INTRODUCTION

INTRODUCTION

Tout au long de l'année 1955, les décideurs canadiens durent prêter une attention soutenue à la guerre froide en Asie. Au début de l'année, le différend qui couvait entre la Chine communiste et la République de Chine, à propos de Formose (Taïwan) et des îles côtières de Quemoy et Matsu, menaçait de dégénérer en conflit ouvert sino-américain. Au moment où les États-Unis se préparaient à soutenir les forces nationalistes chinoises contre une attaque communiste, Ottawa esquissa un mouvement de recul à l'idée d'une reprise du conflit en Asie. La crise soulevait des questions fondamentales sur la nature et les limites de l'alliance du Canada avec Washington en temps de guerre froide. C'est pourquoi les documents du chapitre VII retracent de manière assez détaillée les efforts du Canada pour servir de médiateur entre les deux puissances antagonistes, pour amener les États-Unis à exercer une certaine retenue et, finalement, pour se distancier de la croisade américaine.

Cette crise amena le secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures, Lester B. Pearson, à emprunter des voies intéressantes, tantôt inhabituelles, tantôt plus familières. Le spectre d'une guerre nucléaire, qu'agitaient les États-Unis pendant le bras de fer avec Pékin, força le ministre et son ministère à s'attaquer aux difficiles questions liées aux tactiques nucléaires modernes (documents 736 à 740). Cela conforta en outre le ministère dans sa volonté de s'adapter aux contraintes qui pesaient sur la politique étrangère et la politique de défense du Canada à l'ère atomique (document 789). Dans l'immédiat, la crise incita Pearson à chercher de nouveau une méthode pour faire admettre Pékin aux Nations Unies (document 748).

Formose fut au coeur des discussions de la Conférence des premiers ministres du Commonwealth qui se tint en février. Pearson y accompagnait le premier ministre Louis Saint-Laurent, à l'invitation du secrétaire au Foreign Office, Anthony Eden. Le compte rendu divertissant que fait Pearson des intrigues sociales, politiques et diplomatiques qui se jouèrent en coulisse donne une fausse idée de l'importance de cette rencontre internationale (document 241). Reprenant leurs efforts pour mettre fin à la guerre de Corée, amorcés pendant la conférence des premiers ministres de 1953, Eden et Pearson se joignirent au premier ministre de l'Inde, Jawaharlal Nehru, afin de trouver, sans succès toutefois, une stratégie pour désamorcer la crise formosane.

Ottawa prit note du rôle prépondérant de Nehru à cette conférence, ce qui amena les représentants canadiens à conclure que « le Commonwealth [...] dépend, dans une très large mesure, de l'importance que lui attachent les Indiens » (document 246). Le grand nombre de documents sur les relations du Canada avec l'Inde, reproduits dans le chapitre sur le Commonwealth, témoigne de cette opinion. Ces pages portent sur les questions habituelles, axées sur l'aide au développement, qui caractérisent les relations au sein du Commonwealth dans les volumes récents des Documents relatifs aux relations extérieures du Canada. Cependant, le lecteur y trouvera surtout des documents sur la décision du Canada de donner à l'Inde un réacteur nucléaire expérimental. Ce geste, s'il était destiné en partie à attirer la faveur de New Delhi pendant la guerre froide, représentait un des premiers efforts du Canada pour commercialiser son industrie nucléaire (documents 254 à 285). En effet, très tôt, la politique canadienne dans ce domaine fut guidée par des considérations d'ordre économique.

En 1955, malgré les efforts d'Ottawa pour renforcer ses liens avec New Delhi, les relations entre les deux pays se détériorèrent. Elles furent mises à rude épreuve par les divergences sur le rôle des trois commissions de surveillance internationales créées en 1954 pour préserver une paix fragile au Cambodge, au Laos et au Vietnam (chapitre

INTRODUCTION

The Cold War in Asia continued to demand the sustained attention of Canadian policy-makers throughout 1955. Early in the year, the simmering dispute between Communist China and the Republic of China over Formosa (Taiwan) and the offshore islands of Quemoy and Matsu threatened to escalate into a direct Sino-American confrontation. As the United States prepared to defend Chinese Nationalist forces in Formosa against Communist attack, Ottawa recoiled from the prospect of renewed conflict in Asia. The crisis raised fundamental questions about the nature and limitations of Canada's Cold War alliance with Washington. For that reason, the documentation in Chapter VII traces in some detail Canadian efforts to mediate between the two antagonists, to restrain the United States and, finally, to distance Canada from the American crusade.

The crisis led the Secretary of State for External Affairs, Lester B. Pearson, down interesting pathways—some unusual, others more familiar. American nuclear posturing during the confrontation with Peking forced the minister and his department to confront the difficult issues associated with modern nuclear tactics (Documents 736 to 740), and reinforced the department's determination to come to terms with the constraints on Canadian foreign and defence policy in the nuclear age (Document 789). More immediately, the crisis encouraged Pearson to renew his search for some method to admit Communist China to the United Nations (Document 748).

Formosa dominated discussion at the Commonwealth Prime Ministers' meeting in February, where Pearson accompanied Prime Minister Louis St. Laurent at the invitation of the British Foreign Secretary, Anthony Eden. Pearson's entertaining account of the social, political and diplomatic intrigues of this international gathering (Document 241) belied its importance. In a reprise of their effort to end the Korean War during the 1953 Prime Minister's conference, Eden and Pearson joined the Indian Prime Minister, Jawaharlal Nehru, in an unsuccessful search for a strategy to defuse the Formosan crisis.

Nehru's prominent role at the Prime Ministers' conference was noted in Ottawa, and prompted Canadian officials to conclude "that the Commonwealth ... is to a very considerable extent dependent on the importance the Indians attach to it" (Document 246). This view is reflected in the large number of documents on Canada's relations with India reprinted in the chapter on the Commonwealth. Although these pages cover the normal range of aid-related topics that has characterized Commonwealth relations in recent volumes of Documents on Canadian External Relations, it is dominated by documentation on Canada's decision to give India an experimental nuclear reactor. Intended in part to secure New Delhi's support in the Cold War, this gesture also represented an early effort to commercialize Canada's nuclear power industry (Documents 254 to 285). Indeed, economic considerations quickly came to drive Canadian policy in this field.

Despite Ottawa's efforts to reinforce its ties with New Delhi, Indo-Canadian relations deteriorated in 1955, strained by differences over the role of the three international control commissions established in 1954 to safeguard the fragile peace in Cambodia, Laos and Vietnam (Chapter VII). The commissions also complicated Canada's relations with its closest Western allies, the United Kingdom and the United States. In Laos, Canada came under strong pressure from Washington and London to bring the Pathet Lao to task for refusing to abide by the terms of the Geneva Agreement. In Vietnam, the American-sponsored President of South Vietnam, Ngo Dinh VII). Ces commissions compliquèrent également les relations du Canada avec ses alliés occidentaux les plus proches, le Royaume-Uni et les États-Unis. Au Laos, Washington et Londres exercèrent de fortes pressions pour que le Canada rappelle à l'ordre le Pathet Lao, qui refusa de respecter les dispositions de l'Accord de Genève. Au Vietnam, le président du Sud-Vietnam, Ngo Dinh Diem, le protégé des Américains, s'employa à saper les efforts de la commission internationale et à provoquer une impasse qui se prolongerait indéfiniment. À cette perspective, les responsables canadiens furent forcés de revoir le rôle que jouerait à l'avenir le Canada dans ces commissions. Cette réévaluation, qui se poursuivit jusqu'en 1956, s'avéra ardue : « Nous sommes devant un dilemme épineux, car bien qu'une multitude de raisons militent en faveur du retrait des commissions d'Indochine, dès que cela sera possible, personne ne veut porter la terrible responsabilité de l'effondrement du cadre fragile dont peut dépendre la paix en Asie » (document 640).

En 1955, par comparaison aux dangers qui menaçaient en Asie, il y avait longtemps que les perspectives de paix et de stabilité en Europe n'avaient semblé aussi encourageantes. La conférence au sommet qui se déroula en juillet à Genève, où les dirigeants américains, français, britanniques et soviétiques se réunirent pour la première fois depuis 1945, semblait annoncer une diminution de la tension dans le monde. Cette accalmie fut toutefois de courte durée. Tout s'effondra à l'automne, après que les ministres des Affaires étrangères des Quatre furent incapables de s'entendre sur les mesures concrètes à prendre pour améliorer les relations Est-Ouest. Comme en témoigne l'important recueil de documents présenté dans le chapitre sur l'Organisation du Traité de l'Atlantique Nord (OTAN), le Canada suivit de près ces événements. Les consultations sur l'OTAN, qui précédèrent à la fois le sommet et la réunion décevante des ministres des Affaires étrangères, fournirent à Ottawa l'occasion de débattre la stratégie occidentale et d'influer (tant soit peu) sur son orientation à un moment important de la guerre froide.

Le chapitre sur l'OTAN renferme également nombre de documents sur des questions mieux connues. La volonté du Canada d'avoir son mot à dire sur l'utilisation éventuelle d'armes nucléaires par les États-Unis apparaît ici sous un nouvel éclairage. La section traitant de l'Accord tripartite sur les alertes retrace les efforts secrets des Britanniques, des Américains et des Canadiens pour trouver un mécanisme efficace de consultation entre alliés, dans l'éventualité d'une crise nucléaire. Ce chapitre contient des documents portant sur deux autres questions dont se préoccupaient constamment le Canada au sein de l'Alliance de l'Atlantique Nord : la coopération non militaire et l'aide mutuelle. Au printemps 1955, en raison des objections soulevées par ses fonctionnaires et ses collègues, Pearson relança le débat sur la coopération non militaire à la suite d'une initiative qui fit ressortir l'attitude ambiguë du Canada à l'égard des dispositions de l'article II du Traité de l'Atlantique Nord, connu sous le nom d'« article canadien ». La diminution des tensions internationales, un des facteurs qui motiva cette initiative, encouragea du coup Ottawa à réduire ses contributions dans le domaine de l'aide mutuelle. Cependant, comme le montrent les documents sur la livraison d'avions à l'Allemagne, la question de l'aide mutuelle devenait de plus en plus complexe, s'articulant autour d'un mélange hasardeux de considérations militaires, politiques et commerciales.

Le Canada envisageait sous une perspective unique les efforts du bloc soviétique pour normaliser ses relations avec l'Ouest. En mai, une délégation polonaise de haut

Diem, worked hard to undermine the international commission and foster an indefinite stalemate. As the prospect of a deadlock in Vietnam loomed, Canadian officials were forced to consider Canada's future role on the commissions. Their reassessment, which continued into 1956, was no easy task: "The unhappy dilemma in which we are placed is that there are abundant reasons for our seeking to get the Commissions out of Indochina as soon as possible but on the other hand it would be a terrible responsibility to break the delicate structure on which the peace of Asia might depend" (Document 640).

In contrast to the dangers that lurked in Asia, the prospects for peace and stability in Europe seemed more hopeful in 1955 than they had for a long time. The July summit meeting in Geneva, where American, French, British and Soviet leaders gathered for the first time since 1945, seemed to herald a period of reduced international tension. The respite was short-lived, and collapsed in the autumn of 1955 when the Foreign Ministers of the four Great Powers failed to agree on concrete measures to improve East-West relations. As the substantial collection of documents in the chapter on the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO) demonstrates, Canada paid close attention to these developments. The NATO consultations, which preceded both the summit and the disappointing Foreign Ministers' meeting, provided Ottawa with an opportunity to discuss and to influence (however slightly) Western strategy at an important point in the Cold War.

The NATO chapter also contains its share of material on more familiar subjects. Canada's determination to secure a voice in any United States decision to employ nuclear weapons reappears here in a new guise. The section on the Tripartite Alerts Agreement records the secret Anglo-American-Canadian search for an effective means of allied consultation in the event of a nuclear crisis. The chapter documents two other persistent Canadian preoccupations in the North Atlantic Alliance: non-military co-operation and mutual aid. In the spring of 1955, over the objections of his officials and fellow ministers, Pearson revived the question of non-military co-operation in an exercise that underlined the ambiguity surrounding Canada's attitude to the provisions of NATO's Article II, the so-called "Canadian article." Diminishing international tensions, a factor behind this initiative, also encouraged Ottawa to reduce its mutual aid contributions. But as the documents on the allocation of aircraft to Germany reveal, mutual aid was becoming a more complex business, involving an uneasy mixture of military, political, and commercial considerations.

Canada's perspective on the Soviet bloc's efforts to normalize relations with the West was unique. In May, a high-level Polish delegation arrived in Ottawa for bilateral trade discussions, a step leading to negotiations on a broad range of issues (Chapter V). More important, Pearson travelled to Moscow in October, becoming the first NATO Foreign Minister to visit the Soviet Union. The Canadian clearly enjoyed his encounter with Soviet Premier Nikita Khrushchev, whom he described "as blunt and volatile as only a Ukrainian peasant, turned one of the most powerful men in the world, can be" (Document 537). Even so, as the documentation on wheat sales to the Soviet Union and official visits from Communist countries demonstrate, Ottawa treated Moscow's advances with a great deal of caution and suspicion.

Canada's reserve was prudent. Moscow's overtures to the West were offset by the establishment of the Warsaw Pact (Document 545) and by Communist meddling in the niveau arriva à Ottawa pour discuter de commerce bilatéral, étape devant conduire à des négociations sur un grand nombre de questions (chapitre V). Qui plus est, Pearson se rendit à Moscou en octobre, devenant ainsi le premier ministre des Affaires étrangères de l'OTAN à visiter l'Union soviétique. À l'évidence, il apprécia sa rencontre avec le premier secrétaire, Nikita Khrouchtchev, qu'il trouva « carré et versatile, comme seul peut l'être un paysan ukrainien devenu l'un des hommes les plus puissants du monde » (document 537). Néanmoins, comme l'attestent les documents sur la vente de blé à l'Union soviétique et les visites officielles de représentants de pays communistes, Ottawa réagissait avec beaucoup de prudence et de méfiance aux avances de Moscou.

La réserve du Canada était dictée par la prudence. À la politique d'ouverture de Moscou envers l'Ouest s'opposaient la création du Pacte de Varsovie (document 545) et l'ingérence communiste au Moyen-Orient, où les ventes d'armes tchécoslovaques à l'Égypte menaçaient la stabilité précaire de la région (document 552). À la fin de l'année, après l'évanouissement de l'« esprit de Genève », l'OTAN, inflexible, conclut que « en entraînant un relâchement des efforts des pays de l'OTAN, les tactiques conciliantes des dirigeants soviétiques [...] faisaient pencher la balance des forces en leur faveur aux dépens de la communauté atlantique » (document 231).

Les questions de défense demeuraient un aspect important des relations du Canada avec les États-Unis. En matière de défense bilatérale, notamment, la démarche du Canada se caractérisait par une grande attention à ses prérogatives liées à la souveraineté. Cependant, il paraissait de plus en plus évident qu'Ottawa trouvait difficile d'assumer pleinement sa part du fardeau financier imputable à l'expansion des activités de défense de l'Amérique du Nord. Ce thème revient constamment dans les documents qui rendent compte du débat entre les ministères de la Défense nationale et des Affaires extérieures sur la participation canadienne à l'exploitation du réseau d'alerte avancé (documents 324 à 337). Il sous-tend également l'abondante documentation sur la défense aérienne continentale. Ce choix regroupe des documents sur les projets militaires bilatéraux devant conduire à la création d'un commandement conjoint de la défense aérienne nord-américain, et sur les efforts du Canada pour mettre au point son propre chasseur à réaction moderne, le CF-105, ou l'Avro Arrow (documents 309 à 323). L'opposition des conceptions nationale et continentale de la défense aérienne de l'Amérique du Nord, déjà perceptible dans ces documents, allait caractériser cette question pendant le reste de la décennie.

Dans l'immédiat, toutefois, les principaux dossiers bilatéraux touchaient à l'agriculture et à l'économie. Les efforts acharnés de Washington pour commercialiser le blé américain soulevaient de plus en plus l'ire des agriculteurs canadiens et des politiciens qui les représentaient. Les ministres comme les fonctionnaires s'inquiétaient de l'intention du gouvernement américain de subventionner, en vertu d'une loi jouissant d'une triste notoriété (Public Law 480), la vente de blé américain sur les marchés traditionnels du Canada. À leur désarroi, s'ajoutaient les pressions de plus en plus insistantes du Congrès en faveur de nouvelles restrictions à l'importation de toute une série de produits canadiens aux États-Unis. Cette mesure visait entre autres, le pétrole, le plomb, le zinc et le seigle. En répondant aux demandes du Congrès, le gouvernement américain tenait souvent compte des intérêts du Canada. Cependant, il y avait lieu de s'inquiéter de l'orientation restrictive de la politique commerciale américaine,

Middle East, where Czechoslovakian arms sales to Egypt threatened the region's precarious stability (Document 552). By the end of the year, as the "spirit of Geneva" evaporated, NATO grimly concluded that the "balance of capabilities [...was] tilting against the Atlantic community as the milder tactics of the Soviet leaders ... produced a relaxation of effort on the part of the NATO countries" (Document 231).

Defence questions continued to be an important aspect of Canada's relationship with the United States. Canada's approach to bilateral defence issues was characterized by a careful regard for its sovereign prerogatives. However, it was becoming increasingly clear that Ottawa was finding it difficult to bear its full share of the financial burden resulting from North America's expanding defence activities. This theme runs through the material documenting the debate between the Departments of National Defence and External Affairs over Canadian participation in the operation of the Distant Early Warning Line (Documents 324 to 337). It also informs the lengthy narrative on continental air defence. This selection weaves together material on nascent bilateral military plans for a joint North American air command with Canada's struggle to develop its own modern jet fighter - the CF-105 or Avro Arrow (Documents 309 to 323). The tension between national and continental approaches to North American air defence, already reflected in these documents, would define this question for the rest of the decade.

For the present, however, the principal bilateral issues were agricultural and economic. Canadian farmers and their politicians were increasingly angry with Washington's aggressive marketing of American wheat. The Administration's willingness to use subsidies under the notorious Public Law 480 to sell American wheat in Canada's traditional markets worried ministers and officials alike. Their distress was compounded by mounting Congressional demands for new import restrictions on a host of Canadian exports to the United States. Targeted commodities included oil, lead and zinc, and rye. Although the Administration often took account of Canadian interests when responding to Congress, the restrictive direction of American trade policy was unsettling and left Canadian officials in Washington and Ottawa uncertain how to proceed (Document 399).

As always, transboundary issues had a prominent place on the Canadian-American agenda in 1955. Growing public and Congressional dissatisfaction with the provisions of the 1954 St. Lawrence Seaway agreement governing navigational facilities in the Cornwall area prompted the White House to reopen negotiations in January. The selection of documents on the St. Lawrence Seaway also reflects the Cabinet's interest in ensuring that customs and immigration regulations would allow Canadian companies to bid on Seaway work. The Cabinet was equally interested in the problems associated with Lake Ontario water levels, an awkward technical issue described by Pearson as "controversial and explosive" (Document 466).

The complicated exercise of dividing the continent's natural resources between Canada and the United States continued to worry both countries as the pace of development quickened in the Western regions of North America. The House of Representatives raised alarm bells in Ottawa when it again proposed diverting water from Lake Michigan to meet Chicago's growing needs, threatening Canada's navigation and power interests in the lower Great Lakes (Document 483). In the International Joint Commission, whose engineering teams were busy surveying the Columbia River basin, the two countries jostled for position, aware that negotiations on the future of à l'égard de laquelle les fonctionnaires canadiens ne savaient quelle ligne de conduite adopter, à Ottawa comme à Washington (document 399).

Comme toujours, en 1955, les questions transfrontalières arrivaient en tête des priorités canado-américaines. Les dispositions de l'entente sur la Voie maritime du Saint-Laurent, qui régissaient l'administration des installations de navigation dans la région de Cornwall, suscitaient un mécontentement grandissant parmi le public et les membres du Congrès. C'est pourquoi la Maison-Blanche décida de rouvrir les négociations en janvier. Le choix de documents sur la Voie maritime du Saint-Laurent illustre combien le Cabinet trouvait important que la réglementation dans le domaine des douanes et de l'immigration permette aux entreprises canadiennes de soumissionner les appels d'offres pour la construction de la voie maritime. Le Cabinet s'intéressait également aux problèmes liés au niveau du lac Ontario, question technique délicate qui, de l'aveu même de Pearson, s'avérait « sujette à controverse et explosive » (document 466).

À mesure que le développement s'accélérait dans l'ouest de l'Amérique du Nord, le difficile partage des ressources naturelles du continent entre le Canada et les États-Unis continuait de préoccuper les deux pays. En proposant à nouveau de détourner l'eau du lac Michigan pour répondre aux besoins grandissants de Chicago, menaçant du même coup les intérêts canadiens dans les secteurs de la navigation et de la production d'électricité dans les Grands Lacs inférieurs, la Chambre des représentants déclencha l'alarme à Ottawa (document 483). À la Commission mixte internationale, pendant que les arpenteurs faisaient le levé du bassin du fleuve Columbia, les deux pays jouaient des coudes, conscients que des négociations sur l'avenir de ce fleuve international se profilaient à l'horizon (documents 475 à 482). Plus à l'ouest et au nord, ces questions s'avéraient encore plus fondamentales et délicates, puisque la frontière elle-même était en cause. Cependant, le présent volume ne contient aucun document à ce sujet. La publication de quatre documents sur l'entrée Dixon et le détroit d'Hécate, et d'un document sur la souveraineté dans l'Arctique, n'a pas été autorisée aux termes des dispositions de la Loi sur l'accès à l'information.

Au cours de cette année, le premier ministre canadien, Louis Saint-Laurent, ne joua qu'un rôle minime dans la politique étrangère du Canada, laissant ces questions entre les mains expertes de Pearson. En l'absence du secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures, cette responsabilité était habituellement confiée à Paul Martin, le ministre de la Santé nationale et du Bien-être social. La façon dont celui-ci mena l'affaire des essais nucléaires sous-marins effectués par les États-Unis fait ressortir son assurance grandissante à ce poste, et la sensibilité politique qu'il apportait à ce portefeuille (documents 346 à 349). Fait encore plus important, en tant que chef de la délégation canadienne à la 10<sup>e</sup> session de l'Assemblée générale des Nations Unies, Martin fut le principal artisan de la campagne qui permit de dénouer l'impasse concernant l'admission de nouveaux membres, devant laquelle se trouvaient depuis longtemps les grandes puissances (documents 4 à 40). Parmi les autres ministres du Cabinet investis de responsabilités importantes en matière de politique étrangère, il convient de citer Ralph Campney, le ministre de la Défense nationale, et Walter Harris, le ministre des Finances. En sa qualité de ministre du Commerce et de ministre de la Production de la défense, C. D Howe continua d'exercer une influence considérable sur la politique en matière de commerce extérieur.

this international river lay just over the horizon (Documents 475 to 482). Further west and north, the questions were more fundamental and sensitive, involving the border itself. These, however, are not covered in this volume as four documents on Dixon Entrance and Hecate Strait and one document on Arctic Sovereignty, selected for publication, were withheld under the provisions of the Access to Information legislation.

Canadian Prime Minister Louis St. Laurent played only a minor foreign policy role during the year, leaving most questions in Pearson's experienced hands. When absent, the Secretary of State for External Affairs was normally replaced by Paul Martin, the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Martin's growing confidence in this role and the political sensibilities he brought to the portfolio are evident in his handling of American underwater nuclear tests (Documents 346 to 349). More important, as head of the Canadian Delegation to the 10th session of the United Nations General Assembly, Martin was the primary mover in the successful campaign to resolve the long stalemate among the major powers over the admission of new members (Documents 4 to 40). Other Cabinet ministers with significant foreign policy responsibilities included Ralph Campney, the Minister of National Defence, and Walter Harris, the Minister of Finance. C.D. Howe retained his considerable influence over foreign economic policy as Minister of Trade and Commerce and Minister of Defence Production.

The senior ranks of the Department of External Affairs were largely unchanged. Jules Léger remained Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs, assisted for much of the year by R.A. MacKay. MacKay carried out the duties of Associate Under-Secretary until August 1955, when he replaced David M. Johnson as Permanent Representative to the United Nations. At about the same time, R.M. Macdonnell was promoted to Deputy Under-Secretary. Also supporting Léger were three experienced Assistant Under-Secretaries: John Holmes, Jean A. Chapdelaine and Max Wershof, who was also the Department's Legal Advisor.

There was no change in representation at Canada's key posts abroad. Dana Wilgress remained Permanent Representative to the North Atlantic Council and Representative to the Organization for European Economic Co-operation, and Norman A. Robertson stayed in London as High Commissioner to the United Kingdom. Arnold Heeney and Georges Vanier continued as Ambassadors to the United States and France, respectively.

Like other recent volumes in this series, Volume 21 is based primarily on the records of the Department of External Affairs and the Privy Council Office. These records were supplemented where necessary by the private papers of Cabinet ministers and senior officials, and the files of the Departments of National Defence, Finance, and Trade and Commerce. In preparing this volume, I was given complete access to the files of the Department of External Affairs and generous access to other collections. A complete list of the archival sources examined in the preparation of this volume may be found on page xxv.

The selection of documents continues to be guided by the general principles outlined in the Introduction to Volume 7 (pp. ix-xi), as amended in the Introduction to Volume 20 (p. xxiii). In short, the series tries to provide a "self-contained record of the major foreign policy decisions taken by the Government of Canada," by focussing intensively on Canada's most important bilateral and multilateral relationships and on Les hauts responsables du ministère des Affaires extérieures étaient en grande partie les mêmes. Jules Léger occupait toujours le poste de sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures, et fut secondé pendant la plus grande partie de l'année par R. A. MacKay. Celui-ci assumait en effet la fonction de sous-secrétaire d'État associé jusqu'en août, lorsqu'il remplaça David M. Johnson au poste de représentant permanent auprès des Nations Unies. Environ au même moment, R. M. Macdonnell fut nommé sous-secrétaire adjoint. Trois sous-secrétaires adjoints expérimentés aidaient également Léger dans sa tâche. Il s'agissait de John Holmes, de Jean A. Chapdelaine et de Max Wershof, qui était également le conseiller juridique du ministère.

Les mêmes personnes occupaient toujours les principaux postes de représentants du Canada à l'étranger. Dana Wilgress était la représentante permanente auprès du Conseil de l'Atlantique Nord et de l'Organisation européenne de coopération économique, et Norman A. Robertson resta à Londres, s'acquittant de ses fonctions de haut-commissaire auprès du Royaume-Uni. Pour leur part, Arnold Heeney et Georges Vanier occupaient respectivement les postes d'ambassadeur auprès des États-Unis et de la France.

Comme pour les derniers volumes de cette collection, le volume 21 s'appuie principalement sur les archives du ministère des Affaires extérieures et du Bureau du Conseil privé. Nous avons consulté au besoin des documents provenant des archives privées des ministres du Cabinet et des hauts fonctionnaires, ainsi que les dossiers des ministères de la Défense nationale et des Finances, et du ministère du Commerce. J'ai en outre eu accès à tous les dossiers du ministère des Affaires étrangères et bénéficié d'un excellent accès à d'autres archives. Vous trouverez la liste complète des documents consultés pour l'établissement de ce volume à la page xxv.

Les grands principes énoncés dans l'Introduction du volume 7 (pp. ix-xi), modifiés par la suite dans l'Introduction du volume 20 (p. xxiii), guident la sélection des documents. En bref, cette série se propose de fournir un compte rendu complet des principales décisions du gouvernement du Canada en matière de politique étrangère. Pour cela, elle privilégie, au premier chef, les relations bilatérales et multilatérales les plus importantes du Canada et les grandes questions internationales sur lesquelles les membres du Cabinet sont appelés directement à prendre des décisions cruciales.

Les signes typographiques sont les mêmes que ceux décrits dans l'Introduction du volume 9 (p. xix). Ainsi, une croix (†) signifie que le document n'est pas reproduit dans le présent volume; des points de suspension [...] indiquent que des passages ont été retranchés. L'expression « group corrupt » révèle l'existence de problèmes de déchiffrement dans la transmission du télégramme original. Lorsque cela revêt une certaine importance, les mots et les passages rayés par l'auteur d'un texte, les notes marginales et les listes de distribution figurent dans les notes en bas de page. Sauf avis contraire, les documents sont censés avoir été lus par leur destinataire. Les noms propres et les noms de lieu ont été uniformisés. Le rédacteur a corrigé discrètement l'orthographe, la ponctuation, les majuscules et les erreurs de transcriptions, lorsque le contexte ne laissait planer aucun doute sur le sens du texte. Tous les autres ajouts sont indiqués entre crochets. Les documents sont reproduits en anglais ou en français, selon la langue dans laquelle ils ont été rédigés à l'origine.

L'édition du présent volume est le fruit d'un travail collectif. Comme toujours, les Archives nationales du Canada apportent une contribution indispensable à la Section the major international issues that directly involved the members of the Cabinet in substantive policy decisions.

The editorial devices used in this volume are similar to those described in the Introduction to Volume 9 (p. xix). A dagger (†) indicates a document that has not been printed. Editorial excisions are shown by an ellipse (...). The phrase "group corrupt" indicates decryption problems in the transmission of the original telegram. Words and passages that were struck out by the author, marginal notes and distribution lists are reproduced as footnotes only when important. Unless otherwise indicated, it is assumed that documents have been read by the addressee. Proper and place names are standardized. The editor has silently corrected spelling, punctuation and capitalization, as well as transcription errors whose meaning is clear from their context. All other editorial additions to the body of the text are indicated by the use of square brackets. Documents are reprinted in either English or French, depending on their language of origin.

The preparation of this volume was a collective effort. The Historical Section continues to depend on the expertise of the staff at the National Archives of Canada for help in locating relevant records. Paulete Dozois, Paul Marsden and Dave Smith of the Government Archives Division responded generously and efficiently to requests for assistance. Ciúineas Boyle, Access to Information Co-ordinator at the Privy Council Office, facilitated access to classified Cabinet records for the period. The Honourable Paul Martin Jr. graciously granted me access to his father's personal papers. My overseas colleagues, Heather Yasamee and Dr. Keith Hamilton of Records and Historical Services, Foreign and Commonwealth Office, helped arrange for the declassification of several important British documents. William Burr of the National Security Archive, Washington D.C., was also helpful in this respect.

Ted Kelly edited the chapter on the United Nations and prepared a preliminary selection of material for the chapter on Europe. With customary thoroughness, he guided the volume through production. Christopher Cook remained my principal research assistant, joined for short periods of time by Joseph McHattie, Nelson Joannette, Michael Stevenson and Paul Anderson. Boris Stipernitz aided with the research, compiled the index, and provided thoughtful and cogent advice. A better team would be hard to find.

Isabel Campbell of the Department of National Defence's Directorate of History and Heritage provided guidance on Canadian defence policy in the mid-1950s. Her colleague, Gabrielle Nishiguchi, cleared up my confusion over Japanese immigration. John English, the author of an excellent biography of Pearson, responded graciously to my many and varied queries. Norman Hillmer, who edited an earlier volume in this series, was the source of practical advice and encouragement. My colleague (and another veteran editor), Hector Mackenzie, read and commented on parts of my selection. The general editor of Documents on Canadian External Relations, and head of the Historical Section, John Hilliker, offered sound advice leavened with patient good humour. The series would not be possible without the administrative support of the director of the Communications Programs and Outreach Division, Gaston Barban. I remain solely responsible for the final selection of documents in this volume.

historique, en l'aidant à trouver les documents pertinents. Paulette Dozois, Paul Marsden et Dave Smith de la Division des archives gouvernementales ont répondu généreusement et efficacement aux demandes d'aide. Pour sa part, la coordonnatrice de l'accès à l'information au Bureau du Conseil privé, Ciuneas Boyle, a facilité l'accès à des documents confidentiels du Cabinet datant de cette époque. L'honorable Paul Martin fils m'a gracieusement donné accès aux documents personnels de son père. Mes collègues à l'étranger, Heather Yasamee et Keith Hamilton, du service des archives et d'histoire du ministère des Affaires étrangères du Royaume-uni, m'ont aidé à faire déclassifier plusieurs documents britanniques importants. À cet égard, il convient également de mentionner l'aide de William Burr des National Security Archive, à Washington D.C.

Ted Kelly a établi le chapitre consacré aux Nations Unies et procédé à une sélection préliminaire des documents destinés au chapitre sur l'Europe. Toujours avec le même souci de rigueur, il a dirigé les différentes étapes de la réalisation de cet ouvrage. Mon principal adjoint de recherche a été Christopher Cook, secondé à l'occasion par Joseph McHattie, Nelson Joannette, Michael Stevenson et Paul Anderson. Boris Stipernitz a participé à la recherche, préparé l'index et fourni des conseils à la fois sages et pertinents. Il aurait été difficile de trouver meilleure équipe.

Isabel Campbell de la Direction de l'histoire et du patrimoine du ministère de la Défense nationale m'a conseillé sur la politique de défense du Canada au milieu des années 1950. Sa collègue, Gabrielle Nishiguchi, a dissipé toute confusion au sujet de l'immigration japonaise. John English, l'auteur d'une excellente biographie de Pearson, a aimablement répondu à mes nombreuses questions sur une foule de sujets. Norman Hillmer, qui a déjà compilé un volume de cette collection, m'a prodigué des conseils pratiques et des mots d'encouragement. Mon collègue (un autre éditeur chevronné), Hector Mackenzie, a lu une partie des documents retenus et m'a fait part de ses commentaires. John Hilliker, l'éditeur en chef des Documents relatifs aux relations extérieures du Canada et le chef de la Section historique, m'a donné des conseils judicieux, que relevait un sens de l'humour empreint de patience. La publication de cette collection ne serait pas possible sans le soutien administratif du directeur de la Direction des programmes de communications et de sensibilisation, Gaston Barban. Cependant, je suis seul responsable de la sélection des documents retenus pour le présent ouvrage.

La Section historique a fourni les textes complémentaires et coordonné la préparation technique de l'ouvrage. Aline Gélinau a tapé et mis en forme le manuscrit. M. Yvon Litalien du service de traduction du Ministère a traduit en français la plupart des notes en bas de page, des légendes et des textes complémentaires. Mes collègues de la Direction des services de communications, Francine Fournier et Julia Gualtieri, m'ont donné des conseils de rédaction. Gail Kirkpatrick Devlin s'est chargée de la relecture du manuscrit, a préparé la liste des personnes et mis la dernière main à la mise en pages.

L'édition du présent volume s'est effectuée dans des circonstances quelque peu inhabituelles. C'est en grande partie grâce au soutien indispensable de Mary et Katherine Donaghy qu'il a été possible de la mener à terme.

GREG DONAGHY

The Historical Section provides the supplementary text and coordinates the technical preparation of the volume. The manuscript was typed and formatted by Aline Gélinau. Mr. Yvon Litalien of the Translation Bureau provided the French for most of the footnotes, the captions and the ancillary text. My colleagues in the Communications Services Division, Francine Fournier and Julia Gualtieri, provided editorial guidance. Gail Kirkpatrick Devlin proofread the manuscript, composed the list of persons and refined the layout.

This volume was prepared under some unusual circumstances, and its completion owes much to the vital support of Mary and Katherine Donaghy.

THE HISTORY OF THE CITY OF BOSTON

The history of the city of Boston is a story of growth and resilience. From its founding as a small settlement of Puritan settlers, it has become one of the most important cities in the United States. The city's location on a narrow neck of land between the harbor and the mainland has shaped its development. The harbor provided a natural center for trade and commerce, while the surrounding land offered protection and space for expansion. Over the centuries, Boston has been a center of education, industry, and political activity. The city's rich cultural heritage is reflected in its many historic landmarks and institutions. The story of Boston is a testament to the power of human ingenuity and the enduring spirit of a city that has always been on the cutting edge of progress.

GENERAL INSTRUCTIONS FOR CANADIAN DELEGATION<sup>1</sup>
TO THE TENTH SESSION OF THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY OF THE UNITED NATIONS

Attached to this memorandum are general instructions for the Canadian Delegation to the tenth session of the United Nations General Assembly, which opens in New York on September 20, 1955.

These instructions provide broad policy guidance on the main issues which are likely to arise at the tenth session, and also brief summaries of the position to be taken by the Delegation on each of the more important items on the Assembly's agenda.

The undersigned recommends that the attached instructions be approved by the Cabinet.

GENERAL INSTRUCTIONS FOR THE CANADIAN DELEGATION TO THE TENTH
SESSION OF THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY OF THE UNITED NATIONS

The tenth session of the General Assembly is likely to be interesting but difficult. It is possible that, in accordance with their new policy of promoting a détente in the international atmosphere, the Soviet bloc may adopt more moderate tactics during the session, and that certain controversial issues may not be revived or pressed unduly. The Canadian Delegation should respond to such tactics if they are adopted and attempt to encourage a further relaxation in tension. Major difficulties can however be expected to arise in connection with the so-called "colonial" items involving strains in the relations between the western nations as well as between these nations and those of the Asian-African bloc. Some of the issues which are to be discussed have been raised repeatedly in the past and resulted in acrimonious and unsatisfactory debates. When such issues are debated it will be particularly important for the Delegation to bear in mind that divisions between non-communist countries will provide propaganda advantages to the Soviet bloc even if no special effort is made to exploit them. The need for a conciliatory and mediatory role on the part of the Delegation will be greater than ever. Unless these problems can be dealt with satisfactorily there is a real danger that the Soviet and the Western blocs may be drawn into the discussion on opposite sides and that the détente may be compromised. While, therefore, the Delegation should concern itself primarily with the unity of the free democracies and their relations with the non-committed nations, it will also be necessary to bear in mind the possible implications of any course adopted on relations with the Soviet bloc.

2. In all disputes between non-communist countries, the essential role of the Canadian Delegation will be to advocate restraint and moderation. The Delegation may find it possible also to draw attention to the items which provide opportunities for co-operation, for positive and constructive action rather than for lengthy and heated disputation. To perform the task successfully the Delegation will have to be as objective as possible and seek a compromise between the legitimate security preoccupations of the colonial powers and the aspirations in many parts of the world for better political, economic and social conditions.

Elections

3. The Canadian Delegation should vote for Dr. Maza of Chile for the Presidency; there is no other apparent candidate. In the Security Council elections, we should support Australia to replace New Zealand, and Cuba, or any other candidate agreed upon by the Latin American bloc, to replace Brazil. For the third vacancy, to succeed Turkey in the Eastern Europe seat, the Delegation should initially support Poland. Failing Poland's election, the Delegation should vote for Yugoslavia, if it stands, as compromise candidate on the second ballot. If the vote is still indecisive the Delegation may then support Burma or the Philippines, in that order of preference. Canada is standing for election to the Economic Social Council. For the other seats, the Delegation should support the United States for re-election, Indonesia to succeed India (which will be standing for election to the second "Commonwealth seat" next year) and the candidate agreed on by the Latin American bloc (Costa Rica or Brazil) to succeed Venezuela. For the remaining two seats, the Delegation should support Greece to succeed Turkey, and Yugoslavia for re-election. Should Yugoslavia however already have been elected to the Security Council, the conflict between Turkey and Greece in the ECOSOC elections would be resolved and the Delegation would be free to vote for them both and not for Yugoslavia.

Representation of Communist China in the United Nations

4. At the four last sessions of the General Assembly, United States Delegations have been successful in avoiding substantive votes on this question by securing the adoption of procedural motions providing for postponement of consideration. While the Chinese Communist Government has pursued lately more conciliatory policies, it has not yet given any indication that it is willing to withdraw its forces from Korea and to agree to a settlement of the Korean and other Asian problems in accordance with the principles laid down by the United Nations. Under the circumstances and bearing in mind the fact that the United Kingdom and France are prepared to support the United States moratorium arrangement, the Delegation should again vote in favour of a motion postponing consideration of the issue during the current year.

Admission of New Members

5. There are twenty-one outstanding applications for membership in the United Nations all of which have been blocked previously in the Security Council. We have become increasingly concerned by this deadlock and are prepared to support an arrangement for the admission of all the outstanding applicants except North and South Korea and North and South Vietnam which are not yet unified. Believing compromise to be necessary we are prepared to support the admission of Albania, Bulgaria, Hungary, Roumania and Outer Mongolia in return for the admission of Austria, Italy, Finland, Cambodia, Ceylon, Ireland, Japan, Jordan, Laos, Libya, Nepal and Portugal. It is possible that the U.S.S.R. and many neutral countries may also support the admission of all seventeen qualified applicants. Accordingly we have urged the Western "Big Three" to seek a gentleman's agreement with the U.S.S.R. to support jointly the admission of the seventeen.

6. The Delegation should let our views be known privately to friendly delegations but should not engage in an active campaign to solicit support for our views if the U.S. and U.K. oppose the scheme. If the Security Council declines to recommend any more than the seven qualified Bandoeng applicants (Cambodia, Ceylon, Japan, Jordan, Laos, Libya and Nepal), the Delegation should regard this as a definitely inferior scheme and seek further instructions. If the U.S.S.R. excludes Japan from admission, the Delegation should also seek further instructions from Ottawa.

Charter Review

7. In pursuance of article 109(3) of the United Nations Charter (which Canada originally sponsored in 1945) a proposal to call a conference to review the Charter has been placed on the agenda for the tenth session.

8. If a conference were held, a few useful Charter revisions might conceivably gain universal support and all states could improve their knowledge of the United Nations through studies and objective discussions of the Charter's use and interpretation. However, in view of the U.S.S.R.'s pronounced opposition to Charter revision, Canada, the United Kingdom, France, Australia, New Zealand, India and others have been reluctant to support the holding of a conference in the near future which would not decrease, but might increase international tensions. Accordingly, the Canadian Delegation should support a United States compromise formula: a General Assembly decision, in principle, to hold a conference leaving the date and place open, and to establish a preparatory commission to report to the eleventh session. This suggestion, which is in line with our own thinking and that of the Secretary-General of the United Nations, should be sufficiently positive to please those states which strongly favour holding a conference and yet flexible enough on the question of timing to permit substantial easing of East-West tensions and adequate preparation for a successful conference. The United States is seeking general agreement on this formula and it is hoped that, as a result, this item may be handled non-controversially and with a minimum of debate on substantive Charter review issues.

Disarmament

9. The Canadian Delegation should express its concurrence in the United States suggestion that priority be given to the Eisenhower proposals for the exchange of blueprints on United States and Soviet establishments and for aerial surveys of the territories of the two countries. These proposals seem to offer the best ground, at this stage, for achieving progress in negotiations on the disarmament issue. However, the Western members of the U.N. Sub-Committee on Disarmament (of which Canada is a member) are concerned lest the United States case might be presented at the tenth session in a way which would not be consistent with the aim of achieving unanimous agreement in the General Assembly; this aim was achieved at the last session for the first time in many years. In accordance with Canada's conciliatory role in United Nations disarmament negotiations, the Delegation should make every effort to induce the United States to adopt a flexible attitude in line with the recent détente in East-West relations; but without prejudice of course to Western security.

Peaceful Uses of Atomic Energy

10. This subject is to be discussed under two agenda items. The first item concerns a report by the Secretary General on the International Conference on the Peaceful Uses of Atomic Energy which was held in Geneva last August. The Conference was a great success and there seems to be general agreement that another should be held in three or four years. It is expected that the Secretary General will report that the Advisory Committee, which was established by the General Assembly to assist him in preparing for the conference, will have to meet again to dispose of unfinished business, and that he will suggest that it would be advantageous if the Committee were continued in existence. The position of the Canadian Delegation should be that it would have no objection to the continuation of the Advisory Committee to advise the Secretary General on a possible future conference similar to that held in Geneva this summer, but that its terms of reference should not extend into other fields (e.g., the International Atomic Energy Agency or the problem of radiation hazards), unless it subsequently develops that this would be desirable.

