in force since January 1, 1989.

Similarly, the North American free trade agreement does not include large-scale water exports; the law implementing NAFTA will have a clause confirming Canada's sovereignty over its water resources.

BUDGET IMPLEMENTATION (GOVERNMENT ORGANIZATIONS) ACT, 1992

The House resumed from Monday, February 1, consideration of the motion of Mr. Mazankowski that Bill C-93, an act to implement certain government organization provisions of the budget tabled in the House on February 25, 1992, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Economics envelope.

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Madam Speaker, like most of my colleagues, I would also like to comment on this bill, which concerns the implementation of certain government organization provisions of the budget tabled in the House of Commons on February 25, 1992.

The budget tabled by the minister on February 25, 1992, was an unsuccessful attempt to streamline federal government operations. In 1984 the Conservative government tried to convince us it could control public spending, reduce the deficit and reduce the debt. Today, eight years and several months after an economic recovery that is unique in this country's history, followed by 33 tax increases, we are now back where we were and even worse, because today the debt has at least doubled and the deficit is about the same as it was in 1984.

In February 1992 the Minister of Finance tried to reduce the deficit by restructuring a number of government organizations and agencies. We know from past experience that every time the government tries to reduce the deficit by making cutbacks, the opposite happens. That is why I find it hard to accept this plan to restructure agencies that have done good work and are in fact badly needed at this time. To cope with globalization, we need the advice of our scientists and economists, and we have to prepare our human resources for the fierce world competition they will have to face.

Unfortunately, in his budget the minister proposes to wind up a number of organizations, including the Petroleum Monitoring Agency, the Pay Research Bureau, the Law Reform Commission, the Canadian Institute for International Peace and Security and the Economic Council of Canada. This is unacceptable. The government also wants to close the Science Council of Canada and the Demographic Review Secretariat.

This government always seems to pick the wrong time to do things. It introduced the GST at the worst possible moment in our history, when we were getting into a terrible economic recession. The same thing happened with free trade with the United States. Now it wants us to enter into a free trade agreement with the United States and Mexico. This is one more example of bad timing.

On Sunday, there will be a big demonstration in Montreal to protest the unemployment insurance reforms proposed by this government. Today, we heard there are more than a million and a half unemployed workers in this country and now the government wants to make things even worse for these people. People who still have a job have something else to worry about, because if they lose their job, they might not receive unemployment insurance benefits. We saw a few examples yesterday in the media, where employers have already started to tighten the screws on their employees in anticipation of the new legislation. You can imagine the mental anguish of these people.

I would not say the government does it on purpose, but lately I have been trying to understand why, when they introduce new measures, they always pick the worst possible time. The government has plenty of advisers: it has thousands of public servants. I really fail tounderstand why this government always tries to make life more difficult for Canadians because that is what it is doing.

What it forgets among all the structures and systems it is trying to implement is that behind all that, the first consideration is a human being, someone with a human face. In everything we do and that must be done, we must always remember that we are dealing with people first and foremost. Every time we introduce a new measure in this House as an opposition member, a government member or a minister and every time we do something in a parliamentary committee or in caucus, that measure affects people. We should think of those affected first. Unfortunately we can see that in the past eight years we have forgotten the human element.

I come back to unemployment insurance. For those who leave their job voluntarily, let us say without just cause, the law already provided a penalty, a waiting period of one to six weeks. In 1990 the government decided to extend this penalty, this waiting period, and made it seven to twelve weeks. So someone who quit without just cause would be penalized for three months and I wonder who would deliberately leave a job to stay at home and receive nothing for three months. Is that really credible? This morning, I learned that another major Quebec institution opposed to this bill, the Legal Commission, says that this kind of abuse that the government wants to avoid or get rid of is almost non-existent; there is none. That is not the problem with our unemployment insurance system.

So again it is introducing a measure that does not correspond to reality, that does not solve our problems but creates more victims and places other people in a bad situation.

[English]

The Prime Minister is in Washington today. One of the slogans of the President of the United States in the last election was putting people first. I hope while he is in Washington the Prime Minister thinks seriously about that phrase putting people first because everything we do in this place, everything we say, whether in this House, in cabinet, in our communities or in our caucuses, affects people.

We are here to help people. We are not here to help big business; they have all the help they need. They have consultants, lawyers, accountants, lobbyists, whatever they want.

The people who really need unemployment insurance want to know it is there for them. However, that the law does not provide. Before, if they had to quit their jobs, they could count on unemployment insurance. As we saw in the December 2 budget and in the bill before the House, conditions are now applied, otherwise there is no unemployment insurance.

What are these people going to do? Those who qualify will go on social welfare, but many do not qualify. Some in my riding who lost their jobs more than a year ago have no unemployment insurance and they do not qualify for social welfare because they own a house. They worked so hard to buy a home and now there is no UI, no job, and they will have to sell their homes if they want to eat. That is the point we are at and Bill C-105 does not help the situation.

It makes it worse for some people who have jobs. If something happens that they have to leave their jobs, perhaps they do not get along with the employer, they will be in that situation as well.

We are not doing our job because we are not helping people. We are not putting people first.

[Translation]

Madam Speaker, you are indicating to me that my time is up. I would still have a lot more to say, but I hope that in this difficult period my colleagues on the government side will be able to put pressure on their ministers and that in making their decisions they will think of people first.

[English]

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Madam Speaker, I wish to speak on this bill this morning. In some ways I am delighted to do so because it gives me an opportunity to express my views, and the views of my party, which are very much in line with my hon. colleague from Saint-Léonard.

Frequently in speaking on these issues there is difficulty trying to follow the pattern of the government with its arrogance and insensitivity in pursuing its economicpolicies, particularly as they pertain to eastern Canada and particularly as they pertain to the maritimes.

The purpose of Bill C-93 is to implement certain changes made by the budget tabled in February of last year. The bill is divided into 10 parts and rather than speak on each of the parts, I want to restrict my comments to the Atlantic Canada Opportunity Agency and particularly the Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation which the government is proposing be closed down.

I want to put this in the perspective of where we are sitting on this side of the House and the kinds of things I have heard in the last four and a half years. In the case of my colleagues to my immediate left, some of them have been listening a lot more than eight years to the economic policies of the Conservative government.

When I was campaigning during the election before I came to this House, I recall the general promises that were made in philosophical terms. As the country is now struggling out of a recession, the Conservative government member, in preparing for an election, will be going back and asking Canadians to elect them at a time when they have failed miserably in the essential elements of their four-pillar policy. I am going to quote it because I think this has to be done in the backdrop of this policy. They talked about economic reform, social justice, national reconciliation and constructive internationalism.

They asked people, either philosophically or specifically, to put aside their personal concerns and make further sacrifices in the name of global competitiveness and long-term prosperity. As I speak today, the kind of prosperity I see around me in Newfoundland and in Atlantic Canada, in the western part of Canada, and indeed in all of Canada, is jobless prosperity.

My colleague from Toronto tells me the difficulty that one has. My colleagues from the west tell me the difficulty that we have. I do not have to speak to anybody to tell of the difficulty we have in Newfoundland. I am sure I speak for my colleagues from Nova Scotia and particularly from Cape Breton, and I know that part of the country very well, when I tell you the difficulties that they are having there which are not unlike those difficulties we are having in Newfoundland and that were epitomized and highlighted to such a pathetic degree in the last couple of days by the unconscionable action that is being taken in Port Hawkesbury. There was the fly-by-night closure of a plant by a person who got grants from this government and is now getting out of business and leaving 79 people dismayed, out of work and very angry.

There are a lot of angry people in Atlantic Canada. I think there is a very good reason for it. Having made the promises of the four pillars that I just spoke about on October 3, 1988, the Prime Minister told the Saint John Board of Trade: "We will not have one Canada that is prospering at the centre while the other regions do not receive their fair share of the economic opportunities".

That was in October, 1989. Shortly after that, both the west and Atlantic Canada watched in dismay as in the April budget western diversification was cut drastically and ACOA was essentially cut by 25 per cent. The term used, and I remember it so well, was reprofiling. Reprofiling to ACOA meant a reduction of 25 per cent.

Not only that, but we saw a reduction in regional development and forestry agreements. Military bases were closed, ports were closed, post offices were closed, VIA Rail service was vastly reduced, and it is almost disappearing right now, freight rates were altered and UI regulations were changed to the detriment of most. It includes certainly all fishermen and seasonally employed individuals.

I talked in generalities there. So much for all parts of the country being treated equally. Let me just talk about transfer payments that have happened since 1989 to this very day.

With the implementation of Bill C-20, by the year 2000 the federal government will have essentially kept back from Canadians, according to the best figure I can get, $97.6 billion worth of services and resources that are essentially provided in health care and post-secondary institutions. Federal transfer payments, I would remind hon. members, account for, in a rough order of magnitude, 50 per cent. It used to be. It has now been reduced from 49 per cent to 45 per cent.

With regard to the federal government transfer to Newfoundland, let me put it in a term that can be understood very clearly. From the time I arrived in this House until this very day, the cost to Newfoundlanders, because they had to pick up the tab, in the transfer payment reduction by various bills has worked out to very close to $200 million. When you are dealing with a budget that is in the $3 billion plus range, $200 million isa lot of money and Newfoundlanders are hurting because of it.

I could speak of other examples; the deficit, the goods and services tax being introduced as a bad tax at the wrong time. I could talk about the closing of post offices that are inequitable in various parts of the country. I could talk about any number of things and it would not be a happy message. Let me talk more directly to this particular aspect.

The idea in one of the 10 parts of this bill is to close down Enterprise Cape Breton and move its function and staff to the main office of ACOA.

We are opposed to this move to kill Enterprise Cape Breton for a number of reasons. In the budget speech the government stated that this, along with some of the other organizations, were being eliminated because they had served their purpose and were no longer needed. Nothing can be further from the truth. Enterprise Cape Breton is probably needed more now than it was before.

As I said at the outset of my presentation, the Cape Breton economy is still extremely troubled, as epitomized by the example of Port Hawkesbury. Special programs to address it are certainly needed more than ever but we do not see any programs coming around the corner.

The unemployment rate in Cape Breton right now has reached 25 per cent and is certainly climbing. The rate was only 16 per cent when the corporation was created. Now all of Atlantic Canada, but particularly Cape Breton's economy, faces great challenges today. I would suggest that it faces more challenges today than it did when the corporation was created in 1985.

Why is that? It is just because of the general state of the economy that all Canadians are suffering, or because the unemployment rate is high in all of Canada and is much higher of course in Cape Breton, but because of other factors that have occurred since then.

The business of Cape Breton apart from coal is very much in the fishing business. I am familiar with that and I do not have to tell anybody on any side of the House of the difficulty that fishing has suffered in my riding, which has been closed for the last year, will be for the next year and God knows for how long. It is a very dismal and grim situation.

In Cape Breton the NAFO zones surrounding the Cape Breton littoral have been vastly reduced and now we are in the business of actually reducing the number of licences that bona fide fishermen held through some fluke of the way the catch is organized and the way the catches are credited to the licences. It has not hit my riding yet because very few people are fishing but in the rest of Atlantic Canada and Cape Breton this is a major source of concern.

I believe we have a major problem on our hands. Essentially those who suggest that voters' expectations have become unreasonable or that they are asking for more is a myth. In this particular case, the closing of the Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation is not in the interest of Cape Breton and I would suggest it is not in the interest of Canada.

It is not Canada or the political system that is at fault here. In fact it is the government and its policies that are found wanting.

Mr. Dave Worthy (Cariboo—Chilcotin): Madam Speaker, listening to the last speaker, no matter how much I recognize the contribution he has made in the time he has been here in Ottawa, I wonder if he realizes how absurd it sounds and why in my opinion the people of Canada, in spite of their current popularity, will never put another Liberal government back in.

An hon. member: How can you say that?

Mr. Worthy: The absurdity is that they promised more. They promised more and more and yet their leader has said that fiscal responsibility and restraint, remarkably, has become one of his number one priorities.

An hon. member: It was yours for the last eight and a half years and you have not done anything about it.

Mr. Worthy: If the Liberal Party, the people opposite, are serious about restraint and fiscally responsible government, they should be encouraging the moves that we have made.

The member talks about regional disparities and how we are being unfair to the regions. In my lifetime in Canada, which is now approaching 58 years, I have never seen a Canadian government that has been as fair to the regions. I come from the opposite end of the country from the member. I come from British Columbia. In spite of the restraint that has been required by this government, the fairness we are seeing has never been seen before.

• (1030)

The premier of Alberta was in town just two days ago attesting to the fact that this current Conservative government is finally giving some fairness to the people of Alberta. The prairies are having terribly hard times but we have never seen a Canadian government that has been prepared to try to help as much as this government has.

We all know that the province the previous speaker comes from is suffering terrible hardships but we also know that this government is doing everything it can to be of assistance.

The Hibernia project is not there to take away jobs or wealth from the regions but to provide wealth and provide jobs. The members of our party from central Canada are frantically trying to find solutions for the people in those parts of the country that are suffering the most.

The measures contained in Bill C–93 are part of this government's program of fiscal restraint. Streamlining government will not only save money but it will also increase the efficiency of government and the services it provides to Canadians.

The Liberal leader recently said that deficit control is essential and that fiscal restraint should be and would be one of his number one priorities. However, we have seen the people opposite again and again block, vote against, and do everything they can to prevent any of these fiscally responsible moves which the government is taking.

It is time for the people opposite to match their rhetoric with action. It is time for the Liberals in particular to stop their obstructionist and filibustering tactics and allow Canadians the benefits of fiscally responsible government. Therefore, I move:

That the question be now put.

[Translation]

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Madam Speaker, I have three questions, which I will answer. They are: Why is the government proceeding this way? What hashappened since the government made its decision? Finally, have there been proposals from some agencies, advice or recommendations to the government that could help it if it wanted to look at them carefully and responsibly?

[English]

Why is this being done? There have been suggestions that it might be because the government wants to realize savings but it has backed off a bit because we have said: "You put the figures on the table and we will look at them. Let us see how much money is really being saved".

Then it attacked it from another angle, efficiency. Then of course we said: "All right. If you say it is going to be more efficient then show us how it is going to be more efficient". That has not been done and I think that is really quite unfair. Let us look at the real reason. We know that there were a number of those organizations that were no longer functioning and had not operated for a number of years. We know that there were minimal savings in some particular cases.

I will give governments the benefit of the doubt on the questions of savings and efficiency but I want some proof before I can say: "Yes, you are right". Until I get that proof I am not going to accept it.

Let us examine what is probably the real reason. We know there are a lot of people out there who say, with some justification, that there is too much government and that it is too costly. What has the government done? It has taken these organizations and tried to give the impression that it has done something rather large and significant.

My colleague is nodding his head and saying yes. I know he agrees with me.

[Translation]

It is as if the government were trying to give the impression that it was doing something very important, but that is not the case at all. It was to respond to a certain constituency in which it wants to be re-elected.

[English]

It has lost a certain number of supporters and it is trying to get them back. Let us be very, very frank. That is why this decision has been made.

The second question is: What has happened since this decision was made? I do not want to talk about each organization, I want to focus on one, the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council, which is being folded into the Canada Council.

We all know it has been operating since 1977–78 and has been doing very well. We also know that it was set up because there was a vision at that time that Canada's major challenges were social problems. Economic development is a social issue. What about the 1.6 million unemployed and the almost five million who are living either at the level of poverty or below the level of poverty? Most of them are women and over one million of whom are children. What about the 2.3 million Canadians who receive social assistance? What about the more than two million Canadians who will be fed at food banks this year?

We often talk about abuse in our society. This is a social issue that social scientists can study. They can give us precious and valuable advice so that we can find solutions that are meaningful, creative and put our country in the forefront of nations.

Since this government's decision we have received literally hundreds of letters, as many petitions if not more, and roughly the same number of calls. A number of important meetings were held where people have asked us to please make the government understand that the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council is not better off folded into the Canada Council. Please make the government understand that its major challenges today are social issues such as unemployment, abuse, food banks and aid to various people. Please make the government understand that this is a step backward, not a step forward. This is what these people have said in their petitions, their letters, their telephone calls and in the meetings which they have had with me and many other colleagues.

People want the government to understand there will be virtually no savings and no additional efficiency. The fact is that there may be no savings whatsoever. No one sees any efficiency here.

I challenge the government. The government thinks it is right and it has had a number of speakers who have made that point. I ask the Conservatives to find one credible man or woman who has laboured long and hardin the social sciences to stand up and say that what they are doing here, the folding in of the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council into the Canada Council, is a progressive step. I challenge them to find one Canadian, one man or woman who has credibility in the social sciences to say that this is a step forward. If they can, I would be really quite shocked and surprised because I do not think they could find one person. If they can, I am quite willing to acknowledge that, but they will not find him or her and that speaks loudly of this government's decision.

These organizations that have written, sent in petitions, made phone calls and have had meetings have put forward proposals to government. A number of organizations have told us, with some justification, not to do it. It has been working since 1977–78 and we have been making some progress in attacking those social issues and finding creative and meaningful solutions for Canadians. Do not take a step backward. That was one group of people.

When these organizations felt that the government would probably not want to review its decision in spite of the evidence that they had put forward that it was not a good decision, what did they say? They said that they had not been consulted. The government could stop this part and defer it until Canadians have been consulted thoroughly. Subsequent to that study and consultation, if the government feels it is a good decision for Canadians, that it is going to help us resolve much more significantly than we have in the past our social problems, then and only then make the decision.

There has been another group that felt that the government would not even do that.

• (1040)

That is, let them consult Canadians and try to find out if it was really a sound decision. So they proposed something else. They said, "If you cannot stop this bill, if you do not want to consult, we will propose some amendments."

[English]

I would ask the government to check very carefully the amendments that have been proposed. I have proposed some. I would be the first to suggest that there may besome that are useful. There may be others that are less useful.

We have amendments from the Social Science Federation of Canada. I saw one set of amendments coming from a group representing 15,000 social scientists in this nation. We have amendments from major national organizations, AUCC, CAUT and others. I would ask the government at the very least to examine those amendments before ramming this bill through. It is the least that it can do.

I will close by saying this. I understand that the government wants to make some changes. I believe that it is quite natural for a government to want to make certain changes, but I would really like it to say honestly that it is making these changes because it wants to try to recover its losses in recent months and years. It is not a matter of efficiency, of streamlining or saving money; it is really to win back some of its lost followers.

[English]

That is what I would like the government to do, to put forward its agenda in a truthful, honest way. It is to attract those people it has lost. It has very little to do with anything else, with savings or efficiency. There are a number of proposals on the table. At the very least it should stop this part of the bill and consult Canadians. Then and only then should it decide whether or not this is the best way to proceed to ensure that our social scientists have the tools and the infrastructure in place necessary to attack our grave social problems.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Madam Speaker, I believe my colleague from St. Boniface has opened up a very important and very useful line of concern about Bill C–93. I was particularly struck by his description of the serious social problems affecting this country and the need to begin developing serious solutions.

If we ever needed more evidence of that problem, we saw it in the figures that were released this morning dealing with the serious problem of unemployment and joblessness in this country. When we talk about a drop–out rate of 56,000 people who have totally and completely given up any hope of getting a job in this country, have dropped out of the labour market, are no longer even convinced that the chance of finding a job is there, then they are going to become part of a large, broad subterranean grouping of Canadians who are forgotten, neglected, creating a two–tier society, a split–level country. We are setting in place major structural problems for years and years ahead and there is no will, no interest, no concern about dealing with that problem.

This bill talks about reorganizing government to make it more efficient presumably. Efficiency is not the only criteria. Effectiveness, the ability to achieve serious results in terms of the issues and problems facing Canadians is also a prime responsibility of any government.

The tragedy we see today is figures that talk about the continuing sorrow of young Canadians, where the unemployment rate is close to 20 per cent of people under the age of 20. That is becoming a permanent, continuing fact of life in Canada. It is not temporary, not transitory, but one that is becoming part and parcel of the Canadian scene. We have a government that is indifferent to that plight. It refuses to take any action.

It is so ironic that today the Prime Minister is visiting the new President of the United States, saying we have to start on a new foot. We have to get new beginnings and we have to begin establishing new frameworks. The irony is that just two days ago, that new President announced a stimulative program to inject into the economy of the United States $31 billion, which is a much stronger economy than ours. The program will create jobs in infrastructure, public works and deal with the problems of structural unemployment in the cities. These are the very same problems that my colleague from St. Boniface talked about.

Our Prime Minister and our Minister of Finance reject any opportunity to co–operate with the Americans to develop a stimulative economic package that would help us develop a response to give some hope back to those 66,000 people who dropped out of the work force today.

We can only hope and pray that perhaps on the way to Washington, like Saul on the road to Tarsus, the Prime Minister will have a revelation and will come back with some understanding that this economy needs a stimulus, that young people need hope, that Canadians need jobsand that we have to come to grips with a kind of underlying burden of unemployment in this country.

Perhaps the new President of the United States can use his persuasive powers to convince and overcome the stubbornness of our present administration. It is time for a change. It is time for a change in direction to deal with this serious problem.

I want to point out one other aspect of this bill that again is tinged with enormous irony. We are talking about a need to reorganize, presumably to make things work more effectively.

One of the aspects of this bill which will not demand headlines but certainly concerns me is how it will affect Canada's representation abroad. It has become a cliché to say we live in a global economy. What is important about that fact of life is that so much of our trade, our relations, depends on how Canadians are perceived.

In a recent Angus Reid poll, taken in 15 other countries, unfortunately the prominent perception of people abroad is that the Canadians are far too dependent on the foreign policy of our southern neighbour.

We have to try and change perceptions and realizations. One way is to ensure that there is an effective understanding of the culture and education of this country. We have tried, even though it has been poorly financed and not properly supported, through the external affairs department, to set up Canadian studies programs in countries around the world, where in universities, high schools and educational institutions there would be a greater understanding of what Canada is all about, our concerns and our issues.

In Bill C-93 that program is being folded into the Canada Council. The program is being eliminated from external affairs which already has the structure abroad to make that case and it is being folded into the Canada Council.

To make some genuflexion in that direction, the amendment to the Canada Council Act reads:

> In performing its international functions and duties, the council should take into account the foreign policy of the Government of Canada.

To begin with, there is a fundamental problem. We have to discern what the foreign policy of Canada really is.

• (1050)

More important, why are we creating a duplication of effort in setting up the Canada Council, which will have to establish people to work abroad at the same time as we are eliminating that function in external affairs? Is that what we call an efficient use of resources? Do we take with one hand and set up a new institution with the other?

I can foresee in the days ahead that we will now have Canada Council representatives in various countries abroad, duplicating what the external affairs department was already doing but not being part of an integrated, coherent activity. It will be fragmented and separated, trying to discern what should be the foreign policy of Canada.

It becomes a matter of serious credibility when a government says that these measures are being taken to save money and to get more efficient delivery of services. If we look at what is going to happen, it is duplication of services and the recreation of a function. It adds on to another agency a task that is already being performed. There is simply no rhyme or reason in this proposed reorganization. It simply does not make good common sense.

Surely we are dealing with scarce resources and trying to find out the best way of ensuring that Canadian interests overseas and in the international environment are effectively and properly carried forward. At the same time they are once again disrupting the functioning of an active program, turning it over to another agency, thereby creating a new function, hiring new people, getting them trained and trying to integrate it with what is already taking place.

One has to ask: Where is the common sense in that kind of approach? Again to use the remarks of my colleague from St. Boniface, it totally disrupts the ability in a very important way to come to grips with the understanding of these issues. The social sciences and humanities is the study of people. We must look at how the problems of people have to be dealt with.

It is a different set of intellectual, academic and research concerns than dealing with the arts. A totally different set of judgments has to be made. Different players have to be involved. Yet they are also being folded in without any particular coherence being given for their function.

It is very difficult for us to say that we can support a bill which cripples the ability of this country to come to grips with its economic and social problems, which duplicates its functions abroad and which ends up in my view costing more money, fragmenting our functions and duplicating something that is already being done. That simply does not make good common sense.

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to speak to Bill C-93.

I must say at the outset that the bill reminds me of the historical reality—and we can us it as a metaphor—that while the emperor fiddles, Rome burns. In this country we see the government spending a lot of attention fiddling with organizations, small departments, and so on. Perhaps some change is justified, but while attention from the government is focused on these small issues which have great significance and impact on certain people, our country's major issues are not being dealt with.

My colleagues spoke very well about some of those issues, but the biggest problem is that we are forced by this government to pay attention to this bill and what it is that the government is proposing to do. The government has not really rationalized the content of the this bill and told us, explained clearly, or allowed the public to have adequate input into why this bill is good for this country.

As has been mentioned by some of my colleagues, I certainly have great difficulty with the parts of this bill which wind up the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council and transfer its function and staff to the Canada Council and, as my colleague before me eloquently stated, transfer certain functions and staff of the Department of External Affairs concerned with the promotion of Canadian culture to the Canada Council.

I have heard many people express deep concern about this move. They have expressed very strongly that this move is not advised. Particularly with the winding down of the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council into the Canada Council, it is pitting different groups against each other instead of trying to promote their individual functions, which are very different but very important to the future of our country. Specifically it is those functions which fall in the Social Sciences and Humanities area versus those that are more focused upon Canadian culture. They are two different functions but both are very important to the future of this country. They are not pitted against each other.

Another colleague spoke very eloquently about the winding down of the Enterprise Cape Breton corporation without having a full review and a full understanding on the part of the Canadian public about the implications. It goes on and on.

A colleague on the other side of the House said this was just another example of a fiscally responsible government. However we are not assured at all, in reviewing and analysing the actions planned by this bill, that what we are doing thereby is going to be more efficient or more economic. Sometimes when we see bills like this one it appears the government is panicking in its desperate desire to find ways to free up money. It does not appear that it is actually accomplishing its stated goal of doing that, but instead, in a panic it is just rushing to cut programs without good rationalization.

In my riding of Northumberland people are suffering grievously from the cuts this government has made to various programs. The whole emphasis of this government for the last eight years has been to cut in the name of debt and deficit reduction. We on this side of the House support that as well, but we simply cannot irrationally cut programs without a good analysis of the consequences of doing so. We are now living with the consequences of this government's irrational cuts.

Besides being very concerned about debt and deficit reduction, we should be equally concerned about increasing wealth and about increasing our Gross Domestic Product so that we can analyse where we are going as a country. Indeed as government we always have to review what programs and policies we are supporting and what the rationalization is.

There are some very good programs in place, specifically our social safety nets. We should not be getting rid of them as we have been. We must maintain national programs of communication which we see being eroded day after day, be it Canadian National Railways, VIA, the post office or the CBC. We see irrational cuts of programs being done to reduce debt, but we have not looked at how we can, instead of cutting, improve those programs, make them more efficient, make them more economic and at the same time put a very strong emphasis on other programs and investments that can bemade by this government to increase the wealth of this country.

One of the main factors of growth are our small businesses. Major employers in this country have been hurt grievously by the cuts of this government. We see so much unemployment and so much misery, and the bottom line is that our municipalities are having to bear the great burden for that, that this party cannot support the in many instances unjustified cuts in this Bill C-93.

YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT

Mr. Ross Stevenson (Durham): Madam Speaker, while this government has made substantive improvements to the Young Offenders Act, I was pleased to learn that this and related legislation is to receive further consideration this year. To help provide greater peace and security for our Canadian homes and families, there are two additional changes I would recommend to the Minister of Justice and the Solicitor General.

First, sentencing for repeat offences under the Young Offenders Act should be more meaningful and consistent with the severity of the crimes committed. Second, after conviction, the names of those found guilty should be made public so that people can have a clear understanding of what is going on in their community.

I am sure these changes would be welcomed by my constituents in Durham, and most certainly by a great majority of Canadians.

CANADA POST

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Madam Speaker, since the adoption of its corporate plan in 1986, Canada Post has shut down over 1,200 post offices under a so-called natural opportunity policy. Under this policy all 5,221 rural post offices are scheduled to be closed down over a 10-year period. Individual post offices are shut down when the natural opportunity of retirement, resignation or death of a postmaster occurs.

Recently there were six cases of post offices in and around the Prime Minister's riding where the postmasters had retired. Instead of opening the natural opportunity, new postmasters were hired and post offices remained open in five of six cases.

Why is it that a post office serving 121 people is kept open in the Prime Minister's backyard, while those serving thousands of people as in Spaniard's Bay and other Newfoundland communities are being shut down?

The minister responsible for Canada Post says that Canadians favour the closing and privatizing of post offices. If this is the case, why are post offices in the Prime Minister's riding being kept open? It seems there is one rule for the Prime Minister and another for the rest of us.

HOUSING

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Madam Speaker, once again I wish to congratulate the Prime Minister, the Minister of Finance and the Minister responsible for Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation for the decision last February to allow first-time home buyers to purchase a home with a 5 per cent rather than a 10 per cent down payment.

During the first year of this program it has been utilized by 68,806 home buyers. When it was first introduced 12 months ago, the minister estimated that it might help some 20,000 home buyers over the entire two-year lifetime of the program. Yet the combination of lower house prices and stable mortgage rates in most parts of Canada has more than tripled the demand for the 5 per cent down payments in the first year alone.

Obviously the program has been a smashing success, not only because it has directly increased home ownership and indirectly increased the supply of rental accommodation, but also because it has increased consumer spending—

Madam Deputy Speaker: I regret the hon. member's time has expired.

GRANDPARENTS

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Madam Speaker, across Canada thousands of grandparents live with the agony of never being able to have contact with their grandchildren. They live with the daily despair of knowing their grandchildren may think that their grandparents no longer love them or want to see them.

David and Madeleine Bremner are two such grandparents. For three years since the tragic death of their young daughter they have not been allowed to visit, write or talk with their grandsons in Nova Scotia. Their cards, letters, Christmas cards, Christmas presents and birthday presents are returned unopened.

Quebec law ensures that the loving bonds between grandparents and grandchildren cannot be broken without cause, yet this government has refused to consider the same measures.

I ask it to please listen to the petitions of despairing grandparents. People who want to support grandparents may request a petition from my office.

THE LATE FRANÇOYS BERNIER

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Manicouagan): Madam Speaker, today, all of Canada, but especially the people of Quebec, mourn the loss of Françoys Bernier, this great musician who was carried off by a long illness that he fought bravely until the end.

Françoys Bernier started his career at Gravelbourg College, in Saskatchewan. Later, he was musical director for the Montreal Festivals, artistic director for the Québec Symphony Orchestra and Chairman of the Music department at the University of Ottawa.

Françoys Bernier has put on the Canadian and Quebec charts unique performances that reflected his great talent.

He was a pioneer in interpreting works of Canadian composers, including Roger Matton's Te Deum, when he was the director of the ORTF Orchestra, in Paris.

The crowning achievement of his career was certainly the Domaine Forget of Saint-Irénée, his music school, an establishment located in beautiful Charlevoix which will continue to honour the memory of Françoys Bernier.

To his family, we extend our deepest sympathies and the assurance that his works and achievements will perpetuate his memory.

TRADE

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Madam Speaker, I rise today to again express concern about the American's use of their anti-dumping provisions to harass Canadian companies. Today it is Canadian farmers whom they are harassing. We have been harassed on softwood, we have been harassed on steel and now we are being harassed on grain.

Yesterday in Question Period I asked the minister of trade a question related to an American expert who talked about the corruption and the harassment that is behind the U.S. anti-dumping laws. I quoted that this reveals the hypocrisy and the absurdity of the U.S. dumping record.

We are being treated as patsies by the American government and by American special interests. It is time for this government to stop allowing the Americans to run railroad rife over all Canadian industries. It is time for this government to stand up for Canadians and say enough is enough.

GARBAGE DISPOSAL

Mr. René Soetens (Ontario): Madam Speaker, after the last provincial election, the residents of Ontario riding expected a new approach to the serious problem of landfill and garbage disposal in the region of Durham and metro Toronto.

The previous Liberal government had trampled all over the rights of the local residents and was about to impose its wish on the residents of Pickering.

The new NDP government has released its reports and will now consider allowing garbage to be dumped in four locations: in Pickering and in one mega-dump site right on the border of the Rouge Valley watershed. The residents of Pickering and in particular Whitevale deserve better.

I call on the NDP Government of Ontario to open its mind, allow garbage to be dealt with in new ways, investigate new technologies and widen the geographical search for potential landfill sites.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Madam Speaker, yesterday in a legislative committee meeting on Bill C-76 where we were to have examined, among other subjects, the government's imposition of its decision to increase interest on student loans, the government's desire to impose registration fees possibly on the poorest of organizations and the government's changes to the Small Businesses Loans Act, government members refused to allow even one outside witness per clause of the bill.

When the opposition left in protest, government members snuck out, found another Tory robot, a yes person, and rammed the bill through.

Organizations such as the Canadian Federation of Students and the National Anti-Poverty Organization are outraged by the government's contempt for the democratic process and its total disdain for openness and public participation in the political committee process.

Will this government ever learn that it simply cannot treat Canadians unfairly?

TRADE

Mrs. Edna Anderson (Simcoe Centre): Madam Speaker, the NDP has been resorting to their old tactics of scaremongering as they try to frighten Canadians into believing that free trade is bad for Canada.

In fact Bob Rae has hit a new low in using this well-worn tactic. It has been reported recently that at the World Economic Forum in Davos, Switzerland, politicians from other countries travelled far to boost their countries and their regions but only in Canada did they go abroad to tear down the country. And Bob Raewonders why the recovery in Ontario is so slow in coming.

Mr. Cid Samson (Timmins—Chapleau): Madam Speaker, the Conservative government is continuing to breach the wall of the unemployment insurance plan built to protect the unemployed from the effects of job loss.

The Liberals began to take away the bricks from that wall in 1978 when they reduced benefits by over 6 per cent.

The legislation proposed through Bill C-105 seeks to bring down the wall entirely to establish a level playing field between Canada and the United States. The legislation is a violation of labour standards and human rights. An employer can commit any act of discrimination, order extremes in working conditions, literally get away with almost anything because the results of quitting or firing are total income loss.

LOCKPORT BRIDGE

Mr. David Bjornson (Selkirk—Red River): Madam Speaker, I rise today to commend the government. It was not many months ago that I was up in this House representing the citizens of Lockport in my riding of Selkirk—Red River.

It was at that time that the status of the Lockport Bridge was in question. The government by way of the Minister of Public Works has responded in spades. The St. Andrews lock and dam and the Lockport Bridge will be refurbished at a cost of $20 million.

This will extend the life of the 82-year old structure well beyond its 100th birthday. On behalf of the citizens of the riding of Selkirk—Red River I thank the government for a quick positive response.

CANADA POST

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Madam Speaker, yesterday I brought to the attention of the House how Canada Post has what could best be considered a duplicitous policy on the shutting down ofrural post offices. Today I would like to expand upon that a little bit.

Guess where St-Irénée is? The population, 363, lost its postmaster but kept its post office. Baie St-Paul, population 3,000, still has a post office even though the postmaster retired on March 12, 1992. Forestville still has its post office. St-Siméon, St-Joseph de la Rive. Where are all those places, my colleagues ask? In the riding of Charlevoix.

An hon. member: Who is the MP for that riding?

Mr. Boudria: The government says it does not interfere with the operations of Canada Post. I would like to ask this government across the way why is it then that the Minister of Public Works was able to get a freeze on the closure of the Westville, Nova Scotia post office?

QUEEN'S COMMEMORATIVE MEDAL

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Calgary Southwest): Madam Speaker, tomorrow in Calgary I will be presenting 38 Calgarians with the Queen's commemorative medal marking Canada's 125th birthday. It is indeed fitting that we pay tribute to those citizens who have devoted so much time and energy toward making their country and indeed their communities a better place to live.

Many more Calgarians are equally deserving of recognition and I would like to take this opportunity to extend my sincere gratitude and appreciation to all of them as well. Once again Calgary has proven itself to be truly the city of volunteers and we thank you.

CRUISE MISSILE TESTING

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Madam Speaker, in the next few weeks the current Canada-U.S. agreement in respect of cruise missile testing will come to an end. With the Prime Minister meeting today with President Clinton there is an historic opportunity to end cruise missile testing not only in Canada and the United States but around the world. President Yeltsin has made a standing offer to stop cruise missile testing if the Americans will do the same. There are only two countriesstill testing cruise missiles, Russia and the United States.

Security in the world depends on using this historic opportunity to negotiate and to bring to an end the arms race while these countries are co-operating. I would call on the government and the Prime Minister to end cruise missile testing now by refusing to renew the Canada-U.S. cruise missile testing agreement.

VIOLENCE AGAINST WOMEN

Mr. Lee Richardson (Calgary Southeast): Madam Speaker, recent surveys in Calgary Southeast show an increasing alarm in violence against women. A growing number are demanding that we strengthen the laws which protect Canadian women from so-called stalkers and predators.

I am encouraged that the Minister of Justice is taking immediate action. We have the opportunity to demonstrate to Canadians our commitment to protecting women and our families. I urge the minister to press forward with measures designed to combat the terror which faces too many women in our country.

REFUGEES

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Madam Speaker, according to the Geneva convention any person who has reasonable fears or valid reasons for believing that he or she will be subject to persecution on the basis of their ethnic background, religious belief or political and social activities has the right to seek refugee status. People seek refugee status in Canada precisely because the legal system in their own country of origin has not been able to protect them. The Immigration Refugee Board recently rejected a claim by a young woman from Saudi Arabia who faced deportation on the grounds that she should "respect her father and submit herself to the religious views which govern her country".

Had this woman returned to Saudi Arabia she would have in all certainty been imprisoned or put to death for criticizing Islamic beliefs.

It is obvious that women who are lucky enough to have escaped from lies and total subjugation should qualify as refugees. Rights should be gender blind. I ask theminister to place a moratorium on the deportation of women until new guidelines which incorporate the category of persecution on the basis of sex can be established.

TAXATION

Mr. Scott Thorkelson (Edmonton—Strathcona): Madam Speaker, while the Liberal Party of Canada ponders a business transfer tax to replace the GST, I ask the Liberal critic for consumer and corporate affairs to publicly raise his objections to a tax that would tax basic groceries, a tax that would tax rent, a tax that would be invisible to consumers, a tax without rebates to low and modest-income Canadians, a tax that governments could raise without consumers knowing and a tax that is ultimately hurtful to consumers.

Where does the Liberal consumer critic stand on his party's very cynical replacement tax for the GST?

THE ECONOMY

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister. Now that the Prime Minister is meeting his new friend, his best friend, President Clinton, will the Prime Minister emulate Mr. Clinton's policy as reported in The New York Times today and stimulate the Canadian economy? Or does he intend to stay on the same course, with policies that are strangling our economy?

[English]

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Madam Speaker, the Minister of Finance delivered a financial statement in December and made many proposals to help the economy of Canada. Today we were pleased to note that the unemployment rate dropped a full one-half percentage point, from 11.5 per cent to 11 per cent.

That is not reason to celebrate wildly by any stretch of the imagination because there are still too many people unemployed in this country, but all the indicators are extremely positive. We have the basics in place and we are expecting a modest but steady recovery in this year 1993. The statistics from the first month of January arevery positive, indicating that we are going to have a good 1993.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Madam Speaker, it is a very sad day when the Government of Canada can congratulate itself on the unemployment of more than a million and a half Canadians.

It is a sad day when there are more than a million children still lining up at food banks.

I want to ask the minister a very direct question. Why is it that this government continues to pursue a stand pat do nothing policy on the economy when our unemployment rate is 11 per cent while in the United States at a 7 per cent unemployment rate President Clinton is prepared to act forcefully? Why does the Prime Minister not take a page from President Clinton's book and stimulate the Canadian economy?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Madam Speaker, the Liberals one day are knocking the Americans and praising them the next. One of the reasons people of this country will not elect them is because they are all over the map talking about what comes into their minds at that particular moment.

I must say that in the last nine months we have had 161,000 new jobs created in this country. That is very positive. Second, every economic think tank is saying that Canada will lead the G-7 in economic recovery this year. President Clinton has seen that and he does not like to see Canada leading in the G-7. That is why he is doing what he is doing. We made our economic statement back in December, long before President Clinton was even sworn in and we are starting to see some of the results of that economic statement today.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Unfortunately Madam Speaker, Canadians have not gained jobs. What they have done is lost hope.

More than half a million young people in this country cannot get a first job. We have a drop-out rate that should scare every one of us who wants to provide hope to a new generation. The unemployed cannot find work and the government is not even prepared to protect those people with jobs.

With all our problems in the steel industry, will the Prime Minister at least return from Washington with the commitment that U.S. harassment on steel will stop? Can the thousands of Canadian steel workers who are infear of losing their jobs have some comfort about fair trade between Canada and the United States?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Madam Speaker, Canadians must be watching the television play of this and saying: "Poor Sheila, just like Bad Luck Schlepprock in the comics, always looking for bad news, always looking for things that can hurt the hope and the confidence that people want to have in the economy today".

Surely, my hon. friend is aware of the 161,000 jobs in the last number of months that are helping people get to work, jobs that are being created by the policies that this government is following.

In specific terms on the steel agreement with the United States, my hon. friend knows this is something that the Prime Minister has already taken to the President in the previous administration and will be doing so with this administration as well.

I will be meeting with Mr. Kantor, the new U.S. trade representative, on Monday. I will be taking the same message.

EMPLOYMENT

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Madam Speaker, I want to address the same minister with a very precise question.

The statement from Statistics Canada this morning said that out of the 63,000 people that counted for the decline in the unemployment figures, 57,000 were people who had totally dropped out of the labour market because they have no hope. Is that the way we are going to solve the unemployment problem by having Canadians simply drop out of the labour market because they know they cannot get a job?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Madam Speaker, my hon. friend from Winnipeg is twisting the facts.

We have never expressed any degree of satisfaction with the level of unemployment today. That is why theMinister of Finance has done the things he did in the last economic statement and in the budget of a year ago.

What my hon. friend must realize is that since September we have seen 161,000 jobs created in Canada. Surely my hon. friend would say that is good news and stop going around looking for bad news like the little Bad Luck Schlepprock next to him.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): This party is looking for good news. That is why it is asking when and if the present government will begin to take measures to provide good news for Canadians.

I come back to the fundamental question. We have an increase this week alone of 6,000 on the welfare rolls of Toronto. In my own city of Winnipeg there are over 30,000 people on the welfare rolls, a 200 per cent increase over a few years ago. These are people without hope.

I want to ask the Minister for International Trade while the Prime Minister is down in Washington today: Is he going to understand for the first time that what the Americans are doing is what the Canadians should be doing and that is putting money into the economy to get people back to work and to create hope?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Madam Speaker, the hon. member mentioned Ontario and he mentioned Manitoba in his question.

Let me tell the hon. member that in the month of January, employment grew in Manitoba by over one half of 1 per cent and 43,000 new jobs were created in Ontario.

For Heaven's sake, when will the Liberals accept some good news instead of standing up here and bad mouthing the results that are happening in this country today which are positive and are leading to a recovery in 1993?

PREMIUM AUTOMOTIVE TANKS INC.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister.

This week when Premium Automotive Tanks of Port Hawkesbury in Cape Breton closed and the owners, like thieves in the night, brought in trucks in the middle of the night, loaded them up and took the equipment downsouth to New Hampshire, they did not just take away the equipment. They took away the workers' pride, dignity and livelihood.

This company received a large amount of government grants totalling almost $2 million and there are still some outstanding funds to be repaid. What steps is the government taking to get the repayment of the $500,000 of taxpayers' money that is still owing? Has the government given financial aid to Spectra Steel, the purchaser of this company?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Madam Speaker, my hon. friend has acknowledged that Spectra Steel which is a company from Longueuil, Quebec has acquired the plant and will operate the plant in Longueuil, Quebec according to an agreement between Premium and Spectra.

The position of the Government of Canada is that officials have not allowed the repayment of the debenture by Premium to the Government of Canada until they are absolutely sure of the particulars of this transaction. This is to make sure that any transaction we have done is in accordance with the agreement they had made with ACOA. Officials from both the Government of Canada as well as from the province are actively working on this at this point.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Madam Speaker, the company, as the minister points out, has been sold to Spectra Steel and really had a terrible record. Certainly, that has been acknowledged by everyone. The company lied to the workers. One week before closing it was doing training with the workers and praising them for their productivity. When I spoke to workers yesterday they had one message and one message only for Ottawa: "We do not want a handout, we want a job".

The mayors of Port Hawkesbury and the surrounding area have written to the government asking if it will do a full investigation into this situation given the implication of federal funding as well as the effect on jobs in the area. Is the government prepared to undertake a full investigation in Port Hawkesbury as requested by these elected officials?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Madam Speaker, we on this side deplore the way this whole thing has happened. The Prime Minister spoke of that, the minister responsible for the Atlantic CanadaOpportunities Agency has spoken about that and I have spoken about it. We deplore what has been done and how it has been done. As far as an investigation is concerned, there are officials working on this matter right now.

Rather than looking for all the bad news she can find, surely when my hon. friend goes to Nova Scotia she could visit the Michelin Tire Company which makes 12 per cent of the tires in North America, or Purolator Courier. Has she ever visited that company in Moncton which opened a service centre last October? It employs 100 people now and 400 people will be employed there over the next three years.

Did she ever congratulate Canadians who are providing the successes behind the 11.9 per cent increase in exports, many of whom come from communities like Moncton and Port Hawkesbury right across this country?

TRADE

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Madam Speaker, the last thing I need is a lecture from this government on respecting the workers of this country. The workers have built this country and if the government respected them it would not have signed the trade deal and it would not be contemplating following through with NAFTA.

It is clear as we look at what happened in Port Hawkesbury that job requirements for companies are absolutely essential when funds are involved.

There is another issue related to that. Through the NAFTA agreement we will not have the ability as a government to put those kinds of conditions on foreign companies that wish to take over Canadian plants. Under Articles 1106, 1107 and 1109 of the NAFTA agreement the government would not have the freedom from government imposed performance requirements or the freedom to repatriate dividends or royalties.

How on the one hand can the minister of trade condemn poor practices by companies and on the other hand sell out Canadian workers by signing a NAFTA that does that same thing and encourages it?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Madam Speaker, no one is selling out Canadian workers. If she would look at the facts she would see that there has been an 11.9 per cent increase in exports to the United States last year compared to the year before. There has been close to an $18 billion increase in exports to the United States since the free trade agreement came into force. That is double the rate that the Japanese, the Germans or the United Kingdom have increased their exports to the United States. Surely my hon. friend should see some good news in this.

• (1130)

I would ask her one thing. When in the last four or five years has she ever celebrated success in this country by going to some of these companies and hearing how they have increased their exports to the United States and asking them what impact the free trade agreement has had in that increase in exports which is creating jobs in Canada?

EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (York North): Madam Speaker, I certainly do not believe it is time to uncork the champagne bottles yet. There are still 1.5 million Canadians unemployed.

What is of extreme concern is that the unemployment figures released today reveal an alarming trend. Unemployed Canadians are giving up hope and are dropping out of the labour force. While this government claims we are in an economic recovery, the unemployment rate today is higher than it was in January 1992.

When will the minister accept that the unemployment situation in Canada is in crisis? When will he restore hope for those Canadians who have lost their jobs?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Madam Speaker, I find it interesting. The hon. member does not recognize that there were 161,000 new jobs created over the last eight or nine months. That is a good, positive trend. The unemployment rate is dropping. That is a very positive thing as well. The hon. member must understand that.

The hon. member gets up in the House week after week and talks about youth unemployment. Let us talk about youth unemployment which is still unacceptably high. We are not popping open any champagne bottles. We are not celebrating anything, but the trends are very positive.

The youth unemployment rate fell by 0.6 per cent. This accounted for a large drop in the unemployment rate. I might say that since over-all employment peaked for the fourth quarter of 1990, youth employment is becoming positive again. That is a good sign and is something the hon. member wanted all along.

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (York North): Madam Speaker, if the minister is going to talk to us about statistics then perhaps we can respond. Canada lost 500,000 jobs during this recession. So far we have recovered only 161,000, a far cry from the 500,000 new jobs the finance minister predicted would be created in 1992.

What measures is the minister going to take to have an impact on this so-called jobless economic recovery?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Madam Speaker, I think the hon. member was in the House when the Minister of Finance delivered his economic statement in December and his budget earlier in the year.

There are provisions in there to help the economy, although modest, because of the limitations we have with the economy in the shape it is and with the income that the government has. We have taken some very positive stands and the statistics are showing.

The hon. member will not accept the positive good news. Housing starts are up 7.7 per cent. Employment in the construction industry in January was up by 18,000 jobs. Take the good news and run with it so that Canadians will build confidence in their economy and it can go on to recovery in 1993. Do not go around with a little black cloud over your head all day.

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Madam Speaker, the minister had better check his facts because his facts are wrong about youth.

The minister must be aware that the number of youths now employed in the labour force has fallen by 103,000 in the past year. In the past five months alone, 90,000 young people have left the labour force. They are losing their jobs.

What concrete action will the minister take to create jobs for these young people?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, I do not know where the hon. member is getting his figures but mine show that I have employment has risen 0.6 per cent. The unemployment rate fell six percentage points for youth in the month of January. The jobs are starting to be created and we saw 161,000 new jobs over the last eight months.

They are getting back into the labour force and the jobs are coming back. That is what recovery is all about. It is going to continue in 1993 and Canada is going to have the best recovery of the G-7 in 1993. We have the basics in place with low inflation and low interest rates. The jobs are coming back.

The hon. member should be pleased about that and should encourage people who do the hiring in this country to continue to grow and expand.

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Madam Speaker, one month does not a statistic make. We have a mammoth youth dropout rate; 44,000 more in the past month alone and over half a million young Canadians who have never held a first job. That is a 48 per cent increase since before the recession.

When is this minister going to give these kids a break? It was not their fault that there was a recession. When is he going to come forward with some concrete steps to put them back to work?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Madam Speaker, the Minister of Finance has come forward with concrete steps and the hon. member knows that. We are starting to see the results of that. For heaven's sake, I just mentioned that in January—

An hon. member: One month.

Mr. McDermid: One month, but the unemployment rate is dropping. The hon. member is obviously not happy with that. I could hear them today if the unemployment rate had gone up. Oh, my God, it would have been wild around.

They cannot stand good news over there. One of the problems is that the nonsense being spouted by the opposition does not give confidence to a country. They should start talking positively because the trend is increased employment and the creation of jobs, and the hon. member should be happy about that.

TRADE

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister for International Trade.

Some months ago I raised in this House with the minister the aggressive pursuit of Canadian investment by the benefits of reduced taxes and lower electricity rates in the state of Texas. At that time the minister admitted that there was no method under the free trade agreement by which he could stop the Americans from this kind of procedure, regretted it and said he would look into it.

Today I would like to bring to his attention an even more aggressive move by the Americans, after the free trade agreement, into Canada through recruiting Canadian investments.

Here is a letter sent to Mr. B. M. Done, president of the Reliance Foundry Company in Surrey, B. C. It says to come to Iowa: "No property taxes for three years. No corporate state income tax. Fifty per cent of your employees' wages for one year while on-the-job training. A 1 per cent rate for unemployment costs. A non-union business community in a right-to-work state" and workers compensation down to $2.62.

What action will he take to stop this kind of raiding of Canadian investment, many in the United States, under the free trade agreement that is giving away our jobs to the Americans?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Madam Speaker, the facts speak for themselves. Prior to the free trade agreement we had a net inflow of investment of about $3.5 billion. Since the free trade agreement came into force we have had a new inflow of over $5 billion. I believe the figure for the first nine months of last year was a net inflow of $5.1 billion for a nine-month period.

Those facts speak for themselves and I think are a good attestation to the benefits of the free trade agreement.

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Madam Speaker, this government refuses to stand up for Canadians. We have lost tens of thousands of jobs to the Americans, and even the Toronto Blue Jays cannot hire a Cuban because of American regulations.

What is going on? Who is running this country? Is it the United States or Canada?

This kind of enticement is attracting thousands of jobs into the United States. How is the government going to handle it when Mexico says: "Come down to Mexico. We only pay 80 cents an hour in the Maquiladora, no pollution standards and no environmental health safety standards. Come on down under NAFTA"? We will be sold out again by that minister.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Madam Speaker, there is such a babble of misinformation from the hon. member—

Mr. Barrett: Here is the letter. Last time you told me to table the letter.

• (1140)

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): There is a lot of bluster down there but little information. Let us look at some of the facts here.

We had an increase of exports to Mexico of about $190 million over the first nine months of last year. Clearly Canadian companies are able to export successfully into the Mexican market.

With the NAFTA we are going to see an elimination of non-tariff barriers and an elimination of tariffs which run as high as 20 per cent. This is going to create a level playing field between Canada and Mexico because 80 per cent of Mexican products came in last year to Canada duty-free.

The NAFTA is going to be a major benefit to Canadian companies to open up the market in Mexico, which is a middle income market of about 25 million or 30 million people. This is a very good-sized market for the size of Canada.

UNEMPLOYMENT

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the minister of state on today's unemployment figures.

How can the minister characterize these figures as good news when the only real reason that the unemployment rate seemed to drop is that 56,000 people gave up looking for work? They decided it was hopeless and dropped out of the labour force.

How can the minister and the government take any satisfaction from driving people back to the welfare rolls rather than putting them back to work?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Madam Speaker, I knew my hon. friend would get up before Question Period is over, because he is Mr. Negative of the Liberal Party; always has been and always will be. There is no question about that.

Improvement in employment over the last few months has been sustained. There are 161,000 new jobs created. The hon. member for some reason does not like that. He dismisses that as not good news? That is not good news at all.

I might remind the hon. member that the participation rate in our labour force in Canada is one of the highest in the world and continues to be. With the unemployment rate dropping one-half of one per cent for January, that is good news.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. McDermid: Poor Herb cannot even hear the answer because his members are yelling too loudly behind him.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Madam Speaker, Canadians will remember how the then Minister of Finance refused to even say the r word, recession, when it was under way. Everybody but him and his government knew that they were in a recession because of the policies of that Conservative government. The weakness of the Conservative approach is that they have no answer for unemployed Canadians except useless quips about other people in this House.

How can the minister of state claim that there is good news when the rate of unemployment this month is a full point higher than it was a year ago before the government claimed the recession was over?

I ask the minister: "Why don't you get real and know what is going on when it comes to jobs and misery for ordinary Canadians?"

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Madam Speaker, I am prepared to use the r word today: recovery, recovery, and it is happening. It is happening in Canada. All the statistics that are coming out are leading to a sustained recovery, not-spectacular, but a sustained recovery. I am prepared to use it and I will use the i word too: interest rates.

Remember a member of Parliament who said he would resign his seat if interest rates went up. Oh, sure you did. We all saw it on television. Don't tell us you did not say that. You are still here, for heaven's sake. Don't start throwing those quips over to our side without taking a look at yourself first.

METROPOLITAN TORONTO

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

Despite a public relations visit by a caravan of federal ministers to metropolitan Toronto, this federal Conservative government has completely ignored and abandoned the economic devastation that has been allowed to happen in metropolitan Toronto.

Why is the federal government, together with its friends at Queen's Park, holding up on some $9 billion of local projects in Toronto which would create over 100,000 immediate jobs?

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): A point of personal privilege, Madam Speaker.

Mr. Marchi: How can the minister stubbornly refuse to initiate a stimulative package that would help spur job creation and economic confidence in Toronto and across the country?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Madam Speaker, I stood up and said "a point of personal privilege" when my hon. friend referred to our "friends at Queen's Park". There are limits to how far the rhetoric can go in this House. With friends like that, no one needs them.

My hon. friend reminds me of those folks in Queen's Park. We should both be directing some comments to our friends down at the other end here. Here we have a premier going over to Davos, Switzerland, and saying things in front of 800 financiers and business people from around the world that will turn off investment in Canada and turn off investment in Ontario. It is ridiculous.

We have a premier of the province of Ontario who says that his number one priority is beating the Government of Canada by defeating it in the election.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): They are the only friends you have.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): I cannot believe what I am hearing. Surely the premier of the province of Ontario has more problems than he can handle that are within his own jurisdiction: problems with health care, problems with welfare, problems with transportation. He should listen to The Globe and Mail. It said that if he wants to be prime minister, he should seek the job. If he does not, he should do a better job with what he has in his own home province.

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Madam Speaker, the only person in government that is more unpopular and more incompetent than the premier of Ontario and his government is this crew. The r words are resign and ridiculous. Those are the real r words.

I return to the minister of trade who very cutely abandoned any response on the responsibility that a national government should have for one of the key economic sectors in the country which happens to be the temporary riding of the minister on the other side.

Given that the economic situation in Toronto has reached such an alarming proportion that the municipal leaders of that city have had to call for an economic summit on February 19 and given that his government is a key participant at that summit, is this government finally prepared to recognize the need to stimulate the Toronto economy?

Is it prepared to commit and announce an infrastructure program that would assist a kick-starting of the economy rather than having Ontarians and Torontonians watching this ping-pong game between federal Conservatives and provincial New Democrats?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Madam Speaker, first let me remind my hon. friend that last month 43,000 new jobs were created in Ontario.

Let me also remind my hon. friend that this government was a participant in the saving of the de Havilland corporation. Many of the defence industry productivity-grants go to the metropolitan Toronto area. Bill C-91, which the Liberal Party and the New Democratic Party—

Mr. Marchi: There are 85,000 fewer jobs in Toronto than at the start.

Mr Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, if my hon. friend will not listen to the answer, he should not put the question.

The answer is that with Bill C-91, which the Liberal Party did not support, the result has been the creation of a number of substantial volumes, about $600 million of investment in the pharmaceutical industry in Mississauga and in Scarborough, just to name two particular places. With regard to the airport, my colleague and I just announced the privatization of the airport which will result in about $300 million worth of investment in the airport facility.

I could go on. There are many things this government has done to support the economy of metropolitan Toronto. I look forward to discussing these further at the meeting on February 19.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment and is about the criminal pollution of the St. Lawrence River by Tioxide Canada and the sweet political deals that allowed it to happen. I am sure the minister is aware that since 1985 Tioxide has been forced to clean up its plants in Italy, Spain, Britain and France but during the same period of time, those same eight years, no efforts were taken to get Tioxide to clean up its plants here in Canada and now it has chosen to run rather than clean up.

• (1150)

Will the minister assure this House that he will order a thorough independent examination of the cosy relationship between Tioxide and certain ministers of the Crown here in Ottawa and in Quebec City and make sure that any illegal activity that is turned up brings about immediate prosecution both here and in the province of Quebec and that he will make the results of the investigation known publicly as soon as it is completed?

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, let me first correct one false assertion by the member. In regard to at least 50 plants identified along the St. Lawrence River in accordance with the St. Lawrence action plan, and that included Tioxide, the government has undertaken to reduce the toxic effluent of these plants by 90 per cent in the life of the St. Lawrence action plan. There was a lot of work being done on all of these 50 plants, including Tioxide.

Furthermore, as I mentioned before in this House, and the member will know this, charges have been laid and some evidence gathered. The courts will deal with that matter in the case of Tioxide. Those charges are laid under the Fisheries Act.

As to his further allegations, I have no idea what he is talking about.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Madam Speaker, I am sure the minister is aware that while Tioxide was upgrading and rebuilding its infrastructure everywhere in the world except in Canada, the plant here was running downhill. It was during that period of time that the government should have been taking steps to force Tioxide to march in lock-step to clean up its plant here and do in Canada what it was doing everywhere else in the world.

My supplementary question is this. Since Canadians want to know that the owners of Tioxide will be punished for their actions before they run off under the protection of the free trade agreement to Louisiana, will the minister assure this House that the Tioxide polluters will be held in custody if necessary so they will face the music with their assets frozen, which they are not at the moment, and that a special bill will be brought before this House to ensure that all those responsible, including bureaucrats and ministers who fail to enforce and uphold the laws of Canada and Quebec, will be brought before the courts and properly punished?

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, I think the line of questioning of the member for Skeena in so far as his last comments are concerned is not very solid. I am not sure what he is referring to. I assume he will want to step out of the House and put forward whatever case he may or may not have.

As far as the charges are concerned, charges have been laid and it is for the courts to determine what will happen. It is not for us to go beyond what the courtsmust do and assume their duties in examining the evidence and determining what will happen after.

If I may add in respect to the responsibility of dealing with Tioxide, if the hon. member looks at the record, he will find that both provincial and federal governments worked with the company in good faith in dealing with their pollution problems. There were many contracts and agreements entered into at both levels of government, more specifically with the provincial government, in dealing with these issues and with the results that we are now faced with.

REFUGEES

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. He is aware of reports that a refugee claimant who is the wife of a Somalian warlord has been visiting her husband in Somalia while at the same time receiving welfare payments here in Canada.

Will the minister advise the House whether this report is correct and if it is correct what the government is doing about it?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member must know, because of the Privacy Act I cannot discuss the particulars of any individual cases in the department.

I can assure the hon. member and members of the House that the changes we have brought about to the Immigration Act which were staunchly opposed by our friends on the other side will give us the tools to allow us to prevent that kind of abuse of the Canadian taxpayers and we will be proceeding with the implementation of Bill C-86 to avoid that kind of abuse.

WINNIPEG WATER QUALITY

Mr. David Bjornson (Selkirk—Red River): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Minister of the Environment. Earlier this week I got up during statement period to voice my concerns about the water quality for the city of Winnipeg. As you know the Ontario government has not put forward an environmental review of a miningoperation which is about to begin on Shoal Lake, which is the water supply for the city of Winnipeg.

I know I and many members of this House have had representations from the citizens of Winnipeg about what the Canadian government should be doing. I would like to ask the minister what he plans on doing regarding this issue.

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, I understand that both Ontario and Manitoba support an integrated management plan so far as Shoal Lake is concerned.

I also understand that Ontario and Manitoba ministers have already met to determine the nature of such a planning process and my department has offered whatever assistance that we may be able to put forth in terms of conducting that process.

Now whether or not an environmental assessment may be done will be determined according to what projects are put forward. We will follow all of this very closely to see whether or not federal intervention may or may not be necessary.

UNEMPLOYMENT

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. Twenty thousand workers lost their jobs in January 1993 and the unemployment rate is almost 2 per cent higher than it was last year. What will the Minister of Employment and Immigration do to help these people in need, other than condemning them with Bill C-105?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, we must find ways to help Canadians across the country who are struggling with these economic problems, but without raising taxes and without necessarily increasing the deficit, because in the final instance, the taxpayer has to foot the bill. We must find ways to do this with the resources we have now.

In December, we increased the amounts allocated to help people receiving unemployment insurance benefits get new training and get back into the labour market. We included $260 million to develop what I call an unemployment prevention program for these people, which helps them identify human resources requirements in certain sectors of the economy. All thesemeasures—a total of $3.8 billion—are commitments under programs financed by the Consolidated Revenue Fund and the unemployment insurance fund, to help these people get back into the labour market. This is all part of our economic recovery and job creation plan.

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Madam Speaker, doing something about preventing unemployment does nothing for the 1.6 million people who are already unemployed. We cannot prevent them from being what they already are.

On the weekend, the Quebec Liberal Caucus will join thousands of workers in a protest march against Bill C-105. Will the minister have the courage to meet these people and explain why he is launching an attack against the unemployed?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, the Liberal Party should honestly tell these people that it does not have a plan, that it objects to Canadian workers and employers paying for the benefits of a person who voluntarily, without just cause, decides to quit their jobs. It costs workers and employers $1 billion annually. The Liberal Party of Canada can strut its stuff with these people, but I think Canadian taxpayers ought to know where the money comes from to pay people who choose not to work.

SOVEREIGN LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Finance, I have a question for the minister of state about the Sovereign Life Insurance Company.

He will know that the federal seizure of the company on December 21 will affect adversely about 240,000 Sovereign policy holders, 1,000 Sovereign brokers, 250 head office employees, 300 in-house agents and $810 million in company assets. Will the minister tell the company why he seized the company?

Since I am to combine the two questions, the minister was present on November 30 when the company asked for an 80-day extension to produce audited 1992 financial statements and an unqualified actuarial opinion. At all times there was in excess reserves of $52 million. He had in support an independent actuarial opinion signed by two former presidents of the Canadian Institute of Actuaries. What does the government intend to do now to minimize the damage done by this grossly irresponsible action done to a major financial institution in my part of Canada?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Madam Speaker, I can assure the hon. member that everything was done over a fairly significant period of time to try to preserve Sovereign Life as a company.

Many requests were made of Sovereign Life by the superintendent which were not met. Every effort to find other purchasers for the company to extend its life was made. That was unsuccessful.

It received a fair and full hearing. At that particular time a decision was made to wind up Sovereign Life. We have support from many areas within the insurance industry, especially those who are responsible for paying out and ensuring that the policy holders are protected.

We feel that we gave them every opportunity and it was the decision of the Minister of Finance upon the recommendations of both myself and the Superintendent of Insurance that winding-up procedures take place.

That went to court, as the hon. member knows. The case was heard in court and the decision of the court was to wind up the company.

SOFTWOOD LUMBER INDUSTRY

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister for International Trade.

The minister will know that next Thursday and Friday panel hearings resume on the softwood countervail tariff dispute between Canada and the United States. Included on the agenda of that panel meeting are two among other important items. One is the ongoing ridiculous allegation by the Americans that Canadian laws regulating the export of raw logs is countervailable in Canada. There is some question as to whether one of the commerce department's verification team members, who came to Canada to snoop through our files and verify their ridiculous allegations, was a member of a previous U.S. lumber lobby coalition attack against Canadian softwood exports.

Can the government assure this House that this government will use every opportunity to tell the Americans, including the Prime Minister's meeting with the President today, that this countervail action should be thrown out, in particular the ridiculous allegations over our raw log export policies?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Madam Speaker, I appreciate very much the support of the hon. member. That is precisely the position of the Government of Canada. It is a position that we have taken right the way through this whole debate and it is one that we will continue.

As my hon. friend knows, we have taken this matter to a dispute settlement panel because we disagree with the actions taken by the United States. That panel process is running its course. I will take the opportunity next Monday when I meet with U.S. trade representative Kantor to bring him fully up to date with the views of Canada on this so that he understands fully the seriousness with which we hold this issue and the importance that it represents both to our relationship between the United States and Canada as well as to the economy of very important parts of the country.

GOVERNMENT RESPONSE TO PETITIONS

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36(8), I have the honour to table, in both official languages, the government's response to 26 petitions.

TABLING OF DOCUMENTS

STORM LAKE AREA DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Madam Speaker, during Question Period the member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca quoted from the Storm Lake Area Development Corporation in Iowa. On his behalf I would like to table this document.

At the same time I ask the Minister for International Trade, who quoted from a document in response to our leader's question, if he would table that document in the House as well.

Madam Deputy Speaker: As far as the first request by the hon. member for Churchill is concerned, he knows this is not part of our rules. Unfortunately the Minister for International Trade is not in the House at the moment. I am sure someone will let him know of the hon. member's request and he will, or not, respond to the hon. member's request.

Mr. Murphy: Madam Speaker, then I ask unanimous consent of the House to table the document that the member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca quoted in Question Period.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: No.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Consent is not given.

INTERNATIONAL ASSEMBLY OF FRENCH-SPEAKING PARLIAMENTARIANS

PRESENTATION OF REPORT OF ACTIVITIES OF CANADIAN SECTION

Madam Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 34, I have the honour to present to the House, in both official languages, the report of the Canadian section of the International Assembly of French-speaking Parliamentarians on its activities at the meeting of the Bureau de la Commission politique et de l'administration générale of the Assembly, held in Paris from November 12 to November 14, 1992.

REPORT OF LEGISLATIVE COMMITTEE

Mr. Brian White (Dauphin—Swan River): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to present, in both official languages, the report of the legislative committee on Bill C-76, an act to amend certain fiscal provisions of the budget tabled in Parliament on February 25, 1992, with an amendment.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Madam Speaker, the member just reported Bill C-76. I understand that government members on the committee would not allow any other witnesses except representatives of the Minister of Finance. Representatives of students, who are affected by this legislation, were not given any opportunity whatsoever to appear.

I ask, now this report has been tabled, if the Speaker would look into what happened within the committee and determine why witnesses of the public were not allowed to appear before the government ensured that this matter went to clause by clause study.

I understand that only Department of Finance officials were allowed to appear, no student representatives were allowed to appear before this committee.

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, I would like to point out for the benefit of the House and my hon. friend from Churchill that regardless of what the facts may be with reference to the witnesses before this particular legislative committee, that since the reforms of Parliament in the second phase of the McGrath reforms, the practice of legislative committees is to hear witnesses who have expert status and would be able to contribute to the refinement of the bill by pointing out drafting errors and that sort of thing.

On the other hand, if a bill is referred to a standing committee, then the scope of that committee is much broader. It is capable of hearing witnesses having to do with the policy aspects of the legislation before the committee.

Mr. Murphy: Madam Speaker, I do not know what the parliamentary secretary is trying to do. We have had any number of legislative committees which have had witnesses who are not technical experts. That is certainly the truth.

It may not be what the government wishes to be the truth, but legislative committees have heard from witnesses on all aspects and all clauses of a bill. That is the history. That may not be what the government would like to be so, but the history is that legislative committees do that.

If he wants to imply that the only experts with regard to Canada student loans are Department of Finance officials, I would suggest that perhaps the students themselves are technical experts on this.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Madam Speaker, on the same point of order, I think it is important for the government Whip to understand that not only did Bill C-76 deal with Canada student loans, it also dealt with a variety of other things, including imposing registration fees on lobbyists.

At the same time as that committee was sitting, there was a full inquiry into the lobbying industry, complete with witnesses, in another room on Parliament Hill and those people were not even asked. They could have gone to the legislative committee at a moment's notice to explain how this bill affected them. The decision by the government members was not only wrong, it was unreasonable. The people were right there. There was no delay involved if that was the fear of the government.

That is why it is important for the government Whip to understand what was done and to hopefully take steps to rectify the wrong that has been created.

[Translation]

Madam Deputy Speaker: As usual, the Chair is very reluctant to get involved in the business of a committee, and I think that is as it should be, a committee being master of its own business and proceedings. Since the bill has now been reported back to the House, the Chair will review the various points made by hon. members and, if necessary, I will report to the House on the committee that examined Bill C-76.

CANADA POST CORPORATION ACT

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-73, an act to amend the Canada Post Corporation Act, as reported (with amendments) by a legislative committee.

SPEAKER'S RULING

Madam Deputy Speaker: There are four motions in amendment listed on the Notice Paper for the report stage of Bill C-73, an act to amend the Canada Post Corporation Act, all four standing in the name of the hon. member for Churchill.

[English]

Motions Nos. 1, 2, 3 and 4 will be grouped for debate. A vote on Motion No. 1 will be applied to Motions Nos. 2 and 4.

An affirmative vote on Motion No. 1 will obviate the necessity of a vote on Motion No. 3 while a negative vote on Motion No. 1 will require a vote on Motion No. 3.

Mr. Karpoff: Madam Speaker, a point of order. With respect to the bill that has been called, I wonder if we could have a minute to get copies from the table since this was called without any notice to the opposition.

The government had indicated that it might be calling a number of other bills today, including Bills C-98, C-54 and C-69, but had not indicated that this bill would be brought forward today. I wonder if the table has additional copies of the bill and the amendments.

The hon. member opposite is getting worked up because he has to admit the government has become sneaky.

[Translation]

Mr. Gagliano: Madam Speaker, I may add that the government gave us no notice whatsoever that this bill would be considered after the vote. We are trying to reach the Official Opposition critic, in order to make this debate as reasonable and intelligent as possible, so that people can hear both sides. However, if the government keeps acting the way it has done since this morning, there is no telling what will happen this afternoon.

[English]

Mr. Andre: Madam Speaker, on a point of order. I understand, and I am sure the Chair understands, that this is not a legitimate point of order on the part of the opposition but I did want to correct the record.

Every Tuesday afternoon I meet with the House leaders. I lay out my legislative plans and what I would like to get through. I look for co-operation and support in proceeding with the nation's business in an orderly way.

I indicated that Bill C-73 was one of the bills I would like to see passed today. I had hoped we would get borrowing authority done. Of course it was not done. Ihad hoped we would get Bill C-93 done but it was not done.

We have had a clear indication, threats today to move concurrence. In fact the tactics of the opposition are simply to not agree to anything and to delay everything. We unfortunately have responsibilities to the country to proceed. This legislation was signalled on Tuesday. We did not expect to have to call a motion to move to Orders of the Day today. We thought we would proceed in an orderly fashion.

Unfortunately we were driven to it by the tactics of the opposition. I regret any inconvenience caused to the spokespersons of the opposition but frankly if they are looking for somebody to blame, they might look to the leadership of their own party.

Mr. Gagliano: Madam Speaker, the government House leader just said there are weekly meetings, and of course the bills are discussed at those meetings. We made it clear that we were prepared to co-operate with the government on certain bills.

The minister said just now that we refused to consider Bill C-98. Well, we were supposed to start debate on this bill this morning, but the government decided at the last minute to proceed with Bill C-93. The government moved a motion to revert to Orders of the Day, there was a vote, and we have just wasted 30 minutes. I hope he is there now, but a few minutes ago when the Clerk read the order for resuming debate on the bill in question, he was not even here. So how can you expect us to co-operate when the government acts this way? It is customary for us to be notified, to give our critic enough time to get here and respond to the government.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I just want to inform hon. members that in the Projected Order of Business for today, Bill C-73 was included with other bills. I am now told that copies of the bill are available, and unless the hon. member for Mission—Coquitlam really has something new to contribute to the debate, I would like to move the four motions in the House so that we can proceed with debate.

[English]

I will put the motions to the House if I may.

• (1300)

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill) moved:

Motion No. 1

That Bill C-73 be amended by deleting Clause 1.

That Bill C-73 be amended by deleting Clause 2.

Motion No. 3

That Bill C-73 be amended in Clause 3 by adding immediately after line 32 at page 4 the following:

"This act shall not be fixed to come into force any sooner than the first day in the year 1997 A.D.."

That Bill C-73 be amended by deleting Clause 3.

He said: Madam Speaker, I did not have a chance to get up on the point of order with regard to how this bill was called so quickly, without any consideration to the process that normally exists when there is going to be a change in the Orders of the Day.

I spent three and one-half years as whip for the New Democratic caucus and I know there are courtesies. Effort is made to make sure that the parties know what the legislation is so that the various critics and various government spokesmen are able to be here.

I find it very regrettable that the government, in its haste to make sure it gets this legislation through the House, has ignored those common courtesies.

I resent it as an individual but I also resent it for those other people whose time has been inconvenienced. They may have appointments with me and with others and now are in a situation where those appointments cannot be kept. It affects people from in town and from out of town as well. I find this regrettable.

I am suggesting in the motions before the House that clause 1 be deleted. Through the day I am going to move that all the clauses in the bill be amended or changed. It is important that we have a debate on this at the appropriate time. I do not think this is the appropriate time.

As well, there is another debate that has to occur, that is about what is happening with the postal service across this country.

I have been the critic in this area, among my other critic roles, for a number of years. I am always receiving complaints from small operators, from employees, from communities right across this country about how mail service is being ruined by this government and by Canada Post.

I have found it offensive the way Canada Post officials deny information to members of Parliament and to the parliamentary committee that is responsible for reviewing the estimates for Canada Post. I have accused the top executives of Canada Post of misleading the House of Commons, the Senate and of being evasive when it comes to providing information which the public deserves.

The government has allowed this to happen. The government has allowed Canada Post to break its word. The government has allowed Canada Post to destroy our postal system in this country. There are all sorts of examples that could be cited as to why this is happening.

Why does the government want to destroy Canada Post? Why does it want to make sure that the various communities across this country do not get the postal service they deserve? Why is it in the community in which I live outside of Ottawa, there is about a one-half mile stretch that does not receive rural postal service? The mail people come from one end of the road to one area. They come from the other end of the road to another area. There are about 10 to 15 houses in between that do not receive regular service. They have to go to a different community to get their mail. It is ridiculous.

Just before the Christmas break I revealed a leaked Canada Post document about how they were going to force various franchises to pay up front for stamps and the various articles they sell on behalf of Canada Post. That document stated they were going to tell only some MPs about what was going on. They were not going to give this information about what was happening in the ridings to all MPs.

This document also pointed out that as a result of this change in strategy a number of those small businesses that are carrying on service on behalf of the public, on behalf of Canada Post, were going to go bankrupt. The Canada Post document pointed that out.

There was no concern for small business. There was no concern for the communities involved. There was no concern for the people who have to go and get their mail. This is the problem. I know that my good friend from Timmins—Chapleau is going to point out later in the debate that this is a serious problem.

We have hurt the handicapped. We have hurt the seniors. We have made it ridiculously hard for people to get their own mail and we are doing it for some ideological interest which Canadians cannot understand.

We are told that Canada Post often surveys these communities ahead of time and that 97 per cent of the people want this change. This is very interesting. You can go into these same communities, as I and others in this House have done. Half of the population comes out to a meeting demanding that the post office be kept open.

I really resent the way the government has tried to handicap the opposition on this debate. Therefore I move:

That the debate be now adjourned.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I have listened very carefully to the hon. member for Churchill. The House at this time is debating a motion which stands in the name of the hon. member for Churchill. Henceforth the hon. member may not move that during debate on his own motion. The motion is not receivable.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, I listened to some of the remarks of the hon. member for Churchill and none of them to my hearing pertained to the bill in question.

He went off talking about mail service, small towns, a whole lot of things that are not dealt with at all in this legislation. Parenthetically may I say perhaps the House leaders might discuss some day whether or not we should hold ourselves to the relevancy of debate in this House. Perhaps we will cause those who are looking down on us and watching on TV to have a little less disrespect than they now have because of those kinds of antics.

• (1310)

Fundamentally, this bill provides the opportunity for the provision of employee stock savings plans for employees of the post office. The hon. member for Timmins—Chapleau said privatization. In fact if he reads the act he will see that his accusation is totally false. There is no privatization involved here.

Mr. Samson: Not yet.

Mr. Andre: Not yet he says. That is right. A new bill would have to be brought in to privatize. That is a new bill. It sounds very strange. Vote against this bill because a new bill might come in sometime in the future. I know the New Democrats are scared of the future, but they should not deny everything in the present because of fear of the future.

I thought this might interest him. I received a letter earlier this week with some information about the Swedish post office. The Swedish post office is no longer a monopoly as of January 1, 1993. Other companies are allowed to compete in terms of delivering first-class letters. On January 1, 1994 the Swedish post office is to be privatized. That is the law of Sweden, a country glorified by the New Democratic Party as the example the world should follow. So Sweden is privatizing its post office.

The member for Timmins—Chapleau shouts back there that we should not proceed with this bill because some time in the future some government might bring in a bill to privatize the post office and hence we should vote against this bill. The logic speaks for itself.

This bill does a very sensible thing. It provides for employee stock ownership. Is employee stock ownership a good idea? The fact of the matter is that some two-thirds of the companies on the Toronto Stock Exchange provide for this sort of thing.

The group GBB Buck Consultants did a survey of companies with these kinds of provisions of employee stock ownership programs. It said that 90 per cent of employers and 75 per cent of employees said the plans had a positive impact in their companies and over 90 per cent of surveyed employees took pride in owning company shares.

Canada Post in the last few years has gone from running a deficit of $300 million to $400 million a year, where its service was atrocious, where it was a drain on the taxpayer and the laughing stock of the users to running a surplus and is recognized by other post offices around the world as the most efficient post office in the world. That is a tremendous accomplishment.

This bill seeks to build on that because employees of Canada Post now do feel pride in their corporation. They do feel that it is doing a good job and they do want theopportunity to participate. It is not compulsory. They are not required to. They are simply given the opportunity to.

The idea of employee stock ownership programs is so revolutionary that the current Government of Ontario has said it intends to bring in a plan like this. The current Government of British Columbia says it intends to bring in a plan like this to promote employee ownership of enterprise.

I find it not surprising, but a little bit strange that the federal New Democratic Party says this is an outrageously avant-garde idea that must be opposed by all means possible. That really does not make common sense. This is simply in keeping with modern business practices. It has been a success when it has been tried. More and more companies are doing it. The majority of companies do it. Even socialist provincial governments are adopting legislation to facilitate it.

An hon. member: I would be nervous about it if all these NDP members like it.

Mr. Andre: The hon. member has a point. If the socialists are now starting to like it maybe we had better re-examine it.

I am sorry, I said the B.C. government was considering it. It did it in 1989. The Ontario act was tabled in 1991 and of course Manitoba proclaimed its act in March 1991. It is a modern idea in keeping with modern corporations. It is something we ought to proceed with. This bill simply makes it possible.

I repeat, the amount of the equity that would be offered to employees is 10 per cent. That does not represent privatization in anybody's concept. The other 90 per cent rests with the Crown. If in fact that was to be changed and the Crown was to sell its shares, a separate new bill would have to be brought before Parliament.

The hon. member from the New Democratic Party and anyone else who thinks private ownership is an outrageous concept that should be fought at all times could in fact have their fight at that point in time.

I ask them to put aside their partisan interest, look at what this bill does, recognize it as it allows the continuing progress of Canada Post as a useful thing to do. The employees who choose to participate can. Those who do not will not. Ninety per cent of employers have found itsuccessful when they have put it in place and 75 per cent of employees have found it very useful.

With that kind of experience, that kind of evidence that it is a useful thing to do we ought to adopt this bill and allow the post office to carry on making the progress it has been over the last few years.

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): Mr. Speaker, I certainly disagree with what the hon. minister stated a moment ago, that the motions moved in this Chamber were not relevant to the bill or the debate before the House.

The reason the motions moved are relevant and the reason the remarks of the chief Whip of the Liberal Party before this debate started are relevant is that the bill itself is not relevant to Canada Post. The minister states: "Oh, we are now going to give employees shares in the corporation". I wonder what kind of shares.

First of all, they cannot have any more than 10 per cent, according to clause 27.1(5). We notice that the shares held by the minister have the exclusive right to vote at meetings of the shareholders of the corporation. We also note in clause 27.3 that the employees' shares will be non-voting shares. The employees' shares will be of a different character, a different class.

An hon. member: Second class.

Mr. Baker: Just like the employees of the corporation now are considered to be second class by the government and by the corporation.

When the Liberals were in, what a service we had. When the Liberals were in, we had post offices. We had post offices in rural areas. We had mailboxes in the post offices. There was a Canadian flag over the post office. The post office was the community centre. That is what happened when the Liberals were in.

When the Liberals were in we did not have calls in our offices that mail had just disappeared. We did not have every medical school and law school in this country rewriting their requirements so that they do not say that applications have to be postmarked on a certain date. It says the application has to be received in that university. That has been an intentional change by our professional schools in this country.

It has been intentional since this government took over and since the service has so deteriorated in this country, where a firm is hired to gauge the amount of time it takes for a letter to go from point A to point B. Itthen brags about it but does not explain of course that the letter it is passing judgment on has to have the address perfectly in the centre of the envelope. It is no good to have it written by a mother who is writing to her son overseas somewhere or in another part of Canada in pencil or pen.

This debate is relevant. The bill is irrelevant. That is why our chief Whip a moment ago asked me to move a motion. Of course I am going to do it because I never disagree with the chief Whip. The motion is this.

I move:

That the debate be now adjourned.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Fee): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Fee): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Fee): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Fee): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Fee): Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion, which was negatived on the following division:

Madam Deputy Speaker: I declare the motion lost.

Motion negatived.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Resuming debate, the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell.

[English]

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to participate in this debate this afternoon.

We have to remember the backdrop against which we are addressing this important issue today. First of all, the government changed the House order eight or nine times in the last 18 hours or so, including probably 10 seconds before it commenced the deliberations today.

• (1400)

I notice that the member whose riding is in the Brampton area seems to be upset by the fact that he has had a hard time following the agenda of the government as well. That is unfortunate.

Mr. Edwards: Madam Speaker, on a point of order. I think it is very important that the House and the country understand, as Your Honour has already said, the order of business for today was agreed upon.

Mr. Kilgour: It is not a point of order.

Mr. Edwards: It was stated by the Minister of Labour yesterday in response to a question from the opposition House leader and appears on today's Order Paper. I think my friend would be diligent in correcting the record.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I can hear the hon. member for Edmonton Southeast saying it is not a point of order but I had to listen to what the parliamentary secretary was saying before I could in all fairness rule. The hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell has the floor.

Mr. Boudria: Madam Speaker, since of course we did not hear a ruling, we must assume that in fact it was not a point of order after that diatribe was stated, which brings us to an interesting point.

Mr. Edwards: I hope you withdraw your allegation.

Mr. Boudria: Withdraw my allegation. Well, if we must debate that then let us. Let us do that simply because yesterday the government was telling us it wanted to debate Bill C-93 and then it changed its mind to Bill C-98, then to Bill C-93 again. Today it stopped its own members from tabling petitions and brought forward Bill C-73. That is supposed to be an allegation. Those are facts.

Mr. McKnight: Open the book on your desk. Read the Orders of the Day.

Mr. Boudria: I am sure the minister opposite who used to be the minister of agriculture and is now the minister of energy knows all of this but let us move on to Bill C-73.

We are talking of the post office and it pleases me to no end to talk about the post office today. Particularly today, because yesterday Canadians discovered to their astonishment some of the Canada Post policies. Here is how it works roughly.

If you are an ordinary garden variety MP and the postmaster retires in your riding, your post office is closed, period. Now, if you are the member for Charlevoix, the Prime Minister, and the postmaster retires in your riding, there is a different rule. Here is how it works. When the postmaster retires Canada Post refers to that as a natural opportunity. I suppose getting old or dying is natural. That natural opportunity is seized upon by the Tories opposite to shut down the post offices right across rural Canada.

In rural communities the post office is the only building with the country's flag on it. That is the post office in many rural villages in Canada.

What did Canada Post do? First of all it removed the coat of arms from its insignia. Then it removed the Canadian flag from its insignia. Not content doing that, now it is removing the post office altogether and there is nothing left. No more federal presence in rural Canada, no more Canadian flag. It is gone.

The member opposite is telling me to be careful about Canada Post. I do not know if he is going to send Don Lander after me if I am not careful or perhaps some of his spin doctors who are having lunch across the street in the National Press building. Half a dozen of them are trying to instil a message in the press different from the truth that we all know, to put it kindly. Nevertheless here is the truth.

The village of Saint-Irénée, with a population of 363, lost its postmaster, but it kept its post office anyway on December 1, 1992. Some of these villages are in the riding of the member opposite, others are in the Prime Minister's riding, like Baie-Saint-Paul, with a population of 3,733. I will even admit that if my riding had a community of 3,733 people, it might have kept its post office. In any event, the post office in Baie-Saint-Paul stayed open. As the hon. member knows, the same thing happened in Forestville: the post office stayed open. Saint-Siméon has a population of 1,020, which is not a lot. The postmaster resigned on February 4, 1991. It had an acting postmaster until March 9, 1992 and another one was hired. The post office stayed open. Good for them.

But why does the same rule not apply to other Canadians living in rural areas? As the member opposite knows, Saint-Joseph-de-la-Rive has a population of 225 and 35 houses; the postmaster quit and a notice was issued to hire another. The new one has not even been hired, but the post office is still open and it has been announced that a new postmaster was being hired. As we know, Bradore Bay is a Group 1 post office, the smallest kind there is in Canada—

Mr. Langlois: It's in my riding.

Mr. Boudria: I know that it is in the riding of the hon. member for Manicouagan.

The postmaster retired, Canada Post advertised the position within the Corporation and no one applied. No one. What did it do? It advertised it a second time throughout the system, in the same region that time, not just at the local post office. Once again, no one applied for the position. It tried twice to fill it.

In Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, in Stormont—Dundas, in Avonmore, in the riding of my colleague, the member for Gatineau—La Lièvre, what did it do? It closed the post office the first chance it got! It has tried twice to keep it open in Bradore Bay. What did it do? It has still not found anyone who wants that job. It announced it would close the post office and it is still open today. So much the better for the people of Bradore Bay! But why a different rule for the Prime Minister's neck of the woods than for the rest of Canada and other members from rural areas?

[English]

Yesterday the Minister of Labour replied in this House that his government did not interfere with the operations of Canada Post. Tell that to the Minister of the Environment who is sitting across the way. Ask him about Lennoxville. Is the post office not still there in Lennoxville even though Canada Post announced that it was closing? The Minister of the Environment is in his seat. I do not hear a heckle. Ask the Minister of Public Works what happened in his riding. It is the same thing.

There has been plenty of interference in the operation of Canada Post. Some ministers, particularly the Minister of Public Works and the Minister of the Environment have convinced the postal authorities to change their minds.

The Minister of the Environment knows it only too well, very well. He knows of the representation. The constituent in question was phoning him and me minutes apart trying to convince both of us to do our best to keep the post office open. That is not necessarily wrong.

What is wrong is that yesterday the minister gave us an answer that was less than accurate, to use parliamentary language. He said that the government did not interfere and the government Whip replied to that moments ago precisely. The government does not. He just repeated it.

• (1410)

Yet, Madam Speaker, I have indicted to you twice that that was not the case.

I know all of my colleagues will want to talk about this because it is an important issue for all of us.

Mr. Cid Samson (Timmins—Chapleau): Madam Speaker, it is with a great deal of pleasure that I take the opportunity to speak on Bill C–73 this afternoon. I do not think there is anything I would rather do than debate this bill today.

The minister responsible for Canada Post got up a little while ago and made reference to the comments of the member for Churchill who happens to be the critic for the New Democratic Party for Canada Post. He said that he talked about everything except the bill.

I want to inform the House that anything we say about Canada Post and the changes that are taking place in Canada Post do refer to this bill. I will demonstrate in a moment what I mean by that. The minister went on to say to me as the member for Timmins—Chapleau that in Sweden they have moved to privatize their postal services and that we in the New Democratic Party are always quick to refer to Sweden when we make a comparison between the working conditions and the conditions that exist there as they compare to the conditions that exist in Canada.

I would simply like to say to the minister that if he wanted to follow all of the examples that Sweden put forward in terms of protecting their workers and the working relationship they have with their employers maybe we would want to look at this a little more favourably. Until he is ready to do that I do not think we are ready to support this bill.

This bill is the employees' share savings plan. Its intention is to try to instil a little more pride and a little more partnership between the employer and the employee.

Plans have been tried before where they gave watches and they gave gifts and clocks and pieces of jewellery and what-have-you to try to improve the relationship between the employee and the employer, Canada Post. It did not work. It failed completely because it seems certain people within Canada Post Corporation are content to create a little empire to rule over and act like little dictators. Until that problem is addressed, these little gimmicks are not going to work. They did not work before and this gimmick is not going to work this time.

If Canada Post wants a share savings plan to work between the employer and the employees, why is it that prior to the introduction of this plan, it was never discussed with the employees that Canada Post wants to participate? The employees were never consulted during two years of negotiations prior to the introduction of this bill. Why is that? Is it because it does not matter what the employees have to say? Is it because Canada Post wants to throw this at them and say take it or leave it?

The minister is quick to say it is voluntary. Employees do not have to participate if they do not want to. That is fine but what does it mean? It means that only those at the higher levels will want to participate. They are the ones who will benefit the most from this because they have the most to invest. They have the most opportunities to take part in this program.

For those employees who will perhaps want to participate we are going to see a situation even worse than what exists now in terms of spying on each other and watching what is going on, trying to cut measures in order to create higher dividends.

That is the name of the game and that is what this corporation is heading for. It is heading for more profits and it is asking the employees through an employees' share savings plan to loan money to Canada Post in order for them, and I quote the minister, "to improve service". Does it mean Canada Post is going to maintain employment? Does it mean it is going to create employment? No, it does not. It is going to improve service. We are going to ask the employees to participate in a plan to lend the employer money in order to buy mechanisms and technology machines to put them out of work.

Mrs. Sparrow: It's called productivity.

Mr. Samson: Productivity? Give me a break. It is called putting people out of work. The hon. member knows it.

This plan will not improve the situation at Canada Post. It will not do anything to improve the conditions that employees at Canada Post have to face day after day.

In my riding there is a small rural post office in a little town called Foleyet. The postmistress cannot even take lunch. She cannot even take a coffee break. Why? Because Canada Post eliminated the person who used to come in and help her for 20 hours a week. Canada Post has told her to close the wicket, just close it down. Never mind the people who are waiting outside. Never mind if it is a rural post office and people come from miles around to get their mail. Just close the door. Ignore them, do away with the service.

That post office is still open. Do you know why? It is making money. It is showing a profit. Do you know why it is showing a profit? Because there is no bank in that town. There are no other means for people to access any kind of a financial institution and they are using this post office instead. That is why Canada Post cannot close this post office down.

There are hundreds of these post offices in the riding of the member for Churchill, the critic for Canada Post. He has numerous situations under the same conditions where if the corporation would only realize that with a little bit of co-operation, with a little bit of help, these post offices would not only create jobs but they would also create profits. Are members opposite listening? They create profits. That is something the government knows about. That is something it wants. Along with profits, it creates jobs. What is wrong with that? What is wrong with jobs and profits? You can have it both ways, just try a little bit.

Mrs. Sparrow: Move into the next century.

Mr. Samson: Give me a break. Zip it up. This member is astounding. If you want to speak, get up and speak.

The employee share savings plan will work if Canada Post has the co-operation of the employees. The employees have been left out. They have been left out of all of these negotiations and therefore they will not support it. They do not want it. All the unions that represent the workers at Canada Post Corporation have said they do not trust this corporation and this is a move toward privatization. The minister has said it is not a move toward privatization. If it is going to be privatized, it has to have legislation introduced.

Again today he said that he admires Sweden for privatizing their post office. In the past he has said that he would welcome privatization of the corporation at a future date. All it needs is legislation.

With this government anything is possible. It has such a large majority it can jam anything through. Is privatization out of the question for this government? Absolutely not. Is this the way we want to go in this country? Is this what this government wants? It wants to privatize and put all these people out of work.

We cannot take the approach of cleaning up the problems that exist in Canada Post because if we get into this kind of a mess with employee share savings plan it really does not do anything other than loan the government money to put their employees out of work.

Perhaps it would work if these were at least voting shares and if they would actually produce a dividend. In 1991 the corporation lost $128 million. How much dividend would the employees get? How much return would they get?

The government will retain 90 per cent of the shares. We have to assume that it is going to do that at this point simply because it is issuing 10 per cent. Obviously this must mean that there are 90 per cent left. What is the government going to do with them? Will these be sold to the private sector? We do not know. The government has complete control. It does not need legislation to sell those shares. It is not necessary. These are voting shares and it can do with them whatever it wants. If they vote and decide to sell them, they can do it.

This whole bill is a disaster. It does nothing to address the problems that exist at Canada Post. It does nothing to enhance the lives of the employees at Canada Post. It does nothing to enhance service. It only creates more problems and it is certainly something that Canada Post does not need.

Bill C-73 is as much a disaster as some of the conditions that exist at Canada Post Corporation and this bill has got to fail.

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to speak to Bill C-73 which proposes to make amendments to the Canada Post Corporation Act.

The operation of Canada Post and mail delivery service in general is a very large issue across this country. Since I have been an elected member I have heard nothing but complaints about what Canada Post is doing. Certainly long before I was elected I heard similar complaints. In my own riding we have had the closure of several post offices which have been very controversial. My local constituents have had a lot of difficulty in accepting some of the changes which have been made.

As has been raised by others of my colleagues here, it is of more than passing interest how the Canada Post Corporation, which the government says operates at arm's length from the government, happens to go across ridings, such as mine of Northumberland, closing small rural post offices which have in the past, and those that remain today, provided a very important and valuable service to the rural constituents. I do not want to belittle the important service that has been provided by our postal service over the years in this country.

A country as large as ours has to put a very special emphasis on maintaining very high standards in all of its communications and certainly our post office services are very important.

It is puzzling how Canada Post Corporation, operating at arm's length from the government, closes post offices and reduces postal services in a constituency such as mine, yet the constituency of the Prime Minister just happens to be able to maintain its usual services. We do not have constituents complaining in his riding as they might in mine.

I have tried my best to defend the interests of the constituents in my riding. The staff at Canada Post have done their best from time to time, but we know they have orders as to what they are to do and what they are not to do. It seems very obvious that this corporation is becoming more and more a private enterprise with profit as its main motive, not service to constituents across this country.

Yesterday a few members of our caucus had the pleasure of speaking to the National Pensioners and Senior Citizen's Federation. We had a chance to discuss with them many of the issues that are of great concern to them across the country and certainly postal service was one of their major concerns.

Their position is as follows. I would like to excerpt and have on record what they have to say about our Canadian postal service. I think it is relevant to the bill that is before us today.

The National Pensioners and Senior Citizens Federation wants the government to reconsider its decision to close all rural post offices. It reminds the government that almost 30 per cent of the membership of their group lives in rural areas. The government decision to close rural post offices has had a negative impact on those seniors' lives.

The Alberta Council on Aging stated in its brief to the federal government in 1990 that "seniors we talk to tell us the new services are much less satisfactory that the ones we had before when we had a knowledgeable, helpful and friendly staff in a rural post office".

The United Seniors of Ontario, said: "The rural mail delivery is an excellent service which should neither be reduced nor abolished. The supermailboxes are for the most part inaccessible to many seniors and should never be allowed to replace rural mail delivery at the rural post office". I have to say that in Northumberland I have had several problems brought to my attention by seniors who have had a lot of difficulty accessing the superboxes that exist in their communities, not just in the rural areas but in the suburban areas of my riding as well.

According to Rural Dignity of Canada, over 3,000 of Canada's small towns have concentrations of seniors, over twice that of the national average. I have many small towns in my riding of Northumberland. One-third of all Canadians 65 years and older live in communities of less than 10,000. As many as one-third of those 65 years and older do not drive.

Certainly the latest problem that I have had in my riding has been in the community of Hope Township where a post office was closed because of the very fact that many of the seniors do not drive and have to rely on others to help them. It has been a burden for them.

There was an attempt to try and set that closure of a post office right, but it does cause a lot of concern and change in a community that is at times very difficult with long-term impacts.

National surveys by seniors' networks show postal service to be among the top five issues of concern to Canada's elderly population. I bring that to the attention of our government because certainly it ought to be very concerned about the needs and desires of our senior population. When this is one of the government's five-most important priority issues, it should certainly be stopping to listen to them.

The impact on seniors has many aspects, one of them being higher risks of physical danger. Outdoor boxes are placed in unprotected roadside locations without proper lighting or regular snow removal and seniors are at higher risk of physical danger. They create a loss of independence for seniors. In rural areas public transportation is non-existent. I can say that is certainly the case in most of my rural constituency. The superboxes and retail postal outlets may be split into two locations.

Those seniors without transportation are now required to depend on others to send or receive their mail. There is a loss of social contact that arises out of the closure of so many of our rural post offices. This was a contact that was very important to our seniors and allowed them to know that there was somebody who on a regular daily basis was there to check up and to follow what was happening lest there be some illness or accident that had befallen a senior citizen.

There is also a loss of a support network and the general lack of communication not just between a postal courier and a constituent, but also a constituent and neighbour. Since this government has undertaken the measures it has in the past to make changes to the Canada Post Corporation, communication across this country has suffered greatly.

The proposals that come forward in Bill C-73 today appear to me to be just one further step toward the privatization of Canada Post. As that occurs we have problems of loss of employment, loss of service to seniors, as I have just outlined, and loss of service to citizens of all types.

Other members have raised the issue of just how students who are trying to make application to get into university are hampered by our failing Canada Post Corporation's services across this country.

This is a vast geographical nation. We cover a large, large territory and it is imperative that we try to increase and improve our postal service. However, with the new and improved technologies that we have in the world today and with which Canada in particular is blessed, we find that instead of improved service we are paying more today for less and less service. Any moves in that direction which are going to exacerbate an existing problem I cannot support.

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, I greatly appreciate the opportunity to participate in the debate this afternoon.

Bill C–73 concerns Canada Post Corporation and gives the opportunity to employees of the corporation to share participation in the company. As has been noted, the availability of share participation has been deemed by responsible surveys to be a productive mechanism in 90 per cent of the cases. Indeed, 75 per cent of employees who have participated in such plans have favoured them as well.

While there is no way of knowing the extent to which Canada Post employees would take up this particular opportunity, the freedom for them to take it up or to refuse it is always there. I believe that the issue that is before us requires a good deal of debate.

In order to give an opportunity for all members of the House to participate, since we have had some interruptions today, I would move pursuant to Standing Order 26(1):

> That the House continue to sit beyond the normal hour of adjournment for the purpose of continuing consideration of Bill C–73, an act to amend the Canada Post Corporation Act.

And more than 15 members having risen:

Madam Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 26(2), the motion is deemed to have been withdrawn.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Madam Speaker, I am going to be splitting my time with my colleague so I have only five minutes, I believe.

I want to be on the record to make just a few points. Number one, I have always been a strong supporter of the postal system in this country. In fact, I remember being part of a study in 1982 when we discovered that the postal corporation, Canada Post, had an efficiency rating of close to 96 per cent.

In terms of efficiency, that is something that is unheard of. This was when we had post offices all over the country. This is something where philosophically I am on the other side of the spectrum from the government. I believe that the post office system of this country was a great instrument of federal presence.

I can remember the period of the referendum. The postal service in Quebec was a tremendous agent in helping to keep this country together. I think of rural Canada and the number of postal offices that were closed there in the last few years. It does not really contribute to galvanizing the will of this country in pulling it together. From a federal presence point of view, Madam Speaker, I say through you to the government that I am totally opposed to all of these post offices that it is closing. A lot of Canadians do not realize that these postal offices provide services beyond mail in rural Canada and even in urban centres. They have been access points for senior citizens in terms of getting their pension plans and other programs organized, and so it is wrong to be chopping up that federal presence across the country.

The other point is that it is not just rural Canada. In my riding there were two post offices which were running most efficiently in downtown Toronto and which were closed in the last six months. I received complaints from small businesses, people who run home–based businesses and use the post office box system as part of their business practice. The fact that we shut down these main post offices and turn them into franchise units where they do not have the facilities to provide the same level of service I think is wrong.

With regard to the relevance of this bill, I have absolutely no problem with the concept of equity participation for employees. This is a good thing. What I am really concerned about in this particular bill is that there is a non–voting share. There does not seem to be a code of shareholders' rights attached to this bill.

How do you value these shares? We all know that the postal service of this country is actually showing profits, not out of its operating system, but it has actually been liquidating assets in terms of land and buildings. I am sure in my riding where it has shut down the post office that the next step will be to basically sell the land or sell the building so it can get some quick cash to beef up the financial statement so it can ultimately turn it into a totally privatized operation.

In business, people have a system of earnings per share per quarter where the bottom line is all that business looks for. In government, we are in the business of servicing people. I think that the direction thegovernment is taking with this act is working against service to the public.

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Madam Speaker, Bill C–73 which is an act to amend the Canada Post Corporation Act, has one great fallacy. It fails to address the service of Canada Post to Canadians. Of all the things that Bill C–73 purports to do in terms of giving the shares of Canada Post, or an opportunity of those shares to employees, the government seems to be missing the biggest need and that is to address the postal service to Canadians in both rural areas and in urban centres.

We have tried to document with this government that closing stations, putting up supermailboxes, doing away with door–to–door delivery and removing the presence of the Canadian flag at postal stations across the country is not furthering or enhancing the sense of Canadianism and the important role that Canada Post has played traditionally through the many years. Not to even mention that there seems to be one rule in the ridings of regular members of Parliament and a completely different rule in the riding of the Prime Minister where the Canada Post stations are not being closed when in fact stations of greater service and of greater importance elsewhere are being closed.

The other point that I certainly want to dwell on in the few minutes accorded me in this debate is the way that Canada Post and the government approach public input. A postal station in my riding of York West was closed just a few days ago, Postal Station Downsview C in the Jane—Finch community. Canada Post officials late last year approached me because they were thinking of redesignating that postal service delivery. They had come at it from the standpoint of: "We wish to let you know this is what we are thinking of doing". I objected to that because I thought within the equation of that decision there was no thought given to what the clientele might think of redesignating or closing that particular postal station.

I suggested to them that it would only be legitimate and proper to delay any decision until they heard from the users, the clientele, the public, the community that had used that station for many years. Canada Post agreed with that process.

Then early in the new year I received a call saying that the building in which the postal station was located was sold and therefore they had to expedite their decision without public consultation. That decision was negative-because the decision was to close Downsview Postal Station C.

When we talk about indifference, cynicism and Canadians not believing in their institutions and governments any more and use this one classic example, is there any wonder?

The users of Downsview Postal Station C had absolutely no input and not one word to say about a post office that their taxes sustained and supported. I do not believe that is the way we should conduct public business. Canada Post is a public service to Canadians. Therefore we are having a public meeting next Thursday after the decision has been made.

Obviously there is going to be unhappiness and concern. It could have been managed and should be managed differently, not only for my riding but for the entire country. They should take Canadians into their confidence and allow Canadians the partnership to build and to redesignate and compromise so that both the community and Canada Post win. They should not shut out the communities. They should not agitate communities. They should not incite community activism which obviously will be organized now because of how things were done.

It certainly left bitter feelings in the community surrounding Downsview Postal Station C. It is not only a question of the stations that have been closed in the rural communities of Canada where it has taken on additional importance, but also in urban centres like my own city of metropolitan Toronto.

A lot of Canadians are dissatisfied with the postal service they are getting. There is a great deal of dissatisfaction that the user, the public, has no say. This is what we should be addressing in legislation before the House and not missing the mark and only talking about shares to employees. Let us talk about how we can improve this service for the benefit of all Canadians.

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Madam Speaker, I will be splitting my time with the member for Vancouver East.

North Surrey has the largest postal sorting service outside the city of Vancouver. About 18 months ago the postal station was informed that it would be closed and consolidated with the city of Vancouver. The local councils objected. The GVRD objected. The mayor of Vancouver objected. It is the wrong location. The services should be located in the suburbs where the people are. Surrey has a much better transportation corridor than the city of Vancouver. It is against the officialcommunity living plan of the GVRD to consolidate employment in the downtown core.

I met with senior people in the post office, including the vice-president for mail operations. About that time they found out that the Vancouver post office was structurally unsound. They realized that they could not consolidate safely into the city of Vancouver. I was informed that was off and they were now going to look for property in the Fraser Valley, probably in Surrey, to consolidate a postal sorting service. As recently as the last two or three months I have been informed that this was continuing and was even told about potential sites.

About a week ago a letter was delivered to my office by fax, addressed to me, not to the post office workers or to the unions. It was addressed to me. It was announced that the government was going to close the Surrey postal service as of May 31.

I would like to read one paragraph from this letter because I think it shows what is happening with this corporation. It says: "Any potential impact on employees will be dealt with in accordance with their respective collective agreement. Canada Post Corporation will consult fully with affected unions. No employees will lose employment as a result of the new network processing system although some will be accommodated in other locations".

The three-paragraph press release that went with it contained other interesting points, saying: "Canada Post is consulting with all affected bargaining unions to fully discuss this change. Canada Post will continue to update employees on a regular basis as more information becomes available".

This letter was faxed to my office at seven o'clock in the morning. At ten o'clock I phoned the local union to get its reaction and found out that Canada Post had not informed the employees and had not informed the union. I was put on the speaker phone and that is how 100 workers in Surrey found out that their jobs were gone.