11. The second item, which was proposed by the United States, is intended to give an opportunity to Governments to report on "progress in developing international cooperation for the peaceful uses of atomic energy". The United States intends to refer to the series of bilateral agreements for cooperation which they have made with other nations during the past nine months,<sup>2</sup> the progress of their training programme for scientists from other countries, and the current status of the negotiations for the establishment of an International Atomic Energy Agency. Depending on the time at which the debate takes place, it may be desirable for the Canadian Delegation to refer to the arrangements for supplying an NRX-type reactor to India under the Colombo Plan.<sup>3</sup> It is hoped that the substance of the draft statute for the proposed International Atomic Agency, which the United States has submitted confidentially to the other governments that are members of the United Nations or the Specialized Agencies, will not be debated. The Canadian Delegation should refrain from any action which might encourage debate on the substance of the draft statute. If the question of the relationship of the Agency to the United Nations comes under active consideration in such a way as to prejudice the final decision to be taken in this matter, the Delegation should seek specific instructions from Ottawa.

See Chapter 4, Part 4, Section A.

Effects of Atomic Radiation

12. There has been widespread concern in many parts of the world over the possible noxious effects of nuclear tests and of atomic plants. It was with these considerations in mind that last year Mr. Nehru suggested that further nuclear tests should be banned: the proposal was endorsed by the U.S.S.R. and incorporated in their recent disarmament plan.

13. In order to allay these fears which it considers unwarranted, the United States Government has suggested lately that the United Nations might collate the facts available so far on the effects of radiation and circulate the results of the survey to the member countries and, we hope, to the Specialized Agencies. Their latest proposal (which they have discussed confidentially with us and with which we are in agreement) calls for the setting up of a body of government representatives who, as a first step, will put together as a systematic and comprehensive report such relevant scientific data as may be released by the governments which have experience in this field. The Canadian Delegation should support this proposal.

Policy on the Competence of the General Assembly to Discuss Colonial Items and Matters of Domestic Jurisdiction

14. In the past, when U.N. competence under Articles 10, 11, 14 or 35 of the Charter has been cast in doubt by the provisions of Article 2(7), we have on some occasions proposed, or supported a suggestion that a ruling of the International Court of Justice be sought. On the other hand, for some time we developed more generally the practice of giving a liberal interpretation to Article 2(7) to permit a wide inscription of items on the agenda and their discussion by the Assembly under Article 14, which establishes the Assembly's right to discuss and make recommendations "for the peaceful adjustment of any situation, regardless of origin, which it deems likely to impair the general welfare or friendly relations among nations". More recently we have, however, recognized that this right, among others, would be seriously impaired if too great an effect were given to the domestic jurisdiction laws set forth in Article 2(7). The Delegation should therefore bear in mind our practice of weighing each case on its merits, the final decision being made on the basis of whether inscription and discussion would serve a useful or harmful purpose either in finding a solution or in reducing the tensions which the problem has brought about among member states. Article 2(7) should in general be brought into the balance only in the next steps of discussion and recommendation, as a measure to determine whether the proposed action by the Assembly is of such a nature as to qualify it as intervention. In other words, our decision whether the Assembly should discuss the item should be decided on the basis of practical and political considerations rather than on legalistic ones. The latter should nevertheless be given due weight in casting our vote on any resolution resulting from the discussion. This flexible policy is the basis of the instructions on Tunisia and on items 20, 23, and supplementary items 1, 2 3 and 5 (Morocco, Cyprus, Algeria, West New Guinea, and race conflict and the treatment of persons of Indian origin in South Africa). In view of the above, the Delegation should avoid giving support to proposals seeking an opinion from the International Court on these apparently conflicting Articles of the Charter. Straight-forward legal questions which do not involve this conflict, such as those questions concerning West New Guinea, do not, of course come under this restriction.

See also Chapter 3, Part 2, Section D(ii).

Cyprus

15. The Greek Government has again requested consideration of the future of Cyprus in the same terms as last year, i.e. the application of the principle of self-determination to the population. At the ninth session of the Assembly Canada voted against inscription of the item on two grounds. Procedurally the wording of the item pre-supposed intervention, contrary to the Charter of the United Nations. Politically a general debate on Cyprus appeared undesirable.<sup>4</sup> The United Kingdom will undoubtedly maintain its view that there should be no discussion of Cyprus under Article 2(7) of the Charter concerning domestic jurisdiction. Turkey has already entered an objection to the addition of the Cyprus item on the provisional agenda for the tenth session of the General Assembly, on the grounds that it was disposed of at the ninth session or at least that the Greeks are wrong in claiming that inscription also be automatic. The recent tripartite conference on Cyprus between the United Kingdom, Greece and Turkey will have a bearing on the matter. While the conference did not produce agreement, the proposals made during it by the United Kingdom may provide some basis for future negotiations. The Canadian delegation should encourage any tendencies to take this view, especially as the arguments against inscription remain strong.<sup>5</sup>

The Moroccan Question

16. At its Eighth Session the General Assembly adopted a resolution which noted that negotiations between France and Morocco would be initiated, expressed confidence that a satisfactory solution would be achieved and decided to postpone further consideration of the question for the time being. In recent months the French Government has been endeavouring to establish a provisional Moroccan Government with which it could commence negotiations for political, economic and social reforms before the opening of the forthcoming General Assembly. If the French Government is successful, this fact, together with the transfer of a large measure of autonomy to Tunisia, may moderate the tone of the Assembly's discussion of the Moroccan item.

17. In that event the Canadian delegation should pursue a policy similar to that adopted at previous sessions: the Delegation should not attempt to prevent discussion of the Moroccan problem and should not play a prominent part in the debates on this question. The Delegation should oppose any resolution that would condemn French policies or recommend intervention which would be prejudicial to the French efforts to bring about a peaceful settlement in Morocco. The Delegation may support a resolution expressing confidence that a satisfactory solution will be found and recommending continuation of the French-Moroccan negotiations to that end.

On September 21, the United Nations voted not to inscribe the Cyprus issue on the agenda of the tenth session of the General Assembly.

18. If political pressures in France should force the French Government to postpone further its proposed reforms in Morocco or if there should be a serious deterioration in Moroccan internal affairs before this question is discussed at the General Assembly, the Delegation should seek further instructions.

The Algerian Question

19. The Algerian question has not been discussed at previous sessions of the General Assembly. It is both more complex and more worrying than the Tunisian or Moroccan questions. Unlike the protectorates of Tunisia and Morocco, Algeria is constitutionally a part of metropolitan France and Europeans comprise a much larger proportion of the population of Algeria. Although French policy seems to be shifting from assimilation to a form of integration which would transfer to the Algerians some control over their own affairs, the nationalist drive for independence has meanwhile gained alarming momentum from the point of view of France. The strength of the nationalists in Algeria was clearly revealed during the uprisings on August 20. Their appetite for independence has been whetted by the political reforms that are being implemented in Tunisia and are proposed for Morocco. It is difficult to see how the French can long continue to insist that Algeria is an integral part of France. Nevertheless, the Algerian problem is not capable of a quick solution and there is at present no alternative to French authority in Algeria other than anarchy or civil war. Moreover, the Mediterranean departments of Algeria are within the North Atlantic Treaty area and the whole territory is of great strategic significance in the maintenance of Mediterranean communications and for the Strategic Air Command. A discussion in the United Nations would probably inspire increased unrest and the inevitable criticism of French policies would undermine the constructive approach which the present French Government has been pursuing elsewhere in North Africa despite strong political pressure from right-wing parties. The outcome of events in French North Africa directly affects NATO as well as North African security, and France's future as an international power depends to a considerable extent on a favourable and peaceful settlement of this difficult situation. It is not in our interests at this stage in world affairs, that French power and influence in Europe and NATO should be weakened.<sup>6</sup>

20. For these reasons the Canadian Delegation should discourage any Assembly discussion of the Algerian question at this time. If necessary the Delegation may explain that, although we recognize the gravity of the situation, a discussion at this time might be more effective in preventing violence than in bringing about reforms and that in view of the constructive policies and the concessions on both sides which have brought about reforms in Morocco and in Tunisia, we are confident that measures will be taken to satisfy the legitimate aspirations of the peoples of Algeria as well.

21. An attitude of this kind would support the French position while underlining our view of the desirability of moving forward with the political reforms in Algeria. The delicate situation in Algeria is still very fluid and further instructions may be required in the light of later information on the intentions of the French Government and the attitudes of other governments.

South Africa: (Race Conflict and Treatment of People of Indian Origin)

22. These two items provide a focus for the animosity of members of the United Nations towards a member which has appeared intentionally to disregard some of the obligations embodied in the Charter. In particular, the Union of South Africa's observance of Articles 55 and 56 is in question.

23. Bearing in mind the usefulness of allowing discussion of the failings of the Union, the equally important need to adhere to the principles of the Charter, and the value of South Africa's continuing membership in the United Nations, the Canadian Delegation should adopt the customary Canadian attitude towards Article 2(7): the United Nations may discuss, but not intervene in, a member states's internal affairs if these have international implications.

The Question of West New Guinea

24. At the ninth session of the General Assembly a resolution was submitted expressing the hope that the Governments of Indonesia and the Netherlands would pursue their endeavours to find a solution to the dispute over the status of West New Guinea in conformity with the principles of the Charter of the United Nations. The resolution failed to obtain the required two-thirds majority in the Plenary Session.<sup>7</sup> Prior to that, discussions between Indonesia and the Netherlands over the western half of the island of New Guinea had proved negative and the Dutch had made known in August 1954 that they would refuse to re-open negotiations. The Dutch claim that their administration of West New Guinea is an endeavour to bring a dependent people to self-determination and that this right would be denied to the inhabitants if the territory were to be transferred to Indonesia. The Netherlands position is strongly supported by Australia which is concerned about the implications for Australian defence of any change in the status of the territory. Since the Dutch legal case appeared to be the stronger, the Delegation supported it in voting against the resolution which was defeated at the ninth session. The Delegation should support this position again at the tenth session. In the debate the Canadian Delegation should propose that the dispute be referred to the International Court of Justice for a ruling on the question whether the Netherlands are still legally required to continue negotiations. In the debate on inscription of the item, however, the Delegation should abstain. Abstention would reflect our view that, as the matter is part of a question that the United Nations originally dealt with, the General Assembly has the right to discuss it. Abstention (rather than a vote for inscription) would also take into account Dutch sensitivity on this issue.

Questions of Dependent Territories

25. In trusteeship matters it has been the Canadian view that the details of the administration of trust territories should be left to the Trusteeship Council, and that the General Assembly should concern itself with broad principles. The Delegation should maintain this attitude. It should also seek to moderate the inevitable disagreements between those countries that administer trust territories or colonies and those that are critical of the administering powers.

Korea

26. Very little change has taken place in the Korean issues themselves since the ninth session of the General Assembly, but the general world picture seems to be changing and this requires a fresh look at Korea. Canada has consistently supported the concept of a Korean settlement through negotiations; the question is still one of timing, and the propitious time to give further consideration to Korean unification may occur during the tenth session. The Assembly might reaffirm the Armistice Agreement. It is doubtful if the problem of the Neutral Nations Supervisory Commission will be raised. The Canadian Delegation should favour some delay with regard to NNCS's activities coming to an end. India will report on NNRC and we should do what we can to prevent any renewal of an acrimonious debate on this issue.

Economic Questions

27. The proposal for the establishment of a Special United Nations Fund for economic development will once again be discussed during the Tenth Session. In general, the Canadian Delegation should continue to oppose as in the past, any proposals calling for the immediate establishment of this fund. Canada has been reluctant to support any such proposal because of the extent of other financial demands on Canadian resources for economic assistance abroad; because we believe Canadian funds could be used to better advantage in support of more practical bilateral programmes of economic aid; and because the absence of United Kingdom and the United States agreement to participate in the proposed organization has made it unrealistic to proceed further with definite plans.

28. ECOSOC resolution No. 15, passed by the 20th Session, recommends however that the General Assembly invite governments to give careful consideration to the most recent report of Mr. Scheyven and the Committee of Experts advocating the establishment of SUNFED.<sup>8</sup> The Canadian Delegation could agree that we would give careful consideration to any ECOSOC-approved report on this subject but should refrain from supporting the further recommendation of ECOSOC that member nations be asked to transmit to the Secretary General not later than 31st March, 1956, their views on Mr. Scheyven's recommendations as this would imply acceptance in principle of the proposed SUNFED. It should also be reluctant to support the establishment of an ad hoc committee to analyze the comments of member governments on these recommendations at the present stage. The Canadian Delegation should, however, need not take a leading part in these discussions and should act in close consultation with other like-minded delegations, particularly those of the United States and the United Kingdom. The discussion in ECOSOC indicates that the U.S. and the U.K. intend to resist proposals for the establishment of SUNFED. Both countries abstained in the voting on resolution 15. However, should either of these delegations modify their positions on the ECOSOC recommendations, the Canadian Delegation should seek further instructions.

29. Canada has approved the terms of the Charter for the International Finance Corporation and before or during the early days of the Session will deposit its formal accession. When the Charter comes up for approval in the General Assembly the Canadian Delegation should strongly support its terms. Canada has, since the idea of the IFC was first introduced, supported this proposal for stimulating private capital investment in the underdeveloped countries and believes that the Charter in its present form presents an acceptable basis for bringing the IFC into being.<sup>9</sup>

30. On the question of the possible provision of technical assistance to Libya, the Canadian position is that this activity lies properly within the province of the U.N.T.A.B. In the event that there is any tendency to link this question to the situation in currently unsettled French North Africa, the delegation should seek further instructions.

31. The Delegation may support the adoption of the ECOSOC report on technical assistance. Separate instructions will be forwarded regarding the Canadian contribution for 1956-57 to the Expanded Programme of Technical Assistance.

Humanitarian and Social Questions

32. As a result of a decision on procedure adopted at the ninth session, it is anticipated that the Third Committee of the General Assembly will undertake a detailed examination of the Articles of the draft International Covenants on Human Rights. The Canadian Delegation should continue to press for the inclusion of a suitable federal state clause and, in any event, for the removal of the present federal clause which was inserted at the suggestion of the USSR and which provides that the covenants shall extend to all parts of federal states without limitation. In pursuing this aim, however, the Delegation should avoid placing the Government in a position where it could hardly refrain from signing the covenants without embarrassment, should it be decided at a later date not to sign this instrument in spite of the removal of the Soviet-sponsored article or the insertion of a satisfactory federal state clause. As regards other articles of the draft covenants the Delegation should endeavour to influence the decisions of the General Assembly along the lines of the Canadian comments which were sent to the Secretary General on March 2, 1954.

33. The Economic and Social Council at its latest session approved a resolution for transmission to the General Assembly authorizing the Secretary General to provide technical assistance with respect to any subject in the field of human rights, including the rights enumerated in the Universal Declaration on Human Rights and in the draft International Covenants on Human Rights. Since this proposal would probably result in duplication of effort and since the Technical Assistance Committee of ECOSOC is already considering the amalgamation of Technical Assistance Administration activities for economic development, social welfare and public administration, the Delegation should press for reference of this question to the TAC or, failing that, for deferment of the resolution for later consideration.

34. The Delegation should continue to support the four-year programme of the High Commissioner for Refugees which is designed to provide permanent solutions to the problems of refugees and also to provide some emergency assistance. While Canada has already contributed $125,000 to the U.N. Refugee Fund for implementation of the programme in 1955, the Delegation should, for the time being, avoid making any commitment regarding further Canadian contributions in 1956 and subsequent years.

35. On other items relating to human rights and social problems, the Delegation should endeavour to have the United Nations and its subsidiary bodies undertake projects which are realistic in terms of prevailing world conditions and in which there is a possibility of practical results.

Administrative and Budgetary Questions

36. The Delegation should satisfy itself that all possible economies have been effected by the Secretary General in his budget estimates for 1956 and in his supplementary estimates for 1955. The Delegation should also ensure that any proposed changes in the scale of assessments on member governments are fully in accordance with the principles approved at previous sessions of the General Assembly. Every effort should be made to secure the election of the Canadian candidate (J.F. Parkinson) to the Committee on Contributions. Any move to draft Canada for a further term on the U.N. Board of Auditors should be discouraged. The proposals of the Special Committee for establishing a review procedure for decisions of the U.N. Administrative Tribunal should be supported. Improvements in administrative and budgetary co-ordination between the United Nations and its specialized agencies should be welcomed, but greater emphasis should be placed on the need for co-ordination of planning between U.N. organs and agencies. Finally, attention should be drawn to the undesirable consequences of setting target figures for contributions to U.N. extra-budgetary programmes without regard to the degree of financial support which is likely to be forthcoming from member governments.<sup>10</sup>

CANADIAN MEMBERSHIP IN THE MAIN COUNCILS OF THE UNITED NATIONS

This memorandum deals with Canadian representation in the various councils, bodies and agencies of the United Nations and concludes with recommendations concerning future Canadian membership in the main councils of the organization. It is being submitted at this time because our Permanent Representative in New York has informed us in telegram No. 157 of March 2† (copy attached) that the Australian Prime Minister and his party probably will wish to discuss the question of Australia's election to the Security Council for 1956-57 when they visit Ottawa next week.

The attached statistical review† shows that Canada now holds fewer offices in the United Nations than at any time since 1946. Modification of chart totals to provide special weighting for the presidency of the General Assembly and membership in the Security Council and ECOSOC on the basis of the first two contributing five additional points and ECOSOC four, produces the following results:

Point totals for Offices held by Canada in United Nations Principal Organs, Subsidiary Bodies, and Specialized Agencies
1946	1947	1948	1949	1950	1951	1952	1953	1954
26	36	57	53	46	52	50	35	28

A "box-score" based on membership of Canada and a number of other countries on the Security Council, ECOSOC and Trusteeship Council, adjusted on the basis of five points for the Security Council and four for ECOSOC and the Trusteeship Council, produced the following totals up to 1956:

These instructions were approved by Cabinet on September 16, 1955.

Australia	79	Brazil	42
Belgium	78	Poland	38
New Zealand	62	Canada	34
India	54	Chile	34

The significance of the foregoing figures is, of course, modified by the growing importance of the General Assembly and the increasing of the subsidiary bodies of the Assembly, including the Collective Measures Committee, the Disarmament Commission and its Sub-Committee, and the Advisory Committee established to assist the Secretary-General in preparing for the International Atomic Energy Conference. Membership in one or more of the main councils remains highly desirable, however, for reasons of prestige, influence in deciding important issues and facilities for obtaining information.

Following are observations and recommendations concerning them:

Observations

1. Security Council

Although the Security Council has declined in importance over the years, there is no doubt that it is still a body of considerable prestige. New Zealand's term of office on the Security Council will expire at the end of 1955. As it is unlikely that the Union of South Africa will wish to stand for election, a second round of Commonwealth representation is due to begin in 1956. The sequence of the first round was:

Canada	1948-49
India	1950-51
Pakistan	1952-53
New Zealand	1954-55

In connection with Australia's intention for 1956-57, Mr. Johnson reported from New York (Letter No. 50 of January 21, † copy attached):

"It is perhaps indicative of Australian views that when Sir Leslie Munro, Mr. Forsyth and I were waiting to see Mr. Hammarskjold a few days ago, Sir Leslie suggested to Mr. Forsyth that Australia should now begin its campaign for election to the Security Council in succession to New Zealand. Mr. Forsyth agreed with Sir Leslie Munro and said that he was urging this course upon his Government. The difficulty they both feared was not the candidature of Canada but that of India. They both assumed that as between Canada and Australia, it was Australia's turn. They were both afraid, however, that India, which only reluctantly agreed to support New Zealand two years ago, might make another bid for the Commonwealth seat."

In the same letter Mr. Johnson said that the Australian Delegation in New York seemed confident that Canada would not contest its right of succession to the Commonwealth seat for 1956-57. This confidence might have been based on a conversation between you and Sir Alan Watt — at that time Under-Secretary for External Affairs in Australia — in 1953, in which you indicated provisionally that Canada would not be inclined to anticipate its regular turn on the Security Council. (A copy of a memorandum † concerning your conversation with Sir Alan is attached.)

Upholding Australia's right of succession to the Commonwealth seat for 1956-57 is the probability that disputing of it by Canada would encourage India to denounce the rotational principle for the Commonwealth seat on the ground that Asia is under-represented in the Security Council. If India decided to enter a claim for the Commonwealth seat for 1956-57, Canada would be faced with a problem similar to that which developed in 1953 when it appeared that India might contest New Zealand's right of succession. At that time, we planned to support New Zealand, while informing India that we sympathized with the need for a more equitable geographical representation and would react favourably at a Charter Review Conference to a proposal for an additional seat for Asia. In view of our interest in maintaining the rotational principle for the Commonwealth seat, a similar policy would appear applicable if India decided to contest Australia's right of succession. Expansion of the Security Council to provide an additional permanent seat for Asia is considered feasible by the Department's Charter Review Working Group. The Soviet bloc might find it embarrassing to resist such a proposal.

2. Economic and Social Council

Australia	1948-50
	1953-55
India	1946-48
	1949-51
	1953-55
New Zealand	1947-49
	1954-56

You will note that by the end of 1955, Canada, Australia and Pakistan will have served two three-year terms each, India will have served three three-year terms, and New Zealand one three-year term. Since Canada ended its second three-year term in 1952 and since the other Commonwealth countries concerned, except New Zealand, have served since then, it would appear legitimate for Canada to seek election for a third three-year term starting in 1956. The fact that Australia's second three-year term ends this year should facilitate Canada's re-election. It is possible that New Zealand also may wish to re-enter ECOSOC in 1956, but its candidature should not raise any difficulty unless India sought immediate re-election for a fourth term in 1956. Pakistan's second three-year term will end in 1956, and it would appear reasonable to expect India to be content to wait for one year before seeking re-election.

3. Trusteeship Council

Canada never has been represented on the Trusteeship Council and there seems to be little inducement to seek election there as it appears evident that we are able to play a more useful and constructive role in trusteeship matters while sitting on the sidelines and attempting to mediate and reconcile differences between the opposing blocs. Canada has no direct interest in trusteeship and colonial activities, and experience has shown that there is little to be gained from active participation in these controversial fields. Furthermore, we have too little knowledge of and experience in this field to make a useful contribution without devoting more labour to it than is at present available. Recommendations

On the basis of the foregoing, I should like to recommend:

1. If, as seems almost certain, Australia seeks election to the Security Council in 1956-57, Canada should support its candidature.<sup>11</sup>

Yes. L.B. P[earson]

2. If both Australia and India seek the Commonwealth seat for 1956-57, Canada would be justified in supporting Australia to preserve the rotational principle on which our own prospects for a seat in 1958-59 depend. Canada should, however, inform India of its sympathy with the need for more equitable geographical representation, and indicate the likelihood of Canadian support at a Charter Review Conference for a proposal to provide an additional seat on the Security Council for Asia.<sup>12</sup> (It would be advantageous in some respects to avoid giving the Australians a definite commitment on this point at present in view of our uncertainty of India's plans. On the other hand, a definite "prior" commitment to Australia at this time might save us embarrassment if India later requested our support. On balance, a fairly firm commitment to Australia at this time would appear desirable.)<sup>13</sup>

3. Canada should plan to seek election to the Security Council for 1958-59.<sup>14</sup>

4. Canada should seek election to the Economic and Social Council for 1956-57-58.<sup>15</sup>

5. Canada should continue to refrain from seeking election to the Trusteeship Council.<sup>16</sup>
Your views would be appreciated.

ELECTIONS TO THE SECURITY COUNCIL

Elections for the three non-permanent seats of the Security Council which will become vacant at the end of this year when the terms of Brazil (Latin American seat), New Zealand (Commonwealth seat) and Turkey (Eastern European seat) expire, were held at the General Assembly meeting of October 14. As you know, a member state may not succeed itself on the Council; voting is by a secret ballot and a two-thirds majority is required. Cuba and Australia were elected on the first ballot, but five more ballots on the third seat were taken without decisive result. Three further ballots on October 19 were equally inconclusive.

2. The ballots on this third (Eastern European) seat resolved initially into a deadlock between Poland and the Philippines and then, on the fifth ballot, between Yugoslavia, as a substitute candidate, and the Philippines. The vote was close, on the last ballot (ninth) Yugoslavia getting 27 and the Philippines 31 votes and thus both falling short of the required 39 (attached is a list† of the votes on each ballot).

3. The Canadian view is that it would be undesirable to upset the geographical convention on the Security Council seats by electing a member from another region to this Eastern European seat. This might cause East-West controversy by completely breaking the Gentleman's Agreement regarding the Eastern European seat and, in terms of self-interest, would establish a precedent which might endanger the Commonwealth seat. It was considered that, of the possible Eastern European candidates, Poland should have our support, in order to avoid the friction which might develop if the Russian Satellites' claim to a turn in this seat were rejected and which would be unfortunate in the light of the present international situation. If Poland's chances turned out to be hopeless, it was held preferable to support Yugoslavia as second choice in order to keep the seat in Eastern Europe, and only as a last resort to switch our support to Burma or the Philippines, in that order of preference. In the latter event, it would be necessary to make it known we do not construe an election of an Asian member as implying a permanent transfer of the seat to Asia. We believe the separate question of additional representation for Asian countries should not be solved at the expense of a European seat.

4. The Assembly Delegation was accordingly instructed to vote initially for Poland and, failing Poland's election, for Yugoslavia, if it stood as a compromise candidate. If it became apparent that Yugoslavia in turn stood no chance of election, the Delegation would then support Burma or the Philippines (see memorandum approved by Cabinet September 16).<sup>17</sup> As it turned out, Burma refused to stand and Yugoslavia, having entered the race, has been able to hold its own in the deadlock with the Philippines. The Delegation voted for Poland on three ballots, switching to Yugoslavia on the remaining ballots, after it had been made known by the Soviet Bloc that the candidature of Poland would be dropped and Yugoslavia would be a substitute candidate.

5. We kept the Old Commonwealth countries informed of our intentions, as well as the Americans, both in Washington and New York. Most recently, on October 12, the Delegation was instructed to reply to Mr. Lodge's representations by informing him that its instructions had been confirmed and that it would vote only as a last resort for the Philippines, re-iterating the reasons for our vote.<sup>18</sup> While it does not appear possible to make an exact analysis of the votes, it is known that the Benelux and Scandinavian countries initially supported Poland and intended to shift their vote to Yugoslavia because "they were strongly opposed to having a European seat transferred to Asia". The United Kingdom and New Zealand also switched their votes from Poland to Yugoslavia, but Australia has continued throughout its support of the Philippines. India indicated earlier that it would initially support Poland, but it seems that both the Asian and the African votes are divided on this issue. It is at least clear that the Philippines do not have unqualified support from their region as the candidate of the Asian countries.

6. This issue remains a point of friction for the current session of the Assembly and is likely to be interpreted as yet another aspect of the cold war. It is nevertheless much to expect, given the present two candidates, that the supporters of either should back down. There appear to be no eligible and acceptable alternative candidates in Eastern Europe (Turkey can not be re-elected, Greece is not acceptable to the United Kingdom and Czechoslovakia, Byelo-Russia and the Ukraine are not likely to be more acceptable to the United States than Poland). Moreover, in view of the heavy commitments of the Americans to the Philippines on the one hand and the protagonists of Yugoslavia on the other, it seems clear that a fresh alternative candidate must be sought on which both groups can agree. As far as our vote goes, it might be impolitic, on this matter of principle, to shift it to the Philippines at this stage. A possible solution to the stalemate might be found in Sweden. It is a neutral country which could command some support from the Soviet Bloc, and would also have merit from the United States point of view. While it is not an "Eastern" European country, its election would at least keep the seat in Europe and might provide a convenient way out of the present deadlock to all concerned. The Swedes might not be too eager themselves to be drawn into this controversy but, if both groups were willing to accept them they might be prepared to be "drafted". We have asked our Delegation in New York to explore the reaction of friendly delegations to this possible solution.<sup>19</sup>

ADMISSION OF NEW MEMBERS TO THE UNITED NATIONS

The attached telegram No. 501 of July 28, 1955† from New Delhi confirms a report that Premier Bulganin had told Mr. Nehru during the latter's recent visit to Moscow that the

On October 26, 1955, Cabinet agreed that Canada should continue to support Yugoslavia, which was eventually elected to the Security Council on December 20, 1955, on the understanding that it would resign after one year. The agreement was honoured and, on January 1, 1957, the Philippines took its seat on the Security Council. See United Nations, Yearbook of the United Nations 1957, New York: Office of Public Information, United Nations, 1958, p. 514.

Soviet Union would support the admission to the United Nations of all 17 qualified states which wished to enter (i.e. Albania, Austria, Bulgaria, Cambodia, Ceylon, Finland, Hungary, Ireland, Italy, Japan, Jordan, Laos, Libya, Nepal, Outer Mongolia, Portugal and Rumania). It was agreed that partitioned Korea and Vietnam should not be admitted until they have been re-unified. The admission of Communist China was regarded as being an entirely separate question.

The Russian and Indian position thus coincides with the views which you have expressed on this subject before the External Affairs Committee<sup>20</sup> (and confirmed in tel. No. 1129 of July 12, 1955† to the High Commissioner in London which is attached for convenient reference) and with the general views expressed by many of the smaller powers at Bandung<sup>21</sup> and at the United Nations Commemoration Meetings at San Francisco.<sup>22</sup> Thus, the question of the admission of all outstanding applicants for membership is almost certain to be raised at the next session of the General Assembly and seems assured of receiving widespread support, especially from the members who participated in the Bandung Conference, from the Communist and Scandinavian members and from Yugoslavia. To date, the emphasis has been placed on the desirability of "opening the gates" by any means, rather than on any specific formula (such as a "package deal") for achieving this end.

The attitude of the United States, United Kingdom and France appears to differ. Shortly before the recent San Francisco meeting, these three powers reaffirmed their consistent opposition to any form of "package deal", which in any case they believe to be precluded by the 1948 advisory opinion of the International Court of Justice. In their view, all outstanding candidatures should come up and be voted on individually and on their respective merits. If individual candidatures were raised in the Security Council in the chronological order of their applications, the United States, United Kingdom and France stated that Albania (and presumably the other Soviet candidates) would probably fail at the outset. The Soviet satellites have been rejected in the past on the grounds that they did not possess a "peace-loving" character and were not "able and willing" to carry out the Charter obligations.

The real difference in the two approaches is that the Western Big Three are interpreting the entrance requirements of Article 4 in a legalistic manner whereas we are urging a liberal interpretation of the "peace-loving" aspect. When you expressed the view that "the time has come when we should accept all these applications for membership which are now before the United Nations" this did not overlook article 4 but rather urged a broad interpretation of it and implied a willingness to accept the good faith of any state which desires entrance, regardless of its ideology or past misconduct.

We are not however, urging a loose interpretation of the other, more precise qualification, statehood. Universal membership would not include Germany, Korea and Vietnam at present because they are not unified, sovereign states. Nor does universality imply that non-member states would be coerced into membership in the absence of any application to join (as in the case of Spain and Switzerland); it simply means that membership is universally open to all sovereign states which wish to join and accept the obligations of membership. However, even the qualification of statehood would have to be interpreted liberally if we acquiesced in the admission of Outer Mongolia; but this seems a small price to pay, if it proves to be necessary to gain Soviet co-operation. In this connection, we might keep in mind the precedent of India being admitted as an original member of the United Nations at a time when its status as an independent state was open to question.

Results of the Admission of New Members

The following results could reasonably be expected if the admission of all 17 applicants were approved in the Security Council and General Assembly.

(1) There would be a further easing of East-West tensions. An old bone of contention would have been removed and a further example of the possibility of real East-West collaboration would have been exhibited;

(2) The prestige of the United Nations would be raised as it would validate the organization's claim to be a true world organization and the one forum where substantially all national views can be heard and discussed;

(3) It might well create a favourable atmosphere for the eventual admission of the Peking Government because the admission of all applicant states would (a) ease East-West tensions, (b) establish the precedent of admitting states regardless of their present ideologies and past conduct and (c) point up the anomaly of excluding one of the most important states from a world organization;

(4) After having set the precedent of interpreting article 4 liberally and favouring the principle of universal membership of sovereign states, the eventual easy entry of Spain, unified Germany, Korea and Vietnam, and any colonial states achieving independence should be much more probable;

(5) There would be a change in the balance of voting in the Assembly: the Soviet bloc would gain 5 votes; the neutralists would gain 3 or 4; the Arabs 2; and the West 6 or 7 including the two most important members, Italy and Japan. The relative importance of the Latin American bloc would decline. Pressure for a re-appraisal of the allocation of the seats and possibly for increased membership in the Security Council would also result.

Recommendations

As a result of the foregoing considerations it is recommended, if you agree, that:

(1) We enquire as to the views of the Western Big Three on the admission of new members and as to any plans they may have for breaking the deadlock on membership. If they have none, we might urge a more positive approach in this field possibly through the Western Big Three attempting to reach a prior understanding with Russia on the admission of all outstanding applicants.<sup>23</sup> We might point out that: (a) this can be viewed not as a "package deal" but as a workable scheme to achieve the admission of all outstanding applications; and (b) each applicant could be voted on individually but with a prior Gentlemen's Agreement that all would be admitted. It might be indicated at the same time, that we view this question as an important one which has a reasonable chance of being resolved satisfactorily during the present period of détente.<sup>24</sup> Our desire to consult with the Big Three and to consider any of their proposals should be stressed but it should be brought out also that you are virtually committed to supporting the admission of all membership applicants except North and South Korea and North and South Vietnam.

While working within this general framework we could adopt either one of the following approaches:

(a) emphasizing the inquiry aspect, in which case the subject would be raised only with the Big Three and possibly with our traditional Commonwealth confidants, Australia and New Zealand; or

(b) emphasizing the promotional aspect by consulting a number of friendly Commonwealth, NATO and perhaps a few South American states on the question at the same time as, or shortly after we bring it to the attention of the Big Three. This approach would still be in the form of enquiry and consultation but it would promote support for our view and exert some pressure on the United States, United Kingdom and France.

I should be glad to know, if you agree with this general line of reasoning, which of these two alternatives you prefer.<sup>25</sup>

(2) After we have notified friendly countries of our position as above, you publicly discuss the question again and advocate the universal membership of all sovereign states which desire to join;<sup>26</sup>

(3) We keep in touch with the Colombo Powers in order to learn the exact manner in which they intend to raise the question at the next session of the United Nations: if they suggest that only those applications supported by the Bandung Conference should be dealt with, such a piece-meal approach may compromise the prospects of success for the wider (and in our view much more effective) scheme.<sup>27</sup>

It would appear that we might be well advised to take further action in order to enhance the prospects of the admission of the seventeen qualified applicants for admission to the United Nations, to avoid being faced with the dilemma of whether to approve or reject the admission of only a few applicants (such as the Bandung 7 and Austria), while others like Italy were excluded. As you know, our previous approaches to the United States, United Kingdom and France have failed so far to elicit any positive response and there is a distinct possibility of the U.S.S.R. and the neutralists seizing the initiative on this question.

It occurs to me that, if you agree, this is a matter you might discuss with Mr. Dulles during his forthcoming visit. It would be best if the United States were to agree to approach the U.S.S.R. for a Gentleman's Agreement in favour of admitting all 17 membership applicants by separate votes; however, the impression has been gained from State Department officials that the United States may be reluctant to move unless it is "pushed" by the representations of friendly countries. It may be that, because of domestic difficulties over the admission of the satellites and implications concerning the seating of Communist China, Mr. Dulles may not be prepared to take the initiative of approaching the U.S.S.R. on the question. If Mr. Dulles indicates that this is the case, you might sound him out on an Assembly resolution co-sponsored by Canada, Australia, India, Belgium, a Scandinavian country and possibly a Latin American or two which endorsed the principle of universality and called upon the Security Council to reconsider the admission of the 17 qualified applicants. If this resolution could be introduced by representative middle powers, with the prior knowledge and unofficial approval of the Big Three, it might possibly make it easier for the United States and United Kingdom later to allow the admission of the 17 in the Security Council and this would remove the necessity for a private arrangement with the U.S.S.R. (The U.S.S.R. could not object to this initiative on our part because they have already indicated to us that they are aware that we are promoting some sort of proposal for the admission of the 17 and that they are prepared to view it favourably.)

It is also recommended, if you agree, that the attached telegram† be sent to London (and repeated to Mr. Martin in case Mr. Macmillan has already left London).<sup>28</sup> We hope that Mr. Macmillan might join us in another attempt to persuade Mr. Dulles that a Western initiative would be desirable: if the United States will not move we should know Mr. Macmillan's re-action to a broadly sponsored resolution as suggested above. Because of the Albanian problem it is unlikely that the United Kingdom would agree to join us in sponsoring such a resolution.<sup>29</sup>

If you approve of this course of action a more detailed brief could be prepared for your conversation with Mr. Dulles.<sup>30</sup>

ADMISSION OF NEW MEMBERS

In your conversation with Mr. Dulles on the question of the admission of new members to the United Nations, you may wish to refer to the following arguments to persuade him that the Western Big Three should take the initiative of seeking an agreement with the U.S.S.R. The Western Big Three should support the admission of all 17 qualified membership applicants because if they do not:

(a) The question of the single admission of Austria will arise. Austria's admission can hardly be opposed but the Italian government will be embarrassed if Austria gains admission because of its neutrality while Italy is excluded because of its pro-Western policy;

(b) The admission of the Bandung 7 (Cambodia, Ceylon, Japan, Jordan, Laos, Libya and Nepal) may be proposed either in the Assembly or in the Security Council by the Asians. The West would then face an unhappy dilemma: it would be extremely difficult to oppose the admission of these qualified applicants but also detrimental to pro-Western support in the excluded European countries (especially Italy) because it would be said again that this proves neutralism to be a prerequisite for U.N. admission. If the Bandung 7 were admitted, without the counter-balancing Europeans, it would also upset the delicate balance between colonial and anti-colonial powers in several United Nations organs;

(c) The U.S.S.R. might itself propose the admission of all 17 qualified applicants. This would (1) give them a propaganda advantage and (2) embarrass Western nations which, like Canada, are publicly committed to universality and might feel obliged to support the Soviet move;

(d) Failure to break the long-standing deadlock on the admission of new members during the current period of détente would discourage any hopes that a settlement of this important problem is possible. This, in turn, detracts from the prestige and importance of the U.N. as a world organization. Public opinion has long regarded the exclusion of so many states from the U.N. as one of the organization's serious weaknesses.

If Mr. Dulles feels unable to take any initiative in this regard you might then enquire as to his reaction to a broad resolution sponsored by say, Canada, India, Australia, Belgium and one or two Scandinavian and Latin American countries urging the Security Council to approve the 17 outstanding applications; some of the Western Big Three could even reach an understanding beforehand to abstain in certain cases (e.g. the U.K. for Albania; the U.S.A. for the Soviet European satellites) but in such a way that all 17 would be ensured of the 7 affirmative votes required. Such a move in our part might achieve the desired results and might possibly be more acceptable to the Western Big Three.

If Mr. Dulles were to show any inclination to approach the U.S.S.R. on this subject it would be possible for him to clarify whether Moscow is prepared to agree to the admission of Japan at this time. Soviet views appear to be unsettled as Sobolev has indicated that Japan's admission is still a difficult problem and one on which no firm decision has yet been made.

If United States support for your proposal appears to hinge on the question of Outer Mongolia, you may wish to indicate that while we still favour its inclusion in accordance with the principle of universality, we are prepared to yield and have it omitted from the list in view of the strong objections of the United States and France. It is possible that the U.S.S.R. might also yield if an arrangement for the admission of the other satellites was in the balance.<sup>31</sup>

ADMISSION OF NEW MEMBERS

Zamyatin of the Soviet Delegation again today took the opportunity of a chance encounter at the United Nations to raise with Crowe the question of a possible Canadian move on this subject. He enquired whether Mr. Martin would express Canadian views on admission of new members in his speech in the general debate and he was told that the inclusion of a section on this subject was a possibility, although in the light of Sobolev's remarks to Mr. Martin about Japan we now wondered whether there was any real hope of progress at this time.<sup>32</sup> Zamyatin said that while it was true that the question of Japan had to be very carefully considered, it was still his personal opinion that the Soviet Delegation would be able to consider and discuss a proposal for the admission of the seventeen, including Japan. To the specific question whether the U.S.S.R. could support the admission of Japan before the conclusion of a treaty between Japan and the U.S.S.R., he said that it was his personal opinion that this might be possible. He also said that Mr. Sobolev's comments on Japan might not necessarily represent the final position of the Soviet Delegation. He stressed that the attitude of other great powers was of course very important and that his delegation would be very anxious to know whether for example the United States could accept, in effect, the simultaneous admission of the seventeen including Japan. He did not demur at the comment that it would be easier to ascertain the positions of other great powers if it could be firmly established that the U.S.S.R. would accept Japan and he enquired whether it would be helpful to the Canadian Delegation to have a more definite Soviet answer on Japan before Mr. Martin's speech in the general debate. We assured him that it would be very useful indeed to have such an indication of Soviet Policy.

2. It is tempting to conclude from these two approaches by Zamyatin that the Soviet Delegation would like the Canadian Delegation to take an initiative at this Assembly along the lines of the Minister's suggestion and that the U.S.S.R. would be willing to accept Japan in return for acceptance by the other permanent members of the Security Council of the Soviet candidates and of what would amount to a new and much larger package deal.

ADMISSION OF NEW MEMBERS

Mr. Martin had a word with Mr. Macmillan yesterday on the subject of admission of new members. Macmillan indicated that they had not yet finally made up their minds about the suggestion that 17 be admitted at the same time and he mentioned that, on the most optimistic calculation, the vote on inscribing the Cyprus item would have been a tie if these 17 states had been members.<sup>33</sup> He also stressed the difficulty of accepting Outer Mongolia as a member. Nevertheless he said that he would try to get his Prime Minister's views on this question and would speak to us again about it on Thursday. He thought it might be interesting if Mr. Pearson were able to raise this question with Molotov in Moscow. It would be helpful to have a report on any conversation on this subject with Dulles before Macmillan speaks to Mr. Martin again.<sup>34</sup>

2. Mr. Martin also suggested to Macmillan that it might be preferable to take up the new members question fairly soon to take advantage of what seems at the moment to be a favourable atmosphere.

3. There was also a meeting of officials of the Canadian, French, United Kingdom and United States delegations yesterday morning to exchange views on this question. Crosthwaite of the United Kingdom said quite frankly that his government had been disposed to support the admission of 17 but had had second thoughts after careful calculations of the effect on the vote on colonial questions. He even went so far as to say that, from this point of view, the admission of the Bandung countries alone would be preferable to the admission of the 17 since the net effect on the vote on colonial questions of admitting 17 would be worse. However Crosthwaite said that the United Kingdom had not reached a final decision but was anxious that a policy on the matter should be concerted at an early date with the United States, the French and ourselves. The French had no decisions to report but gave the impression that they would prefer to see no admissions. The United States representative said he could add nothing to what Dulles had said in the general debate. Dulles suggested in his statement that no one should use a veto to prevent admission of a new member (the United States, of course, had not been compelled to use its veto to block Communist applicants).

NEW MEMBERS

The following is the text of a draft resolution on the admission of new members.
Begins:

The General Assembly

Having noted the general sentiment which has been expressed on numerous occasions in favour of universality in the membership of the United Nations,

Having considered the report (A/2973) of the Committee of Good Offices established by the General Assembly resolution 718 (VIII) of 23 October 1953,

Taking into account the statements made by the permanent members of the Security Council in the present session on the question of new members,

Believing that a broader representation in the membership of the United Nations will enable the organization to play a more effective role in the current international situation,

1. Expresses appreciation of the work and efforts of the Committee of Good Offices;
2. Requests the Security Council to consider, in the light of the general opinion in favour of universality and of the improved international atmosphere, the pending applications of the following states which so far have not gained admission to the United Nations:

(List group of 18, including Spain)<sup>35</sup>

ADMISSION OF NEW MEMBERS

We agree with your acquiescence in the Ad Hoc Committee's decision to place the item of new members at the end of the agenda. As was pointed out during the debate on the order of items, we could always ask for some priority for the new members item if it should appear desirable to do so either because of developments at Geneva or because the Ad Hoc Committee would not otherwise reach new members until the end of November. As far as we can see at present, the Committee should take up new members during the first half of November if the debate is to result this year in anything more than the usual resolution, the practical effect of which is to postpone action for another year.