Then it came back and said it wanted to work co-operatively with the union and the workers. It did not even have the courtesy to inform them. It sent a letter, not addressed to the union and a copy, but it sent a letter to the MP because the MP had been on its backside for a year and a half insisting that it treat employees fairly and keep the services in Surrey. It felt it had to pacify me but it did not have any regard for its employees.

Later that morning I talked to the local manager who told me that the letter was inaccurate, that 20 people would lose their jobs. Out of the 100 employees, 20 of them would actually lose their jobs in spite of the fact that the letter to me said this was not so.

Here the corporation went ahead in spite of local governments, the GDRD, the city of Vancouver, all pointing out to it that downtown Vancouver was not the place to locate the service. The transportation corridors were more appropriate to airport, rail and road in Surrey.

Then it had the audacity to go in and say it wanted the co-operation of the employees and it did not even follow common courtesy, let alone personnel practices and it ended up with the member.

This is repeated over and over again and I am sure my colleague from Vancouver East will have other comments along the same line.

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Madam Speaker, I oppose Bill C-73 because it is the first step in selling off Canada Post. This post office, which has been so undermined by this government and by the Canada Post Crown Corporation has been an essential public service since the beginning of Confederation. As other speakers have said, post offices were the heart of most communities.

Privatization is deeply resented by most Canadians. The bill is misleading to employees. It is an attempt to undermine collective bargaining. It will not give real power to workers who purchase shares. It will not promote labour-management peace but will increase hostilities.

It does nothing to improve or maintain effective postal services in Canadian communities, communities that have been decimated by this government's inhumane privatization policies and action.

In my constituency of Vancouver East, a multicultural multi-ethnic riding, Canada Post has closed every post office. I have received frequent complaints about the services in the small franchised units which they have been attempting to develop in small stores. The importance of skilled and informed postal workers providing services to the community rather than having untrained, overworked, underpaid and often part-time clerks in stationery or drug stores is very apparent in my riding.

Vancouver East is home to large Chinese, Korean, Italian, Latin American and other international communities. A thorough knowledge of international postal systems is vital for the maintenance of family communications. Sometimes it can mean the very survival of family members in the country of origin.

Yet with this new system it is understandable that part-time clerks who are untrained and underpaid do not have the skills to communicate with people of different cultures and to understand foreign procedures. Many franchise unit staff members simply do not seem to know postal procedures. The result is that people are forced to chase their parcels across the city and the country. Seniors, parents with young children and physically disabled people find the services inaccessible and sometimes impossible to use.

It is outrageous that this government has allowed this devastating deterioration of essential public services. I could go on and on, but in the time remaining I would like to move:

That the House do now adjourn.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

Madam Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

Madam Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

Madam Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

Motion agreed to.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The motion has been adopted and the House is adjourned until Monday morning at eleven o'clock.

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-227, an act to amend the Criminal Code (desecration of the flag) as reported (with amendment) from the legislative committee.

SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: There are three motions in amendment on the Notice Paper for the report stage of Bill C-227, an act to amend the Criminal Code (desecration of the flag), standing in the name of the hon. member for Scarborough East.

[Translation]

Motions Nos. 1, 2 and 3 will be grouped for debate and voted upon as follows:

A vote on Motion No. 1 will apply to Motion No. 2.

Motion No. 3 will be voted upon separately.

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Bob Hicks (Scarborough East) moved:

Motion No. 1.

That Bill C-227 be amended in Clause 1 by striking out line 5 at page 1 and substituting the following therefor:

"one who, in a public place, wilfully burns, defaces, defiles,".

Motion No. 2.

That Bill C-227 be amended in Clause 1 by striking out lines 6 and 7 at page 1 and substituting the following therefor:

"mutilates, tramples upon for the purpose of desecrating the national flag of Canada, is guilty".

Motion No. 3.

That Bill C-227 be amended in Clause 1 by adding immediately after line 9 at page 1 the following:

"(2) For greater certainty, the national flag of Canada does not include a representation of that flag."

• (1110)

He said: Mr. Speaker, I would like to make some very brief comments on these amendments. First of all I would like to thank the many individuals and organizations that put so much time and thought into improving this bill.

I recognize that the first draft contained many loopholes in its definitions but I believe that the definitions have been made clear and the loopholes have been filled as a result of the amendments which have been read by the Speaker.

One of the most important and enduring symbols of our national identity is the Canadian flag. However, one of the difficulties in addressing this is in adequately defining what we mean by the flag as the representative symbol.

Without these amendments children could possibly lick the maple leaf off a lollipop. Individuals could stamp out a cigarette in an ashtray which had a reproduction of the Canadian flag. This is precisely the reason why these amendments have been submitted today.

It is my opinion that the majority of Canadians have a great deal of respect for the Canadian flag and wish to preserve it as their national symbol. When people speak of the Canadian flag, they conjure up an image of a red flag of the proportions two by length and one by width containing in its centre a white square the width of the flag bearing a single red maple leaf which is flying proudly on top of a flagpole. This piece of cloth, this flag, our national symbol, is what we wish to protect.

May I say that I am not alone in feeling this way. That epitome and pillar of excellence, that monument of righteousness, the profound and anointed purveyors of public opinion The Toronto Star naturally ran an editorial opposing this bill.

The Toronto Star thought it would reinforce that by having a telephone poll. On January 28 it ran a telephone poll over a couple of days and well over 400 people responded. Sixty-nine per cent said that the flag should be protected; 31 per cent said no.

This endorses and underlines the results I had from my own riding in which well over 80 per cent of respondents favoured some type of protection for the flag.

I thank hon. members once again for their input in these important amendments. I think everyone will agree that the bill is much better now as a result of them and I look forward to the debate.

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the words of the hon. member and I congratulate him on his sentiment toward our flag.

Our flag is a symbol of our country, a symbol in which we take a great deal of pride. As such we look to the Canadian flag with a great deal of deference, a great deal of pride, and a great deal of respect. Therein we see our country and what our country stands for.

It is the flag of our country and not our country. The flag of our country, although it represents the honour which we feel toward our country, is a symbol. It is a symbol as the beaver is a symbol, as the CBC is a symbol. The fact is that our country must develop a respect for itself and see in the flag a respect for itself.

I would like to be able to support the private member's bill of the hon. member. I feel, however, to do so would add concern and problems to the law we have. At the present time the Criminal Code already contains laws that we are not following, to which we are not giving proper approval.

Mr. Hicks: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I was of the opinion that we were in the House today to address three specific amendments which have been offered. The hon. member opposite is speaking with regard to the bill itself, a bill which passed this House by unanimous consent at second reading.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Scarborough East points to the relevancy of the debate. I would prefer to give the benefit of the doubt to the hon. member for Cape Breton—The Sydneys. He was indeed speaking to the point, and I think it may be a little premature to raise a point of order.

Mr. MacLellan: I agree with you, Mr. Speaker. I think it is premature to claim, as the hon. member did, that my speech is not relevant to the debate. I therefore wish to go on speaking on the same subject.

[English]

I was talking about the Criminal Code. The Criminal Code contains laws which we must uphold. We have to be able to apply our Criminal Code to particular incidents and say that these laws have been broken.

If we put into the Criminal Code a law pertaining to the desecration of the Canadian flag, we will be causing problems. We are going to bring our flag more into more disrepute than if we left this situation alone.

In that regard, I want to follow up what the hon. member said. I want to deal with the first motion which says:

> That Bill C-227 be amended in clause 1 by striking out line 5 at page 1 and substituting the following therefor:

This situation happened in the United States. It was against the law in the United States to desecrate the American flag. In the case of Texas v. Johnson, in 1989 I believe it was, the Supreme Court of the United States stated that this law could not apply.

This situation arose when a young man protesting outside a nuclear installation burned the American flag in public. The Supreme Court in a decision of five to four, of which three were opposed in one way and one was dissenting for another reason, said that this law could not be upheld because it conflicted with the first amendment of the United States, which protects a person's right to self-expression and to free speech. The U.S. Supreme Court said that setting the flag on fire was a message. People might not like the message but in conjunction with the first amendment that person had the right to give the message. It was not necessary that the message be spoken words or written words only, there were various ways to convey the message.

What we would be doing, even with this amendment which is on all four with the case before the Supreme Court of the United States, is bringing into the Canadian law something which the Americans after decades of having that law in place had termed unconstitutional. We would be putting in a new law which the U.S. Supreme Court had just said was unconstitutional.

My feeling, and I do not want to attribute motives and feelings to the Supreme Court of Canada, is that it would likewise find this law unconstitutional.

• (1120)

I do not say for a moment that we should be making laws in Canada with one eye on what the Supreme Court may or may not do. What the Supreme Court does in interpreting our laws is its role. Our role is to make the laws we think are justified and right. If it is blatantly realistic that this law would be overturned it seems a folly to proceed.

The second amendment says:

That Bill C-227 be amended in clause 2 by striking out lines 6 and 7 at page 1 and substituting the following therefor:

> mutilates, tramples upon for the purpose of desecrating the national flag of Canada, is guilty.

Once again, this is similar to the recent situation in Texas v. Johnson in the United States.

The third amendment says:

That Bill C-227 be amended in clause 1 by adding immediately after line 9 at page 1 the following:

> For greater certainty, the national flag of Canada does not include a representation of that flag.

What are we going to call a representation of that flag?

I have no objections to the amendments themselves in that they are inoffensive. The bill is completely inoffensive. I would like to think the bill would help. No one in this country thinks more of their country and its flag than I do. However, I do not want the flag looked upon as a source of embarrassment, of concern, of caution as to how Canadians should express their feelings toward the flag in a very strong and positive way. I do not want that to happen. Canadians respect their flag and the example has been that they do.

While these amendments do not cause any problem, I do not think they change a bill which would be a mistake to implement in this House. Canadians know how they feel toward their flag. If we start attributing motives to Canadians we are not going to help their feelings toward the flag.

By telling Canadians we trust them and to love their country and to honour its flag is the greatest safeguard we can attribute to the Canadian public.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, my friend from Cape Breton has said many of the things I would say.

The hon. member from Scarborough East was right when he said this bill had passed unanimously in the House at second reading. I want to tell him that had I been in the House I would not have given it unanimous consent. I do not know what the members of the House were thinking about. They should have tackled the principle of this bill and turned it down. I will tell you why and I want to speak to the amendments while doing so.

We have so many things to do in this Parliament and this country. Surely, low in our priorities is to enact another law which is an amendment to the Criminal Code to deal with the desecration of the flag.

We have 11 per cent unemployment in this country. Does the hon. member bring forward a bill that has anything to do with unemployment?

We have plants closing in this country. We had the plant in Nova Scotia, the fly-by-night, leave the other day and the workers rebelled. What if the Canadian flag had been waved and they had said they were so angry at the government for not doing anything? What if some worker had torn up the flag expressing anger at the government in a moment of demonstration?

What would this government have done? It would have gone down there and not prosecuted that employer which threw the people out of work, nor tried to put the people back to work, nor tried to tackle the trade deals which are causing all these problems. It would have gone down there and put the poor person in jail for tearing the flag.

Where is the priority? We have a crisis in this country. In my riding in Coquitlam, a suburb of Vancouver, British Columbia, there is the Crane factory, a division of the Canadian company Crane Company Inc. It is B.C. pottery and makes toilets. The factory is closing, putting people out of work. Why? Because of the trade deals it is being flooded—pardon the expression—by American, Mexican and Chinese toilets.

There are so many factory closures and unemployment and we get a private member's bill on a flag as a priority from this Parliament. This country has a crisis in education. Do we get a bill about retraining workers, especially young people? No, we get a bill on the flag and the Criminal Code. Do we get proposals to help put young people back to work? No. This country has a crisis in its health care system. Do we get a far-sighted measure, a private member's bill that would deal with that issue? No, we get a bill about a flag.

It is said that patriotism is the last refuge of scoundrels. I am not saying the member for Scarborough East is a scoundrel. In fact, he is a very gentle and good man in all the dealings I have with him including a television debate on this very issue. I know he is trying to do the right thing.

I say to the hon. member, to you, Mr. Speaker, and to the country that Canadians are looking to us for leadership. Is this really the kind of leadership we want to give? This is easy to do.

That is why we had quick unanimous consent because it is unthinking and not really getting to the root of the problems in this country. Indeed, it has some negative implications and the bill itself is unclear.

This is not going to help our police. This is going to hurt our police and make more work for them. I look at the amendments in the bill. We have to look at what is a public place. If it happens in a mall, is that a public place? It may be defined in certain instances that it is a public place and in other instances that it is a private place. For example, for labour demonstrations a mall has been defined as a private place.

The second amendment is for the purpose of desecration. What if the flag is torn? What will happen? The poor police will have to go to a demonstration where some kid rips or burns the flag in the height of the demonstration.

Mr. Bjornson: You think young children should do that?

Mr. Waddell: It will be a young person who some day may be prime minister when he grows up and matures and becomes more acceptable. He is angry. He is young. He is at a demonstration and this goes on. These demonstrations happen and they go away. It is called free speech. That is what we call it in Canada and in democracies. That is what it is about.

The police will now have to go and charge this guy.

Mr. Crawford: And so they should.

Mr. Waddell: They will go to court. It will cost the taxpayers money. This is for the purpose of desecration. The Crown will have to prove that he intended to desecrate the flag. It will go on and on and on. Some will be convicted, most will be acquitted. They may be overruled by the Supreme Court. As my hon. friend from the Liberal Party pointed out the Supreme Court of the United States overruled it. The Supreme Court of Canada may overrule it.

We are going to be in all this mess. For what? To show that we are patriotic?

I believe those of us who oppose this bill are patriotic as the hon. member from the Liberal Party said. The hon. member who is making comments will get his chance. He can get up after me and speak on this bill. He can just listen for a moment. To be patriotic, the flag does not have to be worn on one's sleeve. I am an immigrant and deeply believe in this country. I have travelled all around the world with a Canadian flag and I believe in it.

We have a more mature level of nationalism than the United States for example. We have always seen it as a more chauvinistic country where there are these kinds of laws. In Canada, we are more mature. We do not have to wear our nationalism. It is there. It is deep. We do not need laws to show we are chauvinistic and we have to protect our flag.

• (1130)

The reason Canadians like the flag and the reason it is respected is because Canada has respectful policies around the world, for example, our peacekeeping role to which all have agreed in this House and has been implemented by all parties. We have had some differences in our foreign policy, but by and large we have had a progressive foreign policy in this country. We have a social safety net and we try as best as possible not to have homeless people in the streets or sick people not getting medicare.

That is the essence of Canada. That is why we are proud of our flag. We do not need to add another law. We have enough laws surely.

If the hon. member wants to change the justice system, because this is what his bill does, how about a bill on the Young Offenders Act to deal with the young offenders people are complaining about? Or what about the the Parole Act?

Mr. Hicks: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, once again I am enthralled by the eloquence of this hon. member, but I have listened carefully to his over-all philosophy of justice in general. I am wondering when he is going to address the amendments which are on the Order Paper this morning.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): It is always a sensitive issue for the Chair to assess the relevancy of the debate. Of course, with a bill like this one, members are bound to deal with the principle of the bill already approved by this House at the same time as the amendments. Again, I am willing to show tolerance.

[English]

Mr. Waddell: If the hon. member recalls, I have said that his first amendment is going to give rise to litigation in its uncertainty. The second amendment is going to give rise to more litigation and possibly more acquittals than convictions.

Finally, I have been saying that if you want to amend the Criminal Code, there are so many other areas. Dangerous offenders. My constituents want to know why convicted paedophiles are getting out of jail and are out committing the same offence. We get a bill on the flag. The crossbow incident. Why do we not have a bill making crossbows illegal in this country like guns? According to the police, at the British Columbia Institute of Technology in Burnaby last week a young woman was killed by a crossbow, like there was in Ottawa. Why not have a bill dealing with violence against women?

Instead this bill shows a complete lack of imagination. It is going for the easy hit: I love the flag. That can be sent out to constituents. Someone has to get up as I am trying to today to tell the House that this is nonsense.

I think my friend from the Liberal Party covered most of the other matters. I will conclude by saying that the problem with the bill is there is some question about the amendments, whether they are workable in law.

There are so many other things to do where we could amend the Criminal Code. This bill will hurt police, not help them. It will make difficult work for police in demonstrations and like incidents. It is going to make martyrs out of people, rather than ignore them and show how stupid they are in the way they treat the flag. Just ignore them and they will go away. Real patriotism goes a lot deeper than a quick-hit bill to amend the Criminal Code.

Mr. Jim Edwards (Edmonton Southwest): Mr. Speaker, this is Private Members' Hour. We have a private member's bill before us. I certainly am not going to criticize the motivation of the sponsor of this bill. I think his motivation is most sincere. He believes with real justification that he has a lot of public support for the bill. He certainly has demonstrated that he has support in this House.

I am on my feet during Private Members' Hour as a private member. I want to share with my hon. friend from Scarborough East some of the concerns I have about his bill, even with the amendments which I concede have considerably improved it.

As we travel abroad we recognize the touchstone the maple-leaf flag is for us when we see it, whether it is on the shoulder patch of a United Nations peacekeeper or whether it is on the backpack of a young hitch-hiker elsewhere in the world.

We have demonstrated a good deal of contradiction, confusion and irresolution when it comes to matters pertaining to the flag. We need only go back to the debate leading up to the February 1965 adoption of our current flag to realize that. I think a lot of that concern is still there.

Part of the reason for that is that Canada by many standards is a work in progress. I can recall when my late mother was involved with the Imperial Order of the Daughters of the Empire or, as her friends said, "in and out of the damnedest enterprises". She was one of those who fought long and hard to retain the red ensign as the flag of Canada. However, the moment the maple-leaf flag was adopted as our flag in 1965 she and her sisters in the IODE William MacKay Chapter began selling maple-leaf flags as a fund-raising project. It is interesting how quickly we adopt our new symbols.

On the question about Canada being a work in progress, and I assure my friend I will get to the point of the amendments very shortly, we give each other a lot of room and a lot of space in this country. We realize that we come to this country with tremendously different points of view and that we are in the process of forging a common Canadian point of view. Therefore, we avoid some of the excesses other young countries have fallen prey to, such excesses as jingoism and chauvinism as have been referred to by my friend from Port Moody—Coquitlam and xenophobia. We are falling into having a bit of that fear of strangers now, but by and large we have avoided it.

I was reminded of some of these issues when it was my duty to take the broadcasting bill through Parliament. In that context we were dealing with an amendment to the previous Broadcasting Act which had mandated the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation to be an instrument of national unity. I argued, and I still believe it was the right position to take, that the CBC, the state broadcaster, ought not to be an instrument of national unity, that is an extension of the state. I need only remind you, Mr. Speaker, and remind my colleagues of the difficulties we might have got into during the rather acrimonious referendum campaign we went through last fall if indeed our state broadcaster had been mandated to be an instrument of national unity. We backed away from some of these statist exercises.

I was amused by my friend from Port Moody—Coquitlam whose party tends to be a party of national symbols. He laments the loss of our national symbols. He was speaking against the consecration of a national symbol. It is unusual for that group to be on the side of the police.

To deal with the amendment, the first amendment bringing us into the realm of a public place and limiting the scope of the bill to desecration in a public place is a constructive amendment. I believe the second amendment is constructive also in introducing a sense of mens rea, an intent to desecrate, the purpose of desecration, as part of the bill. Finally, the question of the representation of the flag being exempted from the scope of the bill is a constructive move.

The point remains that this bill would criminalize an act of protest. That troubles me because I think we must each day defend our liberties and our freedoms, or we run the risk of losing them. I do not believe for a moment that it is an appropriate expression of public opinion to desecrate the flag wilfully or intentionally. However, by the same token I think it would be a mistake to criminalize such an act. If that seems to be a contradiction, perhaps I can refer my friend from Scarborough East and the House to an editorial that appeared in The Montreal Gazette in June of last year.

It reads: "Flag burning may be sappier and more obnoxious than flag waving, but both are legitimate expressions of political opinion. The desecration of the Quebec flag in Brockville was offensive and so was its exploitation as an example of anti-French feeling in English Canada. The Canadian flag has been defiled again and again by Quebec nationalists in recent years and that was offensive too. But a law making flag abuse a crime would not make the malcontents any happier about their country. It could make things worse—intensifying hostile feelings".

I concur with that editorial. I also concur with a point made in an editorial of The Globe and Mail on June 24 of last year. It states:

> Canadians hold another national symbol, Parliament, in lower esteem than they ever have. Yet no one is proposing that, since public criticism of Parliament might undermine respect for a national institution, we ought to restrict such criticism. There is also that little problem of Charter of Rights guarantees of freedom of thought, belief, opinion and expression. It's time for the flag-burning bill to hit the showers.

That is pretty strong stuff but I think it underlines the fact that no one is proposing that criticism of Parliament be restricted. Therefore, this other national institution, our national flag, while we revere and respect it, ought to be available as an item of expression of reverence and otherwise.

Finally, I would appeal to my hon. friend from Scarborough East and suggest that where this issue ought to be tried is not in the courts but in the court of public opinion. With regard to public opinion polls, I think I heard my friend say 69 per cent of Canadians favour such legislation. I wonder if Canadians would still favour such a restriction of expression if it were put within the context of a restraint on public expression of opinion. That is the issue that I think we need to ponder and it is on that issue alone I differ with my hon. friend. While we agree on most other things, I feel that I cannot support his bill even with its proposed amendments at this time.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Guy Hudon (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to speak this morning to Bill C-227, standing in the name of the hon. member for Scarborough East, and to the amendments tabled after consideration of the bill in committee. In fact, we both participated in the process, during which the bill was examined in detail.

When a bill is tabled in the House by the government, the opposition or the Senate I always ask myself three questions. First, what are its merits? Second, is the bill votable? And third, can its provisions be enforced? I must say that even with the proposed amendments, the merits of the bill remain. However, it becomes increasingly less votable and harder to enforce, but that is another problem. I will comment on each of these three aspects.

The bill has its merits. I am 51 years old, and I was brought up to respect my country and its leaders, regardless of their politics. When I was a youngster, regardless of the party my parents supported, if someone was the leader of a political party, I respected that person as such. I respected the person who represented me in the House of Commons or the National Assembly, because that is the way I was brought up. Today, society has changed. Society is more permissive because that is what people wanted. I was a teacher and a school principal, and I never saw a school where they taught respect for the flag, not for our national flag nor for the flag of Quebec.

The first country I visited as a tourist in 1972 was Dahomey, now Benin, in Africa. Every morning, when the students entered the school, there was a salute to the flag. We do not do that here.

When I was a youngster we did. But today it should come as no surprise that the younger generation no longer shows the same respect for institutions and the flag that I did. To me, the bill has its merits. But what about the generation that is now growing up, which has been given this tremendous freedom of expression and has so many ways to express and publicize its concerns? What do they do? They destroy or, I should say, they attack a symbol. There are times I prefer to see them attack a symbol than me personally. I would just as soon not become a symbol!

I saw this during the referendum campaign, when I picked up posters that had been stuck on my living room windows at the back of the house. People are starting to attack the messengers as well. If you do not like the message, kill the messenger. It does not work that way any more.

I think freedom of expression and the merits of the bill presented by the hon. member for Scarborough run up against the other side's right to freedom of expression. An attractive prospect, however, is that the bill would prevent the CBC from constantly broadcasting images of actions I find reprehensible.

Remember when some people in Ontario trod on the Quebec flag? I think Radio-Canada showed that 22 or 23 times. I said Radio-Canada, but it could have been Télé-Métropole or any other station. Incidentally, I never heard a flag being burned on the radio. I never heard that on radio. Since when have people been burning flags? Since television came along, and especially when it started repeating the same images over and over again. You do something once, and they can show it 40 times in one week. That is the problem.

Violence has always existed, but it is worse now with TV. I am not saying we should abolish television, but it is worse now because we see it not once but repeatedly. As I said before, people never burned flags on radio, but they do on television.

So freedom and the merits of this bill clash with freedom of expression. When I see Canadians burning a flag, I do not approve. I would like to compare this with what was going through my mind when we were considering the abortion bill. I cannot forget that bill, and I would just like to ask one thing: Can we as human beings be for or against abortion? We have no choice. We are against abortion. As a human being, I am against abortion. But that does not mean we should throw people in jail for that.

The bill may have its merits, but is it votable and can it be enforced? As far as I am concerned, it does have its merits, but is it votable? There is one amendment that reads as follows: "For greater certainty, the national flag of Canada does not include a representation of that flag". I remember in committee people said: "Listen, if a flag is painted on a brick wall, on a building, and the wall is destroyed, does this mean we are automatically destroying the flag?" The hon. member suggested an amendment to cover such eventualities. But even if we destroy every single flag in Canada, all those pieces of material, whether they are three-by-six or any other size, would we destroy the symbol? The symbol will always remain, regardless. People may not like the expression of that symbol, but the symbol will always remain.

We have to ask ourselves: What is a flag? We all have a picture of this country in our minds, and my picture is probably different, but no better or worse than that of the hon. member from British Columbia here on my right or of a member from Nova Scotia or New Brunswick, as long as it respects certain values and traditions.

Now, is the law enforceable? If the bill is passed as written, how will it be applied? A law was passed forbidding smoking in the House of Commons and members' offices. Smoking still goes on. People smoke less, but I have the feeling that people still smoke. I used to smoke and quit two years ago. I cannot report smokers even though the law encourages me to do so. If someone smokes, I need only report him and he is automatically guilty. I cannot find it in my heart and conscience to report a smoker, but still we have a law. We passed a law making it illegal to sell cigarettes to people under 18 years old. That is laudable, but is it enforceable? I live in my riding of Beauharnois—Salaberry, 10 kilometres from the Kahnawake reserve and at the other end of my riding is the St. Regis reserve. Where do you think the cigarette smuggling is going on? I am not accusing only the Indians, because whites do it as much, if not more. Whites buy the cigarettes. Where does that trafficking go on? In my riding.

Even though we cannot enforce it, we decided that it is a crime for those under 18 to buy cigarettes. That is easy. We hit out at those we are not afraid to attack. I can give a kindergarten child a good spanking, but I could not do the same to a college student because they seem quite a bit stronger than I am. We attack people and that clears our conscience. I do not necessarily want to criticize the government. It is very good to make it illegal to sell cigarettes to young people under 18, but is it enforceable? That is a different story. That is my point. We could have the most laudable motive, but passing this bill will take compromise. We will have to strike some bargain. However, we are a group of old people here in the House of Commons. The new generation is not strongly represented, except for my colleague from Terrebonne, who seems to be a little younger. I would be interested to know what a symbol or a flag means to young people in college. Such a law should not be voted on only by a group of old people. And to pass, it should be acceptable.

Thirdly, is it enforceable? That is our big problem. I live along Lake St. Louis, and we cannot help hearing the hellish racket made by cigar boats at night. They want us to pass a law making that criminal or the RCMP to chase the operators of those boats. You can imagine the noise. So let us pass a law, but how will it be enforced? Will it take 300 boats or 3,000? Even if we act for the right reason, the law must still be enforceable. In a case like this, I find that enforcing the law would cause many more problems than passing it was meant to solve.

Mr. Jean-Marc Robitaille (Terrebonne): Mr. Speaker, first allow me to congratulate my colleague from Beauharnois—Salaberry for his excellent speech, with which I fully agree.

I rise today to discuss Bill C-227. This is a measure to incorporate in the Criminal Code a new provision whereby anyone who wilfully burns, defaces, defiles, mutilates, tramples upon or otherwise desecrates the national flag of Canada would be guilty of an offence. I fully understand the very noble motives of my distinguished colleague from Scarborough East, who tabled Bill C-227 in this House. However, I cannot take his approach in denouncing what can only be considered an attack on our dignity as Canadians.

When people trample on this symbol of national pride for personal motives, or on any other flag for that matter, whether it is the Quebec flag or the flag of any other province or country, I believe they do something very wrong.

I condemn the acts of those who choose to desecrate our flag as a way to criticize the government. It seems to me there are many ways to express one's opposition other than trampling or burning a flag. Indeed, there are many other democratic ways to oppose what the government does, given what our flag represents for the vast majority of Canadians. When such an act is committed, it is shocking and offensive.

I fully understand the feelings of the member for Scarborough as I believe, do all members in this House. However, it must be recognized that Bill C-227 contains several flaws. For one thing, the bill does not define what the national flag of Canada is. Is this because we want to include the provincial flags? If so, would it be appropriate for Parliament to legislate on those flags?

In the event that we reply in the affirmative to that question, why should we limit the scope of the provision to those flags only? What about flags from other nations that are burned? Should we not protect other people's feelings? Are we satisfied to deal only with the Canadian national flag in this legislation? And there is more.

Indeed, it is proposed to make it a criminal offence to burn, deface, defile, mutilate, trample upon or otherwise wilfully desecrate the national flag of Canada. An exception is also provided for a person who "disposes" of the national flag of Canada with lawful excuse. It is clear that the author tried to make it an offence when the flag is burned, defaced, et cetera, for illegitimate reasons. Unfortunately, those reasons are not specified anywhere and I doubt that a court of law could easily provide a definition of those motives if we, as legislators, are not in a position to be more specific.

I appreciate the feelings of my hon. colleague who tabled Bill C-227. However, I am concerned about the impact of including in the Criminal Code a provision which is imprecise and open to all kinds of interpretations as to what it really means. As my colleague from Beauharnois—Salaberry so rightly pointed out, we must really examine this issue to see if such a measure is enforceable, because by attempting to implement such legislation to control something reprehensible, is it not possible that we will create other injustices?

I also wonder if this use of the Criminal Code is justified and legally applicable, given the freedom of expression recognized in our Charter of Rights and Freedoms. I repeat that attacking a symbol of our Canadian identity to make a point is most reprehensible and arouses feelings of contempt in many of us.

Nevertheless, I think it is always appropriate to preserve the greatest possible freedom of expression in our country by passing legislative provisions which are suitable and fit the crime when this fundamental freedom is threatened in any way in a democratic society. It seems to me that the wording of Bill C-227 leaves big gaps in that the illegitimate goal pursued by a person who defaces, defiles or otherwise desecrates the flag is not defined.

I believe that Bill C-227 would create a vague and uncertain situation which would necessarily have the effect of restraining a form of freedom of expression.

I am aware that it is very difficult to limit freedom of expression as little as possible and still protect this symbol that is our Canadian flag. Our southern neighbours have tried something similar and the results have been less than satisfactory.

In my opinion, you do not solve a problem such as the desecration of the flag by creating another problem, namely unnecessarily restricting freedom of expression. While recognizing that, in itself, my colleague's intentions in presenting Bill C-227 were eminently laudable and very honourable, I would like other means of promoting respect for our national symbols.

• (1200)

Only through pride in being who we are shall respect for those symbols identifying and uniting us be achieved.

I will stop here, seeing that my speaking time has expired.

SMALL BUSINESSES LOANS ACT

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister for Science and Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)) moved that Bill C-99, an act to amend the Small Businesses Loans Act and another act in consequence thereof be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Economics envelope.

He said: Mr. Speaker, we are here today to discuss an innocuous sounding piece of legislation called the Small Businesses Loans Act which in fact is the very opposite of innocuous. With this particular bill we are talking about a sector in the economy that has created almost all of the new jobs in this country in the last 10 years.

We are also talking about a sector which has been unusually restricted in its access to credit by the financial institutions across Canada. I have spoken in the House many times about my concern that the major banks and other financial institutions are not opening up credit to the small and medium-sized enterprises during the recession. Even now as there is a recovery I am disappointed with the level of bank participation in opening up credit and loans generally to small and medium-sized enterprises.

We can have the lowest interest rates or among the lowest interest rates in the industrialized world but if a small business person cannot get a loan, the company is not going to be able to succeed or expand.

Members could expect me to be particularly interested in small business as the minister of small business. I say to everyone in this House no subject is more important for the economic recovery of this country than the financing of small business, both credit and equity.

I have done some research on this problem in the last year outside of Canada as well as in Canada and I have to admit that access to credit appears to be a small problem for small and medium-sized enterprises everywhere in the industrialized world, not just in Canada.

There are some peculiar problems in Canada which we can deal with as government through the very delicate but potent use of the Small Businesses Loans Act and that is what we are talking about today. We are ready to go with this bill.

I have to tell hon. members most sincerely that I am looking forward to their input at committee stage. We should especially remember the Minister of Finance said that he would like this act to help in the financing of some forms of working capital. Therefore thoughts from hon. members opposite as well as from the government side on how to do that would be most welcome. We are working on it but we would benefit from the expertise of everyone in this House, especially when we get to committee stage.

It is generally accepted that external financing is one of the greatest needs of small business at any time, particularly after a small business exhausts its initial pool of capital which it usually gets from the owner, his or her resources, maybe a spouse, maybe some friends, maybe members of the extended family. Often it is that capital, quite frankly that gets a small business going in this country.

Even once an enterprise gets going it has needs for new plant and equipment. It has a need for new technology and so on. When someone goes to their bank or credit union for that additional line of credit, the conversation can many times be very difficult. To help small business obtain much-needed capital is what the Small Businesses Loans Act, which I will refer to as the SBLA, is all about.

The SBLA program makes debt financing more readily available for the establishment, expansion, modernization and the improvement of a business. In practical terms, the program provides loans. We should understand this. The program has never just given funds for working capital outright. It does provide loans for business people to acquire such things as fixed assets: land, buildings, machinery or equipment, computer software to do improvements to the leasehold.

That is the program. That is what it does. It helps obtain credit through a government guarantee which now stands at 85 per cent of the losses which could be incurred if a small business lost money or failed. It is that federal government guarantee which helps so much in obtaining credit.

It is very important too that we remember the name of this act. It is called Small Businesses Loans Act. This program is not for big business. I know my hon. friends opposite will be happy to hear that. It is an act for small business and it is directed to the small end of the business spectrum. I have to add again, small business is the big end of the job creation part of our economy.

We have now a situation in Canada where 99 per cent of all business enterprise is small business.

[Translation]

As you no doubt know, Mr. Speaker, small business is one of the main engines of growth in the country. For example, nearly 99 per cent of Canadian companies are small businesses; that is, they have fewer than 100 employees. Thirty-six per cent of employment in private enterprise is in the small business sector. Since 1984, small business has created about 80 per cent of all new jobs in Canada, after allowing for job losses.

[English]

We read this morning in The Globe and Mail that in the last three quarters, 347,000 jobs have been created by small business whereas the large corporate sector has lost jobs. It is the creation of jobs through small business which this bill addresses.

Small business is also a tremendous force for innovation. A lot of people overlook that. This is particularly vital in an increasingly competitive world. For example, more than one-half of Canadian companies carrying out research and development are small enterprises with less than 50 employees.

These facts and figures state very simply and very powerfully the key role which entrepreneurs play in the economy. They innovate and create jobs.

Our country is more entrepreneurial than it was 20 years ago. People are trying to find ways to downsize big enterprises, spin off divisions to make them more entrepreneurial. Close to one-third of all new businesses created in Canada are done so by new Canadians, first generation Canadians.

I saw statistics the other day which stated that in the last five years almost half of the new small businesses created in Canada are owned and operated by females. This is a new force for innovation and job creation in our economy. We must support it.

In fact, if you take a look at this bill, the SBLA legislation, its scope is really quite amazing. Let me just share the scope with you. We talk about Hibernia costing about a billion dollars or two billion dollars. Let us put this innocuous sounding bill in that context.

Since its inception, the Small Businesses Loans Act has made 290,000 loans worth over $8.5 billion. Very few things come into this House which add up to more than $8.5 billion. That is what the bill has done since its inception. That is why everybody in this House wants to follow it very carefully.

The current portfolio of loans amounts to $1.1 billion. In the last five years 71,000 loans for $2.7 billion have been made under the program with the average loan size. The average loan size is interesting. It is between $35,000 and $40,000. That is the average. Forty per cent of all these loans go to help start up small businesses. Another 20 per cent go to businesses that are less than three years old. All this activity is carried on at a modest cost, averaging $29 million annually over the last five years.

Imagine a program where there is so little money from government levering so much economic activity. It is amazing that $29 million annually is levering all that activity and all those jobs. Twenty-four thousand jobs were created by the program's clients last year alone.

People think this sounds great but ask exactly how this program works. It provides banks and smaller financial institutions such as the caisses populaires and the credit unions with an 85 per cent guarantee against loan losses for eligible loans. I might add that the credit unions are using this program increasingly. I think over 20 per cent of the use of this program is by credit unions since there is a special interest in it in the province of Quebec.

Private sector lenders are the sole delivery agents of the programs. We do not have a bureaucracy that says yes or no to a loan. The banks do it. The credit unions do it on a regular basis. We set the rules and the lenders make the credit decisions within those rules. We do not have an array of officials.

We have a government staff of 19 that does all the work. Imagine a program levering that many jobs and that much economic activity with only 19 government public servants to administer the whole program. We want to try to keep it slender like that. To pile up a lot of dos and don'ts in this program would simply increase the number of bureaucrats.

It is a good program. It is a slender program, highly levered program.

The loan guarantee enables lenders to make loans which they would not otherwise undertake without the guarantee. I know there is controversy about whether the guarantee to the banks is really needed. Would they have made the loan anyway. There has been a lot of research done by Hatch and Wynat and others which in fact shows that this program is profoundly incremental. It does make sure that new loans are undertaken that would not have been undertaken without the guarantee.

A good example is a viable company that has a very limited track record, possibly inadequate or inappropriate collateral in particularly risky types of businesses or perhaps those outside the major metropolitan areas. These generally are the clients for the program. Those are clients that have trouble getting loans without this guarantee.

[Translation]

While the program was unquestionably a success, its activities have dwindled since 1989. This is due, in part, to the economic situation, but also to a certain loss of interest on the part of the lenders. It should be pointed out that no changes have been made to the program since 1985.

[English]

The bill before the House together with related changes to regulations will make the program more accessible to small businesses and will ease access to financing for all small businesses.

The program changes that are being suggested in the bill and that will follow in the regulations respond to the Prosperity Initiatives Steering Group. Its recent report Inventing Our Future called for easing access to capital for all sectors of Canadian business. It is precisely that request that this bill answers.

The bill does two big things. It makes credit more accessible and raises the limit. The result of the bill will be a more competitive Canadian small business sector.

As part of the program review that led up to this bill, extensive consultations were held with both borrowers and lenders and their national associations. That consultation continues. Their valuable input helped to shape the changes being recommended which follow.

I want to thank the CFIB, the CBA, the credit unions, all sorts of small business groups, associations and individuals for their help on this and members of all parties who have taken tremendous interest in this.

Here are the changes that have been recommended. First, to broaden the program's reach, the size of eligible business will be increased from annual revenues of $2 million to $5 million. It used to be that if you had sales of more than $2 million you could not qualify. The new limit is $5 million. In addition, the maximum loan size will be increased from $100,000 to $250,000.

Just about everybody we talked to argued for these two increases and they are being made in the bill. That is what got the headlines. That is what got the attention, probably deservedly so, but there is more to this bill than that.

Second, the pricing structure will be changed. It will be moved to one approximating normal commercial rates. At present we have a price subsidy which is not available to somebody getting a loan and who does not qualify under the SBLA. We do not want to do that. We do not want to have a subsidy for people who qualify under the SBLA. What we want to do is make a level playing field. We are eliminating this subsidy which is not available to non-SBLA borrowers.

Third, on the question of accessibility, this is going to be improved by encouraging lenders to promote and use the program. Without the lenders' full support, the success of the program will be compromised. There are a number of things that have to be done, first of all, the fee. The financial institutions told us, credit unions above all, with a 1 per cent fee it is almost not worth their while to do this loan, so they are going to increase the fee from prime plus one to prime and a half per cent. Also, to add flexibility for borrowers, fixed interest rates will now be permitted. That is very good news, especially for those who want to plan their debt scheduling.

It will help the financial institutions to put this bill in the window because they feel they are going to recover their costs. I talked to the CBA about this. I believe that fee is fine. They are going to market this program. They are going to train their staff, their account managers, to really put this program in the window.

I agree with criticisms I have heard over the past two years about the SBLA, that it is not widely known and that in fact a lot of bank managers have it in the bottom drawer of their desk and do not tell anybody about it. We want to put this in the sunlight. We want to put it in the window. This new fee schedule has prompted the financial institutions to give us their assurance that they are going to publicize it and train for it. They had better do it or they will be hearing from us. I am confident that they will.

To make the program more cost recoverable, the one time up front government fee will be increased from 1 per cent to 2 per cent with the fee, unlike in the past, being amortizable over the term of the loan. By the way, if you amortize 2 per cent, on a $100,000 loan you actually get a loan for $102,000. The $2,000 is amortized over the life of the loan which is let us say five or ten years. That ends up being less than 1 per cent. The CFIB have asked for a 1 per cent annual fee. This is even less than they are asking for. It will help us because it helps us pay for and expand the program.

Finally, irritants in program operation will be removed with the program being made much more user friendly. I used to hear stories about the forms being so complicated that a bank manager would tremble when he started to fill them in. He did not know whether he had filled them in properly. If he made a mistake, the guarantee would be null and void. That is all cleared up. As I understand it, we are going to try to work to a situation where we are going to use the banks' forms that everybody is familiar with. We will have an understanding about making the thing simple.

The changes we have suggested here have been accepted enthusiastically by the financial institutions which makes me think that the problem of it not being user friendly has been cleared up. That is going to greatly help this to be better publicized.

These improvements to the program will be part of a package of initiatives which this government has put together for small businesses in recent months. I will not take the time of the House to reiterate this, but many of the measures in the fiscal and economic statement of December 2 were devoted to assisting this vital sector of the economy.

That statement was focused on small business. We know what the measures were. There was an investment tax credit on machinery and equipment. There was an unemployment insurance premium freeze, which was very good news but did not get much recognition. If the company hires new employees there is a freeze on the employer's portion. There is the extension of the small business financing program and, of course, the simplification of the R and D tax rules. That is very important. That was also in the statement.

• (1220)

Dozens of other things have happened in the last two or three years which I will not take the House's time to reiterate. It is part of this package to help small business.

In closing, let me emphasize my opening remarks. For over 30 years this program has been helping small business meet its financing needs. The program has helped numerous businesses get a start and enabled them to develop further.

This bill will make the program an even more valuable tool in promoting the competitiveness of small businesses in Canada. I hope that the House will give speedy passage to Bill C-99 and thereby show its support for small businesses in extending their access to credit.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, to begin, I would like to address the last remark that the minister responsible for small businesses made, that he hoped for speedy passage of this bill.

I want to assure the minister that we on this side of the House have been pleading for the last three years for the government to address the issue of access to credit for small business in this country. We are definitely going to debate this bill today. Anyone in our party who wishes to debate today will have that opportunity. Make no mistake about it. We want this bill passed and put into the marketplace as quickly as those opposite do, if not quicker. We have wanted it addressed for the last three years.

I have to say to the minister that this is a good piece of legislation. Hopefully we can get it to committee this week. I am happy that we on this side of the House have been asked for some input so that we can address the issue of working capital. There are a lot of good features about this bill.

The minister touched on another very important point in his speech. I want to spend some time on that point today. It has to do with the responsibility of the financial institutions in this country.

With all the good intentions of this House of Commons, this is just a bill. The problem we have had with this act in the past has been the fact that the financial institutions of this country by and large have really not been good partners in the act. The minister alluded to that and I am happy that he did. As Her Majesty's loyal constructive opposition, we are going to make this bill a serious issue with the financial institutions in this country, not just the chartered banks but the credit unions as well. It has been expanded to include the credit unions, the trust companies and others that may be eligible to participate.

We have to do this because we have a situation in this country today where people are intimidated by their bankers. Imagine, the customers are intimidated. Normally if you run a business you look out for your customers. You bend over backward to try and give them good service. You go out of your way to try and keep them on side. With the financial institutions in our nation, it is the reverse. I do not want to say that every bank manager and every bank person in this country is the same. I do not want to tar everybody with the same brush.

The facts are that there are a lot of people in the financial sector of this country who approach their job in an intimidating, condescending fashion which puts the fear of God into a lot of their customers. It ends up hurting the spirit and the productive entrepreneurial juices of this whole country.

I do not want to generalize on that statement today. I want to give a few small examples. As the advocate for small business for my party, I feel that it is my responsibility to try today to sensitize some of the banks to the fact that there are things going on in their institutions that I just cannot believe.

I want to start off by giving an example of a widow who was left a business. By the way, I should say that I have received permission from the people who gave me these examples to use them today.

Most people who have problems with their banks are scared silly. Say one asks: "Would you like me to try and address this story? Would you like me to go and see if I can give you a hand?" They will say: "Oh, no, no, I am afraid of the repercussions. I am afraid that they might cancel my credit card. They might not renew the mortgage on my house. I am afraid that somehow they will get me".

There is this feeling out there that the banks of this country are basically like a cartel. Suppose that I say something nasty about the Toronto–Dominion Bank. Even though I may not bank there, the next thing you know I am going to hear from some other bank that is going to put the squeeze on me.

I think Canadians should understand that, thanks to a Liberal amendment in the Bank Act which went through the House about six months ago, if you as a consumer are not being treated fairly by your banker, it is incumbent upon you to report it to the Superintendent of Financial Institutions, and it is incumbent upon the Superintendent of Financial Institutions to check that complaint. That complaint, if it is legitimate, will be posted in the annual report.

In this first example I want to give, Mrs. Hughes actually had to take over her husband's company, Bolton Electric Contracting Inc. of Bolton, Ontario, when Mr. Hughes died. Mrs. Hughes owed the Toronto–Dominion Bank approximately $74,000. This was comprised of a loan of approximately $67,900 as well as an operating line of credit in the amount of approximately $6,000. These were the best figures available to us and this is quoting from the lawyer who addressed the president of the Toronto–Dominion Bank. They have not heard anything from them as yet, but it would appear that the amount of the loans outstanding at the time of Mr. Hughes' death was this total.

The point here is that this man had paid for a life insurance policy of up to $125,000. When this man died, the money was not made available to that limit of $125,000, although all the fees were paid up. She actually owed about $67,000 at the time of his death.

The bottom line is that the bank and the insurance company together left an amount outstanding of $50,000 under the insurance policy. Now, of course, not only has the bank's loan been subsequently repaid, but they have not made up the differential in the life insurance policy. Now the woman is in jeopardy of losing her home.

I think that is the kind of thing that really gives the banking community of this country a bad reputation. They are big and powerful and have this traditional approach, but I think we have got to change that.

I want to give another example. This one has had a little bit of a profile. It was the Penta-Stolp Corporation. This is a corporation with the head office in Markham, Ontario.

Over a period of five years from March 1986 the Penta-Stolp Corporation put approximately $500 million through the Toronto-Dominion Bank. In February 1991, the Penta-Stolp Corporation was having some financial difficulty and it had $28 million on deposit. However, it also owed the Toronto-Dominion Bank $28 million. It naturally had some securities and some assets, but the Toronto-Dominion Bank unilaterally seized all its deposits to offset the loan. The problem was that $13 million of the $28 million was trust fund money. That trust fund money was linked to the company's ability to continue to build homes and complete its contracts and it forced the company into bankruptcy.

When that company went into bankruptcy, there were carpenters, bricklayers, dry wall installers and all the trade that we in Toronto call the panel truck trade in the house-building industry. Millions of dollars went into default with all of these people. Many of them, of course, had to go on unemployment insurance and welfare all because of the Toronto-Dominion Bank manager unilaterally taking trust funds.

In this particular case, the president of the company, Mr. Chris Mullins, a successful entrepreneur, was shamed publicly. They wrote articles about him in the newspaper. The embarrassment he and his family went through was quite humiliating. He took it to court. Do you know what happened two years later, Mr. Speaker? The judgment came on July 16. It found that the Toronto-Dominion Bank had breached its contracts with Penta-Stolp and on and on it goes. They are entitled to damages arising from that breach.

There was a situation where the Toronto-Dominion Bank seized a trust fund to which it had no access and put the company under. Then it lost the case. I understand it may try to appeal instead of just realizing that there are some situations that are black and white. The bank could admit it made a mistake and try and fix it and move on. There is one thing about banks and that is that they have staying power. However, most entrepreneurs certainly do not have the resources to take on a major institution.

I want to give another example and this one has to do with the Bank of Montreal. God forbid that when this speech is over I ever need to go and get bank credit from any of these guys because it will be game over for me.

I want to give another bad example. I want to talk about a corporation that is in the political jurisdiction of the minister responsible for small businesses. This is a favourite story of mine and I am going to stay on this story until the government gets its act together on it.

It is Amertek. There were 400 military fire trucks exported and shipped around the world for guarding the White House, Camp David, the Persian Gulf and Egypt. Because of the extras that were owing to this particular company, because of add-ons from the U.S. military, this company was owed about $17 million. It is still owed $17 million. The Department of Supply and Services and the Canadian Commercial Corporation have not done their work on this particular case. I have told everyone on this side of the House. I have told the minister of DSS and the bureaucrats are giving it the MAD treatment: maximum administrative delay. I want to refer to the bank.

The Bank of Montreal saw that it was having this difficulty and switched it into this special unit at the Bank of Montreal called the SAMU group. You have heard of a sumo wrestler. The Bank of Montreal has its SAMU group: special account management unit. These are the real hot-shot work-out bankers who take companies in and try to keep them alive. They try to help them through difficult periods.

I have heard from more than one company—I had permission to cite Amertek—where the pain and the approach and style of the SAMU group at the Bank of Montreal really needs to be reviewed by the bank hierarchy. Fortunately, two years ago the company owed the bank about $4.5 million, and they are now down to about $400,000. However, when I had to argue with the bank about five months ago when the company only owed the bank $1.1 million the bank was threatening to put it under. Here was a company that was employing 180 people with export potential. That leads me to a point that I want to make about Mr. Barrett's remarks at his annual meeting just two weeks ago.

I refer specifically to an editorial in The Toronto Star dated January 20. Mr. Barrett is the chairman of the board of the Bank of Montreal. He offered a strategy for reaching the growth target rates of 4 per cent a year for the rest of the decade. He also talked about the fact that we could not have higher taxes.

I would support that. I think my views of a single tax system are broadly known although I do not know what he thinks of it. I have tried to get to see him twice but he is not very accessible.

I say this respectfully. If Mr. Barrett were sitting in this House as a member of Parliament, in the spirit of constructive debate, I would have to challenge him on his statement in the editorial. The editorial reads: "Barrett proposes a five-year freeze in total government program spending after inflation". He linked it of course to a freeze in social spending.

I want to make the point today that the banking institutions of this country can influence social spending better than anyone. When banks freeze lines of credit, reduce lines of credit and cut lines of credit, then in effect they are saying: "We are not taking on any more responsibility here. We are going to shift that responsibility over to the Government of Canada and we will put it on a social spending account".

If Mr. Barrett is sincere, and I believe him to be sincere in his concern about freezing social spending, then he has to realize that he and his fellow bank presidents are directly involved in the reason why we have so much social spending in this country and the reason why we have so much unemployment and so much welfare. One cannot separate the responsibility of the banks from our social spending account as people responsible in governance.

This is where I think Mr. Barrett, with all due respect, has to now start to be creative. I challenge him. This Bank of Montreal has an imaginary flair about it. However, I think when the president of a bank comes out in his annual report and says: "Governments must freeze social spending", I believe he should have said: "I as one banker am going to do my part to relieve some of that social spending".

I want to say to Mr. Barrett and his fellow 58 bank presidents across Canada that I have an idea I would like them to consider. I am not going to just stand here and criticize you, Mr. Barrett, I am going to try to give you an idea.

I would like to call this the 90-day small business campaign. I would like to see something from the leaders of this country, the bank presidents, who are as interested—they say—in cutting social spending as we are. Contrary to the spin doctors and journalists who say that the Liberals are not focused on fiscal responsibility, we are. However, in governance, we also have a responsibility to those who are disadvantaged. To not show any heart or concern for the disadvantaged while we are in government means that we should get out of government if we do not have that capacity.

Let us have the 90-day small business campaign, Mr. Barrett.

• (1240)

You could call the 58 bank presidents together and this is the way it would work. We have 900,000 operating businesses in this country. Over the next 90 days, any business person who takes someone off welfare or UI, someone with a UI certificate or a welfare certificate, should be giving the wage portion of the person's loan at prime. It should put about 500,000 people back to work in the next 90 days.

No money will be lost on it but no money will be made on it either. That is a disbursement in loans from all the banks of Canada of approximately $10 to $12 billion.

The minister said earlier in his speech that the track record of small business creating jobs is the best in the country. He said it was the tops, I believe. I support the minister on that. If we put small businesses to work, if banks gave them some incentive to employ these people right away, those with a UI or a welfare certificate, then all of a sudden social spending would come down.

We would move from the liability side of the ledger to the asset side. We would have 500,000 people paying taxes. We would have 500,000 being productive. We would have 500,000 more people with the dignity of a job.

The favourite thrust these days of Mr. Crane of The Toronto Star, especially when he is talking about Liberals, is in a quote from an editorial. I have to be very careful with these journalists at The Toronto Star. I will quote exactly. He was referring to my leader the other day.

It was an article on Saturday: "Canada's powerful creditors curious about Liberal policies". He was doing a big thing on my leader. He said: "He promised a tax based incentive program to encourage on the job training, but again without numbers". He refers to without numbers later on. He refers to "get the numbers right" three times in this article.

If we go by the industry banking standards, which is that 1 per cent of small business loans go into default, on a $12 billion disbursement it would be $120 million. That is a lot of money. I realize that. I quote from Erik Heinrich's article in The Financial Post. The bank profits that we had last year, and this was bank profits during a year of all the developers such as Campeau, Reichmann, et cetera, Scotiabank last year made $633 million. The Toronto–Dominion Bank made $408 million; the Bank of Montreal, $604 million; the National Bank had a record profit as well.

The point is that $120 million of those profits are spread over the 58 chartered banks. It is worth the risk to put 500,000 people back to work. This is where I believe the banks have a responsibility to help us bring these social spending numbers down. Let us get people back into the work force.

There was a Women in Business conference in my riding two weeks ago. Helen Sinclair, president of the Canadian Bankers' Association, very graciously came and spoke to the 300 or 400 women who attended this conference. She told the women in the room that women in business have a better track record than men in terms of credit rating, credit worthiness. This is an area where the banks could in their marketing, their posters and advertising give some added input to.

When Helen Sinclair spoke at the Women in Business conference, she told the women in that room that when they go to a bank to try and secure a loan and they do not feel comfortable with the bank manager, if the chemistry is not there, walk across the street and try another one.

Very few Canadians realize this but there are close to 7,000 bank branches to choose from. We have a great banking structure, a great banking system, and I respect it but it does not mean it is above reproach.

That takes me to my second point. I want to pass it on to all the bank presidents, all the bank managers across this country. It has to do with an approach that they use with their customers. I would say after this issue of understanding their social responsibility to help get this economy going again, they have to review their value system.

In my opinion, every bank manager should ask: "Am I caring in the way I approach my customers? Am I approachable? Am I compassionate in the way I approach my customers who are in difficulty? Am I action oriented when someone needs help quickly to get that business going? Am I trusted?"

I told a good friend of mine this morning I was going to speak on this bill and I asked him if he had a wish concerning his bank manager what would that wish be. He said he has been in business for over 30 years and he would just love his bank manager to phone him one day and say: "Dick what can I do to help you make your business grow? What can I do?"

Right now most businesses are paranoid. They hear that their bank manager is on the phone, they hear their bank manager is coming to see them and shivers run up and down their spines. They do not want to answer the call and if they are asked to come into the office that puts stress on people beyond imagination.

Mr. Barrett and his friends now seem to be entering much more into the public policy debate. We welcome that entrance into the public policy debate by the financial institutions of this country. I say to Mr. Barrett and the others—and I am not singling him out but he does seem to be more pro-active in public policy than most bank presidents—there is a social responsibility here. They have a responsibility to deal with their troops and make sure they are living up to the specific goals, style and aspirations that Mr. Barrett obviously has for himself.

I only have a few minutes left but I want to talk a little bit about this bill. Bill C-99 is good legislation. It is not perfect legislation but nothing is perfect in this place. Nothing. I will just go over again what we have to do. I want to repeat some of the things that the minister said.

If the sales of a business are $5 million and under, there is a $250,000 line of credit to help the business grow. The bank manager is covered by the Government of Canada for 85 per cent of the value of the loan. The minister has given an undertaking in the House today that he would welcome input in the committee on how we can have a formula or some kind of an approach to working capital. That is terrific.

The first problem we have is that bank managers complain about paper burden. It is too much of a drag to fill out the forms. The minister said the new paperwork is going to be easier. Respectfully, we will hold him accountable to that.

Second is the idea of communication. I see one of the government's prime communicators, one of the expert marketers is sitting in his seat. I plead with the Minister of State for Finance, and I say this constructively, we have to take some taxpayers' money and lever it with the banks' money into their advertising budgets. The minister has to explain, not just to the banks because they are supposed to know internally, but also to the customers, to the 900,000 small businesses that are out there and that are eligible for this loan.

If we did that, it would go a long way to putting some hope and some confidence back into this economy which is in desperate need of it today. I have covered most of what I wanted to say today. I want to reassure the government that my colleagues and I are committed to the small business sector in this country. We are also committed to making sure that the banks, the credit unions, the trust companies, those which are in good sound financial shape, will actively participate in this legislation because, as we all know, this is where the greatest hope of new job creation lies in this country.

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to enter into this debate on Bill C-99, the legislation to amend the Small Businesses Loans Act and to tell you, the minister and the government that my colleagues in the New Democratic Party are going to ensure quick passage of this legislation in this Chamber.

It is important to get this legislation into committee where it can be studied in greater detail. More important, and it is certainly something that I will be doing in my riding, is to inform the business community about the progress of this legislation and the opportunity it presents for the business community to provide some input to the government about their experiences with the banking system and in particular what advice and comments they might offer on the activity and operations of the Small Businesses Loans Program.

I am pleased to speak today, primarily on behalf of my colleague from Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt, who is on his way back to Ottawa from his riding. He has spent considerable time researching the legislation and letting the government know of our interest in ensuring early passage of the bill.

I suspect that my riding is no different from many others in that one of the vital parts of the economy these days is the creation of employment. It has been proven statistically that the ideas and entrepreneurships in the small business community have created some 80 per cent of the jobs in Canada. This program, the Small Businesses Loans Program, has been a valuable tool for those businesses.

Some notes from the government have said that the interest and the awareness of the program for whatever reason has slipped a bit. I think some of the changes that we can make today on the legislation will be more encouraging. I was encouraged to hear the minister talk about some work that could be done to let more of the business community know about this particular program. He is probably right. It is probably at the bottom of some bank manager's drawer and does not get the awareness at the top of the pile.

I might make one suggestion to the minister to encourage him as some of the ministers do with bills and legislation where there is clearly a lot of support. It is a public service on our part to let our constituents know about this. His staff could prepare some material that we might use in our columns or in our householders to promote this particular program because it will of course be of benefit to the businesses in our community.

Some changes that the legislation brings in to assist businesses include increasing the size of business from $2 million to $5 million in annual revenue. A million dollars sounds like a lot of money but I think in terms of the economic activity of a lot of businesses over the course of the year—if the gross revenue of even the smallest business was tallied—it could reach a million dollars quite easily. Obviously the raising of this sum will assist and broaden the number of businesses that are eligible. Also, the increase in the loan size from $100,000 to $250,000 is obviously a plus and will assist as well.

One comment has been made consistently on the legislation and I think it is appropriate. The committee could hear some valuable evidence from the banks and others who have had experience with this. This program, with the loan assurances of the government, will not work unless of course the banking community makes an effort to let their business customers and clients know about the program. The credit union movement is now involved.

I think it is fair to say that a lot of businesses in the past have felt that it would be easier to get some money from a bank if one were a bankrupt Third World dictator than an entrepreneur trying to get a little business going in this country. Over the past number of years, we have seen that a lot of loans to countries that have not been able to repay have had to be written off. Perhaps there will be progress in that particular field.

We have all had businesses contact our offices when they needed assistance when for whatever reason the banks will not lend them funds. Then they get bumped to the next lender, the FBDB, and if the FBDB will not help them, they get bumped again.

There is an innovative program that offers a real opportunity and a real chance to act as a vehicle to inform entrepreneurs and businesses about this program. It is the Community Futures Program. I have been successful in getting the Community Futures Program to cover virtually all of my riding, including most recently the western end, the Houston, Burns Lake, Vanderhoof and Fort St. James area for example. We have just had that designated.

Obviously getting the information out to the organizations, such as the Community Futures Groups, is important. In many cases, MPs' offices act like traffic cops in directing people to the right agency that can assist them the most.

I repeat my suggestion to the minister that promotional material should be available to our offices so that we can use it in our householders and other mailings so that the business community is well aware of the program.

With regard to the banks, perhaps we should again recruit Anne Murray to try to promote this program. At one time the singer was in some of the ads for the Bank of Commerce. It is important that we all make an effort to get information about this particular program out to the business community.

There are a couple of other areas, not related to this particular legislation, that I want to put on the record as being of concern to businesses in my riding. First is the goods and services tax and the ongoing debate over that particular tax. I do not think we could have a debate about assistance to small businesses—particularly the small business community—without talking about some of the damage that has been done to those businesses by the goods and services tax. Second, Canada Post is not the subject of this bill, but many of the businesses in our constituencies rely to a great degree on the service provided by Canada Post.

I am currently conducting a survey of businesses in the downtown Prince George area because there are of course the usual rumours from Canada Post that it will be closing the main post office in Prince George, a community of 70,000 people, that serves the downtown business community.

I think those are clearly issues that when discussing programs related to small businesses have to be put on the agenda as well.

I will get back to the legislation. I have already mentioned the size of businesses. I have talked a bit about the funds that will be provided to businesses that will go from $100,000 to $250,000.

I have a brief comment on the interest rate. The bill only offers a lower interest rate than what would generally be available. It does not increase the availability of financing. The important point has been made by everybody that obviously the commercial lenders are going to have to be primed on this program and the kinds of opportunities it can provide.

I would, with these very short comments on the legislation, encourage the government to ensure that we have the material when of course the legislation is finally passed. I would say that we could use the referral of this bill to committee as a real opportunity to hear from all sectors, including the banks. Let them come and defend themselves and obviously promote some of the work that they have done. I think that will be an important opportunity for legislators and the business community to hear, on the record, the efforts the banks are making. Perhaps there will be some advice about using this legislation to help businesses in our ridings.

In conclusion, from the New Democratic Party and in particular from our member for Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt who has done the bulk of the work on this issue, we are encouraging all members to support and get the early passage of this bill.

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to have the opportunity to speak today to Bill C-99. The bill proposes to not only change the name, but refers to the Small Businesses Loans Act. Anything that affects the viability of small businesses in our country must be of concern to every member of Parliament in this House.

I will repeat what others have said. It is small businesses that are the backbone of employment in our country and the backbone of our economy. Certainly we hear the dramatic news day after day in this House throughout the recession and the problems that the recession has caused for big business in our country, but we do not hear of the day-to-day terrible examples of how the recession and the economic difficulties have plagued the numerous small businesses in our country.

Certainly my riding of Northumberland is no exception when it comes to small businesses having experienced many difficulties. We have seen many businesses that were forced to close and go bankrupt. Many individuals had to go bankrupt through this very difficult time. Anything that can help small businesses across this country is of great importance to me.

Through the economically difficult times, I have listened to many people who run small and medium-sized businesses in my riding. They complain to the government about the many increased taxes and the great difficulty they have with regulations which involve filling out forms and so on. These have added enormously to the work-load and is something that small businesses in particular have a great deal of difficulty coping with.

Besides listening to all of those complaints, the second largest villain has been the banks and the relationship of small and medium-sized businesses to banks. Many small businesses have found for example that their lines of credit with their banks have suddenly been cut in half or curtailed completely with no warning. This has caused many businesses to fail and has caused severe employment problems in my riding.

I am hopeful that through this amendment to the Small Businesses Loans Act we can work out a new relationship between small businesses and banks that will be to the advantage of both the banks and small businesses.

I would acknowledge that although most businesses and many unemployed individuals have gone through great hardship during the economic recession, it has had the effect of causing a lot of small and medium-sized businesses to become much more efficient. They have had to look at the totality of their operation and try to determine how they could be running a smarter small business. I think that many of them have made very good and important adjustments and today are running more efficiently and more economically.

I also know that gradually the banks are beginning to ease up on their loan policies.

Some of the changes in this bill are welcome. Here is an example: Previously, a business was eligible if it only earned $2 million in revenue. Now, a small business is defined as one that can earn up to $5 million in revenue. I welcome that. I welcome other changes such as the one that says when a small business applies for a loan it can make a purchase that can be approved if the purchase is made no more than 90 days before the loan is approved. Through this revision of the bill, we state very clearly that the maximum amount of an eligible loan rises from $100,000 to $250,000. There are other advantages.

However, I have also spoken to people who have had some experience both from the bank's perspective and small business perspectives. They would like to see some things that I have not seen as part of this bill and that do not appear to be there right now.

Small businesses would like to have the House, before it passes this legislation, look at the possibility of the repayment of loans under this scheme such that the payments would be blended payments. In other words, right from the beginning, the small business would be able to pay more in principal and not just be pouring out payments on interest for the first few years of repayment. If there was a stronger blending of principal and interest, this would make the whole loan more attractive to small business. When small businesses have gone to the banks previously for loans under this act they have found that it was really no more advantageous to them to get a loan through the Small Businesses Loans Act than it would be to get a loan directly from a bank or other private institution.

Among other things, if a small business is taking a loan from the government or a private institution, the amount of security that it has to put up is the same.

Through the Small Businesses Loans Act, the government is making a pool of capital funds available to small businesses that is not there presumably just through private institutions which are the ones that administer this program. To make it even more attractive and better, there is the possibility of making payments more blended.

From the point of view of banks, they would like the rules for the administration of the Small Businesses Loans Act be clarified. Banks have said that in the past they have been burned by having agreed to certain loans to small businesses. When those small businesses got into difficulty the banks found the government's repayment to the small businesses was exempted because the banks had not fulfilled some small picayune rule they did not know anything about. The banks are very concerned about having that clarified and simplified.

In the past the banks have found the receipting requirements far too complicated. When a small business applies to a bank for a loan under the Small Businesses Loans Act and is eligible for the government loan, the bank usually finds it may as well provide it with one of its own loans because the administration is much less complicated than the government requirements of the Small Businesses Loans Act.

Although I welcome this bill in general, I believe it should go to committee so some of these issues can be discussed. I hope a full slate of witnesses will come forward to clarify their own perspectives. They may be representatives of the small business sector or private institutions acting on behalf of the government in administering this Small Businesses Loans Act.

Thank you for this opportunity. I hope we will see a speedy approval of this act through the House, hopefully with some amendments. I believe in the end there is the potential in this act to bring support to the small business community, not just across Canada but in my riding of Northumberland with which I am most concerned.

[Translation]

Mr. Joseph Volpe (Eglinton—Lawrence): Mr. Speaker, I would also like to add my thoughts on the bill before us today.

My colleagues from Broadview—Greenwood in Toronto and from Northumberland have already expressed some quite specific opinions on the problem of taxation and the government's economic and financial policies.

I would not only like to emphasize what my colleagues have said but also to spend some time on the importance of a national strategy for dealing with economic problems.

With your permission, Mr. Speaker, and the permission of my colleagues, I would first of all like to say that all the suggestions that my friend from Broadview—Greenwood made in this House concerning small business have so much merit that they deserve great interest and careful consideration. Why, Mr. Speaker?

It is very important for us to note that the jobs and new job opportunities in this country come only from small and medium-sized businesses. My friend and colleague from Broadview—Greenwood has already noted in this House that in the past 10 years, 76 per cent of all jobs created, or 2.13 million jobs, were in small and medium-sized companies.

We are not only talking here about a suggestion concerning taxation and the bill that should help entrepreneurs who take risks for this country, but this whole concept should be seen in the context of a national economic strategy.

[English]

This legislation has some very laudable points. My colleagues have already reflected that this is not simply a time for adversarial repartee. We must take note of some of the items that are important for the growth of this nation. We on this side of the House have been advocating initiatives for small business that should encourage its growth, maintenance, viability and the jobs it creates. The legislation before us goes some way in that regard. We are obviously disappointed it does not go all the way, however we want to give credit where some of that credit is due.

We now define a small business as one with sales of $5 million as opposed to $2 million. That is a reflection not only of inflation over the last several years leading up to this legislation but also the nature of the business community itself.

Ontario has suffered an enormous loss of businesses over the last four years. Perhaps we ought to take a more aggressive and positive view toward creating tax and legislative incentives for investors in financial sectors to direct more money away from paper and real estate speculation toward business enterprise opportunities that actually create jobs.

I do not want to dump on the government for its economic policies because I think everybody is already convinced we have been led down the garden path. I see the member opposite is shaking his head. Over the course of the last four years we have seen plant closure after plant closure and the loss of some 350,000 to 400,000 jobs. I think that is the spread in perspective. I do not want to say 450,000 jobs for political purposes, but let us take a look at the spectrum and number of jobs lost in this country.

In Ontario in 1991 and 1992, 30,564 jobs were lost as a result of approximately 230 plant closings. What does that do for us? If the average wage per job lost was somewhere in the vicinity of $32,000, we are looking at around $1 billion in lost wages. More specifically, for those who are concerned about government deficits, it is well in excess of $350 million lost to federal and provincial treasuries. Keep in mind as well those job losses are accompanied by drains on the unemployment insurance fund and welfare assistance programs. We are looking at an additional $1 billion just for those workers who have lost their jobs. In essence we are looking at over $1.5 billion in costs to the treasury of this country because of those job losses.

Why do we have so many plant closures? Why do so many businesses go under? The main problem—I think my colleagues from both sides of the House would acknowledge—is cash flow. While this legislation addresses itself to trying to make more money available to small businesses, perhaps first and foremost we should be doing something to maintain the viability of the businesses that are still in business.

My colleague opposite was asking how many jobs were created. We know how many were lost, but how many were created? I think the more germane question might be what are the net gains or net losses compared to those of previous years? For example, from 1985 we had a net increase of 41,693 businesses. That rate of increase collapsed to about 25,000 in terms of growth by 1989. What are we doing in terms of economic policy, general strategy and financial policy to cause such a drop in the rate of growth?

There is legislation like this that helps address the needs of businesses to have access to capital. We have acknowledged already that the minister is on the right track. We accept that some of the changes he is introducing with this legislation are good and we will support them.

The minister has said he would look at encouraging private lenders to allocate some of the funds available for working capital. That is an absolute necessity under today's cash shortage and cash flow problems. Our businesses need to have access to funds that will allow them to stay in business. We, as Canadians and parliamentarians have a stake on behalf of our constituents to see that the jobs represented by the livelihood of those businesses are maintained.

We are going to pay for those jobs either by encouraging private lenders to adjust their lending practices now so businesses maintain their viability, or later through our unemployment insurance and welfare programs or cuts to both.

My colleagues have already suggested that some of the villains in this scenario are the banks. I do not think the appropriate term is villain. I think the banks are looking after their own affairs in lending practices without due regard to the consequences of some of their actions.

This last year we have seen the collapse of several financial empires. Without naming them, certain banks had lent hundreds of millions of dollars and on a couple of occasions over $1 billion without collateral. Over the course of this last year the banks have been writing off these debts.

In the Reichmann holdings in particular, writing off those debts simply meant transferring a lot of the cost to the average taxpayer. The small borrower who goes to a bank today is going through the kinds of hoops that banks would not have put people with a great credit risk—until a few years ago—through at all.

We have to go beyond encouraging banks to adopt a more favourable lending practice for small businesses.

We have to be able to tell them that number one is to make a certain portion of all the moneys they put out available to small businesses. They have to make the costs acceptable. Surely a point over prime, a point and a half is not insufficient return on the investment that those lenders will have. There is no reason why more money cannot go out to those who are most productive.

I will repeat the figures that I gave earlier about the number of jobs that were created by small businesses over the past 10 years. Between 1980 and 1990, 76 per cent of all jobs were created by small businesses. When one thinks of what those jobs represent in terms of wages earned and income to the federal and provincial treasuries and equally important, the amount of money that does not have to be paid out through social assistance programs to maintain the people who would otherwise not have been working, it is an investment.

It is well worth the consideration both of this House and other legislatures throughout the country. It certainly speaks very forcibly to the co-operation between both government and industry, in this case the financial industry, to hammer out a plan of putting money at the availability of those who would use it most productively.

It is not a question of throwing money away and saying that this is a situation where we are throwing good money after bad.

Mr. Mills: It is not grants.

Mr. Volpe: That is right. It is not grants; it is a direction. It is an indication, an exhortation to try to lend money where money will work. We seem to be skirting around the issue.

More often than not we take great pains to ensure that the banks and other private lenders have an opportunity to invest in businesses that appear to be working very well when times are good. They are mega-industries. They are megasize on megaprojects.

For small and medium-sized businesses that are the mainstay of our economy and our job creation, we do virtually nothing. Too many small businesses are unaware of how to access the moneys that legislation such as this will encourage lenders to provide.

This is the time for the minister and his department to put out an action plan that will make small businesses move to where they can have access to all the programs resident, not only under his department but under other departments as well to ensure that the banks themselves solicit that kind of business.

If their business is to lend money, then let them lend the money where it is most needed, number one, from a national policy point of view and number two, from a marketplace point of view, where they will get the greatest return with the least amount of risk.

It is time that we, through our legislative processes, do things that other provinces have already looked at very seriously. For example, Quebec through its stock savings plan is trying to make a much more effective investment in small businesses. It provides tax shelter schemes to encourage stock purchases in small Quebec companies. These are companies that will provide jobs in that province for the citizens of that province and in effect, for Canadians who want to call Quebec their home.

Why can we not do that on a national scale? We have the resources, financial and legislative, to take an inventory of what is available to ourselves as a Parliament, to our lenders as people in the business and to our entrepreneurs to ensure that there is a marriage of need and resources and later working toward an end product which is the satisfaction of the needs of our consumer constituent citizens.

• (1330)

We have said before that we would like to perhaps create an environment. I should not say perhaps, that is too soft a word. We must create an environment where small and medium-sized businesses not only have access to capital, but can maintain a cash flow, especially in a time of need such as we are experiencing today, so that they do not experience the kind of problems that my colleague from Broadview—Greenwood illustrated in some examples earlier.

We might consider decreasing the capital gains tax to improve prospects for new Canadian enterprises and to raise equity in public markets. We might even consider the indexation of capital gains exemption for investments extending beyond five years to encourage long-term investments.

What we would have to do as well is increase the capital cost allowance for investment and tax credits for capital investments. Through all cases let us keep in mind that what is most important is cash flow for small and medium-sized businesses. Today we are looking at how we can encourage lenders, either positively or with a carrot and stick approach through legislation, to make funds available for business needs today.

The other villain is ourselves. Some of our tax policies, the bureaucracy and red tape that we impose on small businesses have to be cleared up. There is no need to impose greater input costs on small businesses. There is no need to impose greater costs from an accounting, record keeping and tax point of view at a time when what small and medium-sized businesses need is to get people off their backs, governments off their backs and have the freedom to do what they do best.

That is to take risks that produce results, create jobs and provide for much more competitiveness and productivity, producing goods that can be competitive not only here at home but for the export market as well.

Mr. Speaker, I know that my time is up. The point is if we have people who, despite the psychology that permeates a depressed environment in the economy today, are willing to take risks, let us not put obstacles in their path. Let us use whatever power we have at our disposal to give them access to money. Let us create a responsible environment so that money is put to good use.

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, I first want to compliment the Minister for Small Businesses and Tourism for introducing this legislation today. It is vital to the small business community, small business persons and sole proprietorships throughout this country.

Also, I compliment his department for providing us throughout the introduction of this legislation, Bill C-99 that is before the House today, with very important succinct research data. That has assisted us greatly in arriving at certain decisions that we on this side of the House will be making in the next short while with respect to the legislation.

I say at the outset, as my colleagues have said prior to my speaking today, it is without question that we will be supporting this legislation. We look forward to bringing this legislation to the committee and proposing certain changes to make it more operative and more simple for the small business community to understand what will be before them in the process of extending the availability of capital. In essence the bill is extending the availability of capital to the small entrepreneur in Canada from the present limit of $100,000 to $250,000.

As I said, we will support and propose changes at the committee stage and we will do everything within our power to hasten its passage. It is legislation that is absolutely needed by the small business community of Canada today.

Hopefully at the outset what we will do in committee, and it will be a recommendation, is make the legislation before us today and previous legislation as it affects small business communities in this country and the small business person and the sole proprietorship—I think it is very important to include the sole proprietorship—in the most simple terms so that it is understandable to all of us. I have over 20 years experience as a small business person in Thunder Bay.

We have here proposed changes to the original legislation, which is the Small Businesses Loans Act. The Small Businesses Loans Act is a short statute in so far as the Statutes of Canada are concerned. It is eight pages. The amendments that are being proposed will not lengthen the eight pages of the act. One of the vital issues, as with most legislation in Canada, is that the regulations become very cumbersome.

I do not know whether I have all of the regulations as they pertain to the Small Businesses Loans Act in Canada, but I had the Library draw the regulations. Although the act is only eight pages long, we have 40 some pages of regulations to govern the eight page statute. I am hoping that we will, for the first time I think in a federal statute which will go out to perhaps 900,000 to one million small business entrepreneurs in Canada, be able to combine the Small Businesses Loans Act and other pertinent pieces of legislation that affect the small business community within our country, consolidate all of those acts and the regulations thereto and put them in one volume.

When a small business entrepreneur is looking for references and needs the guidance that the statute law provides, and those areas that are available to him for either capital improvements or loan improvements, renovation improvements as the act is proposing, he or she should be able to go to a consolidated piece of legislation, much the same as we have in the province of Ontario. The regulations follow the act and it is a very simple document to refer to at all times. The simplicity of it is greatly appreciated by those who use the facilities of the act. That is one of the proposals we will be making.

We make that proposal for another reason. There will have to be some consultation and information sent to every small business entrepreneur in Canada. This would be the most vital piece of information that this House could supply to the small business concerns throughout this country in a very timely and efficient fashion. That will be another one of our recommendations.

As I said at the outset, we support this legislation. I think it is important that we tell to the people of Canada why we choose to support this legislation so vigorously.

It goes without saying that with all the discussion that we had in the past, especially after the referendum, that we have all turned our minds back to what we call the regeneration of this economy. Along with this, the most important and vital area is the creation of jobs. This can only be solved today by making an atmosphere in the small business community that is responsive and is conducive for them to go out and hire the people who are looking for jobs in this country. The last figure I heard for unemployment was 11.5 per cent. The small business community can hire the unemployed in this country and even go so far as taking people who are presently on welfare and cannot find a job and have exhausted the benefits available to them.

Job creation, without question, is the top priority of every member of this House. There was a time in our economy when we used to look to the giant corporations in our country to assist in this very vital area of job creation. At one time we used to look to General Motors, Stelco and Dofasco. We used to look to Canadian Pacific Forest Products. We used to look to our Crown corporations like CN Rail. We used to look to other forest product companies to create the jobs in this country. We used to look to the forestry industry because it was the largest single employer in this country. It employs over 800,000 people. In the forestry industry, there are more small and medium-sized companies than there are large companies.

This economy of ours and the governments that are large employers have come to rely on these large corporations for the creation of jobs. However, they can no longer be relied on to create the necessary jobs in our country.

If we agree with that premise, then the only alternative available to us for regenerating the economy of this country and creating the necessary jobs is through the small business enterprise in our country and the sole proprietorship.

This is simply the issue. Should all the members of this House, regardless of political stripe, concentrate their entire efforts to create an atmosphere that is conducive and supportive to the small business entrepreneur or the sole proprietorship? If that is our goal, then we must do it with the express purpose of job creation in our economy. Therefore when we talk today about the adoption of this legislation and the creation of working capital for our small business people, it is with the express purpose of creating jobs within our country.

I will relate some facts that are as current as I can get to point out what I just said. I think they are fairly up to date. The small entrepreneur in this country and the sole proprietor is going to be responsible for the job creations. Unemployment at the end of 1992 was 11.6 per cent. This means approximately 610,000 workers were looking for a job and still receiving benefits within our country. Today, there are over one million people on welfare whose benefits have run out.

Let me just refer for a short time to the province of Ontario. I know that a lot of members in the House will not agree with concentrating on Ontario, but it has always seemed to be the engine that has run the economy of Canada. There are 235,000 Ontario small businesses employing one to five persons. In Ontario, there are 63,000 businesses employing 5 to 19 persons, 18,000 businesses employing from 20 to 49 persons and 12,000 businesses employing between 54 and 499 persons. There are only 1,500 Ontario businesses employing over 500 persons.

With those facts in mind, it is important for us to realize that we must create the atmosphere that is so important for that very small entrepreneur—employing from one to twenty people—to help him go out into the marketplace and take these people off the unemployment rolls and perhaps help those on welfare.

I should mention that our deliberations at the committee level will just be the start of the process. We fully intend to suggest to the government throughout this process, once the small business legislation is put in place, that it should be doing other things with respect to legislation in our country. It should be looking at the Federal Business Development Bank. It should be looking at incorporating changes in the Bank Act, particularly sections 178 and 427 that follow the security interest of those products that are produced in this country and allows the small business facilities that will be available to our country to follow that security for protection.

Looking at the credit that is being extended by the Government of Canada to every creator of jobs in this country, we are giving assurance to the rest of the Canadian people that their money is not being put into jeopardy and it does not add one single penny to the cost of administering this country today.

If we cannot extend the credit to the people of this country who are going to create the jobs, then we might as well hold our ship because there is not going to be any job creation in this country at all.

There are some fundamental issues that I think have to be addressed. We need to address the availability of access to working capital to continue to expand the small business enterprises in Canada. My colleagues have addressed one of the questions so I will not go into great detail on it, but they are asking about the role of the present lending institutions. These are the chartered banks that we have in place that are supposed to be looking after the needs of small business. What is the role of the present lending institutions with respect to capital availability?

We know full well from what we have seen in the last two or three years that the availability of working capital has been restrained to the small business enterprise because of the practices and procedures of the major lending institutions in this country. For some reason, although we on all sides of the House are prepared to admit that, we have not been able to do anything as a government to make these lending institutions make cash more available to the small business entrepreneur in this country.

What we have to do, and we are doing it today, is to make the necessary changes to the Small Businesses Loans Act. When we make these changes we ask ourselves: "Why do the lending institutions of our country not respond to the needs of the small business community?"

The second problem we are going to face is how we can communicate. I addressed this a short time ago, but it is a major and fundamental question that we will ask in committee: "How do we communicate this benefit to the small business communities throughout this country and to the sole proprietorships so that the effects of this legislation will get to the people who need it?" That is the person who is going to create a job in this country for one of the people presently on the unemployment rolls.

How do we do this and how do we expand the present program? This is not only making capital available as the act expresses, but expanding the scope of this legislation in order to make working capital, which is the grease that makes the small business turn. How do we expand the working capital availability within the small business community in order that they can hire those people? We will be talking in the future about how we want to have site training and on-the-job skills development and retraining so that it gets directly to the person affected who comes off the UI or the welfare roll.

As I said earlier, how do we simplify the legislation to make it workable for the small business communities in our country? Those are the major issues we will be addressing at the committee level.

Before my time is up, let me address some of the changes that are proposed to Bill C-99 the legislation that is before us. First, as I read the changes, there are two thresholds that a person in the small business community has to pass in order to qualify under this act. The first threshold is: Does he qualify as a small-business entrepreneur?

The exclusions are professionals and farming. Farming is understandable. I will come back to professionals in a minute. My colleague here is quite familiar with the Farm Improvement Loans Act that meets the needs of the farming community. Financial insurance is an exclusion under the act. Real estate entrepreneurs are exclusions under the act as are religious and charitable services.

Let me first deal with three areas that I think should be reviewed at the committee stage. The first area is the professional atmosphere. If we really, truly believe that we are trying to create jobs in this country through this legislation, then I think it behoves us to include those people in professions, particularly doctors, lawyers and dentists. I do not think they should be excluded, because they are employers and can employ more people than they are presently employing. Dentists, doctors in private practice and lawyers run small business concerns that can employ more people.

The law firm that I was a partner in employed some 70 people. That is considered to be a very high employer. Why would they not be included? The law firms I worked with had the same problems as any business concern. They had problems with working capital. Why do we exclude the financial insurance industry and real estate business enterprises? I know for a fact that real estate businesses employ a great many people. They have a broad range of skills that can develop a very highly qualified, productive person in our economy. They have talents, perhaps, in the sales field that are so fundamentally required in this country.

I know my time is short and it is getting close to the hour. However, I just want to emphasize that we will be making these recommendations to help the small business community in our country. We will not prevent the passage of this legislation. We on this side of the House have always supported good legislation that this government has brought forward. Again I compliment the minister for bringing this forward at a time when it is so necessary for the small business enterprise system in our country.

[Translation]

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be able to speak on this bill.

[English]

I want to thank my colleague for his insightful remarks. He obviously knows a great deal about the small and medium-sized business sector. We support this particular legislation because we see it as a step forward. We also believe that the government might have gone further and that there are a number of other areas it might have addressed.

I want to emphasize that most of the new jobs have been created recently as a result of the contributions of small and medium-size enterprises. It is often forgotten by Canadians just what they contribute to the quality of life of our nation. They have created more jobs than any other sector. In fact there are figures of 86 per cent of job creation. It obviously depends upon the definitions. They are an important contributor to jobs for Canadians.

There is another sector that is often overlooked. They are an important contributor as well to research and development. If one looks at the type of research and development that has been undertaken by small and medium sized businesses, if one studies carefully the various projects they have under way and looks at the amount of investment they put into research and development and the returns on that investment, they compare extremely favourably and some people would argue much better than larger enterprises.

In fact the figures I have suggest that on a percentage basis their investments are much more important in this sector.

[Translation]

As I just said, I understand how much small and medium-sized businesses have contributed to the quality of life here in Canada, not only because they have created many jobs, which are very important, especially in a recession, but also because of what they do for research and development.

[English]

I would have hoped the government would have taken this opportunity not to look only at this particular point, that is the facilitation of greater credit for those enterprises that qualify for it. It might also have looked at removing the paperwork for certain programs such as the goods and services tax.

If one talks to business people one realizes very quickly an overhead that annoys them tremendously is the demand put on them by the government, not only this government but the provincial and territorial governments in some cases, with respect to paper work.

With regard to the goods and services tax it is particularly onerous. When I conducted a survey recently of small and medium-sized businesses in my constituency—there are close to 1,500—one of the the two single most important items was the amount of paper work being generated by government. It is impossible. It is crushing their efforts and really limiting what they can do. It is a very costly operation. They have asked that this be looked at. The other area the government might examine rather carefully is the whole idea of having a one-stop shop so that people can determine what is truly available.

In an uncritical way I simply want to point out that the literature from various governments is a lot more impressive than the actual programs that exist. What really exists in actual assistance for small and medium sized businesses?

I want to share three particular incidents in my riding. An aboriginal inventor has come up with all kinds of new inventions that are extremely promising, but when he went to government as an aboriginal he received some assistance but insufficient assistance to ensure that his inventions are realized. It is really quite inadequate. He can only swim half way and then there is no further assistance.

In another particular instance two young men wanted to start a particular and unique tree farm where at Christmastime they would sell live trees. They would in fact be responding to environmental concerns; these trees could be replanted on the property of those who purchased them. What has happened is that they have gone to the federal government and to the provincial government, and all they have received are glossy brochures.

In another instance a company called Astro Float Materials in Winnipeg produces absolutely world-class float materials. Because of the number of criteria involved with respect to loans they are unable to get the financial assistance they require. It may be that they will in fact go elsewhere, to another country, because of our insensitive policies.

In a fourth instance a young woman came to me with regard to an idea she had for child care programs that might be useful to the citizens not only in my constituency but of others as well. She was not given any concrete assistance. There were plenty of brochures, however. My time has come to an end.

Mr. Speaker: It being two o'clock p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 30(5), the House will now proceed to Statements by Members pursuant to Standing Order 31.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

TAXATION

Mr. René Soetens (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, the Liberal Party has actively campaigned against the new drug patent legislation because, in its opinion, the proposed costs to health care were too high.

Now the Liberal Party has announced it would cancel the GST which exempts the Canadian health care system and all Canadians from paying the GST on prescription drugs. It wants to replace the GST with the new SHL, a sneaky hidden Liberal tax which the consumers would not know they were paying.

This tax would have no exemptions so when seniors, low wage earners and, in fact, all Canadians buy drugs they will have to pay this new hidden tax. Canadians have a right to know why the Liberal Party wants to increase the price of drugs and health care in Canada. Canadians have a right to know how much the SHL tax will cost. All Liberals should be ashamed.

An hon. member: Shame, shame.

An hon. member: You are wrong.

SAFETY

Mr. Raymond Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, the Conservative government would rather save money than lives. The government saves money by having two hour call-outs for the search and rescue helicopters at CFB Comox. The government saves money by closing the most important weather station on the coast of B.C. at Cape St. James.

This government saves money by trying to close B.C. lighthouses; by failing to upgrade lighthouses; by closing lifeboat stations at Bull Harbour; trying to remove the foghorns from Estevan Point; proposing to remove hovercraft from Parksville; proposing to close flight service stations rather than provide overtime; proposing to privatize flight service stations; proposing to remove fire-fighters from Port Hardy airport; failing to provide sufficient fire-fighters at Vancouver airport; closing or proposing to close air navigation in remote communications sites on the coast of B.C.; looking at privatizing Coast Guard helicopters and closing the Coast Guard radio station at Alert Bay.

This government has demoralized a fine Public Service and almost destroyed the safety infrastructure of the coast of B.C. Saving money is important but saving lives is absolutely imperative. It should resign.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE REFORM

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, in October and December 1990, the Canadian Economic Observer published two studies on resignations and dismissals in Canada.

In 1986, the number of permanent or very significant terminations of employment was 3.4 million, divided equally among resignations, lay-offs and other causes.

It is mainly low-paid workers who change jobs. Two thirds of all terminations in 1986 were in jobs paying less than $9.25 an hour.

Worker turnover is much higher in small firms than in large ones.

I will ask employment and immigration a question: Before Bill C-105 was tabled, did the department prepare a study for 1991 and 1992 concerning resignations and other reasons for termination of employment in Quebec?

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, Canadian farmers are facing extreme financial hardship this winter due to the lack of this government's policies to deal with low farm prices on last fall's terrible production and cropping conditions.

Two weeks ago over 13,000 farmers rallied in Saskatoon to protest the lack of government action in this time of crisis. They are especially fed up with the endless battles between the Saskatchewan NDP government and the federal Tory government, blaming each other for the lack of action in this financial crisis.

Last week over 1,000 farmers rallied in Lucknow, Ontario, to protest the lack of action by the government to assist them in the face of the worst cropping conditions in Ontario's history. The interest-free cash advance program for unharvested grain has been a bust. Elevators are bursting at the seams, full of low grade corn. The government refuses to give credit to countries that can buy it.

I call on the government at this crucial time to stop blaming the provincial governments and take action to assist these producers and take it now.

TRADE

Mr. Larry Schneider (Regina—Wascana): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to jump into the trade debate. I quote:

> Mexico-Saskatchewan's best bet for increasing trade and investment with Latin America.

Those words did not come from a Tory politician. No, in fact, they came from the Saskatchewan NDP government in a quote in today's Regina Leader Post. In an article entitled "Mexican opportunity fires up officials", Mr. Frank Hart, Saskatchewan's deputy minister of economic development, speaks of the Mexican entrepreneurial drive, its can-do attitude, its optimism and its commitment to improve difficult conditions. Saskatchewan's deputy minister puts Mexico at the top of the list that Saskatchewan companies should be doing business with.

Mr. Hart talks about the outstanding possibilities for Saskatchewan agriculture, agribusiness, telecommunications, oil and gas, and water treatment technology.

It is this enlightened attitude that seeks to find ways to make our economy and our system work that deserve applause. There is no doubt that NAFTA makes sense. We must continue to expand our horizons or risk being choked in our isolation.

MARKETING BOARDS

Mr. Jim Jordan (Leeds—Grenville): Mr. Speaker, it is about one year since all parties in the House declared their support for Canadian marketing boards.

Since that time the government has softened its position to where its support is highly suspect in all areas of agriculture that operate under marketing boards.

It is time that the government firmed up its position and stated clearly and emphatically that it not only supports but will promote Canada's marketing boards at GATT. It should not entertain any thoughts of substituting tariffs for marketing boards in Canada.

CANADIAN FIGURE SKATING CHAMPIONSHIPS

Mr. Doug Fee (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I want to congratulate all the fine athletes who competed in the Canadian Figure Skating Championships this weekend.

It was an exciting competition. We can have confidence and pride in all those chosen to represent Canada. This is especially so in the men's competition where Elvis Stojko and Kurt Browning both excelled and showed that they are ready to take on the best in the world.

Placing second had to be disappointing to Mr. Stojko but placing second to a three time world champion, Mr. Kurt Browning, is nothing to be ashamed of. There is not much that needs to be said about Kurt Browning. He has won the respect and admiration of all Canadians.

We are pleased that he has overcome his back injury and is ready once again to represent Canada. Nowhere is that pleasure more evident than in my riding where I know I can speak for everyone, especially those in Caroline, when I say: "Good luck in the world's, Kurt. We are with you all the way and we could not be more proud of you".

EMPLOYMENT

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, the rate of unemployment in my area of the country is on the rise.

In December the unemployment rate for Cape Breton Island was 23.4 per cent. The statistics for January indicate that the unemployment rate is now 26.4 per cent. To make matters worse, this government wants to penalize our unemployed by reducing their income even further. The new UI benefit rate will reduce insurable earnings from 60 per cent to 57 per cent in April 1993.

The Prime Minister is of the opinion that the recession is over. It is not over for those who reside in Cape Breton. The situation is getting worse and nothing is being done to change this.

The national unemployment rate in January was 11 per cent. For the province of Nova Scotia it was 13.6 per cent while in Cape Breton the unemployment rate is double this amount with no end in sight.

People from all regions of this country are hurting and the government is throwing salt in their wounds. The Unemployment Insurance Program was designed as a safety net, a means to help those temporarily out of work. The Conservative government is destroying that safety net.

I urge the Government of Canada to show compassion in this their time of greatest need.

EDUCATION

Mr. Scott Thorkelson (Edmonton—Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, Canadians spend millions of dollars on elementary and secondary education. Yet, Canada lags behind other countries in scholastic achievement. We have difficulty measuring our scholastic achievement and in getting a national profile of student performance.

The Council of Ministers of Education has watered down its plan to test selected 13-year and 16-year old students across the country. Canada has no high school leaving exams. Canada has no standardized voluntary testing.

I urge our government to institute a voluntary national test for students leaving high school. This voluntary test would not interfere with provincial jurisdiction over education. It would be entirely voluntary in nature and would give us a national profile of student performance.

National testing is an idea whose time has come.

CROSSBOWS

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, last week at the British Columbia Institute of Technology in Burnaby, B.C., a 22-year old student, Silvia Leung, was killed. Police say the murder weapon was a crossbow.

As both The Vancouver Sun and The Province newspapers have pointed out, anyone—minors, convicted criminals, the mentally unstable—can walk into a store and buy a crossbow without a permit. These people by law would not be allowed to own a gun. Crossbows are silent, tough to trace and for a criminal not allowed by the courts to own a gun, the perfect legal substitute.

In 1991, after the crossbow murder of another woman a few blocks from Parliament Hill, I called on the Minister of Justice to make the crossbow a prohibited weapon restricted to bona fide hunters and target shooters. In the light of tragic events at BCIT, I now call on this new Minister of Justice to act before another person is murdered by a crossbow. The president of the Swiss Crossbow Association of Vancouver agrees that crossbows should be regulated like guns. So do I.

GOVERNMENT PROGRAMS AND SERVICES

Mr. Walter Van De Walle (St. Albert): Mr. Speaker, governments have a choice: cut back on services and programs or spend and raise taxes.

Every government in Canada is faced with this dilemma. If services and programs are cut the people receiving them, aided by the opposition and the media, will be angry with the government. On the other hand, continued spending beyond our means will increase the deficit and raise taxes.

The Conservative government's fiscal policy is restraint and expenditure reduction while the position of the Liberals and the NDP is clearly one of spend, spend, spend.

On behalf of the constituents of the St. Albert federal riding, I strongly urge the government to stay the course, slash expenditures and pay no attention to the opposition MPs' call for spend, spend. Come the election, Canadians will make their choice.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE REFORM

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Mr. Speaker, braving the -25C temperature, tens of thousands of Quebecers marched in the street yesterday to protest against Bill C-105. These people have clearly told the Conservative government that this bill will not solve the problem of cheating. It is a smoke-screen. They were told that those who quit their job for just cause will be protected. But who believes that, knowing that this law will become a tool for manipulation by some dishonest employers?

Even the mayor of Montreal condemned the government, saying that its unemployment insurance policies might cost Montrealers as much as $490 million. That is enough. People cannot stand it any more.

NIAGARA RIVER

Mr. Ken Atkinson (St. Catharines): Mr. Speaker, on January 15 there was a public meeting in Niagara Falls, New York, to hear reports by representatives of the environment departments of the United States, Canada, Ontario and New York State on their efforts to clean up toxic waste in the Niagara River.

We heard about the many difficulties encountered in measuring the various polluting chemicals and it seemed to me that there was a great deal of uncertainty as to whether the goal of 50 per cent reduction set in the Niagara River clean-up agreement would be attained by the target date.

We know that the largest source of these chemicals is the chemical waste sites located on the American side of the river. There are efforts under way to contain these chemicals leaching into the river and promises of a dramatic decline in a few years.

The government has to ensure that these actions are successful. This pollution affects all of us who live close to the Niagara River or live near Lake Ontario and take our drinking water from this source. This is a health issue for all of us.

It is essential that we heed the international joint commission which has called for the entire elimination of these chemicals. It is a goal that we simply must reach.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, Canadians got the usual from the Liberal Party last week when it tried to explain what its position on the GST was or was not.

From what we can figure out the Liberals have now adopted the Reform Party position of expanding the GST to include more items, even the possibility of taxing food.

My constituents do not agree with this. In a recent survey of my riding, when asked if they would support an extension of the GST to food, 95 per cent of the respondents said no and 78 per cent said that we can eliminate the GST and bring in fair taxes.

New Democrats were the only party that presented an alternative to the GST when it was introduced and we are the only party committed to eliminating the tax, presenting alternatives and bringing in a fair tax system.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Nunatsiaq):

[Editor's Note: Member spoke in Inuktitut]

[English]

Mr. Speaker, this government has two faces when it deals with aboriginal peoples, an international face and a domestic face.

On December 2 the Minister of Finance announced that certain aboriginal programs would be cut by 10 per cent or $80 million. On December 10 the current Secretary of State rose in the United Nations General Assembly to introduce a resolution establishing 1993 as the International Year of the World's Indigenous Peoples. The General Assembly was not told of the government's planned cutbacks nor was it told of previous years' cutbacks.

All of the Secretary of State's aboriginal programs, core funding, broadcasting, language and culture programs are under the knife but final decisions have not yet been made. The Secretary of State must defend these programs. The government must cancel the cuts. The government can still give some meaning to 1993.

INFRASTRUCTURE PROGRAMS

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, obviously, members of the NDP are very worried about the upcoming election. Instead of trying to blame everyone else, they should look at their friends and fellow brothers and sisters at Queen's Park. They should ask them why between the NDP government at Queen's Park and the Conservative government at the national level the unemployment figures in Toronto and Ontario have been allowed to continue in misery.

In metropolitan Toronto, which traditionally has been a key economic piston of the Canadian engine, the unemployment rate has been higher than the national average. There are over $9 billion worth of local contracts being held up by the national government and the provincial Government of Ontario. Repeatedly, our leader, our caucus and our party have asked for an infrastructure program to stimulate and create jobs and confidence.

The Americans are doing it. The Japanese are doing it. The Europeans are doing it. Canadians expect that Canada should be doing it.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE REFORM

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. Yesterday, about 50,000 people marched in -25C degree weather to protest the Draconian and rather bizarre changes in the Unemployment Insurance Act proposed by the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

Does the Prime Minister intend to take the matter in hand and look for a more acceptable solution before we have a serious problem in this country, especially in Quebec?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, like many others who exaggerate the impact of Bill C-105, the Leader of the Opposition also tends to exaggerate the number of people who took part in the demonstration, but that does not matter. What does matter is that the changes proposed by the government are supported by Canadians, because Canadians agree we need an economy that creates jobs.

To create jobs, we need an economic climate with low interest rates and a low rate of inflation. To achieve this, we must control the deficit. To control the deficit, especially one that must be paid for by workers and employers, we had to take steps to control the increasing deficit in the unemployment insurance account. To do that, we decided to deny benefits paid for by workers and employers to people who, without just cause, decide to join the ranks of the unemployed.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I will put a question to the minister, since the Prime Minister does not want to take the matter in hand.

Why is the minister going across Canada telling Canadians that people who leave their jobs voluntarily to draw unemployment insurance benefits do not pay a penalty, although there is a penalty of 7 to 12 weeks for people who quit voluntarily? Why is the Minister of Employment and Immigration trying to mislead people? The truth is that the penalties for those who quit voluntarily are already very severe.

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member claims I said the opposite. It is true that currently there is a penalty of 7 to 12 weeks, which costs workers—those who are really working—taxpayers and employers $1 billion annually, because of 225,000 people who quit their jobs each year without just cause. We are saying that we want to save taxpayers money instead of spending it on benefits for a person who, without just cause, decides to become unemployed.

[English]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, we are all in agreement that those who are cheaters should be cut. The problem is that the minister wants to put everyone, including women who quit their jobs because of sexual harassment and people who quit their jobs for other valid reasons, into the same category as cheaters.

• (1420)

Why does the minister not try to find a better reason than the one he is trying to sell to the Canadian people today?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I invite the hon. member to read Bill C-105. If he reads it he will find that a person in Canada subjected to sexual or any other kind of harassment on the job has a valid reason to quit and will receive protection.

[Translation]

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the minister of employment.

In the weekend papers, Quebecers found a full-page ad, taken out by the minister of employment and paid for by taxpayers concerning the proposed changes to the Unemployment Insurance Act.

How can the minister reconcile changes that are supposed to reduce the deficit with spending millions of dollars of taxpayers' money to sell those Draconian changes? If, as he just said in response to a question from my leader, Bill C-105 is supported by Canadians, why is he buying advertising space to sell it to the public?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, if the people opposed to these changes would explain what Bill C-105 really does, if they would stop using the bill to scare people and tell them the truth, we would not have to deal with the kind of allegations that were made by the FTQ of Quebec, for instance, which said that people who quit jobs because of union activities will not be protected, although that protection is right there in the act.

If they want to keep up this misinformation campaign, I am afraid we will have to tell Canadians the truth, because that is what they want.

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, last night on the CBC, the minister said he wanted to get at the people who choose to be unemployed.

To shed some light on this question, is the minister prepared to table in the House information on the number of people who would leave their jobs with the prospect of not receiving any income at all—remember that—for three months? Are there really people who would willingly go without an income for three months? Is he prepared to table the data and tell us as well how many of these people would not qualify under the 40 grounds he listed in his ad on the weekend?

Is he prepared to give the House and Canadians that information?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, out of four million claimants under the Unemployment Insurance Program last year the vast majority obtained their benefits within a reasonable timeframe, about 30 days.

When there is a dispute about the reason for termination of employment, certain procedures are to be followed. The alternative is that if we are going to pay benefits to people just because they apply for them, the system will no longer be manageable.

I have already made it clear to the House that I was prepared to see how we could address these problems as expeditiously as possible when there is a conflict between what the employer says and what the employee says. My department does this every day.

Mr. Cid Samson (Timmins—Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, on the weekend, more than 45,000 Quebecers said no to Bill C-105 in Montreal. There is unanimity outside the House, and I may remind you that yesterday, more than 45,000 people were asking for the outright withdrawal of Bill C-105.

My question for the Minister of Employment and Immigration is this: Will he listen to the people who are his responsibility and withdraw Bill C-105?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, unlike the hon. member and others on his side of the House, many members from all parts of the country, especially from Quebec, told me about the concerns of their constituents regarding these changes. We are now looking at ways to make sure that the provisions of Bill C-105 will be implemented fairly, equitably and reasonably.

I have received some good suggestions from my caucus. I am still waiting to hear from the New Democrats. I imagine it will take some time, because their good ideas tend to be few and far between.

Mr. Cid Samson (Timmins—Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, the best advice I could give the minister would be to withdraw the bill.

[English]

The minister tells us he is introducing the changes to Bill C-105 to catch abusers of UIC. How is he going to penalize all those employers who are abusing the system?

Le Mouvement Action-Chômage tells us that 80 per cent of those people it assists win their appeals. That means employers have misrepresented the reasons people quit or were fired. How is picking on the victims going to halt the abuse by these employers?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): In answer to the hon. member's first question about withdrawing this bill, maybe the NDP member could tell Canadians how he expects to make up for the $1 billion these people cost workers and employers. Maybe he would raise taxes, or maybe he would increase the deficit, the cherished way of the socialists. That is not our option. We have to live within our means.

As for employers, under the act if an employer gives false information on a record of employment, he is subjected to a fine of $200 to $5,000 and to an administrative penalty that can equal five times the amount of money the unemployed insured person can obtain. So it is quite a stiff penalty and employers are being prosecuted if they breach the act.

MCDONNELL DOUGLAS

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, my question to the Minister of Finance also concerns unemployment, in fact, the 3,700 workers at risk or already laid off at McDonnell Douglas Aircraft in Toronto.

When I last raised this question the government set up a committee to work with the company and the union. I want to now ask the government why this committee has not met since October. Why did the government cut back export development funding for this company in January? Is the government simply giving up on these 3,700 jobs or does it have some solution to offer to keep this high-tech company moving ahead in the province of Ontario?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister for Science and Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member knows the tremendous array of export development programs the federal government has. Of course there are the recent announcements about the technology adaption programs, the extra $400 million we are going to be putting into technology adaption and the $240 million announced in the December 2 statement.

All those programs are there. I would be glad to look into the particular case the hon. member raises.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Prime Minister.

On July 14, 1992 Boeing of Canada Limited wrote to the Prime Minister pointing out that no public bidding process had been initiated in the provision of equipment to meet Canada's search and rescue needs.

Boeing wrote that it had recently retrofitted 339 Labrador helicopters for the U.S. marines and navy. It reported to the Prime Minister that such a retrofit could be done on Canada's Labrador helicopters at a cost of $10 million each and a savings of $1 billion to the Canadian treasury.

In light of the information contained in this letter from Boeing Canada, why were no public tenders called? Why did the government not seek to save substantial sums of money in meeting Canada's search and rescue requirements?

• (1430)

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, Boeing was invited to participate in the provision of new ship-borne aircraft and new search and rescue aircraft and in June 1990 submitted a bid which called for refurbishing the Labrador helicopters up to search and rescue requirements.

In today's dollars it represents about $500 million to $600 million to do it. We have to add to that the costs of spare parts and training equipment and the fact that we would then have two types of helicopters which would mean an additional $275 million for the cost of this program. That particular option would cost about $1.1 billion, leaving us with helicopters that were aged and therefore would not last as long, compared to $800 million for the search and rescue function of the EH-101 helicopters.