2. We appreciate the misgivings of the colonial powers and of France in particular and we agree with your judgment not to try to force the issue at the moment. If the Assembly does not upset France too profoundly by its current debate on the Algerian question, the French Government might also be willing to explore, at the Foreign Ministers' Meeting in Geneva, the feasibility of admitting 17 or 18 new members this year.<sup>36</sup> As you say all participants at Geneva will be looking for some issue on which agreement is possible and there are not too many. Indeed, our main reason for desiring to make headway on this issue at the present session is, as you know, our feeling that "the spirit of Geneva" may before long wear pretty thin. On general political grounds we would therefore hope, that as a result of the combined efforts of the four Foreign Ministers in Geneva and of some of the middle powers in New York, favourable action could be taken by both the Assembly and the Security Council this year. For this reason it would evidently be advantageous if the Ad

France was upset that the Afro-Asian anti-colonial bloc had been able to place the Algerian question on the General Assembly's agenda. The French feared that an increase in membership, particularly from the Soviet bloc, would strengthen anti-colonialism at the United Nations.

Hoc Committee debate could take place by Nov. 15 if at all possible, and your proposal, with which we concur, to show the draft resolution to a number of delegations at the appropriate time appears to us to offer a useful lead in this direction.

3. Regarding the substance of your draft resolution, we agree with your decision to omit an explicit declaration as to whether the Assembly considers all of the applicants to be qualified for membership according to the Charter. A more positive resolution might ideally be more satisfactory but would probably prove much more controversial; the present formula should allow us to go ahead with fair prospects of attracting widespread support in the Assembly.

4. We recognize the validity of the observations in telegram No. 1414 from London which suggest that the resolution's reference to universality may be unpalatable to the United Kingdom. As the support of the United Kingdom is important we believe that it would be better if the resolution were amended either as London suggests or, alternatively, paragraph I might be amended along the lines of the preambles to resolutions 718 (VIII) and 817 (IX), which the United Kingdom accepted, and made to read "having noted the growing general feeling in favour of the universality of the United Nations, membership in which is subject only to the provisions of the Charter".<sup>37</sup> Both of these suggestions might be regarded as tentative; the significant thing is that we should be ready to meet the United Kingdom point of view in the wording of the "universality" clause.

5. We agree to the tentative inclusion of Spain in the draft resolution but assume that, for the present, you will wish to leave Spain in brackets in your text to denote a measure of flexibility regarding the list of applicants so as to leave room to manoeuvre and time to ascertain whether the inclusion of Spain would prejudice the chances of having the other 17 accepted. As you know, the Minister spoke to Molotov in Moscow about the admission of 17 not 18.<sup>38</sup> There is also the question of the 1946 Assembly resolution concerning Spain's ineligibility for membership which may possibly be considered to constitute a temporary legal bar to admission.<sup>39</sup> This problem is under study at present.

NEW MEMBERS

This telegram will confirm the telephone conversation on October 25 between MacKay and Holmes concerning this subject. It is the considered view in the Delegation that we should not repeat not, at least at this stage, join with India in the sponsorship of a resolution of new members, along the lines of the draft contained in my telegram No. 60 of October 3. We agree that it may be desirable at a later stage to seek co-sponsors but for the time being it would be preferable to regard the matter as a purely Canadian initiative, although the delegation will be discussing it with several other delegations. It is our impression that the inclusion of India in the initial stages might decrease the chances for success.

2. On October 24 we informally showed our draft resolution to the Australian, New Zealand and United Kingdom delegations. We also mentioned to the representatives of Peru and Brazil that we might be informally circulating a draft. On October 25 we showed the draft to the Indian delegation because we had already informed Menon that we had a draft. We propose gradually to expand the number of delegations to which the draft will be shown.

3. We have been proceeding in that manner because of the several difficulties involved. The attitude of the Great Powers, for example, other than that of the United Kingdom, is not clear. The exact procedure to be adopted must be worked out carefully. Complex though more remote questions about the pattern of voting in the Security Council and the special problems connected with the admission of Spain must be borne in mind. Throughout, however, we are most anxious not to let the initiative fall into non-western hands. We are primarily interested, therefore, in stimulating the opinion that Canada is prepared to take the initiative in this matter.

4. The present indications are that, even if the Great Powers can reach some agreement on the admission of new members, and the position of France greatly increases the difficulty in this regard, the action to implement that agreement would not be effected at this Assembly. There are signs that none of the Great Powers is ready to press the issue, although the United Kingdom and United States at least might be prepared to swim with the tide. This suggests that an initiative might have to be taken in the Assembly, designed primarily to have the Assembly express with the largest possible vote its views in favour of the admission of the largest possible group of new members. A hortatory resolution, along the lines of our present draft, which we have amended in accordance with your suggestions in telegram V-62 of October 10, would presumably influence not only the Great Powers but the non-permanent members of the Security Council, whose votes may be most important if all the prospective members are to be admitted. (However, please see my telegram reporting on the old Commonwealth meeting of October 25 on this subject.)<sup>40</sup>

5. The last mentioned aim is foremost in our minds at the present time. We shall be consulting with first the Commonwealth delegations and later a wider group about timing and procedure. At the moment there seems to be no reason for precipitating action in the Assembly but only to forestall action by others.

NEW MEMBERS

This afternoon we discussed with the Australian, New Zealand and United Kingdom delegations the tactics involved in any initiative during the present session to achieve the admission of new members. These delegations had seen our draft resolution, as amended. The United Kingdom delegation seemed upset because we had begun to circulate, however informally, the text of a resolution, especially one which seemed to contemplate action by the Assembly before the Security Council had dealt with the outstanding applications in accordance with last year's resolution on this subject.<sup>41</sup>

2. We discussed this point of procedure. There is clearly the possibility that a resolution along the lines of our draft might obtain a substantial majority in the General Assembly and might therefore exert considerable influence not only on the Great Powers but on the non-permanent members of the Security Council. Coupled with careful negotiation a resolution of that kind might help to bring about an agreement to admit a large group of new members.

3. Alternatively, and we sense that the United Kingdom preferred this approach, the agreement between the Great Powers and the sounding out of the non-permanent members of the Security Council could take place first. Once agreement had been reached on the pattern of voting in the Security Council, the ensuing action both in the Security Council and the General Assembly would be of the rubber stamp variety. In the latter event the various diplomatic tasks involved in reaching agreement would be allocated to the delegations best suited for the specific task. It was suggested that the Canadian delegation might deal with the Russians, once the United Kingdom had reached agreement with the United States on the group of new members to be proposed. There was some inconclusive suggestions that the position of France might have to be clarified before an approach to the Soviet Union.

4. Crosthwaite said that Lodge had recently informally approached the Soviet delegation on the subject of new members and had intimated to them that the United States should consider a group of seventeen, including Spain but excluding Outer Mongolia "an interesting proposition". The United Kingdom delegation interpret this to mean that the United States would not accept Outer Mongolia in any grouping. They wondered whether we were prepared to drop that state. We replied that for the moment Outer Mongolia was included in our group but that we realized both Spain and Outer Mongolia might be the subject of bargaining. We were not previously aware that the United States authorities intended to be sticky about Outer Mongolia. It is still not clear whether they would veto its application, if an agreement were reached concerning the other applications.

5. Crosthwaite said that the United Kingdom legal advice was that the 1946 resolutions on Spain must be formally repealed if Spain were to be admitted. We expressed the tentative view, which some of the delegations shared, that if agreement were reached to admit the group of eighteen, including Spain, the question of repealing the earlier resolutions would not be raised and their abrogation would be effected by implication, if the Assembly passed a resolution in favour of Spain. Alternatively it might be possible to include some clause in the resolution which would reconcile it with the earlier ones. Crosthwaite said that the United Kingdom delegation would ask London to take another look at this matter.

6. There was some discussion of the manner in which the so-called "Canadian proposal" and the United Kingdom decision to support it would be dealt with in the meeting of the whole Commonwealth on October 27. It was generally agreed that the recent developments should be discussed frankly with the Asian members, even though the presence of Ceylon might occasion some embarrassment.

7. We stated our view that the United States must be brought into these discussions soon. We had intended to show them our draft on October 26. The United Kingdom representatives expressed the fear that the present text might alarm the United States delegation because if referred to a group of eighteen, because it implied Assembly action to bring pressure to bear on the Security Council and because it might be considered premature. We believe that these difficulties can be overcome through oral discussion but we propose to broach the subject cautiously with the United States delegation.

NEW MEMBERS

I had a brief discussion today with Wadsworth of the United States delegation on new members. He was much less disturbed than the British about our initiative and, indeed, said that he was glad that we were taking some initiative since obviously they could not do so.

2. He did intimate, however, that Outer Mongolia was a serious obstacle for them, not so much on the grounds that it was another satellite, but there was no clear indication that it fitted the description of membership in the charter. In this connection he repeated a story told yesterday that Lodge had said in a meeting with Malik and Kuznetsov that the list of applicants, except the divided states, would be an attractive proposition if Outer Mongolia were left out. He added that Malik asked why leave off Outer Mongolia and Lodge said why put it on, whereat they both laughed. Wadsworth seemed to think that the Russians might therefore accept a list which did not include Outer Mongolia. He added that such a list would be easier for the United States to swallow than the Bandung list.

3. He said that they, of course, could not vote for the Balkan satellites, but might be able to keep silent. They could vote for Albania if the British couldn't. The real problem as we saw it was to ensure that our prospective friends would have seven votes and for the Russians to ensure that theirs would have seven votes. He thought the Russians would be amenable to an agreement not to use the veto.

4. With respect to Spain, Wadsworth agreed with me that it would be desirable if the various Assembly resolutions on Spain could be circumvented without express repeal. Incidentally, Casardi, the Italian Permanent Representative, told me today that Belaunde, the Peruvian Ambassador who is Chairman of the Good Offices Committee, had told him that the Latin American group had agreed to vote against all the satellites unless they were assured that Spain would be admitted at the same time.

5. I said that we contemplated action in the Assembly and indeed that this was the only place that we could take action since we were not members of the Security Council. I implied that I did not think that it would be quite proper for us to go around lining up votes in the Security Council. Wadsworth took no exception to this.

6. Wadsworth said that they would expect trouble with Syngman Rhee if he were left off the list. He did not know how he could be handled, but suggested personally that if a resolution such as ours came up in the Assembly they might have to move an amendment to include the ROK, although they would expect it would be voted down.

7. We were told by the British today that after receipt of the information that the British Cabinet were prepared to go along, the State Department cabled Dulles suggesting further talks with Macmillan and the French. I am not sure whether this was given to us merely to keep us informed or whether it was hoped we would get the impression that the matter might be settled elsewhere.

ADMISSION OF NEW MEMBERS

1. Your reports on the reactions to our draft resolution on new members are heartening. We think you should keep up a steady interest on this subject by gradually widening the circle of representative delegations to whom the resolution is shown.

2. We must bear in mind, however, that this whole exercise, if it is to succeed, must have the support of the Great Powers; our main role is to bully them into agreement in the Security Council. For this reason the U.K. attitude mentioned in paragraph three of your telegram No. 195 is not unsound. If there is agreement among the Great Powers the Assembly will merely take note and welcome the happy development. (This is on the assumption that the Great Powers will accept the Canadian slate, i.e., all outstanding applicants less the divided countries. If they come up with another package deal the whole issue would have to be reconsidered. The stronger the line we take about universality at this stage the unhappier we will be with any package deal that might be acceptable to the Great Powers.)

3. The prospect of widespread Assembly support for a resolution should exert considerable pressure on the Great Powers and the fact that you are circulating a draft resolution should be most helpful in this respect. The actual introduction of our resolution, however, should be used only in the light of progress being made among the Big Four. As a last resort if it becomes clear that the Big Four do not intend to initiate action themselves we may at a later stage decide to submit it. This is not a decision that can be taken now. We should not place ourselves in a position where, as a result of action in the Assembly any of the western powers would be forced to veto an Assembly decision. This would do much more harm than good. Nor should we consider the possibility of a Soviet veto since in practice this would mean that the whole deal is off.

4. We are inclined to agree that you should not give the impression that you might in due course join with India in the sponsorship of a resolution on new members. There are definite advantages, however, in seeking close Indian support in the future, especially if there is any further indication that the Indians might take a separate initiative in this field. It would be disastrous were we to have to compete with India if conflicting resolutions were introduced. This would be detrimental to efforts to exert gradual, concerted pressure on the Big Four. There is also a strong likelihood that a separate Indian initiative would lapse into a proposal for the admission of the Bandung seven only. It is possible that strong Asian interest in the question might convince the French that it would be in their advantage not to block the admission of new members; in due course they might be prepared to consider bargaining their support on this question in return for Asian compromise on Algeria.

5. Because of the circulation already given to the draft resolution and of the interest shown by the French, the time seems to have come when our Embassy in Paris should show the draft informally to the French authorities. You might also show it to Guiringaud in New York if you wish. The French could be told that there is widespread demand for action along these lines in the Assembly and that there are indications that the other Great Powers may be prepared to agree among themselves to the admission of seventeen or eighteen new members. It should be stressed that we are anxious not to embarrass or isolate the French and that we intend to show the draft resolution to a select group only, with a view to giving an opportunity to the big powers to come to an understanding among themselves. You might also inform the U.S. and U.K. that we are showing our draft resolution to the French. This will allow them to discuss the matter among themselves if they so feel in Geneva or elsewhere.

ADMISSION OF NEW MEMBERS

There have been several recent developments which indicate that the time may now be ripe for taking direct action on the new members question: the Soviet [delegation] has indicated to the Swedish delegation that they would support a move to admit 16 (without Spain and Japan) and possibly 18 new members: Belaunde of the Good Offices Committee is anxious to have the item on new members discussed soon; and the Scandinavians, Indians and possibly others appear to be considering moves of their own. In the light of these events it seems advisable that you make another formal approach to the Government to which you are accredited pointing out that it seems important that the Western Big Three confer now on this matter and made a definite decision. If the Western Big Three decide to support the admission of 17 or 18 they might then approach the Soviet Union which, we feel confident, is in a receptive mood to discuss such a proposal. One positive aspect of this move would be that agreement could be exhibited as an important accomplishment of the current Geneva Conference.

2. It might be stated that we are anxious that the Big Three take action now before the increasing pressure forces us to take any public initiative (such as formally introducing our draft resolution). If this type of action is not taken by us soon this will mean surrendering the lead in this field to other groups whose actions might tend to be difficult to control. If we or some other group introduce a resolution on new members the great powers will, it seems to us, be faced with a regrettable choice of either bluntly rejecting the admission of new members or else appearing to be giving reluctant acquiescence to a move which was forced on them by world opinion. We are anxious to avoid confronting the Big Three with a dilemma which action on their part could now avoid.

ADMISSION OF NEW MEMBERS

1. Macmillan is busy in the house today with the Burgess-MacLean debate,<sup>42</sup> and returns to Geneva tonight. I therefore gave the sense of your message to Caccia.

2. He showed me the report the Foreign Office had received from Geneva of a conversation between Macmillan and Molotov on this subject. The latter had said that the time was opportune for the admission of new members. Macmillan had agreed and suggested that even if the permanent members of the Security Council found it difficult to cast positive votes for some of the less acceptable candidates, they should agree among themselves not to vote against them. Molotov was reported as "not dissenting" from this suggestion. He then urged Macmillan to bring the United Kingdom position into line with the Canadian position on this question. Molotov and Macmillan agreed that they would have another talk about the admission of new members in a few days' time.

3. I asked Caccia in what respects he thought the United Kingdom position differed from the Canadian. It was my understanding that our governments were agreed on the advisability of trying to get all the eighteen new candidates admitted to membership at this Assembly. He confirmed that that was his understanding of the Foreign Office position and the line that the United Kingdom delegation to the Assembly was following. He suggested, however, and this seems plausible, that Macmillan in talking with Molotov at this stage did not wish to commit the United Kingdom to a position before they had been able to agree it with the United States and France.

4. While I was at the Foreign Office a personal message came in for Macmillan from Dulles, reminding him that while he was not averse from "a large package deal" on new members at this time, he was most reluctant to accept Outer Mongolia.<sup>43</sup> He had understood from an earlier conversation with Macmillan that the United Kingdom shared his misgivings about Outer Mongolia, and hoped the information he had received that the United Kingdom was now ready to support all the eighteen was incorrect. He suggested that he and Macmillan might examine the whole question in Geneva on November 10th.

5. The Foreign Office advice to the Foreign Secretary is likely to be that he should try to persuade Mr. Dulles to accept the whole eighteen. They feel that if we object to Outer Mongolia, the Russians may object to Japan or Spain. Caccia did not think that the admission of Outer Mongolia to the United Nations could be altogether welcome to China, and that this was an argument that might commend itself to the United States. At the same time the United Kingdom is not very happy about its long tug-of-war with the United States over the election to the unfilled seat on the Security Council, and would not like to find itself ranged alongside the Soviet Union and against the United States on another controversy relating to membership of the United Nations.<sup>44</sup>

6. After examination of the record of the Molotov-Macmillan conversation, reported in paragraph 2 of this telegram, the Foreign Office advisers are inclined to think that the Foreign Secretary and Molotov were speaking without the book when they appeared to agree that the problem of securing Security Council approval for the admission of new members might be resolved by a reciprocal agreement to abstain from voting for less desirable candidates. They point out that under article 27, paragraph 3, the concurring votes of

ADMISSION OF NEW MEMBERS

We approached the State Department yesterday afternoon and set forth the views contained in your teletype under reference concerning the advisability of early action by the Western Big Three on the issue of admission of new members. Deputy Assistant Secretary Christopher Phillips (the most senior official of the Bureau now in Washington) told us that no firm decision has been taken yet on this matter by the Secretary of State; he remarked, however, that the United States have gone a long way towards an affirmative decision since this question was discussed with us a few weeks ago. It is now expected that this matter will come to a head shortly.

2. Outer Mongolia is considered as the main stumbling block in the way of a solution; the United States are opposed to the admission of Outer Mongolia under any circumstances. The State Department, Phillips said, is a "little unhappy" that Outer Mongolia has been included among acceptable candidates in the Canadian draft resolution and in the United Kingdom statement supporting admission of new members. It is feared that the bargaining position of the USSR may have been improved by the inclusion of Outer Mongolia on the list. Niles Bond, who attended the meeting, remarked that it is not unlikely that the USSR, in the face of the United States opposition to Outer Mongolia, might insist on the withdrawal of one of the candidates supported by the West, possibly Japan.

3. After an initial prise de contact with the Russians on the new members question it was decided that the United States would discuss the matter with the other permanent members of the Security Council and would take it up again with the USSR at a later stage. Consultations with the United Kingdom and France are presently under way in Geneva.

4. The United States have obtained affirmative responses from the United Kingdom and Nationalist China on renouncing their veto power against Communist candidates. There is still some doubt about the attitude of France which, for well-known reasons, remains cool towards the whole deal. In Phillips' opinion the French would probably agree to go along with the other powers if there were General Agreement favouring admission.

5. The State Department is hopeful that — provided agreement is reached in advance between the permanent members on the substance of the issue — practical arrangements can be worked out to secure the necessary support in the Security Council for the agreed candidates. The Good Offices Committee might be put to work in the General Assembly where a two-thirds majority would be required. It is believed that the South American delegations might be willing to support admission of the Communist countries provided that Spain were assured the required majority.

6. On the timing of action on admission of new members, Phillips expressed the hope that the item might be taken up in the Security Council first and only then in the Ad Hoc Committee. He said, however, that this would not necessarily preclude the tabling of a resolution in the Committee before Security Council action.

ADMISSION OF NEW MEMBERS

From the telegrams which you and the Assembly delegation have been good enough to repeat to London, my impression is you would prefer that the Big Four initiate action in the Security Council and that the introduction of a resolution in the General Assembly along the lines of the present Canadian draft would be your second choice to be carried out on two conditions (a) that the Big Four come to an advance gentlemen's agreement to co-operate in the Security Council, and (b) that the Big Four are not themselves prepared to take the initiative.

2. If I may comment at this distance, it seems to me that there is a good deal to be said for your second choice and that we might without much further delay put it up to the Foreign Ministers in Geneva as a definite proposal on the understanding that we would only proceed with it if they would consider it helpful. If they would really prefer to keep the initiative in their own hands and take joint action in the Security Council, they have only to say so, but I would doubt myself that all four are enthusiastic enough to go that far. The French in particular are likely to hold back from such positive action even though they might be persuaded not to veto particular applicants.

3. I agree that we would not want to place the Great Powers in the position of "bluntly rejecting the admission of new members", but we would not, of course, be forcing the issue to this point by putting our proposition privately to the Foreign Ministers in Geneva as suggested above. As to placing the Great Powers in the position of "appearing to be giving reluctant acquiescence to a move which was forced on them by world opinion", I wonder if that would in fact necessarily follow from an Assembly initiative. The Big Four could make it clear in the Assembly that they are sympathetic and they could if they so wish include in the final Geneva communiqué some general reference to their unanimous desire to co-operate in facilitating the admission of new members to the United Nations.

4. Parenthically, Miss Meagher and I have been wondering how you expect China to behave when a recommendation regarding new members, including Outer Mongolia, comes forward in the Security Council.

5. While it is essential, in advance of tabling a resolution in the Assembly, to be sure of the support of the permanent members of the Security Council, it does seem to me that this question is one on which it is not inappropriate for other states to take the lead. Since we have in fact been very active in promoting a settlement of the admissions problem and our initiative in this matter is now generally known, I should think it should be quite fitting for us, along with a representative group of other member states, to sponsor a resolution in the Assembly.

6. If you think well of putting our proposal to the Foreign Ministers, I suggest that it be done through U.K. channels and that I give a copy of our draft resolution to the Foreign Office for transmission to Geneva so that the Ministers could have the text before them when they are considering the question.

ADMISSION OF NEW MEMBERS

1. Time is running short and we must decide as to our next tactical move on this subject. We have delayed circulating our draft resolution in the Assembly in the hope that the Great Powers would be given an opportunity first to be seized of the matter and agree among themselves.

2. There is now some prospect of agreement on this question at Geneva and we think we should go ahead in the Assembly. The Foreign Office presumably already had a copy of our draft resolution since their delegation in New York is familiar with it and I presume that it has found its way to Geneva. If not I suggest you pass it on to them with a request that it be forwarded to Mr. Macmillan. In so doing you should point out that there seems to be enough agreement among the Big Four for us now to introduce our resolution in the near future. There is a possibility that the item on new members will come up for discussion in the Ad Hoc Committee in the middle of next week. The delegation is now endeavouring to obtain as wide a support as possible for this resolution in the hope that it will become unanimous. The question of whether or not the Communist Bloc should be approached with a view to cosponsoring is now under discussion and we are inclined to think they should be brought into the picture early next week. If the Big Four wish to take the initiative themselves in the Security Council (as the United States appears to prefer according to the Washington telegram under reference) we could attempt to delay action in the Ad Hoc Committee for some little time. Pressure on the Canadian delegation is considerable, however, and there is always the possibility that another country or group of countries will decide to go ahead with a resolution of their own. We have maintained our lead in this field and we very much hope that we can retain it but Menon is quite active and would probably not mind taking over from us. This might have unhappy repercussions. The Big Four should be made aware of the mounting pressure for action in the Assembly and realize that time is running short.

3. Regarding your paragraph four, you will have observed in the Washington telegram under reference that China has renounced its veto power against Communist candidates for U.N. membership. The delegation in New York have learned, however, that Nationalist China proposes to veto the admission of Outer Mongolia. We are taking up this point with the State Department through the Embassy in Washington.

NEW MEMBERS

In this telegram I wish to confirm my conversation with Léger about our decision to begin approaching other delegations to co-sponsor our draft resolution on the admission of new members. My immediately following telegram contains the revised text of the resolution with the reasons why we think the revisions are desirable. In a third telegram I shall report the reaction here once we had begun to approach other delegations about sponsorship.

2. As I explained on the telephone, our informal conversations here during the past week (together with the information we have received from our Embassy in Paris) with representatives of the Great Powers, with delegations of other countries representing a wide geographical distribution and with the Secretary-General have led to the following broad conclusions:

(a) The United Kingdom, United States and the Soviet Union recognize the growing demand for wider membership but are not prepared to do anything about it until the demand becomes articulate. They are aware of the real difficulties, particularly the position of France and the need for a carefully negotiated agreement on the group of new members to be admitted. In the way of progress and, because they have reasons of their own for not pressing the matter, they have not been doing so either here or in Geneva.

(b) There is a belief, widely shared in the Assembly, that if the problem of new members is to be solved, steps must be taken during the present session. Responsible delegations like the Scandinavians, the Australians and New Zealanders, the Indians and Pakistanis and the Brazilians have agreed with us that the opportunity should not be lost. They and others welcome our initiative but if we are not prepared to pursue the matter some of them, and possibly others less desirable, will take steps of their own.

(c) The Great Powers must be persuaded that we mean business. The Soviet delegation has already expressed doubt that we do. (Malik has pointedly mentioned this to me several times.) The United Kingdom and United States, although they share our desire to keep the initiative in Western hands, are content to withhold action as long as they can. The French in their present difficulty would obviously rather not think about new members but they too must be conscious of the pressure in the Assembly to do something about the problem.

(d) Time is running out. We have been given vague assurances by the United Kingdom and United States delegations that the question of new members will be discussed at Geneva but as far as we can judge there have been no concrete discussions to date even among the Western Three. Moreover, the Assembly's work has been progressing very slowly and there remain some difficult questions to be discussed in the relatively short period before Christmas.

3. For these main reasons and as a matter of tactics we concluded that the time had come to make another move in the direction of Assembly action, that is, to approach delegations about co-sponsorship. We assumed that this would rekindle the interest, both here and in Geneva, in the question of new members and keep the initiative in our hands.

4. Our conclusions were strengthened by the views which Robertson expressed in his telegram to you No. 1574 of November 8. Undoubtedly the Foreign Ministers at Geneva are being kept abreast of developments here, particularly those connected with the "Canadian proposal". We hope our efforts to date have been persuasive in the direction we desire. We see much merit in the suggestion Robertson has made about putting our proposition privately to the Foreign Ministers but we should do so in a way which would not tie our hands as regards Assembly action. We recommend that if no agreement on this subject is reached in Geneva when, as a matter of procedure, it becomes necessary to table our resolution in committee here (possibly by the end of next week), we should send a copy of our draft to the Foreign Ministers with a list of the co-sponsors and an indication of our intentions. We agree that communication should be through Canada House and United Kingdom channels.

NEW MEMBERS

The following is the revised text of our draft resolution on the admission of new members. Begins:

The General Assembly

Having noted the general sentiment which has been expressed on numerous occasions in favour of universality in the membership of the United Nations,

Having received the preliminary report (A/2973) of the Committee of Good Offices established by the General Assembly resolution 718 (VIII) of 23 October 1953,

Taking into account the statements about the admission of new members made by permanent members of the Security Council in the general debate of the present session of the General Assembly,

Believing that a broader representation in the membership of the United Nations will enable the organization to play a more effective role in the current international situation,

1. Expresses appreciation of the work and efforts of the Committee of Good Offices;
2. Requests the Security Council to consider in the light of the general opinion in favour of the universality of the United Nations, the pending applications for membership of all those countries about which no problem of unification arises.
3. Requests further that the Security Council make its report on these applications to the General Assembly during the present session. Ends.

2. We reverted to the first paragraph in our original draft because of doubts raised by several delegations about the inclusion of the words "membership in which is subject only to the provisions of the Charter". It was suggested to us that this hortatory resolution might well be based primarily on the general sentiment in favour of universality. The subsequent resolution or resolutions in the Assembly approving actual admission of the new members concerned could deal with the problem of Charter qualifications. We are prepared to accept this point of view at least for the time being.

3. As regards the second paragraph Belaunde of Peru, as Chairman of the Committee of Good Offices, preferred "received" to "considered" and to describe the Committee's report as "preliminary". We saw no objection.

4. The third paragraph was revised to make clear what statements by permanent members of the Security Council we had in mind. We purposely omitted "the" before "permanent members" to indicate that some but not all of them made statements about the admission of new members.

5. In the operative paragraph 2 we decided to drop the reference to the "improved international situation" because of some suggestions that it was not really relevant to the consideration of applications for new membership and its inclusion might prejudice future applications. After considerable thought we concluded that it would be preferable not to list the countries concerned nor to mention any number. We evolved the formula in the present draft.

6. In my immediately following telegram I shall discuss the approaches we made to attract co-sponsors. The representatives of Australia, Brazil and Iraq have already said they will be glad to co-sponsor. As we widen the co-sponsorship we are bound to receive suggestions for revision of our draft. Although we shall try to keep the amendments suggested by others at a minimum, I shall welcome any comments you wish to make on the present wording.

NEW MEMBERS

Late in the afternoon of November 10 we approached several delegations about co-sponsoring our draft resolution as revised. Unfortunately at that time the First Committee's debate on Korea was in full swing and it was not easy to have conversations with the senior representatives of all the delegations we approached. I made a point of speaking first to Spender and told him that because of Casey's interest in the matter we considered Australia should be at the top of our list of co-sponsors to which he agreed readily. Freitas-Valle of Brazil and later Jamali of Iraq assured me that their delegations would be glad to co-sponsor. In the meantime we had approached the delegations of Norway, the Netherlands, New Zealand and Pakistan, all of whom undertook to let us know as soon as possible whether they could join us.

2. I purposely did not approach the Indians at first, although we have now done so. I knew Menon was most anxious to become a co-sponsor but I had no wish to be stampeded either into hasty action or to extensive amendments to our draft. We considered it might be useful to have a number of other firm co-sponsors before India became one. I have previously indicated our reasons for thinking that India's association with the move should preferably be as part of a large group of sponsors.

3. As we began our approach to other delegations we gave the United Kingdom and United States Delegations our revised draft and informed them that we were gathering co-sponsors as part of our preparation for eventual action in the Assembly. Even if time had permitted, which it did not, we were not disposed to give them advance notice of the move because we were sure they would immediately raise objections, some valid and some not, to head us off. In the event, as soon as Dixon learned that we were speaking to prospective co-sponsors, he asked me to meet with Lodge and him. The remaining paragraphs of this telegram give the sense of what each of us said, though not consecutively, at the meeting.

4. Dixon began by reviewing the United Kingdom position. He emphasized the following:

(a) The United Kingdom Government had been obliged to declare its stand on new members and particularly on the "Canadian proposal" of a group of eighteen because of information which the Ceylon Ambassador to the United States had given to the press after an informal discussion at Geneva (an article by Wickham Steed was mentioned in particular). The Ceylonese press had accused the United Kingdom of deliberately dragging its feet on the membership issue. The United Kingdom Government would nonetheless welcome a successful conclusion to the Canadian efforts.

(b) As to procedure the United Kingdom would prefer initial action by the Security Council which would take place as soon as the Great Powers had reached a carefully-negotiated agreement on the pattern of voting in the Security Council which would ensure that the largest possible group of members would be admitted.

(c) It was his impression that within a very few days the Foreign Ministers in Geneva would take up this question and from what he knew of the various positions it was not inconceivable that some agreement might be reached, although our eighteen might be reduced to seventeen by dropping Outer Mongolia. A chief obstacle to discussion in Geneva was the position of the French.

(d) As he understood the French position, because of the impact of the inscription of Algeria on the Assembly agenda, nothing would induce the French to give any undertaking about new members. The Algerian item must be cleared away and, if this could be done satisfactorily to the French, the prospects for French cooperation on new members would be brighter.

(e) He also referred to the difficulties involved in reaching an agreement on the pattern of voting in the Security Council but said nothing that we have not heard before.

5. I explained our reasons for believing that we should make preparations for action in the Assembly. I referred to the various conversations which we had had with representatives of the Great Powers and with many other delegations. It was our impression that the majority of delegations were expecting some progress this year and that this view was widely reflected in public opinion. To some extent for tactical reasons, I said that we did not agree that action should be taken in the Security Council first. I emphasized that we would not wish to disturb any desirable arrangements which might be made at Geneva but that we were somewhat concerned because no word had reached us of developments there in this matter. Because of our well-known position on the question of new members and because we were now being chided about dragging our feet, we decided to take further steps to indicate our sincerity and purpose. I said I fully recognized the difficulty about Outer Mongolia, that in fact we were aware that one permanent member of the Security Council intended to veto Outer Mongolia's application. I said it was our view, however, that we should start with the largest possible group and make deletions if this became necessary. In any event this would be a matter for the Security Council to decide rather than the Assembly at this stage.

6. I explained too that we fully understood the complications as regards the position of France. We had no wish to embarrass the French but, on the other hand, doubted whether the majority of the Assembly would take the view that the new membership issue should be shelved unless and until France found some way to deal with the Algerian question. I expressed my opinion that France would find it hard not to go along with the other Great Powers if they reached an agreement on the admission of new members.

7. Throughout my remarks I emphasized that if Geneva produced the desired results, and we hoped it would, there would probably be no need for the Assembly to express itself in advance of action by the Security Council, although I was not sure that there still might not be advantages in having an overwhelming resolution in favour of the admissions. What we were really concerned about, however, was that action might not be taken or agreement might not be reached by the Great Powers, either at Geneva or during the present session. In this event it would be desirable and indeed inevitable that the Assembly should have expressed itself on the subject. I said I had reason to believe that several other delegations were more than ready to take action in the Assembly, especially if we showed signs of losing interest in the matter. I emphasized that in fact our interest had grown rather than diminished and that we believed our efforts to date had produced useful results.

8. Lodge's remarks were not as comprehensive as those of Dixon and we learned little that was new. Lodge emphasized that:

(a) The United States preferred action in the Security Council first because of the need to protect ourselves against sharp practice by the Soviet Union. The Great Power Agreement on the admission of new members would have to be detailed and possibly reduced to writing. He referred to the various possibilities of a double-cross. (We were not too impressed with this argument because we believe that since the Assembly will have the final word about admissions, failure on the part of the Soviet Union to live up to the bargain could be remedied by a two-thirds majority vote in the Assembly. The Soviet Union probably does not enjoy that advantage).

(b) The United States could and would never accept Outer Mongolia. Lodge believed that the Soviet Union might withdraw its support to Outer Mongolia's application. I interjected that there is danger, however, that India will insist on Outer Mongolia. This added to the other risks involved in taking Assembly action first. Barco added that Assembly action in advance might be the "kiss of death" to the entire procedure. He produced a sound supporting argument, that is, that prior discussion in the Assembly of Outer Mongolia's application might force the Soviet Union to take a strong position, from which it could not later withdraw, in favour of Outer Mongolia.

(c) Lodge said that he had heard from third parties what the Soviet Union was prepared to do to obtain an agreement on new members but that Russians had not said these things to the United States delegation. This led him to suspect Soviet intentions.

9. Both Dixon and Lodge argued that action in the Assembly might make it more difficult for the Great Powers to reach an agreement largely because, I gathered, they would be required to take positions in public in advance of the bargaining. All I said in reply was that we three were divided in our opinions on how the matter should be dealt with. Dixon asked what my reaction might be if agreement were to be reached in Geneva on seventeen, whether I would still consider it necessary to pursue action in the Assembly. I said we would have to consider that possibility when we had received the good word from Geneva. I added that we were interested in results more than anything else.

10. Since it was clear that we were not to be persuaded from following the course of action which we had adopted, Dixon and Lodge both enquired about our ideas on the timing of Assembly action. I said that we assumed that the item on new members should be discussed in the Ad Hoc Political Committee immediately after the next item, which is on Palestine refugees. In reply to their request, I assured Dixon and Lodge that we would keep them informed about our efforts to attract co-sponsors. I said that we wished to have a large group and one representing all shades of opinion in the General Assembly. We assume that for the moment at least the Great Powers would not be interested in co-sponsorship. We undertook to inform the United Kingdom and United States delegations in advance about any move on our part to introduce our proposal in the Ad Hoc Committee.

11. At this meeting I expressed in several different ways our firm conviction that the course we were following was the only one which would produce results. It had already brought some action. I said, and Dixon acknowledged, that the United Kingdom's decision to support the admission of eighteen was a result of our earlier moves. We believed that we had a strong following in the Assembly and we were persuaded that its voice should and would be needed by the Powers concerned. For these reasons we were determined to continue our efforts.

NEW MEMBERS

On November 14 the Ad Hoc Political Committee was scheduled to begin discussion of the second item on its agenda, that is, the report of the United Nations Works and Relief Agency for Palestine Refugees. Since we were aware that the Foreign Ministers proposed to adjourn their meetings in Geneva on November 16 I considered that it would do no harm to give a further indication that we were in earnest in pursuing our proposal to have eighteen new members admitted to the United Nations at the present session of the General Assembly. Accordingly, I arranged with the chairman of the Ad Hoc Committee to make a brief intervention on the point of procedure.

2. Immediately before the Palestine item began to be discussed and with the consent of the chairman, I expressed the deep interest which the Canadian delegation had in the matter of new memberships. Although, as I explained, we had no wish to interfere with the Committee's decision now to discuss the problem of Palestine refugees, I wondered if the chairman could give some indication of the timetable for discussion so that my delegation and others could prepare themselves for the consideration of the item on new members concerning which, I emphasized, "some concrete proposals are definitely in the minds of some of us."

3. Menon intervened on the same point. He expressed the interest of his delegation in the question of new members. He asked specifically that the item be discussed immediately after Palestine refugees. He said it would be desirable, in view of the recent developments as regards the question of race conflict in South Africa, to delay the debate on the treatment of Indians in that country. The chairman said, in reply to me, that the debate on Palestine refugees would probably last a week and that if necessary procedural arrangements could be made for expediting discussion of the new members item.

4. Immediately before I spoke Dixon asked to have a word with me. We had notified the United Kingdom delegation about our intention to intervene briefly. Dixon tried to dissuade me on the ground that some other delegation might seize the opportunity afforded by my intervention to press for immediate discussion of the item on new members. He said that the United States delegation were determined that the question of new members should first be considered by the Security Council before being discussed by the Tenth Assembly. I said I was aware of the United States wishes in that regard but that we were firmly of the opinion that action first in the Assembly was not only a desirable course but likely to be most helpful in bringing about results.

5. There is no doubt that the United States delegation is working to arrange the early consideration of this question by the Security Council. We heard that Belaunde of Peru was on the point of sending a letter to the president of the Council requesting an early meeting. The letter was reportedly dictated in Lodge's office. The United States delegation have been trying to persuade the Latin American delegations that council action first is to be preferred. This afternoon I spoke to Belaunde and I hope I persuaded him not to press for Security Council action without consulting me.

6. I am satisfied that we should continue our efforts to convince all concerned that we will pursue our initiative in the Assembly. These tactics appear to me to have yielded worthwhile results. Today both Engen of Norway and Freitas-valle of Brazil urged me not to be shaken in my resolve to proceed in the Assembly. It seems that someone has been trying to persuade them that our intentions in that regard are not serious.

NEW MEMBERS

As a result of informal conversations with a number of delegations we gained the impression this morning that a move might be made to have the question of new members considered immediately in the Security Council. It seemed that the United States was fostering the idea in order to forestall our proposed move in the Assembly. From our discussions yesterday with the Soviet delegation, (discussions which Holmes will have reported to you in full detail), we considered that any move in the Security Council now would merely be a blocking action and would have no beneficial result as regards the admission of new members. As a precautionary measure, therefore, I decided that the time had come to complete our preparations for tabling our draft resolution.

2. We arranged for a meeting of our co-sponsors to be held late in the afternoon of November 15. At the time the meeting was called the Delegations of Afghanistan, Australia, Brazil, Burma, Colombia, Iceland, India, Indonesia, Iran, Iraq, Lebanon, Liberia, Norway, Pakistan, Saudi Arabia, Syria, Yemen and Yugoslavia had indicated their intention to co-sponsor our draft. The Delegations of Chile, Denmark, New Zealand and Sweden were also interested and we had reason to believe that still other delegations would come forward shortly.

3. In the afternoon it came to our attention that the United States delegation had sent a letter to the President of the Security Council notifying him of their desire to have a meeting to discuss new members but without specifying any date. The request was based on last year's resolution by the Assembly. We learned too that Belaunde of Peru was to hold a press conference this evening at which he would indicate the willingness of the Committee of Good Offices to continue its efforts to assist the Security Council. Shortly afterwards I discussed this development with Lodge. I expressed surprise that he had decided to take this action without consulting me. I reminded him that at our meeting on November 10 (my telegram No. 271 of November 11) we had undertaken to keep the United Kingdom and United States delegations informed in advance about any move on our part to introduce our proposal in the Ad Hoc Committee. Lodge said that my brief procedural intervention in the Ad Hoc Political Committee on November 14 had led him to believe that we intended to ask for an immediate discussion of the item on new members. (There had been a suggestion in the press that we intended to do so this afternoon.) Lodge reiterated the United States preference for a consideration of the new members question first by the Security Council. I said in reply that we still did not share his point of view.

4. On the question of timing Lodge assured me that he had no intention of pursuing the matter in the Security Council immediately because informal discussions were taking place among the Great Powers which might have an important bearing on the outcome of any discussion. He said that his letter to the Security Council was a preparatory move similar in kind to the steps we were taking in preparation for Assembly action. I reiterated our conviction that Assembly action first would greatly enhance the possibility of success. For this reason, I said, we were resolved to continue our course. Lodge did not seem unduly upset about that prospect.

5. The meeting of co-sponsors took place as planned. By the time of the meeting Costa Rica, Denmark and Sweden had joined us as co-sponsors, making twenty-two in all.

6. I outlined the reasons why we believed that prior action by the Assembly would be beneficial. I reported my conversation with Lodge and also gave my understanding of the United Kingdom position. I emphasized that in proposing Assembly action first we had no wish whatever to compete with those who preferred prior action by the Security Council. Nor did we wish to embarrass the United States. I explained that we were only interested in results and that we were persuaded that the best prospects for success would be derived from a strong expression of opinion by the Assembly. In reply to questions I stated frankly that at the present there were difficulties (I referred to the position of France and the possibility of a veto by a Great Power other than the United States) which might prevent the admission of the whole group of eighteen and that this might result in the failure of any new members being admitted. We considered, however, that the time had come for the largest possible majority in the Assembly to declare themselves and that our resolution, if strongly endorsed by the Assembly, would assist the Great Powers and, perhaps more important, the non-permanent members of the Security Council to make up their minds. Accordingly we proposed to table the draft resolution within the next day or so.

7. Spender seemed doubtful about pressing ahead too quickly. He said that the United States had come a long way in agreeing not to veto the four satellite applicants. To insist on the inclusion of Outer Mongolia might be to expect too much of the United States Government. There was a possibility too that the Soviet Union would exploit the situation.

8. The representatives of India, Yugoslavia, Norway and Sweden supported our view that the time had come to table the draft resolution. They agreed that there was no procedural obstacle to doing so. Menon said that even if the Security Council did meet before the Assembly began its discussion of the item, the Council would have to take note of the widely-held opinion reflected in our draft resolution and its co-sponsorship by a large number of member states. He emphasized that last year's resolution did not reflect the current opinion on the admission of new members.

9. Prince Wan of Thailand, who also attended our meeting, saw no objection in tabling the resolution at once and expressed the view that procedural arrangements could be made for having a discussion of the item before it was called. He indicated that Thailand would support the resolution but that it would not co-sponsor it until there were clear indications of the attitude which the United States would adopt in the Security Council. Since Prince Wan is Chairman of the Committee concerned, it is perhaps preferable that his Delegation should not co-sponsor the draft resolution.

10. Munro spoke in favour of our position and said that he had urgently sought instructions to join the group of co-sponsors. He referred to the bearing which Dulles' movements might have on the United States attitude. He said that any hesitation would be interpreted as a weakening of our resolve to have the Assembly express itself. He believed that the tabling of the draft resolution would be effective persuasion.

11. At Spender's request, supported by several other delegations, we agreed not to table the draft resolution until a further meeting of co-sponsors tomorrow. At that time we are likely to have additional co-sponsors. The representatives of Chile, Ecuador, El Salvador, Ethiopia and Greece have consulted their governments. In this regard I should explain that we have not approached either the Great Powers or the Soviet satellites to co-sponsor and the three members of the Good Offices Committee have agreed because of their position not to serve as co-sponsors, although they are likely to support the draft resolution. The Mexican delegation has also assured us of support but will not co-sponsor because of some opposition in Mexico to Spain.

12. After the meeting of co-sponsors I held a press conference at which I explained in a general way our purposes and intentions. This interview was clearly called for in view of the statements made in the last few days by other interested delegations and because a large group of reporters had gathered outside the room in which we had met. The other co-sponsors agreed in advance that I should deal with the press.

13. In the course of the meeting with the co-sponsors, I reported that Mr. Lodge during our conversation had indicated that he could not support our draft resolution because of the reference to the principle of universality. A number of co-sponsors thought that it might perhaps be possible to amend the draft resolution to overcome this difficulty. It would have to be understood, however, that the resolution even if amended would still urge the Security Council to consider the applications of all non-divided countries. The co-sponsors agreed that I should discuss the matter before the meeting tomorrow afternoon with the members of the Security Council. While it may be possible to delete from the draft resolution a reference to the principle of universality there is no doubt that the substance of the operative paragraph will still urge acceptance of the principle by implication.

NEW MEMBERS

In the 24-hour interval between the meetings of co-sponsors (which we mentioned in our telegram No. 293 of November 15) the main purposes of the delegation were:

- (A) to consult further with representatives of the great Powers concerning their attitude toward the admission of new members as contemplated in our draft resolution and
- (B) to maintain and if possible widen the group of co-sponsors.

2. As regards (A), we had assured our twenty-one co-sponsors at the meeting yesterday that we would inform the Great Powers about our joint conviction that the Assembly should express itself on the subject and impress upon them our earnest belief that effective action should be taken at the present Assembly to bring about that admission of the largest possible group of new members. We had undertaken to report to the co-sponsors the reaction of the Great Powers.

3. As for (B), we were somewhat concerned that as a result of pressure by the Great Powers some of our co-sponsors might have second thoughts. We were aware that Spender, for example, was concerned about the United States attitude. We wondered whether some of the smaller powers could withstand the pressure upon them to defect. At the same time, we were confident from the warm expressions of support which we had received not only at last evening's meeting of co-sponsors but from many other delegations that our attitude in this matter was not only correct but highly appreciated by a large majority of delegations. This encouraged us to seek more co-sponsors.

4. Mr. Martin had discussions with Lodge, Dixon and Kuznetsov. Last evening he had spoken to a member of the French delegation. In these conversations he continued to emphasize our belief that an expression of opinion by the Assembly would assist the powers concerned to reach agreement on the admission of new members. He affirmed our determination to circulate formally a draft resolution. He urged Lodge, Dixon and Kuznetsov to strive for agreement, bearing in mind the wide support which our proposal would receive. He insisted that we had no intention of embarrassing anyone concerned but that we considered that time to act had arrived.

5. Lodge continued to argue that action first in the Security Council was to be preferred. He explained that his delegation was consulting closely with the other delegations concerned. He intended to press for an informal meeting of the Security Council, or at least of the Great Powers. At this meeting the admission of new members would be discussion but no formal decision would be taken. This, we believe, is the "dry run on seventeen" about which members of the United States have been speaking recently. The object would be to persuade the Soviet Union that it could not succeed in its effort to obtain seven affirmative votes for Outer Mongolia. Conversely, and Lodge left us with this distinct impression, if it were to appear that the Soviet Union would not budge, the United States attitude might have to be reconsidered.

6. Dixon tried to persuade us several times today not to press the United States too hard. He went as far as to say that the United Kingdom delegation had instructions to oppose our resolution if it were pressed to debate. We were informed, moreover, that the United Kingdom had stated publicly its preference for United States tactics, that is, a prior meeting of the Security Council. We suspect that some members of the United Kingdom delegation tried to dissuade some of our prospective co-sponsors.

7. Mr. Martin's talk with Kuznetsov revealed no change in the Soviet determination to press for eighteen admissions or nothing. He insisted that the Soviet willingness to accept Japan and Spain were real concessions which had to be met by concessions on the other side. At the moment we have no reason to believe that the Soviet Union would change its position on Outer Mongolia.

8. Our efforts in the lobby were hampered by the weight of the opposition. It appeared that the United States, assisted we think by one or two other delegations, made a major effort to discourage our effort to table the draft resolution. The majority of the Latin Americans were obviously undecided on how they should react to our request that they join in the co-sponsorship. Most of them said that they were urgently seeking instructions and almost all of them said they were ready to support the resolution along the lines of our draft. We shall not be surprised if some of them join the group of co-sponsors during the next few days.

9. The meeting of co-sponsors held late this evening was attended by our twenty-one supporters of yesterday plus the delegations of Argentina, Chile, New Zealand, Turkey and Thailand. Mr. Martin reported on the events of the day and emphasized that the least we could say was that the position of the Great Powers had been clarified. He stated that there would be no formal debate in the Security Council before the weekend, that there was likely to be an informal meeting of the Security Council members, and that in any event we would be kept informed about proceedings in the Council. Mr. Martin said he was satisfied from our understanding of the United States position that, if we proceeded wisely, our efforts could end in success.

10. Mr. Martin then raised questions about the wording of our draft resolution. He had ascertained from Lodge that the references to "universality" in our draft gave considerable concern to the United States and the United Kingdom. To meet their objection we had suggested to them that "the widest possible membership of the United Nations" might be substituted after in the preamble and that "strengthening the representative character of the United Nations" might be substituted after "in favour of" in the second operative paragraph. Both Lodge and Dixon had said that changes of this kind would "make their position easier." Mr. Martin recommended the meeting, therefore, that we give sympathetic consideration to changes of that kind.

11. Australia, Norway and India said there should be no difficulty about the words as long as the main objective of the resolution was maintained. Menon made a most useful suggestion that the words "widest possible membership of the United Nations" should appear in both the preamble and the second operative paragraph. These changes were accepted by the meeting. After further discussion it was agreed that the draft resolution should now be tabled formally, that is, circulated as a United Nations document. When we called the role of co-sponsors Argentina, New Zealand and Thailand joined the group. We took steps to have the resolution circulated and, at the request of the meeting, I informed the press.

12. There is now little doubt in our minds that we have acted wisely in doing so. Particularly with the amendments which were accepted by the meeting, the tabling of the resolution will have a most persuasive effect. It not only offers some assurance to the Soviet Union that a majority of members of the General Assembly are prepared to act in the interests of settling this long-standing problem but it will provide the United States and other members of the Security Council with a basis for an adjustment of policy which may be necessary to achieve that end. In addition, it leaves no doubt that we mean business. We hope you will share our belief in the value of the course we had agreed we should follow and which has imposed a heavy responsibility and burden on the delegation. During the next few days we shall know whether our efforts thus far have helped to bring about the results we all desire. If nothing else happens, however, we can at least say that we induced the Great Powers to put their heads together.

NEW MEMBERS

Dixon told me today that the United Kingdom High Commissioner in Ottawa had been instructed to approach you to endeavour to ensure that the Canadian delegation here is instructed to take no action in the Assembly of this question which might interfere with the consideration of it by the Security Council. If the instructions sent to Nye do not go beyond this, they are, of course, quite unnecessary since we had repeatedly made it clear that we regard consideration of the item by the Assembly and by the Security Council as complimentary not competitive processes. Now that the joint draft resolution has been officially circulated with the co-sponsorship of twenty-five delegations, a good part of our objective of ensuring that the Security Council is acutely aware of the wide demand for resolving this question now has been met. We are not, therefore, pressing for immediate consideration of the new members question in the Ad Hoc Committee. We feel at the moment that it would be better to let the Ad Hoc Committee conclude its current item on Palestine refugees before taking up new members. This would leave the Great Powers in the Security Council probably another week in which to try to reach agreement. While there will be informal meetings of part or all the Security Council in this period, Lodge has given us to understand that he will not precipitate an early formal meeting of the Security Council at which the admission might be blocked by disagreement between the United States and the U.S.S.R.

2. We have made it perfectly clear to the United States and United Kingdom delegations that the countries co-sponsoring our draft resolution are fully aware of the delicate balance on this subject in the Security Council and of the need to work out very carefully in advance a distribution of votes which will ensure seven affirmative votes to all agreed candidates. At a Commonwealth meeting this morning, I assured Dixon as we had on several occasions that it was never intended that action would be taken in the Ad Hoc Committee or elsewhere without the fullest consultation with him and Lodge on the coordination of such action with Security Council action and we expected that there would be no repetition of Lodge's attempt to forestall our efforts by a sudden formal Security Council meeting called without consultation.

3. We cannot, of course, agree that under no circumstances should the Ad Hoc Committee begin discussion of this item before the Security Council has met officially on it. If the Security Council has not resolved the problem when the current item ends in the Ad Hoc Committee, it would be very difficult, and I think unwise, to oppose discussing the item in the Committee at that time. It is still our view that a resolution passed by a nearly unanimous vote in the Assembly would have a very salutary effect on the Security Council. Non-permanent members of the Security Council who will have to vote in favour of Communist candidates on which the United States may be abstaining will find their positions much easier if they can base their vote on such an Assembly resolution. In any event, the timing of further action in the Assembly cannot be fixed rigidly now; to a large extent it must depend on the progress made by the Security Council in its informal efforts to ensure seven affirmative votes for as large a group as possible of the outstanding applicants.

Mr. Martin and I had a brief chat with Kuznetsov yesterday on new members. Kuznetsov said that he had thought it necessary to give a press conference since there seemed to be some speculation among delegations and perhaps the American people as to whether the U.S.S.R. might weaken on the question of Outer Mongolia. He emphasized that as far as they were concerned it was eighteen or nothing. When Mr. Martin casually mentioned Japan and Spain, Kuznetsov said it had not been easy for his government to accept them.

2. With respect to procedure, Kuznetsov said that they were quite willing to sit down with the Americans and discuss in detail the probable support for the various applicants. He said they had also discussed the issue with other members of the Security Council except the Chinese and he implied that they could not, of course, talk to them. He did not mention to us the plan which we understand they have tried out on certain other delegations namely that the Security Council and the Assembly might meet at the same time and deal with each application in turn.

3. Kuznetsov raised the question of action in the Ad Hoc Committee. He said that he thought it was desirable to bring as much pressure as possible on the Council and a meeting of the Ad Hoc Committee before the Council met would be useful. He suggested interrupting the present debate in the Ad Hoc Committee to get on with new members and suggested that perhaps this should be done by Tuesday or Wednesday next. Mr. Martin demurred on the grounds that it was most desirable to see first whether the Council could solve the issue without additional pressure. We pointed out that the fact that we had twenty-five sponsors and that we knew that many other delegations would support the resolution was good evidence of strong Assembly support. We also suggested that it might seem like undue pressure on the Security Council to interrupt the present debate in the Ad Hoc Committee. However, we made it clear that we would be quite willing to support action in the Ad Hoc Committee when the present item was completed and if the Security Council procedure was not proving satisfactory.

4. Mr. Martin also stressed the desirability of clearing the Algerian item out of the way first and he expressed the hope that the USSR delegation would do what it could to facilitate this. Kuznetsov pointed out that they had not said anything in the previous debate and implied that it would be inappropriate for them to say anything on the subject if it were brought up again. (We do not, of course, propose to delay action pending disposal of the Algerian item, but it was a useful counter suggestion to Kuznetsov's argument for immediate action.)

5. Late yesterday afternoon the Russians put in an amendment to our draft resolution listing the eighteen countries in order of date of application. The list thus begins with Albania and Outer Mongolia. They did not mention this move to us in the discussion earlier. It may be that this move is to clarify and reinforce their position on the eighteen, or it may be an attempt to get an Assembly vote country by country in advance of action by the Security Council in order to avoid "double-crossing" in the Assembly, which they probably fear. This amendment will no doubt have to be discussed with our co-sponsors and we propose to call a meeting early in the week. The amendment will obviously be embarrassing to some of them who would be reluctant to face a country-by-country vote in the Assembly before the Security Council acts. We suggest that our line should be that no action should be taken on the Russian amendment for the time being since if the Security Council does reach a satisfactory conclusion it would be superfluous. We should like instructions on this not later than Monday.

6. Although the Russians would no doubt prefer Assembly action first I think they are more interested in results than in procedure. As I think you know, an informal discussion of representatives of the U.S.S.R., the United States, the United Kingdom and France is scheduled for today (Saturday) and if this goes well from the Russian stand point they may be more disposed to accept Council procedure first. However, we should not overlook the temptation, which Assembly action first offers them, of isolating the United States in the Assembly.

7. Action required — instructions about the Russian amendment.

We share your preference of waiting to see what action will be taken by the Security Council and would hope that the possible embarrassment which the Russian amendment might cause some countries could be obviated by favourable council action.

2. In the alternative it would appear difficult for us to oppose the Russian amendment since it represents a not unreasonable attempt to minimize the very real danger from their point of view that they might become the victims of a "double cross" in the Assembly. If all or even the great majority of the co-sponsors were willing to accept a country by country vote in the Assembly before the council acted, we might well be obliged to accept the Russian amendment and in such circumstances vote in favour of it. We should hope, however, that for the present no decisive position would have to be taken on this point.

Following from Glazebrook, Begins: At his request I called on the Secretary of State this morning and found that he wished to speak on the question of new members of the United Nations. Livingston Merchant was present.

2. Mr. Dulles expressed with some vigour the view that the Canadian Government had not adequately consulted the United States Government on what he called "the Canadian proposal". He said that in view of the relations between the two countries, he would have expected a more co-operative attitude. The United States administration had been as helpful as it could to Canada, for example in excluding Canada from the restrictions on imports of oil.<sup>45</sup> In general, he expressed the view that the neighbourly relationship which normally existed had not obtained in the case of the new members question. He had first seen the "Canadian resolution" when it was shown to him by General Franco in Madrid.

3. I expressed regret that he felt that there had not been adequate consultation, but reminded him that there had been a series of discussions between this Embassy and the State Department on the subject beginning at the middle of August. I said that at that time we had explained the desirability of a positive approach and outlined the thinking in your telegram No. 1418 of Aug. 11† (this conversation was reported in our 1376 of Aug. 12†). I said that we had been made aware by State Department officials of the serious difficulties which they foresaw and that we had at least thought that there had been an exchange of views here and later in New York.

4. Mr. Dulles said that perhaps there had been some lack of co-ordination in the State Department; and added that the Canadian draft resolution had in fact been seen by the United States delegation in New York some days before it was shown to him by Franco.

5. In conversation it developed that his reference to lack of consultation was principally to what he considered to be our failure to discuss the proposed draft in New York or here before it became known to other countries.

6. The Secretary then argued that by placing Outer Mongolia in the list of seventeen (later eighteen), we had made a concession to the Russians which he regarded as unnecessary and which destroyed the possibility of negotiation. The administration was now, he said, faced with a very serious political difficulty. He went so far as to say that he would expect in Congress an argument that Mr. Pearson had made a bargain with Mr. Molotov behind the backs of the United States. He indicated that it was impossible for the United States to consider Outer Mongolia. Moreover, this created a great difficulty with the Chinese Nationalist Government (Merchant added after we left the Secretary's room that the belief that the United States could influence the Nationalist Chinese vote in the Security Council was erroneous and that they would expect a veto by Nationalist China of Outer Mongolia).

7. No reference was made in the Secretary's remarks to the general problem of new members or to any alternative plan to what he referred to as the "Canadian resolution". His whole theme was that by lack of adequate consultation we had put the administration into an extremely difficult position. I was not invited to make any remarks on the substance of the matter. While expressing regret that there seemed to him to have been a lack of consultation, I confined myself to making several references to the consultations which had in fact taken place. I also recalled to him our original hope that some agreement could be reached between the four Great Powers.

8. Mr. Dulles made a plea for time, even if it amounted to only a few days. He asked that the introduction of the resolution in New York be put off as long as possible.

9. I telephoned this plea for time immediately to Mr. MacKay. Ends.

NEW MEMBERS

Following From Martin: I am considerably disturbed to learn that it is Dulles' view that the Canadian Government had not adequately consulted the United States Government on our proposal for the admission of new members. There is no justification for that view nor for the suggestion that we have not been sufficiently co-operative with the United States in this matter. As you are aware and as Glazebrook pointed out to Dulles, our embassy in Washington first began to discuss this question with the State Department about August 12. It was pointed out then that we were anxious to consult with the Big Three on formulating our policy in this field and that you considered that you were virtually committed as a result of public statements supporting the admission of all membership applicants except North and South Korea and North and South Vietnam. The embassy reported at that time that the United States was also anxious to break the deadlock but had not yet found its way around the various problems.

2. On September 12 our ambassador in Washington reported that he had raised the question of new members with Hoover of the State Department and reminded him of the Canadian views. Apparently then Dulles was still considering the question and had not yet reached any firm decision.

3. You will recall the discussions which you had with Dulles during the last week of September. Dulles also exchanged views with me in New York a few days later. In all these conversations, as far as I am aware, we left no doubt about our sincere desire to see some solution of the problem at the current Assembly.

4. It will also be recalled that I expressly mentioned the desirability of admitting seventeen applicants in my speech in the general debate in the Assembly. As I recollect Mr. Dulles was then present. Since Spain had not then applied there could be no doubt that I included Outer Mongolia in the seventeen.

5. In readiness for possible action in the Assembly we prepared the draft resolution which was sent to you in my telegram No. 60 of October 3 but, because we knew that action in the Assembly depended on an agreement being reached among the Great Powers, we did not press the matter, other than to continue our informal consultations among the various delegations concerned. As was reported in our letter No. 22 of October 12† we sensed a reluctance, on the part of the United Kingdom and the United States in particular, to commit themselves on the question of new memberships at the present session. Neither the United Kingdom nor the United States delegations seemed disposed to enter into serious discussions on how we might proceed.

6. It was not until October 24, after I had learned that Menon was beginning to consider actively whether he should circulate a draft resolution on new members, that we decided to circulate our own draft. Our intention was to solicit the views of interested delegations. As we reported at the time we approached informally a number of our close friends, including the Commonwealth delegations, the United States, the Scandinavians, one or two Latin Americans and the French. The immediate reaction was a renewed effort on the part of the United Kingdom, with we believe the blessing of the United States delegation, to dissuade us from pursuing the matter in the General Assembly. The first draft of the resolution was distributed to about a dozen delegations and only to those who had expressed to us a close interest in the subject.

7. During all this time, as you know, informal conversations were taking place (here and later at Geneva) among the Great Powers but there were no indications of an earnest desire to negotiate a solution. The United Kingdom Government did declare itself in favour of our proposal to admit eighteen, although it was apparent from the attitude of their delegation here that the United Kingdom had no enthusiasm for the proposal. In these circumstances and because time was running out, I considered that it was necessary to take steps to ensure that eventual action by the Assembly could be taken and that the initiative would remain in Western hands. On November 10 (17 days after the first draft was circulated) we revised our draft resolution, among other things to eliminate the listings of the states concerned, and began to approach other delegations about co-sponsorship. At that time, we informed the United Kingdom and United States delegations about our intention to proceed. I concluded from previous conversations that we could not persuade them to take any positive steps toward a solution. On the same day we had a long discussion of the whole subject, including the course we proposed to follow, with Lodge and Dixon and their advisors (My telegrams Nos. 269-71 of November 11).

8. At no stage in these proceedings did we leave any doubt about the inclusion of Outer Mongolia in the Canadian proposal. I had in mind your intervention in the Standing Committee in which you said, among other things, that "I think it would probably be a good thing if they were all in, even Outer Mongolia, about which I have very little information." Other powers among the prospective co-sponsors shared our belief that any effort in the Assembly should be directed toward attaining the widest possible membership and Menon had expressed an intention to insist on the inclusion of Outer Mongolia. Accordingly, it seemed inevitable that we should envisage the group of eighteen in presenting our draft resolution. Of course, if the great powers could reach an agreement without including Outer Mongolia, we would not have pressed for its inclusion. However, there seemed to be no disposition to reach an agreement on any group, mainly because of Soviet insistence on eighteen or nothing and the United States rejection of Outer Mongolia.

9. On November 15, when I learned indirectly that the United States delegation had sent a letter to the President of the Security Council notifying him of their desire to have a meeting to discuss new members, I arranged for a meeting of our co-sponsors. As I reported in my telegram No. 293 of that date, I discussed our intentions with Lodge before the meeting was held. After the meeting, I reported the views of the other co-sponsors to Lodge and Dixon.

10. At the second meeting of co-sponsors, held on the following day, and in deference to view expressed by the United States and the United Kingdom delegations, we changed the wording of our draft resolution to exclude reference to "universality" and to speak of "the widest possible membership of the United Nations." Both Lodge and Dixon said that the changes in the draft resolution would "make their position easier." (My telegram No 298 of Nov 16.)

11. As for Dulles' plea for time, we have made it clear to all concerned that we have no intention of interrupting the current proceedings in the Ad Hoc Political Committee on Palestine refugees. This item is unlikely to be disposed of before the end of this week because as yet there has been no agreement on a draft resolution. When consideration of that item has been completed, however, there will undoubtedly be a strong demand that the admission of new members be considered next. Menon has already indicated that he does not wish to proceed at this stage with the discussion of the treatment of Indians in South Africa. Accordingly, as a matter of regular procedure, we expect the item on new members to be called early next week. Since our draft resolution is now a matter in the hands of twenty-five co-sponsors and since the majority of these are anxious to have the matter considered soon, I see no possibility of delaying discussion beyond the date when it comes up for discussion. In my view it would be not only disastrous to the Canadian position to ask for a further delay but extremely risky from the point of view of all the Western powers.

NEW MEMBERS

The delegation's telegram seems to us to cover pretty thoroughly the consultation with the United States on new members which took place here as well as in Washington and New York. We might however offer in addition several suggestions as to arguments which might be used.

(1) An important American complaint is that by including Outer Mongolia in our proposal we removed the possibility of negotiation. We should point out to the Americans, however, that we gave serious consideration to this aspect of the question and came to the conclusion that no purpose would be served in leaving out Outer Mongolia because of the unlikelihood that any satisfactory bargain could be reached. In our view, a view shared by our co-sponsors, the only way in which the Russians might conceivably have been reconciled to the omission of Outer Mongolia would have been to omit either Japan or Spain or both from the "Western list." We had told the Japanese that we could not consider a proposal from which they were omitted and had emphasized our support of Japan in Mr. Martin's opening speech at the Assembly. It was our deliberate intention that Japan should be included and we were not prepared to sacrifice that country to exclude Outer Mongolia. The moment Spain applied for membership we also included her on our list, thus making it even more unpalatable to Moscow. It did not seem to us likely, furthermore, that the United States would be prepared for strategic and political reasons to negotiate away the membership of either of these countries. It seemed to us therefore that it was an illusion to think that Outer Mongolia was a good subject for negotiation and we included it in order to remove this illusion and to put the problem bluntly and simply.

(2) It might be mentioned that in addition to the consultation with the Americans at a higher level the subject was constantly discussed between Canadian and American advisors in New York. Members of the United States Embassy here were informally in touch with this department on the subject for several months and we assume that this was the case also in Washington. Certainly, the United States advisors in New York were aware of our intentions at all times. It would probably not be wise to say so to Mr. Dulles, but some of these advisors encouraged us to go ahead (e.g. paragraph of telegram No. 187 of October 26 from the delegation to Ottawa).

(3) Our inability over a long period to get any response whatsoever from the Americans on this question should be mentioned in particular. We were given to understand during this period that United States policy had not been decided because Mr. Dulles himself had not made up his mind. In the meantime, we found ourselves almost involuntarily out in front and could not ignore the requests from all quarters in the Assembly that we should take a lead.

(4) Mr. Dulles's complaint about lack of consultation sounds reasonable enough but he is, no doubt unintentionally, virtually suggesting that we should not have proceeded without United States consent. We did consult the United States from the moment we began considering what we should do. After a very considerable time the Americans made it clear to us that their views were different. At that point we had the alternative of accepting the American opinion with which we did not agree or continuing on our own. By that time we could not have turned back even if we had wanted to do so, as others were ready to take the lead. There was not much point, however, in concerting action with a country which had made it clear that it did not agree with what we were doing. Naturally our association from then on was not of the same kind as it is in the vast majority of cases when we are in agreement on a resolution or a proposal.

(5) These arguments are, of course, not ones which should be submitted in this form to the State Department, but they might be useful for your own background information.

NEW MEMBERS

Early this afternoon the co-sponsors of our draft resolution on this subject met to discuss the next step in procedure leading to discussion by the Assembly. Twenty-seven member states were represented at the meeting. Chile and Ethiopia have added their names to the original group of twenty-five. We understand that Ecuador and the Dominican Republic also wish to be added.

2. The meeting first discussed whether we should proceed now with the discussion in the Ad Hoc Political Committee. Mr. Martin explained that the Palestine item was likely to conclude today. Menon confirmed that his delegation had no wish to press for the discussion of the item on the treatment of Indians in South Africa, which item was originally scheduled to be debated after Palestine refugees. It was clearly the view of the co-sponsors that the item on new members should now be discussed. It was agreed that the chairman of that Committee should express his impression that it was the wish of the Committee that the admission of new members be discussed next. If no one objected, the chairman would declare that the new item would be discussed at the following meeting, that is, on December 1. Prince Wan, who was present, was perfectly agreeable.

3. The meeting also discussed whether Belaunde or Mr. Martin should initiate the discussion. Menon, Munro and others considered it advisable and courteous to let Belaunde, as Chairman of the Good Offices Committee, present his report, a report which the item calls for. Spender and some others were of the view that Belaunde might start the discussion on the wrong note and they would prefer that Mr. Martin spoke first. It was agreed that the chairman and Mr. Martin should discuss the matter with Belaunde to seek a mutually acceptable procedure.

4. The meeting discussed how to deal with the Russian amendment. Mr. Martin pointed out that in the Canadian view the Russian suggestion that the eighteen states be listed would be divisive in consequence and would not help our general purpose of having the Assembly express itself with the greatest possible authority. It was clear that the Soviet objective was to ensure, as far as possible, that a two-thirds majority would be forthcoming from the Assembly for the Soviet candidates. This result might, however, not be obtained and, on the contrary, the Assembly might speak with a divided voice. It was more than likely that some delegation would ask for a vote upon the list, country by country.

5. Australia, Pakistan and Sweden supported Mr. Martin strongly. The Burmese representative was of the same opinion and urged that all the co-sponsors make an effort to persuade the Soviet Union to withdraw its amendment. Menon expressed the view that the Soviet amendment could not be voted down, that the Russians had good reasons for pressing the amendment but that these reasons were likely to disappear once a number of delegations had expressed their views on the admission of new members in the committee. He believed that at a later stage the Soviet Union would either withdraw the amendment or not press it to a vote. Menon said that he had made a considerable effort to persuade the Soviet delegation not to table their amendment.

6. Mr. Martin pointed out that he, Munro and Sarper had urged Malik to reconsider carefully the consequences of the Soviet amendment. They had all argued that the amendment would weaken the present draft resolution.

7. The representative of Denmark said that the Soviet amendment had clearly been advanced because the Soviet delegation were suspicious of Western intentions. They wished to ensure that the draft resolution encompassed the applications from eighteen states and not something less. He hoped that the Soviet apprehensions would disappear once the supporters of the resolution had had an opportunity to state their positions. There was reason to believe that in these circumstances the Soviet Union would not press its amendment to a vote.

8. As soon as the proceedings concerning Palestine refugees had been completed, Prince Wan reminded the committee of the suggestion that the admission of new members be discussed next. He hastily added that there appeared to be no objection and that the item would therefore be discussed tomorrow afternoon. He then adjourned the meeting. No delegation seemed interested in opposing the procedure which the chairman suggested.

9. The announcement yesterday of the Chinese delegation that it would if necessary veto the application of Outer Mongolia was discussed at the meeting of co-sponsors. It was clearly considered to be an issue which did not arise at the present stage. There is some speculation that this Chinese announcement is an opening bid in the process of bargaining, although the possibility that the Chinese Government is in earnest cannot be dismissed. We understand that Eisenhower's first appeal, made in the middle of last week, to Chiang Kai-Shek to agree not to veto Outer Mongolia was rejected. A second appeal by Eisenhower was still awaiting answer when the announcement was made yesterday.<sup>46</sup>

ADMISSION OF NEW MEMBERS — REPORTED CHINESE NATIONALIST INTENTION TO VETO OUTER MONGOLIA

Although it has been reported in the press that President Eisenhower has made two appeals to President Chiang Kai-shek that the Chinese Nationalist Representative in the Security Council should refrain from using the veto to block the entry of Outer Mongolia into the United Nations, and thereby upset the so called package deal, you may consider that as Canada has been a principal sponsor of the admission of the eighteen applicants it might be appropriate for you to speak to the Chinese Ambassador to Canada, Dr. Liu Chieh, who, we understand, is with the Chinese delegation in New York at the present time.

2. If you do decide to speak to Dr. Liu we think that you should be careful to avoid any implication that if the Chinese Nationalists should refrain from vetoing the application of Outer Mongolia Canada would reverse its policy trend on recognition of the Peking régime but you could imply that the trend toward recognition in Canada and in other countries might well be accelerated if the Chinese Nationalists should block this Canadian initiative when other governments like that of the United States and the Soviet Union have agreed to forego the veto in this instance.

3. You might wish to start off by telling Dr. Liu something about our role in taking this initiative, emphasizing the very strong desire of certain of the applicants like Japan, Italy and Spain to get into the United Nations and the extent to which they are relying on this resolution to achieve that objective. You might indicate the efforts that have been made over the years to get Security Council members to renounce the use of the veto on the applications of new members.

4. It is for the Chinese Nationalist government of course to weigh the various factors involved in this case. No doubt they have strong direct reasons for opposing the entry of Outer Mongolia in the United Nations. Neither are we enthusiastic about this prospect but view it as part of a whole in which we think that the advantages for the non-communist world and the United Nations as a whole outweigh the disadvantages. We hope that the Chinese Nationalist government will give similar consideration to these broad factors and also to the likely effect on public and governmental opinion in countries with which they still maintain official relations if they should persist in vetoing the application of Outer Mongolia in the Security Council.

NEW MEMBERS

On December 2 in the afternoon there will be a meeting of the co-sponsors of our draft resolution specifically to consider two amendments which the Indian delegation has now suggested. They are: (a) to substitute in the second operative paragraph after the words "applications for membership of" and for the word "all" the words "eighteen countries which are"; (b) add the following as the third operative paragraph and renumber accordingly: "3. Request the President of the General Assembly to transmit to the Security Council this resolution and the proceedings in the General Assembly leading to its adoption."<sup>47</sup>

2. (b) should give us no trouble although the procedure hardly seems necessary. Menon has paved the way by requesting that a verbatim record be kept in the Ad Hoc Political Committee of the debate on new members.

3. The Indian suggestion (a) is designed to remove the strong suspicion which the Soviet delegation has that our resolution as presently drafted does not encompass a group of eighteen. The Indians argue that if their amendment is accepted by the other co-sponsors, it will strengthen our efforts to persuade the Soviet delegation either to withdraw their own amendment (which lists the applicant States) or not to press it to a vote. The Indians have strengthened their own case by persuading the Afro-Asians among the co-sponsors that the Indian suggestion is a good one. Moreover, undoubtedly most of our co-sponsors who speak in the debate will emphasize that the present language in the draft resolution does mean eighteen, although not necessarily "eighteen or nothing", which is the Soviet delegation's position. In all these circumstances we think it would be inadvisable to oppose the Indian suggestion and we shall ultimately take this position in the meeting of co-sponsors tomorrow unless you instruct otherwise or there is strong opposition from others among our group, like the Scandinavians, Australia and New Zealand.

4. After listening to Kuznetsov's most unhelpful statement in the Ad Hoc Political Committee today we have little doubt that the Soviet delegation will continue to insist on eighteen admissions or nothing. It is our impression that the United States and the United Kingdom delegations are likewise persuaded. The previous reasons for maintaining some flexibility as to the number of members to be admitted now seem less pressing. Accordingly there is now not much point in avoiding the word "eighteen".

NEW MEMBERS

We were unable to arrange a meeting with Liu until after the Ad Hoc Political Committee had begun the debate on the admission of new members. Immediately after the meeting this afternoon, however, Messrs. Martin and MacKay discussed the matter with Tsiang and Liu.

2. We began the discussion by enquiring about the Chinese attitude toward the resolution which the Canadian delegation had introduced in the Ad Hoc Committee. Tsiang stated that his instructions were, as indicated in the announcement he made two days ago, to veto "if necessary", the application of Outer Mongolia. He stated that, as far as he was aware, Chiang Kai-shek had not replied to the second appeal made by Eisenhower. (The United States delegation told us today that no reply had been received to the second message from the President).

3. Mr. Martin then reviewed the circumstances in which we had pressed our initiative designed to bring about the admission of eighteen new members. He pointed out, as he had done in his statement in the Ad Hoc Committee, how important this development was for the United Nations and for international relations generally. He expressed the hope that the Chinese government would find it possible to facilitate the aim for which Canada and a large majority of the members of the United Nations were striving. He stated that we were aware of the fact that Tsiang intended to speak on the subject at tomorrow's meeting of the Ad Hoc Committee. He said we hoped that Tsiang would bear in mind the consequences which might derive from any adverse position which he might adopt in the debate.

4. Tsiang said that his government was aware of the significance of the present proceedings in the Ad Hoc Committee. Notwithstanding his present instructions, in his statement tomorrow (December 2), he would not "cross the Rubicon". When questioned he said that he would not say anything tomorrow which would prejudice the position which the Chinese delegation might adopt in the Security Council when the outstanding applications for membership were being considered.

5. He went on to express his opinion that his instructions concerning the veto of the application of Outer Mongolia would not be changed. He said that Chiang Kai-shek's reply to Eisenhower's second message would like the first be negative. He did add, however, that time might provide a solution to the present problem. When questioned on this point he said that although the General Assembly might endorse our draft resolution by an overwhelming majority, if some time were allowed, he suggested several months, for the Security Council to implement the request embodied in our resolution, it might then be possible to arrive at a satisfactory solution (our draft resolution of course requests the Security Council to report to the present session). The implication seems to be that the Chinese Nationalists are interested in buying time.

6. This conversation bears out the information which the United States delegation has given us about the suicidal state of mind of the Chinese Nationalists. It was for this reason, no doubt, that the Japanese observer here has been suggesting to the United States delegation and through them to us that if some assurance could be given to Chiang Kai-shek that his régime could survive for a further period, presumably until after the next presidential election in the United States, he would agree not to block the admission of the group of eighteen. As we reported on the telephone Belaunde has already given some such assurance on behalf of the Latin Americans. We agree that we should not give any undertaking to that effect. It might, however, be helpful if some other delegations, representing different areas, were to urge the Chinese, as we have done, to bear in mind the consequences which might follow quickly on the heels of a veto of any application for membership. The combination of the Latin American carrot and the threat of a big stick by others might have the desired effect on Chiang Kai-shek notwithstanding his suicidal tendencies.

7. We need not dwell in this telegram on the unfortunate consequences which might derive from a Chinese veto which would wreck the present move to facilitate the admission of new members. It is becoming increasingly clear Menon is paving the way for swift retribution by devising means for calling the General Assembly into session early in the new year. I refer to his draft resolution on disarmament which is being reported separately.<sup>48</sup>

PERSONAL AND CONFIDENTIAL

Washington, December 2, 1955

Dear Mike [Pearson],

Although this cannot leave until Monday's bag (December 5), I think I had better record right away, while it is fresh in my memory, my conversation earlier this afternoon with Livingston Merchant about Mr. Dulles' charge that we failed to consult adequately with the U.S. government concerning our initiative in the United Nations with respect to new members.

2. I had let Merchant know in advance what I wanted to talk about and began by saying that I came to him for two reasons: first, he was present when the Secretary called Glazebrook in on November 22nd, and second, our personal friendship would make it easier for me to speak with complete frankness. I added that I had waited until you and Paul Martin had had a chance to see Cabot Lodge in New York, and that later on — probably toward the end of next week, I proposed to seek an interview with Dulles to enter a more formal rebuttal of his allegations.

3. Then I ran over briefly the high points of our consultations on the new members problem with various U.S. officials in Washington, in Ottawa and in New York. These extended over a period of some three months, and I said we intended to record, for their elucidation, the main features of this story, which I was confident would demolish completely the charge of non-consultation. The U.S. government had been made aware of our views and intentions in August and at various stages prior to the tabling of our resolution they had had ample opportunity to express their views.

4. I then went on to say that, in these circumstances, we had been, to put it mildly, surprised that the Secretary of State should, in my absence, summon the Minister at the Embassy and haul him over the coals in the way he did. (I did use the word "resent" with Merchant, though I said I would probably employ a less undiplomatic term when I saw Dulles). We took particular exception to Dulles' reference to what the U.S. government had "done for Canada" in putting us on the same basis as Venezuela in regard to imports of oil. Nor did we appreciate, even if it were attributed to a hypothetical Member of Congress, the suggestion that you and Molotov had cooked up a deal in Moscow.

5. The Secretary's complaint in this matter, I continued, caused us to wonder about the nature of consultation generally between our two governments. Merchant was quite aware that in all subjects in which we knew the U.S. government were interested we made an effort, at different levels, to keep them informed of our views and intentions and to seek theirs. He also knew that I had deliberately made it a practice not to bother the Secretary himself unless there was good reason. I could quite easily alter this custom and beat regularly on his door though I would prefer out of consideration for Dulles to continue to deal with his senior officials, except on special occasions.

6. On the whole, I said, we on our side had no complaint on the extent of their reciprocity in consulting us, considering the number and variety of their responsibilities and preoccupations. We assumed that when Mr. Dulles spoke of consultation on our part he was not suggesting that the United States be given a veto over any action we proposed. On Monday next we were to engage, with high American officials, in another "meeting of consultation".<sup>49</sup> I had seen little evidence of much enthusiasm or even interest on this occasion on the U.S. side. Perhaps we should consider putting an end to these periodic meetings and rely upon the normal diplomatic channels.

7. I then made reference to the fact that wherever you had gone on your recent trip you had made a point of seeing and talking to the local U.S. representatives. You had also, incidentally, gone out of your way to defend and explain American policies in countries not notably friendly to the United States. There had been no slightest acknowledgement of this from Washington, and you returned to encounter a complaint from the Secretary, and one without any foundation in fact. As to the issue itself — new members for the United Nations — we were following a course in New York which we believed to be in the general interest of the United Nations, and in the particular interest of Canada, the United States and the free world. We remained of that opinion for reasons which we had exposed fully to the United States and to our other allies and friends. You fully endorsed the attitude and actions of the Delegation in New York and this had been made quite clear to Lodge.

8. Finally I told Merchant that the suggestion that we (and you in particular) were not "friendly" to the present U.S. administration — a suggestion raised in a high official quarter — was strongly resented by us all. He knew quite well that this was utterly baseless.

9. When I paused to draw breath, Merchant responded to this calculated outburst by saying that there were a number of reasons which occurred to him why the Secretary had spoken as he had in his interview with Glazebrook. In the first place, the fact that he had been so frank and, admittedly "rough" was a measure of the intimacy of our relationship. He would not have talked that way to the British Ambassador. (A double edged observation I thought though not intended as such). In the second place, he was willing to admit that there had probably been some lack of co-ordination in the State Department so that Dulles was not fully aware of the consultations which had taken place between Canadian and U.S. officials. In the third place (and he said this very privately) the U.S. government had not decided upon a policy on new members until the Secretary himself had taken a decision in the aircraft on his way back from the Geneva meeting. (This, of course, is very significant and confirms our own strong suspicions). In the fourth place, it certainly had been a shock for the Secretary to learn first of the Canadian resolution from Franco in Madrid (no matter whose fault that was, Merchant implied). Finally, it was the inclusion of Outer Mongolia in the Canadian package which had really shaken Dulles. The implications for relations between the United States and Nationalist China were very grave. And here Merchant too introduced the spectre of Yalta.<sup>50</sup> (He added, incidentally, that if the Nationalists did veto Mongolia he supposed no one would believe that the U.S. had not put them up to it). Finally Merchant said that Glazebrook had conducted himself admirably at the interview with Dulles.

10. Answering Merchant's somewhat apologetic defence, I said that I found it difficult to understand why the United States had been surprised by the "inclusion" of Outer Mongolia. We were convinced that without it there was no hope of Soviet concurrence and the State Department should have been quite aware, a long time back, that we felt it worthwhile swallowing Mongolia to gain the larger end. However, it was not the merits we were discussing, but the procedure. We had our point of view, arrived at after weighing carefully the various factors — the United States government had theirs. What was involved, at the moment, was whether we had discharged our neighbourly obligation to consult the United States. We certainly felt that we had.

11. Merchant said that he was in no doubt at all of the value which the U.S. government attached to close consultation with the Canadian authorities. They certainly wished to continue the closest contacts and in particular the "meetings of consultation". He was glad that I had spoken as frankly as I had, and agreed that I should see the Secretary of State and that it would be wise for me to leave with him a memorandum on the facts of consultation in this case. He would welcome the opportunity himself of seeing the paper before it went to Dulles.

This appears to be a reference to the first article of the Yalta agreement regarding the entry of the Soviet Union into the war against Japan. It states that the "status quo in Outer Mongolia (The Mongolian People's Republic) shall be preserved." United States policy at Yalta was the subject of considerable controversy following the publication of the conference papers in 1955. See United States, Department of State, FRUS, The Conferences at Malta and Yalta 1945, Washington: United States Government Printing Office, 1955.

12. There for the moment the matter rests. I believe that my talk with Merchant may have some good results (even though of short duration), apart from mere rebuttal of the Dulles charge. We shall now draft a brief memorandum and I shall seek an interview with the Secretary when I shall hope to enter the rebuttal to his charge in terms rather different from those which I was able to employ with my friend Livvy Merchant.

Yours sincerely,

ARNOLD [HEENEY]

NEW MEMBERS

Before the meeting of the Ad Hoc Committee in the afternoon of December 2 we held a meeting of the co-sponsors of our draft resolution to discuss the revisions which Menon had suggested and which we reported to you in our telegram 371 of December 1. We discussed first the proposal to include the word "eighteen" in the second operative paragraph.

2. As soon as Menon had made his suggestion for changing the wording, the Brazilian representative and several others suggested alternatives, all of which had the same effect, that is, of mentioning "eighteen" in the text. There seemed to be general agreement that if the inclusion of this word would allay Soviet suspicion and would tend to persuade the Soviet delegation to withdraw its amendment, it would seem desirable for the co-sponsors to make the suggested revision.

3. There was, however, some difference of opinion about the timing of the revision. The representatives of New Zealand, Burma, Iran, Indonesia and Yugoslavia expressed the view that it might be desirable to withhold our revision until more statements had been made in the general debate and the position of various Delegations became more clear. Mr. Martin said that we were in favour of withholding the revision which might be made to greater advantage a little later on. However, it was clear that Menon was determined to have this revision made at once. In the heated discussion which took place Menon stated that his Delegation would not be party to any draft resolution on this subject which was "deliberately equivocal". He seemed unduly annoyed at interventions made by Barrington of Burma and Entezam of Iran.