Boeing's original bid which satisfied requirements was in fact more expensive. Its latest bid would have refurbished the Labrador helicopters but they would not be able, for example, to go out and rescue people off the Ocean Ranger which was a search and rescue requirement.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, we heard that bid or that quote of $600 million last night from a spokesperson on behalf of the government. I called Boeing Canada at two o'clock and I spoke to the vice-president, George Capern, whose name is on this letter to the Prime Minister. I asked Mr. Capern whether his quote of $10 million a unit cited on July 14, 1992 stood. Mr. Capern has confirmed that bid stands and that this upgrade can be done at a cost savings of $1 billion.

I want to ask the government House leader to stop making excuses and to start making common sense by getting on the phone to Boeing to see whether or not this government can realize savings in the vicinity of $1 billion for the taxpayers of Canada. Is it not time to listen to common sense and stop listening to Tory lobbyists for these sweetheart deals?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, the fact of the matter is that the search and rescue helicopter procurement is $800 million, not $1 billion. Second, if these Labrador helicopters are to be updated and modernized to the extent that they can perform the same function, it would cost $1 billion. They can in fact be updated for $10 million but they simply would not be able to go out in foul weather.

As for the question of lobbyists, the president of the firm that was the head lobbyist for the EH-101 is a former Liberal executive assistant.

GOVERNMENT ADVERTISEMENTS

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. The Minister of Employment and Immigration just said moments ago that he had to cut expenditures to the unemployed because the government did not have enough money.

If that is so, why is it that it has lots of money to give Tory advertisers $21 million worth of untendered advertising contracts, look-alike contracts at that?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, the news article upon which the member based that question is totally and absolutely false. There were six companies which engaged in the competition—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Andre: If the opposition does not want to hear the answer it should not ask the question.

The six companies were Académie in Montreal; Burghardt, Wolowich, Crunkhorn in Toronto; Camp Associates, Toronto; La Boîte à Idées, Montreal; Palmer Jarvis, Vancouver; and Publitel. They made submissions to a committee of five civil servants: the deputy secretary to the cabinet; the director of advertising, Public Opinion Research, Supply and Services; the director of communications of the PCO; the director of operations, Communications Secretariat, PCO; and the executive director of communications, Federal-Provincial Relations Office.

They were following the policy exactly from 1985. That newspaper story is an example of poor journalism, not the government not following its policies.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, the minister never told us that they were in fact formal bids. He knows they were not. There were invitations sent to a half dozen people; that is what happened.

Again concerning the $21 million worth of contracts, why is it that a member of the national campaign of the Conservative Party is the one engaged in giving those contracts through the Tory agency that works for the government to Tory firms that are the recipients in the end? Is there not something wrong with that?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is not going to be dissuaded by facts.

What happened was that these six firms made proposals to a committee of civil servants, and the committee of civil servants assessed the representations and decided which agencies should perform this service. This policy has been in place since 1985. It has been a successful policy.

The hon. member knows full well that there is no basis whatsoever for his accusation of this being allocated in advance. We have a process that is fair, that is equitable, and that provided for six companies to compete, and a committee of civil servants made the recommendation.

SHIPBUILDING

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, I will try the Prime Minister too.

For $3 billion of taxpayers' money Hibernia should be expected to provide considerable procurement benefits for the Canadian shipbuilding industry. Not only were Canadian shipbuilders not allowed to bid on the first supermodule contract worth $200 million, the government even kicked in cancellation of a 25 per cent tariff to help Hyundai win the contract.

My question for the Prime Minister is: What action will the government take to see that Canadian shipbuilders get a chance to bid on the two remaining supermodules? Or, will the government do as it did before and actually help ship jobs elsewhere?

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I dealt with this question late last week when I indicated to the House that an extensive survey of Canadian companies was made, including the sending of formal questionnaires to the Canadian industry, to ascertain whether parts of these supermodules or indeed the whole supermodule could in fact be constructed in Canada. The response to this survey and the questionnaires was negative.

Having said that, I also pointed out last week and I repeat today that if there is new evidence on the part of any Canadian companies I would be delighted to arrange meetings with officials to review the situation once again.

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, I am sure from our conversation today that the minister will get telephone calls as soon as he gets back to his office.

There is 100 per cent overcapacity in the Canadian shipyards in Quebec and in Atlantic Canada. Many have closed or are about to close. Yet Hibernia will require three supply ships, two barges and a number of shuttle tankers to be built.

Is the government prepared to take action to ensure that these are built in Canada as the Norwegians and the British did to their advantage for the North Sea project, or will it lose this opportunity to strengthen Canadian shipbuilding for the future and to assure jobs for Canadians on a permanent basis for the future as a result of this Hibernia project?

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member and the House know that it is the government's priority to encourage as much Canadian content in the Hibernia project as is possible. That commitment stands, and I look forward to receiving as many telephone calls as the hon. member can arrange.

TRADE

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, Canadians are uncertain whether the Prime Minister obtained from President Clinton a commitment that the United States now intends to proceed with ratification and implementation of the North American free trade agreement or whether it will, as President Clinton said during the election campaign, await the negotiation of supplemental accords on the environment and on labour standards.

In light of this continuing ambiguity, would not Canadian interests, at a minimum, be better served by awaiting negotiation of the two supplementary accords?

• (1440)

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not know why my hon. friend persists in suggesting that he has difficulty understanding the President's position. The President's position is the one that he stated quite clearly and the one that has been debated on the floor of the House.

Friday afternoon in a joint press conference, in response to a question, I said that the President has indicated—

Mr. Tobin: It is a long way to go for a photo-op.

Mr. Mulroney: My hon. friend from Newfoundland says that is a long way to go for a photo-op. What about dear Jean going down to get his picture taken with George?

Mr. Barrett: Look what happened to George.

Mr. Mulroney: I hate to do this but I have to give him a 10 for that, and that is bad news for President Clinton. I will be around but I am not sure about the other guy.

The question was in regard to trade. I said that the President has indicated many times that he is going to sign the NAFTA as it is. He proposes to bring in supplemental agreements with Mexico, particularly in regard to some of the points that he has mentioned that do not impact on the NAFTA as concluded. President Clinton: "That's right".

Then he goes on to say, by the way, for the interest of the member for LaSalle—Émard: "And I might add that Prime Minister Mulroney's administration in Canada has had a very strong record on the environment".

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister is right in so far as—

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. MacLaren: —he stated the situation. He will know that President Clinton during the election campaign said he would not proceed with implementation—and I underline the word implementation—of the NAFTA, an unchanged NAFTA, but he would not proceed with implementation of the NAFTA until such time as the supplementary accords on the environment and on labour standards were negotiated.

Let me ask the Prime Minister this question. We all know that the recent events with regard to pork and steel have been the result of an absence of any agreement on subsidies. Would the Prime Minister on behalf of Canada express the Canadian interest by seeking a supplementary agreement on subsidies to parallel President Clinton's emphasis on supplementary agreements on the environment and on labour standards?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend mentions President Clinton's position during the election campaign. I just referred him to President Clinton's position Friday afternoon which is very clear: that the NAFTA is a stand-alone agreement which he supports as it is. Implementation takes place—

Mr. Tobin: No, Brian, no.

Mr. Mulroney: The member for Newfoundland is now an expert on President Clinton's thinking.

Mr. Tobin: Starting to get under your skin.

Mr. Mulroney: No, you do not get under my skin, Brian. I just saw the rat pack take down one Liberal leader and you are in the process of—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Mulroney: With regard to the question of my hon. friend, the question that he raises is being developed and resolved at the GATT.

I indicated to the President that in our judgment one of the best things he could do to assert beneficial leadership for the United States and for all trading partners was to conclude an agreement at the GATT at the earliest possible moment, because among other things this would deal with the matter that my hon. friend has quite properly raised. Failure to resolve the GATT and a loss of the Uruguay round could have damaging effects on all countries, the United States along with Canada.

BELL CANADA

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur): Mr. Speaker, on Friday, Bell Canada said that it wanted to increase basic monthly phone bills for millions of subscribers not once but twice this year, and in some cases charging an incredible 60 per cent more.

Given that Bell's move could cause similar applications by phone companies from Newfoundland to B.C. and given that this government has already put Canadians in tough economic times, what assurances will the government give Canadians today that they will continue to have access to telephone service that is both universal and affordable?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre H. Vincent (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Indian Affairs and Northern Development)): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member must know that Bell Canada's application will be submitted to the CRTC, and having spoken on the weekend to representatives of the Association des consommateurs du Québec, I know they will make their representations with the best interests of the consumer in mind.

[English]

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur): Mr. Speaker, last February the Minister of Communications stated government policy as follows: "Canadian consumers need the assurance that high quality basic services will continue to be provided at affordable rates". I underline the word affordable.

[Translation]

Do the minister and his government still stand by their statements, or have they decided that a telephone is a luxury, not a necessity?

Hon. Pierre H. Vincent (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Indian Affairs and Northern Development)): Mr. Speaker, I will repeat what I just said. The CRTC is the agency that will examine Bell's application and take the appropriate steps.

TAXATION

Mr. René Soetens (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, the Liberal Party has announced that it will cancel the GST and replace it with the SLH tax, the new sneaky, hidden tax that everyone will pay.

The GST presently exempts seniors, low income Canadians, the health care system, in fact all Canadians from paying the GST on prescription drugs.

I would like to ask the Minister of Finance this. If the Liberals get a chance to apply their tax to prescription drugs, how much will it cost the Canadian health care system and all Canadians?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the short answer is tens if not hundreds and hundreds of millions of dollars. What we have here is a flimsy proposal—

An hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Mazankowski: —that the Ottawa Sun referred to as the Grit sneaky tax. What they really want to do is hide the tax so that they can raise it at will. It would not exempt food, it would not exempt medical supplies, it would not exempt ambulance service, it would not exempt—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Prince George—Bulkley Valley.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans.

The B.C. government has announced a public inquiry into the controversial Kemano project in northern British Columbia.

Will the federal government participate in a joint review of this project with the province? Will he allow his officials to appear at the inquiry and will he release the over 83,000 pages of evidence his department has on this project? Will the minister prove that this government has a so-called strong record on the environment?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, the government does not have to prove it has a strong record on the environment. That is obvious.

With respect to the particular question, the hon. gentleman must realize that in 1987 an agreement was entered into by the province of British Columbia, the Government of Canada and the Aluminum Company of Canada in connection with this matter. This was as a result of litigation that had been taken by the province of British Columbia and by Alcan against the Government of Canada with respect to the question of whether or not the Government of Canada had the right to exercise jurisdiction over water in this particular situation.

That was settled by an agreement. That agreement is in full force and effect. The province of British Columbia is now reviewing it for some reason or other, despite the fact that it acknowledges that the agreement is to stay in effect. The province has been advised by a commissioner it appointed that it is to the economic benefit of British Columbia to allow the project to go forward and that if it did not it might be sued for $.5 billion by Alcan as a party to the agreement which has spent that much money since the agreement was entered into.

To answer his question, I will be discussing this matter with Premier Harcourt hopefully in the next day or two to tell him just what is the position of the Government of Canada. However, the background should indicate the room within which we had to act.

• (1450)

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, we thank the minister for his little history lesson. The people of northern B.C. are all too familiar with what this bad deal signed by this government has done to the Nechako River in northern British Columbia.

I thank the minister for telling the House that he is meeting with the premier. Should the public inquiry clearly show a need to change the settlement agreement of 1987, is the government prepared to reopen that settlement agreement to assist the environmental assessment that should have been done in the first place?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, there was an environmental assessment done on this project in the first place. There was an independent review committee appointed, headed by the then president of the University of British Columbia.

With reference to the agreement, the Department of Fisheries and Oceans was satisfied with respect to matters that affected fisheries and fisheries habitat. The courts of Canada have now dealt with the issue. The matter is settled in so far as any petitioners to the courts are concerned. Unless the other parties to the agreement all agree that there should be some change to the agreement, it is not an issue which the Government of Canada has to decide nor should it decide.

DAVIS INLET

Hon. William Rompkey (Labrador): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare or whoever is representing him today.

The department has agreed to fly 60 Innu to Alberta for treatment. Peter Penashue of the Innu Nation said: "We are accepting the lesser evil because there is no treatment centre to deal with our people in our language".

Last Thursday the minister told me in the House that he would listen to the Innu people and accept their proposals. He has not accepted their proposals.

Why has he not accepted their proposals? Will he commit the funds for a treatment centre for the Innu near Davis Inlet in Labrador?

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, with regard to the 14 youngsters who were involved in that very tragic situation 10 to 12 days ago, there was an agreement reached on the weekend for their immediate treatment.

The families of the 14 youngsters, the Innu, the province of Newfoundland and the Minister of National Health and Welfare have agreed that they would travel to a healing centre north of Edmonton. The families and the translators will be taken along.

The long-term solution for a health care facility at Davis Inlet is under review. We are dealing with the Innu people. My colleague, the minister of Indian affairs will be looking at all the issues, whether these are mobile or permanent. Everything is on the table and will be reviewed.

Hon. William Rompkey (Labrador): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the minister of Indian affairs or whoever is representing him today.

There is now an urgent need for a new community for Davis Inlet. The question of jurisdiction must be settled and the Government of Canada must accept it. However, there is a need now for providing the funds for construction this summer.

Will the minister or his representative take the responsibility and the lead to make sure that plans are put in place for a new community this summer?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre H. Vincent (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Indian Affairs and Northern Development)): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for his question. I think all parliamentarians will agree this is a very important matter. Last Friday, there was an important meeting with officials from my department, National Health and Welfare, people from the community and representatives of the provincial government. Certain requests were made by the community, and we are now examining all this to make sure that as far as the needs and demands of the community are concerned, our response is appropriate and valid, not only in the short term but in the long term as well for this community.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

Mr. George Proud (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister responsible for veterans affairs.

Last week the acting deputy minister informed employees that there were no plans to cut up to 400 jobs. However, I understand that in a letter to all departments, Ian Clark of the Privy Council Office called for further cuts of up to 10 per cent in all departments.

Would the minister please explain how these two contradictory messages can be reconciled. What is really going to happen to veterans' programs and what is going to happen to the employees?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, because of the aging of our veterans, our programs at veterans affairs are all experiencing growth. In any program there is always an opportunity to reduce overlap and duplication. We are attempting to ensure the programs meet the original objectives.

Canada has one of the most generous veterans affairs programs in the world. We continue to maintain our commitment to keep it that way. The hon. member can be sure that veterans will not suffer as a result of any changes in administration.

Mr. George Proud (Hillsborough): Then will the minister unequivocally say there will be no further program cuts and no further cuts of employees?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I can understand where the hon. member is coming from. The role of the Department of Veterans Affairs is to take the tax money we allocate and make sure it is used to the benefit of veterans as much as possible.

If from time to time it means being a little more productive in terms of delivery per person and so on, I am sure he would find that a useful direction in which to proceed. That is what the minister is trying to do.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister in charge of unemployment insurance. Earlier in Question Period he tried to make it sound as if the thousands and thousands of people that were parading through Montreal yesterday in -25C below were doing so because the opposition parties had misled them.

Does he not realize that when so many people show up in those types of temperatures, they are expressing a real concern? Their concern is that this government is changing the playing field. It is tilting so badly it is being completely unfair to any worker in this country. Is that not so?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, what it shows is yes, some people are concerned. I guess that as elected representatives of the people we have a duty to address these concerns and this is what we are doing.

If the hon. member is trying to tell Canadians that the NDP stands for the proposition that we should pay benefits to a person who voluntarily, without any reason whatsoever, chooses to become unemployed, I think he is wrong. Canadians would not support him.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the same minister. In today's unemployment scene and recession Canadians are not quitting jobs to go skiing. Canadians are quitting jobs because they have to quit jobs.

The minister should understand that by changing the playing field, by making harassment such an issue, he is making it very difficult for people who should be receiving unemployment insurance. Why is he doing that? Why is he making sure that many Canadians will not receive unemployment insurance when they are entitled to it?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member can point to a person in Canada who does not receive unemployment insurance after having quit a job for a valid reason I would like him to give me the example.

[Translation]

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. In a letter to the government, the Quebec Bar Association mentions that workers who are denied UI benefits will unhesitatingly appeal the decision to the umpire and to the appeal division Federal Court.

My question is this: Can the minister tell us today how many cases are pending before referees and the Federal Court of Appeal in Quebec? Will the number of cases brought before referees in Quebec increase because of Bill C-105?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, most of the time, in about 93 per cent of the cases, the unemployment insurance officer makes the final decision on applications for benefits. Last year, Employment and Immigration Canada received in excess of 3.5 million UI claims. Of these, 35,000 or less than 1 per cent gave rise to appeals. In addition, 80 per cent of the appeals nation-wide in 1992 were decided within 30 days. In Quebec it was 91 per cent. To respond more specifically to my friend's question, there are presently 1,853 appeals before the umpire and 2,300 before the board of referees.

DECORUM IN THE HOUSE

Mr. Larry Schneider (Regina—Wascana): Mr. Speaker, my question deals with Motion No. 5 currently on the Order Paper. This motion refers to decorum and respect for each other. Therefore, my question is for the government House leader.

This motion has been debated for seven and a half hours and seems to be mired in purgatory. Can Canadians be assured this motion will be dealt with?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I hope in view of the new policy announcement by the Liberal Party that it believes there should be proper decorum in the House that it will agree to bring this motion to a vote. It has been debated for three days. I have not been able to get an agreement from the opposition to bring the debate to a conclusion.

LABOUR FORCE

Mr. Louis Plamondon (Richelieu): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration, commonly called the minister of unemployment and arrogance in Quebec.

Yesterday in Montreal, 50,000 people shouted out their disapproval to him. The minister still responds that if we want to reject his hateful unemployment insurance bill, we should suggest something to save $600 million. Last week, he refused to sign a labour force agreement with Quebec that could have saved $250 million.

Would the minister be prepared to get the hundreds of millions he needs from those who hide their money in tax havens, as the Auditor General of Canada recommends? If he is afraid to get this money from tax cheaters, is it because these tax evaders are the same people who fund the Conservative Party?

PRIVILEGE

GOVERNMENT RESPONSE TO PETITIONS

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 48(2), I wish to raise a question of privilege.

On April 8, 1992 and May, 6, 1992, I tabled a number of petitions in this House. These are petitions Nos. 343-1454, 343-1659 and 343-1660. They contained over 3,000 signatures by the Canadian Hispanic Congress on the subject of the fate of refugee claimants in Canada.

On February 2, 1993, placed in my House of Commons desk were the responses to the aforementioned petitions. These responses were received 298 days and 270 days respectively after tabling the petitions.

Standing Order 36(8) reads:

> The Ministry shall, within forty-five days, respond to every petition referred to it.

I emphasize the word "shall". In the practical guide "Petitioning the House of Commons" which all members are given as a guide to collecting and tabling petitions section 2(6) reads:

> Whenever a petition is presented, a copy is sent to the Privy Council Office which then forwards it to the appropriate government department or agency so that a response can be prepared.
> The response must be tabled in the House of Commons within 45 days after the petition has been presented.

This guide is prepared by the Private Members' Business Office. Again, I draw your attention to Standing Order 36(8) which says that the ministry shall give a response within 45 days.

The government does not have to agree with the petitioners, but I think the government must show respect, interest and concern for the over 3,000 Canadians who signed these petitions on an immigration matter. The minister responsible is really showing contempt for the House of Commons orders by not responding.

We cannot operate that way, Mr. Speaker. The rules were put here to provide law and order, to provide for things being processed in an orderly fashion so that Canadians get a response in a decent time.

Mr. Speaker, if you find, and I hope you will, that I do have a prima facie case I am prepared to move the appropriate motion.

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I do not have the immediate facts before me to comment on the substance of the grievance of the hon. member. He is quite correct that Standing Order 36(8) reads as he quoted it.

I want to point out that responses to petitions have been coming forward at a phenomenal rate, some days in the hundreds. It may have something to do with the over-burden of responses. However, I will undertake to investigate the question and see whether it can be expedited.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Parkdale—High Park has raised a matter which has been raised before in this House. There is a rule as the hon. member referred to it and read it to the House.

With this kind of application which is an application to the Chair to find that the privileges of the hon. member have been breached because there has not been a response to a petition within the number of days set out in the rules the difficulty is that there is no sanction in the rules. The Chair has had to say in the past that it is extremely difficult to come up with a lawful response.

I have said in the past and I hope I am not going to have to say it in the future but I echo again what the hon. parliamentary secretary said. The rule is there and for whatever reason it has not been complied with. It was not put in there in the first place I am sure with the intention of not being complied with but as the hon. member who has brought the application knows, this is not the first time the Chair has had to deal with it.

The best way to deal with it at the moment is to accept the undertaking of the parliamentary secretary that he will make an inquiry—I hope it will be an immediate inquiry—and that he could raise the matter again perhaps some time tomorrow.

Mr. Flis: Mr. Speaker, I am wondering if the parliamentary secretary while he is looking into this would consider discussing this in the House management standing committee because certain ministers cannot flout the rules of the House this way. They owe it to Canadians.

No wonder Canadians hold parliamentarians and the whole government process in such low esteem when after 200 days I have no response for the over 3,000 Canadians who signed the petitions. My role as a member of Parliament is being thwarted. I am not very effective when I cannot get a response within 45 days.

I am treating this very seriously and I am not sure whether the petitioners once they hear that I have raised this question of privilege will not follow it up.

Mr. Speaker: I want to assure hon. members that the Chair is not treating it other than as a serious matter. I am calling to the attention of hon. members that there is a rule. There is no sanction. It may very well be that it ought to be considered by hon. members and ought to be remedied.

In the meantime with this particular case and keeping in mind the matter raised by the hon. member and the fact that clearly there is here a breach of the rules and the sensitivities of the hon. members and the sensibilities of the hon. member's petitioners, I think the appropriate thing at least for today is to ask the parliamentary secretary to address the House tomorrow and see if there is some explanation at least. That may not fully satisfy the hon. member or hon. members, but at least for today that is where I would like to leave it.

• (1510)

HOCKEY CANADA—SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: On Monday, February 1, 1993 the House leader of the Official Opposition rose on a question of privilege regarding a question asked during Question Period on Friday, December 11, 1992. As this was the last Question Period before the House rose for its Christmas recess the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond has raised this matter at the first opportunity. I would like to thank him and the Solicitor General for their interventions on this matter.

In his presentation on Monday last, the House leader of the Official Opposition noted that on December 11, 1992 he had put a question to the Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport asking the government to provide the complete financial statements for Hockey Canada since its incorporation. The then Minister of Justice, responding on behalf of her colleague the Solicitor General, stated:

—this matter is currently being investigated by the RCMP. The Government of Canada will offer no further information until the RCMP has concluded its investigation.

Subsequently, on December 17, 1992, Mr. Ian Macdonald, chairman of the board of Hockey Canada, issued a press release stating that the financial records of Hockey Canada were not under investigation by the RCMP. It was from this discrepancy of fact that the question of privilege was raised by the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond.

[Translation]

The situation was cleared up when the Solicitor General, in response to the question of privilege, indicated that it was National Hockey League Players' Association that was being investigated by the RCMP, and not Hockey Canada, which is fully co-operating with the RCMP in this investigation. In the Solicitor General's absence, the hon. Minister of Justice had taken the matter under advisement, to deal with the situation, which was not fully understood at the time. As the Solicitor General has now been able to clear up the situation, it is obvious that there was no attack on the House and that this is not a case of contempt of Parliament.

[English]

I would like to thank the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond for raising this matter and also the Solicitor General for clarifying the situation.

GOVERNMENT RESPONSE TO PETITIONS

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36(8), I have the honour to table, in both official languages, the government responses to 43 petitions.

[Editor's Note: See today's Votes and Proceedings.]

PETITIONS

VIOLENCE AGAINST WOMEN AND CHILDREN

Mr. Jean-Guy Hudon (Beauharnois—Salaberry): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of Rev. Douglas E.W. Lennox, pastor of St. Andrew's Presbyterian Church in Huntingdon and Athelstan, I am pleased to present three petitions that come mainly from the municipalities of Dundee in my riding, Huntingdon, Athelstan and Saint-Anicet, and concern violence against children and women.

These petitions contain a number of signatures and I would like to thank the clergyman for his hard work on this cause and tell him more specifically that the newspapers and media are often criticized for spreading this violence. I must tell you that it is thanks to them that we know more about it.

OLD AGE SECURITY

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have the honour to table a petition from some of our country's seniors. They say that far too many seniors now live in poverty and are always in financial difficulty for lack of sufficient income.

The petitioners ask Parliament to kindly ask the government to re-evaluate Old Age Security so that it reflects the real needs of Canada's seniors.

[English]

HEALTH CARE

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): I have another petition, Mr. Speaker. The petitioners are telling us that Canadian universal medicare is the principle of our Canadian heritage and our identity. Recent cutbacks to health care have undermined the principle of universality in Canada.

The petitioners request that Parliament take all necessary measures to enshrine in the Constitution the obligation to provide universal, publicly funded hospital and medical care to all citizens.

TAXATION

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition to present on behalf of teachers in public and secondary schools as well as post-secondary institutions. They note that they bear the burden of extra-curricular expenses to improve their own professional skills, as well as providing academic services and materials to the students for whom they are responsible.

The petitioners note that business people and self-employed professionals are able to deduct the costs of their in-service training and business expenses but teachers are not. They call upon parliamentarians to request that the Minister of Finance and the Minister of National Revenue take action to amend the Income Tax Act to allow teachers who teach in educational institutions in Canada to deduct professional expenses made in the course of their employment.

JUSTICE

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition from another 250 residents of the Comox Valley who, in memory of Dawn Shaw, a little girl who was murdered and sexually assaulted in the valley, have petitioned Parliament asking that the present justice system be changed to allow for more protection for children in our communities who are increasingly becoming victims of sexual assault.

The petitioners propose a number of changes in the justice system which they believe would improve the safety of children and protect them from sexual assault. One of those changes is permitting police to take DNA samples from persons suspected of sexual assault and also that a national database of DNA imprints be kept in order to assist the police in tracking down people who perpetrate sexual assaults.

CHILD POVERTY

Mr. David Bjornson (Selkirk—Red River): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I would like to present a petition to the House from the constituents of Selkirk—Red River, Portage—Interlake, Winnipeg—St. Boniface and Winnipeg Transcona, calling on Parliament to reconfirm its commitment to seek the elimination of poverty among children in Canada by the year 2000.

VIOLENCE AGAINST WOMEN AND CHILDREN

Mr. Murray Cardiff (Huron—Bruce): Mr. Speaker, I have two petitions to present today from the congregations of Knox Presbyterian Church and St. Andrew's Presbyterian Church both in my riding and as well from the people from Port Elgin, Southampton and Paisley in my riding, calling on Parliament to accept legislation designed to eliminate violence against women and children.

[Translation]

HEALTH CARE

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, because of some recent events in the health field, I have a petition to present.

[English]

The petitioners indicate that medicare is under threat as a result of reductions in federal cash payments to provincial health care systems, changes in drug patent legislation leading to monopoly production and rising drug prices, as well as a lack of a co-ordinated national strategy for health care reform.

They say there are alternative policies that would preserve medicare, provide medical services on a more efficient basis than the American pay as you go system and guarantee health care as a basic right for all Canadians.

To sum up their 11 excellent points, although I do not have the time to read them into the record, they want a renewed commitment from all parties to the Canada Health Act and to the universality of health care. They also want to make sure that the freezes and the cuts to funding are removed, that appropriate funding is reinstituted for health care in Canada.

• (1520)

Finally, the petitioners want to make sure, before any changes ever occur, that there is full and open debate on the direction that any government would take.

CHRISTINE LAMONT AND DAVID SPENCER

Mr. Lyle Kristiansen (Kootenay West—Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, I rise, pursuant to Standing Order 36, to present eight petitions containing some 271 signatures, 15 of them from my home city of Nelson, British Columbia.

The petitioners point out that two Canadians, Christine Lamont and David Spencer, who were sentenced to 28 years each in a Brazilian prison, have suffered miscarriages of justice, cruel and unusual treatment in Brazilian prisons and discrimination in sentencing and parole.

The petitioners further point out that riots in the same compound where they are held have demonstrated there is a real threat to their health and safety in prison. The only relief available from such severe punishment is for Canada to request expulsion in accordance with Brazilian law.

Therefore the petitioners call upon Parliament to urge the Prime Minister to request the Government of Brazil to expel Christine Lamont and David Spencer and return them to Canada in accordance with Brazilian law.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, the petitioners who have signed this petition really must be shocked at the government's inconsistent approach. The government talks about the importance of the global marketplace and how the development of education and research are very important to Canada's competitive position in that global marketplace, yet the government imposed a goods and services tax on the printed word which includes educational materials.

The petitioners have taken the position that the government was wrong and I agree with them. The petition is signed by people from Kingston, Ottawa, Orleans, Westbrook, Tamworth, Harrowsmith, Oshawa, Sydenham, Pittsburgh, Odessa, Lyndhurst, Hamilton, Trenton, Willowdale, Battersea, Newmarket and a signature from someone from St. John's, Newfoundland.

These petitioners are all appalled at the government's application of the goods and services tax on the printed word, contrary to the normal democratic principles of freedom of the press, the importance of education in our society and so on. They call upon Parliament to repeal the goods and services tax on the sale of books, magazines and newspapers.

BILL C-105

Mr. David Berger (Saint-Henri—Westmount): Mr. Speaker, I would like to table a petition signed by about fifty people from the Montreal area who oppose the government's proposal to exclude from unemployment insurance those who quit their jobs.

The petitioners believe that these proposals, if adopted, will lead to excessive and costly litigation. They claim that these proposals will discourage workers from improving their position at work and decrease labour force mobility.

They also maintain that these proposals could subject workers to continuing discrimination, sexual harassment and undue stress on the job. They also say that these proposals will have a negligible effect on reducing the deficit and payroll taxes.

Therefore, the petitioners ask Parliament to reject these proposals contained in Bill C-105.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk)

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, Question No. 415 will be answered today.

[Text]

Question No. 415—Mr. Simmons:

Has the government taken any concrete action on the recommendations made by the Auditor General in his 1991 annual report to review the level of spending needed in carrying out harbour repairs efficiently and appropriately, to improve the preventive maintenance aspects of the program, to safeguard these assets in the long term, and to do a comprehensive assessment on the inspection and commissioning process for major projects in Newfoundland?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): The Department of Fisheries and Oceans continuously reviews the spending level needed to carry out annual harbour repairs. This exercise is used to establish budget priorities. The department has been and remains aware of the need to carry out harbour repairs efficiently and appropriately. Every effort is made to balance requests for harbour expansions, modifications and upgrades with the need to undertake preventive maintenance and repair work. Since funding needs for preventive maintenance and repairs at DFO's 2,127 harbours across Canada have increased but harbour budgets have not, the emphasis has shifted more and more toward preventive maintenance and repair.

As for the commissioning and inspection procedures followed on major projects in Newfoundland, each project is inspected and accepted by DFO staff as the Auditor General has recommended.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The question as enumerated by the parliamentary secretary has been answered.

STARRED QUESTIONS

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, would you be so kind as to call Starred Questions Nos. 436 and 441. Due to the length of the answers I would ask that they be printed in Hansard as if read.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is that agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

*Question No. 436—Mrs. Gibeau:

Regarding the issue of the construction of a viaduct to bypass the railway track that intersects Henri-Bourassa Boulevard at Langelier Boulevard, Montreal North (a) have officials studied the matter and, if so, (i) since when (ii) for which departments do they work (b) is there a project supervisor and, if so, for which department does he work (c) has CN or VIA Rail or any other organization responsible for the railway been contacted regarding this matter and if so (i) what were the nature (ii) the conclusions of the discussions (d) have studies, recommendations or other options been drafted on this matter and, if so (i) what are they (ii) is the written documentation of a public nature and if so where can copies be obtained (e) does the government intend to build this viaduct or find another method to solve the problem of the bottleneck caused by the track and if so (i) what is the completion date and (ii) what are the cost estimates?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Officials in Transport Canada and the Federal Office for Regional Development in Quebec have been discussing the matter since the beginning of the summer with representatives of the city of Montreal. At this time the federal government has not decided on its involvement in this project and consequently, there is no project supervisor. No studies or options have been drafted by the federal government on this matter and the recommendations on a possible federal intervention are confidential. The federal government has not contacted CN or VIA on this matter.

*Question No. 441—Mr. Saint-Julien:

With regard to Canada's national debt (a)what is the percentage of short-term debt (less than six years) (b) what is the percentage of long-term debt (more than six years) (c) to which countries do foreign holders of Canadian bonds belong, are there British, German, American and Japanese holders and if so, what is their share (i) in percentages (ii) in Canadian dollars, (d) what percentage of the debt becomes due in a fiscal year (e) what is its average rate of interest (f) what is the statement of change in loans made abroad by the government for each year from 1980 to 1992 inclusively?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, in response to (a) it was 66.8 per cent as at March 31, 1992. This percentage includes all Canada Savings Bonds because their interest rates are adjusted annually, even if the term could be as long as 12 years. If we include only those Canada Savings Bonds that will come to term in less than six years, the percentage of debt coming due would be 61.8 per cent. In response to (b) it was 33.2 per cent as at March 31, 1992. This total excludes all Canada Savings Bonds because their interest rates are adjusted annually, even if the term could be as long as 12 years. If Canada Savings Bonds with a term of more than six years are included, then the percentage would be 38.2 per cent. With respect to (c)(i), it is estimated that Japanese investors held about 15 per cent of Government of Canada marketable bonds in 1992 and U.S. and U.K. investors, about 7.5 per cent each. There are no figures available for Germany. (ii) It is estimated that Japanese investors held about $24 billion Canadian of Government of Canada marketable bonds in 1992 and U.S. and U.K. investors, about $12 billion Canadian each. There are no figures available for Germany. In response to (d) it was 49 per cent as at March 31, 1992. In response to (e) it was 9.16 per cent for fiscal year 1991–92. Direct borrowing in Canadian dollars by the Government of Canada on foreign markets between 1980 and 1992 was as follows:

	Million Canadian Dollars
1981	1,414
1982	1,699
1983	922
1984	1,548
1985	5,886
1986	6,027
1988	2,247
1989	788
1990	1,122
1991	44
1992	745

[English]

Mr. Edwards: I ask, Mr. Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

[Translation]

Mr. Duhamel: Mr. Speaker, I raised this point a long time ago and you may be familiar with the case.

[English]

Over a year ago I had a question about the goods and services tax on the Order Paper as to how much it would in fact raise from Canadians. How much would it cost to administer? How much of that has gone toward the deficit and reduction of the debt? I have raised this on several occasions. My colleague is very honourable, otherwise I would be angry by now.

I am in a really difficult situation. I have constituents asking me why that gentleman I call honourable is not giving me the answers. I say that perhaps there are others who are not quite as honourable as he who are not providing the information. I do not know.

They point out to me that there has been a number of articles in the newspapers asking: Is it possible that the goods and services tax has raised more money than has been suggested which might be used during an election? Is it possible that it costs a lot more to administer than the government has suggested? There are all kinds of rumours out there.

I am trying to help my constituents find out the truth. I assume that my colleague is continuing to try to get me those answers I desperately need for my constituents.

Mr. Edwards: Mr. Speaker, I think my hon. friend raised this question with me last Wednesday if I am not mistaken. That was five days ago and I was hoping he might give me seven.

SMALL BUSINESSES LOANS ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Hockin that Bill C–99, an act to amend the Small Businesses Loans Act and another act in consequence thereof, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Economics envelope.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): When the debate was suspended at 2 p.m., the hon. member for St. Boniface still had 13 minutes left.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I will briefly summarize where I was because, as you will understand, I was not able to finish my speech. Here is what I had indicated.

[English]

This party will, in fact, support this legislation because we see it as a step forward for small and medium sized businesses. We would have liked the government to have gone further. At the same time, we are going to make some proposals that it may want to take very seriously.

Before I go into those proposals, I want to point out that as a party we acknowledge that small and medium sized enterprises do contribute a great deal to the quality of life of Canadians generally in a number of ways. Let me mention a couple. We have figures which show that in excess of 85 per cent of the new jobs created within the last couple of years have been made by small and medium sized enterprises. In fact that figure has been in excess of 80 per cent for a number of years. Many of these jobs are good jobs that challenge the intelligence and skills of Canadians in a very positive way.

Not only has there been job creation, but those small and medium sized enterprises have also contributed in a significant way to research and development. As I indicated previously, a lot of research and development has been undertaken by these particular firms. If one looks at their over-all expenditure in this area and the pay-offs as a result of those expenditures we find there is a lot of meaningful spin-off.

[Translation]

As I just mentioned, these small and medium-sized businesses greatly contribute to the quality of life of Canadians. A very significant proportion—I believe it is over 80 per cent for at least the last decade—of new jobs are created by these businesses. Not only are jobs created but there is also a whole field of research and development as well as extremely important investments in that sector which are very beneficial to us in the sense that they bring a lot to our country and of course to Canadians.

[English]

I would have liked the government to have looked at the excessive paperwork that prevents small and medium sized businesses from being as productive as they might be. This is an issue that is continually brought to my attention. As well, a lot of people believe there ought to be a one-stop shop where you can go to get advice, find out what kinds of programs are available not only from the federal government but from the provincial and the municipal governments.

One thing that has happened is there is a lot more glitz than substance to these supposed government programs. In other words, there is not a whole lot out there except a lot of glossy material. However, that does not resolve the problem for Canadian businesses and Canadian businessmen and women.

• (1530)

Another matter that needs to be looked at in a serious way is the whole area of financial assistance. A number of people come to see me after having been to the federal, provincial and municipal governments and indicate that there is not a whole lot out there.

Sometimes there is absolutely nothing out there or sometimes what is available out there is not of a great deal of assistance because they need to be wealthy enough to qualify totally. If they are that well off obviously they would not have the kinds of problems many other people have.

I indicated before Question Period in my initial remarks that a number of people had difficulties. I gave some examples from my riding. I referred to an aboriginal inventor, a very creative and brilliant individual who came up with a number of really sound ideas according to all the advice that he has received. Although he has received some assistance, he is unable to receive enough assistance to have those projects realized.

[Translation]

What good are programs if they only help someone to go half way, if they do not enable someone to complete the whole thing? That is an example of someone who received a little help but not enough to complete this cycle. Unfortunately, this person has excellent ideas which might not materialize, and that would be sad, I think.

[English]

In another incident I mentioned two business persons. They had the idea of a tree farm where they would sell trees, particularly during the holiday season, that could be replanted, thereby saving trees and obviously contributing to the environment. They had a number of other unique features to this particular idea. When they explored the federal, provincial and municipal government levels there was virtually no money. It is very difficult to start any kind of business without financial assistance today. It is virtually unheard of. They are young men without a whole lot of collateral upon which they can rely to get the loans required to get this business working.

There were a lot of pamphlets. Initially in their conversations they felt there might be some help, but when they studied the various options available there was very little.

As well, I indicated that the president and owner of Astro Float Industries in Winnipeg has been trying to obtain a loan for years. I have no doubt the bureaucratic officials assigned to this dossier have looked at what he produces and the kinds of funding that could assist him in expanding his facilities to other markets besides the ones he serves now. At the same time there are rules in place that prevent this individual from going forward.

This individual may need to go elsewhere. He may need to go to the United States in order to stay afloat, if I may use such an expression when I am talking about a company that constructs world-class floats and float materials in my riding. It is most unfortunate that we do not have the kind of assistance available to permit someone locally to expand his or her business enterprise beyond the immediate market.

It is contrary to some of the comments made by government ministers. Supposedly they want to increase productivity and competitiveness and create additional jobs for Canadians.

I mentioned as well a woman who had some unique ideas in the implementation of child care facilities. There again she needed some minimal financial assistance which was not available.

In another instance two women were interested in publishing some materials that were very useful in educational circles. They had been endorsed. In fact, to my knowledge and after having looked for a long time, there was no financial assistance whatsoever.

The sadness in all this is that governments—and I do not say it unkindly—talk a good story but there is not a whole lot that follows up in substantive terms, particularly when it comes to financial assistance.

We have to re-examine whether or not we are serious about helping current businesses thrive, expand, survive and become healthier entities and whether or not we are interested in trying to ensure that new businesses can come on stream and create additional employment opportunities for Canadians.

Once we have done that we have to look to see what we need to do to make sure that the right kind of culture is there to permit this to happen.

[Translation]

I recently conducted a survey of business people in my constituency, of whom some 1,500 own small and medium-sized businesses. We found out what the two main problems for these people were. First, these business owners have an incredible work-load and spend considerable time on government paperwork related to the GST and other things. This is so discouraging that some of these people tell me almost daily that they feel like giving up their business and finding another job in order to escape this heavy burden imposed by the government.

[English]

Paperwork is a major issue that taps into the resources of small businesses in a significant way from a number of programs and clearly from the goods and services tax.

Another thing business people have said to me, and I think with a great deal of sincerity, is that there is too much involvement of government.

[Translation]

Governments are too involved. Why not allow business people to decide what they must do, and of course provide them with the necessary support but be very cautious regarding the type of support given. Indeed, we should leave it up to these men and women to react in the manner they deem most appropriate for their business.

[English]

Another issue of great concern to them, quite apart from government interference very often in areas they feel governments should not be involved, is the whole idea of the tax burden itself. They feel that the tax burden has been increasing significantly.

During the last eight years there have been excessive tax burdens. We are talking about 30-plus tax increases; I am told it is 34. We are talking about revenue that has almost doubled since 1984. We are talking, despite those 34 tax increases and revenue almost doubling, about a deficit that has hovered at about the same amount throughout the last number of years and a debt that has increased substantially.

I have said in the House that the former Minister of Finance, the hon. member for Etobicoke Centre, indicated in response to a question on the Order Paper that the debt the government inherited in 1984 was almost $168 billion. That is quite contrary to the other figures that we hear, but right now it is close to $450 billion.

While there are people who have said that simply is a result of the interest over the years, we know that is patently false.

[Translation]

I conclude by reiterating the support of my party. We believe that this is a step in the right direction but we want the government to go a little farther. Our party would also like the government to consider an in-depth review of the heavy burden of government regulations on business people. We would also like the government to review the tax rate on these businesses and to ensure that in a society such as ours these businesses are as free as possible to make the decisions necessary for their health and well-being.

[English]

We want to support this bill. It is a step forward. We encourage the government to look at other areas such as reducing paperwork and making sure the taxes are not overwhelming to the point where we chase people out of the business or we create unnecessary bankruptcies, a very serious phenomenon.

Finally we endorse the idea that while governments have to be aware of what is happening in this sector, they should not interfere unduly. There are a lot of bright men and women out there who know how to operate a business and really do not need help from government. In fact help from government can be very destructive.

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, it is a privilege for me to enter into the debate on Bill C-99 respecting the Small Businesses Loans Act.

Through my lifetime I have experienced being in small business, first in Saskatchewan in farming. It high time the country realized that farming can be a small or medium sized business and in some cases a big business. Somehow we have one rule for farmers who run a small business or a medium sized business and another one for the person who runs a business in a city.

• (1540)

After farming my family moved to Ontario and opened up a small restaurant business. With seven in the family all working together and hiring three waitresses, the little restaurant called "Lakeview Diner" was very successful. We could not have managed had we not been able to obtain a loan. Thanks to a local bank loan and money obtained from selling the farm in Saskatchewan we got into quite a thriving little business. Therefore I speak with a bit of experience.

During December and January when the House was not sitting I visited many businesses in Parkdale—High Park. I was very pleased when I visited a business that was successful and was doing more business than at the same time the year before. I could count those on the fingers of one hand. The rest of them were asking: "When will the recession be over? What are you going to do to help small businesses? We are going under. I may be able to survive another six months but no longer".

When I asked what the problem was and how the government could help small business, usually the answer was: "Stop taxing us to death". Others would say that the GST was killing them with red tape, the paperwork and the taxes. Some even told me they preferred the GST-type tax to be hidden somewhere so that customers would know it is one price and that the price they pay is on the tag, instead of playing around with different prices.

Everyone hoped that 1993 would begin successfully with the economy taking on an upward trend. Unfortunately that is not happening. As a federal government, as provincial governments and as municipal governments we have to put our heads together to help small businesses. That is why I would like to add my support to Bill C-99. I am for anything that will help small businesses, providing of course the government accepts some of the amendments we are putting forward.

We have said over and over that small and medium sized businesses are the backbone of the country. They provide 80 per cent of the jobs. They provide family incomes. They provide jobs beyond the family. Yet, when it comes to help for small businesses, it is not there.

We have been hearing in this House about growing food banks in Montreal, Vancouver and Toronto. What do we do to try to correct that ill in our society? Do we get more volunteers out and throw some more money here or there? If we really wanted to get rid of food banks we would help small businesses to create more jobs. If people had jobs they would not have to stand in lines at food banks.

The hon. member for St. Boniface mentioned the important contribution to research and development by small and medium sized businesses. A weekend ago I met a Canadian who originally came from Taiwan. He is involved in research and development of automobile brakes. He and his colleagues have invented a brake which does not contain asbestos, an asbestos-free brake line. What a breakthrough. We know the environmental and health dangers of asbestos. Thanks to a bit of R and D in a smaller business there is an invention to solve this problem. There are thousands of inventions such as this through the smaller and medium-sized businesses.

Not long ago in Parkdale four or five gentlemen were working on a solar battery that would power an automobile for more than one day. Through lack of support from government that project unfortunately fell through.

I was sorry to hear this doom and gloom from the small businesses in Parkdale—High Park. One thing that bothers me about this bill is the government says it will increase the maximum loan to $250,000 or $200,000. That sounds great and looks good on paper, but the businesses I talked to could not get $30,000 or $40,000 loans from their local banks or commercial banks downtown. Business after business said there was no point increasing the maximum when they could not get small loans to hold them through the recession.

I also learned that women have a tougher time holding on to their businesses than men because banks somehow believe women are greater risks. One woman has been very successful in my riding for about 10 years. The recession has affected her and for the last two years she has been in the red. She went to the bank to get a loan to tide her over. The local bank said sorry, it only gave personal loans and did not handle commercial loans. This bank knows the businesses in that area and how long they have existed but says: "Sorry, nyet." We do not give commercial loans, you have to go downtown. Who knows this shopkeeper on Jane and Annett downtown? Of course she was refused a small business loan.

Somehow we have to do more to get women into various enterprises, because they are great entrepreneurs.

My colleague from Broadview—Greenwood told me he held a workshop to teach women how to get involved in self-employment. I think these are great projects and they deserve the support of government assistance at all levels. Otherwise the free trade and NAFTA agreements are not going to help us and those jobs will leave us permanently.

In 1981-82 when we had the recession, firms that laid people off rehired them when the economy picked up. Now, once these firms close those jobs are gone forever.

I would like the government to look into the depressed areas of cities. I think anyone coming from a larger city realizes there are thriving sections but there are also deprived areas of the city. I visited some of these in December and January and they really need our help. People are going into the red month by month and year by year. They are losing their RRSPs which they have put away for their retirement. They are losing their homes. They are losing their condominiums.

I spoke to one family who is going back to Peru. The woman told me she sees a greater future for herself, her husband and five children in Peru than in Toronto. I found that very hard to believe. She had a big cleaning business that was thriving. She was putting her children through university but the recession just wiped her out. By June she will probably be heading for Peru with the entire family. Look at the talent we are losing. This is a family of entrepreneurs with children who are already in university. Imagine what they could do for Canada to stimulate other businesses. We are driving these people back to where they came from. That is a sad state of affairs.

Somehow the government must do more than increase the maximum on small business loans. It must help the small and medium-sized businesses that need $20,000, $30,000 or $40,000 to hold them over through the recession.

One gentleman came into my office. He was not losing his business. He wanted to do something to really create jobs in this country. He was proposing a new type of food business because he had analysed the lifestyles of people. He said many people now with both spouses working like to drop into a food store and pick up dinner on their way home from work. They do not want a whole tailor-made pizza. They want to create. He developed many ways of creating dinners with a bit of this and a bit of that so people could prepare their dinners on the way home.

Of course, he needed proper refrigeration, equipment, et cetera for that. He mapped out three potential locations for the banks. It would create 12 new jobs. He went to the bank and read all the brochures from the Federal Business Development Bank. He met every criteria. He filled out his application and had other experts check it. He went to the Federal Business Development Bank and his application was refused.

The person processing the loan did not even have the courage to sit down with him and say why his application was refused. The refusal came in a letter through a third person. Is that not terrible?

The government wants to create jobs and increase the number of small and medium sized businesses in this country but how can we with that kind of mentality in our banks? The Federal Business Development Bank is a government bank. Surely to goodness our banks have a corporate citizenship responsibility.

We as Canadians have duties and responsibilities to our country. With the millions and billions the banks make, surely they have a duty and responsibility to save our beautiful country. They can save it by helping to create jobs and stimulate new businesses. They will take a loss on this one or that one, but that is the risk one takes in business.

When the economy is good, the banks are great at taking risks. They lend to the hilt as they did for farmers and others. When the economy goes bad they call in all their loans. They could not care less if a whole family is wiped out in farming or business.

I think it is high time this Chamber sent a message out coast to coast saying: "Wake up banks. You are Canadian corporate citizens. Do your duty. Do your responsibility to this country".

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, I would like to commend my colleague from Parkdale—High Park who spoke moments ago about the role small and medium sized firms and businesses and entrepreneurs play in the economic vitality of our country.

Amendments to the Small Businesses Loans Act started in 1961 and have been under constant revision and modification so bridging between government and businesses can meet the reality of the marketplace. It is an opportunity to have a debate in this Chamber that should go from words to action. For the last number of years members from all sides, and particularly members from the government side have said with great fanfare and rhetoric that the Canadian small business network is the backbone of our economy. It is the greatest producer, creator and innovator of jobs and different techniques in our economy. Yet budget after federal budget, we open those books that are carted in by our pages and have the benefit of a couple of days of analysis. We go through those very colourful brochures that speak in glowing terms to the small business network but when you get a phone call in your constituency office from the small business entrepreneur around the corner looking for help, there is none.

This provides us with an opportunity to not only speak to the small business people out there but to do something for them and the future of small risk takers and medium sized firms still operating from someone's basement waiting to be created and explode into the marketplace. We have to make that transition. In Toronto alone there are 185,000 fewer jobs today than there were before the start of the recession. A lot of this can be attributed to the failure, unfortunately, of that small business entrepreneurial sector which the government has let down.

In the industrial and commercial areas of my riding of York West there are mostly small and medium sized firms. They are hurting and have been calling out for help for the longest time, yet we are deaf to those concerns. A lot of attention is being focused on those big business players and we know the role they have played with this government. We know the comfort zone that exists between the government and that level. We know the role they played in the last election campaign.

I do not want to begrudge the success of any large business entrepreneur who started in his or her basement or leased 1,000 square feet, had the family working seven days a week and now has a big business. God bless him or her.

When it talks business or says it is the government of business, that does not give this government the right to exclude this large sector of small and medium-sized firms. We do so at our own peril. When we talk about the problems afflicting that marketplace we can obviously and quickly look to the GST. Talk to those small business firms and ask them what effect the transitional expenses of implementing the GST system have had on them and what the GST has done to deflate their businesses and marketplaces.

Is it any wonder that some of those small businesses are dealing in cash? Through the imposition of the GST and some 30-odd tax increases over the last number of years, we have contributed to expanding that underground economy.

• (1600)

That is why the government does not see the revenues it had anticipated. It is because those businesses are taking their own action. When painters are asked what it will cost to paint houses on my street in metropolitan Toronto the response is: "Well, are you going to pay me by cheque or cash? If it is the latter, it will cost less". The reason it is less is that they are trying to avoid the imposition of the GST.

I am not encouraging people and companies to break the law. All I am doing is acknowledging a fact that has mushroomed. Underground industry is alive and well.

We talk about regulations and the burden of paper. Not only is it a question of red tape but it is also the constant changing and revising of regulations which makes it much more troublesome for a small entrepreneur to plan and to keep up with the pace. One month they are under certain regulations and five months down the road another regulation from the same government or a contradictory regulation from another municipality or provincial government is impacting on that business.

Small business people are asking us to allow them the time to predict and to operate under a set of criteria that can be managed rather than constantly changing the playing ground under their feet.

People have talked about the banks and the role of lending institutions. Why is it we hear from small entrepreneurs who have been customers of various banks or trust companies for 20, 25 or 30 years, that they cannot get to first base any more? Why is it that our banks, the big five, are among the most conservative of lending institutions around the globe?

I am not suggesting we move into the deregulation system the United States has ushered in. As speakers before me have very articulately and passionately said, we have to realize that the lending institutions also have a responsibility to the national economy.

If those banking institutions are pointing to governments and saying governments must lead the way as they should, those institutions have to recognize they have a very important niche in the national economy. That is to be risk takers like the entrepreneurs and to trust customers who have done well through the years and allow the banks to do well. They must be responsive and sensitive and not call in those loans at the first signs of fear or apprehension. They must commit themselves and redouble their efforts, particularly during the tough times, not only during the good times.

It is frustrating for the small business people not to be able to get working capital from their local banking institution after years of depositing, after years of having a rapport with the bank manager, years of taking the good advice and investment advice of the banking institution. Then when they really need that institution to be in their corner, to support them, to advise them, to reassure them and to build their confidence, all of a sudden, that institution forgets their 30-year relationship.

To make matters worse, the small business people read of the bail outs through grants and incentives by the federal and provincial governments of various large companies which high tail it out of the country whenever they feel like it. Obviously it does not build the kind of confidence in those small and medium-size entrepreneurs about their role in the marketplace.

Is it not a facade that in the budget and subsequently the economic statement the government has raised the ceilings from $100,000 to $200,000 and then to $250,000? Who is the government trying to kid? Does it think that smoke and mirror game is going to enhance the availability of capital in the hands of small and medium-size entrepreneurs?

As my colleague from Parkdale—High Park said moments ago, you cannot even get a $30,000 loan from the banks. Why should we be in the shell game of raising it from $100,000 to $250,000? There is great applause from the government side because the minister did a great thing.

Without getting into the $200,000 and $250,000 loans that many people cannot get, we should be encouraging those lending institutions to get behind those firms with much smaller loans.

What about providing assistance as previous governments did and try to tackle the problem of limited cash flow to those small businesses in operation or those being created which address the needs of our younger Canadians to get that first break, that first job experience and to have on the job training.

The previous Liberal administration had a program. It helped match those needs in society by going to small businesses. It said that if the firms hired young Canadians to do real jobs, if they were willing to provide that experience, that first break, that on the job training, the government would help with the salary. As an incentive to the employer, the government would kick in partial assistance for the salaries of those young Canadians.

That is money well spent. That is not money thrown at a problem. That is the positive use of government funds to tangibly assist small business meet the payroll. At the same time it gives that first important start to a young Canadian.

Why are we not doing things like that any more? If it is not that program per se, why are we not using the creativity that fuelled that initiative some years ago? Why not think of something along the same lines that would practically and tangibly address the different needs that we, as members of Parliament, are hearing from firms?

As a government and a country why are we not being aggressive in the international marketplace? I and other members have many small and medium-sized firms in our ridings that have bid on jobs along with Japanese and West German firms. They were not in the marketplace because the governments of those firms made our small business applications uncompetitive by virtue of the fact that the firms from my riding bidding on those international contracts simply did not have the back-up support, resources and level of financing from our governments that those same sized firms in West Germany or Japan had from their governments. We were not even in the ballpark.

We also have to just talk about the free trade agreement or the NAFTA and the government pounds its chest saying that we are really moving with the world, that we are talking about the new world order and we have to be competitive. The fact is there has been a hell of a lot more pain endured thanks to the FTA than there have been positive attributes.

When talking about firms competing with other firms, let us be very practical. Let us be in the ballpark and let us support those firms so that they can enter those bids at least with some assistance that is on the same level the other firms receive from their respective governments.

What about stimulating the economy? We have heard many times in this House that the government cannot do this, it cannot do that. It is unprepared to stimulate and spend money and suggests there is no money to spend.

I am not suggesting we become irresponsible with our finances. Do you not think the Americans have a concern with their finances? Do you not think the Japanese are concerned about their fiscal house? Do you think the European Community does not give a hoot about theirs as well? During these tough times, those different jurisdictions have made a concrete decision to try to get business, confidence, investment and spending moving again.

The refusal of this government, the stubborn, dogmatic, persistent refusal to try to stimulate our economy hurts first and foremost the small business sector. In my own riding many of the small businesses are in the trades and construction. Firms that used to employ 80, 90, 100 employees are now down to two or three. Those firms rather than looking to Toronto are looking to eastern Europe to try to build and construct. Firms are looking to Taiwan. Firms say that they are no longer getting jobs and investment opportunities in Ontario or Toronto. The main reason is that the marketplace is dead.

There has to be a recognition of the facts. We cannot hide behind ideology all the time. It has to be realized that to stimulate is not to waste money, but is to induce jobs, to encourage risk, to encourage small business, to hire more people, to increase revenues, to build confidence.

Confidence is one of those ingredients one has difficulty in defining but it is important in getting the economy moving again. We need to place our economy back on track. It cannot be done when people are not confident and do not believe things will get better. That ingredient has been sorely lacking from the economic equation for many years. There is little confidence there because small businesses do not see the signs and signals from the national government that it is prepared to change, that it is prepared not to maintain the status quo, but is prepared to assist and encourage people to take risks again. That is the problem with entrepreneurs. There are not enough risk takers any more because they do not believe it is worth the risk. They are lacking confidence.

Governments have a leadership role, not always to play in that marketplace but to provide that confidence and to provide that incentive and inspiration for those entrepreneurs to be able to take those risks.

While we are supportive of many of the changes in the legislation before us I would like to leave a message with the minister of small businesses. That is we have to go beyond the Small Businesses Loans Act and look at the other elements of the small business equation. We must recognize it is time to go from words in a very good looking brochure and someone's budget to concrete actions in order to give wings to those small and medium-sized firms.

[Translation]

Mr. Nic Leblanc (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, I have a few comments to make on this bill which is about providing assistance to small businesses. Having been a small businessman for many years, I happen to know that the trouble with government subsidies or assistance is mainly that the programs are very complex. The government increases subsidies from $100,000 or $200,000 to $250,000, but overlooks the fact that obtaining access to this program remains extremely complex. The trouble is that the banks that manage these programs are not interested in lending money for this type of business. That is the problem. Why are they not interested? Because it is complicated for them as well. That is the crux of the problem.

Often, financial institutions that lend money to small businesses find that after a while, if the business is in trouble, the government says: "Listen, Mr. Banker, you did not observe our criteria, so the loan is no longer guaranteed". That is the real problem. Actually, the Federal Business Development Bank should manage these programs, perhaps keeping a percentage of the profits as a management fee, instead of trying to transfer the responsibility to the banks. As soon as something goes wrong, the government says it will not guarantee the loan because the criteria were not observed. The basic problem is still the same.

I would like to ask the hon. member who just spoke if he would care to comment.

[English]

Mr. Marchi: Mr. Speaker, the member raises a number of pertinent points. I respect the fact that before coming to this place he was—or perhaps still is—engaged in the field of small business. My father started a small business and maintained it and is now retired.

We have all had some very close experiences with the whole world of small business.

The member talks about the regulations and the fact that perhaps some of them are not very well understood. I just believe that there is a problem with the attitude of our lending institutions and of our national government which is currently in office. That attitude toward small business is one that is not nearly as healthy as it should be. I referred to that in my remarks some moments ago.

However, I believe there is a role for our lending institutions, particularly during the tough economic times that we are experiencing, to be more respectful of the role that they play, to be more respectful of those business clients that they have had for many years. There is a role for a national government to ensure that takes place.

Whenever we suggest that, we get cries from the other side that somehow we are intervening and we are playing in the marketplace and we should not. However, those are the same entrepreneurs who sometimes take that tack and are coming to us and suggesting that governments have to move those lending institutions a little closer to where the need is. I think that attitude in the last number of years in our lending institutions has not helped the recovery of this sagging economy.

I am not suggesting that we get on a campaign to undermine those lending institutions. All I am saying is that those lending institutions have to know that they play a role beyond their commitments to their shareholders and beyond those boards of directors that make up those institutions and that they play a very important variable in the national economic equation. If that variable is not exercised in the best interests of our country then the net output of that equation is not going to be strong. Therefore their business interests are going to be short changed as well.

That is probably the greatest single irritant that we have to cure as a country and as a Parliament. We must certainly meet those aspirations in the small business marketplace that are currently being unaddressed.

NORTHUMBERLAND STRAIT CROSSING ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of Public Works) moved that Bill C-110, an act respecting the Northumberland Strait Crossing, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Departmental envelope.

He said: Mr. Speaker, it gives me a considerable amount of pleasure to deal this afternoon with a subject that is not exactly new to this House of Commons. It had considerable focus back in the 1960s as a matter of fact.

Bill C-110 represents an important element in the process of making it possible to establish a permanent transportation link across the Northumberland Strait joining Prince Edward Island with New Brunswick and the rest of Canada. This is an undertaking that has been talked about, considered and assessed for more than a century. Passage of Bill C-110 will bring the concept of a fixed link one step closer to reality.

The bill sets out the terms and limitations of the subsidy to be provided toward the construction and operation of a bridge. However, it does not in itself guarantee that this project will become a reality. Rather, it is one of the key components of the proposed contractual arrangement that will enable it to proceed.

I am particularly pleased that this huge undertaking is basically a private sector initiative. Since we were first approached with the idea some seven years ago, it has been the policy of our government that if the project were to proceed it should be an undertaking of the private sector and at a cost to the Canadian taxpayers no greater than the over-all cost of continuing the existing ferry service.

Members may know that as a result of a competitive process the government has selected a Canadian consortium, Strait Crossing Incorporated of Calgary. Negotiations are currently underway to finalize the terms of a contractual agreement.

Construction of a bridge to span the nine miles from Borden, P.E.I. to Cape Tormentine, New Brunswick will be one of the largest engineering projects of its type undertaken in this country. To keep it in perspective, there are larger crossings in some other parts of the world. I refer to Lake Pontchartrain in Louisiana, the Sunshine Skyway in Tampa Bay, Florida, the King Fayid causeway in Bahrain and the Pinang Bridge in Malaysia as examples.

The bridge of which we are speaking today will have a positive effect on the economies of Prince Edward Island, New Brunswick and on the entire Atlantic region. Construction will result in a direct expenditure in excess of $800 million. I am reluctant to put a figure on it, but it has been estimated that between 60 per cent and 70 per cent of the labour and industrial benefits will accrue to the Atlantic provinces.

The developer has estimated that during the five-year construction period the project is expected to generate 3,500 person-years of employment. The vast majority of the jobs and materials will be supplied from within Canada and most will come from Atlantic Canada. All in all, the bridge project will increase employment opportunities and enhance the Gross Domestic Product of the region for some significant period of time. In the longer term, the completion of the bridge will enhance P.E.I.'s economy, improve transportation service for its tourism, agriculture, fisheries and related industries.

Our government has worked to ensure that there has been public participation as this project has advanced. The project has been subjected to a full public environmental review in compliance with the government's guidelines. This included the report of an environmental review panel which held public hearings in the region and a subsequent review by a committee of ice experts. The governments of Canada, New Brunswick and P.E.I. are satisfied that the bridge design now being considered meets the relevant environmental criteria.

I have worked closely with the premiers of both Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick on this matter. Last December we signed an agreement between our government and those provinces covering such areas as compensation for ferry workers displaced by a bridge, a contingency fund to deal with potential negative effects on the fishery, and the level of toll rates to be charged, as well as many other vital considerations.

I would be remiss at this time in not acknowledging the role played by Premier Frank McKenna of New Brunswick and particularly former Premier Joe Ghiz of Prince Edward Island. This project would not have advanced to this stage without their active support. They have realized the tremendous economic benefits that both of their provinces should receive from this bridge if it proceeds. I want to thank them at this time for their fairness and co-operation. In my dealings with them, I was tremendously impressed by their valuable counsel and the thorough way that they approached many of the multifaceted areas that required consideration in a way that expressed concern for all the parties involved.

The main feature of our proposed development approach is that the private sector will finance, construct, own, operate and maintain the bridge under a 35-year contribution agreement with the Government of Canada. At the end of the term, ownership of the facility will transfer to the government. The developer will assume all normal construction, operation and maintenance risks. In return, it will receive an annual subsidy from the government. Bill C-110 sets out the terms of the proposed subsidy.

The underlying principle is that the cost to Canadian taxpayers should not exceed the operating and capital costs of the Borden and Cape Tormentine Ferry Service over the next 35 years. The subsidy would be approximately $42 million based on 1992 constant dollars.

The Northumberland Strait fixed link is clearly an idea whose time has come. We have capable private sector proponents ready and willing to take on the task. We have strong support from the two provinces most directly concerned. The economic benefits to the region and to Canada will be substantial. The environmental concerns have been thoroughly studied and to the best of our ability adequate mitigating measures are being taken.

This is a project that will create jobs and will be of great economic benefit to Atlantic Canada without imposing an undue burden on the public purse. With the passage of Bill C-110, the developer, Strait Crossing Incorporated, will be in a position to complete the financing of the project. I am hopeful that we will then be in a position to sign contracts this spring so that construction may commence before the summer.

I hope that all members of the House will support this bill so that we may then proceed with this important national undertaking which would be extremely beneficial to the economy of Atlantic Canada.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier—Auditor General's report; the hon. member for New Westminster—Burnaby—Human rights; the hon. member for North Island—Powell River—Fisheries; the hon. member for Bonavista—Trinity—Conception—Fisheries; the hon. member for Moncton—External Affairs.

• (1630)

Mr. Joe McGuire (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to speak today on Bill C-110 which will have such a great impact on my province of Prince Edward Island and will have a great impact on the maritime provinces in general.

The minister said earlier in his remarks that this legislation is no guarantee that the bridge will be built. I wish he told us exactly what he meant by that remark. As the minister indicated, this particular effort to connect Prince Edward Island to the mainland goes back a long way. It was over 100 years ago, in 1885, when it first came up in a serious way since we joined Confederation. It goes back much earlier than that.

It is a very serious question we are dealing with today in this bill. The Charlottetown Guardian and The Globe and Mail tried to lighten things up a little bit and held a contest to name the bridge. Some names reflected one's prejudices and some were quite humorous. One name submitted to The Globe and Mail was "A Faster Way to Leave New Brunswick Bridge".

The francophone entry to The Globe and Mail was La chaussée vers la patate which roughly translates into "a pathway to potato land". We have that to consider if the bridge is built. One of the entrants to The Guardian was "Coyote Alley". Apparently we are being infiltrated by coyotes lately and this I guess to one person's mind will increase our coyote population on Prince Edward Island. There were some very nice names too, the "Garden Gate Bridge" and the "Northumberland Bridge" and so on.

It seems some people are rightly having a little humour with this particular project. Maybe it is time to lighten up a little bit about it. However because it is probably the biggest engineering project ever in Canada, we have to take it very seriously these days. I know if we had gone with the causeway 30-odd years ago, we would really have some problems today with a stone causeway projecting out into the Northumberland Strait for miles on both sides.

The Northumberland Strait crossing project, or as it is commonly called, the fixed link, is without a doubt the single most important project to be undertaken involving Prince Edward Island since the province joined the Canadian Confederation. It is an issue so monumental in scope and so great in potential for economic and social change, it is difficult to grasp the magnitude of the impact that this project could have on maritime Canada, in particular on Prince Edward Island.

Because of its potential impact, it has been necessary to study this project with considerable intensity. Studied indeed it has been. It is estimated that over 90 studies have been conducted on various aspects of the project, most in the past five or six years.

I have a list of studies which have been done on the Northumberland Strait project since 1987. There have been 55 by Public Works Canada on the Northumberland Strait crossing project itself. Nineteen studies have been done by Public Works Canada for the Northumberland Strait bridge project and the concept assessment supplement supporting documents. FEARO and related reports have done four studies. There were three miscellaneous reports, seven Environment Canada and related documents, and four Strait Crossing Incorporated and related reports.

In the past number of years, over 90 studies have been completed on this particular project. That does not include the days when the causeway was being considered or the days when the tunnel was considered back at the turn of the century and earlier.

Since the time Prince Edward Island became a British colony in 1767, the question of a transportation and communication link to the mainland has been bandied about. From the 1830s onward summer steam vessels and winter ice boats provided a spasmodic kind of service between Prince Edward Island and various points in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick.

When the Charlottetown conference in 1864 was called, it was intended to be a discussion of maritime union. One of the items on the agenda was a transportation and communication link to the mainland. Even though the Charlottetown conference actually gave birth to the concept of Confederation, the issue of P.E.I.'s link was a major consideration in deciding whether the province would or would not join.

As things turned out, P.E.I. did not join in 1864 and discussions continued on the terms under which we would become a part of Canada. The issue of a transportation and communication link continued to be a major factor in the decision-making process.

When Prince Edward Island finally became a province of Canada in the spring of 1873, one of the terms of Confederation dealt with the link. In it Canada assumed a constitutional obligation to provide a continuous connection to the mainland. The terms of union clause reads:

> That the Dominion Government shall assume and defray all the charges for the following services; vis., efficient steam service for the conveyance of mails and passengers to be established and maintained between the island and the mainland of the Dominion winter and summer, thus placing the island in continuous communication with the intercolonial railroad and the railroad system of the Dominion.

We have to be careful with that particular condition of entry into Confederation. In the Minister of Finance's economic and fiscal statement of December 2, 1992 there was a paragraph on page 28 that said:

> In addition, the federal government will commit to the construction of a fixed crossing to P.E.I., if the province recognizes that the facility meets Canada's constitutional obligation. To demonstrate this commitment the government will facilitate advanced engineering and environmental work.

This is if we agree to write off the constitutional obligation.

> The project, expected to begin in the spring, will generate up to 3,500 person-years of employment over a five-year construction period. Roughly 70 per cent of the estimated $800-$900 million project cost will be spent in Atlantic Canada.

I am happy to say that the condition which was laid out has since been withdrawn, if I am not mistaken. I believe some people got carried away with the fact that the bridge would be built and forever Canada would have washed its hands of its constitutional obligations. With some vigilant negotiation that has been dropped as a proposal.

During the first years that P.E.I. was a province this so-called continuous service continued to be provided by steam vessel and ice boat. In 1885 the idea of a tunnel under Northumberland Strait was proposed. This was supposed to ensure year-round communication. The tunnel concept was studied and analysed off and on for the next 30 years but never really got beyond that stage.

In 1917-18 the advent of ice-breaking ferries put the tunnel and the concept of a fixed link to rest until the mid-1950s. In 1966 construction was actually begun on a bridge-causeway combination. Access roads were built but before work on the actual bridge-causeway got started the project was scrapped. That is when the province of P.E.I. signed a development agreement with the federal government in lieu of continuing with the bridge-causeway concept.

The latest round of discussions began with the public works study in 1982. This was followed by unsolicited public and private sector bids. A major Public Works Canada feasibility study took place in 1987-88 and further bids were solicited during that time.

This brings us to 1988 and the move by the Government of Prince Edward Island to consult the population on whether or not they wanted a fixed link to the mainland. On January 18, 1988 Islanders voted. The results were 60 per cent in favour of the link and 40 per cent opposed. Prior to the vote, then Premier Ghiz wrote to the public works minister, Stewart McInnis. November 6, 1987 was the actual date of the letter. In his letter Mr. Ghiz, on behalf of the Government of P.E.I. indicated that support for the link was contingent upon the satisfactory address of 10 principles. These 10 principles had to do with highways, the Woods Island ferry, the submerged lands, tolls and how they would be arrived at, the displaced workers at Borden-Cape Tormentine, economic development for the town of Borden, the Atlantic content in the materials which would be used and the labour required, an environmental impact study, the fisheries which was very important to Prince Edward Island, and the utilities. That was the utility corridor to be used at no cost to the province.

These 10 points have been addressed to the satisfaction of both Premier McKenna and Premier Ghiz. A short time ago they signed an agreement with the three levels of government addressing all of these problems. Whether or not they have been addressed adequately, it was adequate enough for the two premiers and the federal government.

In the fall of 1992 Mr. Ghiz in his capacity as premier signed a federal-provincial agreement, along with Premier McKenna of New Brunswick and the federal Minister of Public Works. This signature indicated that he was satisfied that all 10 of P.E.I.'s concerns had been addressed. This has assured me and most Islanders that in the opinion of the province of Prince Edward Island, the premier of New Brunswick and the federal government, every reasonable measure has been taken to ensure that this project was environmentally, economically and socially acceptable.

On the list of concerns the environment has moved to the fore. In fact the environment was always one of the main concerns of building a fixed link of any sort across the Northumberland Strait. To show environmental compliance the following clauses are included in the federal–provincial agreement. I think these clauses are extremely important and I will quote them in their entirety. Clause 6(1) reads:

> Public participation in the federal Environmental Assessment and Review Process, commonly known as EARP, was undertaken to the satisfaction of Canada, P.E.I., and New Brunswick.
> Canada through its Department of Fisheries and Oceans, Environment Canada, and Transport Canada, in conjunction with the provinces of P.E.I. and New Brunswick had deemed that a fixed crossing can be constructed in an environmentally acceptable manner.

Clause 6(2) reads:

> The construction and operation of the fixed crossing shall comply with the environmental laws, regulation, and relevant environmental codes of practice of the provinces of New Brunswick and P.E.I. and the government of Canada, as well as other specific requirements identified by means of the evaluation conducted under the federal Environmental Assessment and Review Process.

Clause 6(3) reads:

As a condition to the coming into effect of this agreement and prior to financial closing, the developer must obtain the necessary approvals under provincial and applicable federal environmental assessment legislation and complete an environmental management plan acceptable to Canada, New Brunswick, P.E.I. and the province of Nova Scotia.

The inclusion of these three clauses in the federal–provincial agreement to proceed with construction of the fixed link is extremely important. It tells us that all three governments have agreed that the environmental studies conducted to this juncture are more than adequate to ensure that any potential environmental difficulty has been mitigated to the point where we can proceed without undue concern.

Environmental concerns have been the most pervasive of any reservation that people have had about the construction of the link. Consequently much of the study of the proposed link has been devoted to these environmental concerns.

Back in January 1989 the federal government appointed a panel to review the equity, environmental, social and economic impacts of the project. Public Works Canada published a bridge concept proposal which attempted to address all the environmental aspects of the project.

During the summer of 1989 the review panel held some focus sessions in communities in P.E.I. and New Brunswick to determine whether the information base was sound enough to proceed to public hearings. Later that year Public Works Canada published a supplement to the bridge concept assessment so that the review panel would have more information with which to work.

In March 1990, 12 federal public hearings were held in order to provide people with an opportunity to present their views on the project. Approximately 150 groups and individuals took advantage of the opportunity provided.

In August, the FEARO panel published a report which contained suggestions for proceeding with an environmentally acceptable project. One of the major concerns expressed by the panel dealt with ice and ice–out delays in the strait if a bridge were to be built.

Nothing more than a two–day delay would be acceptable. That is a two–day delay over a 100–year period. Environment Canada responded to these concerns by appointing a committee of ice experts to study the impact of a bridge on ice–out time in the strait in the spring.

This was done in November 1991. The committee reported in April 1992 and concluded: "A bridge which meets the criteria for ice delay established by the FEARO panel can be installed across the Northumberland Strait".

In May 1991, the Minister of Public Works announced that developers were invited to resubmit their proposals for the project. These proposals would then be evaluated against the government's financial criteria and the environmental requirements outlined in the federal government's response to the FEARO panel report.

The result of this process was that the company Strait Crossing Incorporated, commonly known as SCI, won the bid. Although SCI has been chosen as the company which will build the fixed crossing, it has yet to enter into a contractual agreement with Public Works Canada. The company had to develop a financial plan and an environmental management plan before moving to the contractual stage.

Since the financial plan is a matter between the company and the government, and since at this stage it is not a subject of great debate, I would like to devote my attention to the area which has been of great concern and the focal point of the arguments against the link.

SCI submitted its financial management plan on December 21. In January the company took the plan on the road and held nine public meetings so that it could explain the situation and the environmental management plan, determine the areas of concern in the public sector and give itself the opportunity to address these concerns in the final draft of the plan.

Opponents of the fixed crossing publicly expressed their dissatisfaction and labelled the hearings a sham, a failure of due process and a superficial treatment of the environmental issues.

Each of these meetings was attended by hundreds of concerned citizens from P.E.I., Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. The meetings lasted until every question raised was dealt with. However some of the critics did not see fit to attend any of the meetings.

I will deal with opposition to the link a little later. It seems that there is a group of opponents who fall into the category: If my mind is made up, do not confuse me with the facts".

The purpose of the environmental management plan is to manage and mitigate potential impacts throughout the life of the project. Protection measures recommended by the Federal Environmental Assessment Review Panel are also incorporated into the plan.

As well, any contractor would have to comply with all existing environmental laws, regulations, guidelines, standards, permits, approvals and authorizations. Without going into detail, the protection part of the plan deals with environmental protection procedures for activities such as clearing up the areas and disposal of the debris; road preparation; building and crossing streams, marshes and other environmentally sensitive areas; blasting and filling in quarries and related activities; dredging and disposal of material; disposing of sewage and other waste material, handling and storing hazardous materials and the movement of equipment and vessels.

In addition, there are continuous measures for dealing with events such as fuel spills, fires and vessel accidents.

After the more than 90 studies done for the fixed crossing, after the environmental management plan has been submitted, after the federal government and the governments of New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island have indicated their satisfaction, I believe that most of these environmental concerns will be met.

However, there is a court case scheduled to be heard during the first week of March. The pointed issue here is whether or not an adequate environmental study has been completed. The complainants, the Friends of the Island, indicated in a press conference on February 4, 1993, that they are willing to drop the case if any of the three options are pursued. The options are to debate the bridge in the P.E.I. legislature, hold another plebiscite or go through another environmental review process.

At this point, I want to quote from an editorial in The Guardian of February 6: "What message are we left with? For years now, Friends of the Island have been playing Chicken Little, moaning about the potential environmental horrors of a bridge to New Brunswick. Judging by the options laid out by the group, any environmental concerns will be addressed by a blast of hot air in the P.E.I. legislature. The message is the environmental concerns are a mask for a political agenda that has no popular support in 1993".

• (1650)

There seems to be a lot of back-pedalling by the Friends of the Island in issuing those three conditions. However, the bottom line is that the case is still scheduled to be heard in March and whatever the decision, we will have to live with it.

All along, Islanders felt that if we were going to do this project, then we should do it right. This structure will be permanent. It will be there for a long, long time.

Some believe it has not been done right. The judgment of the two provinces and the federal government is that they have done it right. We will see if this House of Commons agrees at committee stage that it has been done right. We will also have to wait for the Supreme Court case to see if it also believes that it has been done right.

There are some people who are fundamentally and philosophically opposed to the idea of connecting P.E.I. to the mainland. No amount of effort, no amount of study and no amount of delay is going to change these people's attitudes. They just do not want a link of any kind.

Cathy Edwards was one of the members of the federally appointed environmental assessment and review panel that tabled this report in August 1990.

At an anti-link rally in April 1991 spokesmen for the Friends of the Island referred to "the greatest single issue the province would face in this century". They also spoke of the role of passion in the debate of the issue.

This is what Cathy Edwards was quoted as saying: "It has been a precarious journey with the island hanging in the balance. Maybe ice is not the issue at all. We can do something about ice. It is called mitigation. I doubt that there are mitigating measures for the heart. The heart has its own reasons".

"I doubt there are mitigating measures for the heart. The heart has its own reasons". There in a nutshell is an eloquent yet concise statement of fact that underlies the opposition to this project. There are people who are opposed and will continue to oppose any form of fixed link to the mainland. They will do so as a matter of emotion and as a matter of the heart. Nothing anyone can say or do will change their minds. No orators, no scientists, no engineers, no matter how many, no matter how great their reputations and no matter what array of facts, figures and scientific arguments are presented will ever change their minds.

When Premier Ghiz put forward his so-called 10 commandments or 10 conditions that would have to be met before he would agree to support the link, they said: "The feds will never meet these 10 conditions. Let us base our opposition on that".

When the 10 conditions were met, this issue was dropped and new grounds for opposition were dredged up. There was the idea that a bridge would cause an ice buildup so huge that it would take half the summer to melt and thus cause all kinds of other problems. The opponents used that argument.

When a panel of internationally acclaimed ice experts debunked that theory, it was dropped and a new argument took its place. When asked if they would cease to oppose if a second plebiscite was held and the results supported the bridge, the answer was: "No. We will never go away". This small group of opponents to the bridge will always be with us. For them it is an issue of the heart and no logic will dissuade them.

However, there are people who raise concerns of a material and practical nature. There are two main issues involved. They are the possible damage to the fishery in the strait area and the fate of the Marine Atlantic employees who will be displaced when the ferry service ceases its operation.

SCI has moved to address the fisheries question. The company has established a $10 million fund for fisheries compensation. It is left to be determined whether this amount of money will be sufficient.

This fund is to be overseen by a fisheries liaison committee headed by Fisheries and Oceans Canada. Local fishermen's associations and unions will be represented on this committee. However, the ultimate responsibility for addressing any problem which might arise in the fishery must remain with the federal government.

There are several questions which must be addressed. Who will determine the level of compensation for the fishery if there is damage? How long a compensation term will be considered? Will the area of compensation include the whole strait or just an area adjoining the bridge?

I congratulate P.E.I.'s new premier, Catherine Callbeck, on her success. This position automatically makes her the premier of Prince Edward Island, succeeding Mr. Ghiz who resigned after serving 10 years as party leader, including six very successful years as premier.

One of Mr. Ghiz's final acts as premier was to sign the federal-provincial agreement on what is officially known as the Northumberland Strait Crossing Project.

Mr. Ghiz has just been appointed dean of the law school at Dalhousie University and I congratulate him on that appointment.

Premier Callbeck has indicated that she is also a strong supporter of the fixed link. However she has also expressed some concern about the fishery and the ferry workers. In the past week the premier has written to the Minister of Public Works outlining these concerns and requesting an immediate resolution to outstanding issues in these two areas.

I want to reiterate my concerns with regard to the fisheries compensation package as well as to indicate that a ferry workers compensation committee must also be struck as soon as possible. As with the fishing committee, the ferry workers compensation committee is also the responsibility of the federal government. The 500 to 600 employees of Marine Atlantic have entitlements. If one looks back into the not too distant past one will find the total abandonment of the railway in Newfoundland, a total abandonment of the railway in P.E.I. as well as the partial abandonment of the railways in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia. Settlements with displaced workers in these areas have provided precedents for the kind of settlements to which Marine Atlantic workers are entitled.

I do not think we can underestimate the positive economic impact that a fixed link would have on Prince Edward Island. Everything indicates that if we are to improve or even maintain our standard of living we must also become more self-sufficient. We must have a greater degree of economic independence and we must become more competitive.

An improved transportation system is crucial to our becoming more competitive. Whether it is for our manufacturers or processing sectors, our agricultural sector, our fishing industry or our tourism, we have to keep costs down if we are going to be competitive. Economic activity will grow not only during construction, but in the years afterward. The link will generate industrial expansion and create jobs. The link will generate growth and tourism and create jobs.

P.E.I. has a desperate need for meaningful, full-time jobs. There will never be an opportunity as great as this one we now have within our grasp. The successful completion of the fixed link is vital to the future of Prince Edward Island.

Let us hope that all parties have done their homework properly.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have an opportunity to speak about Bill C-110 this afternoon. However, I regret to say in the opening of my remarks that I think it is the ultimate double-cross of the people of Prince Edward Island, New Brunswick, the maritimes and of Canada generally because this government is on the record as saying it is committed to sustainable development, yet not too long ago it passed the new environmental assessment legislation in this House.

I really felt it did commit this House. Although I voted against it because I thought it was inadequate, I still thought that it was a good intention by members of Parliament to indicate where we were going on environmental assessment.

However, I do not think that anyone who has followed the cabinet's guideline order since 1984 and its tortuous movement through the courts of this country all the way to the Supreme Court of Canada can be anything other than deeply hurt today to see Bill C-110 being passed with the quiet acquiescence of the Liberal Party. Apparently it openly supports it if that is the only speaker we are going to hear. There is also the support of the Conservatives on that side of the House.

This is an abusive process. I intend this afternoon to lay out precisely how bad the abusive process is and who the critical players are. Keep in mind that Strait Crossing Inc., SCI as it is called, is the same group of promoters and developers from Calgary that have been involved in the Oldman River dam. That involved the destruction of 38 kilometres of an internationally recognized river system for a highly questionable project. It was finally forced by the courts back into a second environmental assessment and review process where the number one recommendation was to decommission the dam.

The government only accepted the recommendations following that and none of them have been lived up to by the government. This was an abusive process that flew right in the face of the Supreme Court of Canada.

This project contained in Bill C-110 has never been approved by an environmental assessment process in this country. It is a hoax to hear the Liberal member from Egmont and the Minister of Public Works rise in this House and use very carefully crafted language to suggest to the people of Canada that this project was ever legally, legitimately, morally, ethically or properly approved through any kind of an environmental assessment process. The environmental assessment process said no to the generic crossing proposal. It went before this non-peer reviewed, non-public hearing group of so-called ice experts and now the government claims: "Oh well, everything is fine now; we can just forge on ahead".

I think my credentials in following the fixed link go back quite a way. My great grandfather James Stewart was the premier of Prince Edward Island. This was talked about in the family when he was the premier of Prince Edward Island. That side of the family has talked about it for the better part of a century. On the other side of my family, my great-grandfather Peter Mitchell was the premier of New Brunswick at the time of Confederation. That side of the family has talked about this so-called missing link since this country began. The country has been well served by the marine ferry service back and forth.

We listened with care on this side to the Minister of Public Works when he said that this is a private sector project. That is a crock, Mr. Speaker. You and I know it. The government plans to give $42 million a year in fixed 1992 dollars to this corporation, 70 per cent of which is owned outside of Canada in the United States and Britain. No one wants to talk about that.

I looked back through press clippings and noticed that as recently as 1990 this project was touted throughout the maritimes as $600 million. By 1991 it was $700 million. By 1992 it was $800 million. The minister in his remarks was talking $800 million. But when you open the bill, and I hope Canadians read it, it says $42 million in inflation protected 1992 dollars for the next 35 years. I am sorry to the government and to the Liberals, but I can multiply. That comes to $1.47 billion if you keep it at 1992 fixed inflation protected dollars. It has risen from $600 million to $1.5 billion in two years.

Who is in this consortia? This is a private sector driven project, but they have driven their snouts right into the trough. This is double. The Auditor General should be looking back through the marine accounts right now. The Government of Canada is only giving $21 million and a little bit more to the ferry connection to P.E.I. right now. How does it suddenly leap? Here we get a 100 per cent leap of faith to $42 million times 35 years. And what will we inherit if this monstrosity is built? Thirty-five years from now we know it will be a rusting hulk hanging out there over the water. Anyone who has driven across the Lion's Gate Bridge, the Golden Gate Bridge, the Fauna Bridge or any of these other bridges knows if you are near salt water the concrete is going to decompose. The steel superstructure, all of the superstructure and the asphalt is all going to disintegrate.

So the minister says that is wonderful. It will be fully amortized after 35 years and we Canadians will get to inherit a rusting hulk when it is hitting its critical years for reconstruction. The most you can get out of a bridge of this kind on planet earth in a high energy atmosphere is a century. No one has even lived that long to find out if that is true.

We will inherit a rusting hulk, all the debt and all the maintenance problems. The minister, whom I like dearly, tells us in this House that this is a private sector project. This makes me want to vomit. Every single voter in Prince Edward Island should be infuriated at the kind of hoax that is being perpetrated and perpetuated on the floor of this House. People in New Brunswick should be livid that this kind of crap is being hornswoggled around in the House of Commons and jammed at the people of the maritimes. I think they should be outraged and they should throw every single member of Parliament out who has anything to do with this because it is a hoax.

This has never been environmentally assessed. There are these so-called ice experts but that is not the only ground upon which this project was turned down. Let us look at some of the material. Let us look at what the minister's colleague, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans said publicly. He said if the fishermen opposed the project he would have it blocked. Well, let me read from a fax I received today from Buck Watts, the president of the P.E.I. Fishermen's Association. This resolution was duly passed less than a month ago in Charlottetown. It states: "The P.E.I. Fishermen's Association is opposed to the construction of a bridge to the mainland until further and more appropriate environmental study has taken place. We suggest an environmental review panel as advocated by the group Friends of the Island".

Where is the minister of fisheries? He promised the bridge would be blocked if they opposed it. Of course that is along the way. Somebody speaks out and you just throw a little bit of political oil on the waters I suppose. In 1990 the scientists in maritime Canada said: "No higher fishing quotas". This same minister of fisheries overrode that and increased the quota allowance by 50 per cent. In 1993 we have no cod fishery.

Are these the politicians we are supposed to trust when they say the ice-out is not going to be a problem? Where are these four scientists? Why were they not peer reviewed? Are you going to go to some bum down the street because he says he is good at doing open heart surgery? Give me a break. This is crap. It is time people in this House started to stand up for the truth.

The Conservatives say this is going to bring lots of benefits to Prince Edward Island. What about the studies that have been done in P.E.I. that say it will be a net loss of $1 billion to P.E.I.?

The member for Egmont says: "Oh, well, those people there just have concerns from the heart. They are just a little group. They do not even know what is going on". I have many relatives in P.E.I. They are not opposing this bridge concept because of concerns of the heart. They know it is a crock. There will be fewer jobs. This is corporate welfare of the very worst kind. They have come up with the proposal. I know what the sworn affidavits say. I know they were pushing this back in the early 1980s.

In 1985 three unsolicited proposals arrived here in Ottawa. People in the maritimes do not believe in Tinkerbell any more. We know that in January 1987 the project was actually put forward by Public Works Canada. It became the locomotive. It started dragging this monstrosity around the maritimes.

I have already gone through the figures and the level of inflation within the figures. I think anyone in Canada would understand that I oppose this project on good grounds. I think many people have come to realize this very wealthy group of corporate promoters plans to pin the tail on the donkey. They see the public purse as the donkey and say: "Let us pin the tail on the donkey and we will make ourselves rich forever more. It is $42 million a year, consumer price index protected, protected against inflation forever more. In 35 years, the moment it is a rusty monster, we will just turn it back to the taxpayers of Canada".

If this were to continue as a marine ferry service it would maintain more good jobs. Last year out of 13,000 sailings only five were even delayed. This government has been undermining the marine ferry service for years by refusing to provide new equipment, refusing to upgrade the docking facilities, refusing to do what we do in British Columbia. There we try to make tourists and passengers happy while they are waiting for a ferry. We sell them a hot dog, give them a cup of coffee, let them buy some local goods, have a few people playing guitars, give them newspapers and have a little fun.

Good grief. I remember the last time I tried to cross from New Brunswick to Prince Edward Island. Treat the public decently. Give the corporation a little bit of money instead of starving it. The government has been trying to make it a self-fulfilling prophecy so people will say: "Good grief, we have to get rid of the ferry service. It is terrible. We have to have the bridge. We never realized it before, but we have to have the bridge". What a crock.

Whatever became of the tunnel? We now know it would have been cheaper. In terms of environmental impact we know that subterranean tunnels in almost all locations where they have been used are almost environmentally benign because they go below the ocean in the dry zone. Then you can shock treat the walls. You can put in lighting. You can put in breathing apparatus. If there has to be a fixed link, why was that removed from the terms of reference of the FEARO process? Why was the tunnel not reviewed? Well, we know this little cadre of government friends wanted the bridge concept. It has been corporate driven. It has been bridge-concept driven and it has been driven straight to the public taxpayer's wallet and this is a crock.

Mark my words. I predict the Supreme Court of Canada will come down much more harshly on this project than on the Oldman River dam. It will not be amused and in fact will be downright angry with the government after all of the legal proceedings on the Rafferty-Alameda on the Oldman and all the shenanigans in Quebec about James Bay II. It is going to be pretty damned angry to put it mildly, with due respect, with this kind of jiggery-pokery, end-running and hoax playing that has been going on from the government benches.

Let us have a look. I have dealt with the Minister of Public Works and the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. What about the Minister of the Environment? Right now in his office his knees are probably trembling and his spine dripping mustard coloured sweat because we know what has been going on. He wrote to me and threw in the towel on March 10, 1992. He said: "The requirements of the EARP have been fully satisfied with respect to that proposal". Well, in February, a few days before he wrote this letter Environment Canada gave sworn evidence to the FEARO panel that on the cumulative impacts, "this matter has not been addressed to the satisfaction of Environment Canada".

That is his department. Ministers are supposed to stand up for their departments. A cosy deal is going on in cabinet. The promoters are here from Calgary, London and Houston and they are saying: "Look, we have been waiting for a decade to build this damned bridge. Just give us the money. Forget about your voters. Forget about the taxpayers. Get over to the mint and give us $1.5 billion. Who are you guys anyway?" Joe Ghiz and Premier McKenna are trembling. Well, what about the fisheries at about $100 million a year? We know how it has been savaged by political incompetence and neglect on the east coast. It is just now occurring on the west coast. We know what happened to the Great Lakes. We know about tioxide in the Gulf of St. Lawrence and the St. Lawrence.

What about the lobster fishery? What about the groundfish? What about the migration back and forth of the invertebrates? The reason for the concern about the two-day delay in ice movement is all temperature related. This was not plucked out of the air by some airy-fairy scientist. It is based on critical, known, scientific, peer review data. It is not the B.S. that has been coming from the cabinet.

The courts are going to be extremely angered by this kind of approach. The Environmental Assessment Act must now be seen in this light. People who are concerned about the environment and sustainable development now know the government's intention to politically manipulate the new Environmental Assessment Act is demonstrated by what it is doing today.

The likelihood of the Liberals ever standing up for the Environmental Assessment Act is dashed today because it is cowardly to rise in this House and not stand up for the laws that are passed in here.

It is just tom-foolery to say: "Oh, this is going to help our constituents. It is going to mean more tourism and we are going to be able to move potatoes more quickly and all these things are going to be great". Studies have been done in all these sectors that have never been given the opportunity to be assessed by a public review panel under federal law. Those who travel around the maritimes saying: "Oh, it has had an environmental assessment" should also add "and it was turned down". No one seems to give a damn any more and it infuriates me.

There are three ministers of the Crown. The Minister of the Environment threw in the towel, ran away and is hiding in his office. The Minister of Fisheries and Oceans told the fishermen: "If you do not like it and you tell me you do not like it, I will block it". Well, they said they do not like it and he will not block it. The Minister of Public Works, through some kind of corporate infection that apparently has no treatment other than defeat electorally, has been driven to approve this project and bring it before this House. It is an incredible embarrassment to this country that it has been done.

How did big money do this? It is a very primitive plan and let me run through it quickly. First, hunt around for a project that has some public support but do not ever let the public get a clear focus on it, particularly its costs and the alternatives to it. Second, identify a few key spokespersons who appear to represent large sectors potentially affected by the project and keep them oiled well. Third, make sure the taxpayer pays the full shot for everything including the decommissioning of the project. That has been done in spades with this project.

The only silver lining in all of this is that we went through this exercise in this Chamber in the mid-1960s. The approaches for either side of this notorious project were begun in 1966 and the plug was ultimately pulled. Money was voted forward, property was expropriated and so on.

We know that these sorts of things tend to repeat themselves. We know that for more than a century generations of maritime politicians have made their careers on the back of the fixed link. It has always been the missing link to their electoral success just as sightings of the sasquatch have been in British Columbia.

To have manipulated the public in those two provinces, to have manipulated the law so crudely and so vulgarly is delinquent and perhaps worse. I think the courts are going to have something to say about that. I am proud there are Canadians who have not been brow-beaten by their neighbours and are willing to take this kind of matter before the courts.

I would like to quote briefly from one member of the council, Mark Freiman, who points out quite clearly what the problem is. He writes: "Bill C-110 seeks to authorize and so that it is also aware of just how many important environmental issues have either not been addressed or have been ducked up to this point. Even those who favour the idea of a fixed link between P.E.I. and the mainland should be made aware that the government has not abided by its own guidelines", and he goes on.

With that in mind and knowing that the government's intention is to have this matter sent to a legislative committee, I move:

> That the motion be amended by deleting all the words after the word "That" and substituting the following therefor:
> Bill C-110, an act respecting the Northumberland Strait crossing be not now read a second time but that the order be discharged, the bill withdrawn and the subject matter thereof referred to the Standing Committee on the Environment.

I do this knowing that the environmental side of this issue has been buried and hidden from all Canadians and there is a sense of urgency.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. Having tabled a motion for amendment the hon. member does not have the floor now.

[Translation]

The Chair will take the motion for amendment submitted by the hon. member for Skeena under advisement.

Ten minutes for questions and comments. The hon. member for Longueuil.

Mr. Nic Leblanc (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, the minister said earlier that it would cost $800 million to build this bridge. I have some serious doubts because I know a bridge across the St. Lawrence cost close to $1 billion. We are talking about a bridge that would be about 13 kilometres long. It would be built where ice and currents are a problem. I doubt very much that it would cost only $800 million.

Through the hon. member who just spoke, I would like to ask the minister a question. I find it hard to understand how a company could take sole responsibility for the construction of this bridge without having guarantees. Could the minister inform the House whether the company has any guarantees from the federal government in case it goes bankrupt or fails to cover its costs? Is the government going to pay for all the project evaluations? Will it do research for the company? How much is this going to cost? This is important, because we are talking about 35 years. The government is committing itself to paying $42 million per year for 35 years. That is a lot of money.

• (1720)

I wonder whether the company will be able to survive that long without guarantees that the government will subsidize this project to the tune of who knows how many millions of dollars. With all due respect for the people of Prince Edward Island, there are only 127,000 people living there. We have to consider the number of inhabitants in relation to what is being spent here. The government is committed to paying about $1.360 million per year, for 35 years, just for a bridge. We on Montreal's south shore were rather taken aback by this announcement, because we have been trying to get $75 million for Highway 30 for the past 10 years. And for the past five or six years we have been trying to get $80 million to build a tunnel under the St. Lawrence, but nobody is listening. We have 350,000 people living on Montreal's south shore. I mean, it is rather unusual to see the government getting involved in such a major project for a population of 127,000.

I agree with the hon. member for Skeena who just said that the environmental impact should be given further study before a start is made on such a major project. I therefore support the hon. member for Skeena and his demands for an in-depth study of the environmental impact before construction is started on a bridge of this size.

[English]

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, I am glad to answer on behalf of the minister who I am sure would give the same one I am about to give. That is that the government has provided that titanium credit card to the SCI consortia in terms of its expenditures and its ability to raise the capital from the banks or where ever it likes. It is guaranteed $42 million a year for 35 years in inflation protected 1992 dollars. That is $1.47 billion in 1992 dollars. I hope the media will stop calling it a $600 million, a $700 million, an $800 million, or $1 billion bridge because the company is getting $1.47 billion.

Perhaps of greater concern is the overrun and I refer to a very excellent paper done by Friends of the Island. On page 13 they point out that SCI's completion bond will only cover up to 25 per cent of the overrun. Not only do the taxpayers get the bridge back, we get the honour of paying for it totally. We get the honour of getting it back once it is a rusting hulk to have to rebuild it, plus SCI's completion bond will only cover 25 per cent of the overrun, keeping in mind that it began at $600 million. It has already gone up $900 million in two years before one shovelful of sand has been moved. It did not go up 100 per cent. It has gone up 150 per cent in price before it has even moved off the drawing board.

In an article in Policy Options Professor Peter G. C. Townley concluded that: "It is important for decision makers to understand that the economic viability of a fixed link has not been established".

My friend is quite correct. These are the kinds of questions that need to be addressed in this debate. I have a few minutes to respond to the other questions he raised.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Other members want to raise questions with the hon. member for Skeena.

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, I would like to take the opportunity to agree with my colleague from Skeena on the reasons for blocking this bill. I think it is another testament of the kind of scurrilous activity in this House on the environmental assessment review process.

I would like to ask the hon. member to expand on some of the other reasons that we oppose this project.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for Saanich—Gulf Islands for the question.

It is important that Canadians have some understanding of some of the other implicit costs. I quote again from the paper "Against the Bridge":

> Maintenance costs of the bridge will be high. Public Works Canada calculations that justify the bridge subsidy do not take into account bridge maintenance. The Gardiner Expressway in Toronto costs $1 million per mile each year to maintain, with exposure to salt occurring only a few weeks a year. Additionally, the elevated road is serviced by land, not water. A bridge in Jutland, Denmark operating in conditions much less stressful than the Northumberland Strait has cost more in maintenance than the original construction price.

That is precisely why we are supposed to have full, proper environmental assessment and review procedures: to look at all of the social, environmental and precisely project related implications.

If anything can come out of today's debate it is important that a focus come back to what is being done in terms of an end run on the taxpayer. The most malicious end run, of course, is on the people of Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick. The generic bridge concept that went before the environmental assessment and review process was turned down. That needs to be kept very clear in people's minds.

What ultimately happened with the Oldman River dam has not yet occurred in this case. This bridge has not been built yet. What occurred with the Oldman River dam was that the legal arm of government ultimately found that the dam should be decommissioned and taken down. This was after it had been built at a gigantic cost to the taxpayers principally of Alberta by this same company.

Let us keep in mind that it is the same company, the same consortia which has these visions in the light of these projects that the private sector would never do. It knows how to shilly-shally and dilly-dally and lobby. It knows how to do all these things to get through to government. It gets government caucuses rolling. It gets people rolling. It gets promoters rolling. It oils the wheels and goes straight to the public trough to build these monstrosities.

The bridge is not necessary. There is perfectly adequate, quality service between the two provinces. That is the constitutional requirement.

How is it that costs are paid by the Government of Canada according to the Auditor General at $21 million per year and the consortia now says it needs more per year? The government did not want to promise something that was going to cost more than the ferry service. Therefore, it would not say that the ferry service cost $42 million a year, but it would say that $42 million a year was all that it was going to pay to the consortia, inflation protected for 35 years.

That is pretty close to what is found in the Criminal Code. This is supposed to be the highest court of the land. We are supposed to make carefully thought out, reasoned judgments on legislation. I think any clear-thinking member of this House would agree.

Here is a project that has never been assessed as required by law in Canada, as required by the legislation we passed in this House. It has not yet been proclaimed but that is the intent of this House. We should vote to send this legislation to the environment committee where we can begin the long slow process of uncovering the truth. Canadians deserve that.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I declare the amendment moved by the hon. member for Skeena is in order. The debate is now on the amendment.

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, I understand we are debating the amendment put forward. It ties in partly to where the Liberal Party is coming from with respect to Bill C-110. We have to keep it in perspective that we are talking about a fixed link. It conjures up all kinds of ideas as to just exactly what is a fixed link and what its impact is going to be. We have to recognize that it is a bridge.

Bridges have existed on this planet since the time the first tree fell over a creek and formed a bridge. I do not think we have the proper perspective as we analyze this situation. It is simply a bridge. We have been building bridges for years.

• (1730)

We have built bridges for the obvious reason of connecting one part of the country to another. We have an obligation to Prince Edward Island, to New Brunswick and to Nova Scotia to have a transportation link that functions and functions properly.

With that in mind, we in the Liberal Party have supported the fixed link for years. I probably should not admit this but when my mother was the member of Parliament for Moncton she turned the first sod in 1965 for the ramps to the bridge. Since that time construction has been a little slow and it has not really manifested itself in the way we had hoped in 1965.

The time for talk in large measure about whether or not a fixed link is necessary has now passed. A plebiscite has been held in Prince Edward Island. Sixty per cent of the people are supportive of the fixed link. I conducted a referendum and a study in my own riding, and 67 per cent of people in the Moncton riding are supportive of the particular project.

As I look at it, and I am saying this on behalf of the Liberal Party, we support sending Bill C-110 to committee. Whether it is the environment committee or another is not as important to us as keeping the project going. We support it going to committee. There are some questions that still have to be dealt with and there are problems with the environment.

Quite frankly we are disappointed in the way the government has handled the whole project. It has had eight years to get the project on the go and to do something with it. The project should have been started a number of years ago. This government should have done a full environmental assessment of the project in general. Since the time of ascertaining that this bridge consortium should be approved, it should have done an environmental assessment of the particular project.

We are of the view that assessment should still be done. We have not changed our position in that respect. At the same time we are most supportive of the project, the concept and this particular bridge. In large measure it seems to serve the needs. We want this legislation before committee so that all those affected by the particular project will have an opportunity to have their say and at the same time give a full airing of the different environmental and job security matters associated with it.

We have heard comments today about the number of studies that have been done. My hon. colleague from Egmont has listed 90-odd studies with respect to a fixed link. The number of studies with respect to the bridge are somewhat limited. This is why we are supportive of the concept of a full environmental assessment.

There are also other confidence building factors which call upon us to support the project. Former Premier Ghiz had 10 points which had to be met. In them were environmental assurances that the project would not be damaging. Premier Ghiz, as he then was and now dean of the law school at Dalhousie University, has said that he is satisfied. He has put his name to the document that starts this process.

Premier McKenna of the province of New Brunswick has had strong concerns about the environment and the direction that we as a country and we in New Brunswick as a province should take. He has been supportive of environmental concerns. He too has put his signature to the document that starts the process.

Liberals are hoping for a full, fair and frank discussion of the issues before a committee that will take a look at the environment. We recognize that this is probably the only fishing area left in Atlantic Canada. We have seen the destruction of the fishery in Newfoundland, in much of the gulf region and along some of the coast of Nova Scotia. The fishery in Northumberland Strait is one of the strongest. It is in the best shape and is the only viable fishery left on the east coast. Therefore we do not want to take any chances with respect to that fishery. We want to make sure that what we are doing will not have an adverse impact.

We recognize that when we build a bridge there is some environmental damage. It is going to have some impact as each pier goes down and as the bridge extends across Northumberland Strait. The fishery is going to be adversely affected. From the studies we have seen it has been indicated that the impact will be of a very short duration. We feel the proper compensation packages must be set up to compensate the fishermen who will be adversely affected in the short term by the construction process.

This agreement provides $10 million for that particular fund. We want to hear evidence as to whether that is sufficient and whether the fishermen of the Northumberland Strait will be adequately compensated by that fund.

Workers presently working for Marine Atlantic have been trained and are skilled in their jobs. They will ultimately lose their jobs as a result of this particular construction. The bridge will offer new careers for some of these workers. Again I think the committee looking at this particular bill should hear evidence as to the types of programs and support mechanisms to be put in place.

Marine Atlantic headquarters is located in Moncton. This could possibly have an adverse effect as well. We have heard the assurances of the government and of Marine Atlantic that no changes will arise from the construction of the bridge, but I have heard those assurances before when we were not going to see the CNR shops close. I heard the same assurances when I was told that rather than close the supply depot in Moncton we were going to see the supply depot enhanced, subsequently to be closed.

It is absolutely essential that we make very clear commitments to the workers at CN Marine at Cape Tormentine and at Borden, to the maintenance of the headquarters in Moncton, and to the maintenance of the positions of the people working in Moncton.

As we look at what is going on here we have to recognize that there will be a bit of a boom–bust circumstance. The expenditure of a large sum of money, $800 million in actual construction, will have a tremendously important impact on the economies of Prince Edward Island and the southeast portion of New Brunswick, but that will only be for roughly five years. We have to ensure that the mechanisms are there to smooth out the transition from that boom to a bust situation, that we put in place the necessary protections to ensure an easy transition.

We must also make sure that new technology will be developed to make that bridge as environmentally sound as it possibly can be, that it will be maintained, and that knowledge will be developed that can be utilized all around the world. In that sense when the committee takes a look at this project we must ensure those types of measures or protections are added to this particular bill.

We are anxious to get on with this particular project. The time has come to move on. Let us take a look at the project, have an environmental assessment, and proceed as quickly as possible with the construction of the bridge.

We in the Liberal Party support the bill going to committee. We are concerned about the environment. We are concerned about the people presently working for Marine Atlantic. We are concerned about the fisheries on the east coast, particularly in Northumberland Strait. We want the assurances and the in–depth analysis the committee can bring to this legislation and this particular project. Let us keep in mind always that this is a bridge. It is not a causeway. It is not a project that will have a massive impact on the environment.

There are some concerns with respect to icing in the strait. A previous study carried out indicated clearly that could be a problem. We understand, but we require assurances before the committee that the new design implemented with respect to this particular bridge has accounted for particular problems in the area of icing in the strait.

The Liberal Party will support the bill at this particular stage as it goes to committee. In the end we hope it will come back from the committee as a better bill, a bill that is supportive of the environment, a bill that is supportive of fishermen, a bill that is supportive of the workers of Marine Atlantic, a bill that is supportive of the communities of Borden and Cape Tormentine and quite frankly all of Prince Edward Island, and a bill that is supportive of the southeast region of New Brunswick that will benefit from the particular project.

I thank my colleagues for giving me an opportunity to speak to the bill. I apologize for the sound of my voice, but I have managed to catch the proverbial Ottawa cold.

This bill is good for Atlantic Canada. It is good for Prince Edward Island. It is good for New Brunswick. It will be better if the things we have called for in the bill are done. That is what we should hold out for.

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, let me start by congratulating my colleagues from Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick. They have been continuously pushing in the House for government action on issues relating to Atlantic Canada, in particular to Prince Edward Island. If we had the same commitment on all sides of the House for other projects, a lot of them would have probably been put in place a long time ago.

As a member with municipal background who was involved in infrastructure I had a chance to visit the hon. member's province some time ago to look at infrastructure. He was former co-chair of a task force of the Federation of Canadian Municipalities. I am delighted to see him speaking in support of the link between Prince Edward Island and the rest of Atlantic Canada.

Could he tell Canadians about other difficulties Atlantic Canada is faced with when it comes to infrastructure? Could he tell us a bit about the importance of investment in infrastructure when it comes to job creation, as well as when it comes to encouraging economic growth not only in Atlantic Canada but elsewhere in Canada?

Mr. Rideout: Mr. Speaker, I am glad the question has been asked. I thank the member for Ottawa Centre because it prompts me to think of something I had in the back of my mind to mention and failed to do so.

People have heard us talk about one critical thing to New Brunswick being improvements or upgrading of the Trans-Canada Highway. Those who have never before had the pleasure of visiting New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island will learn very quickly that we do not have the advantages of divided highways. We are still back in the Dark Ages with a Trans-Canada Highway which is just a two-lane road. It has turned out to be a killer highway as a result.

Coupled with this particular structure is the need for the improvement of highway infrastructure throughout New Brunswick. I am sure that my colleague from Egmont would agree that is the case in Prince Edward Island. The highways in New Brunswick are in deplorable condition.

If we are making a commitment of this magnitude to build a link and then on either side of the bridge we have deplorable highways that cannot stand the volumes of traffic generated by tourists and shoppers going to and from Prince Edward Island, we have really created nothing.

Therefore the member for Ottawa Centre is absolutely correct in saying that coupled with this is the need for a new Trans-Canada Highway in New Brunswick. The government has promised additional funding in that particular area, but recently the amount of funding allocated for improving the Trans-Canada Highway is very small. The premier of New Brunswick said it is going to take us about 35 or 40 years to upgrade the Trans-Canada Highway on the basis of the money we receive from the federal government.

We need a renewed, firm commitment to improve the Trans-Canada Highway as well as to finish the bridge—and I keep saying that—the bridge to Prince Edward Island.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I would like to hear from the Liberal member from the area just exactly what the Liberal position is on environmental assessment. The member is aware that there has been no environmental assessment and review done of the bridge proposal contained in Bill C-110, that the generic bridge proposal was turned down by the FEARO panel.

I would like to know from the member, since the Liberals are supporting the project, what is their position on environmental assessment? That is a critical concern to Canadians in all areas of the country.

Mr. Rideout: I thank the member for his question. He raises some important considerations. Maybe the halls and the walls were echoing with the reverberations from his speech and therefore it plugged his ears, like mine are plugged with a cold.

I stated the position of the Liberal Party very clearly and straightforwardly. We support this project. We want this project to go forward. We have supported this project over the years that it has been discussed.

We also support the principle that there should be a sound environmental policy dealing with these types of megaprojects, and that there should be an assessment. We support this going to the committee, but we also want a full environmental assessment of this particular project and this particular bridge.

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be able to contribute to the debate this afternoon.

This place gets curiouser and curiouser. Just to put it on the record, the population of Prince Edward Island, as received from the Library of Parliament this afternoon, is 129,800 people. The population of my riding of Saanich—Gulf Islands in the 1991 census was 122,051. The people of Saanich—Gulf Islands might very well ask where their billion dollar project is, when we are talking about per capita dollars from the federal government.

This whole megaproject mentality that has its genesis with this government, and obviously is supported by the Liberals, is just incomprehensible, particularly in light of this government's rhetoric flowing out of the earth summit in Rio on sustainable development.

Does the government really believe what it said in Rio? Obviously not. I think we have a fair answer in this House today with the tabling of this bill and its support of it.

One billion dollars for a fixed link. As an Islander, I ask sincerely why do they need a fixed link? I know the people in my riding and the Gulf Islands want ferry service, and as a matter of fact not too convenient ferry service. It is a means of controlling development because the development is going through the roof. Why should we have our environment degraded by population growth, by fly-by-night developers coming in and ruining our land base?

• (1750)

I ask sincerely of this government and the Liberal Party that is obviously supporting this project, what is the thinking behind a fixed link? Why should you make it a billion dollar project to facilitate more truck and car traffic to an island? Prince Edward Island is a beautiful part of Canada. As a Canadian I am concerned, not just about my area but for all of Canada. My concern is sincere. It seems like such a wacko scheme.

The current project, as the minister cited in his speech today, did not originate with the general public, the provincial government or the federal government. The idea was generated by the private companies lobbying for a billion dollar contract. This is a sort of carte blanche. Yes, we will manage to expedite your ability to earn a billion dollars from our tax dollars.

In this so-called era of restraint, one wonders how they can possibly look at themselves in the mirror when they say out of one side of their mouths: "We have a real deficit problem. We have real concerns about the base of support in Canada". Yet out of the other side of their mouths they are willing to give a private corporation a billion dollars for an environmentally unsound project.

I also want to talk about the federal environmental assessment, a six-member panel which was convened in April 1989. The public hearings from that FEARO project were held in the three maritime provinces between March 12 and March 30, 1990. There were over 1,500 participants in those hearings, an intense public participation in that federal environmental review. That was on a generic bridge concept. The public participation increased the credibility of the process. A lot of people viewed it with great scepticism. With those 1,500 participants their credibility increased.

This bill assaults that environmental assessment review process. The panel tabled its findings in August 1990 and I will cite some of the findings when it asked that it not be proceeded with. The panel's rejection was based on numerous significant reasons. These include: potential impacts on marine ecosystems and agricultural micro-climates arising from delayed spring ice-out; risk of damage to near shore spawning grounds; limited knowledge of the Northumberland Strait ecosystem making it difficult to predict monitor mitigate impacts and determine appropriate compensation to fishermen; incompatibility of the project with sustainable development; inadequate consideration of cumulative impacts; difficulties in finding socially acceptable solutions for displaced ferry workers and fishermen; inadequate consideration of the environmental and ecological impacts on the island of predicted type of tourism growth and the need to resolve numerous land use issues in Prince Edward Island.

It was a comprehensive environmental review. That is what an environmental review is supposed to be on a generic bridge concept. My colleague from Skeena is quite correct in saying that the bridge concept, as we now see it, is a particular concept that has not been reviewed.

All sorts of reasons were brought forward. The panel in conclusion said; "There is a need for improved transportation service between Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick. After careful consideration, however, the panel concludes that the risk of harmful effects of the proposed bridge concept is unacceptable. The panel recommends, therefore, that the project not proceed".

So when the minister stated in the House today, very carefully, as did the Liberal member for Egmont, that there had been an environmental review—let me just get the minister's words on this—there had been a full environmental review. The full environmental review said: "Do not proceed". What is this government doing? It is proceeding. What is the Liberal Party doing? It is recommending that it be proceeded with. Is it any wonder that people are so sceptical of the political process when you see the way some politicians are willing to act. If they do not like one answer they ask another panel and that is exactly what this government has done. The government did not like that answer so what it did was focus only on one narrow consideration of the environmental assessment review, the ice-out. The government found four so-called ice experts. I do not know the qualifications of these people. The people of Canada do not know these people's qualifications, but this government has based Bill C-110 and is proceeding with this project because of what was said by these so-called ice experts. It is no wonder that people are sceptical of the political process when politicians behave that way.

We had an environmental review process. It went through, the environmental panel said not to proceed. The government has found a way to circumvent that process and proceed and the Liberals are going along with it.

I wonder why that would be. Do you perhaps think that maybe there is politics involved here in this 1993 election year? Do you think perhaps that the Liberal Party, which has based its support in the maritime provinces, thinks there might be some political advantage to this? Do you think the government would perhaps want some of those seats as well? Who will pay the most?

Where does sustainable development fit in this scene? Where does concern for Canadian tax dollars fit in this scene when "it is up to the trough and snout your way through it" mentality, the megaproject mentality which both the government and the Liberal Party seem to be supporting. Where does sustainable development and all the rhetoric we heard in Rio fit in this?

The minister said there are 3,500 person-years involved. Who looks after the fish? Who looks after the lobster? Who looks after the climate and the ocean? That is the responsibility of Environment Canada. Environment Canada is on one side saying one thing and the Minister of Public Works is on the other side saying something else. It is no wonder the public is confused because there is not one single message. Politics are being played here.

Politicians have to realize that the time has come for a stand on these issues and to give the straight goods to Canadians. Sustainable development is what all Canadians want. They want jobs. Of course they do. They want jobs so they can contribute to the betterment of our country. They want Canada's international reputation to be good environmentally. This project will not accomplish that.

We have to look at the land use consideration. Why do the people of Prince Edward Island even contemplate putting a fixed link to the mainland? I value being an islander. I like being islander. It is important. When you are an islander it is the world in microcosm. You know the limitations. You know the finite nature of resources. You live it every day. You know there is a finite amount of water, there is a finite amount of garbage that you can deal with so you mitigate your actions accordingly.

By connecting with the mainland, all of that goes out. You think that oh well we can ship our garbage off, we can ship our water on. This is not sustainable development, this is a wacko political re-election bid by both the Liberals and the government.

I noticed also that the minister said there is no guarantee that the bridge will be built. It is nice that he is at least that honest because it will not be built after the election if the government is re-elected, God forbid, or the Liberals are re-elected, God forbid. There will be no bridge built because it is economically, socially and environmentally unsustainable.

• (1800)

[Translation]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 deemed to have been moved.

AUDITOR GENERAL'S REPORT

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, last November 24, following the tabling of the Annual Report of the Auditor General of Canada, I asked the Minister of Finance why the government was allowing Canadian businesses operating foreign affiliates to use tax loopholes to reduce their taxable income in Canada. According to the Auditor General of Canada, these loopholes could cost Canadian taxpayers hundreds of millions of dollars. The Minister of Finance replied that he had made some efforts by introducing the general anti-avoidance rules. May I remind you, Mr. Speaker, that these anti-avoidance rules have not yet been used.

Also, several tax experts agree that the general anti-avoidance rules are inapplicable and therefore ineffective because these tax avoidance schemes are not forbidden under the Income Tax Act. Unless the minister asks for Parliament's approval to promote competitiveness by allowing Canadian companies to use avoidance practices which are less abusive, he must demonstrate to Canadian parliamentarians here today that he has the will to eliminate these tax loopholes. He must review the abusive tax arrangements for foreign affiliates to minimize tax losses. These losses are of the order of several hundred million dollars. This is not peanuts, as we say; it is a lot of money.

At a time when the government is trying to reduce its budget imbalance, the Minister of Finance is, in my opinion, only further eroding our tax base.

[English]

Will the Minister of Finance review the foreign accrued property income rules, better known as FAPI? The Income Tax Act must define active and passive income in the context of the anti-avoidance rules. Even Revenue Canada is concerned over this issue. The Department of Finance was provided on many occasions with specific recommendations to amend the Income Tax Act in respect to the FAPI rules. The Department of Finance has not acted on any of these recommendations from Revenue Canada.

Furthermore, many Canadian corporations receive tax free, active business income earned offshore by their foreign affiliates in a designated country. The problem is that many of these designated countries are tax havens, as we call them, and should not be listed as designated countries. For example, Liberia is a designated country listed in the income tax regulations despite the fact that 12 years ago this Parliament refused to ratify a tax treaty with that country. Even officials with the Department of Finance agree that when it becomes obvious that Canada will not be in a position to conclude negotiations, considerations should be given to take countries off the designated list.

Does the Minister of Finance think it is fair to allow Canadian subsidiaries to reduce their taxable income simply by operating in a tax haven? Will the Minister of Finance follow the advice of his officials and review the list of designated countries to eliminate tax revenues?

[Translation]

In order to make the necessary changes, the Minister of Finance should first complete the studies begun in 1987 on this issue. It is becoming more and more obvious that the Conservative government is dragging its feet when it comes to eliminating tax loopholes, but it is certainly quick to tax Canadians. The Conservatives can increase personal income tax. They have done so fairly steadily in the last eight years, hitting Canadians with some 32 tax increases. Consequently, will the Minister of Finance complete the studies on tax avoidance schemes which began in 1987 and are still not completed some six years later?

[English]

While working on these studies, would he suggest interim budget amendments to the Income Tax Act? Even Revenue Canada wrote to the Department of Finance that it should "consider interim budget amendments to the foreign affiliate rules to address the more obviously abusive tax practices".

Will the Minister of Finance or his representative tell the House tonight that he is going to move on this issue that costs Canadians hundreds of millions of dollars. Those are not my words, but the words of the Auditor General of Canada.

Mr. Bill Kempling (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, the Auditor General has suggested that hundreds of millions of dollars in potential income tax revenue are being lost annually under the current system of foreign affiliate taxation.

As well, he has put forward a number of examples in support of his conclusions. It is important to recognize that these examples all predate the 1989 taxation year. As such they occurred prior to the introduction of the general anti-avoidance rule or GAAR.

GAAR was introduced by this government specifically in order to combat transactions that are entered into solely for tax avoidance reasons and more specifically, transactions that while technically consistent with the specific rules of the Income Tax Act, are abusive in tax policy terms. While GAAR is still relatively new, it is a powerful tool. It is anticipated that Revenue Canada will apply it on a regular basis in those cases which involve abusive tax transactions.

While several examples cited by the Auditor General are presently under review by Revenue Canada, it is not clear that in the remaining examples Canada is actually losing tax revenues as a result of the transactions in question.

This government has an enviable record of closing tax loopholes and ensuring that corporations, which under previous governments paid little or no tax, are made to pay their fair share. In particular, since 1984, we have among other things eliminated scientific research tax credits, stopped loss trading by corporations, terminated par votes in the resource sector and restricted after-tax financing.

Ultimately, the foreign affiliate tax regime accurately reflects the intentions of Parliament and provides for full taxation of all income that is intended to be taxed in Canada. The hon. member must remember that in the field of international taxation, more than one country will inevitably have jurisdiction to tax a particular source of income.

Therefore, in order to avoid double taxation, income must be allocated equitably among different countries. This is done largely through bilateral tax treaties. Where appropriate, it involves Canada waiving its rights to tax certain incomes in favour of another country in order to foster international competitiveness of Canadian business. This does not represent avoidance, but rather, a recognition that in certain circumstances—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order please. Your time has now expired.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I rise to ask the Canadian government to show international leadership to close the rape-death camps of Bosnia-Hercegovina.

At least 20,000 women and little girls have been interned and gang raped. Many have died. Babies born of this violence and hatred are being abandoned. There is profound and indescribable trauma resulting from this attempted genocide and a lack of knowledge as to whether one or one's closest family members will survive the day.

My New Democrat colleagues and I have risen in the House and have written letters to the ministers asking Canada to target humanitarian aid to the survivors of the rape camps.

Following our interventions, $250,000 was specifically targeted to aid the rape survivors. However, that really is just a drop in the bucket. Women are the key to rebuilding any society and these women have been severely traumatised. They will need much more help. I have again written to the minister responsible for external affairs asking that targeted aid be increased.

I want to thank the Liberal and Conservative MPs who signed their names to a statement that I wrote to close the camps. I think that kind of co-operation among the parties in this House goes a long way to show leadership. Unfortunately, there has been no further action.

I asked the minister responsible for the status of women whether Canada would act to get the UN to recognize rape as a war crime in the Geneva Convention and investigate it as such a crime. I am pleased that I have received an answer from her that was positive. Women around the world are watching our government on this very important issue.

I want to point out that rape is a crime of war and oppression around the world that Somalian, Peruvian, East Timorese women and women from every continent have experienced. In every war against races, religions and ethnicities, there is also within it a separate war against women.

I have recently written a letter to the new Minister of National Defence about the behaviour of peacekeeping troops overseas. They need training, a code of ethics and an enforcement of that code of ethics to make sure that they do not add to the oppression of the women and the cultures they encounter in their duties. Today I want an answer to as many of these questions as possible.

• (1810)

Further to my question in the House I want to know what specific action the Canadian government will take to close the rape and death camps in former Yugoslavia.

[Translation]

Mrs. Suzanne Duplessis (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister for External Relations and Minister of State (Indian Affairs and Northern Development)): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank my hon. colleague for raising this very important issue. The most harmful and least recognized human rights violation is violence against women. The systematic rape of women that is going on in the former Yugoslavia, particularly in Bosnia-Hercegovina, certainly is the most disgusting example of this violence. On several occasions already the Canadian government has unequivocally condemned such barbaric and degrading actions. These actions aimed at terrorizing civilian populations constitute serious human rights violations.

The government has promised to have those responsible for such violations tried. That is why we endorse the creation of an international ad hoc court to try these crimes. We have responded to these violations with concrete measures, providing $250,000 through the High Commissioner for Refugees to assist rape victims in Bosnia-Hercegovina. We have also set up an information centre to collect testimony from Canadians about these crimes. We are actively looking into other ways to help the victims.

At the session of the Commissions on Human Rights to be held in Geneva, Canada will exercise leadership and ask the international community again to make such violations stop. These rapes violate the Geneva convention and follow-on protocols.

We understand that the expert commission set up by the UN to look into allegations of war crimes in the former Yugoslavia will investigate this systematic raping as part of its mandate, and that there will be a Canadian, in the person of Commander William Fiedrich, on this commission.

Violence against women in Bosnia-Hercegovina is not an isolated case. Quite the contrary, this is a global issue. In the reaction against violence directed toward women, Canada has led the Commission on the Status of Women in Vienna in drafting a statement against violence against women—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but I cannot allow her to continue, her speaking time having expired. The hon. member for Bonavista—Trinity—Conception.

[English]

FISHERIES

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, I rise as a follow-up on a question I had last year on compensation for fishermen. I want to use the opportunity to go through the chronology and to report on where we are and what adjustments we might still be able to invoke.

Roughly a year ago, February 14, there was an announcement that the northern cod quota would be greatly reduced. This of course affected the offshore processing plants. The announcement caused a lot of consternation and resulted in a lot of fishermen, trawler skippers and plant owners being laid off. It was the beginning of a series of questions from the opposition for compensation for those people.

That announcement was a prelude to a more drastic series of actions which took place on July 2, when the northern cod fishery in 2J3KL which affected all of my riding, was made.

Between February 14 and July 2, practically every day concern was shown on this side of the House for these people, to ensure that adequate compensation was put in place for those involved in the fishing industry who were to be drastically affected because they had no source of income when this occurred.

I know that we had two emergency debates on this in the House, and I think you sat in on at least one of them, Mr. Speaker. Again, on my own part and largely because I was the most affected in that interim period, I had no fewer than 30 interventions, either in the form of questions, statements, participation in debate or whatever.

In any case compensation was announced with the closure of the northern cod fishery on July 2. From July 2 to the end of the year two major adjustments were made to the program because the first compensation package was certainly less than adequate.

There has been the involvement of very dedicated officials of the Department of Fisheries and Oceans and individually. The people in my riding who worked on this matter and I have a lot of fine things to say for the way they handled the tremendous volume of activity involved. Later in the year a final announcement was made with respect to older workers involved in the fishing industry and owners of vessels who were particularly hard hit.

There are still people who have an attachment to the industry and are hoping for compensation in some way, shape or form. We are still looking at that, together with the department.

Three months after the announcement was made on one of the five telephone lines in my riding and in Ottawa Newfoundland Telephone recorded 10,485 calls in six days which would give some indication of the numbers of people who were trying to clarify their situation. That is still going on. Not to the same extent, but we are receiving between 75 and 100 calls per day and still sorting out where people stand with respect to the compensation.

My concern is that while communications continue to improve there has been some back-tracking in the sense that DFO has now taken one individual per riding and is using recorded messages which I believe do not really help clarify the confusion that still exists. However the situation has improved and it should get better downstream.

In closing, I would ask for continuous smoothing of the process. I give notice right now in this fishery debate that we will be looking at the nose and tail of the Grand Banks. We have not forgotten about that. This is a good time to do it when Newfoundland and Atlantic fishermen cannot fish.

Mr. Ross Belsher (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, many times the hon. member opposite has raised the concerns of his community and others in Newfoundland regarding the fishery problems encountered, particularly in the past 12 months.

It was back in June when he asked the question we are dealing with tonight. At that time the Minister of Employment and Immigration wanted to assure him that circumstances would call for measures to be taken to help the people and that the government would do everything possible.

That has been done. I am glad to see the member tonight acknowledging that many things have taken place. It is still not perfect and improvements can be made.

In addition to the income assistance measures, income training within and outside the fishery, early retirement and licence retirement options have been provided to northern cod workers with unique opportunities that would otherwise not have been made available to them.

The once in a lifetime openings will equip individuals affected by the moratorium to make informed career choices and to do away with the image of the fishery as the employer of last resort.

While the fishery has been experiencing a recurring downturn in some sectors, the past year has been exceptional across Atlantic Canada, particularly in Newfoundland.

The Minister of Employment and Immigration has recognized that in certain communities individuals were unable to secure sufficient weeks of insurable employment qualify for UI benefits. In response to this urgent need and in co-operation with the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, emergency funding was provided to create employment needed to obtain the minimum number of weeks.

Clearly, however, continued emergency responses are not the desired solution. It is evident that long-term adjustments are necessary and critical for rebuilding the stocks and to restructure the labour force into one the fishery can realistically support.

The fishery that will emerge from the adjustment process will support a smaller but highly professional work force. The number of people who will depend on the fishery will be reduced. Short-term solutions include compensation for early retirement, licence retirement and so on. The task force on incomes and adjustments is expected to provide valuable insights on how to achieve stable and adequate incomes for fisheries workers and to realize alternative training and employment possibilities.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I am sorry but the time is running out.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, I rise to discuss again the question of two Canadians who are imprisoned in Brazil. They are Christine Lamont and David Spencer.

I am sure that most people are familiar with the facts of this particular case and that we have been pushing the government to request the expulsion of those two Canadians from Brazilian jails and have them returned to Canada and their families. The government so far has been opposed to that particular procedure.

As time passes and as we look at this particular circumstance I believe that it becomes more and more urgent that this government take action with respect to these two Canadians. If you accept their guilt, which I do not, then given the time spent in relation to their original sentence of 10 years and 8 years, they both would be eligible for release and parole here in Canada. Their sentence of 28 years was acknowledged by the minister of external affairs to be discriminatory, excessive and an offensive penalty.

If we look at the other circumstances, then the time that has already been spent is sufficient for this government, if it is convinced of their guilt, to ask for their expulsion and have them returned. If there is any doubt, which I believe there is, as to their guilt then by all means we are allowing an improper and a sad circumstance to continue far too long.

There are now new conditions which prompt me to rise and speak about this circumstance. We have now learned that Christine Lamont has tested positive for tuberculosis. The Prime Minister in one of his answers to my questions said: "Oh, she just had swollen ankles and it was not anything serious". I think tuberculosis is serious. If she has tested positive then that again is an indication that the health conditions are not that great. This is further impetus for Canada and the Canadian government to respond.

Another factor which recently came to light—I received a copy of a recent wire service story—that 100 military police have been charged in an incident involving the slaying of over 200 prisoners during a prison riot in a prison adjacent to where the Canadians are kept. I think it is good. It shows a positive response by the Brazilian government to take this step to charge these military police with crimes associated with what they did.

However, one can hear and read about the indiscriminate sweeping of machine gun fire among all the prisoners. They had their hands up in surrender so that they would not be hurt, yet they were shot by these military police. This is a dangerous situation and it goes beyond an acceptable level. It calls upon the government to come to the aid of these two Canadians.

As I said, the Brazilian system of justice is different from ours and there are problems with some of their police and judicial systems, but what has happened with respect to those military police shows a positive sign on the part of the Brazilian government and we encourage that. However, please act now to save these Canadians.

Mr. Murray Cardiff (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the Secretary of State for External Affairs has set out her views on this case in very great detail in letters dated August 13 and December 8, 1992 to the chairman of the Standing Committee on Justice and the Solicitor General.

It cannot be assumed that if Canada were to ask for the expulsion of Christine Lamont and David Spencer, that it would be granted automatically. While the Brazilian president had the discretionary authority to grant expulsion, it has been emphasized to us that there is a clear distinction between the authority as set out in the Brazilian constitution and the practice according to which the authority is exercised.

We have been told that in practice, expulsion would not be granted while appeals are under way or before the convicted prisoner has served his or her sentence. We have also been told that the Brazilian government would not agree to expulsion in these circumstances because it would amount to unwarranted interference by the executive branch of government in the affairs of the judiciary and would discriminate against the other defendants who would not be released or expelled.

On many occasions the Secretary of State for External Affairs has expressed concern over the severity of the sentences received by Miss Lamont and Mr. Spencer. These sentences and the convictions are being appealed in the Brazilian courts and the Canadian embassy in Brasilia has been working actively to ensure that both the appeal of the convictions and the appeal of the sentences move forward as quickly as possible.

We understand the Brazilian courts recessed in December for the Christmas season and will reconvene in February. The embassy will continue to do everything possible to ensure the appeal process keeps moving expeditiously.

The embassy's efforts to hasten the ratification of the transfer of offenders treaty between Canada and Brazil which was signed last July 15 have also been achieving some success. The treaty was approved by the foreign relations committee of the Chamber of Deputies in December and will be considered by the justice committee when it reconvenes this month.

Finally, I would like to reaffirm that the consulate General in Sao Paulo is doing everything possible to ensure the safety and welfare of Miss Lamont and Mr. Spencer. The consulate general is monitoring the situation very closely and has met with prison authorities and with Miss Lamont and Mr. Spencer and their lawyers.

PETITIONS

YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT

Mr. Brian O'Kurley (Elk Island): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I would like to present three petitions including the names of hundreds of Canadians in and around the riding of Elk Island.

These petitioners live in places such as Fort Saskatchewan, Ardrossan, Bruderheim, Sherwood Park, North Cooking Lake and Edmonton.

The petition states that the Young Offenders Act is in itself inadequate to deal with the problems of youth crime. The petitioners believe this act must be strengthened or replaced by legislation that will act as a stronger deterrent to criminal activity among the nation's young people.

Therefore the petitioners respectfully pray and call upon Parliament to strengthen or replace the Young Offenders Act with legislation that will be a stronger deterrent to youth crime.

These people are most concerned with repeat violent young offenders and recommend harsher penalties including work camps. In cases dealing with theft or property damage they support financial repayment to the victims of crime.

Generally the citizens want laws that make young offenders more accountable for their actions. These Canadians want laws that are seen to support victims of crime rather than insulate offenders from justice.

OLD AGE SECURITY

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, petitioners from my province wish to bring the following to your attention: that indexation of pensions should adequately reflect the needs of the elderly; that the general cost of living indexation does not reflect the real financial needs of the elderly; that under the current system pension payments, even with the supplement, provide an income that is below the poverty line; that an alarming number of senior citizens are now living below or at the poverty line; and, finally, that senior citizens are facing a crisis because their incomes are insufficient.

WATER DIVERSION

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure and indeed an honour to present a number of petitions on the same issue from a variety of very concerned communities in British Columbia.

They believe that the North American free trade agreement holds a number of clauses that would facilitate the diversion of Canadian rivers into the United States to provide fresh water for the southwestern United States and northern Mexico.

• (1010)

They are asking the government to ensure that this not take place when we eventually pass legislation regarding the North America free trade agreement.

BILL C-268

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): On another matter, Mr. Speaker, these petitioners are calling upon the House of Commons to recognize June 21 as the most appropriate day to recognize our First Nations.

They are calling upon Parliament to enact Bill C-268, an act respecting a national solidarity day for the aboriginal people of Canada.

INCOME TAX ACT

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, on yet another matter, the petitioners point out that alimony provisions in the Income Tax Act of Canada currently stipulate that taxpayers who receive child support payments must include the payments in their taxable income.

They point out the unfairness of this and are therefore asking that the Parliament of Canada amend the Income Tax Act to exclude child support payments from the taxable income of custodial parents.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk)

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 416 and 420.

[Text]

Question No. 416—Mr. Simmons

With respect to the post office in Newfoundland, (a) does it follow federal tendering procedures for mail delivery contracts and does the contract go to the lowest bidder and, if not, why not (b) does it follow federal hiring procedures and practices for temporary and permanent staff and, if not, why not?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): (a) Canada Post Corporation, while operating in a fiscally responsible manner, must ensure the best cost and quality when selecting suppliers and contractors. Consequently, the corporation adheres to the principle of a fair and competitive bidding environment. It follows a formal tender evaluation process that ensures an adequate and fair competition and allows Canada Post to consider the most effective package submitted. This process gives all Canadians a chance to do business with Canada Post.

In every competition all the technical, commercial and financial elements of the tender are taken into consideration. The final decision on tender competition is based on the corporation's ability to obtain maximum value for each purchasing dollar. Canada Post awards business to those suppliers and contractors whose offer reflects the best quality, cost service and delivery necessary to carry out the task. In the instance when all these factors are equal, the business will be awarded to the supplier and/or contractor in the locality in which the item or task is needed.

There are few exceptions to this policy. They are: when an emergency situation exists in which delay would be injurious to the corporation and/or the interests of its customers; when the nature of the task is such that it would not be in the best interest to all concerned to invite bids, for example when there are no other suppliers or contractors that do the work.

The above mentioned policy is applied nationally.

(b) Canada Post Corporation does not follow federal hiring procedures. The corporation's hiring procedures in post offices are as follows:

When a unionized position in a post office becomes vacant, it is filled following steps laid out in the collective agreement. For permanent placement, a unionized position is first offered to members of the bargaining unit under which it falls. If no successful canditate can be found, the position is then opened to other employees of Canada Post. If the position remains vacant, it is offered to persons on the valid eligibility list for an office in order of their placement. If no eligibility list exists or if previous successful applicants do not accept the offer, the position is advertised by poster to residents of the area served by that particular post office. Should no qualified person be found in the area, the position is again advertised by poster, extending the area of competition to include other communities.

Question No. 420—Mr. Boudria:

What is the total amount of payments, grants, transfers or any other contribution made by the government and/or the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency to Atlantic Turbines or Mr. Craig Dobin since September 17, 1984, and what was the purpose of each payment?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Insofar as the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency is concerned, see below:

ATLANTIC TURBINES INC.

STARRED QUESTIONS

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, would you be so kind as to call Starred Questions Nos. 438 and 443.

In view of the length of the answers, I would ask that they be printed in Hansard as if read.

*Question No. 438—Mr. Saint-Julien:

Concerning the airport industrial parks managed by Transport Canada, (a) how many are there (b) which ones are they (c) have grants been made to these serviced parks in order to make commercial and industrial developments and, if so, (i) how much have these parks received each year since 1980 (ii) how many commercial industries are there in each of these parks and for each industry, and is the building ownership clause included in each lease?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): (a) Three.

(b) and (c) (ii) The location and number of industries in airport industrial parks managed by Transport Canada are: Gander International Airport (one lessee with 10 sub lessees), Ottawa International Airport (three lessees) and Regina Airport (one lessee with four sub lessees).

(c) No grant(s) was or are paid.

(i) Not applicable.

(ii) Transport Canada does not have a building ownership clause. However, if the member is referring to the occurrence of vesting the end of a lease, there is a form of vesting clause in most of the leases with Transport Canada which expresses the action of common law on leasehold improvements at lease termination.

*Question No. 443—Mr. Duhamel:

Since September 1984, (a) how many post offices have been closed and what were their locations and (b) how many post offices or postal facilities have had their range of services reduced and what were their locations?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): (a) From a rural perspective, the only recent change to postal service in the hon. member's constituency occurred in St. Germain when the contractor of the retail postal outlet there informed us that he did not wish to renew his contract. Unfortunately, neither of the two remaining businesses in St. Germain was interested in hosting a retail postal outlet. Retail postal products and services were amalgamated to McKnight's Pharmacy in Winnipeg. Delivery service through community mailboxes commenced on May 27. Canada Post remains prepared to consider establishing a postal counter in any local business which might express an interest in operating a postal outlet in this community.

(b) On an urban scale, the service currently available in the hon. member's constituency includes two postal stations, five full service retail postal outlets and one retail postal outlet offering a limited range of postal services. Furthermore, there are 19 stamp shops open, providing convenient locations for stamp purchases. For the member's information, the following is a list of the names and addresses of postal outlets and stamp shops in the area. Of the 10 postal outlets in his riding that have undergone changes recently, five have become full service retail postal outlets and five have become stamp shops.

Postal stations offering a full range of postal products and services: St. Boniface Postal Station, 208 Provencher Blvd., Winnipeg; Norwood Grove Postal Station, 287 Tache Avenue, Winnipeg.

Retail postal outlets offering a full range of postal products and services: Marion Postal Outlet, Metro Drugs, 4–276 Marion Street, Winnipeg; Lakewood Postal Outlet, Pharmasave, 35 Lakewood Blvd., Winnipeg; Niakwa Postal Outlet, Safeway, 2 Alpine Avenue, Winnipeg; St. Vital Centre Postal Outlet, Shoppers' Drug Mart, 17–1225 St. Mary's Road, Winnipeg; South St. Vital Postal Outlet, McKnight's Pharmacy, 1631 St. Mary's Road, Winnipeg.

Postal outlet offering a limited range of postal services: Nieman Enterprises Ltd, 1087 St. Mary's Road, Winnipeg.

Stamp shops: Mac's Convenience Store, 8–680 St. Anne's Road; Boutique du Boulevard, 112–131 Provencher Blvd.; Canada Safeway, 285 Marion Street; Tache Pharmacy, 400 Tache Avenue; M & M Foods, 845 Elizabeth Road; Island 99 Food Store, 12–20 Island Shore Blvd.; Mississippi Jacks, 1034 Beaver Hill Blvd.; Uniglobe Travel, 310–119 Vermillion Avenue; Shell Circle K, 1270 Archibald Street; Canada Safeway, 2 Alpine Avenue; Streamers, The Party Store, 4–827 Dakota Street; Auxiliary Gift Shop, 409 Tache Avenue; Laccueil Columbien Inc., 200 Masson Street; Fredette Foodfare, 390 Provencher Blvd.; Western Canada Ltd., 125 Garry Street; Metro Drugs, 1069 Autumn Road; Canada Safeway, 77 wermillion Avenue; Mac's Foods, 1035 Autumn Road; The Coffee Cup, 79 St. Anne's Road.

Mr. Edwards: I ask, Mr. Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

PRIVILEGE

GOVERNMENT RESPONSE TO PETITIONS

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Parkdale—High Park raised a question of privilege concerning the tabling of responses to petitions. I undertook at that time to respond to my hon. friend at the earliest opportunity, and I am pleased to do so today.

On behalf of the Minister of Employment and Immigration I wish to advise the House that we agree the situation is not acceptable. I have asked the department to explain the lateness in answering some of these petitions. I have also inquired as to any measure it may undertake to rectify this situation.

The department wishes to apologize to the member and to his constituents for not having forwarded a response within the prescribed time.

The minister has spoken with his departmental officials and has been assured that any outstanding parliamentary returns will be dealt with in the shortest possible delay and that hon. members can expect that the current situation will not recur.

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the parliamentary secretary for acting so quickly on the very serious question of privilege I raised yesterday.

I fully accept his apology on behalf of the Minister of Employment and Immigration and I shall pass that on to the petitioners.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S. O. 81—AGRICULTURE

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie) moved:

That this House condemns the government for reneging on its commitment to Canadian farmers by changing policy in the following areas:

(a) its lack of commitment to the Third Line of Defence concept;

(b) its abandonment of the 95-year old promise to pay the Crow transportation benefit in perpetuity;

(c) its weakening of the Canadian Wheat Board by several actions: removing oats from its jurisdiction, considering a continental market for barley, and the lack of control on quotas as witnessed by the December 23, 1992 action of removing quotas on canola and flaxseed in the middle of the crop year and ultimately creating problems in the primary elevator system;

(d) its failure to develop long-term agricultural programs that meet the needs of rural Canada by promoting viable farm families and rural communities; and

(e) its failure to provide clear and unequivocal support for our supply management system, particularly with respect to the mixed signals the government is giving with respect to its position on the strengthening and clarification of article XI of the GATT.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in keeping with the rules of the House I will be sharing my time today with the member for Moose Jaw—Lake Centre. This will be a 10-minute intervention.

Essentially we are calling on the government to look at five areas of their agricultural program. Initially their apparent abandonment of the third line of defence concept is something to which we think attention should be drawn.

Farm incomes in the grain sector are very low. Since the beginning of the grain wars initiated by the Americans with their export enhancement program, which had the effect of pulling all export pricing for grains down everywhere in the world except to American farmers, the result has been devastating for Canadian farm families.

We did not have particularly strong incomes in the early 1980s. Already pressure was being placed on farm families, but the result of the grain wars has meant a deficit in their total income of $6.7 billion since their advent in 1985. In Saskatchewan this translates to close to $20,000 per family on an annual basis and that is a lot of money.

The government initiated three lines of defence. The first line of defence was things that farmers could do on their farms and farmers have done a great deal on their farms. They have reduced costs, they have diversified to other crops that might bring a higher price, they have diversified out of crops altogether and into grass, hay and the production of cattle. They have done what is humanly possible.

The second line of defence was to be government programs that would back up the farmers and defend them against international price competition that was considered to be unwarranted. In this we can see quite clearly the government has not been able to fully manage that with the programs that were put forward, the so-called GRIP and NISA programs of 1991-92.

If there is any doubt about that, all one has to do is go out to the prairies right now and talk to farmers. They were so upset about the lack of income resulting from the first GRIP program that a huge rally was held in Saskatoon in the past week with some 13,000 farmers in attendance. This was the biggest farm rally that ever occurred in the prairies. Previous large rallies in the sixties when there was a relatively short period of pain came to 9,000 or 10,000 persons. At that time there were more farmers to rally to the cause as well.

If we need further evidence other than the pain being felt by prairie farmers in the amount of bankruptcies they are going through, you need only spend some time in a rural community as I do all the time. I live there. We see people restructuring, trying to find ways of financing to stay in business for another year. They sell off assets, they downsize, they try to get rid of debt. After three or four years many of them are having to do the same thing again and make decisions whether to stay in farming or not. This puts a lot of financial pressure as well as human tragedy in rural communities. At the rally we were told that suicides in rural Saskatchewan have gone up tremendously, into the hundreds. The source of this is the economic crisis that puts social pressures on people.

Communities do their best to try to ignore the crisis and to make things as normal as possible. We all try to make things seem as normal as possible. It is less stressful for children. It is less stressful for spouses. It is less stressful for the community. Yet this hidden stress does break out.

I usually attend some of the meetings of the municipal councils during the course of a year. I recall being in one municipality in an area where the farm productivity is very high and everyone is considered to be doing quite well. I asked the councillors how the farm foreclosure situation was in their municipality. They said: "Oh, we do not have any of that here". Then the municipal secretary spoke up and said: "Actually there were almost 400 quarter sections transferred from farmers to lending institutions in this municipality last year. That is where all of the tax revenue came in last year. The only way the title could be transferred was to have the taxes paid".

Some municipalities are finding themselves in the strange position of having more cash to deal with than they have had for some time because of the transfer of land and of titles. Some have found themselves with an embarrassing surplus of cash from land being taken back and from back taxes having to be paid to the point where they have bought new graders and snow ploughs with the surplus funds that have accumulated from taxes that had not been paid the last three to five years.

The crisis is there. It is visible if you look, even though people are trying to hide it. It is there in the statistics. During the last decade farm incomes in Europe fell by 16.5 per cent. American farm incomes rose 23 per cent and Canadian farm incomes dropped 51.4 per cent.

The Americans have come in with a very aggressive trade policy on grain pricing which has been good for their farmers. Their net income has risen over the decade by 23 per cent. It has affected the Europeans which apparently were the targets of U.S. actions by showing a loss of 16.5 per cent in net farming income. However, it has devastated Canadian farmers whose net incomes have dropped by 51.4 per cent.

We can see the effect of the trade war. Let us look at the first full year of the GRIP program which has just been completed. The 1991 GRIP was finished in 1992. After all the results came in, and farmers looked at their net income, they rallied for the first time in the biggest numbers in two decades.

The pain is there. Action has to be taken. We call on the new Minister of Agriculture to hold meetings with his provincial counterparts to address the problem of the third line of defence. It is obvious from the statistics and from the social indicators which I have spoken of in my earlier remarks that the first two lines of defence have not been adequate. Something will have to be done. If we are going to catch up, payment and aid in the range of $1 billion are needed.

Part of our problem is that the government ignored the needs of farm income in 1990. It was talking about aid that had been given in 1989 through much of 1990. It talked about aid that was going to be coming under the GRIP and NISA programs instead of giving aid. Since then, that debt has been carried forward each of the years.

It is accumulating interest even though the interest rate is down a little and it is still leaving a wide swath of devastation in its wake. Clear attention to the third line of defence has to be given at this time. That is part of what this motion is proposing to do.

I will now leave other members of my caucus to deal with other aspects of agriculture.

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, as someone who spent 18 years on a family farm in the very region the hon. member for Mackenzie is representing now, I know exactly of what he speaks.

I would like to ask him why there is such a difference in incomes between United States farmers and Canadian farmers. He told us that in the last decade the American farmers' income went up by 23 per cent whereas the Canadian farmers' income went down by 51.4 per cent. That is quite a discrepancy, over 70 per cent. Knowing farming on both sides of the border, I always assumed that our farmers were just as efficient, if not even more so, than the U.S. farmers.

The other question he might want to address is this. He did tell the House that the farmers in Saskatchewan will require about $1 billion in assistance to get this year's crop in and to make ends meet between crop years. I wonder if he has any idea where the government could get that additional $1 billion.

Mr. Althouse: Mr. Speaker, with regard to the difference between American and Canadian farm incomes, it basically goes back to the differences in marketing systems.

Essentially the U.S. has a closed market in that it pretends to price its products on the open market and sell accordingly. However, it has a large intervention program with deficiency payments. Each year it sets target prices for each of the major crops. When the crop is sold the average difference between the target price and the actual amount collected from the market is simply made up by the U.S. treasury.

To strengthen the competitive edge which the Americans already had, in 1985 they began an export enhancement program which provided cash payments per tonne for every tonne of grain that was exported. The exporter or receiving country could take grain or cash for buying from the Americans.

There have been periods of time when you could get a tonne of grain, slightly lower quality U.S. wheat than is available from Canada, at comparable prices plus the $80 U.S. per tonne which went with it. It is a little bit like what the car companies have been using lately, only much more interventionist.

As a result, the Americans have attempted to increase their share of the wheat and corn markets in the world. Essentially it has failed because we have an extremely proficient marketing agency in the Canadian Wheat Board. However in order to compete, we have had to reduce our prices by the amount of the export enhancement program.

It puts our farmers approximately $80 a tonne short of U.S. producers on the export side and we do not have the kind of assistance they get domestically. The war is a very unequal war. The U.S. has an extremely big treasury, granted with a large deficit, but it has decided to put a lot of priority on the farm side.

The other question was where will Canada get the billion dollars. In the short term, the immediate source would be the same place as the Americans are getting their billions, from deficit financing. I think there are a number of places where Canada could raise offsetting funds, either by reducing expenditures such as reviewing some of the expenditures on defence. We are no longer in a cold war.

• (1030)

We could collect some of the existing taxes as the Auditor General has been pointing out for a number of years. He pointed out in several reports that the pay back for the expenditures made in auditing large corporations would be far greater than the pay back in auditing individuals. Yet Revenue Canada persists in auditing individuals instead of large corporations even though we could collect far more funds from auditing the latter.

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to participate in this opposition day. This is the first opposition day the New Democratic Party has had in this new session and it was decided to devote it to the difficulties which exist in agriculture.

Certainly the New Democratic Party has been very concerned with these issues and the member for Mackenzie and other members of our caucus have been very active with respect to agricultural issues.

We have a strange and bizarre situation in this country of having spent $15 billion or $16 billion in the last few years on direct agricultural payments. At the same time there is a need for emergency relief funds.

It is patently obvious the programs we have in place are simply not meeting the needs of western Canada or agriculture right across this country. In fact the government is out of touch with our farmers. That was made very clear last week when I asked the Prime Minister a question about agricultural programs and he responded by saying that farmers in Saskatchewan adore GRIP. That is what he said.

I do not know where he has been because we had a recent rally in Saskatoon with 13,000 farmers saying they did not like GRIP. They did not like 1991 GRIP; they did not like 1992 GRIP; they do not like Saskatchewan GRIP; they do not like Alberta GRIP; they do not like Manitoba GRIP; they do not like GRIP. I do not know where the Prime Minister is getting his information but he said Saskatchewan farmers adore GRIP. That is wrong.

The Prime Minister and this federal government are abandoning the agricultural field. Until very recently we had three ministers of agriculture in this country. We now have two, but one happens also to be the justice minister.

I do not know how the justice minister is going to deal with his portfolio in justice which is a very demanding portfolio and still have time to deal with agriculture. He will be an agriculture minister in name only. In fact we have one agriculture minister left in this country and a Prime Minister who is out of touch and has no idea what is going on in the agricultural sector.

What we have been saying is that we have to have a new approach to agriculture. We have been talking about alternatives. The member for Mackenzie was keen in designing an agricultural program back before the 1988 election. We now have a rural policy to deal with other aspects of rural Canada. In fact we are the only party that has been putting forth real alternatives.

The Liberal Party, although some of its members are very concerned about agriculture and are working hard in that area, has no real policy on agriculture. In fact those members obviously do not have the power in the Liberal Party to invoke some changes and direction in Liberal agricultural policy.

As far as the Reform Party is concerned it thinks it should get rid of every single agricultural program that exists and go to a completely free enterprise system. That is ludicrous. That would simply destroy agriculture in Saskatchewan and across the rest of the country.

It has been the New Democratic Party that has put forth some real alternatives in agriculture. We have said that we cannot continue to have a program in which some farmers receive a cheque big enough to buy a half section of land while other farmers are receiving a cheque that will not even pay their fuel bill. In fact some people are actually receiving bills. There is a fellow in Moose Jaw who works in my office, Ron Bishoff, who actually received a bill from the GRIP program.

What we have been saying is that we have to target the money in areas that are going to do the most good. It has become a joke in this country today, the amount of money we have spent on agriculture and the amount of farmers who are still leaving the land. Taxpayers are upset, farmers are upset, rural communities are upset, urban communities are upset. They should be upset because we are not getting the benefits we should be from $15 billion, $16 billion or $18 billion in direct payments going to farm families.

The reason of course is that a lot of times these payments have come out at election time. There is a joke going around, certainly in my riding. The farmers are saying that as there is a federal election coming they are expecting a cheque any day now. Or when the government makes an announcement of some agricultural funds they will know there is an election coming. That is what it has come to.

I know back in 1988, 10 days before the federal election on November 21, on about November 11 the federal government announced it was going to spend $880 million on agriculture. It did not know how it was going to be spent, it did not know where it was going to be spent, except it told everybody they were going to get $45 or $55 an acre, which was not true. That is the mockery that has been made of agriculture.

We have to bring some sense to the agricultural area. The first thing which should be done is this government has to take some leadership. We have a new Minister of Agriculture. He has a golden opportunity to make his mark in the agricultural area and he should be consulting with the provinces.

The minister should be calling a conference with agricultural ministers of the other prairie provinces with a view to providing a framework for future agricultural programs. That is what should be done. They should not be getting together and developing an actual program, but setting some framework and providing the objectives. There should be an objective to maintain a viable rural infrastructure and viable farm families. That is not the direction in which this government has been heading.

A good example is back during the days when we were debating the GRIP legislation before the House. In fact the New Democrats voted against that legislation, I remember during the legislative committee meetings. By the way, it was not a detailed bill. It was enabling legislation. It simply said that the minister shall have the right to enter into something called GRIP. We did not know what GRIP was at that time. There were some principles that were to be set out.

There were four principles in section 2 of that particular act that the minister should take into consideration. He did not have to follow them; he just had to consider them. The program should do a number of things. I pointed out these four principles to both ministers at that time and that they had missed a principle. That principle was that we should take into account the futures of farm families in rural communities. They disagreed with me and refused to put it in. It was only when I moved a motion on the floor of the House the government passed it because of course it was too embarrassed not to. The clause said: "The program should encourage the long-term social and economic sustainability of farm families in communities". That would not have been there if it was not for this caucus.

This government is not thinking of farm families or rural communities. It is thinking of agribusiness and to hell with little communities, to hell with some of the small farmers. This government is misdirected and misguided.

There are thousands of frustrated farmers right across this country. There are thousands of frustrated Canadians and yet the Minister of Agriculture so far has done nothing. We have had promises in the past.

The growing together initiative came out in 1989 in which the government was going to do big things for farming. We ended up with the GRIP which was a fiasco. There is nothing on farm finances. There has been nothing on the future of grain transportation. All government has really done is to continue to dismantle the Wheat Board and threaten to remove the Crow benefit without putting forth any real alternatives and any real explanation as to how those programs are going to fit into a viable and healthy future rural infrastructure and a future farm economy.

• (1040)

That is the problem we are faced with today. Until the federal government takes the initiative to develop some viable long-term programs, we are going to continue to have this problem. We cannot have emergency payments coming out every year. We are faced with that again this year. Yes, there have to be some emergency payments. Yes, we need them now. However, along with those emergency payments has to be a commitment to develop a viable, long-term agricultural program.

There has been no initiative from this government. Provincial governments are calling for it. I spoke with the Minister of Agriculture for Saskatchewan recently who said he would like to meet with the new minister. He would like to have some consultations with respect to new programs, but that has not been done.

I see that my time has expired. I conclude by saying that this minister has a golden opportunity. Let us hope he takes advantage of it.

Mr. Larry Schneider (Regina—Wascana): Mr. Speaker, I listened more than just a little attentively because the matter before us today concerns me since I have an agricultural background and a constituency of which 8 per cent is rural. I have spoken, perhaps, on a per capita basis more times to the rural part of my constituency than to the urban part. The story I get from the farmers I talk to is somewhat different from what the hon. member presented to us today.

Perhaps a bit of a geography lesson is in order here. The hon. member with all due respect does not have the same kind of farmland in his constituency that I have in mine. The quality of his farmland ranges from excellent to some marginal agricultural land. As a result of that, I would expect he is going to get a wide range of stories.

I suggest that he go to the Tuxford-Marquis area just north of Moose Jaw and talk to the farmers there about GRIP. Talk to those who farm in a mixed farming situation about GRIP. He will likely get the same story I do from my farmers. That is, had the Saskatchewan NDP government not tinkered with 1991 GRIP, while it was not the paved road to Mecca, it certainly was at least a document which could be taken to the bank. The banker and the farmer could predict within a reasonable proximity what the income would be for the 1992 crop year.

That is not the reality now. I know there were one or two farmers from Alberta and Manitoba quoted as saying that GRIP Manitoba and GRIP Alberta were less than ideal. I would suspect that they represent the minority of farmers from those two provinces because the same demands have not been placed on us from those two provinces. As well, I happen to know that the Minister of Agriculture has met with the provincial Minister of Agriculture and they have talked about farm programs.

The hon. member said that the NDP wishes to take a new approach to agriculture. It feels that a new approach to agriculture is necessary and it has some plans. I certainly would like to know what those plans are. They might be better expressed to the House of Commons by the hon. member than that farmer who works in his office. Perhaps if that farmer would spend more time on the farm than pretending to be a bureaucrat we would have some solutions for the farmers.

Mr. Laporte: With respect to existing GRIP there have been a lot of politics played lately, certainly by the former Minister of Agriculture who tried to play down the fact that Saskatchewan GRIP was inferior to Alberta GRIP and so on. The fact is that neither program is doing the job.

Certainly the Alberta GRIP has gone into a huge deficit this year and there is going to be a large increase in premiums. Farmers in Alberta are going to find themselves paying a lot higher premiums next year. It looks as if the IMAP price is going to go down to something like $3.79 a bushel which is not going to encourage a lot of people. That I understand is the preliminary result. That is not the direction to go in. The controversy should not be over whether the Saskatchewan GRIP is inferior or superior to the Alberta GRIP. The fact is that neither program is doing the job.

The New Democratic Party has come up with two programs. The member for Mackenzie and the member for Saskatoon—Humboldt back in 1987 and before the last federal election were instrumental in developing an agricultural program that wanted to keep farmers on the land. There should not be a program whereby a farmer receives payment for every single acre of land he or she has, whether it is 10 acres, 5,000 acres or 50,000 acres.

Mackenzie's program says that we are going to pay farmers for the initial few thousand bushels of their production. They will receive that cheque at the elevator and in the spring they will know what they are going to get. That is a program they can bank on. In the spring the farmers will know that on the first 8,000 or 9,000 bushels, whatever the program works out to be, they will receive a cheque for $5, $6 or $6.50 a bushel. In addition, they can buy an insurance program to insure the next 8,000 or so bushels of grain. Farmers will know in the spring what they are going to receive and will receive those cheques when the grain is hauled to the elevator. That is a far better program than what we have now.

We also have a rural policy now to develop programs that are going to help rural communities and diversification in rural Canada.

Mr. Len Gustafson (Parliamentary Secretary to Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am somewhat surprised at the NDP and this opposition motion condemning the government.

There is no question that there are problems in agriculture today. The trade war has been going on for seven or eight years and has created significant problems. I would just like to bring a little bit of realism to what happened in Saskatchewan and defend a government, a Prime Minister and Ministers of Agriculture who have done more for agriculture than any government that ever sat in this House. I can tell you that first hand.

My life has been agriculture. I have seen our government stand with the farmers through drought, trade wars and difficulties. It has increased agricultural spending by 650 per cent. Now what happened in Saskatchewan just this year? The GRIP program and the NISA program are not perfect and will no doubt need some improvement as we go along.

The Minister of Agriculture in Saskatchewan, supported by the premier of Saskatchewan, Mr. Romanow, rejected the national program. I can bring in the numbers from my own farm. Under the previous GRIP program as directed nationally and for all provinces we were guaranteed $115 an acre premium paid for our farm in the first year. On durum wheat we were guaranteed $120 premium paid, which was bankable. We could go to the bank and get a guarantee that it would advance on the 28 bushel per acre on our farm, which was the long-term average, $115 an acre on hard wheat and $120 an acre on durum wheat after the premium was paid on both crop insurance and GRIP.

The provincial Government of Saskatchewan changed the program after the election and said it would not go along with it. After the changes came in that were made by Mr. Wiens and Mr. Romanow—and Mr. Romanow has indicated clearly now that he made a major mistake—our farm was only guaranteed $80 an acre on hard wheat and $90 an acre on durum. That took the top right off the program and cost farmers on average anywhere from $30 to $40 an acre. I have travelled through my riding and asked farmers what the changes made by the provincial Government of Saskatchewan cost. It is my understanding Mr. Romanow's government only saved approximately $17 million. Opting out of the national program lost the province of Saskatchewan over $400 million. Saskatchewan could not afford this.

• (1050)

There is another interesting point about the direction the NDP took in Saskatchewan. For years it has supported national, universal programs in health and agriculture in this country. It reneged and did not support the national program that was put in place by the various groups of producers.

I sat at the table when John Wise called together 50 to 60 groups of producers from all across Canada. They developed a program that was not perfect, but was workable for the whole nation. I will give the numbers. Since 1984 for every $1 that has been paid into the federal government from Saskatchewan, $1.59 has been paid back to the province of Saskatchewan.

How could the premier of Saskatchewan and the NDP government in Saskatchewan reject a national, universal program that worked for everyone and was developed by farmers? I think they have a lot of explaining to do. It is no wonder Mr. Romanow said they made a mistake.

The federal members here this morning are not willing to admit they have made a very serious mistake. Next year's problem is very important. Let us get back to the table in Saskatchewan and not make the mistake two years in a row.

No government can see a drought or frost coming. I was chairman of the task force on drought in western Canada in those drought years. I saw a government come through for the farmers. As Parliamentary Secretary to the Prime Minister I have seen a Prime Minister who never turned down the farmers.

We have just seen what they have done in Saskatchewan. I do not want to be too hard on the Liberals here, but we can remember when the last Liberal Prime Minister told the farmers to sell their own wheat. We do not have to acknowledge from any government on the opposition benches that we as a government have worked for the farmers. This includes Grant Devine in Saskatchewan who was a farmers' man, and the Prime Minister in the House of Commons.

These are the short-term problems. Let us look at the long-term problem. The world trade war is causing a mammoth problem for Canadian farmers and for farmers all over the world. I can assure you that Canadian farmers are as competitive as any other farmers. They can produce grain as cheaply as farmers anywhere. According to the figures of the United Nations, the trade war has cost us $299 billion in subsidies alone in 1991 figures.

At the same time, to be realistic, if you go out on the prairies you will see piles of wheat on the farms.

We read our newspapers and see that people are starving around the world. The problem is that on the international level food is not a priority. We must come to grips with this. This makes absolutely no sense.

At the same time we are getting $2 or $3 a bushel for grain. How are we going to deal with it? The GATT has been dealing with it and I certainly support the GATT in every way in accomplishing its goals. It has been a long time coming.

I believe the G-7 countries must take hold of this problem and deal with it as the number one international problem we face today. The major international problems have been arms control and cold war. The major international problems of today seem to be starvation, the trade war and agriculture, which is going through very difficult problems. How are we dealing with this?

I want to assure you the Prime Minister of Canada carried agriculture to the G-7 Tokyo conference and has continually been doing this on behalf of the Canadian farmers and the Canadian people. Now that he is the senior member in the G-7, only the Prime Minister will be able to represent the farmers of Canada at the G-7 with regard to the great problems that face us internationally in the world-war subsidies on food.

It is most important that the G-7 take hold of this problem, deal with it through the GATT at the international level and make food a priority. As a farmer who has produced food all my life, the only thing I know is farming. One day the Prime Minister took my glasses, used them to read the menu—he did not have his glasses with him that day—and said: "Len, all I see is wheat, wheat and wheat". It is true that has been my life.

There is no higher calling than producing food. If you want to look at the international situation today, there is a lot of talk about rights. Rights for this and rights for that. Minority groups are talking about rights at every level. Certainly there is not a more important right than the right to eat. If you are going to eat, the farmers have to produce food. I do not know of any better place to produce food and grain than in the prairies of Canada that God has blessed us with. They can and will produce food.

We must strengthen agriculture and build it up if we are to survive as a strong nation. We must build it up if the world is to benefit from the food farmers produce. I strongly believe we must make food a priority at the G–7 level. The leadership must come from there to deal with the world banks, the international situation and so on.

What about storing food for the long term? We know what has happened in Russia. The whole infrastructure has broken down. The ability to produce food has broken down. This must not happen in Canada. It will not happen under a Conservative government and Conservative leadership which has given historical leadership to agriculture. You ask those prairie farmers out there. Talk to them one on one as I have.

• (1100)

They know a government that has stood with them through thick and thin.

Mr. Harvard: That isn't what they said at the rally.

Mr. Gustafson: I was at the rally. I heard them boo the premier of Saskatchewan. I saw our Minister of Agriculture stand and make a declaration and give the message to farmers that we were there to listen, as they know we have been.

This situation that exists in Saskatchewan is interesting. For months the former Minister of Agriculture kept going back to the province and saying: "We will leave the door open for you. Don't scuttle the national program". He said that again and again. How many times did he say that on TV and in this House? Yet the NDP in Saskatchewan decided to move ahead in its own way and not go along with the national program.

I am a strong believer that we do need some strong programs to see the farmers over the difficult times. They have been put in place, imperfect as they may be. On my farm when it costs me $35 an acre that is not bankable because of the direction of a provincial government that would not go along with the national program, it is pretty serious. That is a pretty important third line of defence to me. It was put in place and must be reconsidered.

We know that the NDP did better in the northern part of the province than in the south. I do not know whether it was to penalize those who might have a drought as we do in the south. The old Assiniboia riding, which is now part of the Swift Current riding and part of the Souris—Moose Mountain riding, produces more grain than the rest of the province put together.

Mr. Althouse: Come on. Maybe wheat.

Mr. Gustafson: Wheat and saleable products that go into the international market.

The other point that I want to make is that the provincial government obviously thought there could not be a frost. That was an unfortunate situation. The frost came and we have wheat that is weighing 62 pounds a bushel, if frozen. On the other hand, we have some that is weighing 52 pounds and it is black. You would wonder whether the cows would even eat it.

Had they not disturbed the program—

Mr. Althouse: That's a crop insurance program that wasn't touched.

Mr. Gustafson: The crop insurance program and GRIP were programs that were working together and would work together for the benefit of those who bought the insurance.

Because of the interference of the NDP in the provincial program, many farmers opted out of it. The percentage of farmers going into the program in Ontario was up considerably, somewhere around 85 per cent. The percentages in Manitoba were up considerably. The percentages in Alberta were up considerably. In Saskatchewan, because of the unrest created by the provincial NDP government, many farmers opted out. They now find themselves in a very difficult position.

If I have anything to say to farmers after the 14 years that I have been here come May, it is that anyone who was in the national programs did benefit from them. It would only have to be a government that was completely out of its mind that would put in a program on a national scale that would not work to the benefit of farmers.

Every program that I have ever seen, whether the western wheat program or the drought programs, always worked to the benefit of farmers. Here is an opportunity to buy insurance. Might I state that when it comes to GRIP or crop insurance, farmers do pay a premium. Many urban people feel that all this money is coming from the taxpayer. It does not all come from the taxpayer.

A good portion comes from premiums that are paid year after year. Some years they do not collect from the program. Yet they pay a premium, just like when you buy house insurance. That is why it is so important to have a national program, a universal program if I could use the words so often used by our friends in the NDP. They chose to opt out of it. This trade war continues. We have to come to grips with the long-term program of making food a priority at the international level.

I want to repeat that the Prime Minister of Canada is well positioned. He has done a great job. I am a farm boy. I have seen him operate at as close a level as anyone. I can state that he has never brought in a program that was not a benefit. He has listened again and again to the farmers. This government stood with the farmers. It will stand with them. Just look at the record of the opposition parties on the other side of this House and what they have done in the last 20 years.

The Conservative government increased assistance to farmers 640 per cent. I am not saying it was not needed. It certainly was. I am not saying there is not much more to do. Certainly we have had a government that no one can criticize on the basis of the opposition motion before us today.

Let us be honest. Let us be fair. I am sure that the farmers of Saskatchewan and all of Canada understand and understand very well.

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I note from the comments of the member for Assiniboia that he was quite critical of the 1992 GRIP. That is his privilege.

I think it should be noted, however, that the way the GRIP functions, the 1991 GRIP is the program that provided the income for 1992, the year just completed, and that coverage was inadequate as demonstrated by the 13,000 farmers who gathered at the Saskatoon rally. They criticized the fact that they did not have enough income. The source of that inadequate level of income was from that 1991 GRIP that the hon. member praises so highly.

He did not tell the House that that first effort at the Gross Revenue Insurance Program, known as GRIP, was highly subsidized by the federal government. In the second year of the program the premiums that the farmers had to pay would have increased had there not been a change by 30 per cent. The federal government paid 25 per cent of the premiums in the first year of the program which would have meant that to continue the cost for the farmer would have been 33 per cent higher. He did not tell us that.

He did not explain that the contingent liability from the first year's program to the province of Saskatchewan which has to pick up the deficit that is created from the program rose by $160 million. He did not tell us that the premiums that the province would have had to pay would have gone up because of the level of subsidization on the first year's program which was there to entice people or encourage them, depending on your choice of words, to join the program.

That would have made the program considerably higher cost at his farm than he indicates. For most of us who are on the farm, the program was getting very close to creating a question of whether the benefit was going to outweigh the cost.

The 15-year index moving average price would have dropped under that first program from $4.15 to $3.80 and some cents. The province mitigated that and was able to negotiate a higher level of support to $4.07. There were some positive things that came out of that program which he did not tell us.

As well, the coverage levels as they are now being enforced go by crop district level which discourages the practice that had developed in the first year of simply using the program. Sprinkling seed across the fields and taking the guarantee is no longer possible. You have to get most of your money from the market. The average for your crop district is what the payout will be.

• (1110)

Finally, I want to point out that the hon. member's area gets the highest coverage from that program because it is so tied to wheat and wheat is such a poor risk these days. The highest payments will go to the wheat areas. The areas which try to shift their production to meet the market demand will get the very lowest payouts, and mine is one of those.

Mr. Gustafson: There is no question that there has been a great deal of controversy over the programs and the various areas of the province. In answer to the last question the hon. member raised, one of the areas where both the producers and the different farm groups have voiced their opinion was certainly dealing with the pulse crops, canolas and such, and bringing that into should I say a fairer level with the grain production of especially wheat and durum wheat. The federal government was looking at this and making adjustments to this, in all fairness.

This is the point that I want to make on the criticism the hon. member makes of the national program. Nobody said it was perfect, but certainly it was much better than it is now, having been destroyed by the provincial government of Saskatchewan. These improvements need to be made and they will be made through the proper channels of discussing with farm groups, sitting down with the province of Saskatchewan, as the provinces of Manitoba, Alberta and Ontario did.

Mr. Althouse: If you had to live with it, you would have been complaining, too.

Mr. Gustafson: I suppose that politics has its place, but certainly politics took an awful toll on Saskatchewan. The provincial government of Saskatchewan decided to play politics. It said: "Well, we are in now. This looks like a Devine-Mulroney program so we had better throw it out and put something in for four years down the road when it will look like an NDP program".

Mr. Althouse: But the farm groups recommended the changes. They implemented the farm groups' recommendations.

Mr. Gustafson: It did not work. It cost the farmers of Saskatchewan a lot of money. Now they are coming back with cap in hand and asking us to make changes. How can we make changes that will be credible to the province of Manitoba, fair to the province of Alberta and fair to the province of Ontario after they have rejected a national universal program that was put in place after a lot of discussion by farmers themselves for the benefit of farmers?

This has been a major, major mistake. The Saskatchewan farmers will not forget it quickly.

Mr. Joe McGuire (Egmont): I am surprised that the member for Souris—Moose Mountain, the parliamentary secretary to the Prime Minister, did not spend a few minutes giving us an update on the supply management, the strengthening and clarification of article XI at the GATT negotiations. The government trade negotiator says this government is not pressing at all for the strengthening and clarification of article XI. Basically it has given up any effort to convince other nations regarding this article, which is so important to our national programs, especially in eastern Canada.

I wonder if he would comment on that.

Mr. Gustafson: On the programs relating to dairy, chicken production and marketing boards and so on, the minister of trade again and again in this House has indicated that the Canadian position before the GATT is one that protects that direction and will continue to do so.

The member is well aware of that. That is the record of this government and will continue to be.

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member blamed the plight of the farmers on the trade war that has been going on for seven years. He and his government have been in power now for eight years, and are going into the ninth year.

Surely to goodness over eight years his government could have negotiated with other countries around the world and resolved this trade war. Who does he shift that blame on? He shifted all the blame on the NDP in Saskatchewan, and rightly so. I would agree with him there.

How can he justify that after eight years the trade war is still going on and still hurting the Canadian farmers?

Mr. Gustafson: Mr. Speaker, anyone that would trivialize the size of the trade war and the impact it has had internationally, I would question whether he knows much about what is happening in international trade.

I said a few minutes ago that the subsidies paid by various governments around the world were $299 billion and the European common market countries alone paid $133 billion. There is some good reason for that.

A doctor from Austria, lumping us as Americans, said: "You Americans do not understand starvation. I've seen starvation three times in my life". With some reservations, there is no questions that the Europeans see food differently than North Americans. I am not blaming the Europeans entirely. The U.S. exports only 25 per cent of its product, whereas Canada exports 80 per cent of its coarse grains, wheats, durums and so on. It is a major problem.

Certainly we do not trivialize the problem. There has been one leading country, both through our trade minister and our Prime Minister. We just saw the implications of it when the Prime Minister visited the new President of the United States, Mr. Clinton. What was the topic? Trade.

I am sure that agriculture was talked about. Without a doubt this has been important. It is important that we—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. The time for questions and comments has now expired.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to have an opportunity to speak on this motion today. It highlights many of the failures of this government, not all of them in agriculture, but certainly most of them. It is important that this kind of issue be aired on the floor of the House of Commons.

In commenting on the speech of the Parliamentary Secretary to the Prime Minister, it is interesting that he tells us what a wonderful job the Prime Minister has done at international meetings of the G-7 with regard to the farm situation. If he is responsible for all the chaos that there is today in international trade and agriculture commodities, it is nothing to brag about.

The Prime Minister and his minions over in the Langevin Block do a great job of telling us what a wonderful job the Prime Minister is doing on international trade issues. Where are the results?

Even in 1986 the Prime Minister's Office was putting out press releases saying that he had gone to the G-7 meeting in Japan to solve these problems. He put it all forward and he was going to lead on to the great successes of the Uruguay round. The press release from the G-7 meeting in Tokyo, Japan, in early May 1986 never mentioned one word. He made a great impact if the communique from the G-7 meeting in Tokyo, Japan, never even mentioned it.

The parliamentary secretary tells us what a wonderful job the Prime Minister has done in assisting Canadian agriculture. Would he trade Canadian agriculture as it is today for what it was in 1985 when this government came to power? Thirteen thousand fewer farmers are in business today. The debt levels in Saskatchewan are horrendous. The Farm Credit Corporation owns more land than probably even the banks. Half the bankruptcies, 51 per cent, approximately 220 bankruptcies in 1991 were on Saskatchewan farms. The situation is really dismal.

The Parliamentary Secretary to the Prime Minister put forward the canard that the Prime Minister has led us into some great promised land in agriculture. What a disaster. Show me one sector of Canadian agriculture that feels confident. Show me farmers that are not desperately concerned they are either going to lose their farms or they are going to lose the viability of their farms today and I will show you farmers who do not make their incomes from farming.

The Saskatchewan Wheat Pool people are going to be here tomorrow meeting with caucuses of the House. The average price of grain in Saskatchewan is something like $2 a bushel, 50 per cent of the grain is feed grain because of the quality.

The parliamentary secretary blames the NDP government in Saskatchewan for changing the GRIP. That criticism is well placed. Two farmers, the former minister and Mr. Williams who both have now left agriculture portfolios, made the agreement. Surely two politicians, even though they are from different parties, could sit down and say: "The NDP made a mistake; the federal government is concerned about it. Let us sit down to resolve this problem". Is that what happened? No, it is not what happened. They issued press releases back and forth, April, May, June, July, August, September, November and December. The Prime Minister mounted to the challenge in September as we launched into the referendum debate.

He stated that once the crops were in the bin and the frost damage had been assessed, the federal and provincial governments would start discussing compensation to farmers. He added that the federal government would not be shy about delivering money to Saskatchewan producers before the October 26 referendum. Where is the money?

We have heard from the parliamentary secretary about what a wonderful Prime Minister he is, how many billions of dollars have been delivered to farmers and what a wonderful job this Prime Minister has done internationally. He has solved most of these problems. There are still $300 billion in subsidies which are driving the price of wheat in Saskatchewan down to $2 a bushel. Where is the money that the Prime Minister guaranteed in September?

We know how the former Minister of Agriculture, a buddy of a another former minister, snatched away $73 million in the economic statement in December which is going to cost every shipper about $2 a tonne to ship grain.

In September the Prime Minister promised that he would not shy away from delivering money to Saskatchewan producers. He knew what the situation was. He knew there was drought in the north during the summer. He knew it was cold and damp and they could not get the crop off in decent shape.

When the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool put together the rally on January 26 in Saskatoon, finally the Tories and the NDP got together and produced what they tried to portray as a $170 million benefit.

However when all the gloss is stripped away it comes down to $40 million in new money. Talk about bringing forth a mouse; $40 million for a province which estimates its shortfall is something like $800 million, according to the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool. The $40 million of new money translates, since it is paid over five years, into $4 million a year.

The parliamentary secretary is simply not serious. He may be able to say all these things but on checking what is actually delivered in terms of dollars in producers' pockets, for those 13,000 who attended that meeting, it is practically nothing.

Let us look at the gravity of the situation. As put forward by the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool, it is clearly approaching the situation which we saw during the Great Depression of the 1930s: low incomes, declining assets and inadequate safety net programs.

The Saskatchewan government can well be blamed for changing it because we do not have a guarantee per acre of benefit. However it seems to me that two ministers of agriculture from the same province could sit down together and come up with a much better solution than $40 million of improved benefits. The rest of it, in the announcement in Saskatoon on January 26, is strictly speeding up payments that would be made anyway and the premiums that are paid by the producers themselves. Actually the producers pay some $40 million which is the equivalent of the $40 million of new money.

I want to get to the situation in southwestern Ontario because our producers are facing the worst cropping situation in history for corn, soybean and other crops.

The reason those 13,000 farmers in Saskatoon last month rallied is explained simply by looking at the projections for net farm income. In 1990 the net farm income dropped to $395 million, in 1991 it was $414 million, in 1992 it was $636 million and they still see a shortfall of $800 million.

Let us look at the projection for 1993. The projection for 1993 is $238 million. That is just about slightly more than one–third of the 1992 income. That is why producers are terrified, especially if their fuel bills are not paid and their taxes are not paid.

The parliamentary secretary stood up today talking on behalf of the Prime Minister and saying what this Prime Minister has done in the past and what he is going to do in the future. Now is the day for him to stand up and tell the House and those producers in Saskatchewan what he and the Prime Minister are going to do. He says the Prime Minister has solved most of the international trade problems. How is he going to solve this realized net farm income for 1993 of $238 million. That is what the producers want to know.

I want to deal with the farm income problem in southwestern Ontario. I am told that this fall they had the worst cropping situation in history. Something like 350,000 acres of corn crops still have not been harvested. That is about 20 per cent. The grade is quite low but it is suitable for the feeding of livestock. The problem is that many of the elevators are already full so the farmers cannot deliver that crop.

• (1130)

I have never seen a more cavalier attitude than the one we saw from the former agriculture minister. Several years ago the government did away with the advanced payment program, the interest free cash advance. In the spring of 1989 it had been done away with and then brought back by Order in Council that same fall.

It is never known now whether there is going to be an interest free cash advance or not. This year we did not know until late September or early October whether this assistance was going to be available. A program has been available in western Canada where if the crop cannot be harvested the government will give the interest free cash advance. The level of the interest free cash advance has been set at $50,000.

Last fall, the corn producers and others in southwestern Ontario where the crop is relatively more expensive per acre, asked if that interest free cash advance could be made available in Ontario and Quebec and in other parts of the east on the same basis as the regular interest free cash advance of $50,000. The minister hemmed and hawed and the agriculture committee passed a resolution calling on the government to make this interest free cash advance of $50,000 available. That went on and on and on.

Finally, in December the government agreed to make available $15,000 which is the same level as in the west, plus $3,000 for drying cost. However, it was made so late that out of the 25,000 corn producers, so far to my understanding only 20 of those producers have been able to take advantage of the interest free cash advance for unharvested grain.

What a disaster. Producers are having difficulty getting the crop off but they have GRIP and crop insurance to guarantee the crop and they only get interest free cash advance on half of the crop anyway. The government will not provide the same interest free cash advance for unharvested grain as it will for harvested grain.

Then when the Ontario corn producers tried to implement the interest free cash advance there was a little hooker in there. Treasury Board had set the amount of the interest free cash advance available at $41 million. They had to hustle around to various banks to find the money. The parliamentary secretary never talks about all these little hookers that the government has in there to hinder and to confound the farmers of this area.

One possible source for all of this low grade corn would be for livestock feed in Cuba, but they cannot get the credit available. The Canadian Wheat Board has credits available. The possible market for this low grade corn is for livestock feed in Cuba, but the credit arrangements are simply not there. These producers are so frustrated that we see in the press reports this week where a group of farmers down in Lucknow, Ontario have put together a meeting of 1,000 people to protest the lack of action by the government to assist. The situation is really very serious as we commence 1991.

A report put out by the WEFA forecasting group in late December says that government programs boost 1992 income, but a crash in 1993 income is forecast. Clearly that is the case.

Looking back at why there was some increase in government support programs in 1992 one finds it all came from the massive rallies that occurred throughout the fall of 1991. The government had chopped its support programs in 1990. Even though the world price of wheat had dropped to $2 a bushel, the lowest since the 1930s, the lowest in real terms in history, the government finally approved a payment under FSAM-2—that is the federal smoke and mirrors program number two—in the fall of 1991 for $800 million. That $800 million of course was not paid until 1992, otherwise the income situation would have been even worse in 1992 than it was. Even there we saw these massive rallies because of the inadequacies of the government programs.

The WEFA report forecast a drop of 21 per cent in net farm income in 1993. That is similar to the figures for Saskatchewan. It is in proportion.

The situation as we enter 1993, six or seven years after the international trade war began, is even worse than it was then. We see the total inadequacies of the government support programs but more than that we see the government chiselling on this. It is not known whether the interest free cash advance is going to be available until October or December. It is always a fight to get any assistance rather than the government coming up front and saying what the program is and what assistance is going to be made available. The government is simply not doing well enough.

Mr. Len Gustafson (Souris—Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, it is interesting that the hon. member for Algoma gets so exercised when he hears the work the Prime Minister has been doing and carrying on at the international level. Especially when we hear day after day from a party across the way that is opposed to free trade. It wants a protectionist approach. Here we are with a country that exports 80 per cent of its product in terms of wheat, durums and grain and that party has a mishmash of policy that would make your head spin.

I wonder what would happen if that party were to try to implement the kinds of policies where it says on the one hand it will do this and on the other hand do that. There is not a clear direction of where that party is going. Then it trivializes the international situation of the trade war.

Nobody said that one man could solve this all alone. However, certainly one man can give the right direction as we saw just last week with the Prime Minister's visit to Washington and his dealing with the trade situation and the international trade war going on.

As far as I can see and watching day after day in this House, whether it is the leader of the NDP or the leader of the Liberal Party, there is no direction. There would be very little if any international presence in which the existing situation in Canada would be put forward.

It is interesting that this member from Algoma would stand in the House and trivialize the immensity of not only an international recession but also an international trade war that is going on. Anybody who is not aware of that is not aware of what is going on.

Any government that does not deal with that in trade, just to give an example, the U.S. is now our fourth largest trading partner in wheat. Close that border on livestock. Incidentally, livestock has hit the highest price in terms of 97 cents a pound for live weight cattle shipped with much of it going into the United States. I do not know how the opposition would deal with a situation like that. We would have the old Trudeau era again: Sell your own wheat, do your own thing.

• (1140)

In commenting on what has been, the hon. member knows we had 20 per cent interest rates in 1985. Under this Prime Minister, we have the lowest interest rates in 31 years. Certainly there are international problems and they are immense but with the mishmash of ideas that on the one hand this and on the other hand that which come from the leadership of the Liberal Party, I would fear as a farmer to live under that direction.

Mr. Foster: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. parliamentary secretary had really been interested in bringing information to the House today, he would have told us exactly what the Prime Minister did in Washington last week. We saw him walking around with the new President.

This House passed a unanimous resolution on February 12, 1992. It directed the Prime Minister to meet with the President and to secure his support for our position on a strengthened and clarified article XI. We want to know, as do the dairy farmers, the poultry industry and the supply management groups of Canada whether he did that. Did he do anything? Did he really accomplish anything in Washington or was he just looking for a photo opportunity?

People are interested in the results. Why did the Prime Minister not go there and get a commitment from President Clinton? Why did he not get a commitment if he has all this international power and influence? Nobody is trivializing the trade war. The trade war has been a disaster.

The parliamentary secretary is telling us that the Prime Minister has great influence, that he is a senior member of the G–7. If he is this member and has all this influence, why is he not able to sit down with President Clinton and get a commitment to support us with our supply management system? Clearly his Minister of Agriculture is reported to have supported supply management systems in the United States. If that is true, then there should be no problem convincing the President that it is a good system for not only Canada, but also for the United States.

If we look at the Washington news press releases, Mr. Espy, the secretary of agriculture, has voted for supply management bills in the past. Therefore groups like the dairy farmers of Canada, the poultry and feather industry are asking the Prime Minister to go there and get a commitment in the GATT negotiations. Has that been achieved or not? That is what we want to know.

Clearly the supply management groups are the most stable, most viable groups in the country. If he does not have that kind of support from the President in those GATT negotiations, then we could end up with that whole supply management industry being destroyed. We would go on to the future and see this most viable sector, some 35,000 producers producing something like 28 per cent of farm income being destroyed.

The House directed the Prime Minister to do that last February 12. We want to know whether or not he achieved it.

Mr. Gustafson: Mr. Speaker, I would like to comment on that whole direction. What this government has been trying to achieve under the direction of the Prime Minister is important.

When the minister of trade met with Arthur Dunkel of the GATT, I happened to be there with him. At that time he put forward the importance of the concept for Canada. I heard Mr. Dunkel ask if we had any idea of how big a job it is to get the support of 108 nations that are bringing input into the GATT.

This again makes the point of the hon. member trivializing, if you will, the trade war and the contribution that the Prime Minister has made to trying to end this.

We must continue our negotiations. We are a trading nation. We must trade into that international market or we will lose the grain sector or even other sectors, steel or what have you, in Canada.

Our government has taken strong positions under the leadership of the Prime Minister, the Minister for International Trade, the Minister of Agriculture, to achieve these ends. We must continue it. That is the point I am making.

Mr. Foster: Mr. Speaker, what the parliamentary secretary had to say about the Minister for International Trade is very interesting. In fact there was a letter written to the Minister for International Trade and the Minister of Agriculture on February 1 asking if the government is willing to reconfirm its support for the resolution that was passed on February 12, 1992.

The amendment which our party put down to that resolution says:

> And that this House calls upon the Prime Minister to involve himself personally in the GATT negotiations in the interest of Canada's dairy, egg, and poultry producers by meeting with the President of the United States and with the President of the European Community in order to secure their support and to do so in co-operation with other countries that agree with Canada's position on a strengthened and clarified article XI.

There are 130 trading nations in the world but the first two that you have to lock in are the European Community and the United States. The Prime Minister has met with the President of the United States. Did he lock in the President of the United States to support our position? When is he meeting with the European Community? Is the government prepared to reinstate or reaffirm its position for the resolution that was passed unanimously in the House of Commons on February 12, 1992? If he is, it is a direct signal. We will not have these press reports coming out as on January 21 and the headlines reading: "Ottawa altering farm stance. Border barriers find few friends. Ottawa softens—".

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. I am sorry but the time for comments and questions has now expired.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I will be taking a 10-minute slot and the second 10-minute slot will be taken by the hon. member for The Battlefords—Meadow Lake.

I am happy to have the opportunity to speak on this motion put forward by the member for Mackenzie. It is very important that this House address agricultural issues. One of the things I have noticed is that the government over the last number of years has tried to create a series of myths about what is happening in Canadian society.

To give some recent examples, the minister of employment is somehow trying to blame those people who for one reason or another have to quit their jobs, as the reason that unemployment insurance is costing so much.

Somehow in that whole debate the government has ignored the fact that over 1.5 million Canadians are unemployed, that last year alone a million people in this country exhausted their UI benefits. They are people who were fired, people who were laid off, people who quit for whatever reason. Somehow the government has narrowed the debate to those people who have quit and is taking away their right to a level playing field in terms of how they are affected by this government decision. That is why people are concerned.

• (1150)

There is also the myth, which certain government members have perpetrated, that the fishing industry is receiving millions and millions of dollars in hand–outs that they do not deserve and that those people engaged in fishing really do not deserve the kind of support that they need.

When it comes to agriculture, if we listen to government ministers and government backbenchers we would think that the government has bent over backwards to meet all the needs of farmers. Again that is not true.

I will quote some information that was produced for the member for Mackenzie by the pools: "Compared to our two largest grain competitors, Europe and the United States, Canada is falling behind. Using 1981 real total net farm incomes as a base, European incomes fell by 16.5 per cent over the last decade, American farm incomes rose by 23 per cent and Canadian farm incomes fell by 51.4 per cent over the 10–year period from 1981 to 1991". That is a 51 per cent decrease in farm incomes in this country.

That is why this debate is taking place. The farmers in this country, the rural communities in this country, know there is a crisis. It is not a matter of too many farmers. It is not a matter of farmers refusing to go out and seek new crops, which seems to be the response of The Globe and Mail to the crisis that exists. Because of what is happening at the national level and at the international level, our farm incomes have gone down by 51.4 per cent over the last decade.

While governments may laud their various achievements or claim they have had various achievements over the same time period, take a look at some of the things that have actually happened. Look, for example, at the Crow transportation benefit. My friend, the member for Moose Jaw—Lake Centre said: "The Liberals began dismantling the protection farmers had under the Crow rate and now the PCs are set to finish the job. If we lose the Crow rate we could see a lot of grain moving to port via the United States".

What exactly has the government done with the Crow rate? The Liberals under Jean–Luc Pépin and later the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre actually destroyed the Crow benefit that existed for many farmers. They set up something else to replace it.

What has the Conservative government done with that replacement? Right now we are looking at a 10 per cent cut in 1993–94 and another cut of 10 per cent in 1994–95; that is 10 per cent this year, 10 per cent next year, cut in the support that Canadian farmers received in lieu of the original Crow agreement.

What has that meant? In 1983–84 farmers paid out an average of $5.72 to move a tonne of grain or 23 per cent of the total freight cost. By 1992–93 it cost farmers an average of $11.98 or 37 per cent of the cost of moving a tonne of grain. The actions of this government are increasing the costs of farmers trying to move grain out of this country at a time when there is a 51.4 per cent decrease in farm income for farm families across this country over a 10–year period.

It is interesting that during the same time period farm income in the United States went up by 23 per cent. It is not because American farmers are more efficient on the land. It is because American farmers are more efficient in Congress. They have subsidies and programs that do not exist in this country. They have programs that have taken away our traditional markets, and when that happens our government is silent.

Occasionally there is one single speech, saying the Americans should not be doing that. Then there is a quick shift from attacking the Americans to all of a sudden blaming Europe. The reality is that it is the Americans that are taking our markets. It is the Americans that export the largest amount of grain. The Europeans, by and large, consume the vast majority of the grain they produce.

It is the Americans that are the price leaders. Unfortunately, they are also the subsidy leaders when it comes to supporting their farmers and supporting the sale offshore of their product.

One of the things that has concerned us with the free trade agreement and the NAFTA agreement has been the fact that we continue to be harassed by American industry. Our farmers, whether they are hog farmers or grain farmers, are harassed just as much as our steel makers and those involved in softwood lumber.

One of the things that the free trade agreement was supposed to end was this harassment. One of the things that NAFTA was supposed to improve on was bringing an end to this harassment. That has not happened. We have more and more cases against Canada being brought forward under the American anti-dumping legislation.

American experts have admitted this is harassment. They have said that 97 per cent of cases brought forward before their commerce department are ruled upon in favour of American industry. American experts have said that the harassment is often the end goal. It is not that the Americans are afraid to lose before some dispute settlement mechanism, because they have achieved their goal through their harassment process.

If you make it difficult for steel, if you make it difficult for softwood lumber producers to go into the American market, it does not matter what the final ruling is by a dispute settlement mechanism body; you have achieved your goals because you have harassed Canadian industry and effectively cut off markets.

In the few minutes I have left, I would like to talk about what we can do to reduce the costs to Canadian farmers. One of the things that is obviously important for me is a decision on the port of Churchill. The port of Churchill provides a shorter, downhill route for getting grain to our sea port. It is a shorter distance to much of our European market.

What the farmers need, especially in the area between the Alberta and Saskatchewan border where most farmers find it cheaper by up to $30 a tonne to ship through Churchill, is a commitment from this government to make a decision on the port of Churchill. It is the time of year when that decision has to be made for this year. It has to be made this month. However, we also need a long-term commitment to assist farmers.

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, I am glad that my hon. friend from Churchill got on to the subject of agriculture, because he was straying in various directions. He spoke, for example, of the Atlantic fishery as if there had been no response from this government at all to the very grave difficulties which we face in Atlantic Canada.

He dismissed the $565 million aid package, the Atlantic Fisheries Adjustment Program, that was brought down two years ago. He dismissed the $1 billion of special assistance being made available to support the industry in Newfoundland this year. He completely ignores the $800 million that is annually pumped into Atlantic Canada through the unemployment insurance scheme. Perhaps those bits of assistance are either dismissed by him as irrelevant or they have kind of escaped his notice. I notice he did talk about unemployment insurance and I was intrigued. He is making a mission of this. There is no question there is a difference in philosophy on both sides of the House on this issue. My constituents and others in my province, which is highly dependent on unemployment insurance are saying bang on. When jobs are scarce and times are tough people who quit their jobs without just cause should not have access to unemployment insurance. People are suggesting there are a lot of scams in unemployment insurance and they applaud this government's efforts to come to grips with that.

I want to ask the hon. member a question with respect to what he just said about the free trade agreement because it is most mystifying. It is my understanding that we have had eight panels under the FTA in the area of agriculture—one is being announced today—and every single one has been won by Canada. If we did not have the free trade agreement we would still have protectionists in the United States Congress but we would not have a means to rectify those improper actions.

If we had no FTA as my hon. friend's party advocates, how would he propose to resolve those disputes in the future?

Mr. Murphy: Mr. Speaker, I thought we were going to speak about agriculture, but I guess the member wants to talk about something else. I referred to agriculture, free trade, unemployment insurance and the farmers to talk about a common problem many Canadians face. Then I went on to talk about specific problems faced by people in agriculture.

With regard to free trade, I have said the government has failed to meet its own objectives. In 1987 it was the Conservative Prime Minister who said—I must admit I am only paraphrasing because I do not have the direct quote in front of me—the reason we are going into free trade is to end the harassment. I will get that quote for those members who do not seem to remember those words, but the harassment has not ended.

Mr. McCreath: Why will you not answer my question.

Mr. Murphy: The member asks me to answer his question but he wants to continue heckling. We did not end the harassment. It is continuing and continuing. Instead of the Prime Minister and the minister of trade going on Friday and Monday respectively to make the Canadian position, they were more concerned with protecting their own political backsides and protecting the NAFTA rather than saying: "Stop the harassment". That is what we need.

We had trade with the United States before we had the free trade agreement. We all know that. We also settled our disputes before we had the free trade agreement.

An hon. member: They harassed us then.

Mr. Murphy: We had harassment before and we have harassment now. Under NAFTA we will have more harassment because we have taken out the one clause that had some potential under the free trade agreement. It was the requirement that both Canada and the United States sit down and come up with a final definition of a subsidy. That was a requirement under the free trade agreement and over a five-year period it was supposed to resolve a lot of the problems we face. Under NAFTA that is no longer required. Under NAFTA we will continue to be harassed because none of the parties to the agreement will have a clear definition of what a subsidy is and is not.

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to speak on this motion today brought forward by my colleagues in the New Democratic Party, calling on the federal government to fulfil its responsibilities to agriculture that have been forsaken by this government since it was elected. This actually fits within the plans outlined by this government some time ago for agriculture when the now finance minister was Minister of Agriculture and with the white paper of the government called, "Growing Together" which was actually based on the assumption we already operate under a free market in agriculture. There was no recognition at all in the "Growing Together" paper that all of the marketing institutions we have operate under an oligopolistic situation. The only remnant of the free market in agriculture exists at the local level.

At the time of the release of the "Growing Together" paper, the National Farmers Union and others were able to analyse the paper and comment on it. The then president of the National Farmers Union, Wayne Easter, called the paper an acceptance of the negative international trends and a positive wave for the future. He used them to justify further cuts in domestic farm programs. Since that time we have seen that is exactly what has been happening.

Today's motion indicates a continuing commitment of the New Democratic Party members of Parliament to fight on behalf of agricultural producers. This continuing commitment has been shown virtually every day in this House since this sitting began. A farm rally in Saskatchewan during Parliament's recess attracted 13,000 producers and interested and concerned Saskatchewan residents. They called upon Ottawa and the Government of Canada to respect the financial responsibilities the government has to the producers on the land.

The New Democrats have been questioning government since Parliament sat. There have been speeches under the Borrowing Authority Act including my own. Today is the first opportunity New Democrats have had to raise any issue of significance in this House. Their commitment is to agriculture and the producers of Saskatchewan.

There are many other very important issues today that have been raised in Question Period and appear on the front pages of the newspapers, but New Democrats today have made agriculture the number one priority of our caucus and the debate in this Chamber today.

There is a crisis in agriculture and it must be addressed. On February 2, I rose in this House to speak about my reaction to the farm rally. At that time I talked about the need for an immediate injection of cash as discussed in our motion today. I also talked about other matters that were raised at the farm rally which included support for the Canadian Wheat Board, maintenance of the Crow benefit and the need for the development of a long-term agriculture program based on the cost of production and targeted to meet the needs of producers to sustain rural communities to the best of our ability.

Today I am not going to repeat myself in the short period of time that I have. I simply want to acknowledge and recognize that there is a crisis in agriculture. There are some serious financial problems in agriculture that must be addressed.

One of the concerns we are going to experience in 1993 that is addressed in this motion and put before the House today is the possible end of the Crow benefit subsidy. I want to address that important issue today in the short period of time I have because it is one of the issues we are going to have to address during 1993. Because the need for cash is so important, much of the debate is going to focus on cash. Perhaps some of the other large issues affecting farmers may be set aside in this debate.

I just want to argue today on behalf of the producers who are struggling to ensure that the Crow benefit payment is maintained.

I want to thank a former wheat board advisor and constituent of mine, Mr. Ted Strain, who farms outside of North Battleford, for some of the background I want to put on the record today.

We know that on November 14, 1983 the historic Crow rate ended with the passage of the Western Grain Transportation Act. The act was passed by a Liberal government with both opposition parties voting against the bill. Sufficient Conservative members of Parliament at that time were absent from the House to ensure the passage of the bill. This was also done by Liberal members in the Senate recently with the passage of C–91, the prescription drug bill.

• (1210)

The most profound implication of the Western Grain Transportation Act was its dramatic increase in revenue provided to the railways for the movement of grain. Under the statutory Crow rate, the railways received $4.89 per tonne for moving grain from central Saskatchewan to the seaboard. Under the Western Grain Transportation Act, the railways received $32 per tonne.

The cost was determined by Karl Snavely Jr. who had been hired by the federal government on three occasions to estimate the cost of moving grain by rail. The unusually high cost of 6.25 times the Crow rate was established as the price the railways should receive. The difference between the farmer's share and the amount the railroads received became known as the shortfall or the Crow benefit. It was paid to the railways in the form of a federal subsidy of $612 million which was later increased to $712 million. The December 2 statement of the finance minister indicates it will be reduced by $73 million in 1993–94 and by $104 million in 1994–95.

The Western Grain Transportation Act has given the railways and the government protection against increased costs but has left farmers exposed to future inflation and larger grain volume. The Crow benefit will not apply to export grain volume in excess of 30.5 million tonnes and farmers must pay the first 6 per cent of future inflation costs. That has been happening and will continue to happen.

The farmer receives no inflation protection while protecting the railways against inflation. If inflation continues at 6 per cent for 12 years, the cost of moving grain will double and the railways will receive $64 per tonne compared to $32 per tonne in 1990.

The $720 million Crow benefit is needed to allow western farmers to compete in the world market. Grain exports bring billions of dollars a year into Canada and benefit the domestic economy and farmers in rural communities. Grain is a renewable resource unlike oil, coal and potash where the revenue may not remain in Canada.

Saskatchewan stands to lose about $400 million a year if we lose the Crow benefit. In a province like ours where the rural base is so important, that benefit is critical to the survival of rural Saskatchewan.

Currently the Crow benefit is paid to the railway but the farmer receives the benefit in every bushel of export grain he delivers to the system. He receives it when he delivers his grain.

Realized net farm income is now $6.7 billion less than it would have been prior to the international grain war.

Agriculture Canada is predicting that realized net income for Saskatchewan farmers for this year will be about 30 per cent below the 10-year average and the 1993 forecast is set for a realized net income of only $238 million or about $4,000 per farmer. We have a serious crisis on our hands that must be addressed.

As the rally indicated, we need the injection of cash but we also need the protection of the Wheat Board and the security that the maintenance of the Crow benefit provides to all the producers in Saskatchewan. Without the maintenance of these longer term programs the other policies are simply band-aids that will eventually fall off and create the damage we are trying to prevent.

Mr. Geoff Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity on this opposition day to participate in this debate. It stems from a New Democratic Party motion which is critical of government policies toward agriculture.

In part, I would like to address that motion from the perspective of a member of Parliament who represents an area which is indeed as grain dependent as any part of the country. It is the southwestern and the south and central part of Saskatchewan which consists of some 25,000 square miles. I have 9,000 to 10,000 of the farmers in Saskatchewan and probably about 20 per cent of the viable farming operations.

I spent the first three weeks in January travelling around my constituency. I met with rural municipal councils. I met with groups of 6, 8 and 10 producers here and there. I tried to do this, quite frankly, in the absence of the representatives of the so-called organizations of whatever stripe. I tried to get away from them and just talk with farmers at the grass roots.

I fear that sometimes when the farm organizations come with policies, they are at a national level, or at the very least at a regional level. I am not entirely satisfied that they speak for all of their members. That was the reason for trying to get right down to the grass roots. I can attest to the fact that there is an enormous amount of frustration, disappointment and despondency out there.

First, I want to talk in terms of the history of the prairie grain sector. Then I will talk about the reality which it faces today, the politics of it and the hope that maybe there are some solutions and answers out there.

This is a relatively young sector of our economy. The prairies were for the most part settled in the early 1900s. It was a deliberate policy to settle and to populate the west. The offer was made throughout the world that people could come to Canada. They came on the promise of free land. They came as well for the kind of opportunities and freedoms which our country has and maintains proudly to this day.

People came from the northern United States, eastern Canada, Scandinavia, the British Isles, Germany, Ukraine, Poland and literally from the four corners of the earth. They came to settle the prairies.

It is very interesting and almost unparalleled in history that the country was laid out ahead of time. It was surveyed into sections or square miles and townships which consist of areas 6 miles by 6 miles, or 36 square miles. It was all laid out ahead of time and when the homesteaders came they had the opportunity to file for a particular quarter section of land. It was theirs provided they broke it up and cultivated a certain portion of that ground. They had the opportunity to build on it.

The information indicates that the number of farms peaked at a fairly early time during this century. I believe that in Saskatchewan, there were around 100,000 farms in the 1920s and 1930s and that the average farm size was in the area of 350 to 400 acres. If one follows that sort of chart, one will see that the number of farms has been steadily declining ever since those peak years. That decline continues today.

One will see as well that there is a corresponding increase in the size of the farms, which are now in the area of about 1,100 acres.

The west was laid out before the people came. It was the era of the steam engine. There were places for the train to take on water every five or six miles and it was around those spots that towns and villages grew up. That is where the grain elevators were constructed and that is where the farmers would haul their grain to the elevator so it could later be shipped out by rail to tide water and on to export.

There was a long and glorious history where the prairies were the bread basket of the world. There were huge markets in Europe that the prairies were able to satisfy. These were the golden years. Wheat was the king of the grains.

These villages and towns developed every five or six miles along the railway tracks. Farmers hauled maybe 20–25 bushels of wheat to the elevator in a horse-drawn wagon in the very early days. Those days are long gone and the reason for that is not a trade war today. It is the march of history. It is technology and advances in machinery and equipment. It is road building, communication and technology. It may have taken that pioneer farmer all day to take a load of grain to the elevator a mile or two away. Now they move a trailer of grain—huge amounts of grain—vast distances in that time.

• (1220)

The end result has been a consolidation. Many of these small towns and villages have ceased to exist and many more, I am sad to say, are in their death throes. It is not because of a particular policy of a government of any stripe. I say this not in any partisan way. It is simply reality. It is a result of technology and of markets.

I do not think there is much use in clinging to the old myth of the role of government to preserve rural Canada as it might have been or as someone idyllically remembers it 40 or 50 years ago when the population was at its peak. I am not so sure that those days were particularly rosy anyway. Oldtimers tell me that they do not recall so many wonderful times.

I guess the bottom line is that this movement from the rural areas to the urban ones is something that is a result of technology. It is happening in Saskatchewan. It has happened across Canada. It has happened world-wide.

We are told that back in the 1930s something like a third of all Canadians lived on the farm. Today I think that figure is in the area of perhaps 3 per cent or 4 per cent.

Over the past number of years, many programs have been generated to try to deal with the problems of agriculture. It is not easy to do because agriculture speaks with many voices. Sometimes people who live in the north see things differently from those who live in the south. Those who live in the west naturally see things differently from those who live in the east. If one is into livestock, one sees things differently than one would if one was a straight grain farmer.

There is an enormous difficulty in devising and developing national programs that work and that are seen to be satisfactory to all concerned.

In the past, it has been shown that programs like area-based crop insurance, like the WGSA which triggered huge areas and which had a five-year rolling average which turned out to be inadequate at the time when it was most needed. These programs have been discarded and a new generation of safety-net programs have been brought forward.

These programs, GRIP and NISA, were not developed in isolation. They were the result of many months and, indeed, many years of work, not just by federal and provincial governments, but by producer groups and by individual farmers. They were designed to try to overcome the obvious shortcomings of some of the programs that preceded them.

Those safety-net programs are in their infancy at this time. There are problems with them, yet at the same time they do seem to be working across most of the country. There are some criteria such as individuality, certainty, predictability and bankability that were central to these programs.

It is an unfortunate fact that GRIP has not been allowed to work within the province of Saskatchewan, which is a major grain-growing sector of the country. It is one of the sources of enormous frustration as related to me by producers within my constituency.

Over the past number of years, a variety of government programs have delivered unprecedented support into the grains and oilseeds sector. I believe that the numbers for Saskatchewan, for example, over the last six or seven years average out to something like slightly over $20,000 in support from the federal government to each farm operation within the province of Saskatchewan.

The irony is that for the taxpayer obviously it is too much. Yet for the hard-pressed producer who has been buffeted by historically low grain prices owing to subsidies beyond our borders it is not enough. So we have this fundamental problem. It is reality.

Canada is up against the United States and the European Community in this subsidy war. These countries have large populations, they have deep pockets and they have a much smaller dependence on export than Canada does.

Canada has 27 million people. We try to export five out of every six bushels of wheat that we grow. Eighty-three per cent of our production has to go outside of Canada hopefully to a willing buyer who has some money to pay us for our product. Unfortunately, at this point in time there are not those buyers out there and where there are buyers, the price is being undermined by the export subsidies and the domestic subsidies of our competing countries.

The United States has a population of about 250 million people and the European Common Market has about 330 million. Their dependency on export is much less. In the case of the United States it is 45 per cent. In the case of the Common Market it is something less than 20 per cent.

We are in the situation where the Canadian taxpayer, on a per capita basis, is putting more into the grain sector than his counterpart in the United States or in Europe. Sad to say, it is still not enough. What is the answer?

The Prairie Pools Organization presented a recent brief, December 1, 1992, to federal cabinet ministers. There was one particular paragraph which simply leaped out at me: "We cannot compete indefinitely with the export subsidies and trade-distorting internal support programs which are used by other major grain and oilseed trading countries, which are far in excess of those available to Canadian producers".

That is absolutely correct. It sums up the problem in a nutshell. If this is to go on indefinitely we cannot compete with the treasuries of those other nations. We simply do not have the resources available. That leads to a lot of the frustration and I guess to a lot of the politics.

I recall being at farm rallies in Rosetown, which is in Saskatchewan, Regina and Winnipeg in the fall of 1991. I was also in Shaunavon and Regina in the spring of 1992, in North Battleford last fall and of course more recently in Saskatoon. I have listened very carefully at those rallies and of course I understand and hear clearly the frustration.

I understand that there is a need there. We have people who are dependent on growing of wheat for a living. The question is how long we can continue to grow that wheat for export when there are no willing buyers out there and where there are, they are unable or unwilling to pay the necessary price. That is the reality that we face. What can we do about it?

I do not think it is good enough for opposition parties to come in here and try to deal with this problem through a cheap, grandstanding sort of motion like the one that is in front of the House today. I heard my colleague from Algoma, the Liberal agriculture critic, giving the old-style 1960s approach to this thing. There was not a single useful suggestion. It was just a long litany of the problems. God knows, we all know them. The people on the farms know them. They are not interested in hearing about that.

What they want to talk about are some useful, sensible solutions or alternatives, given the circumstances and given the reality out there. Then we have their friends in the New Democratic Party, the guys with two heads. They have one head for Ottawa and one head for Saskatchewan. Here in Ottawa we have heard some of it already and we are going to hear more during the course of the day. There is no expenditure which would be too great for the Saskatchewan grain farmers. They need help and the government had better go out, borrow a bunch of money and give it to them.

Meanwhile, back in Saskatchewan, guess what? They have a New Democratic government in Saskatchewan that has completely and utterly turned its back on the number one industry in Saskatchewan, agriculture.

This motion today has to be without a doubt the single most hypocritical motion that has ever been presented on the floor of the House of Commons. An NDP government in Saskatchewan which tore up the national GRIP program, unilaterally and arbitrarily tore up a program, did it retroactively, breached contracts which thousands of farmers had signed in good faith and then passed legislation retroactively saying that they were not responsible for the breach of contracts. They then had the audacity to say that it is somehow the fault of Ottawa that the safety net program is not working. Lo and behold, on top of that they have the unmitigated gall, the audacity, to come into this House today and try to point a finger at a federal government which has provided—unprecedented albeit; maybe it is not enough but it is unprecedented—support for that sector at the same time as their brethren, their friends in Saskatchewan are saying: "Sorry, we do not have any money for you".