4. As a result the meeting agreed that the word "eighteen" should be inserted in the second operative paragraph between the words "membership of all those" and the words "about which". This revision has been circulated in Document A/AC.80/L.31/Rev.1 December 2, 1955. Because the meeting had to adjourn to allow delegates to attend the Ad Hoc Political Committee, no consideration was given to Menon's second suggestion about the additional operative paragraph. He may be disposed to drop this suggestion which we regard as inconsequential.<sup>51</sup>

There remain eight delegations inscribed to speak in the general debate on this subject. They are Peru, India, Venezuela, Soviet Union, China, Canada, France and the United States. In view of the general tenor of the debate it may not be necessary for us to intervene again. We did, however, at an earlier stage consider it desirable to request another opportunity to speak. If we do intervene again, it will be briefly to summarize our impression of the views which have been expressed by more than 35 delegations. There seems little doubt that the joint draft resolution which Canada and 27 other delegations have co-sponsored will receive overwhelming support in the committee. We understand that the Soviet amendment, listing the 18 countries the applications of which are recommended for consideration by the Security Council, will not be pressed to the vote. We hope the Cuban delegation will not press its amendments but if they are put to the vote we propose to vote against them. It is clear from the statements of a majority of other delegations that the Cuban amendments will not be accepted.

2. The timetable for future developments is likely to be as follows: The Ad Hoc Committee will adopt the joint draft resolution tomorrow, probably late in the afternoon; the Assembly will meet in plenary session on Thursday and presumably will adopt the report of the committee; the Security Council will more than likely meet on Friday to consider applications for membership, in accordance with the draft resolution. The recommendations of the Security Council would then be considered by the General Assembly early next week. This timetable emerged as a result of a procedural discussion in the Ad Hoc Political Committee this afternoon. Menon initiated this discussion at our suggestion and no objection was voiced when the chairman outlined the programme. This evening Munro, who is president of the Security Council this month, stated his intention to convene the security council on Friday.

3. We believe strongly that it is desirable to proceed with despatch in this matter. The overwhelming opinion in the committee is undoubtedly in favour of immediate action. The position of the Chinese delegation has yet to be clarified (in fact the Japanese observer informed us today that the reply from Formosa to Eisenhower's second message was unfavourable but that a third message was being sent urging reconsideration and suggesting that there was some assurance that the moratorium would not be re-opened in the immediate future). A significant number of speakers in the general debate in the Ad Hoc Committee have appealed to the Chinese delegation not to block (sweeping?) tide in favour of admitting all eighteen applicants. There have also been references to the repercussions which might result from a Chinese veto. There is no doubt that the Chinese delegation has been taking careful note of these observations.

4. Another diversion has been the attempt of the French delegation to obtain some assurance from other delegations, principally the Latin Americans, concerning the proposal that, if the eighteen new members are admitted, the rules of procedure should be revised to require a two-thirds majority for the inscription of items on the agenda. We are told that the French are having some success but now is not the time to reach a clear-cut understanding in that regard. We have no reason to believe that the French are prepared to block the admission of the eighteen new members, regardless of the outcome of their present manoeuvre.

5. The pressure of opinion in favour of admitting the whole group of eighteen is strong. The atmosphere for the solution of this long standing programme has never been as favourable as it is now. We are, therefore, cautiously hopeful that the results we desire will be obtained.

THE UNITED NATIONS

1. ADMISSION OF NEW MEMBERS

United Nations Division: On December 7th the Ad Hoc Political Committee approved the 28 power draft resolution, initiated by Canada, exhorting the Security Council to consider "the pending applications for membership of all those 18 countries about which no problem of unification arises". The vote was 52 in favour, 2 against (China and Cuba), with 5 abstentions (Belgium, France, Greece, Israel and the United States). The General Assembly approved this resolution the next day by an identical vote.

On December 13 the Security Council met to consider this resolution. After the USSR had first vetoed a Chinese amendment calling for the addition of South Korea and South Vietnam to the list of those recommended for admission, the Council proceeded to consider the original resolution. China then vetoed the application of Outer Mongolia, whereupon the USSR retaliated by vetoing all 13 non-communist candidates and as a result the resolution as a whole was defeated.

The date refers to the week in which the meeting was held, e.g. December 12 - December 17, 1955.

The following day, the Security Council reassembled to consider a Soviet draft resolution calling for the recommendation of all those applicants on the previous list except Japan and Mongolia. The U.S. Delegation then proposed an amendment adding Japan and this received 10 favourable votes and one negative vote cast by the USSR and constituting a veto. The USSR resolution was then voted on and, after each of the 16 applicants had been approved individually, the resolution as a whole was adopted by a vote of 8 in favour, none against, and 3 abstentions (Belgium, China and U.S.).

When the voting concluded the U.S. submitted a further resolution to the effect that the Security Council recommends to the General Assembly that it admit Japan to the U.N. at its 11th session. A decision on this matter was postponed for a day at the request of the USSR.

At an emergency plenary session that evening, the Assembly approved by large majorities the recommendations of the Security Council and a draft Assembly resolution to the same effect (submitted by 30 powers including Canada). As a result the following states became members of the U.N.: Albania, Jordan, Ireland, Portugal, Hungary, Italy, Austria, Rumania, Bulgaria, Finland, Ceylon, Nepal, Libya, Cambodia, Laos and Spain.

MEMORANDUM OF CONVERSATION WITH MR. DULLES
PARIS, DECEMBER 15, 1955

Mr. Dulles asked me when I reached Paris if I could call on him at the U.S. Embassy before the opening meeting of the NATO Council for a talk. I did so, and we had about 45 minutes together, Thursday morning.

The time was devoted almost entirely to the misunderstanding which had arisen over the alleged inadequacy on our part of consultation with them in regard to the proposal for enlarging U.N. membership. Mr. Dulles had been informed that I objected to the criticism which he had made of our non-consultative tactics in this matter. I reaffirmed my objection and once again emphasized that in our view we had been very careful to keep them informed of every move that we were making. For his benefit, I went over the record, which surely confirmed the validity of our position in this argument.

Mr. Dulles said that we perhaps did not appreciate the importance that was attached in Washington to the proposed inclusion of Outer Mongolia in the list of members. Politically this was most embarrassing for them as it would have revived the whole Yalta controversy, and as it would involve a Chinese Nationalist veto with serious resulting complications. He assured me that Senator Knowland and other congressmen would make a major political issue out of the Outer Mongolian inclusion and that they were already blaming Canada, in particular, for subjecting the United States to this embarrassment.

I reminded Mr. Dulles that I had discussed this matter with him at the U.S. Embassy in Ottawa even before I went to Russia and that at that time he had given no indication of the strength of his feeling about Outer Mongolia. Indeed, he had not even mentioned Outer Mongolia, though he had indicated U.S. difficulties in the acceptance of Roumania, Hungary and Bulgaria.

Mr. Dulles remembered the conversation very well and also agreed that Outer Mongolia had not been mentioned. The reason for this, he said, was that he had no idea that Outer Mongolia was even being considered in our list as part of any "package deal". This, he said, was where the misunderstanding began.

I said that in my view we had the right to draw quite the opposite conclusions from his silence because I had specifically mentioned Outer Mongolia in Parliament in Ottawa, and the Embassy in conversations in Washington, as one of the "18". Mr. Dulles said he had not been informed of my remarks in Parliament and, indeed, may not have been kept sufficiently informed of discussions in Washington. He therefore not only regretted the misunderstanding, but also that Mr. Heenev had not taken the matter up direct with him or with Mr. Hoover. He understood that discussions had been with officials of the State Department on a lower level. I replied that as I remembered it, Mr. Heenev had had a discussion with Mr. Hoover, as I had had certainly with him. We also naturally assumed that this Department would have kept him informed of our views. Therefore I did not feel that we had any occasion to apologize, either in regard to the substance of the matter or the procedure adopted. It certainly was unfortunate that I did not realize that he had always excluded Outer Mongolia from any list. If he had told me this at the beginning, we would, of course, have given careful consideration to his views before we proceeded further. However we still felt that the original package deal of "18" was wise, as we had been categorically assured by the Russians that it was 18 or nothing.

Mr. Dulles argued that by the inclusion of Outer Mongolia from the beginning we had forfeited any room for bargaining or manoeuvre, and in the event it had been left to Nationalist China to bring about a satisfactory bargain by its courage in using the veto. "Chiang Kai-shek was now the hero." I said I could not feel this way about a veto which negated the will of 52 member countries of the United Nations, but I agreed that the sudden Soviet volte face, whatever might have inspired it, had given us a way out of our difficulties. We had got 16 out of the 18, and for that result the Russians, not the Chinese Nationalists, would now claim the credit.

I then referred to the rumours in Washington that I had plotted in Moscow with Mr. Molotov to bring about the admission of 18. I reminded Mr. Dulles that I had informed the State Department of my talk with Mr. Molotov on this subject, which had been very brief and non-committal. If I had, in fact, been plotting with Mr. Molotov against the United States on this issue, I was a pretty inept plotter in keeping the victim so carefully informed! Mr. Dulles said he did not, of course, himself share this suspicion for a minute, but some congressmen had been spreading this story around. I expressed the hope that if Mr. Dulles heard anything more of this in Washington he would do his best to refute what was an absurd allegation. I told him that I resented this kind of story very much, as he would, and also certain "New York" insinuations that I was not anxious to co-operate with the American Administration in matters of this kind because they were Republican, and I was a well-known Democrat-lover. Dulles said that such talk was, of course, complete nonsense; that he had been very happy about our co-operative and friendly relations while he was Secretary of State and had no complaint of any kind to make. He knew about this kind of insinuation in New York and where it originated. He thought that certain people in New York were too "political" in their approach to many subjects. He also felt that there was a special difficulty in consultation over U.N. matters because some of "their people" in

New York approved of the "package of 18", and may not have passed on our views to Washington in sufficient detail.

Mr. Dulles, while regretting the whole incident, said that he was delighted with the eventual result, but also extremely surprised by it. Last night he said he went to sleep in distress and despair. He thought that the situation was so tragic and its repercussions might be so serious as to affect the attitude of the United States to the United Nations generally. He was especially worried over the effect on opinion of the exclusion of the United States from the meeting of "52", something which he deplored. However, with the news this morning of the acceptance of the 16, most of his worries had vanished. He hoped also that any ill feeling and misunderstanding that had existed would vanish too. I assured him that on my part it had been removed, and would not affect our good relations in the future or our agreement on the necessity of close and constant consultation on all matters of mutual interest.

He then asked me to ride with him to the NATO Council meeting, where we could be photographed together as we entered the building!!

We had little opportunity to talk about anything else except Germany, which he agreed with me should be discussed very thoroughly at the forthcoming meeting. He was most anxious to hear our views on the subject, and I told him that he would very shortly have that pleasure.

He said he had been reading my statements and reports on Russia since my return, which he thought admirable. He thanked me most warmly for having kept the State Department informed of the discussions on my recent trip and he had already written me formally from Washington to that effect.

Mr. Dulles was very friendly — if somewhat defensive — throughout and, indeed, maintained that friendly attitude during the Council meeting, making a special effort, so I thought, to chat with me in an amiable and informal way at every opportunity.<sup>53</sup>

STUDIES OF THE EFFECTS OF H-BOMB EXPLOSIONS

Since the Bikini explosion over a year ago, we have received a steady flow of letters protesting about the continuance of H-Bomb tests. Many of these letters point to the numerous statements made by eminent scientists since the first explosion, warning of the dangers to mankind if these tests are allowed to continue. Of course, the majority of the letters have been from Communist organizations. Since January of this year, we have at your direction ceased to answer such letters, except in special circumstances. Only a very few letters of the hundreds received — perhaps only one in fifty — have come from ordinary citizens disturbed over the possible dangers of H-Bomb tests.

2. Although the proportion of letters written without an ulterior motive is small, we have sought to avoid giving perfunctory answers. Until March of this year, replies both from the Prime Minister's Office and from the Department customarily referred to your statement made in the House on March 31, 1954.<sup>54</sup>

3. On March 7, 1955 Mr. Knowles asked you what the Government's attitude was to the proposal of the Federation of American Scientists that studies of the effects of H-Bomb tests should be conducted by the United Nations.<sup>55</sup> This question was the first of a series of similar questions, which during March and April came from Messrs. Coldwell, Cameron, Enfield, Goode, Knowles and Hamilton, and which drew replies from the Prime Minister, Mr. Campney, Mr. Martin and Mr. Marler, as well as from yourself. Since most of the questions had to do with the biological effects of radiation, Mr. Martin gave most of the answers. These statements made by various members of the Government have provided a basis for replies to the most recent letters from the public.

The proposal of the Federation of American Scientists is printed in Bulletin of the Atomic Scientists, Volume XI, No. 5, May 1955, pp. 185-186.

4. You will recall that we attempted, with your approval, to find out from the United Kingdom and the United States Governments what their attitude was to the Federation of American Scientists' proposal. The reply from London pointed out that it was doubtful whether the U.S., the U.S.S.R. and the U.K. would release the information necessary to make U.N. studies useful. The State Department raised the same objection.

5. Studies are therefore proceeding on a national basis; those in Canada as a result of Mr. Martin's recent proposal to the Cabinet. In the United States, the National Academy of Sciences is beginning a broad programme of studies with the blessing of the Atomic Energy Commission. We have made a number of attempts to obtain a full statement of the U.S. position, and to find out all we can about these studies in particular, but have not been able to obtain any substantial amount of information. There appear to be two reasons for this: the fact that the U.S. authorities have not yet thought their way through the problem, and the notorious reluctance of the Atomic Energy Commission to divulge any information except under strong pressure.

6. This attitude continues to be the subject of sharp criticism in the United States itself, from publications like the Bulletin of Atomic Scientists and Newsweek. A number of United States scientists have accused the A.E.C. of failing to reveal the true extent of the danger from H-Bomb explosions. For example, Dr. Franklin Hutchison, a Yale physicist, recently said that if A.E.C. officials "have data to back up their contention that there are no harmful genetic effects from radiation, that's just wonderful. The trouble is I don't know of any such data, and neither does anyone else to whom I've talked."

7. So long as public statements of this sort continue to be made by reputable scientists, the public position taken by the Government will continue to be unsatisfactory. The issue may well be brought to a head at the Tenth Session of the General Assembly if the Swedish Government implements its recent promise to seek the support of other nations for U.N. studies of radiation effects. Our Legation in Stockholm reports that the Swedes were forced by pressure in their parliament to commit themselves to this enterprise before they were fully prepared to do so. It is still uncertain just how they will go about obtaining support for their proposal, but it is unlikely that we will be embarrassed by a direct approach from them. I have in mind also that no action has yet been taken on the Indian request to have the Disarmament Commission consider the question of H-Bomb explosions, although this request was originally made in April 1954 and has since been repeated. Thus we have good reason to suppose that either the Swedes or the Indians or both will take the initiative in demanding studies of the effects of H-Bomb explosions under United Nations auspices at the Tenth Session of the General Assembly.

8. A proposal of this sort is undeniably attractive. To be successful, studies under U.N. auspices would of course depend on the extent to which the U.S., the U.S.S.R. and the U.K. are willing to co-operate in making information available. This might well prove an insuperable obstacle. At the same time, it seems to be that we need to be able to take a more positive attitude towards these proposals, particularly if a debate in the United Nations takes place.

9. As you stated in reply to Mr. Knowles, the Government would not itself take the initiative in proposing studies under the U.N., but would consider sympathetically any practical suggestion brought forward by another member. To develop this position, I propose, if you approve, to present the case which is made above to the U.S. and U.K. authorities. We could take advantage of the breathing space we have, now that tests in the continental United States are over for this year. I believe that we should point out to the U.S. and the U.K. that the subject is almost bound to be raised in the United Nations, and that it would therefore be prudent in our opinion to work out an agreed position in advance. We might suggest, since the idea of some form of U.N. activity in this field is so attractive to public opinion in the free world, that it should not be rejected except after careful consideration, and even then, not in an unsympathetic manner. Should it appear on examination that there is nothing the United Nations can usefully do in this field, then I believe we should be prepared to suggest a substitute. This substitute should be as widely supported as possible, and should, I think, include public assurances that our common objective is to achieve as great a degree of international co-operation as is possible, through the co-ordination of national programmes and the exchange of scientists and information.<sup>56</sup>

UNITED NATIONS STUDY OF THE HAZARDS OF ATOMIC RADIATION

You will have seen from incoming telegrams that in accordance with Lodge's statement during the San Francisco Conference<sup>57</sup> the Americans have submitted an item for the tenth session of the General Assembly entitled: "Co-ordination of Information Relating to the Effects of Atomic Radiation upon Human Life and Safety".<sup>58</sup> This matter has been discussed between the Americans, the British, the French and ourselves in Washington.

One of the main subjects of discussion related to the U.N. body which should undertake the proposed study. At first the Americans considered that it might simply be done by a Sub-Committee of the Disarmament Commission. They pointed out that the membership of the Commission (members of the Security Council [and] Canada) should be regarded as acceptable to the Western powers and that this approach would have the great advantage of avoiding the question of membership during the Assembly debate. The British and the French were opposed to the American suggestion on the grounds that the proposed study was concerned with the peaceful as well as the military uses of atomic energy. They were also concerned lest the Sub-Committee be drawn into a discussion of some of the sensitive aspects of the disarmament problem (e.g., nuclear tests) which easily lend themselves to propaganda treatment. While we were inclined to agree with the French and the British on this particular aspect, we did not express strong views since we saw advantages in the United States approach in addition to that mentioned above pertaining to membership. In the end the United States came round to the Anglo-French view and the latest proposals which they put forward suggest the establishment of an Ad Hoc Committee.

Yes L.B. P[earson]

<sup>58</sup> Voir/See United States, Department of State, Bulletin, Volume 33, No. 844, August 29, 1955, pp. 365-366.

On the question of membership, however, we agreed with the Americans that the Committee should consist of governmental scientists instead of independent scientists as suggested by the British and the French. We recognized that the Anglo-French approach would probably satisfy public opinion better. However, we wondered whether the advantages derived from this approach might not be more than balanced by its disadvantages. The nomination of scientists by the Secretary-General might become a tricky matter, even assuming a sound decision by the Assembly on the composition of the Advisory Body proposed by the British and the French to advise the Secretary-General in this connection. Moreover, although they might agree on findings based on the information received, the scientists, or a majority (or even a minority) of them, might cause serious trouble if they start the argument that they are not receiving enough information to form a sound judgment. There was also the possibility that the end product of the scientists' work would include some sort of Einstein-Russell statement which might unintentionally complicate matters on the questions of the prohibition of nuclear weapons and total inspection, given the facts of life in this field. Bearing in mind that the Governments cannot be forced to release any information which they have decided to withhold, the establishment of a governmental body seemed the best course to follow.

It would appear that the British, if not the French, are now agreeing to this view and the latest United States paper suggests that the Ad Hoc Committee be composed of one scientific representative from each of the following nations: United Kingdom, United States, USSR, France, Australia, Canada, Brazil, India, Sweden and Japan.

The other major aspect discussed in Washington is the terms of reference of the proposed Committee. We are inclined to agree with the United Kingdom and France that the Committee should not merely be asked to assemble the information received from governments and forwarded to member states as the United States originally suggested but that it should also pass some judgment on the material received. The latest United States paper goes a fairly long way towards meeting the position of the other three countries (see paragraphs C, D and E of Washington telegram No. 1565 of September 13,† attached) and there are indications that the British will not stress this matter further. We are wondering whether in the last analysis the United States draft does not say as much as can be realistically expressed at this time on this subject. It is conceivable that national academies in countries producing nuclear weapons will receive confidential information which will enable them to draw final conclusions (without necessarily divulging this information), while the Ad Hoc Committee as a whole may find it difficult to pass final judgment in the light of the data which it receives.

After consultation with the Department of National Health and Welfare, we have suggested that the Specialized Agencies should be brought into the picture since some of them, e.g., WHO and UNESCO, are directly interested in this matter. The United Kingdom has concurred in this suggestion and the United States draft contains a last paragraph which covers this point substantially.

The Embassy in Washington has been informed that the views expressed above, which have been approved by officials of the Departments of National Health and Welfare and Defence Research Board, represented our thinking at the official level. I should greatly appreciate knowing whether you concur with these views and with the general contents of the United States draft resolution. Should you concur,<sup>59</sup> these views will be embodied in

We have now received confirmation that the United Kingdom has approved the latest United States draft resolution on the above subject, the text of which appears in telegram No. 7 of September 20† from the Canadian Delegation to the tenth session of the General Assembly (copy attached). Except for a few changes of wording, this text is identical to the draft which you approved last week.

The United States has asked both the United Kingdom and ourselves to sponsor their draft resolution and the United Kingdom has already agreed to become co-sponsor. In view of our close relations with both countries on atomic energy matters, I think we should accede to the United States request. In the event that you agree with this course, the attached telegram, authorizing the Delegation to accept Canadian co-sponsorship, has been prepared for your signature.<sup>61</sup> should preferably be extended for the reasons indicated in Dr. Cipriani's memorandum to you.<sup>62</sup> We think this might be done by the insertion of a new paragraph C in the United States draft resolution along the following lines:

C. To recommend to governments research problems which should be investigated in order to provide the information required by the Committee.

2. The present paragraphs C, D and E would then become D, E and F respectively.

3. Dr. Cipriani has expressed the opinion that the security interests of powers making nuclear tests would not be prejudiced as a result of the extension of the terms of reference of the Committee in the sense indicated above.

4. We should appreciate your discussing this matter informally with the United States Delegation with a view to ascertaining their reaction to the amendment suggested until this amendment has been fully considered in Washington and agreement has been reached at least with the United States Delegation on the desirability of such an amendment whether in its present or in revised form, we consider that we are not in a position to mention such a change in the resolution in Canadian statements we may make at this stage. ## ATOMIC RADIATION

This morning we discussed with the United Kingdom and United States Delegations the amendment to the draft resolution suggested in your telegram No. V-91 of October 28. The United States Delegation suggested that the point be met by adding at the end of paragraph E the following phrase, as part of the same sentence, "and indications of research projects which might require further study". Dr. Cipriani said that this phraseology was acceptable to him and we therefore agreed with this suggestion in which the United Kingdom also concurred. The Swedish Representative in his statement yesterday made the same point as that contained in our amendment when he said that his Delegation would give the Committee powers to recommend further avenues of research. Since the Scandinavian Delegations may have a number of other suggestions which would be difficult to accept, it was agreed at the meeting that the change in the text to meet the Canadian suggestion might be presented to the Swedish Delegation as a change designed to meet their views. Since there is still hope that Sweden may agree to be a co-sponsor and this may help to bring them in, we concurred. We have in any case added to the statement to be made in the first Committee today by Mr. Martin a reference in general terms to the idea of the amendment, although we do not refer to it as an amendment.<sup>63</sup>

2. Later this morning the United States, United Kingdom and Canadian Delegations met with the Indian Delegation to discuss further amendments proposed by Menon. The draft resolution as contained in our telegram No. 207 of October 28† already takes account of all the amendments which Bhabha had proposed and the United States Delegation had not expected a further batch of amendments. However, they agreed to a number of relatively minor textual changes. The only substantial additional Indian amendment which the United States and the United Kingdom are unable to accept is one which would delete all reference to "States members of the United Nations or members of the Specialized Agencies" throughout the resolution and replace the phrase by the single word "countries". The Soviet Union has suggested an amendment with similar effect.

3. Lall, who attended the meeting for the Indian Delegation, said that he would inform Menon of the alterations accepted to meet Indian suggestions and would let us know today whether India could co-sponsor.

4. It was agreed that the resolution would be tabled today but would not be circulated in the Committee until after the United Kingdom and Canadian Delegations have finished speaking at this afternoon's meeting. We have made minor revisions in our text to eliminate specific reference to the draft resolution, making reference instead to the statement by the United States yesterday in the Committee.

ATOMIC RADIATION

Denmark, Iceland, Norway and Sweden have now agreed to join as co-sponsors of the draft resolution. After a meeting with the Scandinavian Delegations yesterday none of them was able to agree on the spot to co-sponsor but they were all clearly impressed by the amendment inserted along the lines of Dr. Cipriani's suggestion as well as by a statement by Wadsworth at this meeting that the Committee was not precluded from announcing "conclusions" provided that material submitted to it clearly warranted such conclusions. Some of the Scandinavian Delegations have also intimated to us that they were influenced, too, in their decision to become co-sponsors by the Canadian statement on the nature and scope of the Committee's activities as well as by a section in Sir Pierson Dixon's statement in the Committee on the continuing long-term nature of the Committee's study.

2. The Indian Delegation today tabled a long list of amendments to the draft resolution. Since the United States had already accepted a considerable number of amendments suggested some time ago by Bhabha and had again yesterday agreed to some further Indian amendments, they are understandably unenthusiastic about a third set of Indian amendments, although in fact many, but not all, of the amendments tabled today are the same as ones suggested yesterday and not accepted by the United States.

3. The most important of these Indian amendments (as indicated in paragraph 2 of our telegram under reference) are intended to permit participation of Communist China as a supplier of information to the Committee and as a recipient of the report produced by the Committee. A similar proposal has been made by the Soviet Delegation.

4. The resolution which has been adopted on the peaceful uses of atomic energy makes similar provision for participation of all States members of the United Nations or of the Specialized Agencies both in further technical atomic energy conferences and in the proposed conference on the final text of the statute of the International Atomic Energy Agency. The Soviet Delegation moved formal amendments which would have brought into participation "all States". While the two problems are not entirely comparable it is relevant that the Canadian Delegation, along with all the sponsors of the resolution on the Peaceful Uses of Atomic Energy, voted against these Soviet amendments. A number of countries which recognize Communist China abstained and some supported to Soviet Bloc.

5. It is no doubt easier to argue that a government whose representatives are not seated in the United Nations should be precluded from participation in conferences organized under the auspices of the United Nations than it is to argue that such a government should not be allowed to submit information to a Committee set up by the United Nations. If the Peking authorities had useful information to offer it would seem foolish to deny the Committee the opportunity to receive it. On the other hand, there is no doubt that it is impossible for the United States Delegation to accept an amendment designed to allow Communist Chinese participation. It is arguable that the question of Chinese representation must be settled directly at some fairly early date but that until then it is pointless to try to bring the Peking régime in by the back door in arranging subsidiary committees and conferences of this sort. We have voted to postpone consideration of the question of Chinese representation,<sup>64</sup> we have already voted against a similar amendment to the earlier atomic resolution, and I think that we can do the same with respect to the present resolution.

6. It is always possible for us to argue, if we are pressed, that the present wording of the resolution "States members of the United Nations or members of the Specialized Agencies" does not exclude mainland China since China is a member of the United Nations. The question which régime should represent China in United Nations activities is a separate problem.

7. We should appreciate your early comments on this point. The text of the draft resolution in its present form as tabled and the text of the Indian amendments follow in separate telegrams.

ATOMIC RADIATION

Following is the text of the draft resolution submitted by Australia, Canada, Denmark, Iceland, Norway, Sweden, United Kingdom and United States. Text begins:

The General Assembly,

Recognizing the importance of and the widespread attention being given to problems relating to the effects of ionizing radiation upon man and his environment,

Believing that the widest distribution should be given to all available scientific data on the short-term and long-term effects upon man and his environment of ionizing radiation, including radiation levels and radioactive "fallout",

Noting that studies of this problem are being conducted in various countries,

Believing that the peoples of the world should be more fully informed on this subject,

Establishes a Scientific Committee consisting of Australia, Brazil, Canada, Czechoslovakia, France, India, Japan, Sweden, the United Kingdom, the United States, and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics and requests these governments each to designate one scientist to represent them on this committee,

Requests this Committee:

(a) To receive and assemble in an appropriate and useful form the following radiological information furnished by States members of the United Nations or members of the Specialized Agencies: (1) reports on observed levels of ionizing radiation and radioactivity in the environment, and (2) reports on scientific observations and experiments relevant to the effects of ionizing radiation upon man and his environment already underway or later undertaken by national scientific bodies or by authorities of national governments;

(b) To recommend uniform standards with respect to procedures for sample collection and instrumentation, and radiation counting procedures to be used in analyses of samples;

(c) To compile and assemble in an integrated manner the various reports, referred to in (a)(1), on observed radiological levels;

(d) To review and collate national reports, referred to in (a)(2), evaluating each report to determine its usefulness for the purposes of the Committee;

(e) To make yearly progress reports if appropriate and to develop by 1 July 1958, or earlier, if the assembled facts warrant, a summary of the reports received on radiation levels and radiation effects on man and his environment together with the evaluations provided for in sub-paragraph (d) above and indications of research projects which might require further study;

(f) To transmit from time to time as it deems appropriate the documents and evaluations referred to above to the Secretary-General for publication and dissemination to States members of the United Nations or members of the Specialized Agencies.

Requests the Secretary-General to provide appropriate assistance to the Scientific Committee in organizing and carrying on its work, and to provide a Secretary of the Committee,

Calls upon all States members of the United Nations or members of the Specialized Agencies to co-operate in making available reports and studies relating to the short-term and long-term effects of ionizing radiation upon man and his environment and radiological data collected by them,

Requests the Specialized Agencies to concert with the committee concerning any work they may be doing or contemplating within the sphere of the Committee's terms of reference to assure proper co-ordination,

Requests the Secretary-General to invite the Japanese Government to nominate a scientific representative to the Committee. Text ends.

EFFECTS OF ATOMIC RADIATION

We have had meetings with the U.S., U.K. and Scandinavian Delegations to discuss the Indian and Soviet amendments to our draft resolution.

2. All Delegations agreed that "Scientific Committee" is a better designation than "Special Technical Committee" mainly on the grounds that it will be easier to attract first-rate people to the Committee if it is clearly and unequivocally a scientific group.

3. Regarding the second Indian amendment to paragraph 1, apparently designed to enlarge the Committee, the representative of Argentina today made a strong plea for the presence of a Spanish-speaking country. Since the continent of Africa is not represented on the Committee, there may also be strong pressure from the Afro-Asian group to include Egypt. If a Spanish-speaking Latin-American country must be added, the U.S. and the U.K. are inclined to agree that Mexico would be the best candidate although, so far as anyone knows, there is no Mexican scientist of international repute in this field. The same comment applies even more forcefully to Egypt. Nevertheless, a concerted Latin-American Afro-Asian move, supported by the Soviet Bloc, to add these two countries could not be defeated. On the Soviet proposal to add Rumania and Communist China to the Committee, there is no serious difficulty since Asia and Eastern Europe are already well represented.

4. On the third Indian amendment, all the sponsors are inclined to feel that it will be more satisfactory if each country nominates one regular or principal representative to serve on the Committee but it is recognized that there can be alternates and advisers. Indeed, the Danish representative mentioned in the Committee (and the Swedish representative confirmed this privately) that the Scandinavian country which is a member of the Committee would draw on scientists from other Scandinavian countries in choosing alternates and advisers. The U.S. Delegation does not seem to be alarmed at this and regards it as unlikely that the Chinese would want to serve in a similar way with the Soviet Delegation.

5. The first Indian amendment to operative paragraph 2 on the role of the Secretary-General has now been met in effect by a paper distributed by the Secretary-General in which he interprets his role, quite broadly, under the present draft resolution. This paper has been forwarded by bag.<sup>65</sup>

6. The Indian amendment designed to allow the Committee to receive information from any country or area and to have the reports sent to all countries presents more difficulty to the Scandinavian Delegations. The Norwegian Delegation will vote in favour of at least one of the Indian amendments on this point and some of the others may do likewise. None of them will vote against these amendments. In accordance with the suggestions in paragraphs 3, 4, 5 and 6 of our telegram under reference, we would propose to include in a further brief statement in the Committee something along the following lines: "I do not feel that it is appropriate to try to settle major political problems regarding representation in the United Nations in the context of this Scientific Committee; but I do feel strongly that information of any significance, whatever its origins and whatever the geographical area to which it relates, should be able to find its way to the Committee by one of the various available channels". Material relating to mainland China could, in fact, be submitted through some member of the United Nations or might even be sent to the Secretary-General with a request that it be forwarded to the Committee. We have discussed this point with the U.S. Delegation and they think it will be useful for us to say something along these lines.

7. A number of the remaining Indian amendments are calculated to make the Committee's task less precisely defined and Menon has even suggested that it might be concerned with economic and social consequences of atomic radiation. All of the group of sponsors were firmly of the opinion that nothing should be done to dilute and diffuse the Committee's primary responsibility relating to the effect of small additions to the radiation background on the human race. All sponsors will therefore oppose the Indian amendments in this category.

8. The same arguments apply with greater force to the Soviet amendment adding the problem of protection from the effects of radiation as well as the question of treatment of illnesses resulting from radiation to the Committee's scope. The first two Soviet amendments relate to prohibition of weapons and of test explosions and all sponsors agreed that these amendments could be opposed on the grounds that they touch on subject matter appropriate to the item on disarmament rather than to the item on atomic radiation. There is the further argument that fallout from atomic bombs is by no means the only source of increase in radiation background. Whether bomb trials are stopped or not, the increasing radiation background is a problem which remains with us in development of peaceful uses of atomic energy.

ATOMIC RADIATION

We agree with the course suggested in your telegram No. 216. We should be ready however to go along with the United States should they ultimately come around to accept the Indian amendment, which, as you suggest, is less significant than the corresponding amendment to the 18 Power Resolution on Atomic Energy.

2. The Americans have already gone a long way towards meeting the Indians in this matter and it is fair to say that the West has gone out of its way to meet the Indian point of view during atomic energy discussions. We do not consider that we should outdo ourselves again in this case to meet the Indians.

3. From a scientific point of view the sponsoring countries are on safe grounds since States members of the United Nations and all Specialized Agencies cover between themselves just about the whole surface of the earth outside continental China.

4. We are inclined to agree with the other Indian amendments. (Although your telegram 216 is not clear on this point, we assume from your message No. 210 that the Americans are agreeable to these amendments.) We assume that there are precedents for the Indian amendment relating to operative paragraph 6 since its adoption might otherwise give the impression that the Secretary General will be Chairman of the Committee or have more to say in this matter than the sponsoring countries want him to. We have not yet received the views of the Department of Health and Welfare on the Indian amendments. We shall communicate with you as soon as these are received.

EFFECTS OF ATOMIC RADIATION

The move to enlarge the Scientific Committee has now taken the form of an amendment proposed by the 20 Latin American States which would have the effect of adding to the Committee Argentina, Belgium, Egypt and Mexico. The United States and United Kingdom Delegations have announced in the Committee that they cannot support this amendment because such an enlargement of the Committee they feel will reduce its effectiveness. On the vote these two Delegations will probably abstain. The four Scandinavian Delegations have told us that they will vote against the amendment in order to be consistent with their vote against the proposed Soviet amendment which would add Communist China and Roumania to the group. In fact, the amendment will almost certainly be adopted. It has twenty favourable votes to begin with and there will be a number of Afro-Asian votes supporting Egypt. The Soviet Bloc will certainly not vote against and may vote in favour. The Belgians have told us that they would like to be on the Committee. They would have preferred a smaller Committee of Scientists, but now that it was being enlarged for political reasons they saw no reason why they should not be included. They have a scientist in Belgium who, they are sure, would make a considerable contribution. Nevertheless, I would suggest that the Canadian Delegation might state in the further statement to be made in the Committee on Monday by Mr. Martin that we cannot support this amendment because of our concern that the Committee be of an effective size to carry on its work. In the vote on the amendment I would suggest that we should abstain.

2. The general debate on this item ended today and the debate on resolutions and amendments began. It is expected that the item will be concluded on Monday.<sup>66</sup>

DISARMAMENT

You will see from telegram No. 209 of February 16† from London (copy attached) that Mr. Nutting has asked for our views on the United Kingdom suggestions concerning tactics during the Disarmament Sub-Committee talks which will begin in London on Friday of this week. The United Kingdom suggestions are in line with our views as embodied in a memorandum for the guidance of the Canadian Delegation (copy attached).

The memorandum suggests that the main purpose of the London meetings should be to ascertain the exact significance of the Soviet proposals submitted by Mr. Vyshinsky at the last session of the Assembly which contain a number of apparent concessions.<sup>68</sup> The memorandum then reviews the main points of disagreement between the Western powers and the Soviet Union, namely, the veto problem (page 1), atomic energy control (page 2), the problem of stages (page 3) and inspection (page 5). The main conclusion reached is that Western Delegations should make a special effort to lay bare the position of the Soviet Government on the problem of inspection which is at the root of the disarmament problem. This, as you know, is precisely the field where the Soviet Union is most vulnerable.

The memorandum conveys our views on the Indian proposals. After consultation with the military and scientific authorities, we have come to the conclusion that a freeze on present military levels, pending agreement on an international convention, is unacceptable since we have no way of verifying whether the USSR would implement this suggestion (page 6). Mr. Nehru's suggestion for a ban on test explosions of nuclear weapons is equally unacceptable for the reasons indicated on pages 7 and 8 of the memorandum. There is no objection to Mr. Nehru's suggestion for more publicity (page 8).

The Delegation is told that while we agree with the generally accepted view that disarmament can hardly take place before some, at least, of the major issues between the East and the West are resolved, we consider that the present armaments race is in itself a source of tension and, consequently, that the West should explore every possibility of reaching agreement (page 9). Finally, it is important that the efforts of Western Delegations to clarify the Soviet position should not lead to a purely negative attitude on their part. The Anglo-French proposals might be supplemented, if need be, in order to keep the initiative which the West gained last spring.<sup>69</sup> The United Kingdom already suggested a revision of the French-United Kingdom-United States paper on the question of ceilings for armed forces which was tabled in the Disarmament Commission (Annex A and B of London telegram).<sup>70</sup> The new proposals have been approved by our Armed Services.

I should appreciate knowing whether you agree with the line taken in the attached memorandum which has been approved by the Interdepartmental Working Party on Disarmament consisting, as you know, of representatives from the three Services, the Atomic Energy Control Board, the Defence Research Board, and the Department. Should you express your concurrence, it is our intention to send the memorandum immediately to the Canadian Delegation, subject to the approval of the Chiefs of Staff, as agreed with the Service members of the Working Party. We shall indicate to London by telegram our agreement with the suggestion made by Mr. Nutting and at the same time outline our own position.

We doubt whether the attached memorandum requires Cabinet approval. In view of the general interest in the problem of disarmament, however, you may wish to inform Cabinet of the action taken in this matter after we have received the comments of the Chiefs of Staff. These should be forthcoming within the next day or two.<sup>71</sup> proper interpretation to be placed on present Soviet Disarmament policy. In this connection the Canadian Delegation should note the views expressed in the JIC paper (Annex 1, Appendix E).<sup>72</sup>

In the past the main points of disagreement between the Western powers and the Communist bloc on the problem of disarmament, including the control of atomic energy, were as follows:

The Veto Problem

(1) The West has considered that in order to achieve a truly effective disarmament programme the permanent members of the Security Council should abandon their right of veto in decisions relating to this programme. This requirement is spelled out in the United Nations Plan for the International Control of Atomic Energy which,<sup>73</sup> under the terms of reference of the Disarmament Commission, should serve as a basis for international control "unless a better or no less effective system is devised". Although the Soviet Union has recognized that the operation of the International Control Authority itself should not be subject to the veto, there has been no indication as yet that the Soviet Government is ready to relinquish its veto in connection with the Security Council decisions on recommendations of the Control Authority. The fact that the Soviet proposals inevitably called in the past for the establishments of the control organ "under the Security Council" has been interpreted by the West as meaning that the Soviet Union wanted to retain its right of veto. The Soviet proposals submitted at the 9th session provide for the establishment, in the first phase, of a temporary International Control Commission under the Security Council. There is no mention of the Security Council, however, in connection with the standing International Control Organ to be established in the second phase. In recent years it has been recognized in many quarters that insistence on the relinquishment of the right of veto by the permanent members of the Security Council would not have any real significance in practice from the Western point of view since a serious violation of the Disarmament convention by a major power and the subsequent exercise of the veto would bring about the breakdown of the disarmament programme, or alternatively, an attempt at enforcement action would lead to war. There is no doubt, however, that the West can derive a propaganda advantage from its position in this matter and the background paper prepared by the Western powers at the end of the London talks last spring duly made this point. It would, therefore, be useful to ascertain what the present position of the Soviet Union is on this question.

Ownership vs Managerial Supervision

(2) Under the United Nations Plan for the International Control of Atomic Energy, the Control Organ should own all atomic raw materials from the moment they are removed from the ground and at the same time own, operate and manage basic atomic energy installations. The Soviet Union has consistently refused to accept this feature of the United Nations plan and argued that inspection alone would suffice to achieve effective international control. For some time now the French have held the view that ownership was not essential for effective control and the Western powers suggested in the Sub-Committee last spring, either explicitly or implicitly, that one way out of the impasse would be something akin to managerial supervision. This suggestion could usefully be made again in order to underline the co-operative attitude of the West. The new Soviet proposals are silent on this point. Unless there are indications that the Soviet Government is now ready to consider some measure of management of its atomic installations in addition to straight inspection, which is inadequate, the unco-operative Soviet attitude should be contrasted with the positive stand taken by the Western powers, provided, of course, they are explicitly unanimous on this point. It would appear, however, that a firm position on this particular aspect by the Western powers should await detailed consideration of supervision and management as a method of control with a view to ascertaining its effectiveness. A technical appreciation of the problem of nuclear weapon control as it now stands is contained in Annex 2.† This paper confirms what is now openly admitted, namely, that even if an effective international control system including adequate inspection were established in 1955, this system could only be effective insofar as future activities are concerned. There is at present no adequate means of preventing nations from concealing an appreciable number of nuclear weapons from existing stockpiles. The existence of these stockpiles fundamentally affects the prospect for atomic energy control to ensure its use for peaceful purposes only and suggests that attention should now be paid to problems raised by past as well as future production in the nuclear field.

The Problem of Phasing

(3) The West has always insisted that the prohibition of nuclear weapons and the reduction of armed forces and conventional armaments should only begin after the establishment and positioning of the control organ. The Soviet Union has held the view that total prohibition and control should take place "simultaneously". Repeated questioning has revealed that the Soviet position is that the organ should be established on paper and that from that very moment complete and unconditional prohibition of nuclear weapons, including the elimination of stockpiles, would become effective. The best interpretation placed by the Soviet representatives on their position was that prohibition would be immediately proclaimed in principle but that it would become effective only when international control came into effect. There would thus be an indeterminate period during which nuclear weapons would be prohibited without any international control to ensure the implementation of the disarmament programme. The Soviet representatives have up to now failed to furnish a satisfactory explanation of their position on this point and Mr. Vyshinsky failed once again to answer the question raised by the Canadian representative in this connection at the 9th session.

The Soviet Union, however, can claim to have made a substantial concession to the West in their new proposals by accepting the concept of stages. They can also claim that their proposals are more favourable to the West than the Anglo-French proposals, since under the former the first half agreed reductions in armed forces and armaments does not call automatically for the cessation of the manufacture of nuclear weapons. Most of all they can argue that signatories to the Disarmament Convention should be placed on an equal level and that there is no good reason why countries having a preponderance in the field of nuclear weapons should execute their obligations after countries with larger armed forces and conventional armaments have executed theirs. During the 9th session Mr. Vyshinsky enquired from the United Kingdom representative whether the Western powers would "agree that the commencement of measures for the reduction of conventional armaments and the prohibition of atomic weapons should coincide in time with the entry into operation of the permanent control body?" The Western powers might find themselves in a somewhat vulnerable position if the USSR succeeded in convincing the man in the street that the expression "entry into operation" should be regarded as having the same meaning as the word "positioning" used in the Anglo-French proposals. This underlines the importance for the West to lay bare the position of the Soviet Union on the problem of inspection.

Inspection

(4) The most important point of disarmament between the East and the West relates to the powers of inspection of the international control organ. The Western powers hold the view that the international organ should have unlimited powers of inspection "at any place, at any time" including the right to conduct aerial surveys. After having advocated "periodic" rights of inspection for the international organ, the Soviet Union came round to the view that the organ should be authorized to carry out inspection on a continuing basis without interfering however, in the "domestic affairs" of states. The Soviet representatives also indicated on various occasions that inspection could only be carried out at places which the Soviet Government regards as being covered by the Disarmament Convention. Inspection in other places could only take place in cases where there were suspicions that the convention was being violated.

The problem of inspection is at the root of the disarmament question and one in which the free world cannot afford to make substantial concessions. It so happens that this is the field where the Soviet Union is most vulnerable. The attention of the Canadian Delegation is drawn to the opinion expressed in paragraph 6 in Annex 1, Appendix E (Part I)† that effective international inspection is inherently repugnant to the Soviet system and that this assumption is underlying the thinking of present Soviet leaders. The latest Soviet proposals did not repeat the reservation of non-interference in domestic affairs and merely mentioned inspection on a continuing basis "to the extent necessary to ensure implementation of the convention by all states". It is hardly likely that the Soviet position on this vital problem has undergone any fundamental change. The West should make a special effort with a view to underlining to the world at large the basic defect of the Soviet position on this score and by the same token placing the latest Soviet proposals in their proper light. In particular, Western delegations should endeavour to bring into the open Soviet intentions on the powers of the temporary control commission envisaged in the first phase of the Soviet proposals.

Indian Proposals

At the 9th session the General Assembly referred to the Disarmament Commission the Indian draft resolution (Annex 3, Appendix F)†<sup>74</sup> which suggests that progress towards a Disarmament Convention would be materially advanced by a freezing of the level of armed forces and armaments, pending agreement on a convention. The draft resolution specifically recommends "the study of ways and means of establishing 'an armament truce' pending such an agreement". The Indian Government should be commended for endeavouring to end the present armaments race and all that it entails. However, it is difficult to see how the West could withdraw from that race until it is reasonably certain that Soviet participants have also abandoned the race. The only means of securing satisfactory evidence in this connection is the establishment of an effective system of control and inspection. In the last analysis, the question of an armament truce forms an integral part of the disarmament problem. In the present context of international relations the Indian proposal cannot be regarded as practicable. An armament truce would, moreover, make it more difficult for Western governments to insist on the rearmament of Western Germany to which they are politically committed (see Annex 3, paragraph 12).†

In a statement in the Indian parliament on April 2, 1954, Mr. Nehru made the following suggestions:

“(1) Some sort of, what may be called, “Standstill Agreement” in respect, at least, of these actual explosions, even if arrangements about the discontinuance of production and stockpiling, must await more substantial agreements amongst those principally concerned.

“(2) Full publicity by those principally concerned in the production of these weapons and by the United Nations, of the extent of the destructive power and the known effects of these weapons and also adequate indication of the extent of the unknown but probable effects. Informed world public opinion is in our view the most effective factor in bringing about the results we desire.

“(3) Immediate (and continuing) private meetings of the sub-committees of the Disarmament Commission to consider the “Standstill” proposal, which I have just mentioned, pending decisions on prohibitions and controls etc., to which the Disarmament Commission is asked by the General Assembly to address itself.

“(4) Active steps by States and peoples of the world, who though not directly concerned with the production of these weapons, are very much concerned by the possible use of them, also at present, by these experiments and their effects. They would, I venture to hope, express their concern and add their voices and influences, in as effective a manner as possible to arrest the progress of this destructive potential which menaces all alike.”

A few days later the Government of India requested that these suggestions be placed before the Disarmament Commission and its Sub-Committee. The Nehru proposals, however, have not yet been considered in the Sub-Committee or the Disarmament Commission nor was there any discussion of these proposals in the General Assembly at the 9th Session. On November 19, 1954, the Indian Government again asked that these proposals be taken into consideration by the Disarmament Commission.

With regard to the proposal of a ban on nuclear test explosions, the Delegation will note the views expressed in Annexes 4 and 5 (JIC papers 129 and 130 (55)).† It would appear that the immediate danger to human life resulting from test explosions is limited to the area surrounding the testing grounds, although in the case of larger weapons these areas are admittedly relatively large. Moreover, the significance of test explosions in relation to the maximum number of nuclear explosions permissible is negligible. From a military point of view continuance of tests would provide the best means of following the Soviet development of nuclear weapons. Canada's close association with the United States and the United Kingdom in the basic Western defence programme, which relies on the use of nuclear weapons, makes it difficult for us to support the suggestion of a ban on test explosions if it is considered that these tests are essential to the proper development of the defence programme. The United States recently confirmed its opposition to the proposed ban on tests. At the recent Commonwealth Prime Ministers' Conference, Mr. Nehru repeated his suggestion for a ban on tests which he said lent itself to “scientific” as opposed to “conventional” methods of control since it was possible for scientists to detect thermo-nuclear tests. In his reply, Sir Anthony Eden remarked that scientific checks were not wholly reliable and that the best course seemed to support what he called the French disarmament proposals.<sup>75</sup> The United States Atomic Energy Commission Report of February 15, 1955, implicitly rejects the suggestion of a ban on nuclear test explosions.

There seems to be no objection to the Indian suggestion that there should be more publicity about the effects of nuclear weapons and a good deal of information on this subject has been released in the United States and the USSR since Mr. Nehru made his original suggestion (see in particular United States Atomic Energy Commission Report). It should be noted, however, that last September the United States expressed its firm opposition to the Nehru proposal as such which calls for "full publicity". At the Commonwealth Prime Ministers' Conference Sir Winston Churchill expressed the opinion that the essential facts about the destructive force of thermo-nuclear weapons should certainly be made known to the world. The report of the United States Atomic Energy Commission should be regarded as a noteworthy contribution to the task of educating public opinion.

Conclusions

At a recent Commonwealth Prime Ministers' Conference Lord Salisbury repeated the generally accepted thesis that the armaments race is the effect rather than the original cause of international tension and that nations can hardly be expected to disarm until some, at least, of the major issues remaining between the East and the West are resolved. This view was held by the United Kingdom and the United States during the abortive talks at the Palais Rose in 1951. General Eisenhower's speech of April 16, 1953,<sup>76</sup> also proceeded on the same assumption and the United Kingdom proposals on levels of armed forces presuppose not only agreement of the Austrian and German questions, but also the settlement of the Korean and Formosa issues and China's admission to the United Nations. There is no doubt, however, that once it has set in, an armaments race is itself a source of international tension. Any progress, therefore, towards the limitation of armaments would contribute to a lessening of this tension, and the Western Delegations should explore every possibility of reaching agreement with the Soviet Union. This is not to say that the Western powers should cater to a false sense of security. There is no doubt that the next logical step for the West is to ascertain in an unmistakable manner the true significance of the Soviet proposals submitted at the 9th session and the present intentions of the Soviet Government, bearing in mind the developments in Moscow of February 8 and their aftermath.<sup>77</sup> In this exercise the Western Delegations should avoid giving the appearance of adopting a purely negative attitude and thereby losing the initiative which they gained last spring.

The Anglo-French proposals might usefully be supplemented by addenda concerning the reduction and composition of armed forces and the type and volume of armaments for these forces which were the subject of a tri-partite working paper in 1952. Other fields in which further action might conveniently be taken are (1) the disclosure of information which is touched upon in the Soviet proposals and on which the Anglo-French plan is silent and (2) the International Control Organ. Both fields were the subject of somewhat detailed papers submitted by the United States in the Disarmament Commission and the Sub-Committee.

Whatever decisions are reached on the Indian proposals, the action taken by the Sub-Committee in this connection should be such as to satisfy the Indian Government that its proposals were given careful consideration.

The existence of stockpiles of nuclear weapons, over which scientific control is impossible, adds further importance to international inspection as the only means of controlling armaments, e.g., carriers and guided missiles, without which nuclear warfare cannot be effectively carried out. Attention is drawn to the conclusions outlined in Annex I, Appendix D,† and in particular to the view that an alert inspection team would probably prevent the production of major naval units, aircraft and heavy items of land armaments in secret.

DISARMAMENT TALKS IN LONDON
FEBRUARY 25-MAY 18

The discussions of the Disarmament Sub-Committee in London may have brought about a substantial narrowing of the gap between the Western and Soviet positions. This is all the more remarkable in view of the negative attitude adopted by the Soviet Union at the outset.

gen weapons ... should destroy completely all those weapons in their possession". Conventional armaments and armed forces under these proposals were to be left as they were and as per usual the question of international control would be discussed after the decision to destroy nuclear weapons. These proposals were of course completely unacceptable to the Western Powers since they would nullify the United States lead in the nuclear field while the Communist powers would retain preponderance in conventional armaments and armed forces.

3. The Soviet Government tried to gain propaganda advantages from these proposals by releasing them to the press in spite of the confidential character of the talks. When the Western representatives decided to let the record speak for itself and made ready to abandon the talks the Soviet Union found itself in a vulnerable position and reverted for all practical purposes to the Vyshinsky proposals presented at the ninth session. Although it did not call for the immediate destruction of stockpiles and even represented some improvement on the Vyshinsky proposals, the new Soviet plan fell a good deal short of the Western proposals on the vital issue of control.

4. In the meantime the Anglo-French proposals had been reintroduced in the Sub-Committee in the form of a resolution which was sponsored this time by all four Western members of the Sub-Committee. The adoption of a more co-operative attitude on the part of the Soviet Delegation during this second stage of the London talks permitted some useful exchanges between the Soviet and Western representatives. This happy development, however, was marred by the publication in Pravda (March 24) of a distorted account of the Sub-Committee proceedings followed on the same day by a more detailed distorted story given to the Tass correspondent in London by the Soviet representative on the Sub-Committee.

5. During the third stage, the Western powers attempted to answer the most serious Soviet objections to the Western proposals i.e.:

(1) The failure to specify precise time limits for each stage of the disarmament programme and for the programme as a whole;

(2) The postponement of total prohibition of nuclear weapons until all agreed reductions in conventional armaments and armed forces have been completed on an uncertain date.

6. To meet the first objection, the Western Delegations accepted the principle of precise time limits being embodied in the disarmament treaty "subject to any extension of time which may be essential in any phase to permit states to complete these measures". In addition, the United Kingdom and French delegations expressed the view that the entire disarmament programme might be completed in about three years. (The United States delegation was not very happy about this commitment and privately express the view that it would take at least one or two years longer.)

7. As to the second objection, the French and the United Kingdom delegations proposed what is probably the most important modification in the Western position since the tabling of the Anglo-French memorandum in June 1954. They proposed that instead of becoming effective only after the completion of all agreed reductions in armed forces and conventional armaments, the prohibition of the use of nuclear weapons should go into force upon the completion of the third quarter (i.e. 75%) of these reductions. Simultaneously, the elimination of stockpiles and the last quarter of agreed reductions would begin and both processes would be completed within the time limit laid down in the Disarmament Treaty. This considerable concession was made contingent upon agreement being reached with the Soviet Union on two essential points, i.e.,

(1) "Drastic reductions of the armed forces and conventional armaments of the Great Powers" and

(2) "The institution of an effective system of control which would operate throughout the whole disarmament programme".

8. On the first point the United Kingdom and the French Delegations submitted proposals whereby the forces of the United States, the U.S.S.R. and China would be reduced to between 1 and 1 1/2 million men, while those of the United Kingdom and France would be reduced to 650,000 men.<sup>80</sup> On the second point the four Western members, on the initiative of the United States Delegation, tabled a draft resolution outlining in some detail what they mean by effective international control.<sup>81</sup>

9. The London talks entered in their last phase following an interruption caused by the "illness" of the Soviet representative. After a number of frustrating exchanges during which the Soviet Representative ignored the Western representatives' concrete answers to the objections raised against their proposals, the Soviet Union tabled a twenty-two page document dealing with disarmament and "the elimination of the threat of a new war".<sup>82</sup> These proposals insist on a rigid timetable whereby the whole disarmament programme would not only be negotiated but fully implemented by the end of 1957. The Soviet Government thus refused to accept the Western compromise on one of its two major objections to Western plans. The new Soviet proposals, however, embodied the Anglo-French compromise on phasing which had been presented to meet the other Soviet objection. They also included the United Kingdom and French proposals on the level of armed forces which was one of the conditions attached to their compromise on phasing. These concessions as such are undoubtedly of a major character.

10. The Soviet position on the second Anglo-French condition on an effective system of control is not clear. There is no specific indication that the Soviet Union is ready to accept the Western proposal that the officials of the control organ should be enabled to carry out inspection anywhere at any time in the territories of states. Nor is there any clear indication that the Soviet Government agrees that a control organ should be established and its officials installed in national territories before the implementation of the disarmament measures which they should supervise. The new Soviet paper, nevertheless, represents some advance towards the Western position of control. For instance, the U.S.S.R. now agrees with our view that there should be one permanent control organ which would have wide powers throughout the disarmament programme.

11. The new Soviet paper also agrees with the Western suggestion that states should pledge themselves not to use nuclear weapons "except in defence against aggression". The Soviet acceptance, however, is qualified by the provision that the exceptional use of these weapons should only be permitted "when a decision to this effect is taken by the Security Council" where the U.S.S.R. has a right of veto.

12. Against these concessions the new Soviet plan contains a number of features which did not appear in the Vyshinsky proposals of last September or in the new version of these proposals tabled at the second stage of the recent discussions. Most of these features were actually present in various proposals put forward in the past during discussions on disarmament proper or on "the reduction of international tension". They call for the dismantling of all military bases in foreign territories (by 1957), the immediate withdrawal of occupation troops from Germany followed by the formation of "strictly limited contingents of local police forces", the condemnation of war propaganda, the removal of every form of discrimination in the field of trade, etc.

13. It is clear that the new proposals were submitted partly for propaganda purposes and in particular with an eye to the German problem. This is borne out by the fact that they were made public shortly after their presentation in the sub-committee in spite of requests by the Western members that the proposals should not be released, at least not until they had had an opportunity to study them. The question now arises whether the concessions made by the Soviet Union on the problem of disarmament, which are indeed impressive by any standards, are conditional upon the acceptance by the West of the suggestions on other issues contained in the proposals and in particular on the neutralization of Germany. If this were to be the case, the value of the recent Soviet concessions would be reduced considerably.

PRESIDENT EISENHOWER'S NEW DISARMAMENT PROPOSALS<sup>83</sup>

As you may have seen in the newspapers, President Eisenhower, in a surprise move suggested that the United States and Russia should "give each other a complete blueprint of our military establishments, from beginning to end, from one end of our countries to the other." Furthermore, the scheme would call for the exchange of facilities for aerial photography. "Next to provide within our countries facilities for aerial photography to the other country — we to provide you the facilities within our country, ample facilities for aerial reconnaissance, when you can make all the pictures you choose and take them to your own country to study, you to provide exactly the same facilities for us and to make these examinations, and by this step to convince the world that we are providing as between ourselves against the possibility of great surprise attack thus lessening danger and relaxing tension."

Following the conclusion of the London meetings of the sub-committee, disarmament discussions shifted to Geneva where the heads of government of the United States, the USSR, the United Kingdom and France met in July. Eisenhower's speech at the Geneva Conference was devoted to the problem of establishing an inspection and reporting system to support a disarmament agreement. See Documents on Disarmament 1945-1959, pp. 486-488. For a Canadian assessment of these talks, see Document 201.

2. These proposals of President Eisenhower would represent only a first step but in the right direction. They are based on the assumption that full control as envisaged in the United Nations atomic energy control plan is no longer feasible and they are along lines which go beyond but are broadly similar to the inspection scheme embodied in the Maliki proposals. While Bulganin's first reaction has been to suggest that there should be no more nuclear weapon tests, he has not yet given any indication of Soviet views as to the substance of the proposals.

3. The great advantage of President Eisenhower's proposals (even if they have been made on the assumption that the Russians will not accept them), is that they draw attention to the essence of the problem of inspection and warnings and short of the full control which may be unobtainable they may open the way for the further useful round of discussion in the Sub-Committee.

4. It is clear that even if the Russians were to accept the proposals other steps would have to be taken before confidence could be established and a serious reduction in armaments could be undertaken. The problem of new weapons such as the I.B.M. will have to be studied carefully; it is doubtful whether aerial photography could provide adequate warning against preparations to use such weapons, but the President's proposals would certainly achieve more effectively the kind of controls the Russians have indicated they might accept. As required, further arrangements could be envisaged in step with weapons development.

5. Another advantage of the proposals under consideration is that they isolate, in a sense, the technical from the political aspects of disarmament. It remains to be seen whether the Russians will insist on linking any discussion on this subject with the question of bases and the withdrawal of occupation forces from Germany. In another sense, however, willingness to discuss these proposals on their own will provide a significant indication as to Russian intentions and their willingness effectively to reduce tension. If the Russians persist in a propaganda approach to the whole issue, a useful point will have been established.

6. It is assumed that the Eisenhower proposals will now be discussed in the Sub-Committee: the objective will be to determine:

(a) Whether the Russians are prepared to discuss these new proposals on their merit;
(b) How these proposals should be related to the Western proposals as they now stand. No doubt, inspection is a mere beginning. A disarmament treaty will still be needed; forces will have to be reduced and the whole plan for banning the use of atomic weapons and eliminating them remains valid.

(c) Whether if they accept the proposals under advisement, the Russians will be prepared to make gradual advances to provide adequate assurances to all concerned as present or new weapons are being developed.

6. In short, if the Russians will co-operate, the Eisenhower new proposals offer most interesting scope for progress without sacrificing Western basic principles and interests; they provide an opportunity for testing Soviet intentions in an approach which seems to be compatible with recent Soviet suggestions. Irrespective of their other merits, the proposals in question have obvious propaganda value for the West.

[7.] I think we should bear in mind that any such scheme, if generally acceptable, will involve Canada directly. We should foresee the day when Canadian skies would have to be open to Soviet inspection planes.<sup>84</sup>

CANADIAN MEMBERSHIP IN THE DISARMAMENT SUB-COMMITTEE

As you suggested we have considered the question of our membership in the sub-committee.

2. There is no doubt that our participation in the discussions in the sub-committee creates problems for us

- (a) we are not really in the same league as the other members;
- (b) as we are not involved in the development of atomic energy for military purposes, we lack experience to make a large contribution to the substantive discussions, particularly on control;
- (c) we do not have in this or in the other departments concerned in Ottawa, the administrative machinery to support as adequately as we might wish our representative in the sub-committee;

(d) now that discussions on disarmament are more directly related to German reunification and European security our participation in the disarmament discussion may imply responsibilities which exceed any commitments we may be willing and able to make.

3. There are however some reasons why we should not withdraw from the sub-committee:

- (a) it would be impossible now for us to leave the sub-committee without some embarrassment;
- (b) our importance in some fields relating to atomic energy warrants our presence;
- (c) our membership underlines our growing importance in world affairs and expresses the Canadian view on the functional approach: that irrespective of their general importance, on certain subjects, some countries may have a special contribution to make (the contribution we can make is certainly greater than that of many other countries);
- (d) within the sub-committee we have been able on occasion to help reconcile U.S. with divergent French-U.K. views;
- (e) it has been possible for us on other occasions to intervene between the Western Powers and the U.S.S.R.;
- (f) our approval of certain Western positions in the sub-committee may not have been without influence in rallying support from NATO and non committed nations;

<sup>84</sup> Léger a ajouté le paragraphe 7 à la main./Léger added paragraph 7 by hand.

(g) in fact, our presence on the sub-committee provides a link between the Big-Four and the United Nations; while this link may be rather tenuous, it serves as a sort of symbol in questions of disarmament and the Big-Four are not left on their own.

4. On balance, I think that a case can be made for our continued membership at this stage. The sub-committee has been given a clear mandate by the General Assembly and by the Big-Four at Geneva: it should complete this task. The next round of discussions in the sub-committee in August may not get very far as it is probable that no one will wish to make important decisions before the Foreign Ministers have made another effort to solve the German and related issues.

5. As already mentioned, one of the difficulties in our participation in the work of the sub-committee is the fact that we do not belong to the same league as the other members. This could naturally be remedied by ways other than our withdrawal; either by an increase in the number of sub-committee members or by referring the question of disarmament to another body. Neither course appears to be as satisfactory as the present one. The first one would, I think, be opposed on the ground that any additional membership would create more problems than it would solve, while the second one is related to the idea of specialized agencies which you have in mind. Our inclination in the Department is to think that such an agency would not perhaps be suitable to promote agreement in this highly specialized field, because membership would be too wide. Such an agency could, however, implement arrangements worked out between Foreign Ministers or even, if feasible, through the Disarmament Commission.

6. If we are to continue as a member of the sub-committee as I think we should, serious consideration will have to be given to the creation of staff and organization capable of continuous and expert study of all aspects of our disarmament policy. This would involve, it might be expected, the establishment of a staff in Ottawa for this purpose involving both External Affairs and National Defence personnel, and it might require also the appointment of either a senior expert adviser or an alternate to the Canadian Permanent Representative in New York, who might not be able to combine the increased amount of work to be expected on disarmament with his other U.N. responsibilities.

DISARMAMENT

When Mr. Nutting spoke to Miss Meagher on Monday about the work of the Sub Committee at its resumed session beginning on August 29 he made the following points:

(a) The United States position on disarmament was now even more cautious than it had been when the Sub Committee recessed in May. There was absolutely no hope of obtaining United States support for the Anglo-French 75 proposal or the proposal on levels of forces.<sup>85</sup> The United States would probably not go so far as to write itself out of the Four Power plan of March 8, but it is in fact no longer interested in pushing it. Nutting's firm conviction, which he passed on for our secret ear, is that present United States policy is opposed to any attempt to secure nuclear disarmament. Whether or not the United States wished to pursue the goal of conventional disarmament, he does not know, but the Russians would certainly not agree to such a one-sided proposition and in any event it does not matter if nuclear war-making potential remains unaffected. This assessment of present United States thinking Nutting based mainly on talks he had with Stassen in Paris. In these talks Stassen emphasized, as he had done with Mr. Heenev, that while as a result of recent studies he had been led to reject certain previously held concepts, he had not yet reached any positive conclusions on how best to attack the problem from here on. (He did, however, make some reference to the possibility of concentrating on means of delivery in any system of international inspection which might be established).

(b) Given the United States position there is now no purpose to be served in trying to re-write the western plan. It is out of date as it stands (having been overtaken by the Soviet proposal),<sup>86</sup> the Anglo-French proposed amendments are in cold storage, the French proposal put forward by Faure at Geneva is a non-starter<sup>87</sup> and the Soviet proposals will certainly not be accepted by the Americans.

(c) In the light of the foregoing, we on the western side must work out some plan of action for consideration in the Sub Committee. Nutting does not yet know what the Americans have in mind except that he is quite sure that they will want to concentrate attention on the control aspect, probably in the limit sense of inspection, reporting and warning systems. Nutting's own idea is that the United Kingdom delegation should table a new paper based on the proposal made by Eden in Geneva for a system of joint inspection of forces in specified areas on either side of the line dividing Eastern and Western Europe.<sup>88</sup> Nutting himself is going on leave in a few days but if the Secretary of State agrees that a paper of this kind should be prepared, he will pass on this task to a committee of officials, including the Vice Chiefs-of-Staff and Pink of the Foreign Office. His idea is that the paper should spell out in some detail provisions on the composition of the inspection teams, the

This refers to Article 2 of the Anglo-French memorandum of April 19, 1955 which states that "the process of eliminating all nuclear stocks should be carried out at the same time as the final quarter of the agreed reductions in armed forces and conventional armaments begins, that is to say, when 75 per cent of those reductions have been completed." areas and the items within those areas to be subject to inspection, the rights of teams in the specified areas, etc.<sup>89</sup>

(d) Nutting referred to a memorandum on disarmament which he was sending to the Secretary of State and he handed over copies of the two annexes to this memorandum. These annexes deal with the subject of control in the context of a universal disarmament agreement and spell out (I) the rights of an international control organ and (II) items subject to control. In the second annex the items listed in group C would be subject to inspection only when the control organ had reasons to suspect a violation of the agreement but they would not be under the supervision of permanent inspection teams as would the items in A and B. (The two annexes are contained in our immediately following telegram†). Nutting seemed to think that papers of this kind might be useful as a basis for an exercise in "groping" with the Russians towards some solution of the control problems and also, in so far as the specific points were applicable, in working out details of a limited European inspection scheme along the lines of the Eden proposal.

(e) Nutting emphasized that what he was saying about possible United Kingdom action in the Sub Committee was little more than his own thinking aloud. He was sold on the idea of using the Eden proposal as a basis for a United Kingdom paper for which he would hope to win United States, French and Canadian support, but he had not cleared this with the Secretary of State, officials had not had an opportunity to study the practical implications of developing such a plan and he had no idea whether the Americans would consider it.

2. The United Kingdom will keep in touch with us here and as soon as any definite ideas emerge, the delegation in New York will be consulting with our delegation. Meanwhile, Nutting said the United Kingdom would be most grateful to learn anything we may know or pick up about United States plans for the work of the Sub Committee.

3. Nutting asked if you would confirm that August 29 is agreeable to you as the date for the re-convening of the Sub Committee. He would be interested to know who will be heading our delegation. We explained that Mr. MacKay was taking over from Mr. Johnson as our permanent representative to the United Nations but we could not say for certain that he would sit for Canada on the Sub Committee. Nutting's present plan is to go to New York four or five days ahead of the opening of the Sub Committee for consultations with the other western delegations.

MEETING OF DISARMAMENT SUB-COMMITTEE

We have no objection to the date of August 29.

2. Our preliminary thinking on the forthcoming meeting of the sub-committee runs along the following lines:

Purposes of meeting: Theoretically the meeting could have three objectives:

- (a) a discussion on substance;
- (b) preparation for the meeting of the Foreign Ministers;
- (c) preparation of the report to the Disarmament Commission.

In general, we are inclined to consider that it is unlikely that there can be great progress in dealing with substantive issues or that considerable headway can be achieved in the preparation for the Foreign Ministers' meeting.

3. It remains to be seen whether the Russians will agree to isolate the disarmament question from the other related issues. If they are not prepared to do so, it is obvious that not much progress will be possible. In any case, even if the Russians were prepared to agree to a discussion on disarmament itself, as a separate issue, it is doubtful whether any hard bargains could be made even on disarmament, before the parties concerned have an idea of how far the other side is prepared to go as regards German unification. The obstacles, therefore, to a substantive discussion stem not only from the Soviet attitude but also from the nature of the subject itself.

4. Such being the case, it seems that it might be more profitable if the meeting were to make an attempt to deal with the more limited Eden proposals for regional disarmament. It might be possible to find out to what extent common ground could be found between the Soviet and Eden proposals. Even, if, as we suspect, not much progress can be achieved, the ground will have been explored and this may be helpful to the Foreign Ministers. To this extent, therefore, the meetings of the sub-committee may serve a useful purpose as regards the second objective.

5. In general, I expect that the sub-committee will really divide its work in two parts: the Western Representatives will elaborate the proposals made in Geneva, give a more detailed explanation of their position, and, as a second part, I foresee that they can explore the Soviet proposals.

6. Tactics: It is very important from our point of view that there should be close consultation between the Western Powers before the meetings of the sub-committee. In Geneva, there was every appearance of lack of co-ordination between the Western Powers. This may have more serious consequences in New York where the discussions will be more detailed.

(b) We should emphasize, in the course of the preliminary discussions, that any attempt to deal with disarmament in terms of propaganda will backfire very badly. We have in mind particularly Mr. Moch's intention to raise again Mr. Faure's proposals which we understand may have been inspired by electoral considerations. Any emphasis in such a scheme will in our view not only create considerable difficulties with the non-committed countries but will also weaken opinion in the NATO countries when the governments responsible will have to make a very delicate decision as to the degree of deterrent forces which should still be retained.

(c) The Western Powers should make every effort in the course of the Sub-Committee meetings to explore the prospects of reaching even limited agreement with the Russians and from this point of view it seems to us that the United Kingdom proposals offer the best prospects.

(d) While it will be desirable to seek clarification from the USSR on some aspects of their proposals, in view of the diverse and novel character of some of the Western proposals, it should not be too difficult for the West to retain the initiative in the course of the next round of discussions.

7. We would want you to be a Canadian representative on the sub-committee unless you see any objection to this course. The sub-committee meetings would provide a good opportunity to acquaint yourself in detail with an important problem at a time when the delegation may not be unduly burdened. Our present plan is to have Mr. Martin also attend the opening meetings as senior representative. Whether he remains after that will depend on the course of the discussion. He would also be available, of course, when he is attending the Assembly if the sub-Committee should continue to meet then.

DISARMAMENT SUB-COMMITTEE

You will have noted from London telegram No. 1140† repeated to you that the preliminary meeting of Western representatives on the sub-committee might take place in Washington instead of New York.

2. As intimated earlier, we attach a good deal of importance to this preliminary meeting. We are wondering whether the meeting could usefully decide on tactics without dealing to some extent with fundamentals in the light of significant developments since the end of the London discussions. With this in mind we agree with the suggestion that the preliminary meeting of Western delegations might take place in Washington since this might facilitate the discussion of substantive matters, with Stassen's experts in the background. We are not suggesting here that the meeting can hope to make a thorough reappraisal of all aspects, but we think an effort will have to be made to consider the main assumptions and the broad objectives so far as time will permit. This might serve as a starting point for a joint Western re-examination of the whole problem which might be continued after the meetings of the sub-committee. It may well be that Stassen will be able to supplement his preliminary report of July 14 by the time the Western discussions take place.

3. Since the British have apparently come to the conclusion that a detailed consideration of the Eden proposals would not be practicable during the next meeting of the sub-committee we are inclined more and more to take the view that the next meetings of the sub-committee will be reduced to a clean-up operation in time for the consideration of its report by the Disarmament Commission and the Assembly. At this stage, we are wondering whether an effort might not be made to postpone the discussion of the disarmament item as much as possible in order to avoid an unduly lengthy debate in which a large number of countries might feel compelled to participate in the light of the Geneva Conference. The achievement of this aim might be facilitated by the fact that the Foreign Ministers will be meeting in Geneva beginning on October 27.

4. We have already asked the military authorities for their opinion on the Eisenhower proposals put forward in Geneva. Our own initial reaction is that if the plan for aerial surveys were to be extended to cover the Satellites and China in addition to being acceptable to the U.S.S.R. and the United States we could not very well stand in the way of general agreement.

5. We are not altogether happy with the suggestion in paragraph 6 of the London telegram that the aim of prohibiting nuclear weapons should be openly abandoned. We realize of course that such a move might well be implicit in an East-West settlement on a modus vivendi, but we think a change of aim might better be presented as a practical and feasible interim solution with total disarmament remaining as the eventual goal.

6. We should appreciate your discussing these matters informally with the State Department with the exception of that raised in paragraph 5. Although we have not yet been directly approached on the question of the preliminary meeting taking place in Washington, this will no doubt come up during your discussion and you will then be in a position to express our preference for this arrangement.

DISARMAMENT SUB-COMMITTEE

We discussed with David W. Wainhouse, Deputy Assistant Secretary for International Organization Affairs, and Paul T. Meyer, Director, Executive Staff, State Department, United States thinking concerning substance and tactics on disarmament proposals at the forthcoming meeting of the Disarmament sub-Committee and at the next session of the General Assembly. We gave, on the basis of your message under reference, indications of Canadian thinking on disarmament. We opened our remarks by a reference to the Ambassador's conversation of July 11 with Harold Stassen (reported in our teletype WA-1172†) in which Mr. Stassen gave the outline of the United States approach to disarmament from which President Eisenhower's Geneva proposals for aerial surveys emerged and recalled that emphasis had been placed in that conversation on the desirability of maintaining close contact between the United States and Canada. We then indicated that, in our view, efforts should be made to consider the substance of our objectives in the field of disarmament.

2. Meeting of the Four. Wainhouse told us that the four Western Powers on the disarmament sub-Committee will, no doubt, wish to continue their consultations prior to full meetings of the sub-Committee after the sub-Committee resumes. It will, of course, be useful to consult at greater length before the sub-Committee meets on August 29. Such consultations could take place on the 25th or 26th of [August] and it is felt that New York would be a convenient place to hold them. Governor Stassen will take up this matter with the United Kingdom, French and Canadian Representatives shortly.

3. Although Cabot Lodge will be the official head of the United States Delegation on the Committee, Stassen is expected in fact to represent the United States. He may be assisted by a few more advisers than the United States Delegation had in London. Stassen will give the United Kingdom, French and Canadian Delegations as much information as possible on United States positions during the consultations prior to the meeting of the full sub-Committee.

4. Sub-Committee Meeting and Assembly Discussion. Wainhouse indicated his personal preference for private meetings, but, referring to the Russian attitude during the last session of the sub-Committee in London, said that the formula used in Geneva of separate briefings after meetings of the sub-Committee might have to be considered.

5. Wainhouse said that in present circumstances he could see personally no advantage to an early discussion in the Assembly of disarmament proposals and that he would certainly prefer if consideration of the disarmament items could be postponed until late in the course of the session. Similarly, he would prefer if meetings of the full Commission were deferred. It is believed that the Australian and Philippine Governments will wish to cooperate with the four concerning their resolutions. Meyer pointed out that the Indian proposal for a moratorium on atomic tests is of a different nature and implied that the Indians might not be guided as easily by the desires of the four concerning the handling of their resolution. The sub-Committee, when it resumes, will have before it the Geneva proposals. Wainhouse indicated that he thought it would be desirable if agreement among the four could be secured for concentrating, as much as possible, the discussion in the sub-Committee on the Eisenhower proposal. The Eisenhower proposal is considered, as was re-emphasized by Secretary Dulles yesterday (August 16), basic to progress in the field of disarmament.<sup>90</sup> Stassen will probably be in a position to spell out the proposal in some detail at the preliminary meeting of the four.

6. Eisenhower Proposal. We enquired as to whether, in the United States thinking, the Eisenhower proposal for aerial survey would, or should, be extended to countries other than the United States and the USSR. The proposal and its various implications are presently under most active consideration in the United States Government and no final position has been reached yet. It is expected that the USSR if it decides to go along with the proposal, will ask for extension of the territorial scope to include at least the United States military bases in Europe. As for China, we were interested in Wainhouse's personal and emphatic comment that "it will have to be included in the proposal since otherwise the loop-hole would be of such size that the whole of Europe could be put through it". Wainhouse was careful to say, however, that this was a purely personal view.

7. We asked what was the United States attitude concerning discussion of the Russian proposal for the setting up of inspection teams in ports and at other strategic locations. Wainhouse noted first that these suggestions are unpalatably reminiscent of the NNSC and that the United States was not favourably disposed towards the idea of that type of control.

If the USSR agreed to the Eisenhower proposal, however, — and the State Department has noted with particular interest Bulganin's statement emphasizing that his country has not rejected the proposal — consideration might be given at a later stage to combining the various means of controlling disarmament.

8. In response to our query on the United States intentions concerning proposals to put a ceiling on military forces, Wainhouse said that it was expected that discussions on the President's proposals would be rather lengthy and that, tentatively, the United States would hope that discussions on other proposals could be deferred. This view seems to us very optimistic and we have some doubts whether the USSR would agree to such a limitation.

9. The State Department, we were told, would welcome any ideas or suggestions Canada might care to advance on the foregoing matters.

DISARMAMENT SUB-COMMITTEE

We see merit in the United States suggestion that the West might give priority to the Eisenhower proposals during the forthcoming meetings of the Sub-Committee on the assumption, of course, that the mere outline of the President's ideas in his Geneva speech will be considerably amplified by Stassen. We welcome this suggestion in view of the fact that the British are apparently unwilling to seize this Sub-Committee at this stage of the Eden proposals; a detailed examination at this stage of the Faure plan would appear to be undesirable.

2. The military authorities have now concurred in our view that the Eisenhower proposals for aerial surveys and the exchange of blueprints beyond the territories directly under the control of the United States and the USSR is acceptable from a Canadian point of view, provided this extension is placed in the framework of a proposal to extend aerial surveys generally to cover all the territories from which a military threat might emerge, and especially China and the satellites. They have expressed the opinion that "anything which can mitigate against a surprise attack by air on North America should be encouraged. If some definite arrangements could be made whereby this reconnaissance could be carried out, it may be possible for us to relax somewhat on our present concept of twenty-four a day manning of the early warning lines, which will be a very expensive and difficult operation to carry out over a prolonged period."

3. These views relate of course to the President's proposals as expressed in Geneva. This matter will presumably have to be reconsidered in the light of any supplementary U.S. proposals which may be submitted during the forthcoming discussion.

4. Although the French plan, in the latest version available at the time of writing, provides that only part of the savings resulting from disarmament should be earmarked for international development, most of the comments made earlier on the plan (our memorandum of July [19],† and telegram No. 303 of August 8) still apply. In addition to the objections already put forward, we see substantial practical difficulties in calculating bona fide military expenditures of the participating countries, in devising a common statistical basis for calculating such expenditure and in reaching agreement on the proportion of savings which are to be used (a) by the Government concerned, (b) for the economic and social development of states or territories constitutionally linked with the Government concerned, and (c) by the international agency.

5. A more fundamental objection relates to the attempt made in the French plan to create an "organic link" between disarmament and aid to underdeveloped countries. From an economic point of view there would not appear to be much of a relationship between the desirable rate of disarmament and either the needs of the underdeveloped areas for external assistance or their capacity to absorb such assistance. (Nor does there appear to be any direct relationship between the rate of disarmament and the requirements of the states concerned for other Government expenditures, including those earmarked for the economic and social development of states or territories constitutionally linked with the Government concerned).

6. In general, while recognizing a short term propaganda advantage in Mr. Faure's initiative we consider that by insisting on a detailed consideration of their plan at this stage the French are putting the cart before the horse. There is probably general agreement that disarmament should normally bring about more substantial contributions to technical assistance programmes and it may be that arrangements for increased development of underdeveloped countries could be worked into the general disarmament system, but we can nearly see any point in complicating an issue which is already complex by dealing with difficult proposals which can only be implemented if and when agreement is reached in the first place on disarmament proper. Most of all, unless and until a fool-proof budgetary control system is devised (this, incidentally, is made more difficult by the earmarking of only part of armaments savings) the launching of the French plan at this stage threatens, in our view, the very thing which has promoted progress in reducing international tension and in particular in disarmament negotiations. As already intimated, it makes it more difficult for the West, psychologically and otherwise, to maintain the necessary position of strength both from the internal point of view and from the point of view of Western dealings with neutral countries.

7. In discussing the French plan we should emphasize that we do not consider that it should be rejected but rather that it has merit and that the time for detailed study might more appropriately come later. The objections outlined are intended for your guidance only and not for discussion with the French at this stage. While putting forward objections to the immediate study of the Faure plan we should at the same time indicate that Canada shares, of course, the hope of the French Prime Minister that as any international disarmament scheme takes effect substantial contributions will be made to the economic development of underdeveloped countries. This hope has already found expression in the General Assembly resolution adopted in 1953 which was approved by Canada.<sup>91</sup> As the French are well aware, Canada is one of the Western countries which is already making available considerable amounts of resources to assist in the development of under-developed countries. We have not yet seen the final text of the Faure plan<sup>92</sup> announced in Paris letter No.

1533† being sent to you in today's bag. We intend to consult the Department of Finance on receipt of the final paper.

8. In addition to the considerations mentioned in the first paragraph above, concentration on the Eisenhower proposal would draw attention away from the fact that the United States has not yet approved ceilings on armed forces already accepted by the USSR and also the Anglo-French compromise on the timetable for the prohibition of nuclear weapons. It might at the same time postpone decisions on the question of nuclear tests and of "not to be first in the use of atomic weapons" mentioned in the Soviet proposals of July 21.

9. It remains to be seen of course whether the Russians will agree to limit discussions in the Sub-Committee to the Eisenhower proposals. They could legitimately ask that their own Geneva proposals be also discussed, not to mention their paper of May 10. The Big Four directive can probably be interpreted as not excluding the consideration of the political proposals mentioned in the latter paper and repeated in Geneva if the Russians decide to insist on this course.

10. The Russians may also be hammering, as they did in Geneva, on the prohibition of nuclear weapons which is mentioned seven times in their Geneva paper. If this turns out to be the case the West should avoid being manoeuvred into a position where they would appear to have abandoned this all-important aim, or of having ignored it as seems to have been the case in Geneva, (paragraph 5 of our telegram No. 311).

11. This points to the desirability of continuing to emphasize control and inspection. As you know, Eisenhower insisted that priority be given to this aspect in the Geneva directive but he ultimately withdrew his proposal in return for Soviet agreement that no reference be made to the question of prohibiting nuclear weapons. One possible outcome of a discussion on control would be a narrowing of the gap between the two sides resulting from a combination of features from the Eisenhower plan and the Soviet inspection proposals of May 10. We think there may be ground for some bargaining in this direction provided, of course, the two major powers are not looking at the forthcoming exercise as just another opportunity for propaganda. It may well be, however, that progress in this limited field would prove impossible in the time available, on the assumption that the Sub-Committee will wish to report to the Disarmament Commission in time for the Assembly debate.

12. It occurs to us that if the discussions were to centre on the Eisenhower proposals and the question arose of considering the institutional arrangements required in this connection, there may be an opportunity to suggest that the purpose would be served by setting up an agency of the kind the Minister has in mind. We leave it to your judgment, however, to decide whether such a move might be usefully made in the course of the discussions or whether the idea might not be introduced more effectively at a later stage.

13. While the Americans may have a perfectly valid case, objectively speaking, for insisting on the consideration of the Eisenhower plan as the most promising avenue on which progress could henceforth be made, we are concerned lest their case might be presented in a manner which would place the whole debate from the very beginning in a propaganda context. In our view the plan should not, for instance, be presented as a sine qua non condition of any further progress in disarmament negotiations. Nor should it be inferred by the West that the Eisenhower programme is from now on the only conceivable field of discussion and one about which the other members of the Sub-Committee may be in a position to give immediate and final reactions. In this connection we were wondering whether the Americans have given any thought to the attitude they should take in the event that the questions of ceilings and timetable should come under consideration as may well be the case. The Western members might usefully sound out the Americans on the points mentioned in this paragraph during preliminary discussions.

DISARMAMENT

We had a preliminary meeting with Stassen and his team today at which he outlined in broad terms his intentions for the Sub-Committee meetings.

2. He will endeavour to concentrate discussion on the President's Geneva proposal and he will be prepared to spell out the proposal in further detail, for example expanding on the meaning of the exchange of blueprints, asking suggestions regarding ports-of-entry for reconnaissance aircraft, the preliminary inspection of the aircraft by the host country, arrangements for representatives of host countries to go aboard the planes, etc. The USSR has announced publicly that it is studying the Eisenhower proposal and Stassen has informed the Soviet Embassy in Washington that the United States will be prepared to assist the USSR in any way in its study.

3. Regarding earlier disarmament proposals made by the United States or made by other western countries and supported by the United States, Stassen said that at an early date in the Sub-Committee meetings, he would take an opportunity to inform the Sub-Committee that the United States regarded all its earlier proposals as having a "reserved and inactive status". They will not be withdrawn but they are not renewed. The chief reason for this, which I gathered he would state explicitly, is the fact that there is no inspection method by which all nuclear material could be completely accounted for and there is therefore no way by which you could support the complete elimination of atomic weapons. He said that the United States did not want to be held to or questioned on previous proposals which may be out moded, and he referred several times to the "unattainable" elimination of atomic weapons. Seeking elaboration of this rather disconcerting announcement, I inquired how the United States position, as it would be put forward at the Sub-Committee meetings, would fit in with the Four-Power Resolution submitted on March 8 in London which constitutes the latest agreed western proposal on a comprehensive disarmament programme.<sup>93</sup> He said that the Eisenhower proposal was not inconsistent with this earlier programme but repeated that since there was no way to support the elimination of atomic weapons, the United States would regard the March 8 resolution as having a reserved and inactive status.