Agriculture is a shared jurisdiction. I do not think it is good enough for New Democrats to whine here in Ottawa about the federal government's role while at the same time they have offered nothing, absolutely nothing, for agriculture within the province of Saskatchewan.

I view it as being two-faced and hypocritical. I am not going to say more about that. At the end of the day producers are frustrated. What they are seeing in their minds is a tennis match going back and forth. The ball is bouncing between levels of government.

At the rally in Saskatoon many farmers called for a mediation process to try to get federal and provincial governments together to try to fix the GRIP safety net problem in Saskatchewan. I do not blame them for feeling that way. The federal government and the federal minister are ready, willing and able to sit down with the provincial counterpart to try to fix the problem which was caused and created by the New Democratic Party in the first place.

In the brief time I have left I did want to touch on a number of suggestions that I have, given the circumstances, given the reality that there is no market and that the return at the moment is coming from the taxpayer. One questions whether it can come forever from the taxpayer. Obviously, more efficiencies are needed. There has been a lot of discussion about that and work being done on it.

Western Diversification: A $1.2 billion fund established by the federal government to do exactly what its name implies, to try to diversify a western Canadian economy which is all too dependent on grain.

Lower interest rates: the policies of our government trying to contain government spending, trying to contain the kind of philosophy and attitude that was left here from 20 years of Liberal government, we are succeeding here. That is why we have stable inflation and lower interest rates, the greatest gift I think that we can give not just to agriculture but to small business as well.

In addition, we are negotiating internationally, negotiating at the GATT and bilaterally with other countries, at the same time trying to secure a lessening of these harmful subsidies which have caused the problem.

Finally, we need co-operation federally and provincially to try to make the farm safety net programs work. In that regard, I urge my colleagues in the NDP here to stop complaining about Ottawa, go back to Regina and ask your provincial counterparts in good faith to sit down and see if we cannot make things work for Canadian producers.

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I was very interested in the hon. gentleman's speech. I think he chose wisely to concentrate on the changes that have occurred and the difficulties of adapting to change.

Toward the end of his speech he also talked about hypocrisy, claiming that the NDP members were speaking one set of truths in Ottawa and another set in Saskatchewan. I think for the record he ought to know if he continues with his clear eyed analysis that he attempted at the beginning of his speech, the reason there is the problem in Saskatchewan as a result of the shortfall in the income in 1992 has nothing to do with the change in policy precipitated by the provincial government bill last April.

That shortfall in income is a direct result of the problems with the program that was initiated between the federal and the then Conservative government of Saskatchewan for the 1991 GRIP program which paid out its payments in 1992.

We have not begun to reap any of the shortage or benefits from the NDP induced program that was begun last spring, so he should get that clear when he is describing the problem. The problem that farmers have is because the original GRIP was not adequate.

As a second point he talked about the problems of inducing change and how farmers are going to have to change because the Russians do not have credit to buy wheat anymore and the U.S. has been systematically interfering in international prices to depress the price by as much as $80 per tonne.

He should be aware that the program that was introduced last spring in Saskatchewan would in fact let market forces occur and would in fact encourage diversification to other crops. It has forced a big chunk of Saskatchewan's farmers to look for other markets in the Third World and Europe for products like lentils, pulses—peas and beans for most of us—and the the various oilseed crops that we have been diversifying into for a long time. The payments by crop district instead of on an individual basis will in fact encourage that.

I think he should perhaps give credit for applying his own ideas to that provincial government for the changes that were proposed in the spring of 1992 which will be felt in the income of 1993. For some people it will not be a good feeling.

Mr. Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I may be confused but I thought the hon. member had already made a speech during this debate. I am wondering how it is he is allowed to make a second one.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I hope that the hon. member will end his remarks and ask a question of the previous speaker.

Mr. Althouse: Mr. Speaker, it should be obvious to the hon. member who has been here for some time that this is a period for comments and questions and that is what I am doing.

There have been two questions. The third comment is that while agriculture is a shared jurisdiction, the federal responsibility for trade, which is what got us into the financial problem that we are in, is all in the federal government's court. The shortfall because of the trade wars that have befallen Canada's farmers should be borne by the federal government. As a lawyer, he should know that the provincial government is only responsible under the Constitution for the production side only.

Mr. Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to respond in the limited time available. I heard what the hon. member had to say about the GRIP. I was in Shaunavon, Regina, North Battleford and Saskatoon at the rallies and I know what I heard. I have listened to farmers in my area and I know exactly what they think of those unilateral and arbitrary changes that were made to the GRIP by the hon. member's socialist friends in Saskatchewan who have abandoned the grain sector.

The most vital sector of the Saskatchewan economy was abandoned completely by the hon. member's party. They have the gross hypocrisy to come in here and complain about the federal government's role.

It was interesting that GRIP, a national program with national standards, is working in Alberta and Manitoba. At the rally in Saskatoon, the usual National Farmers Union people were crowded around the microphones at ten o'clock in the morning much, I might add, to the chagrin of the wheat pool organizers. People from a couple of plants in Alberta came in to complain about GRIP in Alberta. But the fact is that GRIP is working reasonably well in the other provinces of this country. The reason it is not working in Saskatchewan is because the NDP government, cohorts of these people who brought this motion today, refuse to give it a chance to work.

In the few moments I have left I want to make some constructive suggestions to the provincial government of Saskatchewan. My hon. friend mentioned trade. I think it is high time that the NDP stop whining about the CUSTA, NAFTA and GATT. I think it is time they recognized the fact that Saskatchewan above all is a trading province and that we have negotiated very important access to the United States market, as well as a dispute settlement mechanism which has been tested and found to work time and time again. It worked for pork and now for wheat. "Canada wins wheat dispute with the United States", today's paper states.

That agreement has given important access to other Saskatchewan producers in livestock and beef and pork. These people who are criticizing trade agreements should go to Saskatchewan and explain that to the cattlemen and the pork producers.

I would like to make three brief points. I think it is important that there be co-operation between the federal and provincial agriculture ministers on the GRIP. Second, the province could harmonize the PST and the GST and lift the burden of sales tax from the inputs of Saskatchewan farm producers. I urge that they do that.

Finally, maybe they have to stand up to the big public sector unions in Saskatchewan which really are their political bosses. We in Ottawa did stand up to PSAC and the other public sector unions. We froze wages because it had to be done. I challenge them to do the same in Saskatchewan. I do not think they have the gumption to do it. It is a matter of priorities.

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a short question for the hon. member who, as he said, was in Saskatoon at the rally. The biggest response at the rally in Saskatoon, the biggest ovation, was when one speaker got up and said: "Leave the wheat board alone".

I would like to ask this member if he thinks that barley should remain under the sole jurisdiction of the Canadian Wheat Board. Second, does he agree with the New Democratic Party that before any changes are made to the Canadian Wheat Board it should be put to a vote so that all the producers can have a say in what they want to happen to their own wheat board? Does the member agree with that position? Does he think that barley should remain under the sole jurisdiction of the Canadian Wheat Board as the farmers in Saskatoon said it should?

Mr. Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, in brief, first of all I find it impossible to agree with the New Democratic Party. I want to make that perfectly clear. I disagree violently with the method of operation and with the hypocrisy of coming in with a motion like this today when they have abjectly failed producers in the province of Saskatchewan.

Second, with regard to barley the hon. member knows that there is a study being undertaken at the present time. I am perfectly willing to wait for the results of that to see what it says. I know as well that a number of producers in my area are concerned about what they see as the dumping of some of our product into Montana, into the northern part of the United States, which is of concern to them. They are frustrated and upset with the wheat board over this and with a major farm organization.

I do not have time to go into it at this point, but I can say that there are quite legitimate concerns out there among many producers about the monopolistic situation. That is not to say that it will be changed, but I cannot believe that it is not possible in a democracy like Canada to at least discuss intelligently some options.

If there are some problems with these organizations and with these institutions, let us be up front about it and talk about some of these problems to see if we can solve them in a co-operative manner.

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, it is my intention to share part of my time with the hon. member for Gatineau.

The motion before this House condemns the government for reneging on its commitment to Canadian farmers by changing policy. This motion identifies the areas of uncertainty that prevail in Canadian agriculture and the continuing erosion of net farm income.

Let me put this into perspective. Three years ago the Minister of Agriculture started talking about farm family income and used figures that painted a very rosy picture. I pointed out these misleading figures last Thursday night at a farm rally in Lucknow, Ontario, where the community centre was jammed full. Incidentally this meeting was organized by a group of farmers calling themselves "Line in the Dirt". They drew a line in the dirt and said: "Enough is enough". That was back in 1991 and things have not changed.

In 1991 the so-called average Canadian farm family income was $39,638, but that is very misleading because more than half of it came from income earned from other sources than the farming operation. For example, if the spouse was teaching school, nursing, working in an office in town or working in a factory, that was called farm family income. The non-related income was added to farm income.

This left a balance of $17,115 of income from the farming operation itself. Of that amount, $9,927 was a government subsidy, both federal and provincial. When we deduct these subsidies from the net farm income of $17,115 that leaves a balance of $7,188 of income from the actual sale of farm products. Slightly more than 20 per cent of the so-called farm family income came from the sale of farm products. I submit that is a national disgrace.

Food production and processing have to be made matters of national security. Canadian consumers pay the second lowest amount for their food in terms of disposable income of any country in the world for the highest quality food in the world. The ironic part of this is that others in the food chain, particularly the food distribution sector, are doing very well. I refer to The Globe and Mail Report on Business showing the average five-year rate of return on capital invested in the food distribution industry to be 17.2 per cent from 1986 to 1990. For the same period Canadian banks had a 13.3 per cent return and Canadian agriculture had a return of 6.2 per cent. This was not even enough to cover the interest on their loans.

Poultry and dairy producers were included in that 6.2 per cent figure, and they had a return of between 8 per cent and 9 per cent and have been criticized for doing so.

A few years ago this government took away the two-price wheat system that served this nation very well since the early 1970s. This program served Canadians very well for many years. In terms of higher world prices, the domestic price provided protection for our consumers, and the producers of Canada received lower prices for the products used domestically. However in times of low world prices it provided a higher price to producers for the product used domestically.

Our studies show that this policy was discontinued. At that time the net producer prices for wheat tumbled in Canada. The price of consumer products manufactured from wheat did not drop but rather continued to escalate. From 1982 to 1992 the value of wheat declined by 31 per cent and the price of a box of soda crackers increased to 25 times the farm gate price of wheat.

Last year an eight-ounce box of Breton Wheat crackers, made in Canada, sold for 99 cents U.S. in South Carolina and sold in Canada within a range from $2.69 to $2.89, the average being $2.79. There were 3 cents worth of wheat in that box. Ten days ago I bought an eight-ounce box of these crackers in Chilliwack, B.C., again containing 3 cents worth of wheat, for $3.15. That is an increase of 36 cents a box since last summer. If Canadian farmers were to receive 6 cents out of that 36-cent increase, they would be satisfied, could survive and make an acceptable living.

I am not sure I am supposed to show this in the House, but I want to draw your attention to it, Mr. Speaker. It is a national disgrace that people make returns like that and farmers have to depend on government handouts to make a living that is not commensurate with that of the rest of society.

I was speaking last August to a person in the food distribution business. I asked him for an explanation of the increases at a time when farm prices were deteriorating. He admitted that in some sectors the prices and the profits were exorbitant. This situation is absurd. Canadian farmers need subsidies to hang on and have to find off-farm work to put food on their own tables, and others in the processing and distribution sector are making exorbitant profits.

A recent consultant's study pointed out that five major food distributors in Canada control 80 per cent of food sales. That was in 1992, and it was up from 69 per cent in 1987. On the surface it appeared to be adequate competition, but if we examine where these distributors operate within Canada, some regions of Canada have very little competition, particularly western Canada and Atlantic Canada.

I have a report of one of those firms. We find that in 1990 the firm sent $538.7 million in dividends back to the parent company in the U.S. and borrowed the money to do it. It sent over half a billion dollars in dividends back to the parent company in the United States at the same time governments were giving money to primary producers in order for them to survive. Also at the same time these farmers and their spouses had to find off-farm work to provide living expenses for themselves and to put food on their own tables.

This situation is intolerable and cannot continue. It is becoming obvious that a very few and very powerful transnational companies are slowly taking control of food supply in the western world. Five of these companies virtually control the world's grain trade.

There was a report prepared by the Library of Parliament for the agriculture committee of this House in May 1991. It was pointed out in this study into the U.S. commodity exchange fiasco in relation to soybeans in the fall of 1989 that two of these companies decided what the price of soybeans would be. The prices dropped by nearly $2 a bushel in the summer of 1989 and never recovered.

As these huge corporations take control of the marketplace there has to be a countervailing force in that marketplace or the price discovery mechanisms simply will not work. I respectfully suggest there is no counterbalance in the world markets at the present time. Consequently the price discovery mechanism is not working.

On December 2 a news item in the Ontario Farmer pointed out that a few multinationals were jockeying for position, for dominance and control of the food industry. It went on to say that the food system in the United States resembled an hourglass with many producers and millions of consumers at either end. This was a statement by William Heffernan, head of the sociology department, Missouri State University.

I also wish to put on record that very few companies are taking more and more control of the U.S. production and food processing industry. Professor Heffernan identified the amount of control they have over production processing. For example, four firms control 69 per cent of beef processing and two of these are the same firms.

One company controls 25 per cent of chicken production and processing. It has recently bought a huge pork processing plant in Minnesota. It processes 12,000 hogs per day, 84,000 a week, more than is processed in Ontario on a weekly basis.

Of eight major commodities produced in the United States, among the top four firms one firm is listed in all eight. That is the type of competition that we are subjected to. Competition is going to wipe us out unless we as a government step in. I heard the same firm is gearing up to have two million brood sows in another midwestern state to produce its own hogs.

Yesterday I received a letter from Gerald van Koeverden from Thamesville, Ontario, who spent several years with CUSO in Thailand:

> While there I worked hard to develop and implement a few strategies to enable farmers to compete and survive. This is difficult in a country where agriculture policy is completely dominated by large multinationals.
> These farmers are not allowed to organize into large farm organizations and they have virtually no say at all in the process.

I submit this is starting to happen in Canada. Those few huge companies have now made Thailand the world's sixth largest exporter of poultry meat. There is extremely cheap labour in Thailand, few environmental regulations, very little supplementary heat is required for brooding, and we suspect the export enhancement subsidized grain is used to feed the birds.

This nation needs to make food production processing a matter of national security and Canadian farmers need a fair share of the consumer food dollar. They need a return on investment, management and risk, and an income commensurate with the rest of society.

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I was very interested in the comparisons of the hon. member in the eight-ounce package of Breton biscuits. He alluded to a possible solution. He was going at it a little backward when time ran out, but he was talking about how large corporations were taking advantage of the huge differential between the farm price and the process price. I note it is very difficult for farmers to get into the next level of production so that they can capture the advantages of the processed product themselves.

I wonder if the member has any solutions as to how that might be done. In the past decade we have seen the value of farm assets drop dramatically in western Canada, and pretty precipitously in eastern Canada and central Canada. In my part of the country land prices dropped from $900 per acre down to $300 and lower, which takes a huge pool of reserve investment away from the farm community.

I note that people like dairy producers and pork producers in western Canada have made attempts to control processing. For instance, Alberta Pork Producers process most of the pork in that province through plants owned by the producers. Alberta Dairy Producers attempted to forward integrate as well by combining both the north and south Alberta dairy pools.

In both instances of pork and dairy products the provincial government kept stepping in the way and trying to stop farmers from getting into the processing business. It did not succeed with pork but it did stop the integration of the two dairy pools. The government insisted that the one in financial difficulty be sold to Beatrice Foods in the interest of avoiding a monopoly, Beatrice Foods being probably the biggest dairy in Canada and if there is anything approaching monopoly it is Beatrice Foods.

Would he tell us how he thinks farmers could avoid this interference? What does he see as possibilities for forward integration so that farmers could take advantage of these high prices for processed product?

Mr. Ferguson: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the question. I want to hold up one example of further diversification by the prairie pools: Alberta pool, Sask pool and Manitoba pool. I also want to point out what has been happening in terms of concentration in the processing industry. I have to relate to one big firm we are referring to getting a foothold in the U.S. meat packing and other sectors of the agricultural industry. It is already in Canada. It has virtually taken over the beef industry with a huge plant in Alberta and now one in Ontario.

To see these things taking place we realize there has to be a solution. What puzzles me is the fact that quality standards in other countries do not measure up to ours. If we are to have foods imported we must make sure their quality standards measure up to ours, or else under article III of the GATT we can keep them out.

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, I would like to follow on the comment about standards. I am horrified when I read what is coming through and on to our dining room tables.

Just to quote briefly, these are the kinds of chickens that are coming through. "Every week throughout the south", the southern states, "millions of chickens leaking yellow pus, stained by green faeces, contaminated by harmful bacteria or marred by lung and heart infections, cancerous tumours or skin conditions, are shipped for sale to consumers".

Another article states that according to the U.S. agriculture department, 40 per cent of all American raw poultry is contaminated. They have all sorts of gadgets where they bombard them with radioactive gamma rays to kill it.

Perhaps the member could share with the House whether our slaughtering techniques and food processing—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. The hon. member has 30 seconds.

Mr. Ferguson: Mr. Speaker, indeed our standards are among the highest in the world. We would never tolerate such standards as those in Canada. In the first week of January children became sick in Washington State from eating tainted hamburger, and some children in the Chilliwack and Abbotsford area of B.C. as well.

It is despicable those standards have been allowed to slip under deregulation of the food inspection industry in the United States. The Americans call it the SIS, the streamline inspection system. We could never allow that to happen in Canada.

My hon. friend from Parkdale—High Park is absolutely right. If they do not measure up to our standards, we must keep them out of Canada and produce our own.

ZOÉ BLAIS HOME

Mr. Marcel R. Tremblay (Québec–Est): Mr. Speaker, I am looking foward to attending the opening of the new Zoé Blais home this Friday, February 12, and I would like to draw your attention to the exceptional work being done by one of the community groups in my riding.

The Zoé Blais home offers moral, spiritual, material and academic support, free of charge, to 42 families in the riding of Québec–Est. With this kind of assistance, these families will have a chance to improve their quality of life and that of their children.

I admire the initiative shown by people who value the concept of brotherhood and friendship and show this in their daily lives.

This is the kind of mutual assistance our society needs.

BLACK HISTORY MONTH

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, the black communities across Canada are celebrating Black History Month to develop pride in their heritage and awareness in Canadians of their long history and many contributions to Canada.

Contributions of political leaders including Rosemary Brown, Emery Barnes, Lincoln Alexander, Howard McCurdy and Zanana Akande are part of this history.

In response to the Liberal leader's chief of staff who recently said that Quebec is not ready to have a black Liberal candidate, Howard McCurdy said: "In refusing to support an equality clause in the Charlottetown accord, in the exercise of veto power over candidates and in the absence of a firm policy on minority candidates, Liberals communicate a mixed message compared to the policy of inclusion of the NDP".

An NDP affirmative action policy has resulted in an historic nomination of visible minority candidates by riding associations.

HIBERNIA

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, Canadian shipyards fear that Hibernia contracts to build tankers and supply vessels will be awarded to foreign competitors.

Where would be the logic? Why look to others when the work can be done right here in our own backyard? Shipyards across Canada can do the job, including the yard in Marystown which has the capability to construct the supply vessels.

In 1984 the government talked a lot about the need for a prosperous shipbuilding industry and about Canadianization. Since then, thousands upon thousands of skilled shipyard workers have had their jobs wiped out. An entire industry is being threatened while the government is sitting on its hands.

I ask the government today to recognize this golden opportunity and to use the Hibernia project to help revitalize the shipbuilding industry and to provide work opportunities for its workers.

LIBERAL PARTY

Ms. Barbara Greene (Don Valley North): Mr. Speaker, I was appalled to read more today in The Toronto Star about the Liberal Party's candidate selection process. Apparently a Quebecer was advised not to run for a nomination because he is black.

The way the Liberal Party selects its candidates in certain ridings is distressing to many people who believe in democracy. If one of the criteria to be a candidate is race, this is even more disturbing. It is absolutely essential that everyone in this Chamber uphold the fundamental Canadian values of our Charter of Rights and Freedoms. It is not only morally wrong, it is illegal to discriminate based on race. Discrimination hurts not only individuals but all Canadians. It has no place in the candidate selection process of a political party.

MULTICULTURALISM

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Mr. Speaker, it is now almost five years since the multiculturalism act was implemented, and the government still does not know the difference between employment equity and multiculturalism.

The act should be strengthened to ensure that public service decision makers consider the diversity of Canadian society when developing policies and programs that affect all the citizens of this country.

[English]

The tabling of the annual report on the implementation of the multiculturalism act is a somewhat anti-climactic event. I believe that a non-partisan officer should review the implementation of the act.

The tendency today has been to highlight the successes instead of some of the failures of the policy. Having the Department of Multiculturalism and Citizenship review the implementation of its own act is like having the fox take care of the chickens. This situation must change.

EXECUTIVE ASSISTANT TO LEADER OF THE OFFICIAL OPPOSITION

Ms. Nicole Roy-Arcelin (Ahuntsic): Mr. Speaker, I was shocked this morning when I heard that the executive assistant to the Leader of the Official Opposition had said it was not the right time for a black candidate to run in the Quebec City area.

Speaking on behalf of all Quebecers, I deplore an attitude that is undemocratic, to say the least, and is a sad reminder of a recent distinction made by Mr. Parizeau between old-stock Quebecers and the others.

Unless Mr. Pelletier withdraws those unfortunate remarks, I urge the Leader of the Official Opposition to dissociate himself from those remarks, in no uncertain terms, in this House where we represent all Canadian citizens.

POVERTY

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, the National Anti-Poverty Organization has brought forward a study entitled Illiteracy and Poverty which shows a strong linkage between illiteracy and poverty. I want to refer to this report.

Unfortunately despite government lip service to the literacy cause the opposite is happening with economic policies such as the cap on Canada Assistance Plan payments, an additional freeze on health and education transfer payments, cuts to social housing programs and legal aid and the GST.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE REFORM

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, in a letter to the federal Minister of Finance dated January 15, 1993, the president of the Quebec Bar Association, Paul P. Carrière, made the following comments on Bill C-105, which would amend the Unemployment Insurance Act:

"The changes made in November 1990 to sections 28 and 30 of the act increased the penalties for workers who quit voluntarily without justification or are dismissed for misconduct. Completely excluding from benefits all those who quit voluntarily for a reason that the law does not consider justified or are dismissed for misconduct would be unrealistic in view of the conflicts that arise in labour relations. The measures proposed in Bill C-105 would totally exclude from unemployment insurance benefits thousands of genuine unemployed people, without considering the particular circumstances surrounding their voluntary departure or dismissal for misconduct".

WOMEN

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): We recently learned that 81 per cent of university and college women have experienced physical, sexual or psychological abuse within the last year.

• (1410)

Seventy-six per cent of the young men surveyed acknowledged acting abusively to a date. Twenty-nine per cent were sexually abused and 22 per cent were physically abused. There is clearly a need for education so that all people are viewed as full human beings with the right to say no and the right to be treated with respect.

The Secretary of State Women's Program funds many organizations and projects aimed at educating about violence and the rights of women. This program has taken another 10 per cent cut this year and there will be a further 10 per cent cut next year.

Anti-racist and aboriginal programs are also being cut during times of growing racial intolerance and in spite of the horrific situation many aboriginal peoples continue to face.

Violence and intolerance grow during bad economic times. Now is not the time—it never is—to cut back on these worth-while projects aimed at strengthening our society.

PEACEKEEPING

Mr. Lee Clark (Brandon—Souris): Mr. Speaker, within days the main contingent of the 1st Regiment, RCHA will return from its six month tour of duty in Cyprus where both the regular force and militia have served with distinction.

Those who have been a part of this 28-year old peacekeeping operation have every right to be proud, as indeed we are, of their contribution even though the time spent in the observation posts may on occasion have seemed tedious.

Although Canada's role in Cyprus will soon be changing as our troops are needed elsewhere for other UN peacemaking and peacekeeping operations, Canada will likely continue to be a part of an observer force in Cyprus should such be created.

In the meantime, the decision of Canada and some other countries to wind up their activities in Cyprus will hopefully serve to act as a catalyst to the peace talks scheduled for March of this year.

The people of Cyprus, both Greek and Turkish alike, must now find a lasting solution to the division which for too long has tragically divided this island nation.

MUNICIPAL TAXES

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Kenora—Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, Canadian municipalities are once again being asked to foot the bill of the government's economic mismanagement. The government is proposing to cut grants in lieu of taxes, resulting in more than $80 million in lost tax revenues for Canadian municipalities.

The government is also proposing to change the formula by which grants in lieu of taxes are calculated, resulting in a loss of several more million dollars for Canadian municipalities.

Mayors from across Canada will be meeting with the Minister of Public Works this evening to voice their concerns over the government's latest attempt to shift the burden of Conservative economic mismanagement on the backs of Canadian municipalities.

Let us hope that the Minister of Public Works will see the error of his government's ways and reverse this unfair and regressive decision. The federal government has a legal and moral obligation to pay its fair share of municipal taxes like the rest of us.

CROSS-BORDER SHOPPING

Mr. Ken James (Sarnia—Lambton): Mr. Speaker, Ontario communities along the Canada-U.S. border welcome Statistics Canada's figures indicating a 15 per cent decrease in same day trips to the United States in November as compared to the same month the year before.

This is good news but to my mind it is no time to back off in our efforts to address this problem. Cross-border shopping is by no means dead.

At Ontario border points there were still 2.2 million automobiles returning on same day trips checked through Canada Customs in November 1992.

All stakeholders must continue to move ahead. For one thing our government must continue to consider the elimination of third party tariffs. Those already removed were well received by the retailers in Sarnia—Lambton and helped lead to lower prices.

A list of further products for tariff removal has been submitted to the Department of Finance. I urge their serious and prompt consideration. I remain convinced that it is initiatives like these that can help our retailers compete on the cross-border front.

MUNICIPAL TAXES

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, the federal government is considering a tax revolt against the villages, towns and cities of this country.

In 1992 the federal government paid $420 million in grants in lieu of payments to Canadian municipalities. These payments replaced tax payments for services provided to federal buildings and properties.

It appears the government is attempting to shift its fiscal responsibility to municipal councils and the residential taxpayers will be forced to offset the loss in revenue, estimated to be $80 million over the next two years. There should not be any arbitrary exemptions.

School boards, homeowners and businesses do not get to make their own property assessment. Why should the federal government? The government is considering intrusion into the setting of municipal property tax rates and abandoning a longstanding agreement with the Federation of Canadian Municipalities.

I urge the minister to reconsider any options that would decrease federal fiscal responsibilities to municipalities.

CRIMINAL JUSTICE

Mr. Brian O'Kurley (Elk Island): Mr. Speaker, one of the most important concerns facing our nation today is the issue of public security. Canadians from sea to sea are insisting that improvements be made to our criminal justice system. People perceive the justice system as favouring law-breakers instead of supporting victims of crime.

Constituents in the riding of Elk Island question a system that pampers convicts at the expense of victims. Two areas that must be examined are the Young Offenders Act and our parole laws.

The Government of Canada has made some important changes in this regard but more work has to be done. The Canadian Parliament must continue to focus on the issue of public security. Our challenge as a nation is to establish a model of justice that has the support and confidence of all citizens. Let us work together to achieve this important and worth-while goal. Let us all work together for a better Canada.

BILL C-111

Mr. Gilles Rocheleau (Hull—Aylmer): Mr. Speaker, with Bill C-111 banning the sale of cigarettes to anyone under 18, the government is again showing that it is out of touch and only seeming to govern.

Faced with the big smuggling problem, the government has chosen to attack small convenience store operators and young people instead of the smugglers. Instead of putting its energy into fighting cigarette smuggling, the government's latest effort would impose fines of up to $50,000 on small store owners who dare sell cigarettes to people under 18.

That makes no sense. Who will pay those fines, if not the people, knowing very well that small shopkeepers cannot afford it? It is the same with Bill C-105. The government is attacking the unemployed instead of tax cheaters.

YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT

Mr. Scott Thorkelson (Edmonton—Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, my constituents are concerned that repeat young offenders are flaunting the weaknesses of the Young Offenders Act. Edmonton Sun columnist Linda Slobodian is leading a campaign to get tough on repeat young offenders.

Staff Sergeant Peter Zaharko who heads the Edmonton city police youth unit commented in a recent article by Mrs. Slobodian as follows:

> The Young Offenders Act as it stands right now is really a good piece of legislation when it refers to first-time offenders, or really even second-time offenders.

He also notes that it is seriously weak when it comes to repeat offenders. In a survey I did on the Young Offenders Act in my constituency, many of my constituents echoed this view.

I urge the Minister of Justice and the Solicitor General of Canada to listen to these views. It is time to get tough with repeat young offenders.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE REFORM

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Yesterday, the Minister of Justice and the Minister of Employment and Immigration both said that the 50,000 people who took part in the demonstration in Montreal in -25C weather were separatists. Everyone who opposed Bill C-105 on unemployment insurance reform, even Conservative or New Democratic members, as well as Liberal members and senators, and who participated in the march on Sunday afternoon were called separatists by these two ministers. Does the Prime Minister agree with this rather surprising statement from two of his senior ministers?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have not read the transcript of the comments in question. I think that the minister said, and it is common knowledge, that Gérald Larose is not a great supporter of my friend or our party or the New Democrats and that his political options are well known. I think that is what was mentioned.

As for the substantive issue, the hon. member simply said that his recommendations were very much like those put forward by the Leader of the Opposition when he was Minister of Finance in 1978. The Leader of the Opposition who was then Minister of Finance found it quite acceptable, and rightly so, because the purpose was to control spending. Is that acceptable? Is it morally acceptable for a government to stop paying unemployment insurance benefits to someone who quits a job without any valid reason or justification? That is the issue. In these circumstances, we come to the conclusion that Canadian taxpayers do not have to pay unemployment benefits to someone who quits a job without just cause. Now, if my friend has a different opinion, he should tell us.

[English]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to know from the Prime Minister if he agrees that the tactic of the minister in calling everybody who is opposing this bill a separatist is unacceptable to the Canadian people. There are hundreds of thousands of Canadians in every part of Canada who think that some provisions of this bill are completely unacceptable.

Will the Prime Minister agree with me that the only separation I support would be the separation of this minister from his ministry?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend is suggesting that the minister be separated from the Crown because he has tightened up on the unemployment insurance requirements.

What would he say then about himself? In 1978, when he was Minister of Finance, he reduced the weekly benefits from 66 2/3 to 60 per cent of weekly insurable earnings.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Mulroney: I share the sense of shock of the NDP. What we are dealing with here is that members of the NDP may be opposed to us on the GST. They may be opposed to us on free trade. They may be opposed to us on deficit reduction, but at least they have the courage to have a position, as opposed to the hypocrisy of the Liberal Party who has two positions on every issue.

• (1420)

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I will quote someone who is neither a separatist nor a socialist. Yesterday, Ghislain Dufour, president of the Conseil du patronat, suggested that the government refer the problem to a committee of the House of Commons and allow public hearings, because the Prime Minister and the minister are trying to give the impression that people who quit their jobs voluntarily are not penalized. That is absolutely false. They have a penalty of 7 to 12 weeks. Why does the government not act on this suggestion from the president of the Conseil du patronat du Québec?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, since the Leader of the Opposition referred to a demonstration in Montreal, perhaps I could refer him to an editorial that appeared in The Montreal Gazette this morning, which says:

[English]

"What is frustrating and infuriating, however, is that so many of the angry people badly misunderstand the proposed changes. The misunderstanding has been shamefully fomented, it must be said, by some politicians and union leaders for their own agendas. A staggering number of people think the changes will penalize anyone who quits a job even for an overwhelmingly good reason. In fact, no one who has a good reason for quitting a job will be affected. The new rules are aimed only at people who quit their jobs without cause".

The Montreal Gazette is quite right. It is the kind of action that was taken by my hon. friend when he was Minister of Finance in 1978, which he then supported vigorously in the interests of trying to reduce the deficit and which today, simply because he is trying to be a typical Liberal opportunist, he is now denouncing.

[Translation]

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. A month ago the minister blamed the unemployment rate in Canada on the unemployed. He claimed they were going to Florida and spending their unemployment insurance benefits there. Now he blames the separatists for the negative reaction to this policy of punishing Canada's unemployed. Why does the minister not admit that the real problem is the minister and his punitive policies, not the unemployed or the separatists?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member talked about penalizing the unemployed and said that I blamed the unemployed. This is not about blaming the unemployed but about protecting Canadian workers and employers. I was told this morning that the Canadian Federation of Independent Business has just submitted to the Liberal Party the results of a survey of its members across Canada. These results show that 81 per cent of small businesses, the businesses that create jobs and prevent unemployment, support the measures announced in the economic statement made by the Minister of Finance in December.

[English]

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the minister asked us to provide examples in the House where people who voluntarily quit their job would not be protected.

I would like to give him an example of a woman in metro Toronto, employed by a major corporation, who was sexually harassed by her boss. She had proof. She went to human resources. It went right to the president's office and at the president's door, instead of protecting this woman's right to work without sexual harassment, she was shown the door.

I would like to ask the minister how his law can protect this woman and whether he reasonably expects that when someone leaves a job the employer is going to write: reason for leaving, sexual harassment.

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that president did not work for the Unemployment Insurance Commission.

If this lady was met with such rudeness by an employer, she would go down to a CEC office where a sensitized employment agent would deal with the person and ensure that she got her benefits under the Unemployment Insurance Act.

Contrary to what these people are trying to spread, fear among women in Canada, they are fully protected under the Unemployment Insurance Act.

TRADE

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, Canadian taxpayers paid to send the minister of trade to Washington to tell the Americans to back off from the trade harassment against our steelworkers, our woodworkers, our pork producers and our brewery workers.

In today's media the minister is quoted as saying: "Really the Americans are free traders. Really they are not protectionist. I am coming away feeling very positive. They have positive things to say about our relationship".

While the minister is talking in these loving Valentine-like phrases, in today's Wall Street Journal there is a full page saying that in 1993 the border between Canada and the United States—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member knows the rule about using props or other things to illustrate his remarks. Would the hon. member put his question, please.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate that I cannot hold up the full page of the Wall Street Journal that says that the border between Canada and the United States is to be no barrier to trade, about to be erased.

My question for the minister of trade is simply this: when is the minister going to stop being an apologist for the American interests and start standing up for Canadians, particularly Canadian workers?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think my hon. friend should indeed table that ad. I looked at the Wall Street Journal this morning and my recollection is that it is an ad from a telecommunications company that says that in future, because of advanced technology and telecommunications, there will not be any borders between Canada and the United States.

An hon. member: Or between Canada and Europe.

Mr. Mulroney: Or between Canada and Europe.

I know my hon. friend and I sometimes read the Wall Street Journal together in the morning. Indeed, if that is the ad, then I think my hon. friend has inadvertently misrepresented that ad and misled this House. I know he would want to apologize to the Speaker and to the Minister for International Trade who represented Canada very effectively yesterday in Washington.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mulroney: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: We have long since had a practice where it is not appropriate to raise a point of order or a question of privilege during Question Period. This can be done later.

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Speaker, I know the Prime Minister knows the rules well enough to follow your ruling and raise this matter if he feels he has one at the end of Question Period.

Mr. Speaker: I will try to do the best I can without coaching.

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister for International Trade with regard to his trip to Washington the other day to discuss trade issues with the U.S. administration.

Part of one of the countervail actions against Canada by the United States is in softwood lumber exports wherein the Americans are making the spurious allegation that our raw log exports constitute a subsidy in Canada.

Did the minister raise this specific issue with trade officials in Washington? Did he get assurances from officials in the new administration that our raw log export regulations stand and are not subject to challenge by the United States?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, let me first correct something that the member for Kamloops just said.

I made very clear in my comments after the meeting that I had with Mr. Brown and Mr. Kantor, I said it is still early days to draw conclusions. I am not drawing any conclusions. I did not go there to pick fights. I also said that it is still too early to draw conclusions. For my hon. friend to immediately draw the conclusion that because I did not bloody someone's nose down there I was falling into the lap of the new administration is totally wrong and he should know that.

• (1430)

As far as the question posed on the softwood lumber issue, yes I raised that with both Mr. Brown and Mr. Kantor. We had a very good discussion. I set out very clearly the concerns Canada has with the actions.

I also pointed out the fact that the price of lumber in the United States market, partly because of the problems we are having with trade between the United States and Canada has doubled and has increased the price of housing by a few thousand dollars and their actions are hurting their own economy.

I told them I thought it was very important that we achieve a long-term resolution of this issue for the interests of both Canada and the United States.

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I will give the minister an opportunity to suggest how successful he was in his visit to Washington.

Yesterday U.S. officials called the steel case a train coming down the track. Unfortunately we agree that the American steel workers are the conductors and Canadian steel is riding the caboose. It is going the way of VIA Rail and the caboose is near extinction.

Did the minister proffer a strong case on behalf of Canadian steel yesterday? Did he insist on a sectoral trade agreement? What assurances did he come away with, if any?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, indeed I did raise the question of steel. I said that this was of extreme importance to Canada because of the significance of the United States market to Canada and also the significance of the Canadian market to the United States producers. I said that the two markets were integrated.

I also raised the point of a U.S.–Canada steel accord, as I indicated to my friend in a previous Question Period that I would. He said that he would take this aboard and give me an early response specifically to the request that I made.

Since I know where the U.S. industry is on this particular issue I also raised the importance of getting started on this with a blue ribbon panel to lay the groundwork for whatever options might be possible, including a U.S.–Canada steel accord.

JUSTICE

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, today the members of the coroner's jury investigating the tragic death of 11-year old Christopher Stephenson did something unprecedented in the legal history of Canada. It issued a statement which singled out the Solicitor General for blunt criticism for his categorical refusal to consider compensating little Christopher's parents for their legal costs of the inquest. The jury specifically stated that it could not conceive of an inquest of this depth and nature without the perspective provided by the Stephensons' lawyer.

Will the Solicitor General now agree to consider a joint federal-provincial package to reimburse the Stephensons for their legal expenses?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate my hon. friend's question. I am sure that everyone in this House shares the tragedy the Stephenson family went through.

I have stated since the start of the inquest that I believe the costs of determining cause of death are quite properly a provincial expenditure and that the province of Ontario had carried the case forward in a very extensive manner.

I also suggested last week at committee that I was prepared to have the Canadian Bar Association or an independent body consider the issue as to whether legal costs of such a person should be paid by the municipality, the province or the federal government, to have the question of independent legal counsel, independent opinions brought forward, whether or not the lawyer's bill should be taxed and what is appropriate.

I do not claim to be the fount of all knowledge on this. I made my decision based on what I know about the process at this time. I am certainly willing to put it to an independent review.

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, this is an independent jury and the Solicitor General has praised it for its work. It has flatly disagreed with both his assertion that the Stephensons did not need independent legal counsel and his decision to deny funding was sensitive, sound and just. Indeed, it found the Stephenson lawyer's involvement indispensable to its recommendations.

I ask the Solicitor General to do the right thing and act on the poignant recommendation: "That the federal government and the provincial government compensate Jim and Anna Stephenson for all legal costs incurred in this inquest".

Hon. Doug Lewis (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, as a colleague of the bar what my friend must also find interesting and I think there is a question here, is that when the inquest jury made 71 recommendations that particular one was not among the original recommendations. I am prepared to take it into account at this time since it has reconvened and asked the question.

This is a very serious matter and I wish my hon. friend would treat it as such. I am prepared to have all of these issues examined by an independent commission.

VIOLENCE AGAINST WOMEN

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister responsible for the Status of Women. Yesterday a study was released which showed that among young university women, 35 per cent had experienced physical assault and 46 per cent had experienced sexual assault since leaving high school.

We have had statistics like this before but they are becoming more alarming. The time has come to address the attitudes and behaviour which allows such assaults and abuse to continue. We support the studies, but the studies are not solving the problem.

What is the government doing to ensure that such abuse will not continue and to drastically reduce this terrible terror women have to endure?

Hon. Mary Collins (Minister of Western Economic Diversification and Minister of State (Environment) and Minister Responsible for the Status of Women): Mr. Speaker, I know that my hon. colleague and all colleagues welcomed that study which was funded through the family violence program of the Department of National Health and Welfare. For the first time it gives us the kind of in depth information about the experience of the lives of young women at universities.

My colleague, of course, knows the new laws dealing with sexual assault which were passed last year by this House send that very firm message to all Canadians that no means no. We have to ensure that young women use that tool and put forward the proper complaints and that the courts deal with them effectively.

As well, universities could establish, as some already have, protocols which deal with this kind of behaviour in an appropriate way and provide penalties to students who get involved in inappropriate behaviour.

A lot of this requires work at the very early ages by education within the family and again through a number of the initiatives of the family violence program. We have supported work going on in the schools by the Canadian Teachers' Federation and we look forward to doing a great deal more as a result of these efforts.

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, it is fine to deal with the courts and relate experiences in the courts. However, only a small percentage of men who commit this abuse are actually charged. We know that abusive behaviour is learned. Therefore, it can be unlearned.

What is the government doing in conjunction with the provinces to ensure that children who are the victims of abuse realize that this abuse is not right and that they do not have to experience and live with it?

Hon. Mary Collins (Minister of Western Economic Diversification and Minister of State (Environment) and Minister Responsible for the Status of Women): Mr. Speaker, I am sure my colleagues agree that there is not one simple answer.

It is going to require a multifaceted approach in terms of education which begins at the family level, in the community and in the schools. Young girls and boys have to develop and understand that relations with each other, men and women, have to be on a more appropriate basis. Then it grows from there to the support given by the universities through the counselling services to support women in developing the strength to deal with these situations effectively when they encounter them and to lay and press charges.

• (1440)

All of those factors are moving ahead. The work of the Canadian panel on violence against women is also going to bring forward a national action plan in which we all work together to eliminate this kind of abuse against women.

EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Cid Samson (Timmins—Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister of employment.

I have a draft UI document which I would be more than happy to table. It was sent out to the UI offices by the director of benefit entitlement and is full of proposed questions that must be asked of claimants and the reason for all these questions. I quote: "The condition to be met by the claimant in this context is particularly strict and appears to imply that only exceptional circumstances where the claimant had no reasonable alternative which might have allowed him or her to retain the employment can the immediate voluntary separation be justified". This is clearly a one-sided approach.

How can the minister continue to tell us that his department will give benefit of the doubt to the claimant?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I have already indicated that the instructions given to employees of the Department of Employment and Immigration on the application of the Unemployment Insurance Act are being reviewed and new instructions are going to be given out.

Furthermore the training programs being devised for the insurance agents will take into account every possible situation. Ultimately the insurance agent makes the determination.

I remind the hon. member that over four million cases were handled in 1991 by the Department of Employment and Immigration. The vast majority of them were handled with equity and reasonableness and that is what we will continue striving to do.

Mr. Cid Samson (Timmins—Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, I am very intrigued by the minister's answer. Clearly we have a case in point that the adjudicator is certainly going to be making the wrong decision.

This morning CBC Radio ran a piece about the dangers of working in the scallop fisheries and how UI would force workers to continue dangerous work. In this radio interview, Lloyd Allen, chief adjudicator for unemployment insurance claims, said that some employment is hazardous by nature and a person would be expected to continue in that employment.

In other words the chief UI claims adjudicator said that quitting a job because of risk of death would not be considered just cause. If that is not just cause, what is?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, how low will they stoop in trying to scare Canadians.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Valcourt: To stand on the floor of this institution and tell Canadians that now because of a bill that has nothing to do with just cause a person cannot quit a job when in danger of imminent death.

It takes only a socialist in a necktie to make a statement like that.

[Translation]

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance.

On Sunday, 50,000 people marched in the streets of Montreal. The government sees it as a separatist plot. I was there, Mr. Speaker. I can assure you these people were not there to talk about independence. They were there for one reason: they want to contribute to the system and not be the eternal victims of that system.

My question is this: when will this government finally understand that the best way to reduce the cost of unemployment insurance is to create jobs, permanent jobs?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I am really surprised to see the hon. member for LaSalle—Émard, who claims they are going to change the world, object to a measure whose ultimate goal is to break the cycle of dependency that our social security system has generated in this country.

Yes, it is a fiscal measure, but it will also make people more responsible. People who quit their job for a valid reason will be protected. I thought the hon. member would at least admit that and tell these people who were out on the streets that anyone who quits his job with just cause will have all the protection he needs and more, because these people will no longer be penalized as they were before. They will get their full benefits.

[English]

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, the minister said he was surprised to see me there. Well I was surprised that none of his colleagues who opposed the bill had the courage to be there on Sunday.

I ask my question of the Minister of Finance. The problem with unemployment insurance is that this government has no long-term plan to create jobs. Its only policy is to hope against hope that prosperity will spill over the border from the United States.

Just yesterday the Minister of Finance said that he could not proceed with his budget until President Clinton had proceeded with his.

Some hon. members: Shame.

Mr. Martin: Mr. Speaker, that is ridiculous. This minister is supposed to be the Minister of Finance for Canada, not the governor of the 51st state.

My question is this. Trickle down meant the end of the road for the Republicans. When will the members—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member must please put his question.

Mr. Martin: Mr. Speaker, when will the members opposite realize that trickle north is going to be end for the Tories?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member's assertion is absolutely wrong. He knows very well the December 2 economic statement outlined a number of initiatives: investments in people, investments in infrastructure, further investments in international trade, positive steps toward encouraging small business which generates 80 per cent of the new jobs in Canada.

That is reflected in Ottawa Business News, a small business publication which indicated it has become increasingly clear that small business has emerged as the big winner.

This is what Mr. Bulloch had to say about the UI measures. "The UI measures were very significant", Bulloch affirmed, "I've been in the office of Liberal ministers in the seventies and there was agreement that the major area of UI abuse was voluntary quitters. The Liberals didn't want to touch it because it was politically unpalatable".

Well, Mr. Speaker, we did it in the name of fairness.

THE ECONOMY

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I too have a question for the Minister of Finance.

I want to ask the minister why is he telling the Canadian provinces to go ahead, prepare and present their budgets now and not wait until after he presents his next budget, when he is saying to Canadians that he has to wait until after President Clinton presents his state of the union message and his first budget to Congress?

Why does he follow this policy which suggests, like my colleague said, he is acting like the governor of the 51st state instead of the Minister of Finance for Canada? Why will he not present a budget now that will help 1.5 million Canadians get back to work?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, what a bunch of nonsense. The provinces can bring in their budgets any time they like. The previous administration used to bring in its budget any time it wanted.

We try to bring in the budget in the spring. We brought down an economic statement in December to keep Canadians and the provinces up to date with respect to the fiscal and economic outlook.

Yes, we will be bringing in a budget. We are listening to some suggestions from across the way as to what might be done and what we might be able to incorporate. So far we have received absolutely nothing in the way of positive recommendations.

I assure the hon. member that I am getting a lot of suggestions from the Canadian people. We will build on the budget of February 1992 and we will build on the economic statement of December 1992.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Finance. He is quoted as saying, after he met with the U.S. secretary of the treasury Bentsen, that they are talking about "providing some stimulus to create renewed economic activity and jobs" and the Minister of Finance then said that it will certainly help Canada.

• (1450)

If the minister thinks that approach is right for the United States, why will he not follow that approach of economic growth for this country? Why does he not present a budget now that will help this country move forward, not backward like his previous budgets?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, welcome to the wonderful world of reality. The United States is our biggest trading partner. As its economy goes, so goes ours. That is a fact of life.

I can tell the hon. member, in case he might be interested, that there was a great deal of interest in the economic statement that I brought down in December. As a matter of fact, I ran out of copies because they were very interested.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): It was a best seller.

Mr. Mazankowski: They were very interested in the balanced approach.

There was the need to contain the deficit and the need to inject some stimulus into the economy. We did both in the December statement.

I remind the hon. member it contained $2 billion worth of expenditure on infrastructure, on training, on the small business sector. Second, it contained $1.8 billion in reduced taxation, something that the Liberals would not recognize.

SEXUAL ASSAULT VICTIMS

Mrs. Gabrielle Bertrand (Brome—Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Justice. As you know, violence is seen and experienced every day on television, in the streets, in schools and even within our own homes. Recently, one of my constituents was sexually assaulted by an inmate who was out on a day pass. The victim asked for a court order that would oblige her attacker to provide a blood sample, in order to determine whether he was HIV positive or had any other sexually transmitted disease. The judge rejected the application on the grounds that he could not legally accept this kind of application. The judge also indicated that it was up to the legislature to fill this legal vacuum.

I would like to ask the Minister of Justice whether he and the Solicitor General would be willing to make certain changes in the existing legislation in order to give more rights to victims of sexual assault.

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Justice, Attorney General of Canada and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member has raised a rather disturbing point. I think we all understand the concerns of a woman who has been a victim of sexual assault and who has to live with the fear that she may have been infected with a fatal disease. I believe the situation referred to by the hon. member is a very serious one.

However, we must also realize that it is difficult to force people who have not yet been found guilty, against whom charges may be laid, but who have yet to be found guilty or to plead guilty, to undergo a test that may not fully comply with the Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. member that this matter is being examined by my department, and that, together with my other colleagues at Health and Welfare and the National Advisory Council on the Status of Women, we will see how we can respond most effectively. I can assure the hon. member that I am very much aware of the concerns of the women of this country.

FISHERIES

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans.

On December 7, in his response to the Pearse report, the minister said that DFO is now identifying over-all increases in manpower, equipment and operating funds necessary to ensure an effective enforcement presence during the 1993 season.

Since 1986 DFO's specific region fisheries management budget has declined from 35 per cent to 27 per cent of allocation. Further reductions were made in all departments by Treasury Board in November at a cost to DFO of $12 million so far.

How can the minister possibly keep the promises he made to the west coast fisheries in December?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, we will simply spend our money more effectively for a start.

Of course the hon. member is leaving out of account the fact that we have additional funding in connection with our aboriginal fisheries strategy. With that funding, we are entering into co-management agreements. Last year, we had some 80 agreements with the aboriginal bands of British Columbia. Funding is provided in those agreements for habitat enhancement, enforcement and other purposes. We have 60 native guardians who will be getting special training to join our enforcement ranks during the coming season.

I can assure the hon. gentleman that we will redouble our efforts with respect to enforcement. It will be far more effective this year.

The hon. gentleman might also tell the House whether or not he supports the aboriginal fisheries strategy and the program of attempting on a voluntary basis to see whether the sale of food fish will work or not in British Columbia. Does his party support that or will they continue to straddle——

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Mr. Speaker, in answer to the minister's question, it is not the strategy that bothers us; it is the lack of implementation of it.

The minister said again, following the Pearse report, that he would not proceed with the aboriginal fishing strategy unless he had watershed agreements for the whole of the river concerned.

Is the minister ready to announce that he has a watershed agreement on any of the major salmon rivers in B.C.?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, it will be a watershed day when the hon. gentleman's party adopts a firm position with reference to the aboriginal fisheries strategy and stops running with the hounds and hunting with the hares, or running with the hares and hunting with the hounds.

Do they support the aboriginal fisheries strategy or not because they are saying one thing to commercial fishermen and something entirely different to the others.

The hon. gentleman should get his mug and his wump on the same side of the line.

GOVERNMENT ADVERTISEMENTS

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the government House leader.

Yesterday the government House leader said there was a competition for the $21 million worth of advertising contracts.

Will he now admit that of the six companies which were invited to make proposals, not tenders, three of them were not equipped to handle the job. The fourth, Camp and Associates was already doing another government job, which left the two Tory firms as the only possible alternative. Is it not obvious who was going to win all along?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, prior to 1984, we had a system where advertising contracts were simply handed out by the political minister. We know which agencies got those contracts.

We introduced a system where agencies for large advertising contracts would have to make submissions and these would be adjudicated by a panel of civil servants. That policy was followed. It is the fairest policy we can think of. It is infinitely more fair than what existed prior to us assuming office.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, the answer was very interesting but it had nothing to do with the question I asked.

Let me ask the Prime Minister this time. On September 9, 1985 the Prime Minister said that he would have the toughest conflict of interest rules in the western world.

Is there not something wrong with his rules when a Tory appointee, Mr. Bob Byron, who sat on the Tory re-election committee was handing out to Tory firms $21 million worth of taxpayers' money? Is that not at least wrong?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is not going to be deterred by facts. He continues to slander individuals who do not deserve it.

Mr. Bob Byron spent 35 years in the advertising business across this country. He severed all links with that industry to take on a position with the government. By the way, exactly the same structure existed under the Liberals with an advertising management group.

The assessment as to which agency will get the contract is made by a committee of bureaucrats. The committee of bureaucrats makes the choice. The administration of the contract is undertaken on behalf of the government by the advertising management group, headed by a man with 35 years of experience, a man whose integrity puts to shame anything the hon. member has exhibited at any time in this House.

EDUCATION

Mr. Scott Thorkelson (Edmonton—Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, Canada spends 7.2 per cent of its GDP on education. This is higher than any other industrialized country. We have no way of measuring the effectiveness of our system. Experts in the field have stated that every successful academic system in the world uses rigorous evaluation methods such as national standardized testing.

Would the Secretary of State consider implementing a program of voluntary national standardized testing?

Hon. Monique Landry (Secretary of State of Canada): Mr. Speaker, the question of my colleague is very appropriate at a time when more than ever we have to assure our youth of a prosperous future. This is very much in line with the prosperity action plan recommendation to focus more on results in learning.

We are also very pleased to see the efforts of the Council of the Ministers of Education to develop a national achievement indicator system. Also Canada is playing a very leading role now in the third international study of maths and sciences with a $2 million grant from EIC.

The federal government will continue to encourage and support any efforts that will improve learning for a prosperous Canada.

POINTS OF ORDER

COMMENTS DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, over the years I have not made a big deal over points of order and I am not going to today, except for one thing.

My hon. friend referred to an ad in The Wall Street Journal which I happened to see this morning. The conclusion he drew from it was quite pejorative in respect of the government. It is a dramatic ad and I would be happy to table it for hon. members.

I noticed what the ad said was that "AT&T and Unitel have formed a new alliance to provide seamless communications between the U.S. and Canada who are working together to assure that your business will get the highest possible level of reliability and consistent service on both sides of the border, including voice data and multi-point conference capabilities".

Mr. Speaker: The right hon. Prime Minister may wish to refer to a document. He may wish to ask the consent of the House for it to be tabled. However, I do not think it is appropriate that we get back into debate.

Mr. Mulroney: Mr. Speaker, I indicated that it was not my intention to get into debate. I would be happy to table the ad and have other members of the House look at it because based on my understanding of the prefatory remarks of my hon. friend, he misrepresented this ad in respect of the Government of Canada.

I know he would want to withdraw that immediately. It would be inconsistent for him to keep those remarks on the record because they are at variance with the truth and inconsistent with parliamentary tradition.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps I could assist hon. members. Is the right hon. Prime Minister tabling the document, or is he requesting that the hon. member for Kamloops table it?

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, perhaps to facilitate this process I will seek unanimous consent of the House to allow the tabling of the AT&T ad which indicates that to have direct access to Canada it will be at the expense of thousands of telecommunications workers. That is the point I was trying to make.

But, Mr. Speaker, my request—

Mr. Speaker: I hope that I indicated, gently of course, that I do not really think we should get back into the debate. I understand the right hon. Prime Minister has tabled the document. The hon. member for Kamloops is asking consent to table the document. That may not be necessary.

Mr. Riis: To simplify it, Mr. Speaker, whether the Prime Minister has asked to table it or I have sought unanimous consent to table it, I think the document will be tabled.

However, I want to ask my friend the right hon. Prime Minister, when he was reading The Wall Street Journal was he reading the help wanted ads?

Mr. Speaker: I think I would almost have to ask consent if there is to be any reply to that. I am going to move on.

Mr. Mulroney: Mr. Speaker, I do not plan to respond to that except on behalf of all members of the House to express the view that really, after a day, it is time for Audrey to come back.

TABLING OF DOCUMENTS REFERRED TO IN QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Cid Samson (Timmins—Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, today during Question Period I made reference to a document I had and was willing to table entitled "The Digest of Benefit Entitlement Principles". In my supplementary question I referred to a transcript of a CBC Radio interview that was held this morning with regard to the comments made by Mr. Lloyd Allen, chief adjudicator for unemployment insurance claims.

I seek unanimous consent from the House to table these two documents.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent.

SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S.O.81—AGRICULTURE

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Althouse.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Gatineau—La Lièvre has the floor for at most 10 minutes.

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): Mr. Speaker, the opposition motions reads: "That this House condemns the government for reneging on its commitment to Canadian farmers by changing its policy in the following areas:" and it mentions the Third Line of Defence, the Crow transportation benefit and especially the GATT agreement that Canada signed many years ago.

For several years, farmers across the country have been very aware of the threat facing them. Over the years, we in Canada have built an agricultural infrastructure that has been very good for our farmers. But with the GATT negotiations, our farmers have been in danger for some time. They know it and they show it. We saw that last year, in February, I think, when nearly 50,000 people came to Parliament Hill to protest this issue of GATT.

But we become increasingly concerned as time goes on, when we realize that the Canadian negotiators in GATT told a parliamentary committee that our position had less and less support in other countries, especially Japan, which wanted to protect its domestic market as we want to protect ours for poultry, eggs and industrial and processing milk.

We are in a situation where our country's negotiators seem concerned about our decreasing support. We are moving towards a new system for which we are not ready and with which our farmers and organizations across the country do not agree.

After this statement by our GATT representative, a small article appeared in the newspapers, reporting that the Minister of Agriculture said that our farm quota system was being vigorously defended. But, Mr. Speaker, we wonder who is telling the truth on this. We are concerned for the simple reason that with the changes imposed by GATT, our farmers' investment in their farms, the family business, if you will, will lose value, that is obvious.

This House even supported and passed a motion asking the Prime Minister to go personally to defend article XI of GATT.

• (1510)

We wanted the Prime Minister to impress upon the European countries, especially upon Jacques Delors, and the newly-elected US President that article XI of the GATT was absolutely fundamental and vital to farmers in Canada. Above all, if I may Mr. Speaker, as I have discovered in my numerous conversations with UPA leaders—that is the Union des producteurs agricoles du Québec—there is of course a great vested interest, when you think that 48 per cent of industrial milk is produced in Quebec. That is a very important market for our dairy producers in Quebec. But we are very concerned about this change to article XI of the GATT. It would be tantamount to revolutionizing the way our producers operate.

They tell us about tariffication. Representatives from Canadian associations, whether from the poultry, egg or industrial milk industry, tell us that they are being pressured into accepting the tariffication instead of the quota system guaranteed under article XI of the GATT. We do not want the tariffication; neither do our farm organizations. I wonder, not so much for myself as for farm associations and organizations of course, who is putting pressure on this country's farm organizations to accept or at least consider tariffication? I thought their answer was pretty clear last year when they rallied on Parliament Hill.

I am sure that, if they could voice their concern in this House, the representatives of all these organizations, especially those from the UPA, they would. They actually did in another way, democratically, through letters, telegrams, petitions and so on. Except that government seems ready to capitulate and see article XI of the GATT fail in the end, and that will have a major impact on agriculture in Canada.

That is why we call upon government. This is very important. We have a motion before us and the Prime Minister has recognized that we have to fight for article XI of the GATT as it affects our farmers, but what we have to do is to stress the importance of having the Government of Canada tell not only European organizations and Jacques Delors, but also the new President of the United States of America that we, in Canada, are not exporters of farm products, that we are in no way destabilizing the global market, that we have no surpluses that could be cause for concern. In that context, it is only normal for the Prime Minister to explain to our GATT partners that it is vital for our country and that we will not accept or agree to sign a deal which will literally drive our farmers to personal bankruptcy.

The situation is very clear, and we would like this government to realize that it has a mandate to protect an agrarian structure that has worked well during all those years, a truly wonderful system for many. I could quote from articles written by U.S. organizations and associations concerning our quota system in Canada. They actually say that they would need such a system, not only for milk, but also for poultry and eggs. If there are people in the United States who believe that our system is so special, all the more reason for us, here in Canada, to protect this system through our government. But without that will, if it is not made obvious to our GATT partners, of course we will fail.

The message is clear. We have a farming system that many countries wish they had. It is therefore essential that we never agree to abandon a system that has benefited not only our farmers but also Canadian consumers.

[English]

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Prince Edward—Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I would like to say at the beginning of my comments today that I will be sharing my time with my colleague from Winnipeg—St. James.

It is a pleasure for me to make some comments on the motion put forward by the New Democratic Party in condemning the government for reneging on its commitments to Canadian farmers by changing policy in many different areas.

The government should be faulted not only for changing policy but having a number of consultations, and I will give them credit, with many and most of the players in the agrifood industry. However the government has been mostly all fluff and no stuff. However in the major part of the industry many players are now asking where and when is the government going to come up with solutions to all the suggestions and comments that have been given to them.

We know that agriculture in Canada is facing an unprecedented crisis. We all know the economic figures show the primary producer is facing a very uncertain future. It has come to the point where there are even food banks in rural Canada. It is something which has been unheard of and unthought of in the past, but in rural Canada we have food banks.

The average farmer feeds approximately 120 people in Canada. Yet it is very likely that one of the partners in that farm ownership, one of the spouses, is very likely going outside the farm environment and the business environment to work in order to feed that farmer's own family.

What is lacking in this country is a long-term agricultural policy, a long-term vision. We do not have that. We need that. All of us as parliamentarians need to work toward that. I am pleased to say our party in particular has been working very diligently on it and we look forward to unveiling it to the public in the very near future.

The government says it is committed to putting into place permanent safety net programs to get away from ad hoc payments which have been there in the past. I personally have no problem with that but we all know that so far it has not worked. It has been tried. We have all had an opportunity to comment on the attempts that have been made with GRIP and NISA. They are good attempts but they have not worked to the extent that they should and they need a very serious reworking and revamping so that they will.

Agriculture Canada states that in 1992 the total net income in agriculture will be between $4 billion and $4.9 billion. However in 1993 that is expected to drop to $3.3 billion to $4.4 billion. I do not know how successful this government can say it is when the total net income is going to drop to that extent.

In the province of Saskatchewan alone the total income figures last year were between $427 million and $522 million. This year they will be between $250 million and $350 million, down again. How can the government say it has been successful?

This motion before us today deals with several parts of the agricultural industry but not all of them. There is no mention in the motion of a commitment of support for the processing and further processing industries which are also feeling the pinch.

It is a known fact that since 1989 Canada has had close to 100 food processing industries and plants close down. Agriculture Canada figures state there were over 20 such plants in 1989 while five opened, they will admit. According to Agriculture Canada's own figures, unfortunately 34,000 jobs have been lost in the food processing industry.

• (1520)

GRIP and NISA, which are long-term safety net programs, are being tried and are being worked with. So far in many areas they have been insufficient. They have been a disappointment to the farmers and the industry.

It has even gone so far that last week the ministers of agriculture in Manitoba and Saskatchewan made the prediction that these programs would be in such a drastic financial situation that by 1995 they might be even too expensive to continue.

Some of the concerns that many of us had when these programs were being discussed in a legislative committee, that they needed to be put in place in a different manner than they were, that they would deliver a fair bit of money in the short term, but in the not too distant future they were not going to be successful, unfortunately I think some of our comments at that time are proving to have been true.

I urge the government to make the necessary changes to those programs so that they can be effective. We had concerns they were not going to be market neutral. Unfortunately those concerns have come true.

The unpredictable prairie weather this year has resulted in a dramatic downturn in the quality of grain produced and therefore the returns to the producers are smaller. In provinces such as Saskatchewan there are estimates that the return, because over 50 per cent of the grain is of feed grain quality, is drastically reduced. The emotional and financial strain on the agrifood industry, in particular on the primary producers, is absolutely incredible.

Other facts and figures we need to consider are these. On the prairies there are more farmers over the age of 70 than there are under the age of 30. We need to consider what we are going to do. I ask this government what it is doing and what is it prepared to do to encourage young people to stay in the industry and to get into the industry.

The third line of defence has turned out to be nothing more than a mythical creature. It was stated that if everything else failed, that the third line of defence type programs would be put in place. I ask the government if this is not the time for that. If there ever was a time that we need third line of defence programs, now is the time. What is the government doing about that? If it is doing anything it certainly has not made it known to the producers.

Producers are getting discouraged. They have lost confidence. They want to know where they are going to go. If we look at what has happened in Ontario this year, I can tell members from very close observation that there are still many acres of corn and soybean crops in the fields. I know of one instance where a producer has close to 300 acres of corn and soybeans which because of the weather this year was totally written off by crop insurance. Yes, there will be crop insurance payments from the Canada–Ontario crop insurance program. Here we are today, February 9, and that producer has not received one penny from that program when the claims were put in well before Christmas.

The federal government wants, as it always does, to lay claim to the crop insurance program and the important role it plays. How does it suggest that producer cash flow his business when the crop insurance program does not pay up? I will make just one comment. If the producer was late in paying his or her premium, my guess would be that crop insurance would say: "Sorry, you don't have any coverage".

The other area I want to stress in my last minute is that the government has, as far as I am concerned, let us and the industry down as far as supply management is concerned. I will just close with a couple of comments. How do you think the industry feels when the government's chief negotiator at GATT recently stated basically that the government's position is a lost cause. He then goes on to say that the negotiations are not over yet. I do not know how effective a negotiator he can be.

Perhaps the greatest tragedy is that I do not think the government has recognized to the extent it should the effect this has had and the human tragedy in the rural communities. Farm families just want to be able to continue to work hard for their living and provide good food to Canadians.

Finally, I want to address this to the taxpayers who wonder why governments spend billions of dollars on agriculture. The taxpayer, like all of us in these recessionary times, finds it difficult to rationalize big expenses. Why do we continue to support agriculture? The answer is because it is worth support. The cost of farm support is not cheap but Canadians should ask themselves where they want their food to come from. I believe they want it to come from Canada.

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg—St. James): Mr. Speaker, I consider it an honour to take part in this very important debate. It brings to light some of the very serious concerns emanating from my part of the country.

I want to start by saying how disappointed I was in some of the offerings from the other side of the House earlier today in this debate. I paid close attention to the remarks made by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Prime Minister. One would have to spend a lot of years in this House of Commons to find a more self–righteous, more sanctimonious speech than the one delivered by the hon. Parliamentary Secretary to the Prime Minister. The man stood in his place and talked about how he really cared about the farm community in this country. He talked about how this Prime Minister really cares about the farm community, that there is no greater champion of Canadian agriculture than the right hon. Prime Minister, and he said it with a straight face.

In fact, he told the story about the time when the Prime Minister had lunch with the hon. parliamentary secretary and the Prime Minister did not have his glasses so he borrowed the parliamentary secretary's. What did the Prime Minister say? "When I look through these glasses all I see is wheat". Pretty sanctimonious, self–righteous stuff.

If you listen to the parliamentary secretary and if you did not know any better, you would think that Canadian farmers had no problems at all. Life is blissful out on the land. In fact, what the parliamentary secretary is saying is that if there are any problems on the farm, if there are any problems in Canadian agriculture, do not blame us. Do not blame the federal government because we have always done our best. We are honourable and we really care.

Let us just look at the record of the government. If we want to talk about the right hon. Prime Minister, we could say that if he really wants something he usually gets his way. For example, take how he went to the wall for the big pharmaceutical companies, the multinationals that want to destroy our generic industry, that want to destroy our compulsory licensing system, a system that prevailed in Canada for 20 years and saved Canadians billions of dollars.

The Prime Minister did not have any trouble going to the wall on that issue. He did not have any trouble giving support to the big multinationals. He brought in Bill C–91 and in the process he destroyed compulsory licensing in the country.

Look at the right hon. Prime Minister's record in the field of agriculture. I will point to a study that was carried out by the Canada Grains Council. We all know how devastating the export enhancement program of the United States has been to grain farmers in Canada. In fact, according to the study carried out by the Canada Grains Council, the export enhancement program cost Canadian farmers between the years 1985 and 1990 something like $2.5 billion. Not a million dollars, $2.5 billion.

• (1530)

One would think that this great champion of Canadian agriculture would be pretty disturbed about that. One would think that this great champion of Canadian agriculture would be down there in Washington shouting from the rooftops. He would be perhaps even trying to throttle the President of the United States for doing such a dastardly thing to Canadian agriculture.

What does the record suggest? What does the record say? The record says absolutely nothing because the Prime Minister says nothing about that. We have asked him for a number of years to address this issue of the Export Enhancement Program. He refuses. The Minister of Agriculture refuses. The entire lot refuses.

They will not do anything. Yet, these are the parrot people who stand in their place and say: "We are the champions of Canadian agriculture. We have a proud record. If you have any problems, don't look at us". I wanted to point that out because we have to get a little balance in this debate. We are not going to allow those people to get away with those remarks.

I want to point to some other things. This government is always so busy, it says, working on behalf of farmers. I will get to some of the problems in a moment. We know the serious problems that farmers face. Yet, this government finds time to be studying the possibility of a North American, continental barley market.

One would think that the government would have better things to do than to be spending its time determining whether there should be a continental barley market. All it has to do is go to almost any farm area of Canada and it will be told in black and white terms: "Forget it. Forget it. We do not want it. It will help only a few farmers near the United States border. It will help only a few farmers". In the process, it is one more exercise in the undermining of the Canadian Wheat Board.

This government and this parliamentary secretary stand up and say: "We are the great champions of Canadian agriculture. Just look at us. If you have any problems, please do not blame us".

What does the Prairie Pool say about the continental barley market? I want to refer to a statement that it has distributed. I will mention just a couple of points. I want to quote directly from the document produced by the Prairie Pool: "The CWB pooling system would not survive the loss of the single-desk selling system. If producers have the option of selling to the board or marketing directly to the U.S., the CWB barley pool would become voluntary producers who would have the option to sell only to the board when U.S. spot prices are low. This would depress the pool price and increase the risk of pool deficits. Number two, removing CWB control of sales would affect the board's ability to source grain to meet international commitments".

I could go on and on. Let us face it. What the Prairie Pools are saying makes a lot of sense. You either have a Wheat Board that has some control, or you do not. You cannot have it both ways.

We have to realize just how important the agricultural industry is. For example, it should not be forgotten that the capital value of the agricultural industry right now stands at about $130 billion. If you look at its production of just a couple of years ago, that value had been set at $25 billion. The industry contributed about $10 billion to Canada's gross domestic product.

In fact, that agricultural industry accounts for about seven per cent of Canada's trade. It earns, on the positive side of the ledger, about $3 million. That is the kind of industry we are talking about. We are talking about an industry that is in trouble, an industry that has to be saved and an industry that needs to be supported.

I want to point out in my final remarks that according to the current estimates, income may plummet by almost $1 billion this year on the prairies.

We know this government has done a considerable amount of things in terms of infusing cash into the agriculture industry. We do not deny that for a moment. I know the agricultural industry, especially the producers, are grateful for that. The fact of the matter is that there is still a cash crisis. Farmers are leaving the land. Bankruptcies are up. There is a lot of despair.

One of the members from Saskatchewan talked earlier today about the number of suicides in his province alone. It gives you an idea of the situation down on the farm. The farmers are asking for about $800 million. It is a lot of money, but we must address that situation. We must address that problem because we have to save the farm and we have to maintain and strengthen rural life.

Mr. Felix Holtmann (Portage—Interlake): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to see that the Liberal member from Winnipeg—St. James has an interest in agriculture and the farming economy and he should be commended for taking such an interest.

I heard him give some recognition to the government for some cash infusion over the past years when the agricultural sector was in some difficulty. If he read local papers—I am sure he has—some Canadians found the cash infusion very significant in terms of paying out from the tax dollars that they put in, many billions of dollars. This averaged I believe $12,000 to $13,000 per farmer per year for the last eight years so I am sure that is what he was referring to. He points out that there is still difficulty in farming, especially in grain farming. He is somewhat critical of the actions taken by this government in trying to find solutions to those problems.

I thought he might have taken some time to put forward a platform as to how his party intends to deal with it as we are going into an election before too long. If he cares to respond to this I hope he does not stand up and say: "We will not do that, and we will not do this, but in fact here are the positive steps we want to take if we form the government". That would be very helpful for this Chamber here today and for the Canadian public because he was somewhat critical of the barley markets that the minister was seeking out.

I cannot imagine why he would be critical of finding and using any effort possible to find new markets for barley as they now have with oats. Since it has been taken out of the Wheat Board, oats are worth more than barley. One cannot necessarily condemn the farmer for wanting to sell it and get a higher price.

With all due respect to his interests, he should not stand and condemn this government, but show me how he is going to get rid of it at a higher price and create markets for the farmer's grain that is going to be produced and has been produced in the past year.

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg—St. James): Mr. Speaker, my good friend from Portage—Interlake talks about the infusion of cash into the agricultural community. I repeat that the government—like governments in the past—has contributed in the way of subsidies and other ways toward the agricultural community and that is appreciated.

What is not appreciated is the hypocrisy of the government. I will just point out one example of hypocrisy. I believe the hon. member for Portage—Interlake mentioned the package that was announced two or three weeks ago for the province of Saskatchewan. In that package is $170 million or $180 million. Is that not right?

These people from the other side do not want to point out that that there is only about $20 million new dollars of federal money in that package. It is only $20 million. At the very same time and in the very same year, they cut WGTA payments to the tune of $70 million. For the farmer, regardless of how you cut it, that is a reduction of about $50 million.

• (1540)

In other words, this government gives with one hand and it takes away with the other. In this particular case the hand that takes is taking a lot more than the hand that gives.

That is hypocrisy. That is the kind of policy that this government has been known for for a good long time.

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Justice, Attorney General of Canada and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to respond to today's opposition motion, which claims the government has failed to provide clear and unequivocal support for our supply management system. The opposition alleges that the government is sending mixed signals with respect to its position on the strengthening and clarification of GATT article XI.

This is patently false. The government has never changed its commitment to strengthening and clarifying GATT, article XI. It has taken a balanced position, and it did so more than two years ago. This position, which was approved by groups of farm producers, groups in the agricultural industry across Canada, has not changed. It was supported across Canada.

The so-called Uruguay round refers to a major series of negotiations which are part of that round and which have been going on for more than six years. One hundred and eight countries are involved. We tend to forget that Canada is one of those 108 countries and that these are probably the most comprehensive and most complex trade negotiations ever conducted in the world.

These negotiations involve an unprecedented number of participants who are more active than ever before. There are many issues on the agenda including agriculture, textiles, subsidies, dispute settlement, access to markets and services, for instance intellectual property, an area in which I had the privilege of working as well, and all other trade related issues.

We must be realistic and consider that when negotiations involve 108 countries at one time, with negotiating committees whose interests do not always coincide, and that when we get into the final stages, the pressure starts coming from all sides. I may say that so far, Canada has fiercely resisted any attempts by partners and allies throughout the world to urge us to drop or modify our position. Our position is clear and has been stated on many occasions.

I think members on both sides of the House will admit—there is no problem on our side—but members on the other side know that we never gave in. In fact, I attended a meeting with the group that represents the largest number of farmers in Canada who are affected by article XI, and I am referring to the dairy producers. They held their annual meeting in Calgary a little over a week ago, and my colleague the Minister for International Trade and I went to Calgary to meet them and discuss and report on the situation in Geneva to show them once again that we want to stay the course and maintain the same position.

What are the chances of success of these negotiations? Despite missed deadlines, dashed hopes and the obvious political problems, GATT member countries remain generally optimistic about obtaining a comprehensive agreement that will set the rules for trade between all parts of the world, at least for this decade.

I think that some political considerations come into play that delay proceedings or often put things in a new light. Both the Americans and the Europeans changed their negotiating team in recent months. In Europe, there were changes at the end of last year, in December. Of course, in the United States, the change of president brought changes to the negotiating team. Last week, we had an opportunity when the Prime Minister went to Washington to meet President Clinton and the Minister for International Trade also met with the minister responsible for trade there. We renewed contact to ensure that our main trading partner, the United States, is well aware of our position and that this position has not changed.

As a matter of economic policy, freer trade is justified because it promotes efficiency, competitiveness and more generally confidence among investors and business people. That encourages economic growth and job creation. We need only consider the fact that since the free trade agreement was signed with the United States, over-all trade with the U.S. has increased by something like $15 to $20 billion, I think. Despite the recession, our food and agriculture exports to the United States have increased 25 to 30 per cent in all areas, including those affected by article XI covering supply management.

You know that even in this special sector protected by a specific GATT article, some trade still goes on and some products are exported. This means that the fears expressed many times, especially by the opposition, the same people who from the very beginning opposed freer trade, in particular the New Democratic Party—these people fiercely opposed any change in our economic policies, especially with respect to trade. I think that they should be able to see that the disaster predicted after the free trade agreement was signed has not happened. It has not happened because now and for the coming years as we approach the 21st century, the economic approach will be broader, more developed trade and this protectionist approach from the 1950s particularly advocated by the New Democratic Party and supported in many respects by their colleagues in the Liberal Party leads nowhere. It is a regressive, unrealistic policy.

Mr. Speaker, I think it is important to emphasize that as one of these 108 countries throughout the world that are trying with difficulty, we must admit, but trying nevertheless to have trade rules that apply to everyone efficiently, we have more chance of successfully building our economic future if we prepare adequately to face international trade and prepare to face market rules that will require countries to be more competitive. I would almost say that is a truism. Any attempt to take us back to what it was like 25 years ago or to the market rules of even 10 years ago could hardly work now.

• (1550)

In the supply management sector, which is a rather special case, we have a very real problem. Some countries are saying: "Hey, Canada, you want the best of both worlds! You support free trade, and you want to sell your grain everywhere in Asia, Europe and the United States. You want trade barriers to come down, not just for grain but also for beef, pork and other products, and at the same time you want to protect your dairy farmers, poultry farmers and egg producers who want you to maintain those barriers".

We are often told our position is not consistent. On the face of it, there does seem to be some inconsistency. However, a closer look will show there is no incompatibility, because what we have been doing since GATT first started is adapt our supply management system in accordance with a clear and specific—more or less clear, and I will get back to that—article, the well-known GATT, article XI. What is the underlying principle? It is quite simple. Canada demands the right to say: we have regulated our business sector in these areas across the country. We no longer produce a surplus of milk, powdered milk or poultry. We produce according to Canadian demand, with an extra margin for exports to very minor markets we have been supplying for a number of years. And we also accept certain imports of products that historically have been allowed to come into the country, such as cheese from Europe and certain quantities of yogurt from the United States.

However, under article XI, Canada demands the right to be able to say at the border: we do not send any surpluses to foreign markets, so we have the right under article XI to prevent other countries from flooding our markets with surplus products that may be dumped at prices that have no connection at all with being competitive or with observing the law of supply and demand.

Until quite recently, article XI had allowed Canadian producers to make a decent living and even enjoy some degree of prosperity, which was agreeable to everyone. However, we had a couple of setbacks, including a GATT ruling, a GATT panel on yogurt and ice cream. We have a problem with the Americans, since the Americans would like to sell their yogurt and ice cream on our markets, and we have high tariffs that prevent the entry of these products. That was challenged at GATT, which said: Canada, you do not have the right or we do not think you have the right to challenge or to prevent entry of these products under article XI in its present form. This caused considerable alarm among our own people who for the past decades had thought they were adequately protected. So what did we do? First, we obtained an agreement from the Americans that there would be no changes regarding yogurt and ice cream for the time being, so that we could continue negotiations at the international level, not just with the Americans but with other countries across the world. This led us to take the position we have now: since article XI in its present form is not sufficiently clear, we request clarification and strengthening of the article so that it covers not just fresh milk, the kind we drink, but also processed milk products like butter, cheese, yogurt and ice cream.

That was the first objective, a very laudable one. I would add that there was a certain, I do not know just what to call it, but in any event, I had a lot of difficulty accepting that the Americans could sell us ice cream or yogurt here in Canada but that we could not sell them ice cream, for example, because they have special permission under GATT. They have special permission from GATT to prevent ice cream from entering their country from Canada, Europe, Australia or anywhere else.

The same goes for the Europeans who over the years obtained a special permission called variable levies giving them a right to impose import duties of whatever amount. I will give you an example. If you take a pound of bacon or a pound of pork to Europe and want to sell it for $2 a pound or $2 for 500 grams, you are refused and the price is raised to $8, if the price in Europe is $8. I think that anyone who takes a close look at that would see that it is not quite fair and equitable under the rules for international trade.

The purpose of this Uruguay round was to achieve more consistency in trade rules and to have the same rules for everyone. I could take an example from hockey. If you have two hockey teams, there are five players on each side, but I would not allow one team to have five players and the other seven. So again referring to the example of ice cream, the Americans have six players on the ice and we have only five. For the case of bacon in Europe, they have seven players and we only have five. We can win from time to time but it is difficult to win more often when the same rules do not apply to everyone fairly.

The over-all purpose of these negotiations is to have fair and equitable rules that apply to everyone. That is the goal we are pursuing.

In conclusion, I will say that one of the strong points in this stage of negotiations is that Canada has a comprehensive policy that was developed with the help of Canadian farmers from all regions. Whether they produce grain, pork, beef, milk or poultry, they all agree. In the negotiations, the farmers agreed to put some things on the table, in particular a cut in the dairy subsidy and permission for foreign products to take 3 to 5 per cent of the Canadian market. Nevertheless, that was a considerable effort for our farmers at a time when the domestic market is shrinking and domestic consumption in the dairy sector alone has declined between 13 and 15 per cent.

I think it was a good move for these people to allow some access to their market in exchange for strengthening Article XI. We are offering the Americans and Europeans the same thing. I will repeat what the European negotiators, Mr. Andriessen and the others, whom I met personally when we went to Geneva with the farmers last spring, said the Europeans would not allow one kilogram of butter more than the minimum allocated at the end of the GATT negotiations. The Canadian position is the same. We will not allow foreigners and foreign countries to put any more of their products on our market than was accepted.

That position still stands, it has not changed and with all respect, I still think that the motion presented today is not applicable because our government definitely does not deserve the slightest blame since it has stood up and met its commitments 150 per cent.

• (1600)

In that, it has the unwavering support of the farm community and the whole Canadian agri food sector.

We have a good system, which we have built with much effort over the years, and we will continue to defend it. That is the Canadian position on GATT.

[English]

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I listened attentively to the minister's words and noted when he said the GATT was trying to create a level playing field. He talked about the difficulty he was having protecting the marketing boards.

Recently in the United States we have seen—and my colleague from Lambton—Middlesex has brought it up repeatedly—several articles in the American newspapers where the inspectors of the U.S. department of agriculture have said millions of tonnes of substandard poultry and some beef were being sold to consumers. Just recently we know of a case where young people were poisoned to death because of substandard meat.

In the hon. member's speech about the marketing boards he did not mention our agricultural industry has probably the highest standards in terms of quality and production of any agricultural sector.

Does he not believe in that extra effort and extra cost that goes into quality? As an urban member of Parliament, I know the people in my urban community are concerned about the quality of products we receive from our agricultural community. Does he not think the extra work farmers put into their products is something we should use to reinforce the uniqueness of marketing boards in this country?

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member is raising an important point. It is better coming from your mouth than mine that we have the best standards in the world. I believe that. Obviously we have worked hard to keep that system the best in the world.

The specific case of poultry does not really apply. We have standards in some cases that are different from the United States. Year after year I would say its system is coming closer to ours.

We are only importing about 7 per cent of our poultry products from the United States. There is an historic quota. Every time a Canadian industry wants to import poultry products it needs a permit from international trade. Those products coming from the United States have to meet Canadian standards and I totally agree with my hon. friend that we should be very tough about meeting those measures as we always are.

From time to time there is pressure from those in the sector that they need more flexibility in the system, but I am not going to give an inch in the area of inspection. I think it is important. We have the best system in the world and we stand by it.

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to hear the hon. minister does not intend to give an inch on strengthened article XI and protection for supply management commodities. I would point out to him the government's own officials are saying that their position has become untenable and they will have to eventually adopt a policy of tariffication in exchange for all border measures.

I am sure the minister is aware that tariffication even at very high rates will not provide protection some times of the year against very low priced products from the United States, which has fluctuating prices for poultry and eggs in particular. There are periods of time when prices are so low that even a high tariff will not keep the products out. Those in the United States will still be able to sell those products to Canada and make a profit.

Many dairy and poultry products that are offered at world price are products that are being dumped. The GATT has not done a very good job on agricultural products that are being dumped. The policy of the United States right now with regard to grain is a dumping process, but none of the countries that get access to that very cheap grain will take the United States to the GATT court for dumping. They simply buy it because it is very cheap.

How does he think we will be able to protect ourselves against that kind of action by the Americans or any other country, since the dumping rules are being ignored by the importing countries now? How would he see our producers of dairy products and poultry products being treated any differently than our grain growers who have seen their asset values drop by more than 50 per cent since the beginning of this action? Does he hold out the same prospect for quota values and land values for dairy and chicken producers?

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, my colleague raises a different question with a number of elements. We are having some difficulty with our position in Geneva because we do not have many allies. Out of 108 countries so far only 5 or 6 are on our side. Israel, Korea, Japan, Norway and Switzerland support our position on article XI, but some of them are not totally committed.

Norway and Switzerland are close to the European Community and are trying to make some arrangements to get ready to accept tariffication. They are independent countries. We are trying to get those allies on side and are doing everything we can.

Some others like Japan are trying to make the best of the situation. I think we are not there yet. The Americans and Europeans, the two major players, are still trying to make arrangements.

Our position on article XI is supported by a few members. I think we will be able to deal with the situation as soon as we are closer to an agreement between the Americans and the Europeans. I think at this very moment it will be easier to get them on side. So far we have done well.

It is unfortunate that we cannot get more support from other countries, but our people in Canada are fully aware of the situation. We told them very bluntly and frankly that we are not going to change our position. Whatever happens we will sit down with them to discuss our position.

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, the minister has talked about how committed his government and the Prime Minister are to agriculture. I would like to ask the minister why in 1991 farm bankruptcies reached 441 which was double the number of bankruptcies in 1980 when the Liberal party was in government. Why was the total farm income 53 per cent lower in 1991 than it was in 1989?

• (1610)

Could he also tell the House why the total farm debt in Canada has reached a staggering $23 billion? Why is the ability to repay the debt being seriously eroded by the government's economic policies?

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, if you look at the situation we face now and that we were facing during those years, there is really a war between the major countries in Europe and America. We are facing the situation where the grain prices are lower than they were a decade ago.

Obviously, the farmers' receipts are lower and that is why the amount given to farmers has grown from $100 million to over $6 billion. We transferred $10 billion to farmers out of programs like NISA, GRIP and other special programs over the years.

That was done to make sure the farmers would be able to face the terrible situation they are not responsible for. I do not think the federal or provincial governments are responsible for this. It is an international situation and we are facing a war. Dumping prices are all over the place and we are just trying to keep our farmers in business to make sure they will be able to survive.

That is why we are being so tough at the negotiating table at GATT. We want to have a level playing field for everybody. I know it is not an easy task. I understand what you mean. The farmers are in a difficult situation and we have pumped money into the system over the years to make sure our farmers will be able to survive those difficult times.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, it is remarkable to listen to the self-congratulatory words of the junior minister of agriculture. It is such a contrast.

I had dinner last Saturday with three farmers. Two of them had sons who were working with them in their farm enterprises. One had sons and daughters who had left the farm. All three of the farmers agreed that the lucky person was the father whose sons had left the farm.

That is the kind of reality that is out there for many of our farmers throughout this country, despite the minister's fine words.

Essex county has some of the best farming country in the world. It has some of the best land in the world. Its climate has ordinarily been excellent for the production of farm products. Yet in Essex county and across Ontario the farm crisis is very real and very serious for many, many Canadians.

Low prices have been part of the reason. Problems in government policy have been another part of the reason. Pressures from the United States and its subsidies to grain exporters have been a third factor. When the negotiations took place introducing some of the new policies that have come to mark farm policy in Canada like GRIP and NISA, this government promised to provide a third line of defence if these policies were not enough. It has failed to provide that.

We needed it last year in Essex county when farmers in my constituency were hit with a severe drought. Corn was only knee-high at harvest time. The soybean crops were ruined. Most crops, if farmers were lucky, yielded 50 per cent of what they ordinarily would have produced. Costs, however, continued to be the same. Sometimes they were somewhat higher as farmers tried to deal with the drought situation.

Agriculture Canada itself has said the following: "Governments are responsible for offering support and changes to the economic and/or legislative environment when severe difficulties arise that are not covered by existing programs".

Such difficulties have arisen. They arose last year in Essex county and have arisen this year in much of Ontario especially for corn producers. They have arisen also in Saskatchewan, in northern B.C. and in Prince Edward Island.

Across the country, farmers are hurting. The first two lines of defence are price levels and the new government GRIP and NISA programs. They are inadequate. That third line of defence is desperately needed and the government's promise of that third line of defence must be respected. Yet what is the federal government doing? It is effectively letting these family farms face the catastrophe of disappearance.

The government's programs, GRIP for instance, are simply not good enough. They are based on a rolling 15-year average of prices. As the price levels, year by year, continue to be significantly poorer than are needed to cover the costs of production for many farmers, the GRIP program, as the years go forward, becomes of less and less benefit to the farming community. GRIP only gives the farmer an already insufficient price for the product produced. NISA is only helpful for those farmers who have a decent income.

The second line of defence that the government established is too weak to protect farmers from the low prices that they have been experiencing as a consequence of trade pressures that come out of the massive level of subsidies being provided in the United States.

Rural communities across the country are being decimated as a consequence. It is not just from these low prices. They are losing their post offices and processing plants. The only thing on the increase is the number of people unemployed.

For the first time last year the National Farmers Union had to establish and operate with support from the Ontario government a welfare program, a relief program, for farmers in my constituency. They had to hand out support so that farmers could buy food for themselves. That is the kind of reality that is becoming far too common across our farm communities.

The solution, I believe, is a system of supply management, a system of orderly marketing and a system which provides support for farm prices. Yet this kind of supply management, which has been so successful in our dairy industries and so successful for producers of poultry products, may be on its last legs because of what is happening in the GATT. Despite what the minister says, the pressure is very much there and this government is not making the noises which suggest that it is going to stand up to that pressure.

• (1620)

On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I think that you may be just a little quick off the mark on your timing.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I appreciate your question but this morning your party indicated that its members would share their time. However, I have no objection if you want to take your maximum 20 minutes.

Mr. Langdon: Mr. Speaker, in terms of at least how I have been following the clock, I have been speaking for six minutes. You just indicated I had two left.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): You have been speaking for eight minutes and twenty-three seconds.

Mr. Langdon: Your clock, Mr. Speaker, is different from the clock which is up here in the House of Commons.

Let me stress if I could in the few minutes that I have left that the uncertainty created by the GATT negotiations is something extremely serious for farmers. We have to recognize that dairy producers and poultry producers cannot make those investments that they wish to if they do not have certainty for the future.

We also see that the credit problem for many farmers continues to be extremely difficult. With a $23 billion debt in this country there has to be a change which gives the Farm Credit Corporation a significantly larger and more powerful role to play within this economy.

We also believe that changes must be made with respect to the free trade agreement. We need to get out of that agreement because we have seen our industries throughout our communities hit very hard by the impact of free trade. Just ask anyone in my county who used to grow tomatoes for tomato paste. Just ask anyone who used to grow for Campbell in Chatham. Ask farmers who used to grow hand-picked tomatoes for Heinz. They simply do not have that market.

Agriculture is presently being treated with the same lack of respect and the same recklessness that the Atlantic fishery was treated with five years ago.

The Conservatives are showing a similar lack of concern. What is needed is action, a new approach and a real sense of empathy and recognition of the problem on the part of this government.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I want to reassure hon. members that the Chair has a very precise stopwatch which gives time to the hundredth of a second.

Resuming debate, the hon. member for Regina—Qu'Appelle.

[English]

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina—Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity of being able to enter into the debate and speak on the motion that was presented to the House by my colleague, the member for Mackenzie.

I also represent a constituency with a fair number of farmers. My riding is half inside and half outside of Regina. Whether one is in Regina or out in the rural areas, on a daily basis one is reminded of the crisis that is facing agriculture in Canada particularly in Saskatchewan. One is reminded from the lost job opportunities. One is reminded as one goes through Coffee Row and hears the individual stories from people of how they are losing their land that was broken and settled by their great-grandfathers. Land that has been in the family for generations now must be sold. The sons and daughters are abandoning their land. The statistics tell it. The average Saskatchewan farm income for 1992 was about $636 million or 30 per cent below the 10-year average. That is indexed for inflation. For example, for the year 1993, the forecast is $238 million or about $4,000 per farmer.

Of course, a lot of this is due to the trade wars. It is estimated that the trade wars constitute a loss of some $6.7 billion from 1985 to the end of 1993 for Saskatchewan.

I can see it in my riding when I go door to door. There are a number of perfectly good homes that are empty with not even a "for sale" on them because they know they will never find a buyer. Slowly, these towns that used to be vibrant are now dying out and becoming ghost towns.

It is a crisis. It is a crisis that we in Saskatchewan particularly feel because so much of our economy is dependent upon agriculture. It is not just a crisis for Saskatchewan. Surely, it is a crisis for the country as a whole. Are we as a country and as a whole willing to give up an important agricultural sector, namely the wheat producers who produce most of the foreign earnings in terms of exports of our agricultural products?

We ask what this Conservative government has done. For years the Conservative government in western Canada portrayed itself as the friend of the farmers. There was a hope that with the election of the Conservative government in 1984, it would implement some programs and policies for agriculture that would produce a base and a firm foundation on which agriculture in western Canada could thrive. What a disappointment.

For the first four years of its mandate it played politics with agriculture. A good example is the last election. On November 11, 10 days before voting day, the government announced a new farm program of some $800 million. Nothing was thought through. There was no consultation. It was totally out of the blue and of course it never materialized. What was needed, of course, was a permanent and predictable program so that farmers would know where they stood and upon which they could depend.

After the 1988 election the government responded with GRIP. We have seen that GRIP has not been the answer. What was needed was a universal program free from political manipulation and easy to administrate. It would automatically kick in and allow farmers to know exactly where they stood. However, GRIP has failed to do that. We have seen this government continuing to play politics with the lives of farmers.

The second thing that stands out about the record of this government is its attempt to off-load. Generally speaking, this unilateral reduction by the federal government cost the province of Saskatchewan some $538 million. We could have been able to balance the budget in our poor province of Saskatchewan had the federal government not off-loaded in numerous areas. The key area of unloading, of course, is in agriculture. The federal government has imposed cost sharing and agricultural income protection programs. This affects Saskatchewan the worst, of course, because Saskatchewan's population consists of such a high number of farms and farm families.

In 1991 and 1992 Saskatchewan paid, on a per capita basis, $199.45, whereas Manitoba only paid $58 and Alberta only paid $40.16 for farm support programs.

Farm support programs should be national programs.

• (1630)

We have lost money because of the international grain trade wars between the Europeans and the Americans. Surely the province of Saskatchewan cannot be expected to fight that battle alone. Yet the feds have continually shoved the responsibility more and more on to the province. For example, in the last year Saskatchewan was responsible for 44 per cent of the farm aid programs. In 1988 it was zero per cent.

Of course, the irony is that the victim in a sense, Saskatchewan, is being blamed as with other Tory programs. This weekend in The Globe and Mail we saw the exposition of the exploitation of Saskatchewan by the Tory government of Grant Devine and his cohorts, the friends of this government. We read in The Globe and Mail how they plundered the treasury of Saskatchewan leaving it with a debt of some $15 billion.

Now this government is shoving further responsibility on to the province of Saskatchewan expecting it to cough up money it does not have because this government's friends, Grant Devine and company, have squandered it all. What irony. It is something the Saskatchewan farmers are going to note.

What else has this government done? We come to transportation. No doubt, the Liberals started it with the destruction of the Crow rate. In the dying months of the former Liberal government it did away with the Crow rate and instead introduced the Western Grain Transportation Act. At that time we warned that it would open the door to the eventual abolition of the Crow benefits. Lo and behold, it is happening.

The Minister of Finance announced a 10 per cent cut in the program for 1993–94 and a further 10 per cent cut for 1994–95. Gone is the two-price system of wheat. Gone is the fuel tax rebate. We have seen user pay programs introduced. We have seen attacks on the Wheat Board. That is the record of this government.

Some fundamental decisions have to be made in this country. What type of agriculture do we want? What do we want to protect? Certainly the GRIP program and programs that pay producers on the amount they grow on their acreages helped the large producers. We see the anomalies in GRIP where some will get hundreds of thousands of dollars in benefits and many will get very little. That is no solution.

We have to depoliticize agriculture. We have to do it on a provincial and a federal level. We cannot afford to play politics with the lives of farmers any more. I strongly suggest that a permanent committee consisting of federal and provincial representatives and the producers be brought together to formulate the programs and that these become the effective programs.

Take agriculture out of politics. People's lives and well-being are dependent. There are some who will play politics with those lives and that is unacceptable. I therefore urge support of our motion.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member from Saskatchewan who has just spoken covered a number of the concerns of the motion before us today. I hope that the Minister of Agriculture when he speaks this afternoon, as I understand he will be, will not give us the usual malarkey that we hear from the parliamentary secretary to the Prime Minister about how many billions of dollars the government has spent over the past six or seven years.

Rather than doing that, the real problems facing prairie agriculture should be dealt with for example, the dramatic drop in income which is forecast for next year. The Saskatchewan income is forecast to drop to some $238 million of realized net farm income where the average income per farm is something like $4,000 in that province.

The government brags about how many billions of dollars in support it provided in 1986 or 1987. It is interesting that the support the government has provided always seems to peak in an election year, for example in 1988, but then drop off. Looking at the statistics, the support was higher in 1992 than it was in 1991 or 1990. Of course 1992 was a projected election year.

Clearly we need to know what the government is going to do. The government has run through the political calendar into the fifth year because the polls are so terrible. The farmers do not worry about that. They want to know what the government is going to do about the net farm income this coming year.

Clearly the Minister of Finance, the former Minister of Agriculture, chopped some $73 million off the Western Grain Transportation Act in December. Other assistance seems to be falling behind. Independent groups like the WEFA group forecast a drop in net farm income by 21 per cent. I hope when the minister speaks later this afternoon he will respond to this because that is what farmers want to know.

Groups like the Prairie Pools Incorporated are in the community and in the gallery today. I am sure they are waiting to hear what the government is going to do about net farming.

Mr. de Jong: Mr. Speaker, yes, we see the aid fluctuate and if it is put on a chart it is totally dependent upon when elections are called. If there is a provincial election we get aid or a promise of aid. Then of course what happens is that the aid comes but it is stretched out to include two crop years and stretched out a little more until the next election is there, whether it is a federal or a provincial election.

We see this playing of politics with people's lives and it is this that the farmers are angry about. It is their livelihood. It is the ability to put food on the table. It is the land that has been in their family for generations. They see politicians playing with their lives and they are angry. They are angry. They expect a national commitment.

As I tried to put on the record the province of Saskatchewan cannot support the grain industry. We cannot fight the treasuries of Europe and the United States. The province of Saskatchewan thought there was a commitment by all provinces and the federal government that the crisis in agriculture was a national commitment. We thought this commitment was made particularly when there were negotiations on the Constitution.

We want to see this government live up to that commitment instead of trying to off-load the problem on to the people of Saskatchewan who are in no position to carry that load.

Hon. Charles Mayer (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, this is an interesting debate to listen to. I take considerable exception to what the previous speaker, the hon. member for Regina—Qu'Appelle, was saying.

I should point out that many of the ways he suggested in terms of how the government should proceed are in fact exactly how the government has proceeded. I know a part of his riding is rural. I would be more than happy if he is available to sit down with him and go over how these stabilization programs were put in place.

The hon. member talks about depoliticizing agriculture and having a committee that would deal with and work on farm safety net programs. That is precisely how the two programs we are talking about today, GRIP and NISA, were put in place.

There was a committee of 33 people and 19 of them were producers. The committee worked over a period of some months under the chairmanship of the assistant deputy minister of the Department of Agriculture. Interestingly enough as 19 members of the committee were producers, essentially the producers were designing the program.

• (1640)

The legislation, which is enabling legislation, also provided that those programs should be reviewed on an ongoing basis. That is presently under way through the signatory committee which is made up of representatives from the provinces, the federal government, as well as producers. A large amount of the input into how those programs are going to be changed and improved is made by the producers themselves on that committee.

If the NDP member who just spoke wanted to see how those programs operate he would find that the suggestions he made, which are good ones, are exactly how the programs were put in place initially and exactly how they are administered.

He also makes the point that too much of this is political. I would be happy to show him in numbers that government spending actually went down in 1988. The expenditures we put in place really had nothing to do with the election. He made reference to the fact there was some $800 million talked about as farm aid during the 1988 election. In point of fact there was $850 million and it was delivered to that amount.

We tried to depoliticize and to remove farm support programs from the political process so that there was more predictability about those programs. That was one of the reasons most people wanted to get away from what has come to be referred to as ad hoc programs, programs that come up on the spur of the moment to address a specific need.

The whole idea of GRIP and NISA was to make them predictable so that before you went to the field in the spring to seed your crop you could go to your banker with the program in front of you. You and your banker could be quite certain of the kind of revenue you could generate from each acre of land you were going to seed that spring as opposed to, in some cases, as has been in the past, not knowing how much you get until you finally get an envelope in the mail and you open it. The whole idea of those programs was to make them predictable.

Some of the nonsense we have heard here is people complaining that farm income is going to go down this year. There is no question that the projections do not look very favourable overall as an industry and there is likely to be a drop in over-all farm income although the year is not well advanced. There may be some things that are going to happen as far as markets and there may be some things that we are going to have to do as government. They cannot complain that we spend only in an election year and obviously when everybody knows this is an election year bemoan the fact that federal programs are going to spend less money in the farm community this year than last year. That just does not make any sense. You cannot have it both ways.

Let me address the motion. There is no question there are problems in agriculture. There are substantial problems in agriculture. They are largely rooted in the fact that this industry produces a surplus in Canada because of the way we can produce and how competitive we can be and the fact that we have a large land base and relatively small population. As an industry, we have to export about one-half of what we produce. In other words for every dollar a Canadian farmer earns about one-half of that comes from exports. We then are very dependent on the export market. What goes on internationally has a very great effect on what happens to Canadian farmers.

Again, I come back to the NDP and its policy of tearing up the free trade agreement and not wanting to have anything to do with some of the international agreements that are going to provide some certainty.

When we are so dependent on exports and with a relatively small population it is very important that we trade on the basis of rules, with some predictability and reliability, so that we do not have to deal with the Americans and the Europeans on the basis of whims. In many cases they can act like bullies and that is what has been happening in international trade and agriculture. Because of their size and because of the lack of international rules they have been able to essentially make up the rules as they go along. The free trade agreement with the United States puts a stop to that.

As a result of the free trade agreement there is a way of settling disputes. If the Americans disagree with our trading practices or if we disagree with their trading practices we can take the matter to an international court which settles the dispute on the basis of an agreed upon set of rules: the free trade agreement.

How does that work for us? We have had three disputes to date, one of them to do with hogs and pork. We have essentially won in both those cases, although we will call it one dispute. We have won to the extent that the Americans collected tariffs from us. They were asked and are in the process of refunding $26 million or $27 million collected as tariffs that the dispute settlement mechanism found were not proper. They are being refunded.

We also won a case to do with raspberries, interestingly enough on today of all days. The Americans have been complaining about Canadians selling wheat into their market unfairly. We established a panel under section 18 of the free trade agreement. They came forward with their findings. We won. We essentially had the practices of the Canadian Wheat Board vindicated by the free trade agreement. We had a panel of five individuals, three Americans. We loss the toss and it was an American who chaired it. By the way, a former justice of the Supreme Court of Canada and a former attorney general of the United States sat on it. It was a pretty high powered group.

They essentially found that Canada was complying with the free trade agreement on five counts: that the acquisition prices of goods referred to in the relevant article include only the Canadian Wheat Board's initial payment; that only storage and handling charges paid by the board should be included; and that the Western Grain Transportation Act should be excluded from the calculations. We also won in two other areas. We won in the sense that we have had the practices of selling into the United States vindicated by a process established under the free trade agreement.

If we listen to members of the NDP, they are going to tear that up. That is not a very smart thing to do if they are going to stand up and advocate policy on behalf of Canadian farmers.

Let me give the results of what has happened in the last three years. Since the free trade agreement has come into effect we have had three complete crop years. The crop year runs from August 1 to July 31. It is different from a calendar year or fiscal year. In the three complete crop years we have had since the free trade agreement came into effect we have almost doubled our grain and oilseed exports to the United States. They have gone from about 1.68 million tonnes to about 3.25 million tonnes. It is almost a doubling of exports into the United States, quite a remarkable record when we think about it.

The United States is the largest producer of grain and oilseeds in the world. It is the largest exporter, yet we are close enough to its market. We can compete with a set of rules that gives us access to that market on a fair set of principles and an agreed upon set of rules. We can be very successful in their market.

Not only is it important because they are close to us. It is important because the Americans do not subsidize their own market. They do not eat their own market. Along with the Japanese market, it is the second highest priced market in the world.

It is right next door to us. We have a first-class product. We have a good capability to sell into that market through the Canadian Wheat Board and through other agencies. The story is there, yet the NDP wants to tear that up.

What would members of the NDP do today when we have just had our selling practices vindicated by the free trade agreement? How would they propose to continue selling over 3.25 million tonnes into that market without the free trade agreement? What is their policy? How would they replace it with anything that would give the same protection to Canadian farmers we have under the free trade agreement?

I do not think they have an answer. If they do, it is certainly not a particularly good answer.

Another point they make in their motion concerns the lack of support for supply management. It reads:

> (e) its failure to provide clear and unequivocal support for our supply management system, particularly with respect to the mixed signals the government is giving with respect to its position on the strengthening and clarification of article XI of the GATT

I do not know where they get that kind of idea. I go back to a press release issued on October 15, 1990, a little over two years ago, prior to the ministerial meeting of GATT ministers in Brussels. We proposed greater security for supply management through a strengthened and clarified article XI of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade in accordance with the proposal made by Canada in March 1990 which would include minimum market access levels pursuant to Canada's international obligations.

• (1650)

In pursuing GATT discussions and negotiations with the other members of GATT we have been very aware of industry concerns. We have involved industry at all levels of the discussions through what are called SAGITS, the sectoral advisory groups for international trade.

The various industries affected have actually been at the table with members and officials of the government in developing and in sitting down with the people who negotiate on our behalf in Geneva. In some cases they are almost giving instructions to our negotiating officials at the GATT. It is an unprecedented move on behalf of the government to involve people in the actual process.

I could speak with a certain amount of conviction on this because I happened to be part of a commodity group during the last GATT negotiations when the previous government was in power. We got absolutely no consideration whatsoever relevant to what has been happening today. We provided information in many cases to the government and got absolutely no feedback. There was no input coming back from the previous government. We used to refer to it as kind of a big black hole: all the information went in and nothing came back.

In this case members of the different sectors of agriculture have been at the table working with government to set policy. Rather than move this kind of motion, I would suggest that members of the NDP talk to groups in the supply management community and ask them about the government's commitment to work on their behalf.