4. In the United States view, the way to begin the move towards disarmament was to develop "openness" in the first place as between the United States and the USSR. This must first be developed to the point where a surprise attack by either of the great nuclear powers could be ruled out. When a blanket comprehensive surprise attack from either the United States or the USSR was no longer possible because of the mutual inspection arrangements made between them, it would then be feasible to proceed with a programme of disarmament (even at this point, Mr. Stassen did not mention the possibility of envisaging eventual elimination of nuclear weapons).

5. As a first step towards implementing the Eisenhower proposal, if the Russians showed interest, Stassen said that they were thinking of suggesting the establishment of a Five-Power (the Sub-Committee members) "Technical Exchange Panel". This "Panel" would study the techniques of control and inspection, would make visits to the territory of the five members to test and study on the spot various techniques of inspection. For example, the "Panel" might pick out a particular port or air centre and study it both on the ground and by air photography in order to work out together satisfactory processes of inspection which might then be embodied in a general programme of inspection. He thought that if the Russians showed interest, the "Technical Exchange Panel" idea might be a good way to study and test their real intentions.

6. Regarding the extension of the Eisenhower proposal to countries other than the United States and the USSR, Stassen said that certainly other countries must eventually be involved but that the President's proposal was to try to reach agreement initially as between the United States and the USSR, and he stressed that the President had referred only to American and Soviet territory in his first statement. He thought that unless and until there was a favourable Soviet reaction to this initial proposal, it was not necessary to speak of extending the proposal to other countries.

7. Stassen thought the probable Soviet reaction initially would be to say that they were still studying the proposal and he added that it was not the United States view that Bulganin had reversed himself overnight on the President's proposal but rather that he had been incorrectly interpreted by the press and had them made his position clearer.

8. On the treatment of disarmament in the Assembly, he suggested that it might be possible to have a resolution passed which would call on the United States and the USSR to make progress together towards realization of the Mutual Inspection Programme proposed by Eisenhower at Geneva.

9. I mentioned the Faure proposal and indicated in very general terms our initial reaction and Stassen agreed that until we had developed an inspection system that would make some disarmament possible, it was premature to consider the disposition of the funds saved by disarming. He suggested that the United States might indicate in general terms that they were already providing a good deal of assistance to under-developed countries and would no doubt be able to provide more if some disarmament could eventually be achieved.

10. On the subject of the privacy of the Sub-Committee meetings, Stassen indicated that they would prefer the Geneva Summit Meeting system of private meetings followed by individual press briefings at the discretion of each delegation. He said that the press was certain to be writing about the meetings and it might be easier to keep them on the right track this way. I intimated that at least for the present I would prefer to try to keep the meetings completely private.

11. On the programme of Sub-Committee meetings, Stassen suggested meetings every afternoon next week from Monday to Thursday, inclusive and meetings in the afternoons from Tuesday to Friday in the next week. I said that this would be satisfactory to us.

DISARMAMENT

Following from Mr. Martin.

We (MacKay, Crowe, Likeness and I) had a talk with Nutting this afternoon on the United Kingdom approach to the Sub-Committee meetings.

2. Nutting was disturbed, as I had been, about Stassen's intention to relegate earlier Western proposals to a reserve and inactive status. Nutting thought this dangerous from the point of view of United Kingdom public opinion which had been to some extent kept out of the "ban the bomb" campaign by the very fact that prohibition of atomic weapons, given adequate safeguards, was an essential part of United Kingdom policy on disarmament. He had therefore suggested to Stassen that he would prefer to take the earlier Western proposals as given but not to take the initiative in reaffirming them. If cornered by the Soviet representative as to whether earlier proposals still stood, he thought we could refer to the doubt expressed in the Soviet May 10 proposal on the feasibility of control of atomic prohibition and say that, since control and inspection was basic to our proposal on prohibition, Soviet reservations on the feasibility of such control necessarily affected our thinking about our earlier proposals. (Stassen however spoke to us after he had seen Nutting and has apparently not changed his mind on this point). Nutting was worried about a possible split between Moch and Stassen on the status of the Four Power proposal of March 8. Moch's own inclination was to table his reaffirmation and elaboration of the Anglo-French plan (paper B of Paris despatch No. 1533 of August 19†) and he wanted United Kingdom co-sponsorship. Nutting thought he might have dissuaded Moch from tabling the first part of this paper which reiterates the Anglo-French plan, but he thought Moch would still go ahead with tabling the second part of the paper which sets forth detailed control machinery and organization.<sup>94</sup>

3. Nutting's inclination was to try to concentrate the discussion on control and he thought this would be facilitated if Moch did not table a new version of the Anglo-French plan since this might lead the Russians to elaboration of their May 10 proposals and help them to avoid facing squarely the question of control. Nutting indicated that he would probably take an early opportunity to query the Soviet Delegation on the control parts of their May 10 proposal.

For the text of the two working papers submitted by France see Documents on Disarmament 1945-1959, Volume 1, pp. 503-509.

4. I remarked on the impact on public opinion in North America of the Eisenhower proposal and indicated that I thought it would be unfortunate if we gave the impression that we were only going through a propagandist exercise without serious hope of progress. Nutting felt that at this stage it was difficult to see how real progress could be made because of the lack of coordination among the Western Governments concerned and he stressed that there had to be a great deal more close thinking and coordination before the Western Governments could be ready to proceed to really close-knit debate and serious negotiation with the USSR. He thought that at the moment there was a real opportunity for the Russians to try to split the Western camp and he reiterated his fear as to the divergence between the United States and French positions. He therefore hoped that the Sub-Committee could wind up its present session in two or three weeks, give the Disarmament Commission time for a short session before the Geneva meeting of Foreign Ministers, allow the Assembly time for a rather perfunctory debate after the Geneva meeting leading to a renewal of the Sub-Committee's mandate to seek solutions in private. He thought "disarmament" might come to the Assembly late in the session when a long debate would not be feasible.

5. In line with the directive from the Geneva Summit Meeting, he would be introducing the Eden plan, but he would make it clear that it was neither a plan for European Security nor a Disarmament plan. It was something which would come before the achievement either of European security or disarmament and would be essentially a practice exercise to build up our knowledge of possible disarmament and inspection techniques.

6. Nutting then said that the United Kingdom regarded the Eisenhower Geneva plan as good in itself, but as by no means the whole answer to our problem. It was a useful addition to the whole complex of disarmament propositions, and the United Kingdom Delegation would certainly express support for it, at least in general terms. He expressed some doubts about the technical exchange panel suggested by Stassen, and thought that it would be very difficult to decide what places might be made available to the panel for its on-the-spot tests.

7. He thought the fact that Sobolev was to head the Soviet Delegation meant that, at least for the time being, the Russians were resting their case on their May 10 proposals.

8. Regarding the privacy of the agreement, Nutting agreed with me that we should try to stick to the Committee's practice of meeting in private and not holding press conferences except to correct misrepresentations.

9. In general, I would say that Nutting was worried about lack of coordination with the United States, and was anxious to get through this session without a serious division in the Western camp in order to gain time for achieving a coordinated Western position.

10. I was rather disturbed by the apparent discrepancy between the United Kingdom intention expressed in telegram No. 1191 of August 13<sup>95</sup> to "try to come to grips with the central problem" and Nutting's view that meetings were only a skirmish and not intended to produce anything serious. He compared his position to a cyclist in a gymnasium: peddling furiously and not going anywhere.

DISARMAMENT SUB-COMMITTEE

At the Sub-Committee meeting today, the five representatives made opening statements which they had agreed in advance would be released to the press at 4:00 p.m.

2. Moch spoke first. He dealt first with the difficulties and prospects arising from the earlier Sub-Committee meetings. He suggested that the French Delegation would shortly propose a compromise between the completely automatic transition from one stage of disarmament to another which characterizes the Soviet May 10 proposal and the excessive authority of the control apparatus which has hitherto seemed the only alternative to such automatic transition. He also referred to the problem of accounting for past production of atomic materials which, year by year, has become greater and made the question of adequate control more and more difficult. He cited both the Soviet proposals of May 10 and statements of President Eisenhower on the possibilities of evading any conceivable kind of inspection of atomic prohibition. He warned however that we must not yet abandon all thought of the possibility of effective verification and therefore of the possibility of eliminating weapons of mass destruction. It was necessary to continue the study of techniques of control and the French Delegation would have some modest suggestions to make on this score. The balance of Moch's opening statement was devoted to a re-statement of the Faure proposals.

3. Lodge then made the opening United States statement after which he turned over the United States Delegation to Stassen and stepped outside to face the television cameras. Lodge re-stated and elaborated in some respects the Eisenhower Geneva plan and in addition tabled as a Sub-Committee Document the President's statement on disarmament at Geneva on July 21. Lodge made it quite clear that the President's proposal, at least in the first instance, concerns only the United States and the USSR and the territory of these two countries. Among the further details given was a definition of "blueprint". It includes "first the identification, strength, kind, structure and disposition of personnel, units and equipment of all major land, sea and air forces including organized reserve and para-military; second a complete list of military plans, facilities and installations with their locations". Each country would permit "unrestricted but monitored air reconnaissance by the other country". Each inspecting country would utilize its own aircraft and related equipment, but personnel of the country being inspected would be aboard each reconnaissance aircraft during all over-flights. Lodge said that further details of the plan would be presented later.

4. Nutting referred to the narrowing of differences which had taken place during the last London session, mentioning particularly the Soviet proposals of May 10 in this connection. He then went on however to question in some detail the adequacy of the control provisions of the Soviet May 10 proposals, citing the Soviet admission in their May 10 proposal of the possibility of evading atomic controls. He then listed a number of the "objects of control" which in the United Kingdom view must be accessible to the control authorities and specified methods of inspection and rights which must be guaranteed to the control organization. Finally, he outlined briefly the Eden proposal made in Geneva and stated that he would be tabling the initial exposition of this plan made by Eden at Geneva together with the text of the proposal itself.)

5. Sobolev spoke next and re-stated without significant alteration the part of the Soviet proposals of May 10 dealing specifically with the conclusion of an international convention on the reduction of armaments and the prohibition of atomic weapons. He also worked in the slight additions to these proposals made by Bulganin at Geneva. He did not repeat the first part of the Soviet proposals of May 10 concerning general political settlements, although he did state that the greatest obstacle to disarmament at the present time and the establishment of effective international control was the absence of the necessary confidence in relations between states. His reference to foreign bases was less specific than the relevant section in the first part of the Soviet May 10 proposals. He said today that the Soviet proposals envisage that states having military bases on the territories of other states will accept an obligation to liquidate part of these bases during the first period of the Soviet plan.

6. In listing points on which the Soviet May 10 proposals coincided with Western proposals, Sobolev said that the USSR had accepted the proposal of the United States, the United Kingdom and France to prohibit atomic weapons after 75 percent of conventional reductions. The United Kingdom and France will of course be the sponsors of this proposal.

7. In general, Sobolev stressed that the long interval since the tabling of the May 10 proposals had been designed to allow other governments time to study them. These proposals were a concession to Western views. It was now up to the Western Delegations to make their reply. He mentioned in conclusion the recent Soviet decision to reduce armed forces by 640,000 as a sign that his government was matching its words with deeds.

8. Mr. Martin then made a statement along the lines of the text sent to you this morning.<sup>66</sup> The final text of the statement, which incorporated the two suggestions for revision telephoned from the Department is being forwarded by bag.

DISARMAMENT

Following from Martin.

Just before yesterday afternoon's meeting, Stassen informed Sobolev privately that he proposed to brief the press after today's meeting, particularly regarding the United States document sent to you in our telegram under reference.<sup>97</sup> This document was tabled at today's meeting in a version identical to that sent to you except for the elimination of paragraph 5.

2. At the beginning of the meeting Stassen referred to his intention to have his Delegation brief the press and Sobolev commented that it was of course understood that other Delegations would necessarily be free to do the same. Press briefings at the discretion of each Delegation have therefore become a recognized part of the sub-Committee procedure in spite of the reservations which had been privately expressed by the other three Western Delegations to Stassen.

3. Nutting then spoke briefly to the effect that it was reasonable that we should now address ourselves to the Soviet May 10 proposals and he directed his comments mainly to the inadequacy of the control aspects of the Soviet May 10 plan.

4. Sobolev intervened to say that the USSR while preferring its own proposals does not decline to consider any other proposals including the Eisenhower plan which the Soviet Delegation will study carefully. However, he would be grateful if other Delegations would give their reaction to the Soviet proposals of May 10 as a whole and not limit themselves to the control arrangements which are only part of the Soviet proposals.

5. Moch agreed that we should first consider the Soviet May 10 proposals and said that he would be analyzing particularly three subjects in this connection:

(1) the automatic transition from stage to stage of the Soviet plan (2) the rights, powers and privileges of the control organization (3) the administrative organization of the control apparatus. Today he devoted himself only to the first of these points and suggested a compromise between automatic transition on a certain date from stage one to stage two of the Soviet plan on the one hand and on the other the excessive authority of the control organ in deciding whether a transition to a new stage could begin. He suggested a Permanent Control Board which would be established by the General Assembly and should be able to defer the transition to a new stage up to a maximum of nine months if there was reason to believe either that the earlier stage had not been completed or that the control agency was not in a position to handle its responsibilities in the next stage. If after nine months the board was still not unanimous on the possibility of going on to a new stage, the question would have to be referred to the Security Council.

6. In a brief intervention I referred to Sobolev's request that we treat the Soviet proposals as a whole and I suggested that Western representatives had already shown themselves ready to do this, but that the Soviet proposals, like the Eisenhower proposals or other plans offered in Geneva, could only be considered fruitfully if their authors were prepared to provide a good deal of supplementary information and were prepared to answer our questions. The United States, for example, intimated that they would be providing further details on the Eisenhower proposal. If we were to make progress it was essential for the Soviet Delegation to clarify its views, particularly with respect to control since that was the part of the Soviet proposals as a whole which seemed to us to be the most in need of clarification. (In fact, the Soviet Delegate is no doubt aware of the United States' views on the impracticability of prohibition of atomic weapons and the request for consideration of the Soviet proposals as a whole is probably designed to get the United States to put its present views on prohibition on the record and at the same time to put other Delegations on the spot with respect to prohibition).

7. Stassen's first intervention in the debate was devoted to the virtual impossibility of effective control arrangements for prohibiting atomic weapons and he read into the record the Soviet admission of this contained in their May 10 document. He said that these considerations, apparently accepted by the USSR, had led the United States to seek another solution, namely the President's plan, and he then tabled Document DC/SC/1/31, the text of which, subject to the correction mentioned above, is given in our telegram under reference.

8. Moch remarked that the United States plan for implementing the President's proposal seemed to be a bilateral arrangement between the United States and the USSR, but he wondered whether it would not necessarily involve other countries and whether therefore it would not be necessary to transform it into a multilateral arrangement. He had raised a similar point at this morning's four Delegation meeting and Stassen, I think misunderstanding to some extent the point Moch was making, attempted to meet him by simply deleting from the United States paper paragraph 5 of the version given in our telegram under reference. Moch's point, I believe, was that it was not enough for the United States and the USSR to seek permission from other countries to fly over their territory (perhaps to examine United States and USSR bases), but that if other countries were involved at all they must come in as full participating members of the scheme with the same rights to inspect and be inspected as the two great nuclear powers. In the sub-Committee Stassen replied to Moch to the effect that the President's scheme would be a great advance if it could be instituted as between the United States and the USSR alone, but that eventually other countries might come into the scheme if they wished to.

9. Sobolev remarked that the new United States paper would be communicated to the Soviet Government and studied very carefully.

10. At this morning's four-power meeting, in addition to the discussion reported in our telegram under reference, we agreed on the general line taken by Western representatives in the sub-Committee today, namely the consideration first of the Soviet May 10 proposals, particularly its control aspects.

DISARMAMENT

The United States Delegation today gave us the text of a draft resolution on disarmament which might be submitted to this session of the Assembly. As we have reported, Stassen had already intimated earlier that the United States was thinking in terms of an Assembly resolution urging the United States and the USSR to get on with implementing the President's Geneva proposal. We should appreciate your early comments on this suggestion and on the United States draft.

2. The United States Delegation said that this draft was being given to the other Western Delegations but not to the Soviet Delegation and it would not be advanced officially by the United States or shown to the Russians without further consultation among the four.

3. Following is the text of the United States draft resolution. Text Begins:

The General Assembly (Security Council) considering, the report of the Disarmament Commission on the results of the efforts of its sub-Committee of five to reach an agreement, as contemplated in the General Assembly Resolution 715 (VIII) of 28 November 1953, on the regulation, limitation and balanced reduction of all armed forces and all armaments, (including provisions for the establishment of an effective international system of inspection and control. Noting, in particular the proposal of the President of the United States of America that arrangements be made between the United States of America and the USSR, the two countries which have nuclear weapons in quantity, for the interchange of a complete blueprint of information regarding their respective military establishments and for the reciprocal provision of ample facilities for aerial reconnaissance over their respective territories. Considering, the further development of this proposal in the meetings of the sub-Committee of the Disarmament Commission at New York, commencing August 29, 1955.

1. Decides that the early execution of this plan would contribute to the reduction of international tensions, provide a safeguard against major surprise attack, lessen the fear of war, and assist in the development of a comprehensive international agreement for the regulation, limitation and balanced reduction of all armed forces and all armaments and

2. Recommends

A. That the United States of America and USSR proceed to put the proposal of the President of the United States into effect at the earliest opportunity;

B. That other states decide at an early date the contribution they may make to the execution of this plan and consider the extension of it on a reciprocal and appropriate basis to their own establishments and territories;

C. That the powers principally involved continue their efforts, as contemplated in resolution 715 (VIII) of 28 November 1953 to reach agreement, giving priority attention to the subject of inspection, reporting and control.

DISARMAMENT

At yesterday's meeting Moch continued his analysis of the Soviet May 10 control proposals. He thought we might agree that control in the first stage need not be as strict as in the second but added that there must be some control on the actual reductions and not merely provision for some advance warning of surprise attack as in the Soviet plan. We might agree for example that the control in the first stage need not have access to industrial establishments of all types but it must have access at least to military establishments and depots. Regarding the second stage he provided a long list of establishments (similar to those Nutting has mentioned) which would need to be included specifically among the "objects of control" mentioned in the Soviet proposals.

2. Sobolev then intervened to suggest that it was not helpful at this stage to concentrate on the points of disagreement between the Soviet and Western positions. He thought it would be much more helpful to go through the Soviet proposals of May 10 and establish at once which points were now agreed among the five. He ended with an appeal to his colleagues to let him know what parts of the Soviet proposal of May 10 were acceptable to them. (Although so far as we know Stassen has not yet told the Russians that he regards all previous proposals as having an inactive status, the present United States reservations on the earlier western plan now partly incorporated in the Soviet plan of May 10 must be fairly clear to the Soviet Delegation. Sobolev will probably endeavour to get on the record a United States admission that they have abandoned the goal of prohibition of nuclear weapons and to embarrass the rest of us on the subject of our present attitude to this long standing objective).

3. Mr. Martin suggested to Sobolev that the points on which we were in agreement, at least to some extent, could be deduced from the extent to which the May 10 Soviet proposals were based on positions first taken by the Western Delegation. He went on to analyse the short-comings of the Soviet control proposals with respect to the timing of the positioning of the control organ before each stage begins, the extent of the rights and powers of the control organ provided in each of the two Soviet stages and the power of the control organ to take interim measures in the event of violations.

4. The most interesting question introduced by Stassen in his remarks was whether Bulganin's statement on disarmament of July 21 at Geneva could be taken as, in effect, superseding the May 10 proposals particularly with respect to the first part of the May 10 proposals on political prerequisites for disarmament which were not mentioned by Bulganin at Geneva. Sobolev did not comment on this.

5. At the morning meeting of the Four Delegations Stassen reported that his Delegation had held a press conference outlining the United States documents submitted at the sub-Committee meeting on August 30 but had not released the actual document. The other three representatives again indicated their view that continuous publicity might jeopardize serious negotiation particularly if it amounted to a blow by blow description of the meetings and was not limited to reports of major proposals or major results. Stassen said he was aware that there was a serious difference of approach between himself and his colleagues on this subject but he could only repeat his conviction that a steady flow of constructive publicity would affect Soviet policy in a way favourable to agreement with western proposals. We were later informed that the United States Delegation proposed to hold a briefing for United States press representatives only after yesterday's sub-Committee meeting. The information provided would not be for attribution to the United States Delegation but only to "informed sources". The United States Information Officer thought that this might become a regular practice.

6. Mr. Martin inquired at the morning Four Delegation meeting whether there had been or would be any bilateral negotiations between the United States and the USSR on the Eisenhower plan since, as presented by the United States, it was at least initially limited to the two countries. Stassen answered that there had not been such negotiations because the United States wishes the negotiations on the Eisenhower plan to be under the aegis of the United Nations.

DISARMAMENT

Sobolev asked to speak first at today's meeting of the sub-Committee and said that he had noted with satisfaction that other representatives had agreed that the Soviet proposals of May 10 widened the area of agreement in the sub-Committee. Following the line that he has taken already, he said that it would be helpful to know exactly what points were now agreed and to this end he addressed a number of questions to the western representatives. These were:

(1) Do all five members of the sub-Committee agree on levels of forces of one to one and a half million for the United States, the USSR and China; 650,000 for France and the United Kingdom; and a ceiling of between 150,000 and 200,000 for all other countries.

(2) Is there five-power agreement on the absolute prohibition of use of nuclear weapons after seventy-five percent of conventional reductions, the elimination of the nuclear weapons themselves during the final twenty-five percent of conventional reductions, followed by the diversion of all nuclear materials to peaceful use.

(3) Do we all agree that simultaneously with the beginning of the first fifty percent of conventional reductions states should assume a solemn obligation not to use nuclear weapons except in defence against aggression when a decision to that effect is taken by the Security Council.

(4) Are the five countries all prepared, as one of the first measures of a disarmament programme, to discontinue tests of atomic and hydrogen weapons.

2. He thought that a considerable rapprochement on these points had occurred in London if not an actual identity of Soviet and Western positions and it would be helpful if Western representatives could reaffirm this.

3. He then answered the question Stassen has raised the day before as to whether Bulganin's Geneva proposals superseded the May 10 proposals. His answer was to the effect that nothing said by the Soviet Premier in Geneva was in any way inconsistent with any part of the Soviet proposals submitted on May 10 and that the Soviet Government still supported its May 10 proposals in their entirety.

4. By this time, Stassen had passed notes to his three Western colleagues expressing the hope that we would not answer Sobolev on the spot but would have a Western consultation before doing so. He himself asked Sobolev whether the Soviet delegation still stood by the view expressed in its May 10 proposals (pages 17 and 18, DC/SC.L/26REV.29) to the effect that reliable international control and inspection of the prohibition of atomic weapons are not feasible. Sobolev replied that these paragraphs of the Soviet May 10 proposal remained fully in force.

5. Moch then spoke dealing first with the detailed organization of a control body. His statement followed the lines of the second part of the French memorandum enclosed with Paris despatch No. 1533 of August 19.†

6. In reply to Sobolev, Moch said that the questions would be carefully considered and a detailed reply given later but that he could say at once that to the extent the Soviet May 10 proposals reproduced ideas originally found in proposals sponsored or co-sponsored by France, such ideas as embodied in the Soviet proposals were still accepted by France. However, he added that all proposals put forward by the French delegation had been explicitly dependent on an adequate system of control and inspection and that earlier proposals could not be taken independently of their control prerequisites.

7. Nutting replied to Sobolev to the same effect adding that Sobolev's express reaffirmation of the Soviet belief that adequate control was not possible must necessarily be taken into account in considering the status of earlier proposals.

8. Mr. Martin suggested that we should try to avoid assuming that only one proposal could be acceptable and the others must be rejected and that we should try instead to concentrate on the possibilities of taking desirable elements from all proposals to construct a generally acceptable programme. He also inquired whether the control system elaborated by Moch envisaged units specifically charged with providing early warning against attack (as in part of the Soviet proposals and as in the Eisenhower plan) in addition to the control units concerned with inspecting the actual measures of disarmament. Moch replied that the French plan was intended to make provision for both of these aspects of inspection and control.

9. Immediately after the meeting, Sobolev gave a short informal interview to press representatives who were clustered outside the door. He is understood to have given them more or less the text of the questions he put to the Western representatives and to have said that the Western representatives had not yet given him any answers to these simple, straightforward inquiries.

10. On the subject of publicity, the United States delegation continued last night to maintain the flow of information to which Stassen is devoted. This morning's papers, as you will have noted, contained a fairly detailed description of yesterday's meeting obtained both from a United States briefing of American correspondents and from a television appearance by Stassen.

DISARMAMENT

We find it difficult to express firm views on the United States draft resolution before we have a better idea of the likely results of the present meetings, both from the point of view of the Eisenhower proposals and of the work of the Sub-Committee as a whole.

2. The present wording of the U.S. draft seems to assume that the Russians not only will have accepted the Eisenhower plan in principle but will also be ready "to put (it) into effect" by the time the Assembly considers the disarmament item. This to our mind presupposes that a good deal of ground will by then have been covered, since the USSR, and for that matter the United States, is not likely to accept or implement a plan of such import without agreement having been reached on a number of complex questions raised by the plan. If indeed Russian co-operation goes that far, the move suggested by the United States might conceivably be justified. There is of course the possibility that the Russians could be pushed to the wall and the U.S. could score a propaganda victory by showing its willingness to open up its frontiers for disarmament purposes while its major opponent would not be ready to do so. We do not believe, however, that this is what the United States has in mind in the light of the Big Four exercise in Geneva.

3. If the Russian reaction to the new American proposals before the Assembly meets can be summed up in "a willingness to study the plan very carefully", and in any case unless their attitude towards the proposals clearly indicates that they really have the intention of implementing the plan, we think the wording of the resolution should be much more flexible if unanimous agreement in the Assembly is sought. It might recommend that the two powers give earnest consideration to the implementation of the plan at the earliest opportunity (on the assumption that sufficient headway would be made before the Assembly debate). If not, the resolution might simply recommend as a first step that the two powers should get together to undertake a detailed study of the proposals with a view to implementing them as soon as possible. In either case we think the word "considers" should preferably be substituted for the word "decides" in operative paragraph one.

4. We do not consider that any useful purpose would be served if the Russians were manoeuvred into a position where they would feel compelled to vote for the present text, although they would not be ready to implement it.

5. Bearing in mind the Soviet proposals of May 10 and of July 21 and also the Faure plan, we assume that the Americans are not proceeding on the assumption that their proposal will necessarily be the only one singled out by the Assembly. Irrespective of the attitude of the Russians, who may well have new proposals of their own by the time the Assembly meets, it is altogether conceivable that one or more of the underdeveloped countries will seize the opportunity offered to them by the Faure plan, not to mention the French Prime Minister's apparent intentions on this score, (Paris telegram No. 413 of August 26†).

6. The singling out of two of the five major powers mentioned in the Charter raises a political issue on which the United Kingdom and France may have particular views. For our part, we should like to have some indication of the kind of contribution other states will be called upon to make "at an early date" before sponsoring the United States text.

7. In view of the wide importance of this matter, we are wondering whether the two major powers should not be appropriately called upon in one way or another to report on the progress made either to the Disarmament Commission or at least to the other powers principally involved.

DISARMAMENT

Following from Martin, Begins: At the meeting of the Four Western Delegations this morning we discussed the answers to be made to the questions asked by Sobolev at the last meeting, as well as the question of the United States draft General Assembly resolution.

2. On the first subject Stassen indicated his intention to state fairly bluntly that the United States regarded all these earlier proposals as now having the "inactive and reserve status" which he has already mentioned to us. The statement would, of course, be padded with reference to the need for control and to the desirability of focusing on the post-Geneva situation, but Stassen's explanation seemed to make it quite clear that what he proposed to do would leave the Russians in a position to accuse the United States of having abandoned the objective of nuclear prohibition and even the objective of conventional disarmament. In reply to questions, Stassen insisted that the Eisenhower plan was only a first step and that it might lead eventually to measures of disarmament, but he remained silent on the possibility of retaining any vestige of the objective of prohibition of nuclear weapons unless there should be some new scientific development which would enable us to guarantee atomic prohibition.

3. Moch, Nutting and I all queried the wisdom of telling the Russians in the sub-Committee that earlier proposals would be, in effect, abandoned. I suggested that we had reached a crucial point in our work which might mark a sharp departure from the more hopeful atmosphere since Geneva and also a departure from the Western solidarity on disarmament proposals which we have hitherto been able to maintain.

4. Nutting suggested answers to Sobolev along the following lines, and Moch agreed in general with Nutting's outline:

(1) Regarding levels of forces for countries other than the Big Five, Nutting would say that so many countries were involved with so many special local problems that it was not feasible for the sub-Committee to agree on any exact figure for all these countries. The sub-Committee could only agree, as in the Anglo-French proposals, that other countries should be permitted levels "substantially lower" than the Big Five.

(2) The United Kingdom could not agree that the Security Council, with its veto, could prohibit the use of certain weapons before a comprehensive disarmament programme was in force. This would dispose of the question on the preliminary prohibition of atomic weapons.

(3) Regarding the ban on tests, the Soviet Delegation must give more details on the kind of international control that would be in effect when the ban was imposed. It apparently was to come early in the disarmament programme at a stage when the Soviet control proposals were quite inadequate.

(4) On the really serious and difficult questions of the levels of forces and prohibition after 75 percent of conventional reductions, Nutting would stress the prerequisite written into the Anglo-French proposals that there be adequate and effective control before these proposals could be put into effect. The United Kingdom Government was still willing to go ahead with these measures if there could be effective control, but could not go ahead with them unless there was effective control. The Soviet position seemed to be that effective control was impossible but that we must go ahead with these measures anyway. Thus, Nutting thought the questions could be turned back to Sobolev on the familiar issue of inadequate control.

5. As indicated, Moch would agree with this approach and he urged Stassen to reconsider his intention to tell the sub-Committee that earlier proposals were being "put in the frig". He was sure that European opinion would react very badly to the abandonment of the objective of atomic prohibition. He suggested that we must surely retain at least some prohibition on their manufacture. Otherwise stock piles would expand, more and more countries would acquire atomic weapons and the world situation would grow steadily more menacing.

6. Stassen replied to all this by saying in effect that there was no point in continuing discussion on an unreal and impractical basis. Prohibition would not be scientifically supported and we must therefore try to take another step, the Eisenhower Plan, which was practical and which might lead on to some degree of disarmament.

7. Moch and I had referred to a report in today's New York Times of a speech by United States Air Secretary Quarles which seemed to indicate that the United States had abandoned all interest in disarmament as such and was concerned only with an early warning system. Stassen said that this report did not reflect United States Government policy and that they were still very much interested in disarmament as something which might flow from the successful implementation of the Eisenhower Plan. However, he still remained silent on any possibility of maintaining atomic prohibition as an eventual objective given present scientific knowledge. I mentioned the possibility of basing an inspection system on control of delivery systems and Stassen agreed that this was an important part of their thinking, but he did not commit himself on the possibility that any degree of atomic prohibition might be undertaken on the basis of inspection and control of delivery systems.

8. Regarding the United States draft resolution (your telegram No. 360 of September 2), Stassen made it quite clear that their desire is to have this resolution passed by the General Assembly whether or not there has been any indication of possible Soviet willingness to go along with the Eisenhower Plan. He feels that if the resolution were passed by the General Assembly with a sizeable majority, it would be a means of putting the pressure of world opinion on the USSR and would make it more likely that they would agree to the Eisenhower proposals. My own reaction is that if this resolution is rammed through in spite of Soviet opposition, it will make Soviet participation in any scheme similar to the Eisenhower proposal almost impossible. Stassen's idea is that the sub-Committee should in some way adopt this resolution which he apparently intends to table in the sub-Committee this week and that the Assembly should receive it via the Disarmament Commission as a proposal supported by a majority in the sub-Committee. He said that he would like to have it unanimously recommended by the sub-Committee, but otherwise he would hope for a four to one vote in its favour. I said that I hoped very much that he would not table this resolution in the sub-Committee until Western Governments had had further opportunity to study it and until we had had a full exchange of views on it amongst the Western Delegations. Nutting and Moch concurred and expressed their preference for an Assembly resolution of a much more general nature on which we could hope to have Soviet support and one which would not single out any of the proposals made in the sub-Committee at the expense of other proposals, but would in general instruct the sub-Committee to continue its efforts on the basis of the various proposals before it.

9. I should appreciate any suggestions you have for further points on the subject of control which we might make in the sub-Committee including particularly inspection of delivery systems. I should also be grateful for any comments you may have on the elaborations on the Anglo-French Plan which Moch has produced. Finally, I should be grateful for suggestions as soon as possible on the answers the Canadian Delegation might make to Sobolev's question because I feel that some answer from each Western Delegation will have to be made this week and Nutting is likely to give his reply today.

DISARMAMENT

Canada has co-sponsored the Western proposals of March 8 which we still regard as a sound basic programme towards reaching agreement on the disarmament problem.

2. As you know, we agreed last spring to co-sponsor the Anglo-French compromise on the timetable for the prohibition of nuclear weapons but we have refrained from doing so, in order to prevent the United States delegation being isolated in the Western camp. At the time of writing we are not clear whether the military authorities ever committed themselves on the question of ceilings for armed forces. We shall let you know as soon as we know their exact position on this question. We cannot agree on the Russian proposal concerning the use of nuclear weapons in defence against aggression if a decision in this matter is subject to the vote of the permanent members of the Security Council. With regard to Sobolev's last question, we are reluctant to take a firm position until we know where the United States and the United Kingdom stand at this stage on this matter.

3. We are reluctant to suggest any specific course on how Sobolev's questions should be tackled before knowing more about the United States real intentions and also the tactics they have in mind. In the meantime, we look at the Eisenhower proposals which embody Soviet suggestions on inspection as a practical plan on which agreement might more easily be reached at this particular stage than on a larger programme such as the Western proposals of March 8. We believe that the United States would be justified in arguing that there is no inconsistency between their new proposals and those which they have sponsored on March 8. Lodge may actually be regarded as having taken this line in his opening statement.

4. Moch's reply, as outlined in paragraph six of your telegram, makes sense although we are not clear whether the Western plan of March 8 as distinct from the Anglo-French compromise was made "explicitly dependent" on a satisfactory agreement on control. On the assumption that the March 8 proposals are to remain valid, Nutting and Stassen's reference to the possibility of evading control, mentioned in the Soviet proposals of May 10, appear of dubious value, bearing in mind the doubts expressed on this score by President Eisenhower in Geneva.

5. We consider that the views expressed in our telegram No. 338 (paragraph 10) and 311 (paragraph 5) remain valid. You should express our genuine concern on this score to the United States and the United Kingdom delegations.

DISARMAMENT

Following from Martin.

Your telegram under reference indicates quite clearly the answer you suggest we give to Sobolev's third question (as listed in my telegram No. 494 of September 1). This is the question on the obligation not to use nuclear weapons except in defence against aggression when a decision to that effect is taken by the Security Council. I agree that it is easy to dispose of this question by reference to the veto.

2. I am not at all clear however as to your suggestions for answering the other more difficult questions.

(1) On the first question regarding levels of armed forces, I thought that we had already accepted in principle the proposed levels of one to one and a half million for the United States, the USSR and China and 650,000 for France and the United Kingdom. In his answer yesterday, Nutting reaffirmed United Kingdom support for these levels and said that regarding levels for other countries, his government could only repeat the view that their levels should be considerably lower than the levels established for the five permanent members of the Security Council. He did not think that the sub-committee was the proper place to try to fix exact levels for all the other countries whose local needs and circumstances varied so widely. The original Anglo-French proposals of 1954 as well as the Soviet proposals of May 10 referred to a world disarmament conference. Nutting suggested that this was the place to discuss levels of forces for all the other countries. I would think that we might reply along similar lines. The proposed levels of forces for the great powers result in a rough parity between the total forces of major Communist and non-Communist states and Soviet acceptance of these levels was a major departure from their former position, maintained insistently over many years, that the only acceptable reduction in forces for the great powers was a flat one-third cut for each. Western delegations, including the Canadian, have made much in past talks of the unreasonableness of the Soviet one-third cut and I think it would be unfortunate if we could not now say quite specifically that we welcome the Soviet acceptance of the levels of forces proposed by the United Kingdom and France and that these levels remain acceptable to Canada.

(2) Much the most difficult question is the one regarding the prohibition of nuclear weapons. Canada it is true did not specifically accept the 75 percent compromise but we did co-sponsor the March 8 proposal which put prohibition at the end of 100 percent of the conventional reductions and I think we must first decide whether we are ready to reaffirm the principle of prohibition and the elimination of atomic weapons. If we still accept this in principle as a valid objective, the question whether the prohibition comes at the 75 percent point or at the 100 percent point of conventional reductions is an important point of detail on which we might be able to hedge for the time being. You have stressed in your telegrams (Nos. 338 and 311) that we should not openly abandon the goal of nuclear prohibition. Unfortunately the United States delegation has now done so. Stassen said yesterday that he now "placed a reservation" upon all pre-Geneva United States disarmament proposals. It is true that he made the proviso that this view could be changed if new scientific developments ever made possible adequate inspection of nuclear prohibition. Nevertheless the USSR will have little difficulty in representing Stassen's view yesterday [as] an open abandonment of the objective of the prohibition of nuclear weapons and I think it would be unfortunate if they could cite our reply to Sobolev's question as evidence that Canada had also abandoned this objective. (One of Stassen's State Department advisers implied to us yesterday that Stassen had put on record his virtual disavowal of all earlier proposals against the advice of the State Department). The United Kingdom and French answers to this question are, in effect, that their earlier proposals on prohibition still stand on the same terms as always, namely subject to the establishment of effective methods of inspection and control, and the French are perhaps less pessimistic than the United Kingdom on the question of the possibility of devising effective methods of control. Moch suggested at yesterday's private western meeting that we might at least salvage some degree of prohibition, for example some prohibitions of use of atomic weapons and perhaps prohibition of manufacture of further weapons.

I would suggest that we should answer Sobolev in terms similar to the United Kingdom and French answers. i.e. reaffirming prohibition and elimination of nuclear weapons as our objective, subject to Soviet agreement on adequate control and subject to the scientific and technical possibility of adequate control. It was in this context that Stassen and Nutting mentioned the Soviet doubts as expressed in the Soviet May 10 proposals on the feasibility of control (paragraph 4 of your telegram under reference). There is no inconsistency between United States and United Kingdom references to Soviet doubts on adequate control and Eisenhower doubts on the same score. Nutting and Stassen were saying in effect that the USSR in its own documents admits what Eisenhower has been saying, namely that adequate control is not scientifically and technically feasible. Therefore on this score, the USSR and President Eisenhower are in agreement, and therefore the USSR should not be surprised if proposals for prohibition of nuclear weapons are being reconsidered. The United Kingdom of course has reiterated support of its earlier proposals on nuclear prohibition, given the possibility of adequate control. The United States has now openly concluded that there is no foreseeable adequate control and consequently, in a rather heavy-handed fashion, has reserved its position on all earlier proposals on atomic prohibition. At today's 4-power meeting, I said that Canada had not yet given up the objective of prohibition of atomic weapons.

In paragraph 3 of your telegram under reference you say you need to know the United States' real intentions before answering Sobolev. It seems to me that by now United States intentions are quite clear. They are interested only in the Eisenhower plan, perhaps as a prelude and perhaps as an alternative to any kind of comprehensive disarmament programme. The most they are willing to say about disarmament is that it might follow after the Eisenhower plan had been in effect for some time and had reduced fears of attack. Even then they would have no thought of any degree of prohibition of atomic weapons except in the unforeseen eventuality that marvellous new scientific procedures should become available for verifying such prohibition. The United States hopes that, whatever the Russian reaction to the Eisenhower plan, the other western countries will join them in an assembly resolution urging that this plan be implemented forthwith as between the United States and the USSR. In short disarmament, whether conventional or nuclear, is at present out of the question; let us therefore try to establish an early warning system between the two great atomic powers.

This may indeed be all that is feasible but I think that we would be unwise to hand the USSR unnecessary propaganda advantage by taking this line openly and bluntly. It will be much easier to carry other countries in the assembly with us if we say that we maintain our objective of disarmament and prohibition of nuclear weapons, provided adequate control arrangements are both feasible and accepted by the USSR, and I would reiterate the suggestion that we answer along this line Sobolev's main question. (I do not see any difficulty on the point whether the March 8 plan is "explicitly dependent" on control. Provision of adequate control is an integral part of the March 8 plan and there has never been any suggestion that the plan might be accepted without the control element).

(3) Given below is the text of Nutting's reply to Stassen's question on the prohibition of atomic tests and I think we might well reply along similar lines:

"Mr. Sobolev's last question, the fifth in the order in which he put them, was whether we agree with the Soviet proposal for a ban on tests of nuclear weapons. On this I have two observations. The first is that, as I understand the Soviet proposal, the ban on tests should be part of a disarmament programme, not an isolated act to be undertaken prior to disarmament; it is to be part of a disarmament programme. That is the first essential point, and with that point my government has no quarrel. The other essential question is when it is proposed that this ban should take effect within the staging or phasing of a disarmament programme. That question affects in turn the problem of how such a ban is going to be controlled for if, as we propose, you have a ban on the production of all nuclear weapons with effective control over that ban, then you must surely achieve an automatic ban on the testing of nuclear weapons. But if the prohibition on tests is to come at an earlier point in the disarmament programme than the prohibition on production, then I submit that it is essential to consider how such a ban will be controlled.

"That might be a question on which our scientific advisers could assist us, for they, perhaps alone, can consider what degree of control is possible in such circumstances. But on this point the Soviet proposals (DC/SC.1/26/REV.2) of May 10, 1955 refer only very briefly and, if I may say so, rather obscurely to setting up an International Commission to supervise the ban and to make reports to the Security Council and the General Assembly about its observance. It appears that this International Commission of which the Soviet proposals speak is to be an ad hoc body with no relation to the permanent international control organ. This suggestion needs considerable elaboration before we can have any assurance that it will be effective. We also need to be told what, if any, relationship this body would have to the disarmament control organ which my government insists must already be in operation from the very beginning of the disarmament process and must, therefore, be in operation and able to supervise and to ensure the carrying out of all the processes of disarmament, including the ban suggested by the Soviet Union."

3. I should appreciate your earliest possible confirmation that we might reply to Sobolev in the manner suggested above.

DISARMAMENT

This will confirm that in the light of the United States position outlined in telegrams under reference and in Stassen's public statement as reported in yesterday's New York Times, we are in general agreement with the course suggested in your telegram No. 503 and in paragraph 4 of your telegram No. 498.

2. We still regard the new American proposals as a first step towards a general disarmament programme such as that outlined in the Western proposals of March 8 (which included the prohibition of nuclear weapons). Although no condition has been specifically attached to the Western proposals as in the case of the Anglo-French compromise timetable ble, the Western plan should of course be considered as a whole and its implementation is consequently subject to a satisfactory solution of the problems of control and inspection.

3. The armed services have now agreed to the levels suggested in the Anglo-French proposals and also in the Russian-Geneva proposals, i.e., 150,000 to 200,000 for smaller powers. We agree, however, with Nutting's view as expressed in paragraph 2(1) of your last telegram. While, therefore, you might announce our agreement in principle to the level suggested for Canada you should at the same time indicate that you do not consider it appropriate for the Sub-Committee to endeavour to fix precise levels for all other countries. You should make it clear that Canada's final commitment on this matter could only be given in the context of a comprehensive programme in which other countries would participate.

4. The armed forces have also expressed their agreement with the stand taken in our last telegram on Sobolev's third question mentioned in your telegram No. 494. They have also confirmed their previous agreement to the Anglo-French compromise on timetable. We agree with your suggestion that there is perhaps no need to spell out our position on this point at this particular stage, bearing in mind the United States attitude.

5. Although we have not yet received the views of other Departments concerned on the question of nuclear tests, we can see no objection to your answering Sobolev's question on this point along the lines of Nutting's reply to Stassen, particularly in his last paragraph.