The Prime Minister raised these issues at the Tokyo summit. He spoke at a Cairns group meeting in Ottawa. He has raised this issue at summit meetings. We have not had a Prime Minister in the history of this country who has taken agriculture and its concerns and raised them so consistently at international meetings.

When those members talk about failure to provide clear and unequivocal support for our supply management system, I have no idea where they would get any kind of concern that would let them put those words on a piece of paper and move a motion in the House of Commons. It does not in any way indicate or represent the attitude of everybody in this government, especially and including the Prime Minister, toward the supply management industry.

They also mention its weakening of the Canadian Wheat Board by several actions such as removing oats. Everybody talks about oats. Let me say a little bit about them. Oats in many ways have become a specialty crop. It used to be that oats were a major fuel. It fed horses when farmers farmed with horses.

In the last number of years, if my memory serves me correctly and if we rank oats in order of value of exports, they were 14th on this list after lentils and other small crops. It was not a big factor in the export market at all. There were cases when the Wheat Board had responsibility for oats where it exported 100,000 tonnes or less. For a couple of years they did not even close the pool accounts.

When we looked at the international market and realized it had essentially become a niche market, it did not make a lot of sense to have one monopolistic jurisdiction over the marketing of oats. We simply responded to a lot of concerns out there of several farm organizations by letting the private side deal with oats.

I will put it into a bit of perspective. I said before and I say again that it will take four, five, eight or maybe ten years to let things sort themselves out. This year volumes of exports of oats out of this country are expected to be as high as 600,000 tonnes. Prices are up probably $15 a tonne to over $110 a tonne compared to some $95 a tonne a year ago.

That is not a bad record when individuals are given an opportunity to compete on the basis of the quality of the product they produce as compared to having one central selling agency essentially trying to market oats. It is more difficult for them to do it on that kind of basis than when we have individuals dealing in specialty niche markets where smaller quantities can be sold in a better fashion. As I say, it will take some time to sort that out. It may take a few more years to get an over-all look at how it has worked.

Beyond that, the motion does not mention the fact that twice in this government's mandate we have kept the Wheat Board selling at a very large potential deficit. That was a considerable amount of support. In fact, a year ago we ran a deficit in the pool accounts of $744 million. That was a lot of support for the Wheat Board system of selling when we think of the difficult situation we are all in as far as deficits are concerned. That was a lot of support for the Canadian Wheat Board.

We also ran a large deficit, I think six years ago, of a little over $200 million, again an indication of the support this government has had for the Canadian Wheat Board and its system of selling. It would have been very easy at the time, when we were facing a large deficit and trying to control it, when the board was in a situation internationally that was not part of its own making and was beyond its own control, to simply say: "Stop selling. We cannot afford to see you selling at a deficit. It is going to cost taxpayers too much". We did not do that. We kept the Wheat Board selling.

When people want to point out some of the things that have happened to the board, I would suggest they put it in a little larger context in terms of the over-all support this government has given on behalf of the Canadian Wheat Board.

When the Minister for International Trade and the Secretary of State for External Affairs travel, almost without exception they speak in terms of how they can help sales and they raise issues on behalf of the Canadian Wheat Board with our customers around the world, various other countries. That again is an indication of the way we have shown support for the Canadian Wheat Board.

Let me conclude by simply saying that we absolutely need an over-all GATT agreement because without it we are going to find it increasingly difficult, earning 50 cents out of every dollar we earn from exports, if we cannot find a way of getting some discipline in the over-all international market.

Let me just give two numbers to make my point. The price a Canadian farmer receives for wheat and barley, but not oilseeds, is probably a little over $100 a tonne. It depends on the grade and where the farmer is. It depends on several things, but it is in that $100 to $105 or $110 a tonne range to a farmer.

Because of their high internal prices and the relatively low international market, when Europeans export they subsidize. The estimate for the present crop year is $140 a tonne. That means their subsidy on exports is larger than what a Canadian farmer receives. That makes it very difficult for a Canadian farmer to compete. That is why we have to put some discipline on international subsidies.

I would like to leave another number with the House. If we add the income all Canadian farmers across the country will earn this year from the production of grain and oilseeds—and we will produce over 50 million tonnes—whether sold internationally or domestically it would be less than the amount of money that the European Community spends on subsidizing exports out of the community.

Those are very difficult numbers for a Canadian producer to compete with and very difficult numbers for a Canadian government to compete with. In the case of the Europeans they have 320 million people and on average they export a very small percentage of their agricultural production.

Unless we can reduce the over-all level of subsidy on a per tonne basis and bring down the amount of money spent in total in subsidizing exports by the European Community, we will find it increasingly difficult to compete. That is why we on this side, from the Prime Minister down, are so committed to putting some discipline in the international marketplace.

Hon. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the minister a couple of questions, if I may.

The minister was one of the guest speakers at the big farm rally in Saskatoon two weeks ago today. I was there with the minister and with many other members of Parliament from our party and from the Conservative Party. There was a unanimous demand there for some money from the federal government in terms of a third line of defence.

I know the minister is aware of the problems we have on the prairies. His own department said that in terms of 1938 constant dollars farm income now is lower than it has been since 1938. As a result we are losing farmers and we are suffering a loss of jobs in the villages, towns and cities because farm income is down. When the farmer is worse off we are all worse off in rural Canada.

I also know that the minister is more aware than I am, because he is in the cabinet, of the dire financial pressures on the government. Despite those things I wonder whether the minister can tell us today if there is a timetable for a decision on the third line of defence or on a deficiency payment for farmers in western Canada. Can the farmers expect something between now and spring seeding, which is really needed?

Aid was given to the fishermen in Newfoundland which we all applaud and which was needed. Will a similar aid package be available to western farmers?

My other question to the minister would be whether, as the new minister, he is open to changing the federal support programs to a formula that is based on the cost of production with a cap so that the smaller farmer receives more than the larger farmer in terms of giving him or her some assistance on the farm?

I know that my good friend from Newfoundland, the member for St. John's East, would agree with me, because he understands the fishery very well, and that it is important to help the small and middle sized farmer. I wonder if the minister would agree that we should have a program based on the cost of production where the farmer gets so much for the first 7,000 to 8,000 bushels of wheat and after that the farmer receives the world price for the rest of his or her production.

Those are my two questions. Those are the things I hear as I travel around my riding in my province: first of all emergency assistance and deficiency payments from the federal government; and second, changing the farm support programs where the small farmer and the middle sized farmer gets a greater share of what comes from the federal government rather than someone who has several sections of land.

Mr. Mayer: Mr. Speaker, with regard to emergency aid, we said in Saskatoon and we say it here again that we are certainly prepared to work with the provincial government with the programs we have in place.

The offer is still on the table from the previous Minister of Agriculture that would see $63 million available to Saskatchewan in this calendar year on a cost shared basis. The member will also know that about two weeks ago we signed an agreement with the province of Saskatchewan, part of it unique to Saskatchewan but a big part of it to do with farmers right across the country, that will see an additional amount of cash flow available in the present calendar year. Beyond that it is very difficult to find additional dollars.

I know we have been berated in the House for simply standing up and talking about the kind of money that has been available, but bear in mind that the average amount of money that is spent by the federal government on a per capita basis on agriculture across the country is around $150 per capita. In Saskatchewan it is eight times that; it is almost $1,300, the number is $1,285. We have recognized that Saskatchewan as the largest grain producing province in the country has a special problem.

If you add up all of the expenditures on behalf of agriculture in the province of Saskatchewan, the federal government this year will account for close to 80 per cent of it and the province of Saskatchewan about 20 per cent. When all of those things are put into context, you realize that there are problems right across the country. There are large amounts of unemployed people no matter where you go in the country with special circumstances and it is going to be very difficult for us to find additional money for farmers.

I would point out to the member from Saskatchewan that one of the things the Saskatchewan government could do and that the previous administration had on the books to do, was the question of harmonization of the provincial sales tax and the GST. This would generate close to $200 million worth of revenue on an annual basis for the province of Saskatchewan. There are some things that the province itself could do. However, bear in mind that the numbers that we talk about are pretty large numbers when you look at agricultural support by the federal government in Saskatchewan.

No matter how much money any government puts out it is not the real answer to the problem. The answer to the problem is to get more into the marketplace and that is something I think we would all agree on.

With regard to his second question about targeting, it is very difficult to look at. We are certainly prepared to consider any of those things, but when you start putting caps on you run into all kinds of situations that can cause problems.

How, for instance, do you deal with somebody who farms with two or three sons and has everything under one permit book and operates as one unit. There may be three or four families involved. However, somebody else may be operating the same number of acres of land and has chosen, for whatever reason, to operate separately? How are some of those things sorted out? As a government do you really want to start telling people the size of the farm that they should have, because that is what you are going to be doing if you limit the amount of support based on a fixed amount of bushels or production. I find it very difficult to justify some of those concepts. However, in looking for better ways to spend the money that is there, we are more than willing to consider any of those things if we can make better use of those dollars.

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the minister. I listened carefully to his comments this afternoon.

I see the chair of the standing committee on the disabled is here. We heard an interesting presentation this morning from a farmer from Saskatchewan who is faced with a very different problem as a disabled farmer who had lost both his arms in a farming accident. Yet he and his wife and family are still farming in Saskatchewan. He faces the regular problems that most farmers face but he has something additional to overcome because he has two mechanical arms. The equipment he buys is not the normal, standard equipment. He has to spend increased dollars in order to purchase equipment that his arms can operate.

One of the things we discussed was possible amendments to the Income Tax Act so that the additional costs he has could be compensated through the Income Tax Act. He also mentioned that both he and his wife work outside the farm during the winter months in order to maintain their livelihood. His 14–year old son acts as his arms. It is a tremendous burden on the family. We know that this is not an isolated case. We know that with the added stress of farming today, accidents among farmers have increased incredibly.

I would like to hear the minister's comments on that and whether he has discussed it with others. What does the government propose to do to alleviate some of the stress that not only the able–bodied farmers in this country have but those who have been disabled, for whatever reason, in a farming accident.

Mr. Mayer: Mr. Speaker, I thank the member for Nepean for those observations. She might be interested in knowing that we are trying to pursue the whole area of farm safety.

As a new minister, one of the first things I asked the department is where we fit federally when it comes to farm safety. This goes a little beyond her question of what kind of accidents put people in those positions. There apparently is no real system in Canada that I have been made aware of for collecting data or investigating accidents to learn from them.

The next federal-provincial agriculture ministers' meeting will likely be in about three weeks. We are just now trying to decide on a date. One item on the agenda is going to be exactly what the member for Nepean refers to, which is farm safety, to see if we cannot do something in co-operation with the provinces. I have already had conversations with some of the provincial agriculture ministers along this line to see if we can work with them to co-ordinate things that are being done federally and provincially and to see if we can do something in the area of prevention of farm accidents.

Beyond that I would be more than happy to talk to any members of the House to see what we can do in the Department of National Revenue or the Department of Finance, or both, to accomplish the suggestion with respect to deductions from income tax for special equipment.

I know that some of today's equipment is very sophisticated. For instance, it used to be fairly easy to get on a tractor or a piece of farm equipment because it was relatively low to the ground. Now tractor cabs are much more difficult to get into and operate. In some cases I suspect there are literally thousands of dollars of extra equipment required to operate some of this sophisticated farm machinery. We will be more than happy to work with the committee or anybody else through the department to see if we can address some of the concerns the hon. member raises.

Mr. Jerry Pickard (Essex—Kent): Mr. Speaker, today we are here because of what I would say is extreme unrest, an almost revolution in rural Canada.

• (1710)

Last winter, approximately one year ago today, we saw thousands of farmers head to Ottawa to protest on the Hill. Many farmers in areas of Ontario like Lucknow are coming forward and telling everyone what a difficult time farming is today.

The same protests are coming from the west. It is not an anomaly that is happening in one section of Canada or in one part of the agricultural industry, it is a problem that is consistently happening across this country.

The farm community is very concerned; concerned that their incomes are getting lower and lower. Stability in the rural community is at an all-time low. There are tremendous problems that need to be dealt with by this government, by the provincial government and by everyone who has any connection or relationship with agriculture in Canada.

In my riding of Essex—Kent, up to one-third of the farmers are having serious financial problems. Those problems are very difficult for the farm community to deal with. In 1988 the agriculture production in the counties of Kent and Essex was in the area of $500 million. Yet one-third of the farmers in that area have run into financial difficulty.

It is not just limited to the farm community. It goes to the food processing industry itself. In my riding, in the last four years since free trade has come in, Olinda Foods has closed. A Nabisco plant in Leamington closed and moved to the Dresden area. A Campbell's plant just recently announced closure. It is moving to the Toronto region. The Hunt-Wesson plant has closed.

In my area four food processing plants have closed. That means every grower of tomatoes or apples for those companies have run into some real problems. We know that the pressure then is a wide broad pressure across this country. It seems to be related back to the time when free trade came in and a very different trend occurred in this country.

Farm competitiveness is the point, we hear, that should be emphasized. However every time I talk to a farmer, I never hear him ask for an increase in subsidies, an increase in support grants, an increase in money to him. The farm community is saying, give us a basis on which we can compete. We can compete with any other farm community in the world if we have an equal footing and if we have a basis on which we can compete. The problem in Canada is that our farm community has been put in a position in which it is non-competitive because of many rules, many pieces of legislation and because of the difficult circumstances under which they have been placed.

I might refer to a report entitled "Competitiveness of Canadian Fresh and Processed Fruit and Vegetable Industry" to point this out. The report suggests that the high cost of doing business in Canada renders us uncompetitive.

What are those high costs? Certainly the input cost for the Canadian farmer is quite different from the person he is competing with. In my riding of Essex—Kent, the farmer has to compete with his counterpart in Michigan or Ohio. When we start to look at his basic costs, the first one we can suggest is interest rates. He has to pay in the neighbourhood of 4 per cent above the person he is competing with. He has a 4 per cent disadvantage on all of his input costs. He has a 4 per cent disadvantage on capital costs. He has a 4 per cent disadvantage on every cost related to financing. This makes it very difficult to sell the product for the same price as the competition in Michigan, Ohio or other parts of the United States.

He is also faced with using fuel. It may be oil or gas or whatever type of fuel he is using in his industry. The cost of those fuels are as much as a third to a half higher again than that of his competitors. As a result he is in a difficult situation in buying gasoline for his tractor or diesel fuel or heat for his greenhouses. Those costs are up quite dramatically in competition with the other industries he is facing and he has to sell his product for the same price.

At the same time we can look at the cost of a tractor or a farm implement and they are much higher in Canada than they are in the United States.

It is my opinion that certainly in the horticultural industry most of the competition that my farmers face are those products coming in from the United States. If large corporations that process products are buying tomatoes for $100 a tonne in southwestern Ontario, they will pay $100 a tonne for a producer in Ohio to bring those tomatoes into southwestern Ontario. The result is that if they are being sold more cheaply in the United States, then in many cases they are being bought in from the United States and processed in southwestern Ontario. They may also be processing tomato paste in Michigan and the food product is then brought into Ontario.

The result is that they are in direct competition with the United States no matter how that comes down. Their cost of fuel, financing, land and each commodity they have to put into that product is way above the cost facing their competitor. As a result it is very difficult to do that business competition with those in the United States.

Second, the report that I alluded to a few minutes ago on competitiveness suggested that wholesale and retail areas were taking by far the majority of the profits. I think that is quite—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member. Since the beginning, Liberal speakers have split their time with another speaker. I would like an indication as to whether you want to split your speaking time.

Mr. Pickard: Mr. Speaker, I will give some time to my colleague.

With the next point on competitiveness, I mentioned that wholesale and retail areas are taking by far the majority of the profits in that competition. I think it is kind of clear when one starts examining the cost of farm-gate products. I believe my colleague from Lambton—Middlesex earlier held up a box of biscuits and pointed out that there is a product worth 6 cents in that box of biscuits and yet it sells on the shelves in our stores for $2.45.

One can buy tomatoes from the farm for $100 or $120 a tonne, which translates into 5 cents or possibly 10 cents for a can of tomatoes. If one goes into the supermarket, that can of tomatoes sells for $1.50 to $2.50, depending on the size of the can. The difference in cost between the 5 cents or 10 cents of product and the $2.50 the consumer pays is really dramatic.

The farmer is not getting his fair share of that cost of product. The primary producer is just not getting a reasonable return for what it costs to grow the product. The largest returns are very obviously going to the retail sector and therefore the primary producer is being left out dramatically.

• (1720)

We also know that in many cases this report has suggested that subsidization by the U.S. makes Canadian products more difficult to compete against U.S. products. The report also suggests that the government is not concerned enough about the industry. If the government were concerned, I am sure we would have some structural changes in the horticultural industry to make competition with that industry equal to its competitors in the U.S. and equal to its competitors elsewhere.

We do not see legislation coming forward to make that competition fair and equal. We do see a dragging of feet when it comes to those types of things.

We hear all about the subsidies that are given. Our farmers want to be able to be competitive and not subsidized. That clearly is the message.

Free trade, interest rates and a high dollar have been great challenges, but there is another area of this horticultural problem that growers in my riding have to face. It is that we have a Canadian policy on pesticides that is a real obstacle for them. In the United States they use certain pesticides that are not allowed in Canada, but products are allowed to come into Canada that have been treated with those pesticides.

In other words, Canada has set out rules that certain pesticides cannot be used by Canadian farmers. However those rules are not consistent with the same rules that are used in the United States. Therefore, many of the farmers in the United States are able to use herbicides and pesticides on the tomato product they grow, have that product processed and bring the product into Canada.

This goes directly to the government. If we are to pass a rule, then any product that is treated with a pesticide or an herbicide here in Canada that is not legal to use in Canada should not be allowed in with any residue. We should zero-rate any residue on those products coming into Canada.

The result would be that an American farmer could not use pesticides and herbicides that a Canadian farmer cannot use. We must allow Canadians to have that equal, fair competition. Our rules today do not allow equal, fair competition. As a matter of fact they are very heavily weighted toward the Americans with the residue ruling that we have in our trade practices.

The NAFTA agreement with Mexico is an example where this may become much worse. We know that DDT has been banned for 25 years in Canada, yet it is still being used in Mexico today.

An hon. member: It is not illegal.

Mr. Pickard: The product can come into Canada. Many people in the United States have suggested there is a real concern about the fair and consistent use of pesticides and herbicides for them. They are worried about product flooding American markets. I am more worried about product flooding Canadian markets. If we do not have a zero rating on all of those herbicides and pesticides, we will have major competitive problems in the future.

There are many things that can be done to make our industry more competitive. I believe it is the responsibility of government to put those rules in place so that Canadian business can be competitive with its counterparts in the United States or counterparts in Mexico and do that with a very rapid speed.

We also talked about the NAFTA. I mentioned the concern about DDT. I would also mention concern about some of the information I have read recently. Even the United States has recognized that NAFTA problems for agriculture may become very great. The Florida secretary of agriculture has warned that NAFTA could devastate the winter produce industry. I believe NAFTA will have some very devastating effects on the Canadian industry unless there are some controls and guidelines.

The particular devastation that I would suggest is the Canadian greenhouse industry. If the Florida industry is frightened about what NAFTA could do to it, then the greenhouse industry has a great deal to be concerned about in this country.

We see within our greenhouse industry today some great concerns about dumping. I talked to one of my constituents just recently about import products coming into Canada. He has been facing a very difficult situation in the horticultural industry. Large pots of plants coming into Canada, 10-inch plants, have been brought in to be sold in Canada in Woolco, Zellers and in many of the companies that retail these large plants for $9.75 or $10.

Look for the same plant coming into Canada from the United States, in particular from Florida. We can take a similar plant and go across the border into Detroit from my riding and those 10-inch pots for $9.75 are nowhere to be seen. In Detroit they are selling at $17 to $18 a pot. However, our Zellers and Woolco stores are selling them in Canada at under $10.

There is a problem. Why are they selling in Canada for under $10, while across the border in the United States they are more than $17? I believe that there is a tremendous amount of dumping. The producers in Florida will sell to different cities in the United States and get rid of their product. Leftovers will be transported into Canada and sold off at very low rates. They are going to get profits on the leftover plants here in Canada, but our greenhouse industry, our people who are competing with that, are at a real disadvantage. They are not being treated equally.

I think we have to tighten down those rules on plants coming into Canada and make certain that we are not having them dumped against the Canadian industry and causing lost business. The rule clearly should be that any plant coming in from Florida or other areas should go into the greenhouses for a period of time in order to make sure diseases or problems with those plants are cleared up. It is usually two or three months before they go on to the floor of stores. Those costs should be worked into the Canadian system. However, we are seeing many instances where that is not happening and our industry is suffering a great deal because of that.

Another buzzword in Canada lately is harmonizing. There was a very prosperous Campbell industry in Chatham. They recently announced that they are moving to the Toronto area to operate. I understand that there are applications and discussions with the government having to do with importing tomato paste and the possibility of making other products such as juices, ketchup and other things.

What happens to the Canadian grower? The Canadian grower then is cut out of that process. In other words, a lot of paste imported from Mexico and the southern United States would go into a Campbell plant in the Toronto area to be processed into ketchup, tomato juice and other products. Therefore, the long and short of it is that the Canadian farmer is cut out of that industry.

I see my time has come. I will give the rest to my colleague.

• (1730)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Ten minutes for questions or comments. The hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood only for questions or comments because the previous speaker used up the time.

Resuming debate, the hon. parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Agriculture, the member for Huron—Bruce.

Mr. Murray Cardiff (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I too am very pleased to participate—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I just want a point of clarification. Are you suggesting the full 20 minutes have lapsed from the previous speaker's time?

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I want to be very clear. I interrupted the previous speaker to tell him that if he wanted to share his time, I would consider that. However, I noticed that, as was his right, the hon. member used the 20 minutes allotted to him. Therefore, there is no time left for your party. On the other hand, I asked if there were any questions or comments and nobody rose. That is why I recognized the next speaker when debate resumed.

Mr. Mills: Mr. Speaker, with your permission could I ask my colleague a short question?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All right. I am prepared to be tolerant. I will therefore recognize the hon. member for a question or comment. I apologize to the hon. member.

[English]

On a point of order, the hon. member for Huron—Bruce.

Mr. Cardiff: I know the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood indicated he would like to speak and I do not intend to use my full allotted time. I will make sure to leave at least five minutes for the hon. member to make some remarks if he wishes to do that.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): This is a fine example of parliamentary goodwill and I appreciate the comments made by members on both sides of the House. The hon. member has the floor.

[English]

Mr. Cardiff: Mr. Speaker, I too am very pleased to be able to rise in the House today to speak about an issue that is always very dear to me and of concern to us. We share that concern with the producers of agricultural products right across this country and the processors of those products. The entire sector includes the major producers on the farm, through the processing plants to the consumer. We have to think of all of those people when we talk about food in this great country.

We also must recognize we have always had the ability to produce high quality foods much beyond the capability of our domestic consumption. We have always had to depend on export markets for those extra dollars that are so necessary to keep agriculture going. I know some provinces probably export 80 per cent of what they produce in the grains and oilseeds sector in particular, so that does cause an extra drain when it comes to difficult times. As times become more difficult we have a tendency to produce more to try to make up for the shortfall we have had in income.

This year we have been extremely challenged right across the nation because of the devastating weather effects we have experienced. In August of this year Alberta experienced snow and frost, which is a very unusual situation. In my province of Ontario we have had similar situations where the corn did not mature.

The Essex—Kent area of my hon. colleague suffered a severe drought last year although this year the crops were better. This year in other parts of the province we have all experienced an extremely wet summer and lack of maturity of crops. We usually produce top quality corn, capable of being used for distillers, the corn sweetener plants, et cetera. This year the value of that commodity is somewhere in the number five grade, which is only fit for livestock feed and the keeping qualities of it are not as good.

We know we have to try to work with organizations and companies to find markets for that corn because we want to clean it up this year. We do not want to carry it through to another crop year and create problems then.

Despite all that, some sectors of the agrifood industry in Ontario have had some growth. There was a 28 per cent or $544 million increase in the value of those exports in 1992.

I will give you another example. Just last week the Canadian Embryo Exporters Association announced that Ontario breeders would be exporting bovine embryos to Japan, making Canada the first country to break into that Japanese market. At home, the dairy industry is strong and stable and beef prices have continued to rise.

It is high time that has happened because we have not seen a decent beef price for many, many years.

The Ontario average net cash income per farm before depreciation has shown a slight decrease from $21,592 in 1987 to $21,053 in 1991. That does not take into account any off-farm income.

I know some of the speakers have alluded to statistics that show off-farm income has been added but those figures do not include the off-farm income. Moreover, Ontario farms are holding their value. The net worth of the average Ontario farm has increased in the last four years from almost $395,000 in 1987 to almost $522,000 in 1991. That is an average annual increase of 8 per cent.

In 1991, the average equity held by Ontario farmers was 85.1 per cent. The proportion of Ontario farms with high debt loads and low cash flow has decreased in the last five years. In 1991, 7 per cent of farmers had less than 75 per cent equity and less than $20,000 in cash flow, down from 13 per cent of farmers in 1987.

Industry debt is now better held by those able to service it. In 1987 on average, Ontario farms with over $20,000 in cash flow carried 63 per cent of the debt. These farms carried 76 per cent of the debt load in 1991.

Debt is not a universal problem in the farm sector. Thirty-six per cent of Ontario farms reported no debt interest payments in 1991 compared to 26 per cent of Canadian farms. The outlook for the industry is still good.

Total cash receipts from Ontario agriculture for 1992 are expected to increase between 8 per cent and 10 per cent from 1991 to between $6 billion and $6.1 billion.

Total cash receipts for 1993 are expected to range between $5.6 billion and $6.1 billion.

Ontario agriculture is holding its own. At the same time, we realize there are some real problems in the industry. I have alluded to those problems before and most of them this year have been caused by the weather, compounded by the low prices of commodities over the last few years.

During the past year, for example, some farmers saw significant yield and quality loss to their crops because of the poor weather. The safety nets the government developed jointly with the industry and the provinces are attempting to address that situation.

In 1992, federal and provincial safety net program payments to Ontario farmers are expected to be between $633 million and $744 million. Because of the difficult growing and harvest conditions this crop year, the federal government in December announced emergency cash advances of up to $15,000 in unthreshed grain.

That program was not taken up to a great extent because of the unusual weather conditions we had in late December and again in January. It is the first time in my farming history that I can recall when the combines were out very close to Christmas and again in January harvesting corn that we had not anticipated would be harvested until spring.

We are fortunate in that way. We have to recognize the quality of that commodity. As I said before, it was not great but at least it gave some of those people the opportunity to get that commodity off the fields and be in a better position in the spring to get on with their planting for 1993.

We are eternal optimists and believe if we can get another crop in the ground, the next year is going to be better. I have farmed all my life and I guess that is how I think as well. By working together and trying to resolve the problems we have come through, we can achieve those things.

In addition, GRIP, the Gross Revenue Insurance Plan interim payments cheques totalling more than $96 million of which $39 million was for corn have been mailed to more than 25,000 farmers, including nearly 1,800 corn producers who are covered under that program.

There is also a projected $39 million to go out in April of this year to the farm sector. In October or November of this year the balance of that GRIP payment of $45 million will go out as well. A total of $180 million will be going into the farm sector for that crop year.

• (1740)

Since 1985–86 the federal government has spent more than $4 billion in support in the agrifood sector. This works out to about $7,000 per Ontario farm annually. About 60 per cent was direct income support to farmers. The other 40 per cent was used to fund research, inspection, marketing and trade activities, transportation, rural development and operating costs.

Through partnerships with the Ontario government and producers we will continue to provide those safety nets which allow farmers to ride out tough times. Meanwhile, the federal government is working hard to develop trade opportunities and a competitive business environment so that Ontario agriculture can continue to thrive in international markets.

As the minister and others spoke earlier, there are the long-term plans for agriculture that farmers can rely on and the continuity of present programs that were started by the former Minister of Agriculture and Deputy Prime Minister. Everyone is familiar with the "Growing Together" paper which I was also involved with. It is the most comprehensive agriculture plan we have had to develop in many, many years.

That is because things have changed throughout the world and not just in Canada. It is a universal market and we have to compete in it. The U.S. farm bill of 1985 or 1986 has certainly changed the atmosphere of how we trade. We have done the best we can to compete and meet markets wherever we could. Of course, we brought in GRIP, NISA and crop insurance. We have tried to create those programs to sustain agriculture through those lows experienced this year.

It is unfortunate some Canadian producers chose not to buy into GRIP or crop insurance. It is a voluntary program and it was the choice they made. It is unfortunate that they do not have some of that protection.

Granted, the programs are probably not perfect but they are the best we have for today. We have to continue and as times change and as markets change we respond to the world and Canadian demands to put programs in place. With the dollars we have to work with we have to stay within a budget and we have to put money into sectors the farming community believes necessary. Everyone in this House knows the situation of the debt, not only of this government but also the debts of provincial governments. Therefore we have to work only with existing dollars.

We have worked very closely with farm organizations across this country for many years. I know the previous government did as well prior to 1984. As I have said, circumstances have changed so much that we have had to come up with new ideas. I think everyone in this House has good ideas on how to develop programs but it is very difficult to know what to do in a situation such as we are facing this year with limited dollars.

Farm organizations and individuals who served on committees with great ambition have tried to help the farming sector in providing the tools to work with. We have tried to put a program in place whereby before a producer goes to the field in the spring he can predict a minimum amount of acreage payment. That should give some comfort to both the lender and the borrower. We hope there will be greater participation next year.

We have also introduced legislation, Bill C-54 I believe, and we hope to get that through the House fairly quickly. We feel that would help producers in the longer run with development and promotion of their products and buying Canadian.

The Farm Credit Corporation legislation has had first reading in the House and we hope it will pass fairly quickly also. Most people in this House have had the opportunity to examine that legislation. I believe it is another tool that the agriculture sector will be able to work with, with the extension of lending beyond the farm gate to farm related business. As well it will help with the generation of transfers.

We are trying to work with existing programs. We also are working continually in trying to streamline our export programs so that if we have an opportunity to make an agricultural sale we can put the export credits in place much faster. We have to be very cautious when we do those things. All of those things are hopefully helpful.

Another one is interprovincial trade. We recognize that there are problems there. We can understand why provinces are reluctant to give in some of their cases, but those are areas where we have to work together and see if we can smooth the trade problems we have and the irritants within our country.

Another area that we feel very good about and we think is necessary and should have been done years ago is the placing of qualified persons in our key embassies around the world who can talk about agriculture and thereby put us in a better position to talk about the food services industry and the things that we have to offer to the people of Canada.

I am quite prepared to give up my time now. I will take questions for a few moments, but I want to make sure the member from Greenwood has the option to make some comments as well.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I do not think it is necessary to split your time with the opposition member. We have question and comment period and then it is up to the Liberal Party to have the floor.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, first of all I would like to acknowledge the member for Huron—Bruce who has always been a gentleman in this House and who has always done a fabulous job representing his constituents. I thank him for giving me this opportunity. I will actually take this time to ask him a question. With his experience and being a farmer, he is probably equipped to answer my concerns.

About six months ago I had an exhibit in my constituency window on Danforth in downtown Toronto. It was created for me by my colleague from Lambton—Middlesex. The exhibit was entitled "Compare the share". That exhibit contained miniature tractors and combines showing the capital cost of the basic implements needed to run a farm. There were examples of what a farmer would receive at the farm gate for milk and the rate that the consumer would pay; bread, wheat, et cetera.

I believe my colleague from Lambton—Middlesex earlier in the remarks today talked about the "Compare the share" concern that he and many of us in this House have.

Does the member from Huron—Bruce share my colleague's concerns about the obvious spread between the farm gate price and what the consumer has to pay? It is an egregious spread, I agree with my colleague from Winnipeg, but more important, and I am speaking now as an urban member of Parliament from downtown Toronto, citizens are concerned about quality of product.

One of the things that we have been so proud of in this country has been our marketing boards, not just in terms of protecting income flows to our farming community but that it has given them the opportunity to have the best quality in the world. We see in the Atlanta Journal–Constitution dated May 26 that 84 inspectors were interviewed and that thousands of contaminated birds are shipped every day instead of being condemned. Actually millions of birds are being shipped to consumers in the United States. The inspectors are actually saying that if you blow the whistle today, you are in trouble. What concerns me is that some of that cheaper product through quota is getting in here. Because of the cartel that is basically taking over this agricultural industry, I am concerned that those low prices on food being imported from the United States are being used to lever and put downward pressure on the prices that our farmers have to sell to market. I wonder if the member would respond to that.

• (1750)

Mr. Cardiff: Mr. Speaker, I would like to respond to the member's comments, particularly about the "Compare the share" of the hon. member for Lambton—Middlesex. I know he has done a lot of work in this area and has travelled across Canada as well with that message.

No matter what the situation, we always feel that someone else is making more than we are. I believe in the situation that from the farm gate this does happen. He mentioned the example of wheat. That included the box in the value of the wheat.

We wish that was double. You would think that somewhere there would be room to double that. I do not know but I understand that is a very competitive market. If we could find a way of doing that, I do not know how much more wheat we would produce in this country. It is an area that is of concern to all of us. With regard to the quality of food in Canada, we have always prided ourselves on the food that we have. Any food that is imported, everything that comes in here, is high quality food. I believe the Canadian consumer has been protected and assured of high quality products when he or she goes to the store to purchase products.

He talked about an article on contaminated birds. I do not know the substance of the article or anything about it. I do not know of any food chain in Canada that could afford to take any risk with food that did not meet Canadian standards. We have always felt our fast-food outlets in Canada have been extremely good and we have had virtually no problem with any food contamination. I believe that is because of the standard we have set and the inspection system that we have as well.

I believe that we have been competitive because of the high quality that we have and we intend to maintain that high quality.

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the hon. parliamentary secretary a question with respect to the Canadian Wheat Board.

The Canadian Wheat Board, as the member will know, is something that is very near and dear to the hearts of western Canadians. As an institution, it is very popular and has done a great deal of good for western Canada over the last number of decades. In fact, the support for the Canadian Wheat Board became very clear at the recent rally that took place in Saskatoon when one of the speakers made the comment: "Please don't touch our Canadian Wheat Board". That comment received a standing ovation from 13,000 farmers. It is a very popular institution.

One comment that I get time and time again from farmers is if the government is going to make changes to the Canadian Wheat Board, will it at least put it to a vote. The reason is that the Canadian Wheat Board is paid for by farmers. The government does not contribute except at times when there is a pooling deficit. It is an institution that is for farmers, to represent farmers, and farmers are saying that the government should not be ramming changes down their throats. If there are going to be changes, there should be a vote.

Right now there is a study on the future of barley and a report will be issued. I wonder if the parliamentary secretary can help me and farmers across western Canada. If when that report comes down it suggests that barley be removed from the Canadian Wheat Board for the North American market, can the member assure this House and Canadians right across the country that before any changes to the Canadian Wheat Board with respect to barley, there will be a producer vote. Can the member give some comments with respect to that? That is something I am hearing, something that farmers want. Certainly farmers would like to hear some definite answer from the member if he can give it.

Mr. Cardiff: Mr. Speaker, I would not want to prejudge a report before it comes to us as to the future of any recommendations concerning the Wheat Board and barley. I do not live in an area that comes under the jurisdiction of the Canadian Wheat Board but we do have the Ontario Wheat Board in the province of Ontario. We have always been able to work extremely well with export permits, et cetera that the Wheat Board would issue on our behalf in the province of Ontario.

I would not even attempt to answer the question until we know what the report is. I know if that report comes in that regardless of what it says consultation would continue. I could not indicate whether there would be a vote or not. That would depend on what the report has to say.

I too would have to agree that the Canadian Wheat Board has done an excellent job for Canada and Canadians. It is not a government board, but we are responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board in any pool deficit and other similar things that happen. Also, we set the standards for the Canadian Grain Commission that the Canadian Wheat Board has to work within.

We have had good co-operation from the Canadian Grain Commission and the Canadian Wheat Board. They have had to respond to the changes in the world markets because of the EC, because of the American situation and the export enhancement program as well. They have had their work cut out for them in these areas and challenges have been there too. It has not been easy trying to compete in a market where it is being subsidized with many dollars in a traditional market for Canadians.

We are very proud of the agreement Hon. Alvin Hamilton made years ago with China which was a very beneficial market for Canada for many years. We just wish we could continue to find more markets that would give us the continuity and the projections that one did. There was a lot of security in that as well.

The Canadian Wheat Board works well and we will continue to work with them.

VICTORIA CROSS ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed from Tuesday, November 24, 1992, consideration of the motion of Mr. Fee that Bill C-305, an act respecting the award of the Victoria Cross, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Departmental envelope.

Mr. Allan Koury (Hochelaga—Maisonneuve): Mr. Speaker, it is a privilege for me to finally speak on this bill standing in the name of my colleague, the hon. member for Red Deer. Bill C-305 proposes to reinstate the award of the Victoria Cross. It seems to have taken a long time to get to this point.

The Victoria Cross is the highest decoration that can be awarded by the British Empire to any member of the navy, army or air force, from the highest to the lowest ranks. This bronze cross, bearing the British lion above the Crown of England and the words "For Valour", takes precedence over all other British orders or decorations.

Since the Crimean War, the Victoria Cross has been the Commonwealth's premier military decoration. It was a great honour to receive this decoration during the Second World War because only a very small number of crosses were awarded.

We are an independent nation, but we have no distinctive military decoration to recognize exceptional bravery by our soldiers in the face of the enemy.

This decoration is older than the Dominion of Canada. In fact, it was instituted by Queen Victoria in 1856. Among the first recipients was a Canadian, Lieutenant Alexander Robert Dunn. Over the years, Canadian recipients have totalled 93, including 10 Quebecers.

In 1972, we decided to create our own Canadian decorations and medals. However, we still have no decoration which recognizes acts of exceptional bravery. The government is now examining this situation.

The Victoria Cross is important because there is a proud tradition in this country, a military tradition, that most Canadians do not know or understand. Canada is a peace-loving nation. We have never initiated a war and, God willing, we never will.

Nevertheless, on several occasions, we have answered the call to arms in defence of liberty and freedom. We still have brave, courageous men and women in this country who even today serve under the flag of the United Nations, proudly wearing the Canadian flag on their shoulders.

These Canadians are prepared to endanger their lives and act very bravely for peace and freedom in far-off lands.

Nevertheless, for Canadians serving in the armed forces today, the highest military distinction ever awarded to Canadians does not exist since it has not been recognized in Canada's system of decorations and distinctions.

In resuming this debate, I ask the government to consider Canadians' request to respect our military tradition and create military awards that recognize the bravery and courage of our service people.

In closing, I ask that the Victoria Cross again be awarded to our heroes.

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, I feel privileged to rise in the House to address the private member's bill put forward by my colleague from Red Deer.

I regret that I did not have the opportunity to speak before at different times and in different circumstances. However I am privileged and honoured to speak because this is a subject dear to the hearts of many Canadians. I know it is dear to the hearts of many veterans in my riding.

Because it is a private member's bill, members have been allowed to express their views without the concern of following party lines or following instructions from the Whip, the House leader or anything of that nature. I am glad it has taken on the position of a private member's bill.

We all know the history of the Victoria Cross. We studied it in books in school. Some of us have had the privilege of knowing Victoria Cross winners. In my particular case I am very proud to say that I have known four Victoria Cross winners, and two of them very well. I notice a number of things when I am in the presence of those who have the honour of having been awarded the Victoria Cross.

The Victoria Cross is the highest award for gallantry in the British Empire. It was conceived and put together in 1856 by Queen Victoria. It is known throughout the world. It has universal recognition as, if not the, certainly among the highest award for gallantry in the world. If it could be recognized in the universe, I would be so strong as to say that it could be recognized universally.

Since the Victoria Cross was initiated by Queen Victoria in 1856, it has been awarded to very few people. In fact the first Canadian to be honoured with this award was in the Crimean War for his part in the charge of the famous light brigade in the battle of Balaklava. Since the award to Lieutenant Alexander Robert Dunn, the first Canadian to receive this award, 92 other Canadians have been given it.

It is not parenthetic to say that the award is given for the most conspicuous gallantry in the face of the enemy. There have been occasions when the award has been bestowed not in the face of the enemy but these are very few and far between. Some of the 93 Canadians earned this award posthumously.

If we speak to any military man, any military woman or military family and mentioned the name of the Victoria Cross, we see the response of reverence and dignity that it brings.

Canadians became ineligible for this award when Canada developed its own system of decorations and awards in 1972.

• (1810)

I suppose one could hope that Canadians would never be asked to fight in a skirmish like World War I, World War II, Korea, the Crimean War where the award of this decoration would be necessary. In our recent past, and as recent as the Falklands campaign, the Victoria Cross was awarded to those who were involved in the battle and showed conspicuous gallantry in the face of the enemy.

I believe that most members who have spoken have generally spoken in favour of it. I can understand why they would. They would for the reason that I am, because of the universal dignity and honour it brings.

There are some difficulties in having a Victoria Cross eligible for award to Canadians. I do not think any of these obstacles are insurmountable. I understand we will not be able to talk out this private members' bill, and neither should we because of the importance of it.

If it is the intention of this court, the highest court in the land, to move forward with the private members' bill there are ways around the difficulties. I have been told there are ways that would not infringe on the rights of the Sovereign. This would be a concern from the viewpoint of the Secretary of State since it is a medal for the British Empire and is conferred by Her Majesty the Queen.

I use as a precedent the Australian situation in which that country decided to adopt the Victoria Cross as its highest military decoration. However its government did not proceed by legislation. Instead, Her Majesty was asked to issue a letters patent signifying her will and pleasure that the Victoria Cross in this case for Australia, would be the country's highest declaration and that its award would be governed by regulations that her staff had set out in the schedule.

Her Majesty also agreed that the Australian Victoria Cross itself should be identical to the original. I think it is important so that the universal recognition factor would pertain.

In addition, some of the other provisions were stipulations that award of the decoration should be made with the approval of the Sovereign by instruments signed by the Governor General of Canada, in this case, on the recommendation of the Minister of National Defence.

There has to be some staff work done to accomplish this. However it is my belief that should this House vote in favour of retaining the Victoria Cross, which would be awarded for conspicuous gallantry, the highest gallantry in the face of the enemy, then I believe the same mechanism could be applied.

The Victoria Cross could then become Canada's highest military declaration without fear of degrading or otherwise qualifying those Canadian decorations like the Meritorious Service Cross, the Award for Bravery, the Cross of Valour and the other Canadian decorations that we now have.

I do not see it in any way, shape or form qualifying the national system we have had in place. It has been evolving since 1972 and is a very appropriate and fitting complement to this award.

In conclusion, I would say that I represent those veterans who I have spoken with and non-veterans. I have discussed this with at least two Victoria Cross winners and they are certainly in favour of it. I understand why they would be.

I will tell the House something that is rather unique in this case. It is unique that it is a private members' bill and I do not have to worry about how my party is voting. It is also unique that I have not spoken to one person who has had difficulty with this. When you come down to the crunch, providing it could be done without changing the qualification of the other series of decorations and awards, no one has any great difficulty with having an award that is as universally recognized as the Victoria Cross.

I speak in favour of this motion. I would like to take the opportunity to congratulate the member for bringing this to the floor of the House of Commons. I know the difficulty inherent in stick-handling a private member's bill through and I do congratulate him on it. I know that, certainly from my viewpoint and that of other members and constituents and Canadians I have spoken with, they would generally be in favour of this motion. I will support this bill.

Mr. Geoff Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to make a brief intervention and, I hasten to say, an intervention in favour of the intent of this bill. In doing so I want to pay tribute to my colleague from Red Deer who has introduced the bill and, as his hon. friend indicates, stick-handled it very skilfully along the way.

I think it is important that we restore the Victoria Cross to its place at the top of the military honours list for this country, a place that it had for a considerable length of time. I think it is important that we do this. It is important that we in this way pay respect to those who have served our country in a number of wars in a number of theatres.

Within this House we still have members who served actively during the Second World War. I commend the member for Regina West who was one of those people as well as our member from Burlington and the member from Athabasca who served during the Korean conflict. I am sure there are others. I do not mean to leave them out. I think it is important that we recognize the kind of contribution and the kind of sacrifice they have made so that people of my generation have been able to enjoy a lifetime free of those concerns and free of having to make that kind of sacrifice.

I simply want to lend my support as a prairie member and as a member from Saskatchewan in support of the spirit and intent of this private member's bill which would restore the Victoria Cross and make it the medal awarded in this country as the highest honour for exceptional valour. I commend my colleague from Red Deer.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Before giving the floor to the hon. member for Red Deer, I must say that he will be the last speaker since he is using his right to reply as the mover of this bill. The hon. member for Red Deer has the floor.

[English]

Mr. Doug Fee (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, perhaps rebuttal is not the word that is necessary because of all the speakers who have spoken on this bill in this House, there has not been a single word expressed in opposition to the bill.

At this time I want to express a fair bit of pride and a lot of pleasure that the bill has made it this far. I also appreciate the comment and the mechanical problems pointed out by the valiant and honourable member for Bonavista—Trinity—Conception.

I look forward to following this bill through committee so that we can perhaps address some of those mechanical concerns. I think it is important that we address them, but it is also important that we look at the intent of the bill.

I want to thank the Legion members in my riding who supported and encouraged it. I want to thank the hundreds of people from coast to coast in this country who have written in support of the reinstatement of the Victoria Cross. I have not had a single letter of criticism from anyone, but I have had numerous people encouraging me and thanking me for the initiative.

I want to thank all of the members in this House who gave unanimous consent to make this votable. The member for Regina—Lumsden has already been pointed out. The hon. gentleman came in here on crutches to make a speech in support of this bill. I think that shows the type of support it has among the membership.

Mr. Speaker, I thank you and I thank the table officers for their help. One should never presume what is going to happen in this House, but having heard no word of opposition I look forward to this bill passing and working in committee to get it back as soon as possible.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

FISHERIES

Mr. Lawrence MacAulay (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, recently the owners of the Usen Fisheries fish plant in Souris announced it was closing for the winter, throwing hundreds of people out of work and devastating the economy of eastern Prince Edward Island.

Because of federal fisheries mismanagement, the plant owners decided it was more economic to process redfish in Nova Scotia. People in the area are worried about their future and they want action from the federal government.

The Minister of Fisheries and Oceans has communities fighting communities over falling groundfish stocks. This is unfair and I call on the minister to ensure the future of the fish plant in Souris. The people of eastern Prince Edward Island want to work this winter but they cannot. The government must do everything possible to allow the plant to return to its former status as a year-round employer.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE REFORM

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, section 30.1(5) in chapter IV of Bill C-105, which concerns changes to the Unemployment Insurance Act, doubly penalizes the unemployed.

It means that a claimant disqualified from receiving benefits because he voluntarily left his employment or lost his employment by reason of misconduct would be denied the right to receive benefits at the time the event occurs.

It also means that later on the following year, for instance, if this person again becomes unemployed without being disqualified on the grounds of the manner of termination of employment he would again be penalized because his case could be examined under subsection 6(3) and not 6(2), in which case he would need 20 insurable weeks instead of the number of weeks required under the variable entrance requirement to be eligible for unemployment insurance benefits.

PORNOGRAPHY

Mr. Ken James (Sarnia—Lambton): Last October 25 through November 1 was the annual White Ribbon Against Pornography week. I was presented with white ribbons worn by concerned citizens of Our Lady of Mercy Roman Catholic Church in my riding of Sarnia—Lambton. These ribbons were worn as an expression of concern over the effects of pornography in our society.

Recently the Supreme Court of Canada unanimously upheld the anti-obscenity provisions of the Criminal Code as they apply to publications, video tapes, movies and other pornographic materials. This law is important as it is needed to protect women and children against violent and sexual exploitation.

The federal government is now considering a law on pornography and children to protect the most vulnerable in our society from sexual exploitation and abuse.

I, along with all members of this House, am committed to fighting the violent and sexual exploitation of women and children.

SUDBURY TAXATION CENTRE

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, the employees of the Sudbury taxation centre are fuming over the recently announced parking fee increase which will come into effect this April.

This marks a 33 per cent increase over the two and one-half years since parking fees were first implemented and this for a parking lot that is not accessible or usable by anyone else.

I want to remind this government that these are the same federal employees, most of whom are women, who have had their wages frozen for the next two years. Once this tired old government is through after the 33 tax increases, the GST, free trade, its assault on middle class families, the unemployed and in this case parking fee increases, the concept of disposable income will no longer exist for these hard working Canadians.

This government is an advocate, I believe, of disposable Canadians, not disposable incomes. I urge the minister responsible to reconsider his decision and for this government to give Canadians a break.

TRADE

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, it was just a few days ago that opposition members were screaming in this House that free trade with the United States was not working because the Americans had imposed modest duties on Canadian steel.

This was absolutely no proof that the FTA is flawed. In fact without the agreement Canadians would have no opportunity to fight arcane protectionist U.S. trade laws.

Today opposition members should be admitting that free trade works because Canada has just scored another important victory using the dispute settlement mechanism of the FTA. Canadian durum wheat exports to the United States are a success story at $65 million a year. Now a free trade arbitration panel has dismissed U.S. attempts to hurt Canadian producers. This is the ninth consecutive time that Canada has won using the terms of the free trade agreement. In addition, since the FTA was implemented, Canadian exports to the United States have soared while we have gained protection from protectionism. The least the critics can do today is thank God for the FTA.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I want to join with others in welcoming to Ottawa members of the prairie pools who will be meeting with the respective caucuses later this day. They are here to discuss among other things the serious income crisis which is hurting Canadian farmers.

The agricultural industry is a fundamental pillar of the Canadian economy. Agricultural exports represent 7 per cent of all Canadian exports in a trade surplus of $3 billion.

Western grain farmers, Ontario corn producers, the Quebec milk industry and the maritime potato farmers are living in very difficult times.

I want to tell them that for a Liberal government, farmers and agriculture will be a priority. Food security and maintaining rural life are essential to the future of Canadians. It makes good economic sense.

TRADE

Mr. Jack Shields (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to inform the House and underline an important report by a dispute resolution panel under the free trade agreement on Canadian durum wheat exports to the U.S.

The report, which was jointly released by both countries on February 9, concludes that the Canadian Wheat Board's pricing practices for durum wheat exports to the U.S. are consistent with the rules set out under the free trade agreement.

This ruling demonstrates the dispute settlement process does work. Much has been said on the durum issue but what counts is the panel ruling. As a result of the free trade agreement we are able to deal fairly with the concerns raised in the U.S. Canadian durum will be able to continue to move into the market.

The government has always maintained that the Canadian Wheat Board operates within the rules set out under the free trade agreement. This panel ruling of February 9 confirms this. The Canadian Wheat Board on behalf of Canadian producers will continue to take advantage of all market opportunities wherever they may be.

MEMBER FOR ESQUIMALT—JUAN DE FUCA

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): A shattering event took place this morning on Parliament Hill. That noted feminist and advocate for gender equality, the member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca, made a mistake. Worse, this Canadian Phil Donahue, this British Columbian Alan Alda, this prototypical gender sensitive nineties liberated male made a mistake about me.

• (1410)

Knowing as I do the hon. member's utter devotion to furthering the cause of women in politics and knowing that in his long years in politics he has probably never been misquoted, I can only suppose that he attributed statements to me that I have never made without checking with me because he is too shy, too hesitant, too totally opposed to any hint of confrontation to even approach me.

I know he will say that he read it in print. I can understand that such a naive innocent would believe everything he reads. But I am here to put him out of his misery, quick.

My office door is always open. I can always be reached by phone. I even have a surprise for the hon. member. I would be prepared to speak to him in the lobby, not the lawn, not more than once a week, but I would be prepared to speak. I promise that he will never ever have to run the risk of being so totally wrong again.

I say to him, through you, Mr. Speaker: Dave, do you want to step outside?

Mr. Barrett: Let's go.

HEALTH

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, this issue was raised in the House last week by the member for Churchill. The Queen's Journal quotes the member for Halifax, saying that she supports the North American free trade agreement because it puts Canada in a good position. She said that NAFTA is much better than the bad deal negotiated by the Tories and the U.S. in 1988.

However, my issue today is not that. It has to do with the Minister of National Health and Welfare's lack of commitment to increasing funding for AIDS.

We cannot afford to be short-sighted when it comes to funding for AIDS and HIV. The cost in human, social and economic terms is too high. Funding for education, prevention and research in HIV and AIDS is a wise investment. It should be a question of when we spend these sums of money, not if.

Canada can dedicate adequate funds now or we can try to cut corners and pay for the far higher social and financial costs that will come later as we deal with the unnecessary, tragic and costly illnesses we will have failed to prevent.

The minister is on record saying the government must be committed to long term action. I urge the government to follow the advice of its own experts and I urge the minister to heed his own words that the government must commit itself to long term and adequate AIDS funding now.

KASHMIR

Mr. John Reimer (Kitchener): Mr. Speaker, I would like to draw the attention of the House to the tragic history of Kashmir.

A UN Security Council resolution in 1948 called for a plebiscite to determine Kashmir's future. That never occurred. Since then, tens of thousands have been killed or wounded. On January 6 of this year Indian forces killed more than 40 civilians and wounded approximately 100 more. This is in addition to the thousands of civilians over the past 40 years who have been subjected to arbitrary arrest, rape and torture.

In view of the world's disregard of Kashmiris' human rights and the resulting suffering, I urge the Government of Canada to strongly recommend that the UN Security Council actively pursue a solution that is in harmony with UN initiatives and the 1972 Simla accords.

Surely the principle of self-determination of which Canada has been a great supporter should be upheld in Kashmir. The long-suffering Kashmiri people should not be continually brushed aside simply because other world events occupy the world's attention.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, an Alberta RCMP officer has admitted to having sex with a woman in his police car while on duty and in his uniform. It is alleged that he may have asked for sex in exchange for not charging her with impaired driving.

Instead of focusing on the RCMP officer's abuse of power and appalling behaviour, an internal RCMP investigation checked into the young woman's sexual history. This so-called evidence was used to dismiss criminal charges against the officer who is still on duty over a year later.

I ask the Solicitor General to investigate this matter personally. RCMP officers must never be allowed to abuse their power. The Solicitor General must establish a fair method of looking into complaints against RCMP officers so these inquiries do not boil down to investigators conducting a witch-hunt on the complainant in defence of their colleagues.

Canadian women deserve much better than this.

CANADA POST CORPORATION

Mr. Marcel R. Tremblay (Québec-Est): Mr. Speaker, recently I was invited by Canada Post to visit its control centre for the Quebec City division and attend the daily postal service control session.

If the public were given the same opportunity it would realize how much the corporation has managed to do in a very short time comes in response to extraordinary changes in our economic and social environment.

Furthermore, after operating with a deficit for 30 years as high as $600 million annually they have managed to eliminate this deficit by introducing control systems. They can now offer Canadians an efficient postal service at a much more reasonable cost.

I can testify to the tangible, positive results Canada Post has achieved by streamlining its spending and focusing on customer service.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT

Mr. Cid Samson (Timmins—Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, what the Tories have done with the UI Act is a continuation of the destruction the Liberals started in 1978. The then Minister of Finance is now the leader of the Liberal Party.

We have noticed that the Liberals are silent on the reduction of benefits. Why is that? Could it be because the Liberals support the 3 per cent reduction just as they did when they reduced benefits more than 6 per cent in 1978?

At that time they used all the same excuses the Tories are using now to attempt to justify their actions. At that time the Liberals took the meat and potatoes off the table. Now the Tories are taking the bread and milk off the table.

No one should trust the Liberals to be any different from the Tories when it comes to attacking the unemployed.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[Translation]

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE REFORM

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the minister of employment my question is for the Prime Minister.

For several weeks the minister of employment has stressed that if someone is transferred or changes jobs his or her spouse is eligible for unemployment insurance if they move. However, according to the regulations released yesterday, the minister says that the community's expectation that married people will live together permanently is not an absolute principle for justifying someone who quits his or her job.

Does the Prime Minister agree with the principle that a married couple should stay together?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, for the benefit of the hon. member and members of this House, I would say that she is drawing conclusions that are incongruous, to say the least, from a document that is only a draft which I have never seen and have not authorized and which cannot change the law. I could refer the hon. member to decisions of the Federal Court of Canada which clearly say that under the law anyone who quits a job because there is no reasonable alternative is entitled to unemployment insurance benefits. That will not change at all.

[English]

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, the minister can twist and turn as much as he likes.

The fact is at the very time he was telling this House that sexually harassed women would be protected, that spouses could stay with their spouses in case of a job transfer, at the very time he was making these promises in the House his own officials were preparing regulations that did the exact opposite.

His own internal document says that a mother who has a child undergoing long-term treatment in a hospital in another city cannot leave her job to be near her child unless she can prove that no one else can fulfil her role.

How in the name of all decency can the minister ever circulate a document which would deny the necessity of a mother to be near a critically ill child?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I know the hon. member is really concerned about twisting the truth.

The member refers to a draft document of the department as regulations in preparation. They are not regulations. They are directives that eventually I will have to endorse and approve. That has not been done.

I want to reiterate with respect to any person in Canada who has to quit his or her job because there is no reasonable alternative, we will ensure that person receives benefits under the Unemployment Insurance Act.

• (1420)

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister shakes his head and says I am not telling the truth. The minister of trade accuses me of being in a kindergarten.

Will the Prime Minister review the documentation which quite clearly shows that in the case of a critically ill child the mother cannot be guaranteed benefits unless she can show that somebody else cannot actually be there to be with her child.

I know it is an issue of concern to the Prime Minister. Will he personally review the recommendations that are being circulated? Will he state categorically that any policy of the employment ministers department that would deny a woman the right to be with her dying child will be refuted forthwith?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I really do not know why my hon. friend in seeking to make a political point would trivialize a human situation by suggesting that an official of the Government of Canada would in any way, directly or indirectly, tolerate the kind of human condition to which she refers.

My hon. friend knows, or should know there are already 40 reasons considered to be legitimate for quitting a job. They are accepted as such by the Unemployment Insurance Commission and sustained by jurisprudence. These include: sexual harassment, dangerous working conditions, obligations to accompany a transferred spouse, obligation to take care of a child, any unilateral reduction in salary, unilateral changes in working conditions, discrimination on a prohibited ground of any type of discrimination, the refusal or loss of a right to union affiliation or participation in union activity, and so on and so forth.

It is a sensible, appropriate, humane and reasonable list of realities which makes sure that the presumption is always resolved in favour of the worker. What we have is a situation accepted by many industrialized countries in the world.

My hon. friend may have a valid point from time to time but she certainly is destroying whatever validity she has today.

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, I would like to remind the Prime Minister that with those 40 points he mentioned, it is always the worker who has to provide the proof.

Right now in Montreal there is a two-year delay in appealing those cases.

[Translation]

My question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. The changes that this government has already made to our unemployment insurance system have moved it closer to the one our southern neighbours have. In the United States the government does not fund unemployment insurance and benefits are not paid to those who quit their jobs.

Why does the government continue to lower our system in order to harmonize it with the Americans? Is that another secret promise made when the free trade agreement was signed?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my friend is mistaken. I have just come from the United States and far from harmonizing downward, President Clinton and his wife have looked at our social programs and are trying right now to make theirs better and more like ours, using our unemployment insurance program as a model. My friend is mistaken. Our social programs are better than those in the United States and we intend to keep them.

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, I will let the people judge that the Prime Minister is mistaken. Personally I know that in the United States the American government does not help fund unemployment insurance and does not let those who quit their jobs voluntarily, for valid reasons, collect unemployment insurance benefits. We are now moving toward the American system and not the other way around. Why do that now that a free trade agreement has been signed?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the provision that my friend mentions is indeed contained in French law, and France has a socialist government which is considered "generous". Are we harmonizing our unemployment insurance system with France?

Mr. Gagliano: Not in Spain.

Mr. Mulroney: Now he says: "Not in Spain".

The fact is that we have the most generous social programs in the world, I think. Some countries imitate us and some have other provisions, but the Government and Parliament of Canada are keeping the highest standards for protecting our people.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister.

Today it was reported that the government intends to hire 300 unemployment police, also known as the Bernard macoutes, which seems to be a new federal policy. This would mean hiring another 300 people to hunt down the victims of the government's policies, at very high cost, because 300 people more with salaries and benefits might cost as much as $12 million.

Why is the government spending money to hunt down its victims instead of helping them?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the focus of the question of the Leader of the New Democratic Party was: "The government's plan to hire 300 inspectors, 300 police". That is false.

[English]

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I quote a senior official of the employment department today who said: "There is no particular change in claimant behaviour", referring to unemployment insurance, and "it is just that if you put more resources in you catch more. It is like putting more police cruisers out on the highway. You are going to have more speeding tickets".

Instead of taking this approach to punish the victims and instead of forcing people to work in unsafe working conditions, why is the government not taking those funds to create employment in this country and stop punishing the unemployed?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I just said that the prefatory remark of my hon. friend in French was false. It is false in English as well.

The question in respect of quotes from any anonymous employment official is one you will have to ask the anonymous employment official.

As Prime Minister I am happy to tell my hon. friend that the statement on which she based her question is false both in English and in French.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I would like to note then that the Prime Minister is on the record as saying it is not the intention of the department to simply hire more people to punish the victims of unemployment. I accept his answer.

However, I have something to say to the Prime Minister concerning the proposed changes to unemployment insurance in general. It is clear, as it was from the previous questions, that the government is putting the onus on the employee to prove his or her case. This is clearly an instance of the innocent having to prove their innocence rather than the opposite. If your spouse moves, you are going to have to hire a lawyer to see if you can get UI. If your child is sick, you are going to have to hire a lawyer to see if you can get UI.

I challenge the government to answer why it is proposing all these changes to unemployment insurance if, as the Prime Minister says, all of these exemptions already exist? Why not drop the changes and be fair to Canadian workers?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend in her third question very generously accepts my answer and then proceeds to change the context.

In French the hon. member began by referring to 300 police who are going to inquire, les enquêteurs. There is no such thing. I have indicated in both English and French that is false. The entire question therefore I think ought reasonably to fall.

My hon. friend asks perhaps legitimately about concerns as to how the unemployed might be protected. I pointed out to the opposition spokesman that there are 40 reasons that exist and that are viewed as legitimate for quitting a job and continuing to receive unemployment benefits.

Ms. McLaughlin: Then why change the law?

Mr. Mulroney: My hon. friend says why change it. It is because they range from sexual harassment all the way to a new position classification resulting in a lower pay for the employee. The protection for an employee is absolutely comprehensive.

• (1430)

The question that arises is a question that I suppose could be fairly debated: Is it appropriate in a society like ours that someone without provocation, without reason, without justification of any kind, quits and walks away from his or her job and asks ordinary Canadian taxpayers to pay for unemployment insurance.

It may be that we should have a social program to look after that kind of a situation, perhaps a universal social program. It is not unemployment insurance, it is not insurance against unemployment, it is a wilful act of an individual to walk away from his employment.

Therefore, I tell my hon. friend that the unemployed are totally covered pursuant to these changes, and I think generously and appropriately covered.

INFRASTRUCTURE

Mr. Joe Fontana (London East): Mr. Speaker, talking about learning from other nations, hopefully our Prime Minister can learn from some of these. Europe has committed itself to a $30 billion infrastructure program; Japan has committed itself to at least a $40 billion infrastructure program; President Clinton, whom he met last week, will commit the United States to a $32 billion infrastructure program.

I want to ask the Prime Minister this question. Will Canada commit itself today to rebuilding its roads, sewers, bridges, towns and cities, and put thousands of people back to work?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend refers to commitments by Europe. That, of course, is misleading information. It is totally misleading. At the Edinburgh summit certain amounts were discussed. They have not been accepted or implemented in any way in regard to stimulative spending; in fact, they are encountering an enormous number of difficulties.

President Clinton has yet to announce any program in the United States. However, someone who has announced this kind of a program, the Minister of Finance of Canada, expended $2 billion on a pro-active program on December 2. On a per capita basis that would amount to some $25 billion in the United States. They are talking about a $20 billion expenditure there.

I think we have done our share, although I would be happy to hear from my hon. friend about what more we could do and how we can finance it.

Mr. Joe Fontana (London East): Mr. Speaker, perhaps we will take the Prime Minister up on his challenge, if he would bother to read our position on the infrastructure program.

Canadian municipalities are looking for confidence from this government. Municipalities such as Halifax,

Montreal, Toronto and Calgary, London are prepared to put their money where their mouths are, as are the provinces, in a one-third, one-third, one-third program.

If the federal government had the guts to have confidence in the Canadian municipalities and workers instead of penalizing the unemployed, we could put people back to work and rebuild our towns and cities.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, that was quite interesting.

My hon. friend, in response to my inquiry about how it was going to be financed, said to read their position on infrastructure. That is like reading Ripley's Believe It Or Not. I thought in reading the position on infrastructure the member said that it would be financed out of the proceeds from their GST, the new GST.

I point out to my hon. friend we have a situation today where we have the lowest inflation rate that we have had in Canada in 30 years. We have the lowest interest rates that we have had in Canada in 20 years. We are going to lead the employment growth of the OECD and we are also going to lead in economic growth.

My concern with the otherwise intelligent suggestion of my hon. friend is what took place with our NDP friends in Ontario where they announced a billion dollar NDP job plan which created 675 jobs. That is not the way you create jobs. You create jobs by lowering interest rates and by lowering inflation.

TAXATION

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Kenora—Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. As you all know, the government has a legal and moral obligation to pay its fair share of municipal taxes. Canadian taxpayers do not have the option of cutting back on the amount of federal, provincial and municipal taxes they pay when times are tough. Neither should the federal government have the option to do so.

Why is the government refusing to abandon its arbitrary plan to cut $80 million in revenues from municipal coffers by freezing grants in lieu of taxes?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Public Works will be in the House on Monday. I spoke to him late last evening in regard to this matter. He has been meeting with the mayors and leaders of Canadian municipalities. No doubt he will be happy to respond in greater detail to my hon. friend during the course of the next week.

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Kenora—Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate that. I want to ask the Prime Minister if he can do this for us.

If it is true that leaders of municipalities and the minister are meeting and that there is a lot of work to be done on the calculation and the formula itself, will the Prime Minister undertake to ask his officials to work in consultation with Canadian municipalities? At the same time as a measure of good faith, will he cancel the freeze on grants in lieu of taxes until this whole situation is cleared up?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, as the Prime Minister just said, the Minister of Public Works met with municipal leaders yesterday and that was not what they asked for. They understand the situation.

We have doubled payments to municipalities in lieu of taxes in the last six years, from some $217 million to $438 million, almost half this year. They understand the fiscal situation the federal government is experiencing as well and they are prepared to co-operate. The minister had a very good meeting with them yesterday and is committed to meet with them again very shortly in this regard.

DAVIS INLET

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, the opposition welcomes the government's announcement of yesterday that it intends to move the Davis Inlet Innu community over to the Labrador mainland.

My concern is why it takes so long for the government to act and why it only acts in response to negative reports in the international media. There are hundreds of aboriginal communities across Canada that have substandard housing, inadequate sewer and water systems, high levels of unemployment, substance abuse, family violence as well as the highest youth suicide rate in the world.

When will the government live up to its moral and legal obligation to bring the standard and quality of life of all of Canada's aboriginal communities up to the level enjoyed by other Canadians?

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member paints a very bleak picture. Fortunately it is not a true one.

Speaking of action, it was my decision to study the possible relocation of the community at Davis Inlet. I received that report a little over six weeks ago. I took recommendations to cabinet and the government has acted in the appropriate way.

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister. The government is only too ready to quote the UN development report on the standard and quality of life of member countries. From the point of view of Canadian white males Canada ranks first, but from the point of view of women it drops to eighth position.

This year's report will cite Canada as one of the cruelest countries in the world from the point of view of aboriginal ethnic groups. What steps does the government plan to take in the International Year of World Indigenous People to improve the reputation of Canada as one of the cruelest countries in the world for aboriginal people?

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I do not think it is befitting of this member to mischaracterize Canada in this way. One step Canada could take would be to better educate members of Parliament who are spreading untruths about Canada's reputation in this respect.

• (1440)

Mr. Speaker: I know the minister feels strongly about a dispute in facts here, but he will want to be sure that his language does not take us into the bounds of something unparliamentary.

Mr. Siddon: Mr. Speaker, I will be careful of my use of language. I do believe the hon. member should be careful of his use of figures.

Among the nations of the world, Canada extends more generous benefits in housing, in infrastructure, in education, in social programs and in constitutional guarantees and land claim settlements than any other nation on the face of this earth.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg—St. James): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture. He knows that the U.S. export enhancement program has cost Canadians farmers $2.5 billion. We also know that there is a bill before the U.S. Congress calling on its government to use EEP on U.S. exports to Mexico, thus directly attacking a Canadian market.

We also know that the problem of EEP was never a priority in the NAFTA negotiations. That was confirmed at committee by a chief Canadian negotiator.

My question for the minister is this. When is the government going to stand up for Canadian farmers and confront the United States of America on its export enhancement program?

Hon. Charles Mayer (Minister of Agriculture): It is interesting, Mr. Speaker, that the member did not make reference to the way we confronted the U.S. over the durum panel that was announced yesterday where essentially Canada won all five counts.

The member is absolutely right that we do not like the over-all effect of EEP and we have said so pretty directly to the Americans. Again, if he wants to be fair about it, he should also point his finger even more accusingly at the Europeans who we estimate will spend over $7 billion on export subsidies this year as compared to the Americans who will spend about $500 million.

The real solution to this is to deal with it at the GATT. This government has been putting a lot of pressure on in trying to get a solution there.

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg—St. James): Mr. Speaker, net farm income in this country is expected to drop almost $1 billion this year. Farm bankruptcies are up alarmingly and half of those bankruptcies are in the grains sector.

Faced with this economic crisis, farmers cannot understand the government's preoccupation with a continental barley market. Most farmers do not want it. If the minister has any doubts about it he can ask members of prairie pools who are in Ottawa today.

When is the government going to get its priorities straight and what is it going to do to attack the current farm income crisis?

Hon. Charles Mayer (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the member should know that farm bankruptcies are down in 1992 over 1991. They are still plenty high, but they are down. They are going in the right direction. They are at about the same level that they were eight or nine years ago. That is not necessarily good news, but it is not totally the bad news that the member wants to put out.

With regard to the study of barley, all we are doing is responding to the suggestions of many producers and many farm organizations suggestions that we study an over-all continental market that would provide an opportunity for individuals to sell into that market. That is nothing new. That is a question that has been asked, we think very legitimately, by many producers. We are trying very hard to address that question with an over-all panel.

The other thing the member should know is that one of the suggestions that was made in the review committee that looked at regulations is that the Canadian Wheat Board consider marketing Canadian flour, milled from wheat. For the hon. member, it is spelled f-l-o-u-r, not flowers, but flour made from wheat. That is one of the things that we are also considering.

Be careful, Mr. Speaker, when this member attacks us on how we have supported the board, because we have shown—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Burin—St. George's.

FISHERIES

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. He will recall the high seas protest by a couple of boats from St. Pierre last month off the coast of Newfoundland. As a result, the fishery there for Newfoundland in particular is still very much in limbo. Grand Bank fishermen cannot go scallop fishing.

At the same time, people from St. Pierre continue to use our ports, our airports and to shop duty free, tax free in Canada. In a few weeks the St. Pierre groundfishery is going to begin and that is going to aggravate an already explosive situation.

What is the Prime Minister prepared to do? What tough measures, if necessary, is he prepared to take against France if St. Pierre continues to thumb its nose at our codfish quotas?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans is unavoidably detained outside Ottawa.

I will take notice of the hon. member's question. As soon as the minister returns I am sure he will want to provide him with an answer.

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, I thank the minister. Since he is answering today for the minister of fisheries maybe he could tell us about the latest bit of good news, that the minister of fisheries has seen the error of his ways on the groundfish licence cancellation. The bad news is that he is about to compound the error by freezing those licences.

I want to ask the minister of fisheries, through the minister who is answering, why it is that the government and the minister are letting those people twist in the wind, those people out there who have had no landings in their name because the landings were in the names of their skippers and those people who had disastrous fish landings? Why are the minister of fisheries and the government gunning for those people whose only sin is that there is no fish to catch in the first place?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, again I will take notice of the hon. member's question and when the minister returns he shall answer.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, on a number of occasions my party has demanded that instead of spending $4.4 billion to buy military helicopters the Government of Canada should send our existing fleet out for a complete retrofit at a considerable saving to the taxpayer.

My question is for the Prime Minister. Given that the Government of Canada has just sold seven of its Chinook helicopters to the Dutch government, which has in turn contracted with Boeing to retrofit those helicopters at a cost of $12.25 million each, will the Prime Minister explain to the Canadian taxpayer why this government insists on spending $88 million per helicopter for new ones instead of recycling the existing fleet?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, the problem quite frankly is that our fleet is so aged that it could not perform the job required.

We are building new frigates. Those frigates are basically useless or very low utility without helicopters. It does not make sense to have a new ship and a 40-year old helicopter that cannot operate in bad weather.

We also need new search and rescue helicopters. The EH-101 after exhaustive evaluation is the best helicopter and the most cost efficient way to satisfy our defence requirements in terms of the frigates plus our search and rescue requirements.

A briefing was given to all political parties and everybody interested. I do not know if the hon. member was at the briefing or not, but if he had been there he would know that his question today is superfluous.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I think there are a lot of people who believe that the minister's answer is much the same.

The minister should be aware that not only has the Dutch government recognized the value of retrofitting existing helicopters, but the U.S. government has recycled over 800 of its Labrador and Chinook helicopters with the completion date being next year for the final round.

Given the recognition by the Dutch government and by the United States government that this kind of equipment can be recycled safety and efficiently, will the minister, before Canada sells off any more of its fleet at bargain basement prices, cancel the helicopter deal and put them back in the air in the right way?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, there has never been any question that we can recycle. The fundamental fact is that we end up with a more costly option in terms of performing the duty.

We can recycle the Labradors for search and rescue, yes, but the cost would be more than acquiring new EH-101s and we would end up with old helicopters.

The hon. member knows that it is entirely possible to recycle his 1950 Ford, but at the end of the day he ends up with an inferior vehicle than his 1992 one, and it costs more in the end. It is simple economics: we do the most cost effective thing and that is what we are doing.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE REFORM

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. Section 30.1(5) of chapter IV concerning unemployment insurance doubly penalizes the unemployed. If someone becomes unemployed again, without disqualification on the grounds of the manner of termination of employment, he will again be penalized because his case may be examined under subsection 6(3) and not under 6(2).

My question is this: Will the minister confirm to the House today that someone who is unemployed would be penalized again, since his case might be examined under subsection 6(3) and not subsection 6(2)? Workers should not be getting a double whammy. Will Bill C-105 be amended to reflect this?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, as I have said before, the question raised by the hon. member is the result of an error at the drafting stage. It was not our intention to penalize people who leave one job for another job. The bill will be corrected to reflect this as soon as it comes before the House for second reading.

AIDS

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

The number of Canadians from Vancouver to St. John's infected with AIDS continues to rise. Canadians need $55 million a year for the next five years to stop the spread of this deadly disease.

What possible reason could the Prime Minister give to deny this request?

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, there is no doubt that this government supports and assists the needs for AIDS research and help.

This morning the minister met with four major organizations from the AIDS group. He has listened to their concerns very carefully and will be taking a plan to support them to cabinet in the very near future.

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, meeting with groups is not enough. AIDS workers have a detailed plan to address this crisis today. Why can the government not make a firm commitment today to support their efforts? AIDS workers cannot do more with less, they can only do more with more.

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, with regard to compensation and an assistance package for AIDS coming up in the fiscal year, there will be arrangements made.

We know we need research. We know that we need to assist them. Education and prevention have to be number one for all of us. We will be there. I can assure the hon. member that the minister has his message and will take it to cabinet.

JUSTICE

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General and concerns the Stephenson inquest.

Today the minister's aide, Brian McInnis, is reported as saying that the minister will ask the Law Society of Upper Canada to advise him on the propriety of the billings of the Stephensons' lawyer and the value of independent lawyers at inquests and that "the door is still open".

I ask the minister in the name of fairness and compassion to be crystal clear to this House and to the Stephensons. Has he reconsidered his categorical refusal to contribute to the Stephensons' legal costs?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, as I have suggested in the House and on other occasions, I have every sympathy for the Stephensons.

I have suggested that I am fully prepared to have this matter reviewed by the Law Society of Upper Canada or the Canadian Bar Association to determine whether, for example, the cost of engaging such counsel should be municipal, provincial or federal; whether there should be independent legal advice before such an engagement is taken; and whether, the account should be taxed.

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, I take it that is an undertaking by the minister with respect to the Stephensons' legal costs and not the matters generally.

The problem is that the minister's answer illustrates the frustration ordinary Canadians have with our legal system. If the murderer Fredericks had been alive during the inquest, he would have been represented by an independent lawyer paid for by the taxpayer.

This government paid the inquiry legal bills, about two-thirds of a million dollars, for former cabinet minister Sinclair Stevens. Since the legal fees of a murderer on the one hand and a cabinet minister on the other are paid for by the taxpayer, will the Solicitor General listen to the ordinary Canadians who formed the jury and help pay the legal fees of two other ordinary Canadians, the Stephensons?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, there was just one error in what my hon. friend told the House. He neglected to say that legal aid in this country or the payment of legal aid is a provincial matter.

HIGH RISK OFFENDERS

Mr. Al Johnson (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Solicitor General. It is in regard to the issue of the public's right to know when high risk offenders are released into the community.

The Solicitor General is to be congratulated for the initiatives he has already taken to protect our families and communities. Last fall he significantly changed our laws to restrict parole for high risk offenders. While these actions tell Canadians that their safety comes first there is still much to be done, particularly in relation to the release of high risk offenders such as child sex abusers into unsuspecting communities.

What assurance can the Solicitor General give Canadians that their personal safety really does come first and that where necessary their right to know will override a convicted felon's right to privacy?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, there are in fact some dangerous offenders, high risk repeat sexual offenders and others, for whom there exists in the legal system a gap, that is where they do not respond to treatment, either they do not want it, they do not accept it or it is not possible, and at the end of their sentence they are released into the community.

I am of the view—and I think it is shared by members on all sides of this House—that we should take action on this matter. I can assure my hon. friend that I have discussed it with my friend, the Minister of Justice, and that we intend to proceed in the very near future with action in order to correct this gap in the legal system.

TRANSPORTATION

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport and concerns the funding for a commuter railway through the northeast sector of greater Vancouver, one of the most rapidly growing areas of Canada.

Three days before the 1988 federal election a Conservative minister and a provincial Social Credit minister announced shared funding for such a project but after the election it disappeared. The new government of British Columbia intends to make this a priority and even CP Rail is now on board.

Will the minister, for the good of the environment, for jobs and for the economy, reaffirm the federal government's previous commitment to this project, contribute one-half the cost, and agree with me it is time to get on with actually driving the first spike rather than talking about it?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I would like to remind the hon. member that when he made his announcement on July 29, 1988 the Minister of State for Transport at the time said: "The minister emphasized that federal funds will be available after provincial officials complete operational and infrastructure agreements with CP". We have not seen any action in this area lately.

PLYWOOD INDUSTRY

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, Canadian plywood producers are outraged at the recent announcement of the minister of trade that the Canada-U.S. plywood standards dispute has been resolved.

As the minister knows the harmonized standard recommended by the binational panel has been completely ignored by U.S. plywood producers and as a result the playing field is now tipped largely in favour of the U.S.

Will the minister demand that negotiations be reopened so that Canadians exporters can gain fair access to the U.S. market? Will he demand that U.S. producers immediately adopt a harmonized production standard, and will he impose a freeze on tariff reductions until U.S. producers decide to play fair ball with Canada?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, my friend refers to the interests of some parts of the industry. Other parts of the industry have been pressing the government for four years to resolve this issue. We resolved almost all of the issue as a result of negotiations last year.

There is one outstanding item in relation to the size of the knot-hole and the standard related to that. That matter is under discussion right now with the Americans. They have committed to us to resolve it as quickly as possible. I am sure that my hon. friend will support us in the discussions we will be having with the Americans to continue that process.

• (1500)

Mr. Speaker: I will take a single question from the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre, followed by a single question from the hon. member for Halton—Peel.

CHRISTINE LAMONT

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, I would like to pose a question to the acting minister.

This morning in a TV interview, when asked about the very tragic report that Christine Lamont had contacted tuberculosis in a Brazilian jail, the Secretary of State for External Affairs said that she would only act if there were more positive tests.

We know that any further tests taken in the unsanitary conditions of a Brazilian jail could lead to more disastrous and deadly diseases. I want to ask the acting minister on behalf of the government what steps the Government of Canada is going to take to ensure that Christine Lamont will receive proper care and, if clearly diagnosed with TB, whether she will be immediately brought back to Canada.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I do not think it is appropriate on the floor of the House to be discussing Christine Lamont's health conditions. Le me simply say that from the information we have received, it is premature to draw the conclusions that my hon. friend has just drawn. What we have offered to the family is to have them come and meet with the Secretary of State for External Affairs at the expense of the government. We hope they will take up this offer and have those discussions soon.

BILL C-105

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, union bosses are marching in the street right now saying proposed changes to the UI scheme are heartless and that the Tories are fighting a recession on the backs of the unemployed. Nobody seems to be talking about whether or not the changes would help the economy or trade jobs.

My question is for the minister responsible for small business. Can he tell the House how independent businesses are reacting to the provisions in Bill C-105 which Canada's big unions seem intent on stopping?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister for Science and Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, independent business people, small business people, male and female, have two characteristics in common. First of all, they are usually too busy running their enterprises to march down the streets for photo opportunities. The second characteristic is they are creating jobs. They have created 81 per cent of all the new jobs in this country in the last 10 years.

The CFIB members in an opinion survey about the UI changes made just three suggestions. When asked about freezing of premiums at current levels, 82 per cent were in favour. When asked about suspending UI premiums in order to have new hiring, 76 per cent were in favour. When asked about no benefits for employees who voluntarily quit without reason, 81 per cent were in favour.

These are the people, 1.6 million—

Mr. McDermid: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I think you will find there is consent to call immediately for concurrence in Ways and Means Motion No. 25.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the minister. Is there agreement?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

WAYS AND MEANS

EXCISE TAX ACT

Hon. John McDermid (for the Minister of Finance) moved that a Ways and Means motion to amend the Excise Tax Act, the Access to Information Act, the Canada Pension Plan, the Customs Act, the Federal Court Act, the Income Tax Act, the Tax Court of Canada Act, the Tax Rebate Discounting Act, the Unemployment Insurance Act and related acts laid upon the table Wednesday, December 9, 1992, be concurred in.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

Mr. Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Speaker: Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion, which was agreed to on the following division:

PEACE MEDAL ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface) moved for leave to introduce Bill C–402, "an act respecting the establishment and award of the Peace Medal to Canadians serving with a United Nations Peacekeeping Force".

Madam Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 68(2), the motion is deemed adopted.

Mr. Duhamel: Madam Speaker, I am pleased to present this bill, an act respecting the establishment and award of the Peace Medal to Canadians serving with a United Nations Peacekeeping Force.

[English]

The purpose of this bill is really quite simple. It is to create a peace medal to honour Canadians who participate in peacekeeping activities anywhere in the world.

Canadians have long held the tradition of serving with the United Nations throughout the world. They are held in high esteem across this planet. In fact, Canadians were among the peacekeeping forces who won a Nobel Peace Prize for their involvement in peacekeeping a few years ago. That is something of which we are all proud. As well, there are currently peacekeeping forces in a number of countries such as Croatia, Bosnia–Hercegovina and other parts of what was Yugoslavia.

In this particular case the minister would award the peace medal to any eligible person to commemorate an act performed as part of peacekeeping in the world and someone who gave his or her life to keep peace in the world or died from a cause attributable to his or her service with the United Nations.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Mr. Duhamel moves that the bill be now read the first time and printed.

Pursuant to Standing Order 69(1), the motion is deemed adopted.

Bill read the first time and printed.

PARLIAMENT OF CANADA ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Guy Saint–Julien (Abitibi) moved for leave to introduce Bill C–403, "an act to amend the Parliament of Canada Act".

Madam Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 68(2), the motion is deemed adopted.

Mr. Saint–Julien: Madam Speaker, I would like to thank the Conservative member for Etobicoke—Lakeshore for supporting me today in tabling this bill.

I am presenting this bill on behalf of the taxpayers in Abitibi. Its purpose is to require the member for Abitibi to disclose to the House of Commons his expenses that are directly related to his parliamentary duties.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Mr. Saint–Julien moves that the bill be now read the first time and printed.

Pursuant to Standing Order 69(1), the motion is deemed adopted.

Bill read the first time and printed.

SUBCOMMITTEE ON INTERNATIONAL TRADE

AUTHORIZATION FOR COMMITTEE TO TRAVEL

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): Madam Speaker, I move:

> That seven members and nine staff persons of the Subcommittee on International Trade be authorized to travel to Charlottetown, St. John's and Moncton to hold hearings on the North American free trade agreement on February 10 to February 17, 1993.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Does the hon. parliamentary secretary have the unanimous consent of the House to move the motion?

[Translation]

Mr. Plamondon: Madam Speaker, I am prepared to co-operate with the new parliamentary secretary, but we were not advised of this motion. We will give our consent today, but in future, we would prefer some advance notice of the various motions to be presented in this way, as has been the custom for some time.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The Chair has concluded there is unanimous consent. The House has heard the terms of the motion as moved by the parliamentary secretary. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Agreed and so ordered.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Langlois: Madam Speaker, further to what was said by the hon. member for Richelieu, I would like to give the hon. member the assurance that in future I will do what I can to keep him informed of the motions to be tabled in this way.

PETITIONS

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Madam Speaker, I have a petition that requests there be no goods and services tax on books and reading materials.

The petitioners point out that reading is a cornerstone of our democracy, of increased productivity and competitiveness, all things that we hold in priority and hold dear in our nation. They ask that the goods and services tax be removed.

BROADCASTING

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Madam Speaker, I have another petition which asks that the Parliament of Canada monitor very closely the use of foul language and violence on television and radio.

The petitioners believe that such use counteracts the efforts being made by many families in Canada and they point out that foul language and violence are not needed to inform or to entertain.

BILL C-91

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Madam Speaker, I have a total of 17 petitions signed by residents in the riding of York West which I have the honour of representing.

The petitioners call on the government to rescind the recent legislation that was given Royal Assent, namely Bill C-91, which will basically do away with the compulsory drug licensing system that we have had in this country for years, which worked on behalf of consumers, which kept health costs down and which encouraged a Canadian pharmaceutical industry to flourish in this country.

The petitioners ask this government to rescind Bill C-91 and to allow both generic and multinational corporations to coexist to the advantage of the Canadian consumer and the Canadian health care system.

REQUEST FOR ELIMINATION OF VIOLENCE IN OUR SOCIETY

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Madam Speaker, I would like to table a petition from the residents of Saint-Mathieu, Amos, Val-d'Or, Landrienne, Saint-Félix, Sainte-Germaine, Val-Senneville, Saint-Marc-de-Figuery, Vassan, Saint-Dominique-du-Rosaire, Dubuisson, Malartic and Rivière-Héva, in Abitibi, who say that violent films on television are dangerous and therefore unacceptable because they act as a stimulus for violent behaviour.

The petition also says that all toys that incite children to play violent games are unacceptable and their manufacture should be banned.

Consequently, the petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to pass the appropriate legislation in order to eliminate violence in our society and thus protect our children and give all citizens a better quality of life.

[English]

JUSTICE

Mr. Brian O'Kurley (Elk Island): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I would like to table three petitions which include the names of hundreds of Canadians in and around the riding of Elk Island. These petitioners live in places like Fort Saskatchewan, Ardrosson, Bruderheim, Sherwood Park, North Cooking Lake, New Sarepta and Edmonton.

These people believe that the Young Offenders Act in itself is inadequate to deal with the problems of youth crime. They also believe that this act must be strengthened or replaced by legislation that will act as a stronger deterrent to criminal activity by our nation's young people.

Therefore the petitioners respectfully pray and call upon Parliament to strengthen or replace the Young Offenders Act with legislation that will be a stronger deterrent to youth crimes.

• (1600)

These people are most concerned with repeat violent young offenders and recommend harsher penalties including work camps. In cases dealing with theft or property damage, they suggest financial repayment to the victims.

CORRECTIONAL SERVICES

Mr. Terry Clifford (London—Middlesex): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I would like to present to the House a petition from hundreds of London—Middlesex constituents opposing the location of a halfway house for 35 federal inmates on Huron Street in London, Ontario.

These inmates on conditional release from prison will be serving the remainder of their sentences at the proposed halfway house for crimes such as rape, robbery and murder. My constituents are concerned for the safety and welfare of their children and others in their community.

I implore the Solicitor General to take these concerns into account and review this proposal before any further action is taken.

VIETNAM

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Madam Speaker, under Standing Order 36, it is an honour and a duty to present today a petition signed by approximately 100 Canadians mostly of Vietnamese origin living in Ottawa, Toronto and Montreal.

The petitioners call on Parliament to do what it can to establish a democratic and pluralistic government in Vietnam after free elections, to pressure the Hanoi government to respect human rights and release all political prisoners, prisoners of conscience, respect religious freedom and specifically to respond to the very reasonable demands made by the Vietnamese Buddhists, and finally to make representations to the UN High Commission for Refugees designed to ensure that refugees in southeast Asian countries are treated with fairness and dignity.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Madam Speaker, my second and last petition is also under Standing Order 36.

It is an honour and a duty to present today a petition signed by approximately 30 Edmontonians. The petitioners call on the House and the Secretary of State for External Affairs to voice Canada's disapproval in the strongest possible terms to the Government of India for its continuing violations of human rights with specific reference to the earlier imprisonment of Mr. Justice Agit Singh Bains.

WATER DIVERSION

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, it is my pleasure to present a petition pursuant to Standing Order 36.

The petitioners from Barriere, British Columbia, point out their deep concern regarding the intention of a firm called Multinational Resources to divert part of its major river into a number of other channels which will eventually end up in the San Diego basin.

Therefore, they call on the government to take whatever steps are necessary regarding the North American free trade agreement to ensure that water is made exempt.

CHILD POVERTY

Mr. Lyle Kristiansen (Kootenay West—Revelstoke): Madam Speaker, I rise pursuant to Standing Order 36 to present a petition signed by a number of residents of the city of Nelson in my constituency of Kootenay West—Revelstoke.

The petitioners ask that this House express its concern for the more than one million Canadian children currently living in poverty and seek to achieve the goal of eliminating poverty among Canadian children by the year 2000. They point out that the House of Commons expressed itself in those words on November 24, 1989.

The petitioners further point out that the Minister of National Health and Welfare on May 7, 1992 said that there is no plan exclusively to cope with the problem of poverty among children.

The petitioners finally ask Parliament to take the necessary action to reaffirm its commitment to seek the elimination of poverty among children in Canada by the year 2000 and to develop a plan for the implementation of this commitment.

JUSTICE

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River): Madam Speaker, I rise pursuant to Standing Order 36, to associate myself with literally hundreds of signatures from people in Beaver River towns such as Vilna, Smoky Lake, Waskatenau, Kikino, Lac-la-Biche, Bellis, Cold Lake, Grand Centre, Medley and Bonnyville.

These people are concerned about further changes to the Young Offenders Act, not just the token changes we saw less than one year ago in this House. The majority of Canadians support equal treatment of criminal offenders but with legislated age shelters from criminal law for very young adolescents.

The petitioners believe that chapter 15 of the charter of rights guarantees equality rights. They are asking Parliament to revise the laws of Canada, to replace the Young Offenders Act with an updated juvenile delinquents act with a lowered maximum age of 13 years.

CHRISTINE LAMONT AND DAVID SPENCER

Mr. Joe Fontana (London East): Madam Speaker, first let me concur with the remarks made by my colleague from London—Middlesex and the petitioners who he has represented with regard to the correctional services.

I have a petition from the sisters of Mount St. Joseph in London, Ontario, who are calling upon this government to urge the Prime Minister to request the Government of Brazil to expel Christine Lamont and David Spencer and return them to Canada in accordance with Brazilian law. In light of the recent health concerns with regard to Christine Lamont it becomes even much more urgent.

POINT OF ORDER

TABLING OF DOCUMENTS REFERRED TO IN QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Madam Speaker, at three o'clock today I gave notice to the previous Speaker that I wanted to raise a point of order. The Chair recognized members opposite, the vote took place, and the Speaker left the Chamber. I guess he did not want to give too much credence to my point of order.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I think the hon. member would understand the Speaker did leave the Chair when the vote was announced. I do not think it has anything to do with his giving credence or not to the point of order the hon. member is about to raise. I do not even know if he knew what it was about. I was told the hon. member would be raising a point of order and I am happy to recognize the hon. member at the first opportunity.

Mr. Dingwall: Madam Speaker, I do not think there is any necessity for the Chair to be overly sensitive about my remarks. I was not attempting to impute motive at all but merely to state the facts as they were.

Earlier this day and indeed on previous occasions on the floor of the House of Commons we have repeatedly seen ministers of the Crown and more particularly the Prime Minister make numerous references to various items and reading documents during Question Period.

Although there is no provision in the Standing Orders, there is a provision in Beauchesne's. Citation 495.(1) states:

> A minister is not at liberty to read or quote from a despatch or other state paper not before the House without being prepared to lay it on the Table.

I seek the direction of the Chair. Would the Chair want members of the opposition to continually rise on points of order after Question Period to have the respective ministers table those documents? Or would the Chair wish to take notice of the provisions in Beauchesne's and remind ministers when giving responses to questions and quoting from documents that they ought to table those documents so members will be in a position to examine them in full as to what the ministers are saying?

I ask for guidance from the Chair. If the Chair wishes, members can rise on points of order, but I thought a better way to facilitate our deliberations would be if the Chair were to take it upon itself to do this.

• (1610)

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, on the same point of order, I respect my hon. friend opposite as he well knows. He is a man of some experience in this House and a man of considerable learning.

I am wondering whether his point today was triggered by the incident yesterday when the hon. member for Kamloops read from a newspaper ad and got into some discussion with the Prime Minister about the contents of that ad. The Prime Minister invited the hon. member for Kamloops to table what he was reading from. For whatever reason it appears that was not done and the Prime Minister tabled his own copy of the newspaper ad.

With reference to government documents which my hon. friend suggests ministers may be reading or quoting from, I know he is some years away from office on this side, in either direction one would look. It is the practice of ministers to read quotes from notes that are prepared for the purpose of Question Period. The long established practice is that ministers are not compelled to table that kind of note in the House.

I appreciate my hon. friend knows the Standing Orders very well. He accurately pointed out that there is no reference to any such necessity in the Standing Orders. I respect his quotation from Beauchesne's. I think the Beauchesne's quotation is designed to reflect on state papers and other official documents.

In the case of multiplicity of our practice here on this side at this time, it is merely working notes that are quoted from. I do not think there is any need for such a tabling to take place.

Finally, I do not want to be argumentative or provocative. That of course is not my nature. But I did hear my hon. friend, the opposition House leader, suggest that if what he was seeking was not complied with or if it was not followed through that there was an implicit threat of a plethora of points of order. I ask my hon. friend what has changed.

It is a time-honoured practice in this place that ministers quote from prepared notes. I do not think the front bench here has departed from that practice. Therefore, first it is unseemly to hold out such an implied threat and second, there is no real need for any points of order on the matter since the practice has not changed.

Mr. Dingwall: Madam Speaker, I find it rather humorous that the hon. parliamentary secretary and government Whip in his remarks would resort to such a tactic. I have seen it done in other institutions when one has a relatively weak case, one will deviate from the substance of the issue raised and try to take something in through the back door.

Madam Speaker, for your information, today the Prime Minister in response to a question raised by the deputy leader of our party said that there were 40 reasons with regard to denying unemployment insurance benefits. Quite rightly the Prime Minister could not read out the 40 reasons.

The Prime Minister did have a document which no doubt was prepared with great diligence and great care by senior officials paid by the taxpayers of this country. We would think that in the interests of those concerned about the subject matter it would only be appropriate to make that kind of document available to the House. It is in no way trying to impede or lessen the enthusiasm of ministers opposite who may be trying to give indefensible answers to superbly crafted questions, nor is it in any way to suggest to the Chair that there is an implied threat of a plethora of points of order. It is merely, if the parliamentary secretary and government Whip will recall, and if he does not recall perhaps he will refer to the "blues", seeking the guidance of the Chair as to how we might best proceed.

I am not suggesting this in order to be argumentative, to use my colleague's remarks, but I am asking the guidance of the Chair as to the best way that we might proceed in order to have a fuller examination of all of the things that are being referred to in documents which are held by ministers and the Prime Minister for the purposes of Question Period.

Mr. Edwards: Madam Speaker, I think I understand the new point my friend is now introducing. It is that when a minister or the Prime Minister begins to quote from a document or note or whatever that he then be compelled to table the entire document regardless of whether the material contained in it is pertinent to the question being asked. In other words, the document may contain information far beyond the scope of the question being asked.

I would ask my hon. friend whether that is truly his intent because the consequence could be to deprive the opposition of a great many lines of questioning. I would submit that if there are 40 reasons in a particular document that the Prime Minister is referring to and he gives a couple of them every day that would provide the opposition with 20 questions. I do not know whether the opposition would want to abnegate the possibility of asking 20 questions.

Mr. Dingwall: Madam Speaker, I will conclude my remarks and then perhaps allow the Chair to reflect on my suggestion, with the following caveat.

I have listened attentively to the member opposite and he has made reference to repeated opportunities for the purposes of Question Period. One could turn that around on the hon. member and question the veracity of the statement in the first place.

Perhaps one could conclude if one was a reasonable person, as we are on this side of the House, that perhaps the 40 reasons, when only three or four were given, are non-existent. If they do exist perhaps the Prime Minister and the parliamentary secretary would then have no reason to hide them from members of this House and then he would want, in his so-called co-operative and non-provocative manner, to try to provide that information to the House in order that members from all political parties could attest to the veracity of the comments made by the Prime Minister.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I have listened very carefully to the comments made by the hon. opposition House leader and to the answers given by the parliamentary secretary. It has been the practice in this House as long as I have been here, and for many more years before, that the the Prime Minister or ministers refer to briefing notes prepared for them by their departments.

If in this case the Prime Minister was quoting from what could be called a state document then I am sure the right hon. gentleman will have an opportunity to table it at the next sitting.

The Chair will review the debates and report back.

However, the best way is for members to make specific requests when a minister cites a document. As I said before, a minister is not obliged to table briefing notes. However, a member can ask at the time whether that document should or should not be tabled. Nevertheless the Chair will watch the tape and will also examine the "blues" and, should it be necessary, will get back to the House.

• (1620)

Mr. Dingwall: I thank the Chair for the Chair's intervention. I would just hope that regardless of whether the Chair does or does not find sufficient merit to my suggestion that at least the House would be apprised and the reasons for that decision would be given if there are cogent reasons to be given.

I would hope that my hon. friend opposite would want to confer with the right hon. Prime Minister and perhaps provide the information to the House, which I am sure is readily available, and then we can all attest to the veracity of the remarks of the right hon. Prime Minister, soon to be the former right hon. Prime Minister.

FARM PRODUCTS MARKETING AGENCIES ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND – CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENTS

Hon. Charles Mayer (Minister of Agriculture) moved the second reading of, and concurrence in, amendments made by the Senate to Bill C–54, an act to amend the Farm Products Marketing Agencies Act and other acts in consequence thereof.

Mr. Murray Cardiff (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, I am very pleased to rise today and speak to Bill C–54, which amends the Farm Products Marketing Agencies Act to provide enabling legislation for the establishment of promotion and research agencies for farm products.

Promotion and research activities will contribute to a more competitive and self–reliant agricultural sector by helping producers help themselves in responding to market opportunities.

Bill C–54 was passed by this House on May 1, 1992. The Senate then passed the bill on June 11 with two added amendments. This House must now give due consideration to those Senate amendments. One Senate amendment was simply a necessary technical correction. However the other amendment removed the eligibility exclusion of farm products regulated under the Canadian Wheat Board Act.

As a result of this amendment all producers in Canada, including wheat and barley producers in the Canadian Wheat Board designated area, will be able to propose the establishment of promotion research agencies for farm products.

This amendment has received support from organizations such as the Prairie Pools, the Alberta Barley Commission, the Canadian Federation of Agriculture and the Canadian Wheat Board. The amendment does not affect the existing authority of the Canadian Wheat Board. I want to make that very clear.

For these reasons the government supports the amendments made by the Senate.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Madam Speaker, the amendments to the check–off legislation, the Farm Products Marketing Agencies Act, which come from the Senate today are ones that the government attempted to make in the standing committee when C–54 was before that committee. Unfortunately the Speaker ruled them out of order because they went beyond the scope of the bill at that time.

This legislation really provides for check–offs for agencies to be established under the Farm Products Marketing Agencies Act that would allow these agencies to do promotion and check–offs for research by various farm commodity groups. It is legislation that we supported.

When this legislation came to the committee it was not clear whether groups like the prairie pools and other agencies really favoured this legislation or not.

When those representatives appeared before the committee that dealt with this bill, it became clear they thought it would be desirable to make it available for farm groups dealing with wheat and barley which are under the Canadian Wheat Board Act. They would have the same opportunity to establish this kind of promotional agency.

The amendment put forward in the House was not acceptable to the Chair. It provided for an override of the legislation as it had come to the committee by an Order in Council. When the legislation went to the Senate, they were more ingenious; they simply removed that portion of the act which prohibited promotion and research agencies being set up under the authority of the Canadian Wheat Board Act. We all know that under parliamentary procedure we can remove things from acts but we cannot add amendments which go beyond the scope of the bill.

The Senate put that forward and we have the bill back in the House. It is generally supported by many farm groups. Some do not support it. There is an ongoing concern that it is a way for the government to set up agencies to do the promotion and research government departments should be doing. In the Department of Agriculture we have seen cutbacks in the funds for research so there is some justification for that concern.

Groups in some parts of the country such as beef producers already have promotion agencies. The advantage of this legislation is that the check-off can be applied to imports of beef. We have a very healthy exchange in the market between Canada and the United States. If beef producers in Canada are having a check-off applied to them to promote the sale of lean meat and so on, that check-off should apply to meat which is being imported just the same as for domestically grown commodities such as beef. That is the only fair way.

This legislation has a lot of support across the country because it puts that caveat or provision in the law wherein imports will have the same check-off applied and will benefit from the promotion that is being carried out by that commodity group.

The amendment today would apply to promotion and research into commodities produced under the Canadian Wheat Board Act, which is barley and wheat, now that the government has removed oats from the responsibility of the Canadian Wheat Board Act.

I might say that the base legislation is not being changed. It is legislation that provides us with supply management and marketing boards. There is a very great concern that in the whole article XI of the GATT negotiations just how strongly the government is supporting those commodities under supply management. When the Prime Minister came back from his meeting with President Clinton last Friday, there was no indication that he had even raised the question of supply management or the GATT negotiations.

A year ago this Friday, February 12, a unanimous motion was passed in the House calling upon the government to take action to secure the support of the President of the United States and the European Community to strengthen our position for legislation which is the basis or the foundation for some 35,000 producers of supply managed commodities in the dairy and poultry industries.

There is very great concern, especially with the special briefing that was provided only three weeks ago by the chief negotiators for the Canadian government. They said that their position was apparently being weakened. They had even less support for the joint resolution that was passed by the House on February 12, 1992. They called on the government to expand its support among like-minded nations. It did not really do that because the support we had then was something like five or six countries. Now it is apparently down to only two, and we are not sure that the Prime Minister really took any effective action in his meeting with President Clinton on that issue last week in Washington.

To maintain our position and go forward on that whole issue we need his support and the support of the European Community, the main people involved in the GATT negotiations, although other countries are involved as well.

We support this amendment to section 39 by the Senate. We want to see it passed and this check-off legislation come into effect. It has been before the House now for over a year. This amendment would do what was attempted in the standing committee when the legislation passed there. I hope it will be passed and it will go forward so that the legislation can be implemented.

These agencies that will have an international aspect to them will be available to various commodity groups across the country. In a global market situation we need agencies that can promote those commodities and provide a check-off equally for commodities being imported as well as those being produced at home.

We are supporting this amendment as it has been returned to us from the Senate.

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Madam Speaker, I do not agree with the motion as presented from the Senate. I believe it has misinterpreted the powers of the Canadian Wheat Board. I believe it already had the power to spend money on research and promotion.

Promotion is its chief reason for existence. It is a marketing agency that promotes Canadian wheat and Canadian barley of various types and for various uses around the world. In my opinion it now has the power to introduce research projects which will produce and test new varieties and new plants to meet the requirements of consumers around the world.

Therefore I did not see any use for this particular amendment. The Conservatives and the Liberals in this Chamber and in the other Chamber have decided that such a change needs to be made so I will not oppose it for an undue length of time. However I wish to state my position quite clearly before we allow this bill to be passed in a moment or two.

It seems to me the basic reason behind the particular amendment was a second-thought position of the government. It originally decided to leave wheat board grains alone, understanding I presume that the wheat board would do an adequate job of research, development and promotion of various types of crops in the wheat and barley areas.

That position changed and the reasons given usually had as part of the argument the fact that the Alberta Barley Commission would like this amendment, the barley growers would like this amendment and the wheat growers were anxious to have such an amendment.

This gives the minister and those organizations the option of attempting to get a check-off on all wheat or barley as the case may be to aid in the promotion of the organizations and their particular usage for research and promotion.

I made the point previously and I will make it briefly now. That type of promotion and research is an extremely inefficient use of farmers' funds. I pointed to various similar groups in existence where the amount that actually arrives for real research is much less than 50 per cent of the funds collected. Most of those funds are used to promote the organization and its causes rather than to do any real research in making a better grain or better product or better commodity.

I still feel that the best source of funds would be for the Canadian Wheat Board to finance such projects internally. It already has the administrative ability and I believe the legal ability to do this.

The Canadian Wheat Board in the past has financed such diverse changes as hopper cars to improve the transportation system. It has financed the education of young doctoral candidates studying disciplines useful to the wheat board in its marketing and research capacities. It has gone into the promotion of different varieties of grains in the wheat and barley classifications. I believe it could have carried on quite well without this amendment.

However, as I said, the Liberals and Conservatives in both Houses by a very large majority have decided they want to give these opportunities for various commodity groups to take check-offs, even though the money will not be spent very efficiently. That decision has been made.

I am in a minority and recognize that I am defeated and will permit this bill to go through, even though I still oppose the idea.

Mr. Jim Jordan (Leeds—Grenville): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to talk about this bill. My colleague from Algoma put it in the context of farm marketing boards and they are living in a great deal of uncertainty these days.

The feeling in the agriculture industry is that the government is softening its position. A discussion like this is very timely right now. It is just a week or so short of a year when we had a rally of about 40,000 farmers here. I think it was on February 21 last year.

Since that time I believe the government has been using a lot of double-talk. It is saying: "Oh yes, we want to strengthen Article XI at GATT. We want to lend strength to that". Why does it not just come out and say: "We want to support you, plain and simple. We are behind you. We will go to the wall with you on this". Instead of that it is being fuzzed over a little bit by double-talk.

There is a great deal of uncertainty out there. I have a letter—and after listening to the discussion between the government Whip and our own House leader a few minutes ago I will be glad to table it—which was sent to the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and also to the new Minister of Agriculture. It is pleading with them, asking them to give some sort of new endorsement of support. That is the basis of the letter. As interesting as the letter is, it is the letterhead that is worth noting. The letter comes from the Canadian Broiler Hatching Egg Marketing Agency, the Canadian Chicken Marketing Agency, the Egg Marketing Agency, the Turkey Marketing Agency and Dairy Farmers of Canada.

Those are five agencies in Canada that are making a little money now. It is one of the glory spots in the agricultural industry. Not every aspect of agriculture is making a little money. Why are they making a little money? It is because they have an organized, controlled marketing system. It is worth supporting and I hope when those ministers receive their copies of that letter dated February 1 they will give some measure of guaranteed support to those who are negotiating on behalf of the marketing boards.

The government has done this in the past. I have a quote from The Globe and Mail of December 7, 1991: "Canada's farm marketing boards will survive international trade talks now taking place in Geneva". That quote was made by the current Minister of Agriculture. Of course, he was not the Minister of Agriculture then. Would he say that today? I wish he would. I think there would be certain assurances if the new Minister of Agriculture would make that statement which he is attributed to have made a couple of years ago in The Globe and Mail.

I have another one from the current minister of fisheries who at that time said: "Canada intends to continue its supply management system". I wish that the current minister of fisheries who was in a different role when he said that—it is a quote from The Globe and Mail way back—would come out today and make that kind of statement. That would seem to be reassuring for an industry that is operating in terrible uncertainties right now. In addition to the five agencies asking for an update, a current renewed approval from this government, we find that the government is hedging. It is talking from both sides of its mouth on this one.

All the farmers are asking for is the kind of assurance they thought they were given about a year ago. My colleague from Algoma referred to that also. All parties in the House said they supported farm marketing boards.

We are at a critical stage in the negotiations. What would be wrong with saying that again? There are about 36,000 dairy farmers waiting to hear it. There are about 2,300 or 2,400 poultry farmers waiting to hear it. It does not have to be a flamboyant statement, just a statement, a repetition of what was said here approximately one year ago. They are not going to settle for anything less than that. They thought they had the assurance of the government at that time and they just need reassurance.

There is a clipping from the National Farmers Union with reference to the Japanese government and its position on imported rice which says that the Japanese government has maintained a staunch defence of its highly protected rice market regime which it considers essential not only to national food security but also to the social objectives of its agricultural industry. I think we have social objectives for our agricultural industry and they are just as important to Canadians as the Japanese social objectives for its agricultural industry would be.

I do not know why the government is hedging on this. It would seem to me it would not be unusual to come out and repeat the kind of assurance that it has given farmers who are working under the marketing boards and also working under a great deal of uncertainty in that industry these days. They are looking for reassurance from the government.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: On division.

Madam Deputy Seaker: Motion carried on divison.

Motion agreed to, amendments read the second time and concurred in.

FARM CREDIT CORPORATION ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Hon. Charles Mayer (Minister of Agriculture) moved that Bill C–95, an act to continue the Farm Credit Corporation and to repeal certain acts in consequence thereof, be now read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Natural Resources envelope.

Mr. Murray Cardiff (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, I am very pleased to rise to speak on Bill C–95. We hope this bill will be passed in all stages today rather than going to the Committee of the Whole House. We will see how the time goes.

Bill C–95, the Farm Credit Corporation Act is replacing the old Farm Credit Act passed in 1959 and the Farm Syndicates Credit Act passed in 1964. This bill will update FCC's legislation and give the corporation the flexibility to adapt its financing instruments to the evolving needs of the farm community.

We all know from our debate yesterday and other debates we have had in this House before that it is very necessary. We know and recognize that the parliamentary committee is changing, not only in this country, but throughout the world.

Bill C–95 is another example of the ongoing commitment of our government to the farm sector in Canada. There is no greater symbol of the strength and resilience of this country than the Canadian farm. The preservation and development of rural Canada has always been a priority of this government. This is another part of the Growing Together paper that was started by one of our previous ministers of agriculture after the last election.

The working groups on farm finance and management recommended that the Farm Credit Act be amended to increase FCC's operating flexibility in their 1991 report. This recommendation was supported by all interested groups during the consultative process.

Bill C-95 will give the FCC the latitude to offer financing instruments to assist farmers to compete in a global marketplace. This legislation will allow the FCC to broaden its target market and widen its range of services to better serve farmers and rural Canada.

I would like to highlight some of the key elements of the proposed legislation and show how it will strenghten the agriculture base in Canada. The Farm Credit Corporation will be able to focus its attention on value added production and diversification into other entreprises located on the farm, as well as traditional farming operations.

Part-time farmers and farmers with other full-time occupations will be eligible for loans in recognition of the shift to alternative sources of income. It will also provide those who are working in the hope of becoming involved in agriculture the opportunity to supplement their income when they first start to farm. It was a problem in previous legislation when the corporation was unable to make loans in those situations.

Today those who wish to enter farming on a small scale basis with the hope of eventually becoming full-time farmers will be able to qualify. This will be of great assistance to them.

Financing will be extended to the agribusiness areas which supply and serve farm businesses. Such entreprises as farm supply businesses and abattoirs, for example, could qualify for financial assistance. In addition, agricultural support industries, such as livestock trucking businesses and grain cleaning facilities could also be eligible for this financing. I am sure there are many other areas which we have not even thought of.

For the FCC to adequately serve these new markets, the corporation's mandate needs to be expanded beyond its traditional role. The Farm Credit Corporation will continue to contribute to growth and stability in rural communities through financial services for value added financing, diversification through non-farm businesses, agribusinesses and the rural development initiatives.

The Farm Credit Corporation will play a vital role in co-ordinating other federal farm finance initiatives directed by rural development, as well as co-operating with other financial institutions and organizations in supplying financial services.

To tap into these new markets and deliver these new services, the corporation will consult the farming community to offer products tailor-made to the conditions inherent to farming.

This new act will also increase Farm Credit Corporation's administrative flexibility to respond quickly to changes in the marketplace. For example, the corporation will be able to set and offer interest rate changes more quickly in response to the financial markets rather than waiting for an Order in Council each time the bank rate changes.

It will enable the Farm Credit Corporation to accept a greater range of security instruments rather than being restricted to primary security of mortgages on rural property. For the farmer this will mean a greater range of options to meet his financial requirements with the corporation.

• (1650)

Finally it will allow the Farm Credit Corporation to increase the limit on loans offered to meet all of the projects and objectives we have mentioned.

The government is proposing the deletion of subsection 4(5) during the clause-by-clause review of this bill. It had been included to provide greater certainty of the corporation's jurisdiction over its own property.

However, this constitutional question is now before the courts and will be decided there. Therefore ths clause is no longer necessary in that legislation.

There is perhaps no better way to illustrate the need for this legislation than to set examples of actual situations throughout the country where new financing tools can be matched with the initiatives of innovative farmers.

In Horsefly, British Columbia, a community of 426 people, cow-calf operations are the mainstay of agriculture and one rancher is teaming up with a local abbatoir to supply beef to nearby communities.

In working with both the rancher and the abbatoir operator the Farm Credit Corporation could develop a financial package to suit their specific capital needs.

Cut Knife, Saskatchewan, is a town of 600 people located west of North Battleford serving 135 area grain farms. Cut Knife entrepreneurs plan to build a flour mill and a pasta plant adding value to the production of wheat in the area. The corporation could assist in meeting the special finance needs of these vertical integration product projects of local farmers and business people.

In Winnipegosis, Manitoba, the capital requirements for agriculture, including commercial fishing and fish farming, must be met to maintain existing operations and provide the basis for expansion.

Financing this activity could be achieved through a memorandum of understanding between the corporation and an agency like the Manitoba Agriculture Credit Corporation of western economic diversification. In La Patrie, Quebec, a village of 357 in the eastern townships silviculture plays a key role in maintaining the rural community.

The Farm Credit Corporation could finance equipment purchases using loans to terms approximating the useful life of equipment on the security of promissory notes, cattle mortgages or lease to own arrangements.

My farm example takes us to Drummond, New Brunswick, where the economy is based on agriculture and forestry. Farm operations are expanding to include the production of fresh broccoli for export. The FCC's ability to lend beyond the farm gate in this community would provide producers and processors with financing for packaging and marketing initiatives.

These are but a few examples of the potential revitalization that will be assisted with the passage of the Farm Credit Corporation Act.

This legislation would allow the Farm Credit Corporation to continue to provide an effective alternative source of credit for the current and future needs of Canadian farms with the flexibility to grow and keep pace with the industry it serves.

This proposed legislation will allow the Farm Credit Corporation to deliver the products needed by the farming community and thus fulfil its mandate.

It would also enhance the competitiveness and profitability of Canadian farmers while creating vital economic activity in rural Canada for the benefit of all Canadians.

We are always trying to find ways to enhance the income of farmers and we believe that this is another tool that will be beneficial to the future of agriculture for the long-term planning and viability to meet the balance of the years in the 1990s and to prepare ourselves for the challenges that will be there in the year 2000.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to have an opportunity to say a few words this afternoon on Bill C-95, the Farm Credit Corporation Act.

This is a major change and rewrite of the farm credit act, the former act, and we support the bill in principle because we think it does a lot of the things that perhaps should have been done four, five, or six years ago.

I listened to the parliamentary secretary and he told us a great deal about the kinds of things that could be done under this new act. What he failed to mention was that essentially over the last five or six years we have seen the Farm Credit Corporation effectively going out of business. If we look at the number of loans in 1987-1988, not going back to how many there were in 1984 or 1985 when this government came to power, we see there were 72,182. In 1991-92, which I guess is the last fiscal year report, we see that the number of farm credit loans out there is 59,845. That is a very dramatic drop from the number of 13,000 less mortgages.

Clearly if that is the direction this government is moving regardless of the fact that we have a new act that is going to be more flexible and have a number of advantageous arrangements, if the amount of dollars is going down as it has gone, the amount of mortgages it holds has gone from $4.7 billion to $3.5 billion. That is a dramatic reduction in the amount of money that is made available.

I think the idea that legislation will provide for further processing off the farm or a group of farmers work together is very commendable because it provides more flexibility and gets us into the further processing which has been dramatically reduced in the last four or five years in this country.

I think farmers and groups will want to know if the government is willing to put more money into the industry, not take it out as it has been doing for the last five years. In fact the reduction in the number of mortgages of 13,000 is just about the number of farmers who have given up during the last five or six years and left the land completely because they simply could not live with the kind of pressures that were put on them by the Farm Credit Corporation and by this government.

Clearly when we look at this legislation that is before us today I would say we have one of the most desperate situations that we have ever faced in this country in terms of agriculture. We only have to look at the situation that we saw a couple of weeks ago in Saskatoon when 13,000 farmers gathered for a rally to protest the lack of support by the government in terms of stabilizations programs.

We only have to look at the rally that was held just a week or so ago in Lucknow where 1,000 farmers gathered to protest the lack of action by the government. Underlying all that in the field crop area is the concern that Ontario corn producers feel, wheat and barley producers feel and grain producers feel in Saskatchewn. We have the uncertainty of the whole supply management sector.

We hear reports from the chief negotiator at the GATT negotiations that the government is weakening its position. If a GATT agreement is reached after the French elections next month, and while it could be that the whole underpinning or the major underpinning import controls for the whole supply management sector will be blown away in the next few years, the value of quotas will tumble to a fraction of their value and perhaps the most stable and successful sector of our Canadian agriculture industry could be destroyed.

We are pleased to see the government bringing in this legislation which is a major rewrite of the farm credit legislation but it does not really solve the problems and the tremendous uncertainty which producers face across this nation this winter.

The legislation, Bill C-95, comes mainly from the recommendations of the farm financial task force. They made a lot of recommendations. As I go through the legislation and Bill C-95 itself I see a number of the recommendations of the 1988 agriculture committee when they made recommendations about support for finances for agriculture. So it comes about from many of those changes. It will clearly provide a great deal more flexibility in the lending arrangements for the Farm Credit Corporation. The act removes many things which are really provided for in the Financial Administration Act, some of which were apparently in conflict before.

The Financial Administration Act controls many things such as the approval of the Minister of Finance for borrowing and the approval by the government of bylaws that are passed by the Farm Credit Corporation. It provides for the auditor to be appointed by the Governor in Council. Of course, it is often the Auditor General. It provides for the tabling of annual reports and corporate plans. That is the legislation that was passed in June 1984. It is the Crown corporations legislation under the Financial Administration Act. That has all been stripped away in this major rewrite of the Farm Credit Corporation Act.

Some of the powers under the new act are very similar to the existing legislation, for example it covers the cost of loans and mortgages for land and buildings. It provides for loan guarantees, which is a new feature. I do not believe that was in the previous legislation. It provides for personal property and consolidation of debts. Many of these things were in the existing legislation but often were not used unless incredible pressure was applied on the government.

Many people who have gone through the farm debt review process say that the government agencies, whether the Farm Credit Corporation or the Alberta government agency, are the toughest to deal with, often more difficult than the banks and that is pretty tough.

A major change is that this legislation also provides for the diversification of enterprises, whether it is a slaughterhouse or a seed processing plant or any new further processing. It is my understanding that the majority of the funding must relate to primary production. That is clearly an important step forward.

Producers are asking: "If we are going to have this funding for further processing will there be additional money?" When we get into major processing plants, if that money is going to be taken away from primary producers then there are other sources for that further processing. The government and the minister in committee will have to make it clear that there must be more funding.

The reduction in funding has totalled $1.2 billion over the last five years. If we keep squeezing the amount of money that is available then there is really nothing to be gained because although there may be funding for a further processing plant in one part of the country it just means that several dozen or a hundred primary producers will not have any money in some other part of the country. It must be clarified by the government that there will be additional money available.

The free trade deal and the government's policy for further processing has been a disaster. In the Canadian food processing industry 100 processing plants had gone out of business since the free trade deal was passed in the fall of 1988. The government's own estimate, and this figure is almost six or eight months old, was that 34,000 jobs had been lost. I am happy to see this legislation and I think there will be an opportunity to provide this.

However we must compare that with the pressure that is put on Canadian food processors by the FTA and by the government's own taxation policy. In 1987 the government had a fast write-off for new further processing industries for food products of 50 per cent declining balance. That has been reduced to 30 per cent. Even the government's own agriculture competitive council is recommending that it be returned to the 1987 level. It also recommends that there be fast write-offs and improved incentives for agri-research because we are dealing with a global industry. If the incentives are greater in western Europe, Ireland, or the United States our producers will clearly have a hard time competing.

It is therefore important that the government not only provide this funding for further processing but also provide the fiscal and monetary policy to encourage that industry to survive. It is the second largest industry in the country and clearly incentives must be provided. If we lose further processing industry for food products we obviously lose that market. That is a major problem.

Under this legislation the FCC will have the power to set its own rates. That is beneficial. The way in which the FCC is currently run is unfortunate. It continues to lose its market share of the farm loan industry. Its rates are higher than those of the banks. We must wonder what the policy really is.

Under this act the board of directors will be increased. There will be more flexibility for security, and that is beneficial because a very large percentage of our producers work off the farm in addition to running their primary production units.

The other area that is beneficial, and I believe this was also recommended by the farm financial task force, is the provision for a grievance between the provincial government lending agencies, the private sector and so on.

It is interesting that in this legislation it provides that the headquarters of the FCC would be in Regina, Saskatchewan or any other place in Canada. The Tories lost most of their support in Saskatchewan in the last election. One just wonders, and God forbid that they be re-elected, that if they lost the rest of their support the headquarters would move to some other location. Regina has worked out to be a very good location because of the tremendous agriculture potential and work in that province. It is interesting that they have left the headquarters' location rather open. Later I will discuss why they might be doing that.

It is interesting that appointments to the enlarged board will be made by the Minister of Agriculture as approved by the Governor in Council while the chairperson and the president will be appointed by the Governor in Council. The procedure for the appointment of these directors and senior officers is the same as currently stipulated in the existing legislation. However, the proposed legislation takes away the power of the Minister of Agriculture to remove directors at any time, as deemed appropriate. It also eliminates the power of the Governor in Council to remove officers of the corporation at any time judged suitable.

• (1710)

It is amazing that the power of the government to remove people has been taken away. If we examine the Votes and Proceedings at the end of December we can see that there were some 54 Order in Council appointments and on February 3 there were 105 Order in Council appointments. We wonder if the government has some intention to lock people in for as long as possible.

There were such outstanding non-partisan appointments made on February 3 as Brian Peckford and William H. Neville to the board of directors of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. Obviously the government is taking great care in these appointments and seems to be getting ready for something or other.

It is interesting that in this legislation the power to remove people is being removed, whether it is the Governor in Council's power to remove officers or the minister's power to remove members of the board of directors.

There are a number of beneficial elements of this legislation. They represent a number of recommendations. There are a number of things that could be improved, and I hope they will. I am sure there will be other recommendations when this bill goes before the legislative committee and we have heard from an appropriate number of witnesses.

It seems to me that the idea of an advisory board should be provided for in this legislation. There does not seem to be any provision for that. I know that the Minister of Agriculture has had an ongoing battle with the advisory board of the Canadian Wheat Board and perhaps that is why the government wants to remove the advisory board of the Farm Credit Corporation. It is useful to have an advisory board.

The argument is made by the government that the board of directors is larger but the board of directors has a statutory corporate responsibility to defend whatever it is doing. An advisory board is closer to the grass roots. It does not have that corporate responsibility. It is able to be a sounding board to reflect the feeling of the producers. There should be provision for an advisory board.

It is interesting that the Farm Credit Corporation would be able to make loans to non–Canadians and to people who are not even residents of the country. With the credit crunch that so many farmers are feeling in this country at this time, and especially if we are going beyond the farm gate and providing funding for the food processing industry, it seems to me that we should at least provide that these funds are available to Canadians or at least to Canadian residents, to landed immigrants.

Even though the board of directors is substantially enlarged, almost doubled, there does not seem to be any provision that a set number of the directors be primary producers. Even though this legislation is providing for further processing plants it seems to me that the primary concern should be and must be primary producers and that the funds available should be made available to primary producers. I hope that additional funds will be provided to compensate for the fact that this is going beyond the farm gate and that it will not just have the same amount it has now because that would obviously take funds away.

The government has already chopped something like 25 per cent or 30 per cent of the funds available under the Farm Credit Corporation Act in the last five years. It should be providing additional funding as it is undertaking a responsibility beyond the farm gate.

There is no provision in the act for an appeal board. It seems to me there are always human personality clashes in any sphere of human activity. The FCC representative may fall into a situation where personalities get in the way of sound business decisions and it seems to me there should be provision for an appeal board. I hope the government will consider that when we get to a legislative committee.

The other area I want to look at is whether this legislation is strictly what it seems or whether it is the first step toward privatization. The Nielsen task force report in 1985 suggested that the government should consider privatizing the FCC, possibly into an agriculture co–operative.

Whether the government has this in mind or not, nobody knows for sure. Only the government knows. It would not be surprising. The government has moved to privatize practically every other Crown corporation. After all Erik Nielsen was sort of the philosopher king of this government for many years. His move to privatize everything that moves is clearly the direction in which the government is moving.

I cannot help but wonder if a number of the provisions are designed to ultimately be there for privatization. There is the fact that the government has moved the headquarters to Regina. That is clearly set out so it would be easy if the government proposes at some stage in the future to sell off the agency. The headquarters could easily be moved to where the rest of the banking industry of this country is located.

A number of things about this bill suggest that the government is moving toward ultimately privatizing the Farm Credit Corporation. I think that would be extremely undesirable. The Crown corporation should be expanded. It should be designed to provide special arrangements for Canadian farmers and not be just another agency of government with no special responsibility except the bottom line. The agriculture committee recommended that in its report several years ago and I am sure it will be the view of the committee reviewing this. The record of the banking industry in this country as far as producers are concerned is not that great. It is a tough situation. We want to see the Farm Credit Corporation setting an objective and producers given the benefit of the doubt. We do not see that necessarily.

The rates of the FCC are higher than the private sector. Its share of the market is going down. As we see from the figures that I quoted earlier its contribution to Canadian agriculture is dropping all the time.

We support this bill. We think there can be improvements made in it. The farm community will have suggestions which will be useful to us. We want to hear from witnesses in the private sector as to how this legislation can be improved. We want to see some amendments in the legislative committee but we are pleased to support it.

• (1720)

We are aghast at the government's general and cavalier attitude toward the dramatic reduction in farm income that we are facing in 1993. It is almost a $1 billion reduction. We have seen the government's support programs already dropping. We assume that something will happen there.

If you look at the government funding over the years, especially for those commodities in the grain and oilseed sector, it usually comes to a peak in an election year, as happened in 1987 and 1988. It came to a peak last year compared to previous years but even that was dramatically lower than 1987 and 1988 even though world prices for grain are not much better.

We hope the government will recognize the desperate situation that thousands of producers are facing this year and provide those support programs that are required to stabilize the industry to see us through this difficult time.

We hope that the predictions of the chief negotiators at the GATT negotiations will be false and that the government will stand up and support those producers in the GATT negotiations. Otherwise we will see thousands of producers who have been self-sufficient and doing a great job in their commodity areas of poultry and dairy facing the same kind of dismal situation which so many grain and oilseed producers have faced for these long years.

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, we have before us a bill to create a new expanded Farm Credit Corporation which I approve of in principle.

It was a bit more than a decade ago in this House that I recommended to the then Minister of Agriculture, Eugene Whelan, that a farmers' bank was something that would be useful, given the situation that existed then. An expanded Farm Credit Corporation would have been able to provide credit to put in crops, to finance livestock, to finance buildings and the expansion of the farm itself, as well as the equipment and the wherewithal to expand off the farm into businesses which were integrated into the farm either forward or backward. It was a dream that I proposed to the Minister of Agriculture at that time.

That was just over a decade ago. Unfortunately we may be too late, but it is better late than never in this case. It is long past the time that the Farm Credit Corporation began to act in a way that will make it of more use to farm people than has been the case in the past.

Farm Credit, as I saw it 10 or 11 years ago, was well positioned to play the role that needed to be played in the strapped financial times farmers were facing. They were already evident in the early 1980s. Most of their credit advisers had a fairly good background in agriculture—much better than most of the banks had at that time—and they would have been well positioned to have assisted farm families in making the shift into the kind of adjustments that took place in the 1980s.

Unfortunately the Liberal government at the time did not see fit to act. It is good to see, although it is in the dying days of this Parliament and of this government, that the Conservatives have now decided to put such an agency in place.

I am not certain this new agency can still be competitive. The banks, both private and public—public meaning the Federal Business Development Bank—and the various provincial organizations that provide financial and banking services have a leg up on this new organization.

The Farm Credit Corporation is on very shaky ground at the moment financially. It will retain the backing of the Government of Canada which is a good thing because in its most recent past, if it had not had that backing it would have technically been as bankrupt as many of its clients have become. Therefore it has a big challenge in front of it to carry out the mandate this bill will give it.

I see the corporation being involved in providing loans for farms to expand into the farm supply side of their business, to allow farmers, either singly or with neighbours, to set up machinery agencies, fertilizer plants, fuel supply centres. Some of this is already being done in most of the farming areas of this country through co-operatives. This provides other options for those small communities where perhaps the co-op has failed or where there is a new alignment.

Its greatest possibilities lie in the further processing of farm products. This sort of financial institution would have been given consideration by individuals in my community who have recently set up a food processing plant which turns pea flour into a product that resembles potato chips but, of course, tastes a bit more like peas. It is healthier because it has a higher protein content and is finding a fairly good demand in the market at the moment.

Peas are grown in the area and in the future I can see the grinding of peas into flour for this further processing into what we call a chip continuing in the future.

There are a great many projects being planned and designed in the rural part of Canada I come from. Feedlots that make use of the grain to produce ethanol as a sideline with the feedlot using the by-product from the ethanol production are in place now and more are being planned. Having a source of funds from the Farm Credit Corporation is a further place for such institutions to get financing. Alfalfa dehydrating plants and further processing of food also have possibilities.

As I said at the beginning of my comments, farmers and provincial governments have provided new ways for people to act co-operatively. A number of farm communities have already figured out ways to set co-operative structures in motion that have attracted the attention of the financial institutions, including the six or seven large chartered banks, to the point where some of these banks are now offering such co-operative ventures credit at less than prime.

I only mention this because it seems to me that this new expanded Farm Credit Corporation is going to have its work cut out if it is going to be a competitive institution facing the experience other lenders and other credit institutions have developed in the 10 or 12 years that the federal government sat and did nothing with regard to the expansion of powers of the Farm Credit Corporation.

I do not think we should spend a lot of time reviewing this legislation.

• (1730)

I approve of the parliamentary secretary's statement when he opened this debate in which he pointed out that the government intended to withdraw subclause 4(5) of the bill. It was an unnecessary part of the legislation and would probably result in a lot of political wrangling.

It is quite clear from my point of view as a federal member of Parliament who understands the need for strong federal powers over financial institutions that the final power rests with the federal jurisdiction in that regard. I do not think it had to be reasserted in legislation. That is spinning wheels and creating unnecessary verbiage and unnecessary conflict. I am pleased to see that it was withdrawn.

I will cut my remarks short so that we can go on to further stages of this bill. I believe it could be dealt with in all stages before this day's session is finished.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I will recognize the hon. member for Prince Edward—Hastings and then the hon. member for Kent who will split 20 minutes.

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Prince Edward—Hastings): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to have the opportunity to make some comments on Bill C-95 which is redoing the Farm Credit Corporation legislation, the act covering it.

As my colleagues have said before me I will say from the outset that I support the bill in principle. There are some ways the bill could be improved. I am not excited about the fact that it may go through all stages today because there is some work that could and should be done on it in committee. My recommendation to my colleagues and to the House is that indeed that should happen.

It is an important piece of legislation. I do not think we need to rush it through today. I am not saying I want to drag my feet on it, but we need to have at least a meeting or two in committee on it.

As we know it is permissive legislation and there are some good changes. One of the questions I raise is that I am not so sure that we need 12 members in total on the board of directors. I will leave it at that. I just raise that question. I am not sure we need that many.

Without going over the good things the bill does point by point, it expands the way in which moneys can be used that are borrowed from the Farm Credit Corporation by including value added parts of the industry and enterprises. In the minds of some people it may be moving away a little from what we think of as traditional Farm Credit Corporation loans for barns, machinery and land, to what I will call cottage industries, as long as they are on the farm and one of the spouses wants to get involved.

We know there is an incredible amount of stress, strain and financial pressure on the farm community today. In far too many cases one spouse has to go off the farm. As I said in the House yesterday, the average Canadian farmer feeds 120 people, but one member of the average Canadian farm family has to go off the farm to make enough money to feed the family. This will make some money available for a cottage-type business or industry that might spin off from the farming operation.

It also makes it possible for an individual to use other assets to guarantee the loan, whether that be another property some place else. In the past it had to be a first mortgage on the assets the money was being borrowed to buy. If an individual with a full-time job wants to start a farm business or livelihood in a smaller way and he has a piece of property some place else or has some investments he can use them.

It also gives the FCC the power to set interest rates. I might make a comment here that I hope with the new powers and the flexibility it will have the FCC will make the banks nervous.

There have been times in the past when maybe the FCC has been a little too lenient when it has lent money. Quite frankly there was a period of time a few years ago when the FCC was seen as the lender of last resort. Probably some of the files it started at that time, we can say with hindsight now, were not good investments.

As the previous speaker just said, some chartered banks are lending money to agrifood operations at less than prime. If some changes in the Farm Credit Corporation can bring a bit more reality to the chartered banks and other lending institutions and therefore a little more support to agrifood and the farm community, it is way overdue. That should take place.

I become very upset every week when I get calls at my office from farm businesses that are struggling. They are working hard. They are doing the best job they can do and they say, basically with no notice, that their bankers phone them up and say their operating loans are cut. They just start tightening that old vice and the first thing we know they have restricted business to the stage that it just cannot survive any longer and we have lost it. Not only have the people lost their incomes. We in the agrifood industry in Canada have lost that input and that production.

There are a couple of places where there should be some improvements. I am not at all happy with the fact that there really is not a proviso in the legislation, unless I have missed it, for an appeal board for people who are not happy with the way they have been dealt with. I think that provision should be there.

If there are to be twelve members or directors in total, one being the chairman, one being the president and ten being directors, three of those directors should definitely be primary producers. That stipulation should be included in the make-up of the board of directors. I am not saying it would not happen, but I think the industry and I would feel more comfortable if it were there.

I have discussed the next one with the minister in the last few minutes. I do not know what the answer is. It is being checked out, but I think we should follow it up. I know there is concern—it is a concern of mine and of some other people I have talked to since this legislation has been out there—that this legislation makes farm credit loans available not only to Canadian citizens or landed immigrants but to non-Canadians and non-landed immigrants.

People could come into Canada from another country and avail themselves of the benefits of the Farm Credit Corporation. I do not know where that fits in as far as the charter is concerned and what that would do, but it definitely does concern me and others who have brought it to my attention. In a nut-shell the feeling is that Farm Credit Corporation loans should be available only to Canadian citizens or landed immigrants.

I do not have any other comments I would like to make. This is a move in the right direction. It is a little overdue. The industry needs a lot of help. There is a lot of uncertainty, uncertainty whether it be over GATT, whether it be over the future of the Western Grain Transportation Act, whether it be over the future as to whether barley will be in or out of the Canadian Wheat Board. I could go on and on.

Farmers want some more certainty. This is a piece of legislation that can start giving that. I stress again that I feel very strongly it should go to committee for a bit of work there and then back to the House in the not too distant future. Mr. Speaker, as you said, I will share the rest of my time with my colleague from Kent.

• (1740)

Mr. Rex Crawford (Kent): Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to rise today during debate on Bill C-95 respecting the Farm Credit Corporation Act.

I am personally inclined to support this bill, especially since many of the changes proposed in it are the result of the farm finance task force. Farmers have had input into this bill and I believe that on the whole they are in favour of it.

The major concern I have with Bill C-95 is the fact that it will seem to act just like a bank. The Farm Credit Corporation should be there for farmers. It is a lending institution of last resort.

If Farm Credit Corporation offers interest rates at the same or even higher levels than banks, what is the point of having a separate organization for farmers? I say that as a farmer. I have seen too many farmers go bankrupt in my day for many reasons, not the least of which being that the banks and farm credit were unwilling to take a risk and lend to a farmer in trouble.

Yes, the money has to come from somewhere, and I would be the first to applaud greater efficiency in the use of tax dollars. Farm credit uses tax dollars while banks do not, but we must support our farmers. They are faced with Mother Nature, low commodity prices and global competition. We ought to use every means possible to ensure that Canada remains self-sufficient in food and retains the ability to export quality grains and oilseeds to world markets.

I think that a lot of people in Canada need educating on the importance and greatness of agriculture. Too many take it for granted. They go to a restaurant, shop at a grocery store and perhaps never once think about how that food got there in the first place.

Canadians would dramatically increase their appreciation of agriculture the day our farmers shut down and we were faced with a famine or food shelves were not stocked the way they were used to seeing them. This is not Russia; this is Canada. We must maintain and improve our farmers' ability to grow crops and food while helping to ensure a fair market price.

One of the things I favour with this new Bill C-95 is the fact it will allow farm credit greater flexibility in long-term financing. This is so important to farmers because no loan officer can base their figures on one, two or even three crop years.

If that were the case, no farmer would ever get a loan as they could be faced with drought one year and floods the next. We see that in my own riding of Kent. It seems to me that the aim of Bill C-95 is to extend and strengthen the mandate of the Farm Credit Corporation. Market conditions and the farming economy in the nineties are much different from those in the fifties and sixties.

We are competing in a global market so this legislation must have a global outlook. Today there is more emphasis on added value in the agrifood sector. This is an important departure from the existing Farm Credit Act which only allows the FCC to lend money for agricultural purposes.

For example, farm syndicates would now be eligible for FCC loans. As well, the expansion of financial services as outlined in this new bill will permit loans to people who lease farm land but do not own it. This is an important addition. If our farm land is being used for agricultural activities we ought to help the farmer to the greatest extent possible, even if he is just leasing the land. He is making good use of the land so the farm credit option should be available to him. Bill C-95 does that.

One thing that should be clarified is that the new legislation does not require farmers to be Canadian citizens to get an FCC loan. Why not? It is Canadian tax dollars used on Canadian farms. Is this the new globalization when foreigners can buy up our land and then be eligible for loans? I would like to know the government's thinking on that one.

The Liberal Party believes that an FCC loan should be available to a Canadian citizen or a landed immigrant.

Something brand new in this bill is the notion of giving the FCC the power to make guaranteed loans to farmers or a group of farmers for business related to their farming operation to allow value added production. Bill C-95 expands the availability of financial services to this kind of production. The loan would be conditional on proof that the input is going into farm production and where the output is part of farm production.

As long as the inputs and outputs of a diversified operation can be seen clearly, the proposed legislation will allow the FCC to provide a loan to a business located off the farm but within the rural sector.

Under the law presently in place the FCC could only make a loan to a business venture on the farm, but subclause 4(1) of the bill does not come right out and say that the value added part of the farm operation must be located in rural Canada to get an FCC loan. The legislation does not set any boundaries on population size to distinguish between rural and urban centres and yet this same subclause says the bill is for the benefit of rural Canada. Why is there not a clarification on that?

The original mandate of the Farm Credit Corporation was to lend money for agricultural purposes only. Bill C-95 is a significant departure from this. The new bill proposes to include loans to farm businesses that diversify beyond the farm gate for value added production.

I feel the result of this move while logical at first glance could mean a large percentage of FCC funds being transferred away from helping our primary producers and instead to further value added production facilities.

Clause 4(2)(a)(iv) fails to explain how the FCC will deal with problems which could arise when dealing with laws under provincial jurisdiction. For example, if a farmer obtains an FCC loan to diversify into ethanol production and then later he decides to diversify again into the distribution of ethanol blended fuels, how can we justify FCC financed oil tanks on farm land zoned as agricultural?

There are still kinks to be worked out in this bill. That may come through actual implementation.

One of the major changes in the proposed legislation is found in subclause 4(2)(g) which gives the FCC board the power to set interest rates charged on loans. Under the current law it takes six to seven days for the Governor in Council to set interest rates and fees for guarantees. Now FCC loans charge a higher rate of interest than the banks in keeping with the greater risk of farm loans.

We still must address the real problem which is the government's economic policy. Even though the FCC increased its lending by 86 per cent last year, it continues to lose market share to banks and credit unions. Many banks have adapted well to the marketplace with agricultural specialists, regional head offices and bank managers trained in farming pursuits.

Something that bears closer scrutiny is that under subclause 4(2)(h) the FCC must operate on a break-even basis. No farm credit program will be allowed if it is losing money. The only way the FCC could operate a money losing program would be for the federal government to provide farm credit with equalizing payments.

Something that is a positive move is the reduction debt to equity ratio. The current debt to equity ratio is 25 to 1. Subclause 12(3)(b) imposes a limit on liabilities to 12 to 1.

Under the current legislation the FCC would be allowed to borrow up to $28 billion, whereas under the new rules the FCC would be limited to between $13.5 billion and $16.8 billion. The reason behind increasing the FCC's capital limit and imposing a lower limit on liabilities is that the government is interested in Farm Credit growing through its own profits like any other private corporation. I certainly do not have any problem with that.

We are all very aware of the problems with agriculture today. The number of family farms has dropped steadily over the years with roughly 280,000 farms remaining today, down 13,000 from 1986.

• (1750)

The total farm debt has reached a staggering $23 billion. The ability to repay that debt is compounded by a farmer's low income. In 1991 farm bankruptcies reached 441, double the number from 1980. It is amazing to note that the average Canadian farmer has about $525,000 invested in the farm, yet only realizes $15,707 in annual farm income, of which over half is producer support payments by the Canadian taxpayer.

The GATT discussions are very important to farmers, especially in my area of southwestern Ontario. The future of supply management is in doubt. Marketing boards account for over a quarter of total farm cash receipts and supports 38,000 farm families.

We have a grain subsidy war on our hands and I know the new Minister of Agriculture shares our concerns. He knows that the impact of the grain subsidy war on the price of Canadian grain between 1985 and 1990 resulted in the loss of $4.7 billion in farm revenues on the export of 90 million tonnes of grain. Now under the free trade agreement we have opened the border to U.S. wheat.

I believe that the FTA failed to protect traditional Canadian grain markets from U.S. subsidy programs such as the Export Enhancement Program. According to the Canadian Grains Council, between 1985 and 1990 the EEP has resulted in the loss of $2.5 billion in grain sales.

In conclusion, the level of desperation in rural Canada is increasing tenfold. As established farms face foreclosure, farm families are under tremendous stress and rural communities are in decline.

Bill C-95 goes some way to increasing the flexibility required to handle the unique needs of the farmer. It moves the system into the globally competitive nineties. If in the long run it helps farmers more effectively and efficiently than the old Farm Credit Act, then I am all for it. Despite some of its imperfections, I am pleased to support Bill C-95.

Mr. Jordan: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I notice our colleague from Saint-Denis has joined us. I just wanted to remind all sides of the House that he has been here a long time.

It was 29 years ago today that our colleague from Saint-Denis was first elected to the House of Commons. He is one of the senior members. In a by-election on February 10, 1964 this very shy and reserved man who is reluctant to speak very often came to the House of Commons. I have a lot of admiration for him, the rather multi-dimensioned guy that he is.

I am sure that all sides of the House would like to congratulate our colleague from Saint-Denis as he starts the second half of his political career.

Mr. Boyer: I rise on the same point of order, Mr. Speaker. In recognition of the dean of the House, I would like to say on behalf of Progressive Conservative members and certainly myself that ever since being in this House the hon. member has been if not an institution at least a very familiar part of the scene and the setting, the debate and the mood that is always created here by his participation and his guidance.

It is not only for his 29 years of service in the House of Commons that he is recognized as dean of the House, it is also his contribution to the public debate of our country, as well as the years of long service.

I can remember as a student at Carleton University in the mid-1960s joining with some other young Liberals, and I think even a few young New Democrats, in an organization of young Canadians interested in politics. We held a meeting at the Chateau Laurier Hotel. In came this effervescent young member of Parliament and he was introduced as the newly elected member for Saint-Denis. That was my first encounter with the hon. gentleman.

The point of order was introduced with a reference to the first half of his political career which is now 29 years in the House.

The riding of Saint-Denis has grown accustomed to longevity in its elected representatives. The hon. member's predecessor, Azellus Denis, was first elected to this House of Commons in 1935. He served here for a full 28 years as well. When Mr. Denis retired from this place, he went on to the other place, the red chamber along the corridor and served there for another 28 years. He found political heaven after and on the basis of that, I think the incumbent for Saint–Denis is already one year overdue to find his reward in political heaven.

Wherever that might be and with whomever he might associate as a colleague, they will be as fortunate as those of us who are currently members of this Parliament to be present with the hon. member who has brought a lot of distinction as well as good humour, wisdom and passion to the public affairs of our country.

Mr. Althouse: Mr. Speaker, I would like to join my colleagues in congratulating the hon. member for Saint–Denis on his anniversary. I do not envy him his 28 years. It is not something I anticipate for myself but I do appreciate the hon. member and the contributions he makes.

Those of us who have come in after him particularly appreciate the very kind way he has of making new members feel comfortable when they first arrive. He was one of the first members I recall running into. I imagine it is just part of his personality that he greets all new members. He probably does not even remember, but it was very much appreciated to have one of the long–standing members welcome me to the Hill, someone from the other end of the country so to speak.

At that time he was quite close to the then Prime Minister. I think he was his parliamentary secretary. He was one of the members who travelled a great deal for three or four years. He kept Canada in front of a lot of countries. I am sure with his personality and his elegance he made a fine impression on all he met on behalf of Canada.

The member has been a credit to the House. While it is up to him whether he wishes to stay another 28 years, I am sure that he has been looking down the hall at the other chamber. I am not sure he will get 28 years there as his predecessor did, but we wish him well at any rate.

[Translation]

Mr. Langlois: Mr. Speaker, I would like to add my comments to those of hon. members who paid tribute to the hon. member for Saint–Denis. When the hon. member started his career in this House, I was a very young man at the time, but I have always appreciated and admired the excellent job done by the hon. member for Saint–Denis. I may add that he has always very ably represented his constituents, the entire Montreal region and of course Quebec as a whole.

As a member of the delegation that attended the canonization of Mother d'Youville in Rome, I had the pleasure of making that trip with the hon. member for Saint–Denis. I must say that the hon. member was very well known in Vatican circles and at the Holy See, and it was a privilege to have him with us on that occasion.

For the past few months I have also had occasion to sit with him on the House Management Committee, where his advice and comments are always of very high calibre and much appreciated. Therefore, on behalf of all Quebec members sitting in this House, I would like to pay tribute to the hon. member of Saint–Denis and wish him a long life in this House. Should he consider continuing his career in another House of Parliament, I would be delighted to support him in this endeavour.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I have another member here.

An hon. member: What does this have to do with agriculture?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Somebody just asked me what this has to do with agriculture. He is going to mention all the agriculture ministers he has met and seen leave.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to join with the House in expressing congratulations to the member for Saint–Denis. I am sure it has nothing to do with the real stuff of agriculture that we are talking about here today. It is about a member who has really made an outstanding contribution to this House.

I think back to the mid–1970s when I had the opportunity of serving as the vice–chairman of the external affairs and national defence committee. The hon. member was the very distinguished chairman of that committee and led it through some very difficult and complicated hearings, not only in Ottawa but outside the country. I came to appreciate his contribution tremendously. I think that he brings a sense of balance and a sense of the best traditions of this House. Often there are issues that seem to be inflamed and a few words from the hon. member seem to cool the situation.

I think the work he has done on the Member's Services Committee is also important because it is not strictly a matter of legality or a matter of quick judgment, but a matter of putting this in that committee in an historical perspective. I think he always does that, certainly with our caucus. Although I have not had an opportunity to attend those meetings, I am sure he brings that same balance and judgment to the deliberations of the committee.

Our time in the House of Commons often is judged not so much by the years but the number of elections. The hon. member has gone through nine elections and that is a great many. I think it is very fitting that if his predecessor had 28 years in the Chamber and 28 years in the Senate then it would be very fitting for this member to serve 29 years in this House and 29 years in the upper House so he would one up him by that amount."

I am sure we have very powerful representatives on the government side who might want to speak to the Prime Minister about this. I know the hon. member is very close to the Prime Minister on issues such as this.

There is another issue this member really brought to the House. I travelled with him on committees dealing with the Constitution in the early 1970s when he was able to put the national perspective with regard to the two founding nations of this country and bring some good will, good sense and judgment. That is not always easy. However, members like the member for Saint-Denis are able to bring out the goodwill that exists on the national level and makes our country really function. He has done a great job in that regard.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I think it would be unfair if we did not let the shy and very modest member from Saint-Denis reply, as he wipes the tears from his eyes.

[Translation]

Mr. Prud'homme: You are right, Mr. Speaker. I must say I am very touched by this tribute from my friends in the House.

[English]

Needless to say, I am thankful to the hon. member for Leeds—Grenville.

[Translation]

Mr. Jordan, which is how I always refer to him, was the first to rise and draw your attention to my presence in the House.

[English]

Yes, indeed, it was a great day then and I want you to know it is still a great day.

I always remember when I was introduced in the House by the Right Hon. Lester B. Pearson, a man for whom I had great respect. My colleague from Algoma, who was last to speak, is a faithful and remarkable successor to Mr. Lester B. Pearson.

When I came into this House I held Mr. Pearson a little bit in order to pay a salute, just a short salute like this, when I passed in front of the Right Hon. John Diefenbaker. It was quite surprising for people. Some say it was even surprising to me, maybe it was nervousness, but I thought that was the only way to act in the great political system called the British parliamentary system. We are not and should not be adversarial all the time.

I am very touched by the kind words of the member for Leeds—Grenville. Yes indeed I remember because I make it a point when I see new members coming in. When I came into this House, I came alone. Everybody thought that I knew everything, but I had to find my way around. I said that if I had a chance to stay longer the first thing I would do is to go and see every member from every party and say: "If you need anything, if I can be helpful, not push, but if I can be helpful I would be honoured and delighted". I have done so and I remember.

I cannot say I remember speaking to the student, but I spoke to many students. I thank the hon. member for Etobicoke—Lakeshore. Yes I think it is a great occasion for parliamentarians to share with the young people of this country, trying to build this country, and we are still trying today.

[Translation]

I would like to thank the hon. member for Manicouagan for his kind words. I have the pleasure of sitting with him on the House management committee and I must say it is a very rewarding experience.

[English]

At the same time, I am still here. Do not announce anything. I hear the good voice of my esteemed colleague who like many here represent exactly the definition of what they call civility. This is something that seems to disappear but civility is important.

[Translation]

Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for giving me these few moments. I was away this afternoon because the duties of a member of Parliament include going to funerals, and that is what I did this morning. I am very rarely absent, but one has an obligation to one's constituents. Elio, a restaurant owner who started his business, incidentally, when I was elected for the first time 29 years ago, lost his mother, so I was at the funeral, and yesterday I attended the funeral of Marcel Léger, a great Quebecer with a great affection for the Acadian people. Reconciliation is still possible.

[English]

If I had to say a very few words to my younger colleague and to Canadians at large I would say that this is a great institution. I am not shy to be a member of Parliament. I am proud to be a member of Parliament of Canada. We should stand up for our noble institution and we should never hesitate to exchange, as I like to do, with each other. We are all elected so we must have a reason to be here. We learn so much from each other.

[Translation]

I think it is essential for parliamentarians to know each other beyond the official speeches, beyond their partisan role playing because we have an incredible task—and thanks to you I can say this—which is to build this country, because it is a country that is evolving, a country that belongs to youth. We have a responsibility to hand it over to them in good shape.

[English]

I appreciate this moment. I thank all my colleagues and you, Mr. Speaker, for your graciousness because I know the subject is agriculture. I would like to say something on agriculture. I never hesitated, as a city boy, to go on a radio hot line to say that if we do not protect our agriculture, we will be dependent on other countries. I do not want my country to be dependent on others. That is why we must make the link not only between colleagues but a link between the people of the city and the country. We must protect the people on the farms. My people, my family, comes from the farm. I know what it is to work hard. We must stand up and talk to people in the cities. It is in their own interest to have a very strong vibrant agriculture in Canada so that we will not be dependent.

• (1810)

I can link the celebration of today, thanks to your graciousness, with the debate that is taking place.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I knew he would come back to agriculture.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): On behalf of all my colleagues in the House, all colleagues here who were not here at this time but were probably watching you on television, we wish you Godspeed, lots of health, and hope it will not be today, but tomorrow or the next day that you will be going to the red chamber.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, it was not very long after the member for Saint-Denis came into this House of Commons that I had the honour to meet him. Before he leaves, I hope he will listen for a moment.

It was at a political convention and he was true to his word. Of course I was involved in agriculture being a farmer. The hon. member for Saint-Denis at that very first convention demonstrated to me an individual who had a very broad outlook on life. I admired and respected him and I can assure him that my admiration and respect continued to build.

I want to say it was an honour in later years to sit with him in this House of Commons as a colleague. If there is anyone in this House who demonstrates the sincerity, passion, elegance and the sense of pride that he spoke about a few moments ago that is clearly understood by this country, it is the member for Saint-Denis.

That is a sense of pride that I believe we as Canadians have to rekindle if we are going to achieve the greatness of which this country is capable.

I too want to add my congratulations to Marcel Prud'homme, the hon. member for Saint-Denis. Marcel, I mean it sincerely.

Bill C-95, the bill before us today, amends the Farm Credit Corporation Act. This act has assisted thousands of farmers, myself included, over the years. I was a client going back a lot of years ago when I first started and later expanded.

It is a good organization and provided a service that was badly needed because back in those times we could not get a mortgage from the banks. I am happy to say that over the term of that mortgage, I believe it was 25 or 30 years, through a lot of scrounging, a lot of improvising and a lot of worry, we were able to meet our commitments. Only once or twice over that time span did we have to ask for a delay, but when we asked we were always granted that request.

I have been upset in more recent years when I see younger farmers struggling to make ends meet. I would like also to point out that we have a lot to look at in this act. As was noted in the report of the Auditor General, this is the second consecutive year the Auditor General did not have sufficient evidence to conclude that the allowance for loan losses, and consequently certain other items in the FCC's financial statement, were fairly presented in accordance with generally accepted accounting principles.

I want to repeat that last part, that the Auditor General found there was insufficient evidence to know if the FCC's financial statements were fairly presented in accordance with generally accepted accounting principles.

I am afraid that this bill may very well lessen the corporation's accountability to Parliament and may well lessen the ability of the Auditor General to investigate the accounting practices of FCC.

I have been approached by many producers, not just from my own constituency, but outside my own constituency. They feel they have been dealt with unfairly by the FCC. They were led to believe that all these people like themselves are malcontents and trouble makers. I am very sorry and shocked to hear this.

Just last week I was contacted by a producer who has been unable to get a proper accounting of his mortgage account history. This is a client of a corporation that has to respond to the Parliament of Canada and he cannot get an accounting. He made repeated requests for the information. Until my office called the local office he was told he could get this information only by filing a court request. Yet when we requested this information we were assured that it was sent. But FCC continues to stonewall and did not send the requested information. It sent some but not what was requested.

I am beginning to feel that on this and previous situations, my role as a member of Parliament may well be infringed upon when I am asked by a constituent or someone outside my riding for specific information and ask for it in writing.

In fact I want to go back a few years to the 1988 five-year plan required by the legislation that was supposed to be tabled in this House within 15 days of the next sitting of Parliament. I had to wait three years for that corporate plan and so did this House. It was not received until nearly three years later. I suggest that my rights as a member of Parliament were infringed upon by not being able to have that information.

This particular producer wants an exception to end the date of mortgage and reamortization application of payment, with the rate of interest and how that interest is calculated in a statement from the FCC, not just a summary of the amount owing. Surely this is not too much to ask from any institution.

I do not see anything in this bill that will ensure that producers have a right to their own information when dealing with FCC. This bill really should be increasing the accountability of FCC to Parliament and to producers, not reducing it. It is most essential that accountability be available to all of the borrowers.

One also has to wonder about the removal of the provision that a future Minister of Agriculture can remove members of the FCC board. If this is so, can the government appoint a new batch of members? I also object to the removal of the stipulation that half the members of the FCC board be agriculture producers.

In another case, an individual who deals on a regular basis with FCC cases sent me a fax the other day with some interesting figures. He did an analysis of information we sent him on request. He points out that the FCC claims to have a 75 per cent rate of success in dealing with the Farm Debt Review Board. However, that figure refers to cases resolved, but resolved does not refer to cases where the applicant is allowed to continue in the business of farming, but the FCC getting some sort of settlement.

In this person's mind the figure is a 72 per cent failure rate in Ontario and a 74 per cent failure rate across Canada, as only 28 per cent and 26 per cent of Farm Debt Review Board cases involving FCC result in the producer being left with a farm operation.

I do not see anything in this bill either that would direct the FCC to deal fairly and openly with the Farm Debt Review Board. All too often I have been running into the FCC using a bait and switch tactic with producers before the Farm Debt Review Board. That is the case where the producer believes they have a deal struck to make a settlement with FCC and makes the financial arrangements to do that from another source only to be told that the deal is all off now. We have something else in mind. The FCC made one deal before the hearing and another deal at the last minute, either after or during the hearing itself.

• (1820)

A constituent of mine whose case I raised primarily in this Chamber, in an attempt to get the FCC to deal fairly with him, wrote me a letter in November 1992 notifying me that 1,350 days after the last Farm Debt Review Board and attempting to reach a settlement with FCC, a court ruled that FCC could not liquidate him without going to court.

I want to read a section of this letter into the record that describes dealing with FCC in flesh and blood terms. I want to point out that this particular client is severely handicapped. He writes:

> As with every major fork in the path the family has been forced to travel, the timing is contrived to enhance the maximum stress damage to the cohesion of the family and the individuals carrying on the struggle.
> To schedule such decisions for Christmastime is no coincidence. It is also no coincidence that in an Ontario Court of Appeal before the proceedings began, the lawyer for FCC called my father a loser while looking at my father and within my father's hearing range.
> That a Crown corporation answerable to the Parliament of Canada, and directed by the Minister of Agriculture, would put a family farm through a war of—5.5 years—that a Crown corporation answerable to the Parliament of Canada and directed by the Minister of Agriculture would spend or lose between $1 to $2 million doing it—are actions that the family demands be stopped, ended, explained, corrected, compensated, published and prevented.

This is another case reported to me. The FCC arrived at the farm gate with several police cruisers just as the children of the affected family were waiting for the school bus. This type of tactic is devastating for the children, the parents and the community. Think of those children trying to explain to the other children in that school bus or at school what a group of police cruisers were doing at their farm gate just as they are going off to school when the Farm Credit Corporation was serving a foreclosure notice.

Such tactics are not acceptable for any organization, let alone an organization that operates under legislation passed in this House and supervised by this institution.

FCC is the largest single holder of land in Canada. I notice that as of December 31, it has acquired over 1,000 properties but it has over 2,500 properties on hand worth $240 million.

When you look at this sort of accumulation of properties, one has to ask about the state of mind of the people who are being forced off the land by this institution through no fault of their own.

The number of properties acquired by FCC from 1986 to 1991 increased from 324 in 1986 to over 1,000 in 1991 alone. The dollar value of properties climbed from $14 million in 1984 to the $240 million I just mentioned. That is an increase of 1,700 per cent.

This is outrageous. I worry about what lies ahead. I am sure the provisions in this bill to allow the FCC to lend money to non-Canadians so that it may dispose of the land that it has accumulated is not coincidental. Land has been accumulated from hard working Canadian farmers who are losing it not because of their own doing but because of government policies and world market conditions over which the individual has no control.

I want to go back to that letter I received in November 1992 asking how "a Crown corporation answerable to the Parliament of Canada and directly responsible to the Minister of Agriculture that put a farm family through a five and half year war with all the stress and that a Crown corporation answerable to the Parliament of Canada and directed by the Minister of Agriculture would lose between $1 and $2 million doing it". These are actions that this particular family demand be stopped, ended, explained, corrected, compensated for and certainly be prevented in the future.

We know that times are difficult. I spoke in this House yesterday on the direction agriculture is going in the world today and that more and more huge corporations are taking over the world's food production. We see it in Canada now with two of these firms involved. I have to worry about what is going to happen not to these farmers who are having their battles now but also in the years ahead.

I suggest that we cannot hide our heads in the sand and ignore that this problem exists. As Canadians who have watched the situation develop we have to recognize it and force it to a halt. We have to make sure that food producing and processing in Canada becomes a matter of national security. I also suggest that the cases I spoke about are going to continue to multiply until such time as the Canadian producer receives a fair share of the Canadian consumer's food dollar. That does not exist at the present time.

Mr. Bob Kilger (Stormont—Dundas): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to speak briefly to Bill C-95. I want to address a specific area of concern relating to this bill that is found in clause 4(1). I would just like to quote it.

> The purpose of the Corporation is to enhance rural Canada by providing specialized and personalized financial services to farming operations and to those businesses in rural Canada that are related to farming.

I am well aware, as are colleagues from both sides of the House who spoke previously, about the tremendous amount of anxiety in the rural agricultural community and the need for any amount of support, particularly at this time of tremendous need.

Next to my riding of Stormont—Dundas, is the riding of my good friend and neighbour the member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell. We have a very pro-active group called the Seaway Valley Energy Co-operative that has been working very hard toward constructing an ethanol plant in the Cornwall area.

Cornwall is not in a rural area. It is a small community of approximately 47,000 people and as such would qualify, I am sure, as a small yet urban centre. We have an opportunity in partnership to recognize the needs of our agriculture community and the potential an ethanol plant would present for both the agricultural sector and job creation in the urban centre of Cornwall.

More specifically there is one site where regrettably a closure took place late last year. This particular plant offers a very sound potential site for the location of such a project. I have some serious concerns that without a clearer definition, specifically, what is a rural sector?

• (1830)

I would hope if the Seaway Valley Farmers Energy Co-operative people wish to make a request to the FCC for funding that they not find themselves being disqualified on the basis of the plant itself being located just adjacent to our rural area, but being of course situated yet in the city of Cornwall in an urban setting.

I might add that last week Mr. Robert Smith who is the president of this Seaway Valley Farmers Energy Co-operative Group, received some positive news from the province which allocated some funds for a feasiblity study. We would hope that in fact this is only the beginning but certainly a step in the right direction for this initiative which would serve the needs of the rural sector of my riding and also the need for good employment opportunities in the city of Cornwall.

I do not want to delay the debate any longer. We welcome this piece of legislation and we recognize the need. Certainly any assistance that can come forward to our agriculture community at this time certainly is well appreciated by all of those stakeholders.

Once again I would hope that we would be able to clarify in that particular section of the bill as to what the interpretation might be if in fact someone came forward and asked for assistance for a loan or for a project which will go a long way into assisting particularly our corn growers and so on. At the same time it is a tremendous positive input into areas related to our environment and of course in the area of employment. I welcome this opportunity to put this on the record.

Mr. Jerry Pickard (Essex—Kent): Mr. Speaker, it is a privilege for me to stand here today and debate Bill C-95, the Farm Credit Corporation Act.

Farm groups across this country and farmers themselves have over the last several years experienced drastic economic problems. There is no question that all we have to do is look at the financial record of what has been going on to see a real need to revamp or change our financial institutions which do serve us, the farmer in this country.

I do support the move to change some of the financing institutions. I certainly would like to see a guarantee of better interest rates, a guarantee of more money and a guarantee of better financial situations for our farm community. All one has to do is realize that the total farm debt in Canada today has reached a staggering $23 billion. The total net farm income was 53 per cent lower in 1991 than it was in 1989.

In 1991 there were 441 bankruptcies. The average farm family income in 1990 was $36,900 of which only 42 per cent, $15,700, was earned on the farm. We can see in that situation off farm income provided the farm community with a much higher income than the farmer working on the farm with an investment of $1,000, $2,000, $3,000 or $100,000 could make. It really is a sad situation that we see today with extremely low commodity prices.

We see a very difficult time suffered by the farm community and not a great deal done to help ease that situation.

Many farmers in my riding really face the fact that bankers, the Farm Credit Corporation and many others have put extreme pressure on them because they are not able to service that debt on many farms.

The average Canadian farmer has roughly $525,000 invested in his farm and he realizes only $15,000 of income from that huge investment. The economic statement of 1992 cut $63 million from the western grain transportation costing the farmer a great deal more money.

The future of supply management which accounts for 28 per cent of the total farm cash receipts and supports 38,000 farm families is currently at risk because of the negotiations at GATT. That causes a tremendous amount of concern in those supply management farm families who are so concerned about the status of their livelihood today and in the future.

We really have failed that farm community as a government. We failed the farm community at the federal level. We failed the farm community at the provincial level seeing year after year very difficult structural problems.

Then, looking at some of the free trade negotiations, they really failed to protect the Canadian grain farmer from subsidy programs that the U.S. supports its farmers with. The NAFTA right now is causing a tremendous amount of threat to many of our basic producers.

As we look at the income side of farming, we see a dramatic problem that I believe this government has to address. I am pleased at this point to say that possibly there is some address here to the side of financing in the farm. There is still going to be a problem if this bill passes of raising moneys on the farming situations that we see today to pay those loans the Farm Credit Corporation may be giving our farmers.

Farm groups seem to be satisfied with many of the proposals that have come down in this piece of legislation. Therefore I feel that we should in this House support that piece of legislation. However there are some difficulties and I think those difficulties may be more clear when we start to look at the expanding practices of loans that may come about with this legislation.

The proposed bill will certainly create an over-all boader focus in the farm community and financing will be available to, as one of my colleagues stated earlier today, some cottage industry on the farm, support processing in the farm community or other activities that will be going on as diversified businesses in farming operations.

I think a great concern must be said about the numbers of dollars that are going to be available for the farm community. Will they be as high after this bill passes as they were before? I have my concerns if these loans become too diversified and move too far away from the basic producer, the basic producer may not have the access to loans that he previously would have had under this piece of legislation.

There are some areas of this new legislation that must be clarified. Does it require farmers to be Canadian citizens? As long as the input and output diversification operations are clearly identifiable the purpose of the legislation will permit the FCC to provide loans to businesses in off-farm rural sectors. However will these off-farm rural sectors start to become operations in the middle of metropolitan Toronto? Could they possibly become operations which may be moved into the urban sector and leave the rural sector in a difficult situation? Certainly, I talk about very, very large centering areas that I may have a great deal of concern about. I would hate to see corporations like Campbells, Heinz, and other large institutions find it more advantageous to locate in metropolitan Toronto than locating in the rural communities where they are today.

• (1840)

I certainly realize that they have moved out of a smaller community to move into that area, which does cause me some concern. Certainly it is not to get their base product from the rural community. It is looking more at possibly importing tomato paste to move into a metropolitan area in order to service that way.

I also have some concern about loss of operations within the rural sector, within the rural communities, moving more to the large metropolitan areas.

In looking at the legislation. I believe that setting interest rates is very important. I hope as we look at the new board and its individual powers that it will take very careful consideration to be competitive with the banking institutions that we have in this country and have competitive rates for the farm community.

One of the problems that I have seen in the past few years is the increasingly higher and higher rates that farmers have had to pay to service loans. That has become a very important problem in dealing with the structural debt that farmers face. It is my hope that with the new structure they will be able to handle farm debt and keep interest rates in line with most lending institutions, banks, or even give the farmers a bit of a break in that area.

My final concern is that the Farm Credit Corporation will become very independent, as I see the structure being created. The 12-member board will be appointed by the government but there is no area within the legislation to take away or alter those appointments at a later date. I know of nothing in the legislation which would allow changes to occur in those appointments after they are made, which causes me a bit of concern about how independent and almost self-serving that board may become in the future. This may create some difficulty, a board that could not be controlled otherwise.

I appreciate speaking on this bill today.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I believe that is all for this afternoon.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Cardiff: Mr. Speaker, the government would be quite prepared to move forward with this bill if the House so desires to Committee of the Whole. However if that does not receive unanimous consent it will go to a legislative committee.

Mr. Foster: Mr. Speaker, we would prefer to see it go to a legislative committee as provided in the order.

Mr. Cardiff: In that case, Mr. Speaker, as it is only 6:45 p.m. we could move into Private Members' Hour, if that is the disposition of the House.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Natural Resource envelope.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I will call it seven o'clock. It being seven o'clock p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 30(6) the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

FINANCIAL ADMINISTRATION ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed from Monday, November 30, 1992, consideration of the motion of Mr. Crawford that Bill C-301, an act to amend the Financial Administration Act (financial information), be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Economics envelope.

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I am honoured to take part in the debate tonight on the bill put forward by my colleague the hon. member for Kent, Bill C-301.

I want to commend him on the work he has done on this bill. I see a need for such a bill. I did not only recognize this need as a member of Parliament but as a taxpayer before I ever became a member of Parliament. We always shuddered when we thought of some of the waste that was reported in the Auditor General's report.

If passed this bill with its innocuous sounding title, an act to amend the Financial Administration Act, it would radically change the manner in which the Canadian government spends its money.

The bill is a common sense bill, as my colleague from Kent says. It only makes common sense that there should be a a bill like this in the statutes of this institution because it would ensure the strict monitoring of spending by the federal government, particularly in the areas of project cost overruns.

This bill would require long-term planning on the part of cabinet ministers. They would be required to present to Parliament a detailed report showing the objectives of any proposal, the costs, the method by which this cost had been computed and its effects on the economy, the environment, employment and social programs.

Too often money for proposals is announced before the specifics of the proposal are known. This often leads to cost overruns and inflated price tags.

The Auditor General, in tabling his second report on government operations, said we needed truth in budgeting. He said: "Too often Parliament is asked for spending approval in advance with no idea what the final tab will be. Things are done on a two-step basis, a little bit now and a little bit later. We want to get away from that".

This bill would fulfil the Auditor General's intent to have truth in budgeting.

If we examine the reports of the Auditor General over the last few years we can certainly see the need for such legislation. For example, in 1991 it reported that science, industry and technology gave out $28 million to companies involved in the defence industry productivity program rather than let it lapse at the end of the year. Then it reported later that the companies involved had never asked for the money nor did they realize why they were receiving it. This is ridiculous.

This bill we are debating here this evening would stop this kind of year-end spending. If we have money left let us return it to the Treasury rather than spending it or losing it in next year's budget. We might need it next year. This attitude is prevalent in the bureaucracy.

This bill would also address situations such as one discovered by the Auditor General involving Transport Canada. In October 1988 Transport Canada entered into a 41-year lease agreement with a developer for construction of a $20 million hotel adjacent to Halifax International Airport. This project has since been terminated and only a foundation has been constructed because the department did not verify the company's financing arrangements. Important revenues were lost and future liabilities concerning this land will remain with the department.

If the department had followed the process outlined in this bill in all likelihood the error would have been caught.

• (1850)

I would like to offer another example from the Auditor General's 1990 report that shows why it is important that ministers, not just departments, are covered by this bill. The Auditor General found in 1990 that the Laprade Fund had been inappropriately managed since 1987 when authority for the fund was transferred to the Department of Regional Industrial Expansion, now the Department of Science and Technology.

In 1986, $87.3 million was set aside for contributions to economic development projects that would create permanent jobs. Approval for the funding of these projects was left in the hands of the departmental minister and one other minister. The Auditor General found that there were cases in which the ministerial approval given, the level of support given, was more than department analysis identified as necessary for that particular project to proceed.

The Auditor General also found that in one case the project was split in two and as a result received double the amount of funding approved. It is also interesting to note that all project funding went into ridings held by government members, which can only be classified as patronage.

Another boondoggle that might never have occurred if all government spending was required to be approved by the rigourous process proposed in Bill C-301 is that of the case of sky-rocketing computers.

In his 1989 report the Auditor General found that the on-line secure information communication systems program had cost overruns of close to $100 million. The project was budgeted to cost $111 million. As a result of the fact that performance specifications were not included in the contract for the project's automated switching system the budget increased to $208.6 million in 1989.

In his 1991 report the Auditor General noted that in spite of warnings in 1987 and its inclusion in the 1989 report this particular project was not operating and the cost was an additional $53 million.

Lastly I would like to point out that if implemented this bill would stop the awarding of polling contracts without scrutiny by Parliament. It was reported in The Ottawa Citizen on January 15, 1993 that $3.2 million in polling contracts were awarded without competitive bids. It was also reported that in some instances contracts were signed after the surveys were done and the pollsters had submitted their bills.

According to The Ottawa Citizen most of the work went to two firms, Decima Research and Anderson Strategic Research. Both firms had close ties to the government. It is to put an end to such practices that a bill such as Bill C-301 is needed.

In conclusion, I would not deny that this bill requires some amendment, perhaps in committee, and that some of the details will need to be ironed out. However the principle and intent of this bill is sound. Therefore I am proud to be supporting this bill and encourage all members on all sides of the House of Commons to do likewise because, as the member for Kent says, this bill is indeed a common sense bill.

[Translation]

Mr. Vincent Della Noce (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State and to Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to speak to Bill C-301, an act to amend the Financial Administration Act.

First of all I must say that as far as I can see the purpose of this bill is to embarrass the government by shortening the time frame for the tabling of public accounts. For instance, the bill proposes that these should be tabled in October instead of December and that the Auditor General have the authority to comment on long-term planning. I listened very carefully to the hon. member who spoke before and who referred to this bill as a common-sense bill and a measure for expenditure control.

I am sure that in the House spending control has been dear to the hearts of all parliamentarians for the past 40 years. However, as hon. members are aware, it is not always easy.

It is high time the House considered this bill, which was given first reading on October 24, 1991. Hon. members have had plenty of time to analyse its implications.

Before considering the amendments proposed by the hon. member for Kent, perhaps I might briefly recall the history of this act, which dates back to 1951. It is still a very important piece of legislation and regulates a large part of the internal operations of government that form the basis for its financial administration and public-sector accounting.

To ensure the legislation remained appropriate to the needs of a government constantly adjusting to today's modern and complex world, the act has been amended on several occasions. On the last of these occasions, in May 1991, an in-depth review of the act resulted in amendments to some 70 sections.

The amendments were a response to recommendations by the Auditor General, to which the hon. member referred earlier. The Auditor General had made several recommendations. Recommendations were also made by the Standing Committee on Public Accounts and the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance. The purpose of all this was to simplify the administration of public finances and bring it into line with private sector practice, to reduce the paper burden by taking advantage of computer applications—now everything is computerized to clarify certain terms both in English and in French and, last but not least, to save taxpayers money. I am sure parliamentarians on both sides of the House will agree with these goals.

However, the amendments being proposed today do not fit that mould. They are basically concerned with three aspects: the special warrants issued by order of the Governor in Council and subject to his signature, long-term planning, and the date for tabling public accounts.

As I said earlier, it is not always easy to table public accounts. As hon. members are aware, there are times when public accounts are always being held up by one of the departments. They are also aimed at providing Parliament with more specific information on the way public money is spent and bringing the time frame for tabling the accounts more into line with practice in large publicly-owned companies.

Although at first glance these amendments seem to be desirable, I do not think it would be appropriate to adopt them. It would not be reasonable to set conditions that would inhibit the ability of the government to govern effectively and to provide accurate and quality information to this House. Let me explain.

Let us consider the first condition, which concerns subsection 30(3) of the Act. It deals with special warrants, issued by order of the Governor in Council and signed by him, to authorize payment of funds from the Treasury. The amendment to this subsection would provide that for every warrant, in addition to a detailed statement of the purposes to which the payment was applied, there should be a statement indicating the amount and the reason for the urgency.

I would remind the House that these warrants can be issued to provide the government with funds only when three conditions have been met. First of all, Parliament must not be in session. Second, there are payments to be made which are urgently required for the public good. Third, there is no appropriation to which the payment may be charged.

Some members of this House are concerned about the irresponsible use of these warrants. Actually, they are seldom used, since the occasions on which all three conditions are met are few and far between. The last time the government resorted to the use of special warrants was in 1989 in a rather unusual situation. Members will recall that following the 1988 election Parliament sat for only three weeks. Before it adjourned, however, the House had been informed of the need for further supply in the 1988-89 fiscal year. The government tabled supplementary estimates on December 16, 1988.

Later, when Parliament was not sitting, the government asked the Governor in Council to issue four warrants, on January 19, February 16, March 23 and April 1. Parliament was recalled on April 3.

Issuing these four warrants when Parliament was not in session was not at all different from the nine other cases when such warrants were issued since the Financial Administration Act was passed in 1951, 42 years ago. Considering that all in all successive governments have issued such special warrants only 13 times, we cannot really say that the system has been abused. I believe that I can also say in all good faith that in the case with which we are concerned, the government acted responsibly in using public funds and respected the spirit and the letter of the Financial Administration Act.

The other point I would like to dwell on concerns the date when the public accounts should be submitted to Parliament. Bill C-301 would make the time limit for presenting them October instead of December.

I would remind you briefly that the public accounts show the spending on each item, government revenues and other payments credited or charged to the Treasury. They are reported to this House by the President of the Treasury Board no later than December 31 following the fiscal year-end, or if the House is not sitting, within 15 sitting days of that date.

Under the proposed amendment, subsection 64(1) of the act would be changed so that the date would be October 30 instead of December 31.

The government fully realizes that the deadline of December 31 for submitting the public accounts to Parliament is late. By then nine months have passed since the fiscal year-end. The question we might ask is whether it really takes nine months to report Canada's financial situation.

The government is the first to admit that this delay is too long. That is why it has always given high priority to having the public accounts tabled well before that deadline. Indeed, in six of the last ten years, the public accounts were tabled in the first week of November. However, we think it would be pointless to set the highly desirable deadline of October 30 in the act, and here is why.

The information in the public accounts requires a great deal of thorough, time-consuming research. This research is delayed and hindered by all kinds of difficulties. Also, the information in the public accounts comes from the departmental accounts which are not closed until two or three months after the fiscal year-end.

The departments and Treasury Board are not responsible for other difficulties that are due to circumstances beyond our control. For example, it sometimes happens that certain points are discussed with the Auditor General's office and are not settled until he tables his report. In the past this report has been tabled in October, but it has also not been tabled until the end of November, as it was this year.

The process for drawing up the public accounts is both long and painstaking. It is detailed work and moving up the deadline for tabling the public accounts by nearly two months would only compromise the process.

I note that I do not have much time left. In a way the purpose of this bill is much more to embarrass the government than to come up with good figures. That is why I would ask the House not to go ahead and pass this bill because its purpose is much more to embarrass the government than to have accurate financial statements.

[English]

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, it is a privilege to rise on behalf of the New Democratic Party and lend our support to Bill C-301, brought forward by our colleague from Kent. It is indeed a rare occasion that a private member's bill gets this far. One that has been labelled a common sense bill, it is only appropriate that it gets this far, and let us hope that it gets a little bit farther. I will start by dealing with what I consider to be some negatives for 30 seconds and then get on with 9 minutes plus of positives.

As the previous member indicated, I suspect this is going to take some more time for the government. It is going to create more work for the Auditor General. It is going to be a continual internal audit on behalf of the government. It may have to create more bureaucracy to deal with the mechanics of the bill, but the bottom line is that it will bring forward fiscal responsibility and accountability. We know the public demands those now.

Indeed it is an appropriate bill. If I may just read one of the clauses so that if anybody is listening he or she can relate to the common sense of the bill, clause 42.2 reads:

> Where the Minister is informed that the cost of a program on which he has laid a statement before Parliament pursuant to section 42.1 will exceed the estimated cost shown in the statement for any year, the Minister shall lay before Parliament a statement showing:
> (a) the amount of the excess cost for the year,
> (b) the reasons for the excess,
> (c) the alternates that have been considered before concluding that the excess is unavoidable.

One might ask for a concrete example or several examples and say: "Does this happen? Just how bad are the overruns when the government loses control of spending?"

I want to cite a statement I made in May 1991 talking about cost accountability at external affairs. It was noted that the estimates for external affairs revealed that between 1987-88 and 1990-91 construction sites in Algiers, Buenos Aires and Tokyo all experienced severe cost overruns.

For Algiers the increase was 169 per cent; for Buenos Aires, a mere 200 per cent; for Tokyo, 478 per cent; the Canadian pavilion in Seville, 50 per cent; the Canadian embassy in Washington, the cost overruns for those buildings out of one department of this government was $102 million. To go from the ridiculous to the sublime, the Canadian government said that it had to put a gate up at its embassy in Washington and that the gate was going to cost $170,000. This is a very special gate. We found out that it was too heavy and that it would not swing so we had to replace the gate. Perhaps that shows some of the fiscal irresponsibility of the government.

It does happen. It happens on a regular basis. What is the problem with making the government fiscally responsible and accountable to Canadian taxpayers? I am sure if they were told about these overruns on a regular basis as they happen they would be horrified. It does continue. We can go to whatever lengths are necessary to bring fiscal responsibility to whatever government happens to be in power at the particular time.

The Museum of Civilization is a classic, something of which Canadians can rightly be proud. In 1982 the estimated cost was to be $80 million. In 1985 it had risen to $122 million. In 1987 it went up another $46 million to $168 million. When we are in so deep we cannot really say: "Well, let us not proceed with this museum"; we have to finish the job. In 1988 it was just another $8 million because the designer of the building said: "Look, this building is more expensive than we thought it would be and I need my royalties to go up a little higher; my charge is going to be a little higher". It was another $8 million. In 1989 the cost of that museum started at $80 million. It finished at $340 million and it is not yet complete.

I was called over there a year and a half ago and they said: "We think the building is leaking". After $340 million, the building could have a leak in it. In fact some said there was a faulty structure and there was danger that the building was going to shake and collapse. Heaven forbid. That is veering off the point, but it went from $80 million to $340 million, a cost overrun of $260 million, and the museum is not yet complete. Once we get in that deep we cannot get out. That is the reality of the situation.

Right at the very end they wanted to get the museum opened so they said: "We had better hurry up and get all these things finished". They had to toss in another $11 million to get it ready for opening day. Unfortunately on opening day some ammonia fumes got into the museum and they had to postpone the opening. I do not know what it cost to get rid of the ammonia and straighten things out. I am sorry to have picked on such a prized structure but nevertheless that is reality. It really points to the fact that a bill like this one would bring direct accountability and fiscal responsibility to the government.

I urge the government side to support the Official Opposition and the New Democratic Party in approving this bill and getting it to committee. Some say it is not perfect. Let us deal with it. Having had a bill destroyed in committee yesterday, I really appreciate that the member would like it at least to get into committee. I think it is a bill worthy of support. It should be retained, studied and supported.

Mr. Bob Hicks (Scarborough East): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to participate in the debate of the motion of the hon. member for Kent. I know he has put a lot of thought into it. I know his heart is in the right place. I would like to make some comments though and draw some attention to some aspects of the particular bill that need particular consideration.

Bill C-301 seeks to amend the Financial Administration Act in three areas: special Governor General's warrants, long-term planning and the tabling of public accounts. Some members may feel this is a worth-while bill to support. However many others will recognize that these changes may not be in the best interest of this House.

Allow me to respond to the concerns of the hon. member with regard to section 30 of the Financial Administration Act which authorizes the use of special Governor General's warrants during periods in which Parliament is not in session.

Members of this House will recall how in May 1989 the House debated the government's use of special Governor General's warrants in the context of the 1989 Main Estimates. At that time the government's actions were not only determined to be in full compliance with the Financial Administration Act, but they were also determined to be fully justified.

The provision to use special Governor General's warrants under prorogation and dissolution has been provided for in our legislation since 1867. In 1951 the first Financial Administration Act was passed. That act broadened the provision to use the warrants during periods when Parliament was under extended adjournment.

The changes made have not fundamentally changed the original criteria governing the use of special Governor General's warrants. They have only clarified the scope of their application. The provisions of the Financial Administration Act which govern the use of special Governor General's warrants sets out three conditions under which the warrants may be used.

They are: Parliament must not be in session because it is dissolved, prorogued or adjourned; payments are to be made which are urgently required for the public good; and there is no other appropriation to which the payment may be charged.

I would like to review for the hon. member the circumstances surrounding the use of Governor General's special warrants in 1989. As most members of this House recall, that session of the 33rd Parliament lasted for almost two years before the general election of November 21, 1988.

Parliament was convened a mere three weeks later to complete the business of the previous Parliament. Even though the Speech from the Throne made it clear the purpose of the opening session was to deal with free trade, the government clearly informed the House of the need for further supply in the 1988-89 fiscal year by tabling Supplementary Estimates (B) on December 16, 1988.

Later when the House adjourned and subsequently prorogued, the government requested the Governor General to approve special warrants in accordance with section 30 of the Financial Administration Act.

The issuing of the four Governor General's special warrants in 1989 cannot be construed in any way to be a breach of rules or convention. Each of the three conditions as required by the Financial Administration Act for the issuing of warrants were satisfied.

The government's use of those special warrants in 1989 was consistent with the nine other instances that special warrants were used since the Financial Administration Act was passed in 1951. The government in no way extended the scope of the special warrants since the items covered by the 1989 warrants were similar to the items financed through Governor General's special warrants in 1979 and again in 1980.

I would like to make some comments regarding the proposed changes to section 30(3) of the Financial Administration Act. These changes would require the President of the Treasury Board to present a detailed statement for each warrant issued within 15 days after the commencement of the next ensuing session of Parliament.

As members of the House are aware, the President of the Treasury Board can attest to this urgency in the report to the Governor in Council. Information regarding the urgency of warrants is not required in the president's report to Parliament.

The question still remains as to whether there is a proven need for Parliament to have this additional measure to monitor expenditures. I suggest that the ministers who are accountable to this House for their decisions are the best judges of whether or not the appropriation is of an urgent nature.

Allow me to state now some observations regarding the proposed changes to section 30(5). As stated in the Financial Administration Act, the issuing of warrants must only occur when urgently required for the public good. It is the government's belief that by changing the definition of adjournment within section 30(5) from 15 days to 90 days we are not acting in the best interests of the public.

It would be a grave mistake to paralyse the government by restricting the ability to issue Governor General's special warrants when Parliament is not in session. In fact, it has been recognized that access to these warrants is necessary from time to time and under carefully delineated circumstances for the good and orderly functioning of the government.

History has demonstrated to us that these warrants have been issued in order to carry out urgent repairs to public buildings or to pay employees their due wages. I am confident that members of the House will realize the need for conducting timely repairs, should they be required, to public properties where the public is served while the House is not in session and to pay employees for doing so.

The next point I wish to address is the proposed addition of sections 42(1) through 42(4) to the Financial Administration Act. This amendment proposes that when new programs are established the government must table information regarding the long-term cost profile of that program as well as give the Auditor General the opportunity to review and to comment on this information.

This proposal has numerous flaws. Perhaps the most critical of these is that the proposed amendment would appear to be in conflict with section 7(d) of the Financial Administration Act. Parliament under section 7(d) has delegated the authority for long-term resource planning to the Treasury Board. This proposal would thus create ambiguity and work toward undermining the role and accountability of Treasury Board as the authority for solid financial planning practices within the government.

• (1920)

A concern also arises from the proposed requirement to table information relating to the establishment of new programs. Such public disclosure may have the effect of jeopardizing the intended result of new programs by impairing the effectiveness of the program delivering mechanism and reducing the benefit to the public. Surely this is not in the best interests of Canadian taxpayers who contribute their hard-earned money toward such programs.

This proposal also calls into question the role of the Auditor General. The proposed amendments significantly alter that role from one of being an important accountability agent within the system of government to one of being an active participant in government decision making. Decisions of this nature are to be made by the ministers.

Similar to auditors in the private sector who provide an opinion to the board of directors and shareholders, the Auditor General's responsibility is to provide an opinion to the Government of Canada and the taxpayers. The responsibility for delivering this opinion is assumed at the end of a specified period of time, not at the point before the period commences. The Auditor General's resources are already well used as it is. Any new responsibilities would only increase the costs of the audit office which are already touching $60 billion per year. This proposal would undermine ministerial responsibility for resource management by introducing another level of governmental decision making.

The government is charged with the responsibility of delivering programs which are deemed to be in the best interests of Canadians. During the development of these programs the government consults with many groups including business and academia to design the best possible programs. The cost of these programs during these times of restraint is a fundamental consideration.

Keeping this in mind, the Comptroller General is already consulted with regard to the sound financial management of governmental programs. There is no need to spend additional taxpayer money to set up a system to second-guess a decision which has been made by those who have the responsibility to make those decisions. I see I am nearly out of time.

An hon. member: Thank goodness.

Mr. Hicks: I regret that these comments were necessary. I regret this to hon. members opposite but I think these observations are necessary and I hope they are taken to heart. As hon. members have assumed by my comments I cannot at this time support the bill.

Mr. Joe Fontana (London East): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be able to rise in the House today to support this private member's bill, Bill C-301, an act to amend the Financial Administration Act as proposed by my colleague for Kent who through this bill has brought some long-awaited fresh air and common sense to this House.

Perhaps, like me, it comes from the member's municipal background where one needed to but could not run deficits and get heavily in debt. In fact you had to balance your budget and be fully accountable for expenditures each and every day to the taxpayers. I believe his roots do come across in this particular bill.

A colleague from Sault Ste. Marie started to talk about the over-expenditures in the Museum of Civilization. After the next election we will probably be putting a lot of Tories in that museum so that future Canadians can view the period between 1985 and 1993 as one of the most dismal in Canadian history, but we will let the electorate look after that.

I want to talk about a different perspective on this bill because it embodies the real essence in the purpose of what private members' bills are all about. It speaks for the people of Canada and to a government that no longer listens.

Listening to government members I have found it rather curious that it would be the Conservatives who are voting against the bill for fiscal responsibility and the Liberals and the NDP who are proposing the bill for fiscal responsibility. One would think the government would be in favour of such a bill.

Bill C-301 is a call for the federal government to be accountable to the people of Canada for the tax dollars that it spends. The federal government's yearly tabling of the budget and the accompanying estimates is no longer sufficient to accountability. The tabling of the budget and the estimates only provides for a minimal amount of debate by members of Parliament.

I believe that the Prime Minister and his cabinet are the key decision makers and that members of Parliament are really sitting on the sidelines giving brief comments on the most important decisions that the federal government makes each year.

The Auditor General in his recent report concluded: "There is a general widespread breakdown of management controls including fundamental parliamentary controls. Canadians are worried about the impact of the annual deficit and the accumulated national debt on their standard of living".

That statement rings true in many respects. This bill does not only address the issue of the government's accountability to the people, it also addresses the issue of responsibility. Who is responsible for the fiscal decisions of government? As members sitting in this House, we are accountable to our constituents for these decisions. However, how can we take responsibility when much of the information which is provided to us is not given to us by the decision makers, those in cabinet?

This bill will ensure that members of Parliament can act responsibly for their constituents. Canada is faced with a population that no longer trusts its politicians. We know that. We make promises every time there is an election. We arrive in Ottawa wanting to change things for the better. We are accountable to our constituents who elect us.

How can we fulfil this accountability when the government we represent is not even accountable to us in this Parliament? This bill addresses this concern because it requires the government to cost out fully all the programs and expenditures before they can be implemented. Any cost overruns would require special authorization.

An important implication for this bill is that it will force the government's cabinet ministers to plan for the long term, not the short term for political expediency but for the long term. That is so people will know what the plans are, how much it is going to cost and what in fact the benefits will be to the population.

As parliamentarians we do not want a government introducing sweetheart deals or sweet deals just before an election. I believe the public is sick and tired of that kind of government. We want and they want a government that is fully accountable for the implications on the federal expenditures, the taxpayers' dollars.

This bill forces cabinet ministers to present to Parliament and the people of Canada a detailed account of the cost and the effect on the economy, the environment and the employment of any new program.

All detailed financial statements would also be referred to the Auditor General and the House of Commons public accounts committee for closer inspection.

Let me give an example. We have heard that in the public accounts committee this very day there is a tremendous amount of debate on the GST as to what those numbers really are. The members from this side of the House on that public accounts committee will tell you they are absolutely frustrated in not being able to get the right numbers as to how much GST was collected, how much GST was rebated or credited back and how many tax dollars this government is really taking in by this very bad tax that we intend to eliminate in the next election.

There are some valid points on this particular bill that bring back the whole concept of accountability and responsibility which I believe are the hallmarks of democracy and parliamentary representation.

We are spending tax dollars on behalf of the Canadian public and therefore we must account for our spending practices. As members of Parliament and caretakers of the public purse, we must have the power to do this job effectively. The only way we can do it is for members of Parliament to have meaningful input and meaningful debate on government expenditures, on long-term planning and government tax policies. I believe that this private member's bill will do this.

• (1930)

I compliment my colleague from Kent who I believe has put forward a common sense bill, as he has pointed out. More important, I believe it is a bill that every member of this House should support because it talks about parliamentary reform and making members of Parliament truly what they are, representatives of the people they represent.

Mr. Bob Corbett (Fundy—Royal): Mr. Speaker, I would appreciate some instruction from the Chair as to the time limitations.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member will have 10 minutes. This is a private member's bill. It is 10 minutes debate and there are no questions or comments.

Mr. Corbett: I certainly am pleased to have the opportunity to speak in this debate on Bill C-301 dealing with amendments to the Financial Administration Act. My interest is specifically with regard to the final section of the proposed bill.

At the outset I should relate to the Speaker that I am particularly interested in this bill because it is of specific interest to those in my community who are involved in the small business community.

I think it is terribly important that we have an opportunity to participate in the development of the organization of Canada's economic development in a small business way. Let me say that I think it is important that this bill be given at least a fair hearing in this Chamber. Clause 4 states:

Section 64(1) of the said act is amended by striking out the words "December 31" and substituting therefor the words "October 30".

The change to the Financial Administration Act that is being proposed here is to move forward the deadline for tabling the public accounts from the present date of December 31 to October 30.

I think that there are all kinds of opportunity for all of us to appreciate. We can as small business people and as the small business community particularly can make suggestions to the government as to how it might improve or make things more appropriate from the perspective of dealing with our particular businesses and more substantially from the point of view of how we should deal with our day to day regime.

However, it is also important to recognize that the government has responsibility to the fiscal community as a whole. That is why I would suggest that we have to take into account the entire aspect of this particular bill.

Mr. Speaker, the government, as you are well aware, is always open to new ideas about ways in which management processes can be improved and government can be made more accountable to the Canadian public. These new ideas come from a wide variety of sources. I am sure you are aware, Mr. Speaker, that views are commissioned by the government and come from recommendations of parliamentary committees, one of which I am a member, the transport committee, audits by the Auditor General and in some instances even from members of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition, which we have often said that we were open to. Hopefully we will have an opportunity of hearing more constructive suggestions as we move along.

Today we are debating a suggestion for changing the timing of the tabling of the public accounts which was made by means of a private member's bill put forward by a member of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition, the hon. member for Kent. While we welcome the suggestions of the hon. member and we applaud his diligence in the pursuit of improved management processes in our country we do not always necessarily agree. That is what our democratic society is about and certainly is what this House is about. We do not always agree with ideas that are put forth. This is an excellent opportunity to suggest alternatives.

The hon. member's suggestion to bring forward the tabling debate of the public accounts from December 31 to October 30 is an example of what we on this side of the House, and myself as being a private member, not a member of the government but a member of a party who supports the government, are not in concurrence with. We do not agree with the idea and would like to put forth our reasons why.

In order to understand why we disagree with the hon. member on this point it is important to understand the context in which he is proposing to make changes to the Financial Administration Act.

I should explain that the Financial Administration Act provides the legislative basis for financial management and control in government. I hope that the House will bear with me because I am not a technical person, a technocrat, or someone who is intimately involved with the department. I do not have intimate knowledge but I can only share how I feel about this particular bill. Therefore I will ask the House to bear with me as I go through the process.

The act originated in 1991 and in that year there was passage of Bill C-91, which was entitled an act to amend the Financial Administration Act and other acts in consequence thereof.

That is obviously material that would be well beyond most of our capacities to be able to digest. It is certainly beyond my capacity to digest as an ordinary civilian who is only interested in being the representative of the people in my constituency of Fundy--Royal. The entire concept is something that we should all be concerned about. I know that we should talk about things that are somewhat more considerate of the people who we represent.

Let us go back to things that are entitling us to develop conversations with reference to the bill itself. The delays, which I am told are not important, that we have been encountering in the past years have been primarily caused by external factors mainly beyond government control.

The Auditor General has been involved with things that are of interest to all of us. We should be cognizant of his report. I would suggest that a deadline of October 30 could impede the full resolution of issues that we want to deal with in the House. For this reason I am totally opposed to the tabling deadline of October 30. I would have to vote against any suggestions before the House saying that we should change that deadline to October 30.

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to support my colleague. I certainly wish I could understand what was said by the member prior to me. Perhaps we can look at Hansard in the morning and an editor will have made it cohesive and understandable. I say that in jest. He is our colleague and I think he said at the end of his speech that he truly supports the legislation that my colleague from Kent is putting before this House.

I compliment my colleague from Kent who has brought this legislation forward. He has put this private member's bill through the whole tedious procedure that private member's legislation has to go through. His success on being able to get it on the floor of this House and to have it at this stage is truly a credit to his ability as a parliamentarian and a hard worker. I am truly honoured to be able to call him my colleague.

As I stand in the House I do not see anyone to my left. There are supposed to be 40-some members but there are not many members representing one party here tonight.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I must bring this to the attention of the hon. member. I know he has been around here for a long time so he should not make these types of statements in the House. I am sure hon. members are watching the hon. member on television and they will probably be down here very shortly and getting up on a point of order.

Mr. Comuzzi: Mr. Speaker, I do not think I mentioned any particular group or anyone in particular who was missing. I apologize if I offended the rules of the House.

I want to also compliment my colleague from Kent for the hard work that he has been doing and the leadership he has been providing. He comes from an area of Ontario that is very important in the agricultural industry which is so important to our country. It is sometimes lost in our discussions that Ontario produces the majority of the agricultural product in our country. It is an industry that needs assistance. We know that people in the agricultural industry are frugal in their operations and they would expect that feeling to be carried on in government.

The essence of what we are discussing today can be expressed as accountability and responsibility of government actions when it comes to the spending of the taxpayers' money. It can be summed up best in the speech my colleague from Kent made in the House when he introduced the bill. I would just like to paraphrase some of his words.

He said that the notion of big government not managing our money properly is coming from farmers, factory workers, students, housewives, small business owners and teachers. The list goes on and on. "I hear throughout this country as I travel that members of Parliament on both sides of the House are not paying enough attention to the way that this government overspends. This bill will go a long way toward restoring accountability to federal programs. It is what the people of Canada are telling me. It is what the people of Canada want implemented in so far as spending is concerned".

One of the fundamental reasons for problems that existed as we were beginning to become a nation was that we were upset with the foreign power coming in and providing what I call taxation without representation. That is fundamentally what we have here today. The government takes a program and allows cost overruns in the exorbitant amounts that we have been hearing about today, without having to refer the matter back to the House of Commons for further approval. In essence it is bordering on the statement that elected members of Parliament have no say in how the government is spending its funds. That is just not what was intended in the parliamentary system. My colleague has proposed legislation that is trying to correct the dilemma we find ourselves in.

When we talk about accountability and reliability, I would like to just spend the balance of my time on one issue, the goods and services tax that was introduced.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I think it might be just about time to call it 7.45 p.m.

The time provided for Private Members' Business has now expired. The hon. member will have seven minutes in this debate the next time it comes up.

PETITIONS

VIOLENCE

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Madam Speaker, I have the pleasure to present two petitions, signed by over 1,100 people in my riding of Carleton—Gloucester and surrounding areas.

[English]

These petitioners are as outraged as I am that the serial killer board game, with the object of having players kill as many babies as possible, is allowed to be distributed and sold in Canada.

They call for an immediate ban of this board game and any other material which advocate violence.

[Translation]

I have the honour to support them in this. I congratulate all the petitioners who took part and I ask the government to act on this issue as quickly as possible.

[English]

INCOME TAX ACT

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, it is a pleasure to present a petition on behalf of a number of teachers from central British Columbia, adding to what would be many hundreds of petitioners.

They point out that under the Income Tax Act selected professional groups can deduct or write off dues, equipment or services necessary for the operation of their profession.

They indicate that teachers are precluded from receiving such benefits. They ask the Government of Canada to introduce legislation that would provide equal treatment by amendment to the Income Tax Act so that teachers would be treated in the same way as other professionals.

WATER DIVERSION

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, on another matter the petitioners are by and large from the Kamloops area. They point out their opposition to any possibility of water diversion to the United States.

REQUEST FOR ELIMINATION OF VIOLENCE

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Madam Speaker, I would like to table a petition from Amos, Saint-Félix-de-Dalquier, Saint-Mathieu, Saint-Dominique-du-Rosaire and Preissac in Abitibi. The petitioners say that violent movies on television are dangerous and therefore unacceptable because they incite more violence.

They mention that all toys that incite violent games are unacceptable and should not be made. They also state that freedom of the press should be limited in reporting acts of violence.

Therefore the petitioners humbly ask Parliament to legislate on the above-mentioned points in order to eliminate violence in our society, so as to better protect our children and give all our fellow citizens a better quality of life.

[English]

YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to rise again today to deposit petitions signed by a large number of Canadians in memory of a young girl, namely Rosalynn Dupuis, who died at the hands of a young person.

They ask that the young offenders system be looked at very seriously. Questions concerning the security of people and the way we treat the the accused in serious cases are very much on the minds of Canadians.

It is important that Parliament deal seriously with the matter. We must remember the victims at the end of the process.

BILL C-91

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Madam Speaker, I have the privilege to present two petitions this morning.

The first one deals with the government's Bill C-91. It points out that under Bill C-22 there was an increase in drug prices both to individuals and to provincial pharmacy programs.

They request that the government not proceed with Bill C-91 and repeal Bill C-22.

VIOLENCE

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Madam Speaker, I have a second petition pointing out that many studies have linked the violence in entertainment with the desensitization of our society.

There is growing concern that because of violent games there is a lack of understanding and respect for the humanity of people, particularly when they become victims.

It calls upon the government to make sure that the serial killer board game be banned from sale in Canada.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Madam Speaker, I have two petitions to present this morning, both dealing with the same matter.

The first is signed by some 200 residents of metropolitan Toronto, mainly from the city of Toronto but many in my own constituency. The second is signed by some 75 residents of metropolitan Toronto, mainly from the city of Etobicoke.

Both draw the attention of the House to the fact that two Canadians, Christine Lamont and David Spencer, are presently serving some 28 years in a Brazilian prison.

They express concern and recognize the fact that the only relief available would be for Canada to request the expulsion of those two Canadians by the Government of Brazil. They call on Parliament to urge the Secretary of State for External Affairs to request the Government of Brazil to expel Christine Lamont and David Spencer and return them to Canada.

BILL C-91

Mr. Ron Fisher (Saskatoon—Dundurn): Madam Speaker, it is my honour and duty to present a petition duly authorized under Standing Order 36.

When this petition was drawn up Bill C-91 had not been passed. It asks that the bill not be proceeded with and that Bill C-22, passed in 1987, be repealed. We now have to ask for the repeal of Bill C-91 as well.

The petitioners, who are mostly from the constituency of Saskatoon—Dundurn around the city of Saskatoon, state that when Bill C-22 was passed in 1987 the promise was that drugs would be cheaper and that the government would keep a tight rein on the increase in the price of drugs.

The petitioners said at that time they had no faith in that occurring. That was not the case. I certainly concur with their request that Bill C-91 be repealed, as well as Bill C-22.

CHILD POVERTY

Ms. Barbara Greene (Don Valley North): Madam Speaker, I have six petitions that I would like to table today.

The petitioners call upon Parliament to take the action necessary to reaffirm its commitment to seeking the elimination of poverty among children in Canada by the year 2000 and to develop a plan for the implementation of this commitment.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): Madam Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 433 and 449.

[Text]

Question No. 433—Mr. Skelly (Comox—Alberni):

With respect to resolution No. 1992-44 adopted by the United Nations Commission on Human Rights on March 3, 1992, concerning the rights of indigenous peoples, (a) what comments has the government given to (i) the Working Group of Indigenous Populations of the Subcommission on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities (ii) the Secretary General concerning the draft universal declaration on the rights of indigenous peoples (b) has the government made a financial contribution to the United Nations Voluntary Fund for Indigenous Peoples and, if so, in what amount (c) what steps has the government taken or does it intend-to take to ensure the full participation of indigenous organizations within Canada to participate in the activities related to the tasks of the Working Group of Indigenous Populations (d) has the government provided funding to send delegates to the Indigenous Youth Conference to be held in July 1992 in Quebec City?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): The Working Group of Indigenous Populations (WGIP) has been engaged for the last 10 years in considering standards unique to the rights of indigenous populations. Representatives of indigenous groups have been putting their case to the five experts of the WGIP. These experts, drawing from their legal and human rights background, the experience of indigenous people and the observations of governments, have produced a draft declaration on the rights of indigenous people.

The Government of Canada has played an active and participatory role in the activities of the WGIP. It has the lead in drafting the resolution in the Commission of Human Rights from which the WGIP draws its mandate. The government has also contributed on a regular basis to the indigenous voluntary fund of the human rights centre to enable indigenous representatives from the Third World to attend and participate in the WGIP sessions. These contributions are important for those indigenous groups which do not have the financial means to attend the sessions or those whose attendance is not sanctioned by their governments. Rigoberta Menchu, this year's winner of the Nobel Peace Prize, has benefited from this fund, financed as well by the Nordic countries, the Netherlands, Australia and New Zealand.

The most important contribution of Canada has been the sharing of its experience with the WGIP and other governments attending the sessions. Probably no other country has been as involved in the settling of claims of lands, grievances from the past or in looking to new concepts of governance within the state. Canada is seen by other governments and indeed many indigenous groups as a leader. This is but one of the reasons why Canada has been given the honour and the responsibility of the lead on UN resolutions regarding indigenous people.

The Cree youth of James Bay received active support from the government for the holding of their Indigenous Youth Conference. The delegation of Canada at the Human Rights Commission ensured that the 1991 mandate resolution for the WGIP included a reference to the conference to encourage others to attend. The Department of External Affairs used its network to spread news of the conference through our embassies and to facilitate the travel arrangements from countries requiring visas to enter Canada.

The department also encouraged the authorities of the Government of Quebec to support the conference with funds and logistics. The Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and the Canadian International Development Agency each contributed $125,000 for the over-all logistics of the conference and to enable indigenous youth from around the world to attend. By all accounts the conference was a success and brought much credit to the aboriginal youth of Canada and the Cree nation in particular.

Question No. 449—Mr. Angus:

With regard to American railways, did the minister of immigration authorize the company to operate a train through Canada between Buffalo and Detroit, and, if so, (a) under what authority were the American personnel allowed to operate in Canada (b) has the government received any additional request for such trips, and if so, on what route(s)?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): No, the Minister of Employment and Immigration did not authorize the company to operate a train through Canada between Buffalo and Detroit.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The questions as enumerated by the parliamentary secretary have been answered.

Mr. Langlois: I ask that the remaining questions stand.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed from Thursday, February 4, consideration of the motion of Mr. Mazankowski that Bill C-98, an act to provide additional borrowing authority for the fiscal year beginning on April 1, 1992, be read the third time and passed.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Bonavista—Trinity—Conception.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Madam Speaker, I am pleased and somewhat overwhelmed by the support from my colleagues this morning, particularly the House leader and the Whip. I am delighted that I am starting off this very busy day with support from this side of the House, from my two highly esteemed and very important colleagues. I even got a sort of welcome from the other side of the House. I see even the NDP is smiling. I hope they are all smiling and clapping their hands when my presentation is completed.

This borrowing bill is a very important bill. I know the government will try to get this through as quickly as possible. It will try to limit debate on it so that Canadians will not be too aware of how it is running the economy and how the finances of this country have been put together.

In order to put it in perspective I have to go back the four and a half years I have been in this House, but I also want to reflect back to 1984. It is my understanding that the three essential elements of any government are to legislate, to legitimate and to educate.

As far as legislation is concerned, the government has a good record in numbers of bills put through the House, the numbers of projets de loi passed. The quality and the legitimacy of the legislation along with the education process certainly causes me, and a lot of members of this House on both sides perhaps and the Canadian public, difficulty. I believe this confusion of the three principles is one of the root causes of our problems as politicians.

• (1020)

I have only to speak of the unemployment insurance bill, Bill C–21. The goods and services tax bill will go down in history as a bad piece of legislation introduced at the wrong time and in the wrong manner. I include the bill on Canada Post, the bill reducing VIA Rail, the bill reducing transfer payments to the provinces.

The most recent bill we have been discussing which will have difficulty getting through the House—the government is bound to limit debate—is on the drastic and insensitive cuts to unemployment insurance. It is the subject of major discussion in our country.

Countless bills have been the subject of great discussion in this House and regrettably the opposition was not given the time or the volume of effort necessary to oppose the bills and to discuss them to the point consensus could be reached.

I believe I am safe in sayin I am not going to quote statistics, as I have done a dozen times in this House, and as my colleagues have also that the record number of closures and debate limitations that have been placed on the House of Commons by this government is greater than all the other numbers of those combined since Confederation. In other words, debate has been limited more in the last eight and a half years than it has been at any other time up to and including 1984 since Confederation.

The legislation part I have discussed and I will now turn to legitimacy. In a democracy, how really legitimate in a generic sense, not in the legal sense, is a bill or are a number of measures that are passed in Parliament, the highest court in the land, when back in the previous 125 years of Confederation, the limiting of debate, or closure on a debate was almost enough to call a general election.

It has happened so often in this Parliament and in the Parliament before that it is now common procedure and hardly gets a note in the media. I will leave it to hon. members to decide how to combine the legitimacy with the legislative aspect.

As for the education part, I believe Canadians are confused on what it is this government is doing. I can quote countless examples of statements that have been made or election promises that have been declared. The Prime Minister has said certain matters were sacred trusts, or these are our plans, or this is what we want to do in the election. However, as the legislation unfolds and as the mood of the government becomes apparent, it is obvious to the House, to the media, and indeed to Canadians in a downstream manner that the promises made were not kept and the sacred trusts that were discussed were thrown out the window. It is an indication of what happened in 1984, but more so in 1988, that if it was not diametrically opposed to what in fact happened, it certainly did not follow the course of the promise.

I will use two examples. I will use the example of the sacred trust to which the Prime Minister referred, the unemployment insurance program. In October 1988 during the campaign he said, and it was repeated by the minister responsible for Newfoundland, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, that he reiterated and reinforced that unemployment insurance and social programs were sacred trusts.

A sacred trust is a very strong term. The Concise Oxford Dictionary describes sacred as associated with or dedicated to God and trust is defined as a firm belief in the reliability or truth or strength of a person or thing. The words sacred trust convey a commitment. The Prime Minister did not just casually mention to Canadians that he would maintain a social program, or he would do this or he would do that. It was presented to Canadians as a commitment of a higher order and as a pledge that was related to God.

Having pledged that the unemployment insurance program and the social programs were a sacred trust and nothing would happen to them, even as the election was being planned and the campaign unfolded, officials were preparing legislation which eventually became Bill C–21. It totally changed the unemployment insurance system and in fact took the government out of the business. It increased the input from the employers and the employees by over 50 per cent and took away job development programs which in Atlantic Canada have been the mainstay of job creation. Regrettably but pragmatically it was a very important thing.

I recall when this happened in June three years ago. I am still explaining to people why jobs that were planned and why projects that were planned were, at the stroke of a pen, taken away. I had no control over it. The officials in Atlantic Canada had no control over it. The government just wiped its face and got on to the next unpopular legislation.

Another sacred trust, although it was not put forward as a sacred trust, was regional development. On October 3, 1988 in Saint John, New Brunswick, during the election campaign the Prime Minister said—I do not have the exact words here—words to the effect that "I am not going to govern a country where all regions are not treated equally".

That statement was made in October and in the budget that came out in the spring of 1989—I think it was April 27, one day premature because of some difficulties the government experienced—the Western Diversification Fund for the prairie provinces was reduced by $55 million, and in my case ACOA was reprofiled to lose 25 per cent of the funds and resources that were so important for regional development. There is another promise that not only was changed by some minor significance, it was a total change from what was promised.

There are other areas that I want to examine, and I hope that time will permit. I mentioned unemployment insurance and I talked about regional development and funds committed to regional development. While I am on that subject I want to mention transfer payments.

Transfer payments to the extremities of Canada are very important. Very briefly, in Newfoundland where the budget is between $3 and $3.5 billion it used to be that 49 per cent of that resource input came from the federal government. When 49 to 50 per cent of all the expenditures of one province come from the federal government it is easily understood that if you tampering with that input of $1.5 billion plus in any way is going to cause major perturbation, major upsets in the finances of a government.

In the case of Newfoundland, starting in 1989 with the reduction in the growth of transfer payments, the input to Newfoundland was reduced from 49 per cent to 45 per cent. This represents a total input of $200 million. This has meant downstream that the provincial government—I would say it has done it quietly and without major complaint—has got on with the job of running the province. It has had to cut back in critical areas, particularly welfare but in the general sense not necessarily on the social programs which have increased because of this. It has had to cut back on education and health care. Those are critical areas that were directly related to transfer payments.

Newfoundland is not alone. Atlantic Canada is not alone. With the implementation of Bill C-20 which capped the transfer payments by the year 2000 the federal government will be denying Canadians $97.6 billion, almost $100 billion of services and resources, particularly those focused on health care and post-secondary institutions. That is a major blow to Newfoundland. It is a major blow to Atlantic Canada and the rest of Canada.

On the question of transfer payments in health, education and particularly social programs there is a group of parliamentarians on the other side of the House, a group of wealthy business concerns in Canada and a group of people who really have not given this much thought who are beginning, because it is trendy, to say that we can no longer afford the social programs Canadians have become accustomed to.

The deficit we have this year is the deficit we had eight and a half years ago. I am not going to get into that because I have spoken on that twice already in the last 10 days. With the rising cost of social programs and the need to do all the other things this government has been trying to do we can no longer really afford social programs.

A closer examination and a better analysis of that trendy thought does not bear evidence. It does not bear out the facts. The facts are that Canada's social spending as I speak is 21.5 per cent of our gross domestic product. The average for all the other industrialized countries in the OECD is 25.6 per cent. So do not give me false information or try to mislead me with the hogwash information that we cannot afford our social programs.

Many of the European countries that have high standards of living and successful economies spend even a larger percentage of their GDP on social programs: Belgium, 37.6 per cent; Holland, 36.1 per cent; West Germany, one of the best industrialized countries in the world, 31.5 per cent; France, 29 per cent. The only major industrialized countries where social spending is lower than Canada are the United States at 20.8 per cent, and we are trying to emulate them with the free trade agreement and the NAFTA, and Japan at 17.5 per cent.

In my mind, borne out by the facts, clearly the portrait of Canadian social programs is very much in a favourable position with the other industrialized countries of the world that we compare with in the G–7 analysis and that we compete with.

Therefore, I do not want to hear much more of this trendy thought that we cannot afford social programs. Their name of the game is that we have to hit the social business, we have to reduce transfer payments because we cannot find money any other way.

In November I had the opportunity and the privilege to sit in on the closed session with the Auditor General and later the open public session. In the Auditor General's report the charge and observation was made that hundreds of millions of dollars were being lost in tax revenue because of the way we organized our corporate tax and to a certain extent our income tax for offshore capture. Some of my colleagues may recall, I believe it was on November 24 or 25, 1992 during Question Period, that question was put to the Minister of Finance and he denied it.

After meetings with the public accounts committee and other questions that were asked the finance department officials finally admitted that hundreds of millions of dollars in corporate tax revenues were lost to offshore tax schemes as the Auditor General claimed. This did not occur until some time in December, I believe. That was certainly a reversal of the department's initial stand. Not only does it know that it can get taxes and incomes from other revenue sources but it also denies that this possibility is there.

Back to the three principles of government in a democracy of legislating, legitimizing and educating. That is a very poor way to educate those desperate Canadians who are wondering legitimately and with great motivation how we can reduce the national debt and the deficit.

I now want to talk about another area that is of current and topical concern in the House of Commons and in Parliament. This is unemployment insurance.

The present bill before the House is one that will change yet again unemployment insurance principles which were developed by the Liberal Party in the early 1940s. It will change unemployment insurance to the point where its effectiveness will be reduced another notch.

Unemployment is at a record high and is predicted to be by the Conference Board of Canada the second highest in the G–7 countries at 11.3 per cent for this year. Instead of attacking this difficulty and organizing programs to put Canadians back to work the budget announcement in early December penalized the unemployed to the point of $2.5 billion. They are already paying 50 per cent more in unemployment insurance fees. Now the government wants to reduce the benefit rate on the maximum insurable weekly earnings of $745 from 60 per cent to 57 per cent. It also wants to eliminate benefits to workers who quit without just cause or are fired for misconduct.

I heard this morning that those unfortunate people who through no fault of their own and in a lot of cases through no fault of their companies are being retired and receive severance will be cut off from unemployment insurance.

There are other areas I could mention in wrapping up. Canada Post is an area of major concern with 10,000 jobs being lost. Another area is our social programs.

In conclusion, if the government had put measures in place that would have increased growth and employment it would not have had to borrow as much. People would be paying more taxes, would be showing more confidence in the government and the country. If the government added this to those areas of corporate taxes and offshore taxes it is not capturing worth hundreds of millions of dollars, then we would not be in the predicament we are. I do not see any change between now and the next election. The government will have to answer to the people after this bill is passed.

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Madam Speaker, I always listen with great care when my hon. friend from Bonavista—Trinity—Conception speaks. I have two questions I would like to ask.

I must observe first that there is clearly a difference of philosophy on his side of the House compared with those of us over here. Those of us over here think that if revenues are down expenditures should be brought in line rather than just carrying on and ignoring the fact that perhaps there is not the same amount of money to work with.

• (1040)

The government's revenues are down some $8 billion this year. Obviously that means if we are going to spend at the same level, let alone increase expenditures, we are going to lose control of the deficit completely.

I have noticed his leader is proposing to scrap the GST. This is now definitive we are told. He had said earlier he would scrap it, then he said he would keep it, then he said he would modify it and now he is going to scrap it. I am not sure what he is going to replace it with because that has not been made clear. If the $15 billion or $16 billion of revenue that accrues is added to the $8 billion shortfall then $23 billion or $24 billion has to be made up.

What is the hon. member's proposal to replace the GST? Is it going to be the new GST, the Grit sneaky tax as it is being called, which is apparently being proposed? That would be a hidden tax, the business transfer tax, which would be on everything including food, medical services, and so on.

Where does he propose to make up the revenue shortfall in order to provide the programs that certainly we on this side of the House would agree are desirable?

My second question has to do with the EH-101 contract. His leader has said that one of the ways to make up for the deficit shortfall is to cancel the EH-101 contract which will cost $4.4 billion over 20 years. That is not really a big thing on a year-to-year basis in that sense. They sometimes forget it is spread over 20 years.

I know that many of his former colleagues in the navy starting I might say with Admiral John Anderson, the new chief of defence staff and the new deputy chief, also an admiral in the navy, are all very ardently in support of the necessity of the EH-101s, both for search and rescue purposes but also for maintaining the preparedness of our military.

Does he agree with his leader that the EH-101 contract should be scrapped or does he think this government is right to proceed with it? If he believes it should be scrapped, what is his proposed alternative? Does he think we should also scrap the Canadian patrol frigates which without those helicopters cannot obviously fulfil the purpose for which they were established? I put those questions to my hon. friend and I look forward to his answers.

Mr. Mifflin: Madam Speaker, I am delighted to hear from my good friend the hon. member for South Shore. I am very familiar with that part of the country and love it dearly. It is a lovely part of Nova Scotia.

Quite frankly sometimes I am sorry he is in the position of having to argue some of the cases that he does. I know he has difficulties with his constituents in following these policies and that is the unfortunate fallout of politics. It happens to all of us from time to time.

I remind my hon. colleague it is the government that is on the firing line for having introduced the GST, the most unpopular tax in the history of this country, possibly in the history of the world. There was the misinformation that it was going to be revenue neutral at a time when we were heading into one of the worst depressions ever experienced in this country. If he thinks he is going to put the ball in my court when this government is responsible for these three aspects, he is wrong. He asked me what we were going to do about the GST.

The last figure I could get showed that the GST accounts for 12 per cent of the government's total income of $122.2 billion in the last fiscal year. That hits those in the middle class more than anyone else because the middle class and the lower income class spend more of their money on essentials that are taxed with the goods and services tax. While the tax was supposed to be spread across a reasonable distribution it hits middle and low income people harder, irrespective of the credits. Also last week we heard that small businesses are going under at a record high of 77,000. So do not blame me for the GST. He is asking me what we are going to do.

The Auditor General's report says that the goods and services tax accounted for around $29.5 billion and the government says that it accounted for $15 billion—we are not sure whether that was the $1.5 billion it cost to collect. How does anybody on that side of the House have the gall and audacity to ask this side of the House, given that the figure could be $30 billion or $15 billion, how we are going to introduce a tax to replace the revenues collected from the GST?

We will not continue with the GST in its present form. We will not continue to tax the kind of people who have been taxed by the GST. We will not continue the onerous burden that small businesses have had to bear to the point where they are going out of business. I know many and I am sure my colleague from South Shore knows many.

He wants to talk about the helicopter and I am quite happy to talk about the helicopter. If he were here in the House when I made a presentation last Thursday, and maybe he has read my presentation, he would know why we have a problem with the EH-101 helicopter. Our position is very clear.

Mr. McCreath: It is not a problem with that side of the House. It's a problem with the front row.

Mr. Mifflin: Madam Speaker, my colleague asked a question. If he wants an answer he has to listen for it.

Mr. Charest: We're not getting an answer.

Mr. Mifflin: They are getting an answer but the Minister of the Environment says they are not getting an answer. He would hear it if he would listen instead of shouting and screaming and trying to pressure people into doing things they really do not want to do. I would not accuse this side of the House of doing that because they are all very well disciplined. I know that the three gentlemen in front of me are very reasonable and want to listen to what I have to say.

The position of our leader and the position of the Liberal Party on July 24 was no different from what it is now. We believe that something must change with regard to the Sea King helicopter and the search and rescue fleets. They need refurbishing. They need to be replaced. That is on record.

However at a time when there are 1.5 million Canadians unemployed, when the number of soup kitchens is at a record high, when the unemployment line-ups are great, when the debt is mushrooming, and when small businesses are going broke at a record rate we question the government's priorities in committing $4.5 billion to helicopters.

Subsequent to that position, in July the Auditor General examined the defence management system that handles these megaprojects and said it was ineffective and expensive. He may be wrong, but if he is wrong I want the minister to tell the House. I have given the Minister of National Defence, two different ones, two opportunities to say that our system is great and explain why it is great. The government will not discuss it in Parliament. It will not discuss it in defence committee. It will not discuss it anywhere. The minister should say whether it is wrong or right. The Canadian people have been told that $4.5 billion of taxpayers' money is being committed to a system that the Auditor General in his report to Canadians says is ineffective and expensive.

In January the Minister of National Defence herself said that she was not convinced that this was the right program. Do not point the finger at my leader, do not point the finger at this side of the House and ask why we are doing it because the minister herself has done it.

When she is not convinced, being privileged to the discussion in cabinet and on the expenditure committee, how in the name of everything holy can she expect us to be totally convinced? How can she expect the opposition to roll over and play dead on $4.5 billion? This is one of the biggest programs in terms of spending in Canadian history. It is one-half of the total cost of the frigate program, which I would remind my hon. friend was a Liberal program. We are totally dedicated to that and we will continue to be dedicated to that. Why we are opposing it is pretty obvious.

If the member for South Shore thinks that I am going to bolt my caucus because he thinks I do not agree with my leader he is wrong because it is only the other side of the House that does that. It has lost more members than I have fingers and toes. It is not going to happen with this party and it is not going to happen on this side of the House because I support my leader and I support his decisions for the reasons I have given.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am sorry but the time for questions and comments has now expired.

Mr. Charest: I ask for unanimous consent to ask a short question.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for an extra question?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

• (1050)

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, I was interested in the member's comments. I want to remind him that there were two members of the Liberal caucus who left close to the very day when their leader was elected. By no means is there any monopoly on members leaving by any side of the House. If I remember correctly the hon. members for Shefford and Hull—Aylmer left their caucus.

I have a much more precise question for the hon. member concerning the GST. I found his refusal to answer the question quite revealing, especially given the role of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition. The role of the opposition is not only to question the government, as he seems to do with some enthusiasm and I accept that, but also to offer an alternative. Its role is to tell the Canadian people what it would do if it was the government. That is the fundamental role of the Official Opposition.

On the question of the GST I must admit I do not know whether my hon. friend is satisfied with the answer or whether the minister of sport was satisfied. Frankly, maybe I missed something in the response. Maybe we can phrase the question differently.

What would the hon. member's response be during the next election campaign when a constituent whom he represents in this place and is called upon to defend in this place asks him as a member of the Liberal Party of Canada, given the fact that he has stated that his party would axe the GST, with what would his party propose to replace it?

If his response to us is not clear I would think that he would certainly want to give a very clear response to his constituents.

Mr. Mifflin: Madam Speaker, I am delighted to rise in response to the question. I gave unanimous consent to my colleague, the hon. Minister of the Environment, because I have a great deal of respect for him. I would not want to do anything that would upset his chances in the leadership race.

I want to give him as much opportunity as I can for exposure because I have a lot of faith in him in terms of where he is going in that race. It is only fair if one likes somebody to give them an opportunity.

How delighted I am for him to suggest to me that five members of that side of the House are not satisfied with my answer.

I sit in this House practically every day that the House is sitting and have done so since December 13, 1988. The number of answers that are given to the questions that Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition asks here that I, my leader, my party and the people of Canada are satisfied with—and the reason why they are at 18, 19 and 17 per cent in the polls—represent the major effort put into those questions.

Last year taxes for individuals went up 11.5 per cent and they went down for corporations by 15 per cent. Our alternative to the GST is that we are not going to have one. We are not going to have a tax that burns the individuals and the small businesses, which then go broke because they cannot afford the people and computers to do it.

We will do it in such a way that it will not hurt the working Canadian. That is my answer to him.

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Madam Speaker, I am really quite pleased to follow in the footsteps of my colleague in speaking to this borrowing bill. One of the things that the people of Canada would like to know is when the government is going to call an election.

The government has made such a mess of things and is continuing to make a mess of things.

They really want to know when it is going to call an election. It is really frustrating. I am just wondering when the government can answer that question because everyone in Canada is waiting with baited breath. They think that maybe they will be able to get an alternative that can actually consult people, speak to them, try not to hurt them, and above all not always introduce the wrong thing at the wrong time.

One of the key questions is when there will be a budget. Normally the government presents a budget at the end of February but this time it is saying just think back to the economic statement and do not worry about the budget. The government is going to wait until Bill Clinton presents his budget. Then it will tell us what it is doing.

What kind of an answer is that? Come on. Either give us a budget or call an election and let us get on with governing this country. There are too many problems to be addressed. This is a tired, old, and paralyzed government. The members opposite are all waiting to see whether the Prime Minister will step down. That is really what is on everybody's minds.

There are people running all over the place and not really getting anything done. Everyone is waiting. It is especially important that the Prime Minister make up his mind, put the question to rest once and for all and step down and then we can go on with encouraging others in their leadership campaigns. Then we can possibly get to the real business of governing a country and addressing the economy.

We talked about the economy and how this Conservative government had promised that after the referendum in October it would address the economy. I am very disappointed with the way it has addressed the economy.

The government has given us a drug bill that was more like a price hike for the average Canadian. It will cause very serious harm to the medicare system in this country. It has given us a bailout of the airline industry that was a lot more like a crash than anything else. Our airline industry continues to be in desperate shape.

The government has promised us jobs but the only jobs that we have seen are cushy seats for this government's friends. That is not what the people of Canada mean when they talk about jobs. It is now giving us a UI bill that it claims will catch all these bad Canadians who really do not want to work but want to sit at home and collect unemployment insurance.

I remind those members how difficult it is right now to get a job for most Canadians. Furthermore, if they have a job they do not leave it because collecting unemployment insurance is not the panacea that the government seems to think it is. Right now there are very serious penalties for people who leave jobs with no valid reason, as there should be, but they are not in the majority.

The government must address the problems that these people face: the shutdowns and layoffs that cause these people to not have a job in the first place and that causes there to be no other jobs for them to find.

I feel certain that after the next election many members on the other side of the House will face that and realize that it is not easy out there to get a job. There are young people with good educations but there are very few jobs for them. They are working part time as sales clerks and so on even though they may have a Masters degree in business administration or degrees in economics. This is a reality that we all must face. It is a serious problem. We cannot just sit by and wait for things to happen.

This government speaks of its strategy toward the economy. Its short-term strategy is to do nothing, hope the U.S. does something and ride on its coat-tails.

• (1100)

Its medium term strategy is to pretend it is doing something good because then it will not have to worry about it. Things will get better and the government members can pretend it was because of them.

Then there is the long-term strategy to just keep going because it probably will not be there to bear the consequences. It can pass the problem on to the next group. That is no strategy.

We have to face what we have today. We have to stop being so partisan. I am saying this as I stand here in the opposition and perhaps at times I am as guilty as the others. We have to stop fighting one another. We have to start co-operating. I am not just talking about the federal level, I am talking about all levels of government.

For instance, this year we are going to top the $450 billion mark in the national debt. That is just at the federal level. We are not taking into consideration at this point the debts at the provincial level and the problems that all of these serious constraints cause to the other levels of government such as school boards and municipal systems.

We have to stop shifting the blame, playing little games among ourselves and saying we are going to cut back on transfer payments. Then the provinces will blame the federal government members and we will say: "It is their problem. It is not ours". Then the provinces will cut back on transfers to municipalities and the story goes on.

We all must realize that if a province has a debt it is also a national debt. If the federal government gets out of debt at the expense of an ever increasing debt at the provincial level, we are not going to be any better off. We are going to be worse off. It is long overdue for the federal government to sit down with the provincial governments and decide how they are going to proceed in the future. They must stop fighting one another.

We have an example of that happening now. There has been an announcement of cutbacks in grants in lieu of taxes to municipalities. Municipalities have nowhere to go. They are at the bottom of the line. If there is a cutback in the grants this government gives municipalities in lieu of paying municipal taxes then it is the municipal taxpayer who picks up the burden. The same taxpayer is paying income tax to the federal government and the provinces.

Is there not a better way to distribute the burden more equitably? It will not be easy, but it is absolutely essential. We all know that the debt is a serious concern. The sooner we distribute the burden more equitably the better off we will be as a country.

We have some very good things going for us. If we can build on them we will move ahead far more quickly than in this partisan atmosphere where we always blame somebody else for our misfortunes. We are all Canadians and we are all responsible.

I know we have talked about many things with regard to debt, deficit and the GST. I want to remind the people in this House that according to figures presented to the public accounts committee the GST burdened the Canadian public to the tune of $29.5 billion. That is not the net figure. It is what was actually taken into government coffers before expenses. It means that for every dollar of GST collected it cost 50 cents in 1991–92. That is not a very efficient tax.

There is a lot of confusion in terms of the information given to MPs about the GST in that particular year. I am aware that both the Auditor General and the Comptroller General were asked to clarify the differences between the $29.5 billion and the $15 billion net result of the tax. Neither of them has really been able to answer the questions. We are awaiting responses.

How can we opposition members give the government members all the answers when they cannot answer our questions? What is the real effect of the GST? Who is being hurt? Who is paying? Let us know that. It is absolutely essential that the people of Canada be given the whole truth and nothing but the truth on this tax.

I know for a fact that a tax bill was introduced yesterday by a Ways and Means motion. Now a tax bill of this kind will have a lot of measures and means but it also includes a section that would remove the GST from access to information. Why would they remove the GST from access to information? It is quite normal to want to protect corporations from revealing their sales figures, et cetera, much as you protect people by not giving out information on their private tax returns. I respect that, but I am really worried that it will be a way for this government to restrict information to the opposition and the people of Canada about what exactly has happened with the GST.

I would like the government to answer that question for me, because so far there has been no answer. This is very serious and we want to know. If we are prevented from accessing the information how can we give realistic answers? Our questions must be answered. We have to stop playing games. We need to know the facts.

The Comptroller General and the Auditor General are having a difficult time answering questions. When there are secrets being kept it does not look good. Where there is smoke there is usually also fire. That is what this looks like to me. I ask the government to be absolutely above reproach in terms of access to information and stop playing games.

When it comes to prospects for this country I know that the majority of Canadians are hard workers and do not want to be on unemployment insurance. There will always be people who are not quite as honest as they should be, but the majority of Canadians are honest, hard-working people. When they do claim unemployment insurance they are very much aware of how serious it is.

I think sometimes the people of Canada are not aware of how serious the penalties are if they make a mistake and how they can be charged $100 or $200. For instance, if they make a mistake reporting income on their UI claim form and worked a few hours in one week, they will not only have to pay back the $100 they forgot to mention, but they might be fined as much as $100 or $200 for that one mistake. There are very strict guidelines, as there should be. But let us not pretend that all people on UI would cheat the system because they would not. I know many people who are very frightened of making a mistake.

I also know people who have not really made a mistake but have been seriously penalized by the UIC. I know of a recent case of a man who was laid off when his company closed down. He is a family man with three young children and a wife at home. He had worked for the same company for 16.5 years and was given a severance package that was the equivalent of approximately six months of wages. In case members do not know, when a person gets a severance package he or she is not allowed to claim UI until he or she has exhausted that severance package. In other words, he would have had to wait six months and if he did not have a job at that time then he could have applied for unemployment insurance. This is fine because it at least gave him a chance in those six months to find a job.

This man really looked for a job in those six months. He was able to find some part-time, minimum wage occupation for eight weeks of that time but was laid off. He took a short-term job because he is very conscientious, did not want to be a burden on anyone and wanted to support his own family. At the end of his severance package when his money was gone and he still did not have a job, not even a part-time job which he was willing to take if he could find one, he applied for unemployment insurance.

Because he had worked those eight weeks at a minimum wage job the money he will now receive is far lower than what he would have received had he not worked those eight weeks at a minimum wage job. This man has been penalized because his remittances to UI from this minimum wage job were far reduced from what he was making before.

I want the Canadian people to know that the UI system is a very harsh system now. It is not easy to take advantage of. It always surprises me when I hear what people go through.

For instance, two people worked as cooks in a restaurant. They left because they could not take any more abuse from the owner of the restaurant. They both left at the same time, applied for UI and were fined for having quit their jobs. Not only were they fined 10 weeks in the case of one and 9 weeks in the case of the other—and do not ask me why there was a difference because I do not know—but they only received 50 per cent of what they would have received otherwise.

This case has gone before arbitration and has not been settled yet. They may get full benefits at some point and they may have some portion of the penalty reinstated, but it has been at least eight months since they left their abusive employer. They have not received that money yet and they may never get it.

I want the people of Canada to realize that these are the kinds of measures in place today. They should not be side-tracked by this government that insists on bringing in the wrong measures at the wrong time. I ask the government to do the right thing for once. Let us give this country a chance and call an election, please.

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Madam Speaker, I see in the press that the leader of my hon. friend from Sudbury's party has recently appointed a transition team to put together his new government, demonstrating the confidence he seems to have that he will get that opportunity.

I listened to my hon. friend talk about people who do not answer questions. She talked about the partisan atmosphere in the House and various other things. I would like to make a suggestion in asking her a question. The sooner we go to the polls the better. I am ready for an election campaign. I think that she and her colleagues are going to find that the Canadian people are no longer satisfied with empty rhetoric. As well, she will find that the Canadian people want to scrutinize not only the candidates but the leaders.

Liberal Party policy seems to vary from day to day, depending on what the opinion polls have to say. The polls seem to be telling it to keep its leader hidden and it might have a chance of winning because there is a perception that the Prime Minister is unpopular. That may or may not be true. However, as I have heard the Prime Minister say: "Nothing focuses the mind like the issuance of a writ". I can tell the member that we on this side are ready for that writ. When people take a look at our leader and then look at her leader I am not too discouraged about the chances of this government for re-election.

I might also say that when people start asking: "What do you stand for", they know what this government stands for. We have put policies before the people. We have put forward an approach that says we have to live within our means. We have implemented tax reforms that for 40 years were recommended by committees of this place and royal commissions but which they on the other side did not have the courage to face.

I asked the previous speaker from that side the same question and I did not get an answer. If her party is seriously proposing to get rid of the GST, what is it proposing to replace it with? Is she going to get up now and bafflegab like the hon. member for Bonavista—Trinity—Conception: talk a lot and do everything but answer the question. I ask her in a very specific way because she is one of the finance critics for her department and she has some knowledge of this area. In plain, simple English, what is their proposal to replace the GST with?

Mrs. Marleau: Madam Speaker, the first thing would be to remove the government. Second, give us an answer about what is in that GST package. There is nothing empty about $29.5 billion. I want to be honest and realistic. I have worked as an accountant. I can say that until I personally know what is on the books, it is very difficult for me to say absolutely what should be done or what I would do without knowing what I have before me. In opposition, I am absolutely unable to get answers. So far there have been no answers from the Comptroller General and no answers from the Auditor General. We want the facts. We want to ensure that we are not restricted in access to information on the facts. One thing we on this side of the House want to be is realistic. Why should I make empty promises when I do not know what is in the books?

Mr. Jelinek: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I very seldom rise on a point of order in this House, but when I hear an hon. member opposite inadvertently misstating the facts and putting on the record totally erroneous information it is my duty to stand to correct her. All of the figures and all of the information have been made public in a variety of ways and means, in all parliamentary committees as well as in financial statements and in reports from the Department of Finance and the Department of National Revenue. In fact next week the public accounts committee will have an opportunity once again to review all the facts relating to the GST.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. minister knows that is not a point of order but a point of debate. I would be delighted to recognize him on debate later today.

• (1120)

Mrs. Marleau: Madam Speaker, the hon. Minister of National Revenue said it. The information has been provided in a variety of ways, totally mishmashed here and there.

There is a lot of creative accounting going on. It is wonderful. I challenge the minister of revenue to sit down with me and the chairman of the public accounts committee and show us all of these wonderful figures. The chairman has also been asking for these same answers.

It is absolutely essential that we quit these beautiful accounting cosmetics that show the people only what we think they should see. They will not really like what they see.

Mr. Jelinek: What a phoney you are.

Mrs. Marleau: I am not the minister of revenue. I will have to defer to the minister of revenue. After all, it is his responsibility to give us the answers that we seek. I remind him that he was the one in charge when the GST was brought forward. He is still in charge and therefore has to answer to the people of Canada and MPs in the House of Commons.

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Madam Speaker, the hon. member who is full of gobbledegook obviously has not been following any of the reports that have been made public over the course of the preparation, implementation and follow-up of the tax which replaced the old manufacturers' sales tax.

She has the audacity to stand up in the House and challenge me to sit down with her. I accept that challenge. I would be very happy to invite her for a briefing in the department to show her in detail all the figures pertaining to the preparation, implementation and collection of the GST at any time that she wishes.

Mrs. Marleau: Madam Speaker, that is wonderful. I will take the minister up on his offer and I will bring along the chairman of the public accounts committee. It is important that I have witnesses at this meeting so we make sure that we do not carry on with the gobbledegook.

Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth): You had better do it quickly.

Mrs. Marleau: That is right. I am really anxious to get all this information because it will certainly help us in formulating our future policies. It is essential.

Mr. Lyle Kristiansen (Kootenay West—Revelstoke): Madam Speaker, in the kinder, gentler spirit which always dominates the House of Commons in an election year I would like to give the Liberal member for Sudbury an opportunity to answer the question that my colleague across the way asked a few moments ago. With the enthusiasm with which she wound up and attempted to respond I think she forgot what the question was.

My colleague across the way asked her exactly what the Liberal policy was to replace the goods and services tax. Was it the position outlined by her leader, that they would simply take a visible tax and replace it with a hidden tax and thus put a tax on food as well as on everything else?

As she knows my party, the New Democratic Party, outlined some years ago when the GST was coming in exactly what methods we would use. The Prime Minister has acknowledged that we did put forward an alternative. He may not agree with it, but he gives us credit for that. I thank him for that obvious and deserved recognition.

Once again, I would ask the member to cool down a little bit, not to be so overenthusiastic and perhaps pay attention to the question. Maybe she can give us an answer. Where does the Liberal Party stand on replacing the GST? Are the Canadian voters supposed to look at the Liberals like Mowgli looked at Kaa the snake in The Jungle Book as Kaa sang Trust in Me?

Mrs. Marleau: Madam Speaker, that sounded to me like a speech. I am sorry, I did not quite understand.

I want to throw the ball back in the NDP court because obviously we have not heard anything from those members on what they would do regarding the GST. They are not in government. Their party is in government in Ontario and it is not responding there to what is happening.

I am not particularly threatened because we want to be as honest and as realistic as possible.

It is time we stopped trying to mislead the public into believing that everybody has all the answers. We have to all work together. If when we have all the facts we all sit down together I know that we can find an alternative that will satisfy the need for finances for this country as well as take away the burden that this horrendous tax has placed on Canadians. That is really what it is all about.

I want to personally ensure that we do not hurt Canadians any more than they have already been hurt. I think that is the bottom line to anything that we consider.

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Madam Speaker, it has certainly been an enlightening debate so far. I am pleased to participate in it.

The bill before us is Bill C-98, the borrowing bill by which the government is trying to get authorization from the House of Commons to borrow another $34.4 billion.

Before I get into my remarks regarding the bill, in case there are any friends and relatives watching us on television today, I would like to explain that while I realize my face has never been my number one asset in politics it is looking a little worse than usual. It is not as a result of political persecution from the other side but because of a close encounter with the ground when I was tobogganing with my son on Sunday. It is my favourite winter sport, never having been a figure skater like my hon. colleague across the way.

That aside, I would like to deal with the challenge that is before us. If we do not like the way the government is spending money, borrowing money and handling the nation's finances, what are the alternatives?

In my remarks I would certainly like to deal with all the national issues that are involved but it is much easier to focus on my own constituency of Prince Albert—Churchill River. It is a very diverse constituency; 46 per cent is the city of Prince Albert, 36 per cent northern and aboriginal population and 22 per cent rural. In many ways it is a microcosm of the country.

The reason I would like to focus on my constituency is because I do not believe we need to be borrowing as much as we are today. I believe there are better ways of spending our money. I would like to demonstrate that by using my constituency as an example.

I was first elected in 1988. When I was running for election the question was already before us: How are you going to pay for the alternatives that you are suggesting? I took up that challenge and did some research. I found that in 1988, four and one-half years ago, the federal government alone was spending $125 million in that constituency on unemployment insurance and welfare.

Those high welfare costs are a result of the fact that 25 per cent of that population are treaty Indian people. The welfare costs are paid directly by the government. Unfortunately 80 per cent of that population is unemployed. Also there is the federal government's contribution to cost sharing arrangements with the province.

We started in 1988 with $125 million. I have kept track of that over the years. With this new financial statement going into this new budget year I find the federal government is spending $170 million in my constituency alone on welfare and unemployment insurance.

If there is any waste of money, it is that particular sum of money. Not only is it costing the taxpayers directly in having to shell out that amount of money, but there are also the secondary costs that come with the broken lives that need to be repaired health costs and the cost of imprisonment of people and all costs associated with that level of poverty and with those people in the constituency who are not working.

How does this government propose to tackle this problem of the deficit, in other words, spending more money than we are taking in? The government is planning to cut UI. In a constituency like mine where 80 per cent of the people are unemployed the 3 per cent cut in UI benefits will really be a disaster for people, and not only in economic terms. In a constituency with unemployment that high a person is very vulnerable when trying to find another job. It makes it very easy for employers to take advantage of that situation and subject people to unsafe working conditions and other kinds of working conditions on the job site that they would otherwise never put up with. People are very vulnerable. Yet this government goes after those unemployed people.

• (1130)

What else does the government go after? It goes after the Crow rate, the historic arrangement between the Government of Canada and the farmers of the prairies which transports our grain to an export position and also for domestic use in eastern Canada under guaranteed regulatory rates. The government has cut that by 10 per cent in this economic statement.

What does that mean in my constituency? It means $1 million to the farmers in my constituency. Now the government is talking about cutting the family benefits plan and other ongoing cuts, and off-loadings on to the provincial government.

I would like to propose an alternative. I would like to propose that we take one-quarter of that $170 million and try to put one-quarter of the unemployed people in my constituency to work. In other words, we are talking about $40 million of that $170 million which the government is now wasting in my constituency.

Where could that money be spent? First, I would like to suggest it should be spent on the Athabasca Road. This House and Canadians were shocked to learn approximately a year ago that in this day and age there is a tuberculosis epidemic in northern Saskatchewan in the Athabasca region, centred in the communities of Fond du Lac, Black Lake and Wollaston Lake.

Emergency measures have been taken to deal with the situation and health care professionals have done the best they can. However, the underlying problems of poverty, poor housing, lack of opportunity and lack of good nutrition remain. Those problems cannot be solved unless we can get a transportation system into the Athabasca region, where 5,000 people live, that will meet their needs. A transportation system will allow us to bring in food more cheaply and will allow us to bring in building materials so that we can build more houses with the limited funds available. We can open up the Athabasca region to commercial opportunities like tourism and fishing in Lake Athabasca, a lake currently hardly ever fished because it costs more to fly the fish out than fishermen get in return. We need that road.

How much is it going to cost? It is going to cost $35 million. The provincial government is currently negotiating with the federal government to get funding for that road. The provincial government is suggesting that the federal government pick up 75 per cent of the cost of that road based on two arguments. It would replace something like a $2 million cost to the federal government of having the Coast Guard dredge the Athabasca River to get barges on to Lake Athabasca to supply those communities. The government would save that $2 million a year. The vast majority, approximately 80 per cent of the people in the region which would be served by that, are treaty Indian people. The economic benefits which would flow from the development would accrue directly to the federal government.

It would mean a cost to the federal government of $27 million over about five years. We would have to spend about $5.5 million a year for the next five years to get that Athabasca road into place. The benefits would be immense and have been well documented.

Second, I would like to mention the whole issue of cleaning up the Gunnar and Laredo mines. I see the Minister of the Environment is diligent today and is at his desk. I was surprised to hear from a reporter yesterday that the Minister of the Environment seems to have dismissed the notion of his department participating in the clean-up of the Gunnar and Laredo mines.

For the benefit of the House and the viewing public I would like to explain that issue a little bit. There has been uranium mining going on in northern Saskatchewan since the late forties and early fifties. In those days the environmental standards that we operated under were much different and much more lax than they are today.

When the Gunnar and Laredo mines were decommissioned in 1964 very little clean-up was done. There were very low standards. It probably is not anybody's fault particularly, but the clean-up was never done. Tailings are getting into the environment through leaching and blowing around in the wind. Some of the old buildings are contaminated. Although the site poses no immediate health hazard it is certainly something we would not tolerate in this day and age.

It has been identified as a major public issue because the premier of Alberta saw fit to make reference to it in some year end remarks and it is now on the public agenda. It is the appropriate time for it to be on the public agenda because while we are discussing this clean-up issue we are also contemplating expansion of the uranium mining industry in my constituency.

Through the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources, the Atomic Energy Control Board, Atomic Energy of Canada Limited, which engages in commercial ventures, and many others, the federal government has been very much an advocate of the uranium mining industry and indeed of the nuclear industry as a whole in all kinds of ways, even the former government's old Eldorado Mining which mined in that area.

The federal government has a clear role to play. What would it cost to clean up that site? The Minister of the Environment probably knows this. It would cost about $8 million. If the federal government paid $6 million of that cost, 75 per cent over a period of four years, that would be a cost to the federal government of $1.5 million per year.

There is money. Funds have been established to do this kind of work. There is a national contaminated sites program which provides for the clean-up of orphan sites for which the corporate responsibility can no longer be established. That certainly applies here. There is money in that fund for innovative technology. We intend to use innovative technology, to let nature do its own clean-up to enhance the natural processes that are already going on. It is very innovative technology.

As well, the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources is already engaged in the clean-up of uranium mining sites in Ontario and the Northwest Territories and could help contribute toward that $1.5 million a year.

I would suggest that the government restore the 10 per cent cut that it made to the Crow rate benefit. That was pointed out at the farm rally in Saskatoon about two weeks ago, where 13,000 people from the farms, the cities and the towns of Saskatchewan met at Saskatchewan Place and outlined their situation. At the rally we were told that this year farm income in Saskatchewan is going to be at its lowest level since the 1930s.

A lot of Canadians know what the 1930s were like through movies, through folklore within families and through books. People know what kind of misery existed in the farm community. We are returning to that level again. It is projected in the next year that the average income of the average farm family is going to be $4,000, which is less than those families would receive if they were receiving welfare.

There is a clear need for income in the farm community. That affects not only the farm community but it affects the businesses in the towns, in the villages and even the cities of Saskatchewan. It is still a fact in Saskatchewan that if the farmers have money everybody has money. If the farmers do not have money, people get laid off and businesses go bankrupt. This is a trend we have to reverse.

As I mentioned earlier in my remarks, $1 million in my constituency would restore that level of income to the farm community.

I would suggest that the government take a look at what its training policies are doing in a constituency like mine. Communities in the constituency have as much as 80 or 90 per cent unemployment. The real unemployment rate over all is probably 25 per cent of the work force. A lot of people are unemployed. As this government says and as the prosperity initiative people said, the key to getting Canada out of the financial mess it is in is through empowering people through education, training and through being able to give people some control over their lives.

What is the government doing in this constituency which might well have as great a need for training as any in the country? The government is cutting back between $1 and $2 million a year. How is it doing that? It is doing that by tying the funding for training to the unemployment insurance training fund through Bill C–21. In a region like mine where a lot of people never have been in the work force on a permanent basis, where many of the jobs are marginal, very short term or part time, and the economy is depressed, an awful lot of people never even make it on to UI. If the UI funds follow the UI claimants it means that a region like mine where people have never worked or worked very little absorbs massive cutbacks, while money streams into the large metropolitan areas where the government rightly is fighting the devastation wrought on our manufacturing sector by free trade.

People should not be under any illusions here, especially the Minister of Employment and Immigration, that diversion of funds means massive cuts to training for the people who need it the most, the people who are not even literate in this day and age.

The government argues that part of this money that is being lost through training and through regular channels is being picked up through the Pathways Program in the aboriginal community. That is also a smoke and mirrors operation, because it started with a $200 million allocation which now has been cut to $150 million nation–wide.

At the local level it is also not working, because the aboriginal communities have had to create an infrastructure to deliver this training which parallels the infrastructure of Canada Manpower and absorbs probably 25 to 30 per cent of the money originally intended for training. As well, a lot of the initiatives that have been funded directly through the federal government, like the Meadow Lake Tribal Council learning centres and the Athabaska Training Council, are no longer being directly funded. It is incumbent on Pathways to pick up that slack. It is not designed to do that and therefore we have a massive shortfall, both in aboriginal training and training for other people.

I suggest the government restore this funding, enhance it to some degree and spend $2 million a year on that.

Another area where the government could well be spending money much more profitably than the $170 million on welfare and unemployment which they are spending in my constituency now, is to support community economic development organizations. My region of the country has been one of the pioneers in developing community–based economic ventures. Like the maritimes, like Montreal, like some other regions of the country, my region is one of the places where these kinds of movements originated. The co–operative movement has strong roots in that region. The first co–operative community health clinic was established to provide medical services during the doctors' strike in 1962 in my constituency.

We now have another form of business development, which is the community economic development corporations, the economic development authorities and all the other means that communities are engaging in to try to mobilize capital to take control of their own economy, to create jobs and opportunities for their people. Organizations like the Creighton–Denare Beach development corporation, the Kitsaki Development Corporation, Visions North, community corporations like Ile–à–la–Crosse, La Loche, La Ronge and the new Prince Albert Regional Economic Development Authority are doing good work with very limited resources. They involve a lot of volunteer time for a lot of people. In order to be effective they need some basic core funding in order to function and play the proper part they need to play, especially at the organizational stage they are at now.

I would suggest to the government that $2 million out of that $170 million it is blowing could be well spent on these local vehicles for economic development.

I have only a few minutes left. I have outlined $12 million worth of spending that the government could be doing in my constituency out of the $170 million it is blowing now. I suggest it takes one-quarter of that, which is $40 million, and devote it to job creation. I am not talking about new money. I am talking about the money it is spending now.

I have identified $12 million worth of projects. Another $8 million could very easily go to the Indigenous Summer Games which the minister for sports and fitness is very actively looking at. I would encourage him to recognize the need. The government could spend money for the SEED program which is being cut back again, the Summer Student Employment Program, for student loans or for the Brighter Futures Program which is supposed to deal with family problems, child care, family violence, and so on, and is really a smoke and mirrors operation that has no money, no criteria, and is very difficult to access. Some real money in Brighter Futures would help, as well as in child care. I am suggesting out of that $40 million we are diverting from welfare and unemployment insurance let us spend $12 million on projects and $8 million on these projects. That would leave $20 million to help reduce that province's deficit. If it did that in every constituency it would amount to $280 million in Saskatchewan and would cut the Saskatchewan deficit in half. The government would still be money ahead because in that constituency we would still be collecting approximately $20 million more in taxes directly from people working.

The problem with this government is a failure of the political imagination. This government has run out of gas.

I have just run through a scenario in one constituency on how any government could spend its money more wisely to put people to work. I have demonstrated that the taxpayers of Canada would benefit from it. It is time for this government to go. If it cannot do it let somebody else do it. We are ready to do it. We are ready to help other people do it. It is time we got on with it.

Madam Deputy Speaker: As we are resuming debate, I would like to advise the House we have now completed the first five hours of debate on this bill. We will now proceed with 10-minute speeches.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Madam Speaker, this is indeed an interesting bill to be debating at a time of record unemployment in this country. There is record despair and a record number of bankruptcies in this country. Record numbers of Canadians are unemployed and on welfare. Record numbers of children are living in poverty. A record number of individuals say that the current government in power, if it ever has the gall to go back to the electorate soon, would receive the biggest trouncing of any elected government in the history of this country.

We are here debating the bill for borrowing authority so the government can further its desires for some of the measures it put in the last budget.

It is an interesting time for Canadians. We are sitting here debating a bill that will allow the government to continue economic policies that have been a travesty to the Canadian public.

In order to put this government's economic agenda in perspective we have to understand what it has done over the last eight years. What has it done since it came into power? Way back in 1984 Brian Mulroney was canvassing across the country. He was promising jobs, jobs, jobs and two chickens in every pot. He said Tory times were going to be good times again. He talked about fundamental tax reform. The Conservatives were going to make sure the tax system was fair because under those dirty old Liberals it was not.

What did the Conservatives do? They created jobs, jobs, jobs all right, but unfortunately they were not in Canada. They created jobs, jobs, jobs in places like Buffalo, Detroit, Toledo, Chicago and every border city in the United States because the free trade deal forced many Canadian manufacturers to shut their doors and move to their parent plant operations somewhere in the United States.

The clock is ticking but the Conservatives do not want to go to the electorate because they know what is going to happen to them. The Conservatives will probably try to fool the Canadian public with the NAFTA and promises of jobs, jobs, jobs again. This time the Canadian public will not be fooled.

It is important for us to understand what the Conservatives have done with taxation. Since these people came to power in 1984 with a promise of fundamental restructuring of the Canadian economy they have increased taxes in 40 different areas, excluding the GST, to July of last year. That is real fundamental tax reform. It is called: "Take more from those who have the least amount to give".

Since this government came to power the middle income groups have paid $1,500 more on average per family in constant dollars per year. Even those individuals whose incomes are around $10,000 per year are paying more taxes in 1992 than they would have paid in 1984.

• (1150)

The government said it had to come in with this new tax, the GST, because that old awful federal sales tax was unfair, that it was taking too much money and was making Canadian businesses uncompetitive.

Do you know how many times the government has increased it? Let me see. I have a chart here: October 1984, January 1986, April 1986, July 1985, July 1987, January 1988, June 1989, January 1988, May 1985, February 1986, February 1986, January 1988, April 1989, February 1991. That is the number of times by budgetary measures this bunch opposite raised that dirty, awful, old federal sales tax that it had to replace with that wonderful example of genius called the goods and services tax.

The implication from increases in federal sales tax alone from 1984 to the time that government replaced it with the GST was an extra $9 billion in revenue.

In short what we have is a government that from 1984 to 1992 has set about a legislative regime to introduce more tax increases and increase the federal revenues at a greater rate than at any other time in our recent history.

The government was raking the dough in. It was coming in hand over fist. One would have assumed, since Tories are supposed to be such wonderful economic managers, that the deficit would have been dropping like a stone. Au contraire. It did not happen. At the same time as it was raking in record amounts of revenue this bunch opposite was spending like money was going out of style. They are probably the worst fiscal managers we have seen in this century in this country.

They misspent themselves into a doubling of the federal deficit in eight years. They have doubled the federal deficit at a time of record increases in revenue, record tax increases, and have also made a new record for record deficits.

It took them almost two years to admit that we were in a recession. It took them less than two minutes after Statistics Canada came out with the first positive figures to declare the recession dead.

The current Minister of Finance one year ago came into this House and indicated that all was well, recovery was around the corner, not to worry, there was a light at the end of the tunnel, things were going to be wonderful again, just in time for another federal election.

At that time the Minister of Finance had estimated that the federal debt for this current year was going to be about $27 billion or $28 billion. Now we find out that maybe he was wrong again. Just like his predecessor was wrong each and every time he stood in this Chamber, since I arrived here, and gave an economic projection. He is not wrong by a mere $1 billion or $2 billion, or $3 billion, or $4 billion. He is wrong by between $7 billion and $8.5 billion.

The man cannot add. He certainly cannot read, because every economist in the country has been saying the direction this government's economic policies were taking the country would lead to further despair and disaster.

Twelve months ago the Minister of Finance stood up in response to the second record year of bankruptcies in Canada. He told us not to worry that it was the end of the recession and that it was just a final big blip on the scale before bankruptcies dropped like a stone. But that was not true. He went for the real triple crown and that was the third record year of bankruptcies. Only one week ago, after we were supposed to be out of the recession, after he told us 12 months ago that all was well, we debated and asked questions of this front bench about the reasons that another record was broken because 1992 was another record year for Canadian bankruptcies.

In the province of Nova Scotia we saw a 25 per cent increase over the last record year in the number of business bankruptcies. We saw a slight decrease in the level of personal bankruptcies, but the fact remains that in the province of Nova Scotia last year there was approximately one bankruptcy for every 318 Nova Scotians. That is this government's brand of economic recovery.

What the government did during these record years of revenue and record years of deficit building is something else which will take perhaps a decade to repair. What it did was to destroy the partnership federal governments have always had with their provincial government counterparts.

The federal government has the power of taxation. It has the power, if it has the will, through legislative programs and through constitutional requirements to equalize wealth in this country. But what has it done at a record time of tax increases? While it has been building record deficits it has been transferring the deficit from its mismanagement down to the provinces.

I want to quote this: "As a result of four successive budgets by this government, the May 1985 budget, the April 1989 budget, the February 1990 budget and the February 1991 budget, these budgets had provisions in them for a decreased participation by the federal government in cost-shared programs". We call them EPF, Established Programs Financing. That is for post-secondary education and for medicare. It is supposed to be 50 cents on the dollar. The result of those changes alone would amount to $42 billion less being transferred to the provinces for just those two programs over a 10-year period. In effect, the government has taken its fiscal mismanagement and transferred it down to the provinces right across this country which in turn have had to transfer it down to the municipalities.

This government seeks the authority and the support of this House to do more of the same for Canadians. I think not. The only good thing about this particular bill is that it will be the last time this government has an opportunity to come before this House and seek authority to borrow money. It will be one hell of a long time after the election before the Canadian public puts its faith and its treasury in the hands of the bunch opposite.

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to stand in the House today to speak to third reading of Bill C-98, an act to provide additional borrowing authority for the fiscal year beginning on April 1, 1992.

I am somewhat disturbed. Although the government certainly has been trying to present a positive picture, the government's incompetence is well-known across this country.

We are in the midst of probably the worst recession since the 1930s. We have 1.5 million Canadians unemployed, 2.3 million on welfare and 3.8 million living below the poverty line, and that includes more than one million children. More than two million people in this country are forced to rely on food banks.

Recently the Minister of Finance had the audacity to appear on a television program and declare that his government had created more jobs than any other G-7 country. What the minister failed to say is that Canada has lost more jobs than any other country and the jobs the government has created are low paying, part-time jobs.

We on this side of the House have steadfastly put forward ideas to stimulate growth through policies that will create jobs and encourage the private sector to expand. Last January, as an example, we proposed a five-point emergency economic plan designed to help create jobs and encourage growth. The proposal's centrepiece was a national shared infrastructure program with equal funding from federal, provincial and municipal governments. These initiatives would have been an investment in people.

I have been campaigning for a significant commitment to municipal infrastructure for years, first as a 10-year municipal councillor, then as a co-chair of the Liberal Party's national task force on municipal infrastructure in 1989 and repeatedly in this House during my four years in office.

In the summer and fall of 1989 my colleague from Ottawa Centre and I travelled to every province and territory in Canada to look into the crisis facing Canada's towns and cities and to increase national awareness about this serious issue.

The task force hearings confirmed my fears about the environmental and economic dangers which are looming as the result of inadequate infrastructure throughout the country. Only 10 per cent of all raw sewage east of Ontario is treated. More than eight million Canadians, or one-third of our population, live in municipalities without sewage treatment.

I heard horror stories about raw sewage floating down ditches, about harbours where boats plough through sewage floating in the water and about public beaches which are closed each time it rains due to polluted storm sewer run-off.

• (1200)

I visited towns without any sewage treatment and towns with aging systems that were never designed to handle the toxic discharges of modern communities. The threats to public safety are many and obvious. The report of the task force proposed a broad range of measures which were applauded by the Canadian Federation of Municipalities.

During the weeks leading up to the December mini budget I waited anxiously to hear from the Minister of Finance. Rumours were ripe that his government would finally see the light and make a commitment to Canada's infrastructure. The minister's proposal turned out to be a huge disappointment.

The present Minister of Transportation is a former colleague of mine. He was a director of the Federation of Canadian Municipalities. At that time the present Minister of Transportation in this House used to stand up as director of municipalities and say how much the federal government should be participating in this Canada-wide infrastructure program.

The member then became a member of this Parliament and he did an about-face. He is hiding behind the skirts of the Prime Minister and will not take a public stand on this issue. The government announced that it expects to create under 5,000 jobs, half the number to be cut at CN Rail alone.

The $500 million committed by the government to the infrastructure program over five years amounts to only about a fifth of the $2.5 billion taken from the unemployed. None of the spending will be on desperately needed local community projects. In other words, the infrastructure program is inadequate. What else can we expect from a very inadequate government?

The government's announcement also contained a frightening message to employees in Canada, particularly women. As the Liberal critic for human rights and the associate critic for women's issues I am appalled that Canadians who are fired or who quit their jobs will not get any benefits. This leaves people near the bottom of the economic ladder, particularly women, open to abuse.

Up to this point female employees who have been harassed by their employer, supervisor or colleagues have had the option of quitting their jobs and receiving UI benefits to which they have contributed. Once removed from a bad work environment the employee can more easily take formal action against the alleged offender, whether by way of an action for damages or a human rights complaint.

The new provision means a fundamental change in the power relationship between employers and employees. Women will have to put up with harassment from unscrupulous employers or quit and go on welfare. The onus of proving just cause in order to be eligible for UI benefits will fall solely on the employee.

Short of taking legal action how will she prove just cause? What is the level of proof required? Will naming an employer or other employee as a perpetrator of harassment result in an investigation by a government department? Will this increase the risk of a libel suit against the employee who makes a complaint outside the judicial process? Will there be an independent tribunal set up to determine the guilt or innocence of the employer?

Fifty thousand people turned out in Montreal this past weekend to protest against this unfair measure, yet the government's response to these protesters was weak and totally erroneous. It said: "They are all separatists".

The government has also reduced the unemployment insurance benefit rate for new recipients from 60 per cent to 57 per cent. The effect of this reduction will be to freeze the average benefit per recipient. The savings will amount to $550 million in the first year and $1 billion in the second year.

This will have serious effects on women, who continue to earn approximately two-thirds of what men do. The impact on unemployed female workers of having their benefits reduced from 60 per cent to 57 per cent will simply ensure that women, many of whom are single parents, continue to live near or under the poverty line.

This measure continues the treatment that women received from this government in the February 1992 budget. For example, the child benefit has been widely denounced as a totally inadequate anti-poverty measure. The cutbacks to social housing expenditures and the elimination of the co-operative housing program means that single mothers will be denied affordable housing.

Not only has the government done nothing to assist women to get back into the labour force but it is forcing the unemployed, the poorest of whom are women, to shoulder the responsibility for deficit reduction. Also, the government has again hacked at our Public Service by once again freezing the salary of public servants, tens of thousands of whom earn an income below the poverty line. At a time when consumer confidence is so low it is wrong to make public servants bear the brunt of the federal government's fiscal mismanagement.

This Conservative government has underlined its philosophy that collective bargaining does not have a role to play in Canada. This is a total contradiction of this government's own legislation.

I am appalled at the total lack of regard for the Ottawa-Carleton region. It is also obvious that this Conservative government, including the Minister of Supply and Services, has given up on the National Capital Region.

If the government was serious about saving money it would stop spending the millions it spends on partisan polls and Conservative consultants. If the Prime Minister was truly interested in spending restraint he would slash the size of his cabinet.

The Conservative commitment to the environment, its green plan, melts each time the Department of Finance looks at it. Another $172 million has been cut from the much touted green plan. That is the third cut for a total of 10 per cent in cuts since the plan was unveiled two years ago. Further, less than one-third of the money the government promised for the green plan will be spent before the next election.

For small business the government is launching what it calls a small business employment and investment package. The package has five components but all but one do little to address the two fundamental problems facing small business today, which are the credit crunch and the lack of equity financing.

I welcome the 10 per cent investment tax credit but would have liked to have seen it extended to all small businesses. The small business financing program has been blasted by both the small business and banking communities. Eligibility requirements are simply too restrictive and the program's scope is inadequate. To date only a very small number of businesses have actually been able to take advantage of the program.

I do not oppose raising the ceiling for loans made under the Small Businesses Loans Act as the government has done, but the measure does nothing to address the fact that banks are simply not lending money. In addition, by failing to expand the definition of what constitutes a small business there are still enterprises in new service industries that are ineligible.

Fortunately there are a few proposals put forward by this government with which I agree, though I must admit there are very few. I was pleased to see that the home buyers plan, first proposed by the Liberals last January, has been extended to 1994. The minister also proposed to increase funding under the industrial research assistance program first put forward by my party.

Mr. Ron Fisher (Saskatoon—Dundurn): Madam Speaker, I must confess that speaking on the borrowing bill of the government this morning is no great pleasure, despite the fact that it is truly a pleasure to be speaking in the House of Commons.

If this government had come close to living up to the promises it made at the time of the last election we would not be standing here talking about having to borrow money to anywhere near the extent that we are. On the other hand, what if we had taken the advice of the minister of fisheries, if we had heeded his words before the last election? In the city of Regina, the capital of the province of Saskatchewan from which I come, he quite blatantly said that if he were to tell the Canadian public what the Conservatives were going to do once they got elected the Canadian public would not vote for them.

• (1210)

He certainly lived up to that promise because during the last election they did not tell the Canadian public in any real terms what they were going to do other than create jobs, introduce the free trade agreement with the United States and create prosperity like this country had never known.

The unfortunate and predictable part of the situation is that they have wrought havoc on this country such as we have not seen since the days of the depression of the thirties. It is not any coincidence that it is the same government and the same political philosophy that led us into the last depression.

The fact of the matter is that we have not seen such a tremendous decrease in production in this country since the 1930s. It certainly speaks ill of this government that we must be here today borrowing excessive amounts of money and paying excessive amounts of interest on money being borrowed to cover up the mistakes it has made and to cover up for promises it made. The Canadian public took for granted it was telling the truth when it made those promises and it has not fulfilled them.

There are any number of areas in which we could examine what this government is doing, whether in monetary or social terms, and find it lacking on almost every count. In fact it is lacking on every count.

I do not know how many budgets we have had since I came to the House of Commons in 1988 but every one of them was presented in the most glowing of terms. The Minister of Finance of the day assured us that the budgets being introduced would get the country back on track, that they would get the deficit and the accumulation of the debt of the nation back on track and then decrease them.

In last spring's budget the government miscalculated by a mere $10 billion, and of course we find ourselves talking about borrowing money as a result. The promises have simply not been there. Some of the solutions the government is coming up with to try to save some money are just beyond imagination. Some of the programs it is coming up with are unimaginable in their severity for a civilized country in 1993, in the latter part of the 20th century.

Canada has been a world leader in many of the social programs which we have instituted. We may not have initiated them first but in a lot of cases we certainly were not very far behind in the implementation of those programs, throughout at least the first world as it is sometimes called. I am referring to social programs such as the unemployment insurance and pension plans we have, and labour legislation to some extent, although that falls far short of the OECD countries particularly.

We find ourselves speaking at the present time as a result of the mini budget, Bill C-98, introduced last December. We find ourselves in a situation, and this is the vicious part, in which those people who for whatever reason find themselves unable to continue in a job and quit now find themselves not only having had their unemployment insurance benefits reduced from 60 per cent to 57 per cent but are now disenfranchised and prevented from being able to collect any unemployment insurance at all. I stress, for any reason whatsoever.

The government is implying that there are hordes and hordes of people out there who quit their jobs for the most frivolous reasons, with the sole purpose of collecting unemployment insurance.

The situation is similar with people who are on welfare. The implication from the other side of the House is that because of some of the Draconian measures it has taken in the past people on welfare are also out to cheat the system. The fact is that living on unemployment insurance or welfare is not exactly easy street. It is simply a vicious move on the government's part to insinuate that so many people are going on unemployment insurance because it is easy street. Unfortunately it is feeding fuel to the fire of the prejudices held by the general public.

I would suggest to anyone in this House and anyone watching the proceedings of the House that if they know of anyone who is supposedly cheating on unemployment insurance they ought to report him or her. No one in this House would ever suggest for a moment that anyone who is cheating on unemployment should not suffer some kind of a penalty.

The supposition is that people are out there looking for work, but in this day and age when work is so difficult to find and millions of people are unemployed, the prospects of finding a job are very slim. Nonetheless, that does not excuse anyone from looking for a job.

I am suggesting that there are very few cheaters out there. The government is trying to make a case where none exists. It is out to punish those who discontinue employment for very good reasons. In some very unfair situations people find themselves fired because they cannot contemplate continuing where they are presently working because of the attitude of the employer.

Just within the last day or so the minister has said that if there are valid reasons these people will be able to receive unemployment insurance. There are 40 categories in which they are allowed to exercise their right to quit and still receive unemployment insurance.

In the last couple of days we have seen the case of fishers, which is the terminology today for people who go out to sea to catch the fruits of our oceans. There was the tragic loss of a fishing ship in the Atlantic and now the comrades of the dead fishers, some of whom were out on the rescue mission, are refusing to go to sea. We saw their employer on television saying: "No, no, no, there are hazards in all occupations. Going out to sea and having your ship sink underneath you is just one of the hazards. There really is no reason whatsoever not to go". If the employer says go, you go. That is a good example of the kind of intimidation employers use most frequently to force people to stay in jobs which for the most part are really quite intolerable. In the final analysis, the government's proposed changes are not going to save it a tremendous amount of money anyway.

The cuts of 10 per cent to the Crow benefit are equally as devastating to the agricultural community in the province of Saskatchewan.

• (1220)

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Madam Speaker, I am delighted to have an opportunity to speak on Bill C–98. This very small document sets out the very large figure of $8.2 billion that the government is asking for today.

One really has to ask what has been accomplished by this government since 1984. It is difficult to look anywhere in the Canadian economy today and find a bright spot. There are some dim bulbs, especially on the other side of the House, but there is hardly a bright spot in the Canadian economy. I come from northern Ontario so I have a particular perspective. It is difficult to describe the economic chaos that exists.

It is discouraging that this government was launched into office in 1984 at the time of the longest sustained growth period in our history. The six–year period from 1984 to the spring of 1990 was the longest sustained growth period since World War II. What did the government do? It totally squandered it.

It talked about balancing the books; deficits continued to rise and the Minister of Finance was never right. In spite of that taxes were increased dramatically every year. There were 31 new taxes during that six or seven year period. It is incredible. It was the longest sustained growth period in history. The Tory government increased taxes dramatically and yet the deficit rang in every year at $27 billion, $28 billion and $30 billion. There was an opportunity to reduce the deficits we suffered from the very strong recession we had in 1981–82 but nothing was accomplished. In fact the deficit today is double what it was when this government took office. It was some $176 million then and is now over $450 billion today.

It really is an incredible time and a very discouraging time for Canadians. That is why this government has languished in the public opinion polls between 12 and 18 per cent during the past two or three years.

Besides increasing taxes on businesses and people—and I have not even come to the GST yet—it has really put an incredible tax on the provincial governments. They in turn have pushed that down to municipal governments.

If we look at what was done with the Established Programs Financing Act since 1985, it is incredible that financial institutions, hospitals and medicare systems in our country even continue to function. The provinces have had to compensate for the reductions. The government began reducing assistance in the 1985 budget. The Established Programs Financing arrangements had previously been a 50/50 arrangement. The government gradually moved away from that toward a system where the increase in cost of health care and education programs due to inflation was reduced by 1 per cent, 2 per cent and then 3 per cent. In other words, if inflation was 5 per cent, the provinces picked up all of that amount. In the first year of the Established Programs Financing the reduction in funds for the 1986–1987 fiscal year was $316 million. By 1992–1993, the current fiscal year, the reduction in funds being transferred to the provinces was $5.9 billion. Imagine any province, especially the smaller provinces, trying to pick up $5.9 billion. By 1995–1996 the reduction in assistance to provinces for health and education will be $9.3 billion. The total reduction over that 10-year period will be $42 billion.

The government is not only preying on the people and putting the economy into the worst recession in history since 1990 but it is off-loading its financial responsibilities for the key areas of health and education.

It is interesting that everywhere in the competitiveness arrangement the government has set up there is reference to education and training. This is how we are going to be more competitive and take on the markets of the world. What the government has done in post-secondary education during that 10-year period totally flies in the face of its talk about further education and training.

Over the 10-year period for post-secondary education the government has reduced transfers to the provinces. In 1986 they were reduced by $91 million. For 1992–1993 funding for secondary education is being reduced by $1.7 billion. Over the course of the 10-year period the reduction totals $12 billion for post-secondary education.

This government is talking about globalization and international competitiveness. Those two concepts do not even begin to make a believable arrangement.

The bankruptcy statistics for this past year for the three provinces that historically have had major economic growth are really quite frightening. The figures are extremely high even in provinces like Nova Scotia, where in 1992 there were 2,678 bankruptcies.

This did not just happen. It happened because the government brought in a fiscal and monetary policy in 1990 which drove the country into recession. If people think that John Crow does not get his orders from the previous Minister of Finance they only have to watch the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance defend those policies.

In 1988 we signed a free trade deal with the United States. By 1989–1990 there was a disparity in the prime interest rate of at least 5 per cent or 6 per cent. Historically it has always been 1 per cent or 1.5 per cent. During 1989 and 1990 we drove the economy into a recession and did not let up for even a year or two after that.

The government had the gall to bring in its statement of constitutional reform but the responsibility of the Bank of Canada was to keep inflation at zero. Nobody had ever heard of such a proposal before but this government decided that its policy was to drive down inflation to a level that drove literally thousands of businesses out of business.

• (1230)

This was at a time when we were entering into a free trade deal with the United States, and our producers, exporters, and our forestry and manufacturing sectors were experiencing a total financial blood-bath. Hundreds of thousands of jobs were lost because of the interest rates, certainly in Ontario and in other provinces as well. Those extremely high interest rates of 14 per cent in the spring of 1990, five or six percentage points above those of the United States, drove the dollar so high that they were simply not able to compete.

We can examine those figures concerning bankruptcies in the province of Ontario. Between 1991 and 1992 there was an increase of 4 per cent, 1,429 more in 1992 than in 1991. That is an increase from 29,989 to 31,418. These businesses were destroyed by the fiscal and monetary policy of this government. It is a tragedy. This bill to give this government another $8 billion of borrowing power should not be approved.

Mr. Lee Clark (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 26(1), I move that the House continue to sit beyond the normal hour of adjournment for the purpose of continuing consideration of Bill C-98, the Borrowing Authority Act.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of the Environment moves that the House continue to sit during lunch hour for the purpose of studying Bill C-98. All those members against this motion will please rise.

And fewer than 15 members having risen:

Madam Deputy Speaker: There are not 15 members rising in objection to the motion. According to the provisions of Standing Order 26(1)(6) the motion is deemed to be carried.

Motion agreed to.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Madam Speaker, that was one of the government's most interesting speeches so far. It has suggested extending the debate until Question Period, in other words, until 2 p.m. I have no objection. I have no problem with a debate on government bills.

Bill C-98 proposes to authorize expenditures, by way of loan or by the issue and sale of securities of Canada, in an amount or amounts not exceeding a total of eight billion two hundred million dollars. That is a lot of money. One billion means one thousand million dollars. A very substantial amount of money is involved.

Canadians and members who speak in the House on their behalf have the right to ask the government to account for its administration of public funds. Parliament has the right to expect the government to inform the House of Commons and the general public on its financial administration.

Canadians have every reason to be concerned about the government's ability to manage public moneys as they should be managed. During today's debate, many members raised a number of serious questions, including the unemployment problem. Canada now has 1,600,000 unemployed workers. These are people who are actively looking for work, are able to work and want to work, but cannot find jobs.

In Ottawa-Carleton 700 jobs were lost in January 1993, in one month. According to the experts at Statistics Canada, however, the recession is over.

Tell that to the 1.6 million unemployed workers. Tell that to another million Canadians who are living in difficult circumstances after losing any hope of finding a job that pays and are either on welfare or being supported by their families. Tell them the recession is over, that the government is compassionate and that it has an economic recovery plan. That is not what I hear at my riding office.

It is unfortunate to have to say this, but Canadians have lost confidence in a government that, as we have said repeatedly, has outlived its usefulness. It is time the government was replaced and the people were given a chance to decide. It is time Canadians had their say about managing change to make the economy more dynamic. That is what counts: letting Canadians decide and meeting the challenge of more effective and efficient government.

[English]

This morning we heard people talk about the GST and its impact on Canadians. In the past while we have come under attack by the Conservatives and sometimes by the NDP over what we would do to replace—

Mr. Johnson: Oh, are we going to hear?

Mr. Gauthier: Sit down and listen. It will only take 10 minutes. I only have 10 minutes. I may tell the member a few things about what Liberals will do—

Mr. Soetens: Probably nothing.

Mr. Gauthier: The member can make that judgement after I am finished speaking.

Let us look at the facts first. The Conservatives have raised taxes or imposed new taxes on individuals 38 times since taking power in 1984. That is a fact. The average Canadian family is paying $1,500 more in taxes than it was in 1984.

The GST, the most hated tax in Canadian history, was imposed on Canadians without proper consultation. It was imposed on small business despite its opposition to this tax. It was imposed on the provinces without consultation and over their objections.

The GST destroyed public confidence in the fairness of the tax system. It has expanded the underground economy, and I do not think anybody would deny that. The underground economy is made up of those who work but do not report their earnings or pay taxes. If all Canadians paid the taxes they were supposed to pay our tax load would be diminished.

It has undermined consumer confidence to the extent that people are now not spending. It slowed down the economy. It lengthened and deepened the recession. It was imposed at the wrong time. It is complex, it is costly and it is unfair. Those are words that we have heard over the last two and a half to three years.

There is an army of bureaucrats administering the GST right now. There are 4,000 to 5,000 public servants who spend their day administering this tax.

We in the opposition have difficulty having any confidence in the information that is made available to us. I defy anybody in this House to examine the public accounts of 1991–92 and honestly tell me that he or she understands the very complicated way in which those figures are presented.

• (1240)

This morning in this House the revenue minister said: "We have presented all the facts in a variety of documents". He sure has. Finance has done that and Revenue Canada has done that to the extent that nobody understands exactly what has happened to the $29.5 billion in gross revenue from the GST and the net result of the $15.1 billion or $15.2 billion that remained at the end.

Mr. Soetens: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The member invited me to stay so I could hear some ideas from him and he is spending time on facts. I would like to hear the ideas rather than the history.

Mr. Gauthier: I want to get to that point because that is exactly what I intend to do for the remaining two or three minutes of my speech. We will clean up the mess that was made for Canadians by the Progressive, God forbid, Conservatives. What nonsense: progressive and conservative. How one can be progressive and conservative at the same time is beyond me.

We will not do what the Conservatives did, which is to railroad a tax, the GST, through Parliament with closure and everything else. The Liberals will implement a replacement in full consultation, and I emphasize that, with individual Canadians, the business community and the provinces.

That is the essence of democracy. People must be heard. People must be asked what they think. We Liberals have been trying to do that. We will ask Canadians to help us, through full consultation, to replace this mess of the GST with a tax that is possibly unlike the existing one but will be understood and accepted by Canadians. We are not pretending like the NDP that it comes down with the snow in the middle of November and disappears. The $15 billion that must be replaced will be replaced. That is true. It is income. The government needs it. Parliament has to authorize it. It has to come from somewhere and it cannot come from Santa Claus.

There will be a public consultation, which is what we need. In the first session of the new Parliament—the hon. member should stick around, maybe he will be there—members will be asked and will be involved. The NDP are always sanctimoniously saying we should not be taxing people or we should not be spending money. In my province of Ontario the NDP is making a mess of the Ontario economy. I regret to say I have no time for these armchair socialists who know everything yet can deliver nothing.

We have been saying for years that the House of Commons and its parliamentary committees should be actively involved in trying to resolve issues in this place. This is a very important issue called taxation, fiscal measures, or the GST. In the next Parliament members of this House should be sitting down with the people of Canada and coming to grips with this issue. They should do so in consultation with Canadians, the business community and the provinces. I am sure that will be done with the assistance of the experts and with the information that will be available to us. When we come into Parliament we will open the books. They will be transparent to Canadians. They will know where they are. They will know where they are going. We will know exactly what to do.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Madam Speaker, I too wish to participate in this debate on Bill C-98, the Borrowing Authority Act, which would allow the Government of Canada to borrow large sums of money.

It is rather ironic that on the very day in which this House will give approval to this particular bill information has been made available to the public with regard to the way in which the members opposite have conducted themselves and the finances of this country.

It is interesting to note that in 1984 members opposite campaigned on a theme of fiscal responsibility and balanced budgets. Shall we say they were to be the new team in Ottawa which was to have a balanced budget? They were the ones who were to take fiscal responsibility, as they said, to the Parliament of Canada.

They also said something else. They also criticized opposition parties and others who had a different approach. They shunted them aside and told Canadians that they and they alone had the capability, the knowledge and the political will to address the national debt.

In 1984 that deficit was in the vicinity of $180 billion to $200 billion, as I am sure hon. members opposite would want to attest. Those great protectors, those individuals opposite in the Progressive Conservative Party, said repeatedly across this country in 1984 that they and they alone had the capability, the political will and the knowledge to have a balanced budget and to reduce the deficit.

Today, on February 11, 1993, we know the success the government opposite has been able to achieve. It has taken a $180 billion to $200 billion deficit and has increased it to $450 billion. What a record, what a record of the administration opposite. It was a sham when it said it in 1984 and it is more demonstrable today. It is an even bigger sham on February 11, 1993.

One thing it said was that it would bring a new sense of taxation fairness to the Canadian people. For eight years the Tory administration has put in place over 40 new taxes, one of which is the GST, a tax brought in at the wrong time. Canadians from coast to coast have told them that. The distinguished, elegant Minister of Labour knows very well that the people he is supposed to represent in this Chamber, his constituents and indeed labour organizations across the country, have told him chapter and verse that 40 new taxes, the GST and a $450 billion deficit is not the way to go.

Surely this minister has a responsibility, if not to the labour organizations he represents then to his conscience. His conscience must be nagging at him each and every day as he walks into this Chamber. He knows there is only one way to clear the air, only one democratic way to put these issues to rest for the next four years, and that is for the hon. Minister of Labour and his colleagues to do the honourable thing: to go to the Governor General to call a general election and give the people of Canada an opportunity.

I have had some deliberations and discussions on other matters with the hon. minister opposite. I want to say for the record that he is a most honourable person, perhaps one of the most honourable opposite. Let the hon. minister be the first to call upon his Prime Minister and his cabinet colleagues to do the right and honourable thing and call a general election to allow the people of Canada either to affirm or disapprove of that administration which has been in office for four years and 75 days.

• (1250)

It was not I as opposition House leader who stood in this place in 1984 and said the following words. I will paraphrase them. The quotations are on the record. They were given time and time again by the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier, the hon. member for Saint-Léonard and my colleagues from Edmonton and Hamilton. It was the right hon. Prime Minister who said that after four years the right and honourable thing to do was to go to the people of Canada.

I say to the Minister of Labour and to the right hon. Prime Minister: "If it was good in 1984 it is certainly good in the fifth year of your mandate. Go to the people and allow the people to decide whether or not your administration has been able to live up to what you stated in 1984 and in subsequent years".

The issues of a general election, tax reform, the proliferation of taxes and the GST concern all Canadians, not just those of us who are in opposition. This very day the leader of the Liberal Party of Canada made a statement in Toronto regarding the fiscal policies of that administration and what we would do if we were given the confidence to run a national government.

We believe it important to have economic growth. We do not have economic growth when the Minister of Labour focuses on the unemployed of this country. I remind the Minister of Labour of what the former right hon. Prime Minister, the member for Yellowhead, said in 1978 when we as the administration brought in changes to unemployment insurance. I ask the Chair and members of the House to compare what he said then to what is going on now.

On December 21, 1978 the then Prime Minister said: "This legislation before us is a terrible abuse of the unemployed, a terrible disservice to Canadians out of work". What is more demonstrable, what is more a disservice to Canadian people than what the Minister of Employment and Immigration is doing to the unemployed?

Our party and our leader have called for fiscal policy commitments. We are committed to fiscal responsibility, unwavering discipline, expenditure control, holding off new programs that do not contribute directly to economic growth and job creation, and reducing the deficit, reducing Canada's debt as a percentage of the GDP.

There might be disposition in the House for me to continue my remarks. I am sure hon. members opposite would agree. It is very clear with regard to federal-provincial fiscal co-operation that monetary policy is a necessity in the Canadian context as we understand it today. We have clearly spelled out our trade policy, unlike the New Democratic Party that heels to one side of the issue regardless of who it may affect or hurt and our views on skills training and small and medium size business. Of course hon. members will hear more about these matters in subsequent speeches as well as through media reports covering the remarks of the Leader of the Opposition.

In conclusion, if members opposite were true to their convictions and the convictions of their Prime Minister they would do the honourable thing and seek out the confidence of the Canadian people by going to the Governor General and calling a national general election.

Mr. Kilgour: I rise on a point of order, Madam Speaker. Since there has been a movement by the government to extend hours I wonder if there might be disposition in the House to have the House leader of our party speak for another few moments.

Some hon. members: Agreed.

An hon. member: No.

Madam Deputy Speaker: There is no period for questions and comments after this point. We will resume debate with the hon. member for Surrey North.

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to rise to speak on the borrowing bill.

As most of the House is aware I come from one of the most dynamic and growing communities in Canada, Surrey North. Since the last federal election 11,000 additional households have been built in Surrey. Right now the new Surrey Centre will become the second town centre on the lower mainland. By the year 2010 Surrey will be bigger than the city of Vancouver.

Part of that development is being done by the Gateway project, a $100 million project involving private developers, union pension plans and a general contractor who works with the unions and private developers to ensure that the jobs are filled by union labour. It is now the biggest integrated development taking place in North America in terms of capital construction involving residential and commercial properties.

An hon. member: All this good news because of the free trade agreement.

Mr. Karpoff: All this good news because of the vitality of the NDP government and its co-operation with the labour movement in developing jobs in B.C.

It is interesting to see what the federal government is doing in a growing community like this one. Last week we had three examples of that.

First, out of the blue the federal government announced that it would close the immigration office in Surrey, one of the busiest offices on the lower mainland because of our vital ethnic population. Suddenly it decided, in order to prop up the member for Vancouver Centre, to close the Surrey and New Westminster offices and move them to Vancouver, to her riding.

An efficiency study had been done of the offices in Vancouver, Surrey and New Westminster. Lo and behold, Surrey and New Westminster were far more efficient than the Vancouver office. An application could be processed in Surrey in five weeks whereas it took six months to do so in Vancouver. An extension of a visa was done within two days in Surrey and took two weeks in Vancouver. Per man productivity was much higher in those two offices.

It will cost the government $330,000 more for leasehold costs in downtown Vancouver than it is paying in Surrey. The total cost in Surrey and New Westminster was $80,000 so it will cost nearly $250,000 to move those offices downtown to prop up the seat of the Minister of National Defence. The Surrey office is a money-maker. It raised $4 million in application fees last year.

This is one of the things the Tories do in a vitally growing community.

Second, the Tories announced that it would close the main Surrey post office and sorting service, affecting 100 jobs. Lo and behold, they will move them to downtown Vancouver. This is after a year and a half of discussion. The greater Vancouver regional district and the mayor of the city of Vancouver have gone on the official record as being opposed to centralizing jobs in the downtown core. It also goes against the structural engineer's report that says the main post office in Vancouver is unsafe and that there should not be a consolidation.

• (1300)

As a side issue, how did this government which values itself on labour relations inform the employees that their jobs were gone? It sent a letter to my office in Ottawa at seven o'clock in the morning announcing that the Surrey post office was being closed.

At ten o'clock I phoned the local union president to find out what he knew about the details and particularly what would happen to the 100 workers. Were all their jobs going to be transferred downtown? Would there be a job loss?

What did I find out? The government had not informed the union. It had not informed the employees. How the employees and union found out about this closure was by putting me on the speaker phone. I read the part from the press release that said the government was going to work in co-operation and had been consulting with the union and the employees about this decision.

An hon. member: Pitiful.

Mr. Karpoff: It was pitiful. Later that morning, of course, I found out from the regional manager that contrary to what the press release said, all the jobs were not being transferred downtown, that there would be a loss of 20 jobs.

We had this vibrant residential community where the GVRD is saying: Keep the jobs in the community where people live. Keep the jobs where the growth is. What do we have? We have this government, for crass political reasons, trying to prop up the seat of the Minister of National Defence against all the advice and recommendations by transferring jobs downtown.

What was the third blow? There was the announcement that the federal government was not going to increase grants in lieu of taxes. It just so happens that Surrey has a number of very large federal facilities. One is the taxation centre which processes taxes for B.C. and most of western Canada. We have all sorts of federal facilities along the border because of customs and excise. Traditionally we have had, but are in the process of losing, one of the two big mail sorting services. The grants in lieu of taxes for Surrey amount to nearly $1 million. The tax increase in Surrey that would be expected is about 4.5 per cent this year. Therefore around $45,000 will now have to be raised by local taxpayers through cutting school programs, not proceeding with park development that is so necessary, or by raising residential property taxes.

An hon. member: Off-loading.

Mr. Karpoff: This of course comes on the heels of this government already off-loading a number of things on to the local municipalities, particularly through its withdrawal from the unemployment insurance program and making sure that was being funded by employees and employers.

The cost to the municipality in terms of increases to the school board, the municipality and the hospital is well over $1 million a year. The three largest employers in Surrey are the hospital, the school board and the municipality. They are the ones who have had to pick up the off-loading from the unemployment insurance program.

This is the kind of triple blow this government has laid upon my Surrey, the community that is the growth area. It has absorbed 60 per cent of all residential housing starts in the lower mainland in the last five years. It is being projected as the new centre of the lower mainland. Within 20 years, into the next century, it will be the centre of the lower mainland because of its geographical situation and its population growth.

I want to close with one comment. We have heard a lot from the Liberals about unemployment insurance and they have made some quotes which are quite interesting. When the Tories were criticizing them the Liberals were dropping the unemployment insurance fund by 6 per cent, reducing it from 66 per cent to 60 per cent. Now the Liberals are screaming when the Tories are doing only half of what the Liberals did before. Shame.

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Mr. Speaker, I wish I had time to talk at more length because 10 minutes is not very long. Bill C-98 would authorize the government to borrow not exceeding, in the whole, $8.2 billion as may be required for public works and general purposes. A number of points have been made and I would like to reinforce some of them.

First, the government has raised taxes or imposed new taxes on individual Canadians 38 times since taking office in 1984. The GST is the most hated tax in Canadian history. As the member said, I think it was certainly the major reason I was expelled from your party, Mr. Speaker. I had received phone calls, visits, petitions and letters from, I believe, 7,500 constituents in opposition to the tax. I think I heard from less than 20 constituents speaking in favour of the tax.

Having worked as a tax lawyer and briefly as an economist I was convinced that it was a bad tax, extremely harmful to the small business community. A man down the street from where I live in Mill Woods tells me that he still spends two hours a day at his convenience store trying to fill out the forms and keep the GST and his credits straight. That tax is an abomination for the small business community which we know has been creating up to 80 per cent of the new jobs and can create many, many more once a new government can turn the economy around.

The GST was imposed on Canadians without proper consultation and very little was said about it during the 1988 election campaign by the then Minister of Finance. It was imposed on small businesses despite their objections and was imposed on the provinces over their objections.

The GST destroyed public confidence in the fairness of our entire tax system. It expanded the underground economy. I am told by a resident of your city, Mr. Speaker, that an increasing number of Calgarians who can afford it and can have their finances adjusted to do it are living through their companies in order to avoid paying the GST. If they buy a car in the name of their company, because of the credits and so on a number of Calgarians are avoiding the GST.

That is the kind of abuse this kind of a tax creates. It is undermining consumer confidence, lengthening and deepening the most serious recession we have had since the Great Depression of the 1930s. It is complex and costly for small business to administer and it takes an army of about 4,000 who were hired to administer the GST. It has made federal-provincial fiscal relations much more difficult.

If this party on this side of the House is called upon by the Canadian people to form a government we will have to try to clean up this mess. Unlike those opposite who have railroaded the GST through Parliament we intend to implement a replacement in full consultation with Canadians across the country, the business community and the provinces.

Unlike the NDP, which thinks it can cancel the GST and have $15 billion fall from the sky, our party acknowledges that the only responsible course is to replace the revenue brought in by the GST.

In the first session of the new Parliament this party, if called upon to form a government, will mandate the all-party Commons finance committee to consult Canadians and provincial governments on all options to the current GST and to report within 12 months. Our object is clear: to replace the GST in a way that generates equivalent revenues is fairer to consumers, is easier for small business to administer and promotes federal-provincial co-operation.

• (1310)

One example is the state of Washington. It has a sales tax. I am told that if people are subject to that tax, if they are manufacturers or otherwise caught by it, once a year they write a cheque for 1.5 per cent of their gross sales. Because it does not have the credit system and all the administrative headaches, that tax produces virtually as much revenue as our tax does with its credit system.

This brings me to page 2.28 of the Public Accounts of Canada. At the bottom of that page signed by the Auditor General of Canada there is a statement I think Canadians will find of considerable interest. It is called: "The Debt Servicing and Reduction Account, Statement of Transactions for the year ended March 31, 1992, in thousands of dollars". It says: "Goods and services tax gross revenue: $28.76 billion, more or less. Goods and services tax refunds and rebates: $11.329 billion, more or less. Goods and services tax quarterly tax credits: $2.2 billion".

Plainly, the system is not working. I was not at the public accounts committee meeting but I gather that even professionals of the Government of Canada went to great pains trying to explain this particular table I have been referring to.

In the time available let me speak on what we are going to have to do as a new government in trying to make some order out of the finances of the Government of Canada. Before I do so I will quote from one paragraph of a speech given by the Auditor General in Quebec City on January 19, 1993. He said:

[Translation]

You may have read the result of a Gallup poll in the press about two weeks ago. In that survey, Canadians were asked what percentage of their taxes the federal government wasted. I am sorry to tell you that for all of Canada, people believed that 47 cents of every dollar was wasted.

[English]

In other words, it would appear that for Canada as a whole half of the money raised by the federal government is perceived to be wasted by the federal government.

I did a poll in my riding, Mr. Speaker, and I suspect it is no different in yours. The question was: "Does the federal government use your money in a responsible way?" Ninety-seven per cent of those who replied, the highest consensus I have ever had on any issue in a questionnaire, thought that the federal government did not use public money in an efficient way.

Very few Canadians have to be told that the most urgent task of any new national government, I hope the Chrétien government, is creating and maintaining jobs and training and retraining people of all ages.

Far too many families with jobs today fear that a family member could lose a job. That is why speeding up the delivery of training and retraining programs is a key feature of my party's emergency economic plan.

Key elements in it include our proposal for a federal-provincial shared-cost program on infrastructure, roads and that sort of thing and an increased capital cost allowance for new plants and equipment. These are to come from existing spending allocations within the federal spending total.

On January 27 the leader of this party said that the people will come first to his government. One of his first points was that we must: "raise the level of knowledge and skill of the vast majority of our students so that we can compete effectively in the economy of the future". He reminded listeners that the apprenticeship programs in Germany graduate 600,000 people yearly, whereas Canada as a whole now produces only 24,000 apprentices yearly. Canada needs 200,000 to do as well as Germany in this area.

The leader of our party also noted that the role of government must change. Times change. He zeroed in on fiscal responsibility and sound economic management. He committed himself to reduce the ongoing yearly deficits both in absolute terms and as a percentage of GDP, partly by fostering economic growth and partly by "unwavering discipline in controlling expenditures". Quite properly, the $4.4 billion the Tories have proposed to buy 50 submarine-chasing helicopters will not survive the election of a Liberal government.

If we spent the same huge amount on education or training, for example, it would create up to 75 times as many jobs. Until the deficit is significantly reduced other new programs, other than those directly related to economic grants and jobs, must be financed from the allocation of existing spending.

Hon. William Rompkey (Labrador): Mr. Speaker, I want to continue on from where my hon. colleague left off. He is quite right when he talks about the need to emphasize education and training. That has been one of the abysmal failures of the present government.

We are talking about an $8 million borrowing bill today in addition to what the government has already spent. The fiscal policy and the monetary policy of this government has helped to create the recession in this country.

What is the effect of the recession that we have just come out of? The effect of the recession is to weaken the economy of central Canada. When the economy of central Canada is weakened there is a multiple effect on the extremities of the country because the transfer payments to Atlantic Canada, for example, rely on spending across the country and on the health of the economy of central Canada.

As a result of the economic collapse or near collapse of central Canada transfer payments to the extremities of this country and to the Atlantic provinces have been reduced.

In addition to the reduction in those transfer payments the government has also reduced or frozen, which is the same thing, Established Programs Financing. In this country Established Programs Financing is what pays for post-secondary education and health. There is less money going to my province in transfer payments as a result of the recession and there is less money from Established Programs Financing, which means that all post-secondary education in my province has less money to work with.

What does that mean? It means that tuition fees have increased. It means that fewer people are able to afford to go to university and post-secondary institutions. It means that the institutions in my province, and I suspect across the country or at least in many parts of the country, are starting to become institutions for the rich, for those people who can afford to go.

In addition to the increased tuition and the lack of accessibility for students across the country let us not forget that those who are affected most at a time such as this are young people in the following categories: Women, who need education the most to gain equality; native people, who need special attention and special help and are doubly affected; and disabled people. All of those categories of people who need extra attention are doubly disadvantaged by the programs and policies of this government which gave rise to the recession.

At the same time as young people have been affected workers have been affected. This government has paid lip service to training. In each of the last two budgets $100 million has been cut from the training programs available from the Department of Employment and Immigration.

The government has said that the unemployment insurance fund is supposed to take up the slack and it made changes to the unemployment insurance fund. However that has not happened. There has been a reduction in the amount of training dollars from the Department of Employment and Immigration but at the same time the slack has not taken been up by the unemployment insurance fund.

Workers in this country have less to work with at a time when they need it most because there is a direct connection between productivity and training. There is a direct connection between being competitive and having an educated work force. This is a knowledge economy. This is a time when one does not gain wealth through simple machinery, the physical work of one's hands and physical labour. One gains wealth today through knowledge. If we are going to be competitive as a country we must have a trained work force. That is essential.

We have heard every responsible leader in the world, from the President of the United States and the Prime Minister of Great Britain to the leaders of Japan and Germany, all talk about education being number one.

• (1320)

George Bush wanted to be the education president. Whether or not he was is immaterial. The point is that everybody has recognized that this is paramount. Yet at this time this government has seen fit to cut back on these issues which are of most importance to us.

In this country we have a drop-out rate in secondary school of 30 per cent. There is a 30 per cent drop-out rate across this country. We have an illiteracy rate of something like 25 per cent. In some parts of the country it is more like 40 per cent.

Can we countenance these things at a time when we are in a knowledge economy and we are supposed to have an educated work force? My colleague is quite right in saying that we are asked today to agree to more spending power for a government that has spent wrongly, that has spent money on the wrong things and that has not helped the Canadian people to become competitive.

The second issue I want to talk about is another one to which the government has given lip service. It is infrastructure. Infrastructure must be a public investment. If we are going to be competitive again we must have that infrastructure.

My colleague has talked about the recent speech of my party leader in which he emphasized the importance of training and the importance of infrastructure. We on this side of the House and in this party have a plan to enable that renovation and revitalization of infrastructure across the country.

What is the attitude of the Government of Canada? In the recent budget we heard about a roads program across the country. At first blush it seemed to be a very interesting and very attractive offer. However, the reality is that in my own riding there is a highway that is partly built which would be an excellent investment, the trans-Labrador highway. It would be equal to the Yukon highway in terms of what that highway has done for the Yukon territory. In Yukon tourism is the number one industry. It has been able to build its economy, to build that industry in Yukon, but what does it need to do so? It needs infrastructure. What do we need in my area? We need infrastructure.

The Minister of Finance mentioned the trans-Labrador highway and we were all very excited. What happened? What happened was the offer of $10 million over two years. That is not all. That $10 million was to be cost shared by the province in this country which is the least able to pay. The government is asking Newfoundland and Labrador to come up with an equal amount. If that does not happen then the investment does not go ahead.

We are seeing the nickel and diming of infrastructure in this country. We are seeing lip service to an issue which is extremely important to our economy because it is an investment that will pay off. There is a way for the Government of Canada to make use of dollars it already has to build this infrastructure.

We have seen the example in the fixed link to Prince Edward Island. The proposal for the fixed link to Prince Edward Island is that we make creative use of Marine Atlantic subsidies, which are for shipping on the east coast. I am not talking about cutting out Marine Atlantic totally because we will have an ongoing need for certain ferries but we can reduce that increasingly costly service. We should look at that. We should see where else in the Atlantic provinces we can take those subsidies and put them into roads, as is happening with Prince Edward Island.

The theory behind that is that we take increasingly expensive subsidies which we will have to pay over a period of 20 or 30 years and put them into an investment, in this case a surface road link, which makes a great deal more sense and will pay off in the long run. That is the kind of thinking that we need from the government.

What have we seen? We have seen nickel and diming. We have seen $10 million over two years cost shared 50/50 with a province that cannot afford to pay and has been impacted by the recession brought on to a great degree by the timing of the government in introducing the GST and other measures.

If I were to support and ask my own people to support a government that wants to borrow another $8 billion I would be laughed out of town if I were to go back. They would say to me: "What have we seen?"

What have young people in my area seen in the spending policies of this government? What have construction companies seen in the spending policies of this government? What have tourist operators and fish camp operators seen in the spending policies of this government? We have not seen the kind of policy that we need to improve our position.

Nobody in the Atlantic, in spite of the failure of the fishery, wants a handout. There are things that can be done. There are economic possibilities and opportunities. We need a policy that will seize those opportunities and invest the money in the areas from which there can be an economic pay-off. However that is not within the policy of this present government and we on this side of the House will counsel voting against this particular bill.

Mr. Mike Breaugh (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, I want to participate just briefly today because there are some interesting phenomena to observe. It was said in the last little while that the recession is over. Someone here in Ottawa decided that in a technical sense the recessionary period has ended and we are now moving on to something else.

This is all news to where I live. Where I live the recession continues. General Motors of Canada made its first major announcement of a cutback in its work force in the Oshawa plant. Almost 1,500 workers will be dislocated in some way by the end of March. Housing starts, although a growth area, are not still not what most people would like them to be. In the retail sector there is still not that kind of movement. People are still reluctant to spend, even though during the Christmas period there seemed to be some relief. However, in general economic terms the recession is still with us.

What can governments do to participate in speeding up the recovery period? What can they do that will be sensible and sensitive?

I suppose that we all look to the south where there is a new president trying to introduce some new policies. They do not seem to be in place yet. Initially at least they seem to reflect that the ability of our free trade agreement to protect us from conflicts, or at least to resolve conflicts, seems to have misfired somewhat. In major sectors such as steel we are in a punitive stage again, even though this was not supposed to happen and despite the fact that in a technical sense it was dealt with in a different way than in the free trade agreement. In my part of the country, in southern Ontario, we are still feeling some very negative effects from that recessionary period, from that entry into a free trade agreement with the United States, and from the uncertainty of what a North American free trade agreement will bring.

For us in southern Ontario times are still pretty tough. It is difficult to convince our shopkeepers that the recession is over. It is certainly very difficult to talk to auto workers. Among those who are taking the layoff now are young men and women who have assumed mortgages, have assumed responsibility for educating children, are trying to maintain a family, and thought they had a relatively secure lifestyle but now find that it is all dislocated again.

There is still reasoned apprehension, not doom and gloom. People are worried about their own economic future.

On the good side there seems to be a bit of a resurgence from the private sector and local government. People are saying that they should not look for big handouts from somewhere else but should try to determine what would be a sensible thing to do. Members have talked a little bit about some of them so far today.

In my area there is an airport that needs a little bit of work done. The local municipal government was examining that and trying to decide if there was some assistance available to expedite that process. It was also looking at our harbour. These are our transportation modes. Now is a rational time to try to do something about that. It is important to note that.

Around Ontario one of the things that has impressed me in the last little while is that the Government of Ontario, although it is hard to tell this by reading the Toronto papers, has decided that there are some government initiatives that must be undertaken. Even though in a traditional sense the Government of Ontario, like every other provincial government across Canada, is strapped for cash it is now beginning to proceed with those announcements and is looking at some non-traditional ways to finance them. For example, it is looking to the private sector to participate in the funding of public highways because it is the private sector that, with everyone else, uses them to make a profit. It is looking at experimenting with the idea of a toll system for highways which we have not used in Ontario for quite some time.

What it comes down to is: If one is faced with the decision of making a major transportation announcement and there is a shortfall of cash is it not a better course of action to try to find a non-traditional way to finance that and to proceed with the actual construction?

I think it is, because we need the transportation links. Sometimes they are subway systems in places like metropolitan Toronto. In some places they are new highways, such as highway 407 running through much of eastern Ontario. Sometimes it is a connecting link like highway 416 from Ottawa to highway 401.

All of these are difficult to do in the traditional way because the government in Ontario lacks the sources of revenue. Like every other government it is in hard times. It should get this kind of accommodation. It has not given up on the task. It has attempted to find different ways of doing this. Maybe it is not the traditional way but it has two little hallmarks that are worth noting.

One is identifying this as a good thing to do. It is not just having our own staff saying that is what ought to be done but listening to the needs of the general public, of the private sector and of local government to try to establish what kinds of expenditures are necessary. What would be the spin-off effects of that? What kind of jobs would be created? What other problems would be resolved, in come cases environmental problems?

Perhaps what I ask governments to do these days is a very unusual thing, but they should start the process of trying to assist in an economic recovery by listening. Listen to those around us who are in a position to identify for us what would be a sensible expenditure of public funds at this time and entertain some non-traditional ways of doing that.

I see this government cutting back in very traditional conservative terms by being punitive to people. It is cutting people off benefits for this, that and the other thing. I wish I could believe this would solve all of Canada's economic problems but I do not believe it will. I do not think the kind of punitive action such as it is promoting under the changes to the unemployment insurance system serves a positive function in our society. I suppose a hot line could be set up to have everybody turn in their neighbours. A few bucks will be saved here and there, but I bet the operation of the hot line will probably take away any cash benefits received.

I would like to see this government and governments across Canada take a more positive stance. I know that education is a long-standing problem in many parts of the country and our educational systems are big institutions. I am happy to see that in many locations around Ontario we are beginning for the first time to understand that these systems cannot operate in splendid isolation. They have to work together. There has to be a sense of co-operation and a sense of need from the community up to determine how the system is run and what those young men and women do after they have gone through a period of learning new skills. If there is no job at the end of that it becomes a rather hollow exercise.

There are some good signs ahead for us but it would be folly to insist that because some bureaucrat in Ottawa has decided that the recessionary period has ended that it actually has. It has not as yet. There will be a need for governments to continue to do things but to do sensible things and to do them with some sensitivity.

One of the greatest follies politics brings about is that some political party thinks it is so bright, so smart that it is the only one in the world that has the right idea about what to do. I do not think any person in our society believes that anymore. They should not because it is simply not true.

The political process as I understand it works well when a great many people are involved in the day-to-day decision-making process. When it decides that it does not have a corner on the market of intelligence and that it can reach out to the rest of our society, listen to what its needs are, listen to what its ideas are and break from traditional ways of doing things then that would be a unique thing for governments across Canada to do.

I am happy to say I see some signs of it occurring in provinces like my own. I encourage it to happen in other provinces across Canada. Most of all, I encourage this government to change its ways. Simply stop and think and listen to the rest of Canada and see what it can do of a positive nature to help the men and women across Canada who are still feeling the effects of this recessionary period.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, I am glad that the parliamentary secretary has come into the House. It is nice to have one member on the Conservative side to listen to the debate. I have always taken the view, even when I was a student of Parliament, that ministers of the Crown ought to be here during a debate on a government bill. I have raised that point frequently in the House, but I am searching in vain to find one.

The fact is that this is an important measure. The government is asking for authority from this House to borrow an additional $8 billion that frankly this House should be very reluctant to allow the government to borrow. It has borrowed far too much at the cost of Canadians already in the eight and a half years it has been in office.

It is time for a change. Canadians want a change and they want a chance to express that change in an election. The government persists in coming to this House with legislation instead of going to the people and allowing them to express their views on the government's maladministration, its destruction of the Government of Canada for the last nine years. It has done a great deal of damage to our government systems, as everyone well knows.

I want to turn and look at the record of fiscal mismanagement that this government is engaged in and of which this bill is the product. I neglected to say that this is the second borrowing bill in this financial year that the government has brought before this House. Normally, just so people listening to this understand, the government comes once a year with a budget and asks for borrowing authority in an amount sufficient to enable it to borrow whatever money it needs to get a balanced budget in the course of the year.

This year, because it was so wrong in its projections in the first budget it has had to come back with a second borrowing bill and ask for an additional $8 billion. That is really quite unsatisfactory. It shows a complete lack of competence on the part of the government, the Minister of Finance and his advisers in the cabinet, particularly his cabinet colleagues, in their organization of the business of both this House and the Government of Canada.

Recently the government issued, as I think it does monthly, The Fiscal Monitor. It revealed some very interesting statistics. Normally when statistics are damaging to the government it presents them in a different way so it does not look so bad. This government is notorious for doing that.

It will normally show, for example, a graph on the deficit. It starts it in 1984 and runs it to 1992 or 1993 as it would be now. It tries to show that really over the years it has been in office things have improved, or it will go back to some earlier date when things were particularly bad in its view and then show the decline since.

The government always picks on a year like 1983, 1984 or 1980. It goes to the previous recession and then shows how much better things are today, or something like that. That is always the aim in the graphs it chooses. It has the option of choosing any date it wants, so it picks up one of these early dates and in effect fudges the graph. Then Canadians think things are better when in fact they are worse.

In this particular issue of The Fiscal Monitor, something slipped through the net because there are a few facts in it that are important and are not really explained to Canadians in any of the government statements. I suspect that somebody is going to get fired for having put this in The Fiscal Monitor after I use it in my speech. I am sorry about that, but it is a public document and I think it is worth drawing attention to this. I am sure that the Minister of Finance is going to come down on this group of people like a ton of lead bricks.

The Fiscal Monitor points out that personal income tax revenue from this year over last year for the same period has declined by 3.5 per cent. Given the large number of unemployed people, that is hardly surprising. People are not earning so much so tax revenues are down.

Corporate tax revenues have plunged 16 per cent. Again given the lack of profits because of the Tory-induced recession we are enduring in this country, that is not surprising either. Corporate profits are at some of the lowest levels on record.

Also, we have unemployment insurance contributions. What do you think happened to unemployment insurance contributions? Do you have any idea? They went up. There are fewer people employed generally than there were before. There is a lot of unemployment in Canada.

It will be found in the employment statistics that the numbers are down over the period. In spite of that there is a 16 per cent increase in unemployment insurance payments, that is receipts, income from unemployment insurance premiums. Why is that? It is because of the increases in the rates. This government has jacked up the rates two or three times. They are very significant increases. Now it is proposing to change it so that people who have paid all this money into the unemployment insurance scheme will not be able to collect when they lose their job.

That is what the government is doing. It is in effect hiking the rates. It has an additional 16 per cent year over year increase at the very time when it is proposing to reduce the benefits that will be paid out of this scheme to people who have lost their jobs. Talk about hard-hearted. Talk about the wrong time to do it. It could not be worse. Yet the government comes to this House and says it wants more borrowing authority.

• (1340)

Let us look at some of the other figures. The goods and services tax, the tax that was supposed to save us from everything, was well concealed during the election campaign in 1988 and then brought forward with fanfare as the great thing. Of course the government brought it in at the worst possible time. Almost every economist in the country denounced the government for its timing on the thing. It has brought in less money in 1992-93 so far than it did in 1991-92, 4 per cent less. It is not a big difference, but Canadians are not spending. Everybody knows that. Many of them have lost their jobs and so they are not spending money.

Sales and excise taxes and duties have gone up 24.5 per cent. Do you think it might have anything to do with cross-border shopping? Do you think it might have to do with the collection duties at the border as people come back from their shopping trips abroad? One suspects so. There is a 24 per cent increase in sales and excise taxes and duties.

Those are rough figures that were contained in the most recent The Fiscal Monitor. Those figures are important for Canadians because they show the way the government approaches people in this country. It has in effect suffered a reduction in corporate taxation and it certainly has not had any significant increase in corporate taxation for many years.

However, it has significantly increased the very regressive and very expensive unemployment insurance premiums. It has brought about a substantial increase in those so that revenues from that source are up very significantly, and at the same time it is proposing to reduce the benefits that are payable presumably so it can earn some kind of profit on the unemployment insurance fund.

This is an unsatisfactory way for the government to operate. We have said so before. Opposition members, as I said the other day in the debate on this bill, are getting tired of having to say it over and over again. The sooner we have an election the sooner we will be able to stop saying it because we will get rid of this group opposite who are doing so much damage to Canadians and to the economy.

I want to turn to the criticism that members opposite have made of our party. They claim with the goods and services tax alternatives we have bandied about that we have not put any firm proposal before Canadians and will not. They say that is unfair and wrong.

Of course, the proposal on the GST that the government discussed during the 1988 election was vague too. It was supposed to be a tax on everything. When Canadians realized there was going to be a tax on food and we criticized and pointed this out to Canadians, the government changed that so that there would be no tax on food.

When it brought the tax in it was not just food that was to be not taxed. It took the GST off basic groceries. Canadians all around this country know that food is taxed. If we go to a restaurant we pay GST on our bill. Every Canadian knows that. A restaurateur certainly knows it because it drives up the cost of the food in the restaurant significantly in relation to the cost of buying the food elsewhere.

The Canadian restaurant industry knows a lot about the GST. Of course restaurateurs face the difficulties of collection. It is collection of the GST that represents one of the most significant costs to Canadians and to the Canadian economy. It is one of the most inefficient taxes because it does not dovetail with the other sales taxes levied in this country by the provincial governments.

We have the spectacle in Ontario of small businesses having to maintain three sets of books: one for items that are subject to only the GST, one for items that are subject only to provincial sales tax, and one for items that are subject to both taxes. It is inefficient. It is wickedly expensive. Many small businesses have been forced to hire an accountant or some person to keep books for them only because the GST was brought in.

It was the wrong tax at the wrong time and it is still the wrong tax. I am very pleased to say that our party will look at alternatives and will consult with people on alternatives.

I see the hon. parliamentary secretary, the only Conservative in the House, has perked up his ears and is paying attention to this. I invite him to pay very close attention because this is quite important. I want the hon. member to relax because he will enjoy this solution. It will be very good for him. If he manages to get re-elected in the coming onslaught then he will be here and perhaps he will get on the proposed committee.

In a new parliament our proposal would be to mandate an all-party House of Commons finance committee to consult Canadians and provincial governments on all options to replace the GST and report within 12 months. Our plan would be to get a new tax that generates equivalent revenues, that is fair to consumers, that is easier to administer for small business, and that promotes federal-provincial co-operation.

Those are the objectives of our tax policy. That is what we will be looking for after the next election.

Mr. Langlois: Madam Speaker, my point of order concerns what the member for Kingston and the Islands said at the beginning of his speech, when he mentioned that I was the only government member present on this side of the House.

I would remind him that when he began his speech he was also the only member of his party present on his side of the House. Given the experience that the member for Kingston and the Islands has, he must know that the custom of this House is not to refer to the absence or presence of members.

Furthermore, I would remind him that the government agreed to extend the debate between one and two o'clock, which is normally the hour when members have lunch or go about other business that they have scheduled. So I think it is normal that if the House is sitting at that time members are going about other business that they have already scheduled, especially if the extended hours for debate were not planned.

The purpose of this extra hour of debate is to give opposition members and others a chance to speak and the member for Kingston and the Islands took advantage of this extension. Nevertheless, Madam Speaker, I wanted to point out to you that his remarks were out of place, to say the least.

Mr. Milliken: On the same point of order, Madam Speaker.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I would appreciate it very much if the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands would be so kind as to drop this point of order. He has twice mentioned the absence of some members in this House. I did not see fit to interrupt him at that time, so that we could have as much time as possible to debate the important bill before us. The hon. parliamentary secretary made some remarks. If the hon. member still wants to speak I will of course recognize him, but I would not want this exchange to degenerate into a debate on something other than the bill now under consideration.

The hon. member has the floor.

Mr. Milliken: Madam Speaker, the hon. parliamentary secretary said that I had erred in my remarks because I said that only one member of his party was present. I certainly did not say that all the others were away. I only pointed out that he was here and that is why you did not interrupt me.

The other thing he said is that the government agreed to extend the debate over lunch hour and that is not correct. The government forced this House to continue sitting because there were not enough members here to prevent the government from continuing its deliberations over lunch hour. That is why—

Madam Deputy Speaker: To prevent this from really becoming a debate perhaps the members would agree to call this exchange a tie. Anyway, I think that we are already in overtime.

[English]

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Madam Speaker, it is rather sorrowful we have to continue debate on Bill C–98 respecting the borrowing authority of this government, because we have lost so many debates on this side of the House against the government. Everybody in the country knows we have a government that is incompetent and unable to govern with policies that benefit the people and do so in a fiscally responsible manner.

When we look back at the economic statement or the mini budget presented in December we see that the government is not only fiscally irresponsible but is bankrupt of ideas on how to help turn around that situation. In the last years of governing the government has more than doubled the national debt. The government said in February 1992 that the deficit was going to be in the order of $25 billion this year and in fact it ended up by announcing that it would be $7 billion more than that.

If we as individual Canadians were not able to budget better than that all of us without exception would be bankrupt. This government has constantly put its emphasis on the cutting of programs in order to deal with the debt and deficit. Cutting the legs out from beneath the people of this country is not going to help to reduce the deficit and the debt of this country; what we need to do is create wealth.

This government in its statement in December, instead of trying to find new ways to generate growth and create wealth by lending some support to municipal infrastructure programs, took the dreadful measure of making further cuts to the unemployment insurance program, thereby making the poorest people pay for the ineptness of this government. Those people who are least able to pay are being asked to pay the burden of this government's wrong-headed policies and ideas.