DISARMAMENT

Following from Martin.

At the morning meeting on Sept 7 of Western Delegations, Stassen announced that he proposed to table the U.S. draft resolution in the sub-Committee sometime this week, probably on Friday. He said that they would welcome suggestions for changes in the wording, but made no reference at all to the views which had been strongly expressed to him at an earlier meeting by the other three that it was premature and inadvisable to table this resolution.

2. Nutting urged him to reconsider and pointed out the embarrassment which might be caused to the United Kingdom and perhaps to other delegations if the Russians should decide to put forward for example their May 10 proposals in the Assembly and call for a paragraph-by-paragraph vote on them. It would certainly be difficult for the United Kingdom even to abstain on paragraphs which were direct quotations from earlier Anglo-French proposals. He therefore urged again the advisability of trying to obtain a resolution which would have Soviet support and he thought that this would have to be a much more general resolution which did not single out any particular proposal at the expense of others. He thought that we should at least await some indication of the Soviet reaction to the Eisenhower plan before this resolution was tabled, and he could see no advantage and many difficulties from a precipitate tabling of the U.S. draft resolution. The United Kingdom would not welcome any attempt to score a "cold war" victory over the Russians by getting this resolution approved in the Assembly over Soviet objections.

3. Moch concurred in these views, and I said that I thought it would be a serious mistake to advance the resolution in its present form and that I thought that in any case it might be preferable not to put forward a resolution in the sub-Committee. It would be much easier to seek unanimous approval of a resolution which could be developed after the sub-Committee had concluded its meetings when the situation was a good deal clearer. In any event, it would be necessary to have a wider and more flexible draft resolution if we had any serious hopes of advancing it with Soviet support. I hoped that we would eventually be able to agree on something more substantial than a merely procedural resolution but I thought that an early U.S. move to table the present resolution in the sub-Committee would make this task much more difficult.

4. Stassen replied that neither he nor the President had any intention whatsoever to pursue a "cold war" aim. He simply felt that the most hopeful, practical course open to the world was an early agreement between the United States and the USSR on implementing the Eisenhower plan, and he felt that the best way to compel the USSR to accept the plan was to develop an understanding world support for this proposal. He thought that the U.S. draft resolution would contribute to this growing pressure of world public opinion on the USSR and he felt that the sooner the process were begun by introducing the resolution the better. (He would no doubt publish the draft resolution as soon as it had been tabled in accordance with what now appears to be the sub-Committee's practice).

5. In conclusion, Stassen inquired whether if the USSR would agree to this resolution without major changes he could assume that it would be acceptable to the rest of us. Moch and Nutting were obviously rather taken aback at the implication that the views of their governments were of no concern if only the U.S. and the USSR could agree, and they fully reserved their positions on their probable attitude in that unlikely event. Both said that they would almost certainly want some reference in the resolution to the Geneva plans of their Prime Ministers.

6. Having listened carefully to all these reactions, Stassen announced that he proposed to sound out Sobolev today on Soviet reactions to the draft resolution and that he would very likely table it in the sub-Committee on Friday.

7. There appears to be no possibility of making any impact on Stassen on this subject, and I would suggest that the only hope of holding off precipitate U.S. action would be by representations in Washington.<sup>98</sup>

DISARMAMENT

At the meeting of the Four Western Delegations on September 9th Nutting began by expressing the serious concern of his government that the Western Delegations were getting out of step both on the substance and the tactics of the disarmament negotiations. He mentioned three particular points:

(1) The tenor of United States briefing of the press which he regarded as misleading especially in its exaggeration of the possibility of a favourable Soviet response to the Eisenhower plan.

(2) The growing divergence between the United States and other Western Delegations on the subject of previous decisions taken on disarmament.

(3) The question of tabling the United States draft resolution in the Sub-Committee. He repeated his views in strong terms to the effect that the United Kingdom could see absolutely no advantage, even to the United States, in tabling this resolution. His government could not agree to one of the Geneva disarmament proposals being singled out for special treatment. To try to advance this resolution against the advice of the other Western Delegations, and in all probability, against Soviet opposition, would be very "rough tactics" and would be generally regarded as an unfortunate cold war exercise. If the United States put forward this resolution would not the Soviet Delegation ask whether the United States also re-affirmed our earlier objectives of disarmament and prohibition of atomic weapons. A negative answer to this question by the United States Delegation in the Assembly would certainly have a very unfortunate effect on the general support for the United States resolution. To ram the resolution through with a routine "cold war majority" would not be worthy of the President's generous and imaginative initiative. He referred again to the other probably disadvantages of a number of resolutions being advanced many of which might be acutely embarrassing to the United Kingdom and other Delegations.

2. Mr. Martin also expressed his strong concern that we continue our long tradition of giving serious consideration to one another's views before taking action in the United Nations which any other members of the group regarded as unfortunate.

3. Moch spoke along similar lines and asked Stassen to consider that forcing a plan through the Assembly against Soviet opposition might, in effect, be a major setback to the plan. He recalled the "grave error" of the adoption of the Baruch plan in the Atomic Energy Commission and in the General Assembly.<sup>99</sup> He thought that Mr. Stassen was too optimistic in his view that the net reaction of public opinion would be favourable to the United States. The USSR could argue that as soon as it made a move on May 10th to meet the Western position, the United States, apparently afraid of Russian agreement, promptly disavowed its earlier positions. They could argue that the Eisenhower plan was just the old disclosure and verification, a system of legalized espionage designed to defer indefinitely any real disarmament or prohibition of atomic weapons. This kind of propaganda would certainly be false said Mr. Moch but it would nevertheless be very effective if the USSR should decide to pursue it. Therefore like his United Kingdom and Canadian colleagues he very strongly urged that the United States defer tabling its resolution at least until there had been a Soviet response to the Eisenhower plan.

4. On the probable Soviet response Moch cited a remark made by Sobolev to Alphand, the new French Permanent Representative. Alphand, during his courtesy call, had not raised the question of disarmament but Sobolev had volunteered to him that the USSR was very disturbed at the new United States move reserving all its pre-Geneva positions of substance on disarmament and he added that he could not see how the USSR could consider the Eisenhower plan seriously unless it formed an integral part of a comprehensive plan. Moch added that he was certain there had been no change of basic Soviet policy which was to secure as part of the disarmament agreement:

- (1) elimination of bases, and
- (2) prohibition of atomic weapons.

He really could not subscribe to the view that these basic Soviet objectives could be dissolved by the pressure of world public opinion.

5. Moch then mentioned again a tentative compromise position which he had already touched on at earlier Western meetings. He wondered how the Eisenhower plan could be made a preliminary to a larger plan, thus at least partly meeting the inevitable Soviet objections. Could it not be combined with a plan for limitation and reduction of conventional forces and for first a ban on further production of atomic weapons (which could be controlled) and eventually, after completion of say 75 percent of the conventional reductions, acceptance of Bulganin's idea that each State would pledge not to be first to use atomic weapons. Agreement on this pledge would of course have to be discussed in NATO but he thought that it might be acceptable in view of the two necessary prerequisites:

- (1) the disparity between Soviet and Western conventional strength would first be largely eliminated;
- (2) the pledge would come only after extensive control and inspection operations covering conventional reductions, and including the Eisenhower air reconnaissance, would have been in effect for a fairly long period.

6. In conclusion he argued that, regarding the Assembly resolution, we must try to create a generally acceptable resolution embodying some degree of agreement in substance among the Western Delegations [and with ?] the USSR. Failing this it would be necessary once again to concoct a merely procedural resolution and, while this would be a regrettable admission of sterility, it would be preferable to a number of different resolutions none of which had any chance of unanimous support.

7. In reply to all this Stassen suggested:

(1) That our press officers meet after each meeting to concert the line taken with the press. This was generally agreed although there is little prospect that the press officers could reach agreement if the Heads of Delegations could not.

(2) He thought we might set up a Working Committee of officials to try to harmonize our views on the substance of disarmament proposals including pre-Geneva proposals. No final decision was reached on this and it is in any case subject to the same objection that if there are real differences in policy such a working group would be of little value.

(3) On the resolution, he said that he was very grateful for the forthright views expressed to him but he hoped that we would be able to re-consider and that we might be able to support the tabling of the resolution next Tuesday instead of this Friday. He made no attempt to meet the arguments advanced against the tactics of early tabling of the resolution but spoke only on the merits of the Eisenhower plan itself on the apparent assumption that opposition to the immediate tabling of the resolution was really opposition to the Eisenhower plan.

8. The United Kingdom Delegation later showed us a telegram from the Foreign Office to Washington asking that the State Department be left in no doubt that the Foreign Secretary strongly supported the position taken by Nutting on tabling the resolution.

9. Our final impression of the meeting was that Stassen will probably table the resolution next week.

MEETING OF DISARMAMENT COMMISSION<sup>100</sup>

At the meeting of the Disarmament Commission this afternoon statements were made by representatives of Canada, France, United States, China and the U.S.S.R.

2. The definitive text of Mr. Martin's statement will be sent to you by bag,<sup>101</sup> the U.S. delegation was particularly pleased by the references to the Eisenhower plan and before Mr. Martin had finished speaking they asked for a text to be used immediately in "Voice of America" broadcasts. In his statement Lodge said he deeply appreciated the references to President Eisenhower's plan in the Canadian statement. We were a little surprised by the warmth of the American reaction since the statement did not accept the Eisenhower plan unreservedly but made clear our view that it requires much further development and elaboration and that it must be considered in conjunction with other proposals. However, neither Moch nor Nutting made any substantial reference to the Eisenhower plan and the Canadian reaction has been consistently warmer than that of the U.K. and French delegations.

3. In a brief intervention Moch stressed that time was not appropriate for discussion of disarmament either in the Commission or in the Assembly. On the substance of the question he reiterated his view that no particular plan was acceptable except as part of a wider agreement but that, at the same time, no absolutely comprehensive programme covering everything we eventually hope for could be achieved.

4. Lodge said that the U.S. wanted a real debate on disarmament both in the Commission and in the Assembly but that this was not the time to have it. Every member of the Commission and of the United Nations had a right to play its part and the Soviet proposal would make this impossible.<sup>102</sup> His most interesting remarks were on the reservation of earlier U.S. positions. He had given us to understand privately that he thought he could restate this reservation in a way that would deprive the U.S.S.R. of any propaganda advantage from it. In fact, his statement appeared to us even more categorical and negative than Stassen's formulations. He set forth three reasons for the U.S. reservation on its earlier disarmament proposals:

- (1) The problem of accounting for stockpiles of weapons and weapons material;
- (2) The requirement for time to make a new study of the problem of inspection;
- (3) The fact that not only science but the present international situation, in short the "facts of life", placed their own reservation on all earlier disarmament proposals.

5. The first two of these reasons are essentially the ones Stassen has used but the third is a sweeping and imprecise assertion which might be interpreted to mean that U.S. policy on prohibition would not necessarily be affected even by the achievement of the "scientific breakthrough" of which Mr. Stassen has spoken so frequently.

Although the Soviet representative had earlier agreed with a Western suggestion to postpone the meeting until after the Foreign Ministers' conference in Geneva, Sobolev asked that the Disarmament Commission reconvene in mid-October.

6. Sobolev then replied to the statements made, attempting to rebut each in turn by repeating his view that discussion now in the Commission and in the Assembly would clear the air and assist the Geneva discussion. He also gave a detailed restatement of the Soviet May 10 proposals and of the Bulgarian letter to President Eisenhower.<sup>103</sup> He concluded that the Commission should make its own report to the Assembly as soon as possible in order to permit Assembly discussion of the disarmament item.

7. As had been agreed at a meeting of the Chairman [Sarper] and the U.S., U.K., French and Canadian representatives, the Chairman then remarked that the consensus of the meeting was that further meetings of the Disarmament Commission would be most useful when it would be possible to take full account of the report of the sub-Committee and of the Geneva Conference and, unless there were objections, he proposed that the Commission should now adjourn and hold its next meeting at a time fixed in the light of the considerations he had just mentioned.

8. Sobolev naturally objected and proposed that the next meeting of the Disarmament Commission should be held on Wednesday, October 26. The Chairman suggested that since only one of the 12 members of the commission did not agree, the meeting should adjourn and leave it to the next Chairman to take what action he considered appropriate. (Sarper is Chairman until the end of October when Sobolev becomes Chairman.) Sobolev also objected to this and the Chairman then said that the decision was in the hands of the meeting. Nutting and Moch expressed the hope that Sobolev would not press for a meeting on the 26th in view of the difficulty this would cause in connection with the Geneva Conference which begins on the following day. Sobolev said he did not insist on putting his proposal to a vote provided the record showed quite clearly that he was opposed to the Chairman's suggestion. We therefore adjourned without fixing the date of the next meeting.

9. It is, of course, conceivable that the Soviet Delegation will still request a further meeting of the Commission, or, when Sobolev becomes Chairman on November 1, he may call a meeting. Under the rules of procedure of the Disarmament Commission, the Chairman may call a meeting when he thinks it necessary and he is required to call a meeting when requested to do so by any member of the Commission.<sup>104</sup>

MEETINGS OF THE DISARMAMENT COMMISSION

In view of the prospect of further discussions in the Disarmament Commission next week, we have given some thought here to the problems which are likely to arise in the course of the debate and to the tactics which we think might be considered.

2. In spite of the failure of the Geneva Conference we are still convinced that there is hope of reaching some agreement on disarmament even if only on a limited basis and that Western tactics in the Commission and in the General Assembly debates should be based on that assumption. As soon as we have the full record of the Geneva discussions, we think that we should examine very carefully the measure of common ground which may exist between us and the USSR and that we should suggest that further discussions should aim at developing the maximum degree of agreement compatible with commonly held positions.

3. We anticipate that in the Disarmament Commission there will be two and possibly three stages in the debate: (a) the Big Four will attempt to explain and justify the position they took in Geneva; (b) the other members of the Commission will then comment on the situation as it will appear to them in the light of the record of the sub-Committee discussions and of the Geneva proceedings; (c) the Commission may then merely transmit to the Assembly the record of the sub-Committee and of its own discussions on the subject or an attempt may be made at this stage to develop an agreed resolution which could be submitted to the Assembly for approval.

4. From our point of view, it would be desirable and easier to attempt to promote agreement on an acceptable resolution in the Commission rather than in the Assembly. We propose, if you agree, to urge the Western members of the sub-Committee to pursue in the Commission their efforts to reach agreement with the USSR on the future programme of action. The choice is still between a procedural resolution or we fear a renewed attempt on the part of the U.S.A. to secure majority endorsement for the Eisenhower plan. As long as we remain convinced that further progress may be possible in the field of disarmament, we are bound I think to recommend the procedural formula and to resist the attempts to turn the debate into a cold war operation. As a consequence, we are also I think and for the same reason bound to suggest that the effort to develop the agreed resolution should be made in the Commission rather than in the Assembly where the presence of the Indians, for instance, may considerably complicate the task.

5. The procedural resolution, we envisage, might be along the following lines: (a) It could refer in general terms to the various proposals which have been advanced: it is undesirable to list them specifically as this involves difficulties in regard to priorities; (b) It should recognize the technical difficulties involved in attempting to develop a scheme of disarmament which would call for the complete prohibition and elimination of atomic weapons; (c) It should point out that the proposals made so far clearly disclose the existence of common grounds between the parties concerned; (d) It should suggest that without giving up the objective of a more comprehensive arrangement on disarmament, as a first step, a more limited scheme based on agreed positions and providing for adequate control and inspection should be negotiated and implemented as soon as possible.

6. The problem will then arise of determining whether the search for a limited agreement should be undertaken by the sub-Committee with its present or with a larger membership or whether the task should be assigned to a broader body such as the Disarmament Commission itself. Here again our course is bound to be influenced by the view we adopt as to the prospects of agreement. It is clear to us that the smaller the group, the more confidential the discussion, the easier it will be to make any progress. If, for instance, the Indians or the Italians were to take part in the discussion, the temptation would be very great for the major powers not to negotiate but to rehearse the propaganda battle which they would expect to develop during the following session of the Assembly.

7. We appreciate, of course, that just as we ourselves have argued in the case of the admission of new members, some countries may take the line that after two years the sub-Committee has failed to break the deadlock and that a debate in the Assembly in spite of the risks involved is bound to compel the parties concerned to review their respective positions very carefully and to follow perhaps a course which may be more flexible and more promising in terms of possible agreement because it would be calculated to appeal to the majority. Our objection to this course is that it is based on the assumption that a complete deadlock has been reached and that only outside pressure can now overcome big power reluctance, even strengthened by propaganda postures, to move forward. We do not (group corrupt) the possibility that such outside pressure may be required at some later stage but, as we indicated above, we consider that the prospects of negotiations have not been exhausted and that the sub-Committee should be given another opportunity to promote agreement quietly between the major countries concerned before the General Assembly seeks directly to resolve the issue.

8. These are merely preliminary views which have occurred to us, and, before we approach the other Western Delegations which are members of the sub-Committee, we should appreciate very much receiving your comments and suggestions in the course we propose to follow. The disarmament experts have not yet arrived in New York. As Mr. Moch is very keen that the meetings of the Commission should begin on Tuesday there may be very little opportunity for detailed consultations between the Western Delegations. We should appreciate for this reason an early indication of your views on the foregoing.

DISARMAMENT COMMISSION

I am in general agreement with the course outlined in your telegram including the suggestion for a procedural resolution proceeding from the Commission and the proposal that the Assembly should aim at the adoption of a unanimous resolution instead of attempting to force a decision on the Eisenhower plan. The latest Geneva meetings certainly gave no indication that the Russians were prepared to agree to the plan except on their own terms, and no purpose is likely to be served by manoeuvring them into a position where they might feel compelled to support a programme which they would have no intention of implementing or else of forcing a protracted and unprofitable debate.

2. While you should work toward this end, I think we should leave the initiative in this particular exercise to others if at all possible. The Americans may well insist on other procedures, and to rally the forces against them on still another issue at this time may not be wise in the long run. Since our views on disarmament will probably be shared by two other Western members of the sub-Committee who were present in Geneva, it might be better to let them carry the ball this time.

EISENHOWER PROPOSALS ON DISARMAMENT

When I was in New York Mr. Martin expressed on a number of occasions anxiety that we should be prepared as soon as possible in the Disarmament Commission or in the Assembly to take a firm stand in favour of the Eisenhower proposals. The British and French had already done so and our position required clarification. Furthermore, our view of the plan was more enthusiastic than that of the British and the French and the Americans would appreciate a firm statement on behalf of their plan.

2. The view which I expressed to Mr. Martin was that we should hesitate to express too strong support in public unless we were prepared to accept the extension of the proposals to Canadian territory. It is true that the original Eisenhower plan spoke only of a bilateral agreement covering Soviet and American territories, but at Geneva Mr. Dulles expressed willingness to consider extending the proposal to cover U.S. bases abroad.<sup>105</sup> He stated also at Geneva that the British and French had agreed to this extension. At present there has been no firm decision on the part of Canada as to whether or not we would agree to the extension of the Eisenhower proposals to cover U.S. bases in Canada or Canadian bases on our own soil. Such a decision is of so great importance to our defence that it would have to be reached, I should think, after solemn deliberation in the Cabinet Defence Committee and after a good deal of study by the Defence authorities. Pending such a decision, we should be careful about statements in New York which might commit us in advance.

3. There has been some communication with National Defence on the subject. We drew the Eisenhower proposals to the attention of the Chairman of the Chiefs of Staff and on October 6 we sent along the more detailed proposals as we had received them from New York. General Foulkes' reply of October 21, † by an unfortunate error, went straight to file without having been seen by anyone here concerned with the subject. In this letter, General Foulkes expresses the view that "Canada should support the Americans in putting forward the Eisenhower proposals". I am not at all sure, however, whether the views expressed somewhat casually in this letter would be considered sufficient on which to base a strong

There was a meeting of the four Western sub-Committee delegations this afternoon (attended by Mr. Lodge, Mr. Nutting, Mr. Moch and Mr. Martin) to discuss the United States draft resolution quoted in our telegram under reference and to consider tactics for disarmament in the Disarmament Commission which meets tomorrow morning, as well as in the Assembly.

2. The United States position set forth by Lodge and Wadsworth was that we should try both in the Disarmament Commission and in the Assembly to obtain a clear-cut endorsement for the Eisenhower plan and the other ideas mentioned in the draft resolution, i.e., Soviet control posts, budgetary information as outlined in the Faure plan, and the Eden suggestion of studying problems of inspection and control. He thought we could at least obtain a very large majority for such a resolution and, by building up the pressure of world public opinion, we might even induce the U.S.S.R. to support it. Regarding the Disarmament Commission, he did not insist on a resolution, but he felt that in some way the Disarmament Commission should transmit positive recommendations along these lines to the Assembly rather than merely handing on the undigested sub-Committee records.

On December 7, 1955, Martin gave a speech in the First Committee of the United Nations General Assembly in which he expressed support for the Eisenhower proposals. For the text of the speech, see United Nations, Official Records of the General Assembly, Tenth Session, First Committee, 805th Meeting, December 7, 1955, pp. 249-251.

3. Nutting and Moch took essentially the same position, sharply at variance with the United States suggestion. Both preferred the briefest possible Disarmament Commission debate and a simple transmittal of the sub-Committee record to the Assembly without any attempt at a general directive from the Commission on the Assembly. In the Assembly both favour an attempt to secure unanimous agreement on a simple procedural resolution which does little more than call on the sub-Committee to resume its labours. Both expressed the fear that a broader resolution such as that suggested by the United States would leave the United Kingdom and French delegations open to the danger of embarrassing amendments which they could hardly refuse and which the United States could not accept. Such amendments, for example, might introduce the levels of forces proposed in London by the United Kingdom and French delegations, the prohibition of atomic weapons after two-thirds of conventional reductions, and the complete elimination of atomic weapons simultaneously with the carrying out of the final one-third of conventional reductions. Amendments along these lines could be introduced in words quoted directly from United Kingdom or French proposals. Both Moch and Nutting argued strongly that the only possibility of avoiding this difficulty was to insist on a purely procedural resolution.

4. Lodge said that he found the statements made by Nutting and Moch profoundly disappointing. The United States draft resolution was based directly on a paper which had been agreed by the three Foreign Ministers in Geneva — if this would help the situation, the United States could use exactly the same text as the Geneva Declaration — and he found it strange that proposals accepted by the Foreign Ministers in Geneva could not be accepted by Assembly Delegations in New York.<sup>107</sup> He thought that we had in the meeting of the Disarmament Commission and in the Assembly's debate on disarmament a tremendous opportunity to put the United Nations on the record in favour of the Eisenhower plan and the other proposals which are included, and he was sure that if this were done in a sufficiently bold and vigorous way it would have an effect on the Soviet position. If the other delegations could not support the United States in this matter, his delegation would have to consider taking action alone, but his government would very much prefer an initiative jointly undertaken by all the Western members of the Disarmament sub-Committee.

5. Nutting interjected that the position at Geneva was a good deal different from the Assembly position where the Soviet Union had a number of important more or less neutral nations whose support they might be able to win, particularly if they could argue that the U.S.S.R. was advancing views until recently held by the Western Powers, at least by the United Kingdom and France. Nutting also put the case rather sharply against the Eisenhower plan, "We accuse the Russians," he said, "of advocating disarmament without inspection. The Eisenhower plan, on the other hand, is inspection without disarmament." Lodge denied this and said that the United States position was that they would agree to some disarmament along with the implementation of the Eisenhower plan, although this statement does not seem to accord with the United States position advanced by Stassen in the sub-Committee, or, for that matter, with the draft resolution in our telegram under reference. In this resolution, the Eisenhower plan and other inspection proposals suggested in operative paragraph 3 are described as a "prelude to a general disarmament programme". If they could be described as a "part" of such a programme, the position vis-à-vis the U.S.S.R. would be a good deal stronger.

6. Mr. Martin said that he had a good deal of sympathy for the general position advanced by Lodge that we should not rest our case in the Assembly merely on a procedural resolution, but that we should be willing to advance and support some more substantial outline of inspection and disarmament proposals. He said that we had not yet had time to study the United States draft resolution, but that at first glance it seemed on the whole satisfactory. He suggested that the difficulties foreseen by Moch and Nutting would arise in any event, even if we had a narrowly procedural resolution. In that case, other delegations, for example India, would probably table their own resolutions which might well contain parts of earlier Western proposals which now create difficulties for the United States, and might, therefore, reveal disunity in the Western camp. However, these differences were now on record in the sub-Committee in any case, and would no doubt be produced in the Assembly debate. If, therefore, a simple procedural resolution would not save us from the difficulties expected by Moch and Nutting, the arguments in favour of a meatier resolution were strong.

7. Regarding the Disarmament Commission, Mr. Martin said that he was inclined to agree with Moch and Nutting that it would be better not to put forward the Western resolution there. Since in any event we would have to make the case for such a resolution a second time in the Assembly, it seemed better to restrict the discussion in the Disarmament Commission and get on as soon as possible to the consideration of disarmament in the Assembly. In conclusion, Mr. Martin suggested that it would not be profitable for us to try to resolve these important differences among us today, and the meeting adjourned without any general agreement having been reached.

8. Moch will speak first in the Disarmament Commission tomorrow morning, but beyond that we have very little indication of the likely development of the debate.

DISARMAMENT

My immediately following telegram contains text of a revision we have prepared within the delegation of the U.S. draft resolution.

2. This new draft differs in a number of respects from the U.S. original:

(a) reference is made to the ultimate elimination of nuclear weapons if adequate safeguards are discovered;

(b) paragraph (c) of the introduction has been revised to remove the implication that the taxation burden would remain at the present level;

(c) the point is made in the introduction that pending agreement on a complete disarmament programme extending to all kinds of armaments, including nuclear weapons, it might still be possible to reach agreement on such limitations and reductions or armaments as can be effectively controlled;

(d) the revised draft suggests that the Eisenhower plan could be implemented not as a prelude to but as the first part of a comprehensive programme.

3. It seems to us that the revisions we suggest might go some way towards meeting the U.S.S.R. attitude as regards the elimination of nuclear weapons and the incorporation of the Eisenhower plan into a wider disarmament programme.

4. From the U.S. point of view we think that the revision might perhaps be acceptable in so far as it does not suggest that a scheme should be developed which would involve the immediate elimination of nuclear weapons but which would yet give priority to a combination of the Eisenhower plan and the Bulganin plan. The arrangement we foresee would call for the establishment of an early warning system against sudden attack as part and parcel of as comprehensive a scheme on disarmament as can be effectively controlled at this stage.

5. We should be glad to have your comments on our suggested revision to the U.S. draft. We would appreciate receiving your suggestions if at all possible some time tomorrow as we are anxious to have discussions on this matter with the other Western members of the sub-Committee before the disarmament debate in the Assembly which could be held early next week.

DISARMAMENT

Following is the revised text of the draft U.S. resolution mentioned in my immediately preceding telegram. Text begins:

The General Assembly,

Reviewing the report of the Disarmament Commission on the work of its sub-Committee, as contemplated in General Assembly Resolution 808 (IX) of 4 November 1954,<sup>108</sup>

Noting the efforts of the sub-Committee carried on in the spirit of the conference of the Heads of Government of July 1955 to reach agreement on a satisfactory system of disarmament,

Observing that the members of the Disarmament Commission sub-Committee appear to agree on the following:

(a) Inspection, control, limitation, reduction of armaments and, ultimately, if adequate safeguards are discovered, the elimination of nuclear weapons can best be achieved in an atmosphere which is free of fear and suspicion;

(b) The renunciation of the use of nuclear weapons and all other weapon in any manner inconsistent with the Charter of the United Nations;

(c) The need to relieve the burden of armaments on nations and to increase assistance to less developed countries with the material resources that would be released by agreements in the disarmament field;

(d) The fact that an effective system of inspection and control is the keystone of any disarmament programme, and, consequently, the need to establish an organ responsible for the inspection and control of agreed measures of disarmament under effective safeguards;

(e) The fact that there are possibilities beyond the reach of international control for evading this control and for organizing the clandestine manufacture of atomic and hydrogen weapons even if there is a formal agreement on international control;

(f) The need for continued scientific search by each State, with appropriate consultation between Governments, for methods which might be derived from evolving scientific knowledge that would make possible a thoroughly effective inspection and control system of nuclear weapons material as part of a disarmament programme covering all kinds of armaments;

(g) Pending agreement on a disarmament programme covering all kinds of armaments, the need to arrive at agreements on such limitations and reductions of armaments and of armed forces as can be effectively controlled;

1. Requests the Disarmament Commission acting initially through its sub-Committee to seek agreement on a comprehensive programme for disarmament which will promote international peace and security with the least diversion for armament of the world's human and economic resources.

2. Recommends that the Disarmament Commission reconvene its sub-Committee at an early date and seek to develop early agreement on the widest possible programme for disarmament which can be effectively controlled and that, as the first part of such a comprehensive programme, the States concerned

(a) Should agree promptly to put into simultaneous operation in order to help prevent a surprise attack:

(i) a plan for exchange of military blueprints and aerial inspection on the basis of the proposal of the President of the United States on July 21, 1955; and

(ii) a plan for establishing control posts at key points, as suggested in the proposals of the USSR of May 10, 1955;

(b) Should also agree:

(i) to arrange for the exchange and publication of information regarding military expenditures and budgets, as suggested by the Prime Minister of France on July 22, [sic] 1955; and

(ii) to study how best to gain practical experience regarding the problems of inspection and control, as suggested by the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom on July 21, 1955.

3. Requests that the Disarmament Commission report to the next session of the General Assembly. Text ends.

DISARMAMENT

We are in general agreement with the suggestions made in your telegram No. 337. With regard to your first amendment we would suggest that the provision concerning the prohibition of use of nuclear weapons (your paragraph "B") should come first in view of the priority which the Russians are giving to this proposition and also of its world wide appeal. To our mind this appeal would be substantially enhanced if the wording could be amended to indicate unanimous agreement on the renunciation of the use of nuclear and other weapons "except in defence against aggression". The words "in any manner inconsistent" in the present text might be replaced by the word "except in defence against aggression in accordance". Your paragraph "A" might appropriately become the second last paragraph of the preamble.

2. The wording of your second amendment (paragraph "C") can be interpreted to mean that all savings resulting from disarmament would be earmarked for technical assistance. This, you may recall, was one of the main objections to the original Faure proposals. Unless some satisfactory formula can be found to eliminate this implication we consider that a more specific wording along the lines of Resolution 724 A (VIII) should be used.<sup>109</sup>

3. With regard to your paragraph (G) we are not too clear at this end whether the Russians can be regarded as having agreed to the proposition contained in this paragraph.

4. We would hesitate to recommend that the sub-Committee be reconvened "at an early date". Our understanding is that the United States' report will only be submitted to their [National] Security Council about the middle of January.<sup>110</sup> Even if this dead line is met, a relatively long delay will be required for final decision by the Council and most of all for other Western members to digest the report and then negotiate a common line in preparation for the sub-Committee meetings. Unless United States and other Western members are convinced that all this can be achieved within a fairly short time, we would suggest the Assembly resolution should be as non-committal as possible with regard to the time when the sub-Committee should reconvene.

5. We still think a less elaborate preamble would have been preferable. It may be, however, that the line suggested in the United States draft is the only course practicable if all interests are to be reconciled.

6. We have misgivings about the use in disarmament texts of the term "blueprint". It is a somewhat slovenly metaphor which could produce dangerous confusion as to whether it should be interpreted literally or figuratively. While we realize that it may be difficult to suggest alternatives at this stage to the Americans, you might bear this in mind in future discussions.

2. The first meeting on disarmament will be held on Wednesday morning and we understand that the Soviet Representative, Kuznetsov, will be the first speaker. A meeting of the Heads of the Four Western sub-Committee Delegations has been arranged for tomorrow afternoon to consider further tactics for the disarmament debate, particularly the question of a resolution. We have given copies of our draft resolution (revised in accordance with your telegram No. V-176 of November 25) to the United States and United Kingdom Delegations and are also sending a copy to the French Delegation. We have received from the United Kingdom Delegation a proposed draft resolution on disarmament which seems to cover essentially the same points as our draft.

DISARMAMENT

There was a meeting this afternoon attended by Moch, Lodge, Nutting and Martin to consider the question of a draft resolution on disarmament. Lodge said that he could accept something very close to the United Kingdom draft (our telegram No. 357 of November 28) and Moch said he preferred the United Kingdom draft to the earlier United States draft but that his first preference would be the Canadian draft. Lodge's chief difficulty with the Canadian draft is the phrase "as the first part of such a comprehensive programme" in operative paragraph 2.

2. Nutting expressed a different objection to the Canadian draft, namely that a "widest possible programme for disarmament which can be effectively controlled" (operative paragraph 2) covers much too large a field. When we enquired whether paragraph 7(ii) of the United Kingdom draft did not mean much the same thing as the Canadian sentence to which he objected, he said that the United Kingdom intention was much more restricted. The United Kingdom phraseology covered only such disarmament as could be effectively controlled and also only such disarmament as was practicable in the light of the current international situation. Developing this point, he said that it had always been the United Kingdom view that certain major international political settlements must necessarily precede the putting into effect of a comprehensive disarmament programme. In particular he had in mind the reunification of Germany on satisfactory terms. Mr. Martin said that this seemed to him to indicate a retreat in the United Kingdom position on disarmament but Nutting contended that political prerequisites had always been part of his government's policy. We pointed out that the Anglo-French plan, as tabled in London on March 8 by Canada, France, United Kingdom and United States, mentions no political conditions of this sort which must be met before the plan would go into effect.<sup>112</sup> Nutting replied that, nevertheless, such conditions were "understood".

3. Moch (who was the author of the plan) intervened to say that he had not understood such political conditions or limitations on the plan. His view had always been that we should proceed to implement such disarmament as was capable of effective control.

4. We agreed to have meetings again to-morrow, first at the official level and then with Heads of Delegations to try to seek agreement on the text of a resolution. It is, at any rate, an advance in the United States position over the line taken by Stassen that they can support the United Kingdom draft, but we feel that if the United Kingdom delegation interprets its draft as frankly in public as it did to-day, the Western case on disarmament will be seriously weakened. For example, it can already be argued that our response to the Soviet May 10 proposal was the sudden discovery of the technical and scientific impossibility of nuclear prohibition; now, if there should be any danger of merely conventional disarmament, we are ready with new and difficult political conditions.

5. We have given preliminary consideration to the following redraft of paragraph 7 of the United Kingdom draft resolution:

"7. Urges that the States concerned, and particularly those of the Disarmament Subcommittee, whilst continuing to seek agreement on a comprehensive disarmament plan, should give priority to an early agreement on such a disarmament programme as can, with suitable safeguards to be put into effect (in present conditions), including (preferably as a prelude) the early implementation of such confidence building measures of President Eisenhower's plan for exchanging military blue-prints and mutual aerial inspection and Marshal Bulganin's plan for establishing control posts at strategic centres."

6. It would be better to delete the phrase "in present conditions" in the above re-draft but it could be left in provided the United Kingdom did not intend to develop explicitly and openly the view expressed to us to-day. The phrase "preferably as a prelude" might also be deleted if the Soviet Union were strongly opposed to it and the United States would agree to its deletion.

7. On the general question of a possible Soviet reaction to a Western draft resolution, Lodge and Nutting were both of the view that even if the U.S.S.R. opposed certain parts of a Western draft, it would probably support that part of a draft re-establishing the Subcommittee and that it was, therefore, not necessary (however desirable) to have unanimity on the whole resolution in order to have Soviet agreement on continuing the Subcommittee.

DISARMAMENT

My immediately following telegram contains the text of a revised draft resolution on disarmament. This draft is based mainly on the earlier United Kingdom draft but paragraph 7(ii)(b) has been revised to make it less apparent that there may be other conditions, such as the political conditions mentioned by Nutting, in addition to the usual control and inspection conditions which we have always accepted. At a meeting this afternoon of the Four Western sub-Committee Delegations, Mr. Martin indicated that he thought we could accept this draft which is also acceptable to the United Kingdom Delegation. The United States Delegation expects instructions within 24 hours and seems likely to be able to accept this draft. Moch feels that it represents a substantial withdrawal from positions formerly taken by France and the United Kingdom but he is seeking instructions as to whether he can co-sponsor it.

2. We are inclined to agree that it will require some ingenuity to demonstrate in the debate that this draft resolution is not a retreat for the United Kingdom, France and Canada because it does not mention nuclear prohibition of any sort except insofar as nuclear weapons are implied in the phrase "comprehensive disarmament plan" in paragraph 7. Nevertheless, if the United States can co-sponsor it, it is a significant advance for them as compared with Stassen's position. Paragraph 7 does not state that the Eisenhower plan must be implemented before any disarmament measures are carried out. Part (a) and part (b) of paragraph 7 are on an equal footing.

3. Nutting is anxious that this resolution be tabled as soon as possible so that it will have priority over any other resolutions on disarmament that may emerge. We agreed at the meeting to delay tabling at least until Friday in the hope of achieving joint sponsorship of all Four Western Members of the sub-Committee.

DISARMAMENT

The French Delegation is now able to co-sponsor the resolution given in our telegram under reference with the addition of a new paragraph which will become paragraph 1 and which will read along the following lines: "Recalling Resolution 808 (IX) adopted unanimously by the Ninth General Assembly". This addition is acceptable to the United Kingdom Delegation and Lodge, while he is consulting Washington, seemed confident that the United States Delegation would be able to co-sponsor the draft resolution including this additional paragraph.

2. Nutting is most anxious to table the resolution tonight in order to have it before the Committee when he speaks tomorrow, and in view of this and the probability that by tonight all the other Three Western Members of the Sub-Committee will be co-sponsors, we have informed the United Kingdom delegation that Canada is also willing to co-sponsor the draft resolution.

3. The reference to last year's unanimous resolution we think strengthens the draft, and we understand that Nutting will not say anything in his statement tomorrow which will lay us open to the charge that we are now making disarmament explicitly dependent upon certain political settlements.

DISARMAMENT

Following is the text of a number of Soviet amendments to the Western draft resolution. Text begins:

Union of Soviet Socialist Republics: Amendments to the Joint Draft Resolution submitted by Canada, France, United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and United States of America (A/C.1/L.150)

1. Insert the following as the first paragraph of the preamble:

"Noting with satisfaction the efforts made by States, particularly of late, to relax international tension, to promote mutual confidence and to develop cooperation among States, and the particular importance in this respect of the Geneva Conference of the Heads of Government of the Four Powers, the Bandung Conference of the Asian and African countries, and the development of contacts between the political leaders of States";

2. In the second paragraph of the preamble insert the words "the removal of the threat of war" before the words "and the reduction of the burden of armaments".

3. Replace the fourth, fifth and sixth paragraphs of the preamble by the following:

Welcoming the agreement on objectives reached during the meetings of the Sub-Commission of the Disarmament Commission in 1955;

Noting the rapprochement between the powers on several important questions concerning the establishment of maximum levels for the armed forces of the Five Powers, France, the United Kingdom, the United States of America, China and the Soviet Union, and on the order to be followed in the execution of measures for the prohibition of atomic weapons and the need to set up effective international control,".

4. In the seventh paragraph of the preamble replace the words "of the limitation and reduction of armaments" by the words "of disarmament".

5. Add the following at the end of sub-paragraph 1(a) of the operative part "in accordance with Resolution 808(IX) of 4 November 1954;".

6. Reword sub-paragraph 1(b)(i) of the operative part of the resolution to read as follows:

"(1) the proposals of the Soviet Government of 10 May and 21 July 1955 on the reduction of armaments,<sup>113</sup> the prohibition of atomic weapons and the removal of the threat of a new war; President Eisenhower's plan for exchanging military blueprints and mutual aerial inspection; the proposal of the Prime Minister of France and the proposal of the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom presented at Geneva, and relevant proposals of other States;".

DISARMAMENT

At a meeting of officials today of delegations of the United States, United Kingdom, France and Canada we discussed the Soviet amendment to the Western draft resolution.

2. On the first Soviet amendment the United States and United Kingdom could accept and the French were seeking instructions on the following paragraph, similar to that suggested by the U.S.S.R., which would be inserted as a new paragraph 1:

"Expressing the hope that efforts to relax international tensions, to promote mutual confidence, and to develop cooperation among States, such as the Geneva Conference of the Heads of Government, the Bandung Conference and the tenth anniversary commemorative meeting of the United Nations at San Francisco<sup>114</sup> will prove effective in promoting world peace."

3. The United States, United Kingdom and French delegations can accept the second Soviet amendment affecting the second paragraph of the preamble.

4. The third Soviet amendment to replace the fourth, fifth and sixth paragraphs of the preamble is not acceptable to these other Western delegations. The Soviet suggestion that we note the rapprochement by the powers on levels of forces, prohibition of atomic weapons and effective international control would cause the greatest difficulties for the United States in view of their reservations over earlier positions. It is also not correct to talk of a rapprochement on the need to set up effective international control. There has been no substantial Soviet move to accept the essentials of the Western position on control.

5. The fourth Soviet amendment regarding the seventh paragraph of the preamble is acceptable to the United States, United Kingdom, and France.

6. The fifth Soviet amendment is also acceptable to these delegations.

For a report on the meetings in San Francisco to commemorate the tenth anniversary of the founding of the United Nations, see Canada, Department of External Affairs, External Affairs, Vol. 7, No. 9, September 1955, pp. 235-238.

7. The sixth Soviet amendment is not acceptable because the insertion of the Soviet proposals of May 10 and July 21 (i.e. a general disarmament programme, including prohibition of atomic weapons) into paragraph 1.(b)(i) would be essentially in contradiction to the thinking behind the present Western draft. Thus 1.(b)(i) is now devoted to the Eisenhower and Bulganin early warning proposals; Paragraph 1.(b)(ii) is devoted to such limited disarmament as is now feasible and capable of adequate safeguards. In addition, to this basic contradiction the Soviet proposals of May 10 and July 21 include many unacceptable details. For example, the introductory political proposals of the May 10 document.

8. The seventh Soviet amendment is irrelevant if the sixth is not accepted.

8. To meet the eighth Soviet amendment the other three delegations would be willing to revise paragraph 3 of the Western draft as follows:

“Recommends further that scientific research should be continued by each State, with appropriate consultation between governments, for methods that would make possible thoroughly effective inspection and control of nuclear weapons materials, having as its aim to facilitate the solution of the problem of comprehensive disarmament.”

9. Regarding the Indian draft resolution it is now our understanding that the Indian delegation will not press paragraph 3 of this draft since the question of an early session of the General Assembly in 1956 will probably be handled in another context.<sup>115</sup> To meet the first paragraphs of the Indian draft resolution the United Kingdom, United States and French delegations would be willing to add at the end of operative paragraph 2 of the Western draft resolution the following words:

10. The meeting of officials did not have time to discuss in detail the Indian amendments to the Western draft resolution. At first glance it would appear that a great many of these amendments are inconsequential and can be accepted. The proposal to enlarge the Disarmament Commission and to request the Disarmament Commission to enlarge the sub-Committee can perhaps be deferred temporarily on the grounds that the question of the size of United Nations bodies will have to be reconsidered if the new members are admitted.

11. There will be another meeting of officials tomorrow to consider further the Indian amendments.

12. We indicated general Canadian concurrence with the amendments which were acceptable to the other three Western delegations at the meeting, subject to any comments you may have to make and to further consideration by Mr. Martin.

DISARMAMENT

The four co-sponsors have now agreed on a revised text of the Western draft resolution.<sup>116</sup> This revision takes into account those Soviet amendments provisional acceptance of which was indicated in my telegram under reference as well as a number of the proposed Indian amendments tabled in document A/C.1/L.153. and the first two points of the Indian draft resolution regarding experimental nuclear explosions and an armaments truce.

2. Regarding the proposed Indian amendments we agreed that the first amendment quoting a large part of last year's resolution was unnecessary. We accepted the second Indian amendment and the substance of the third Indian amendment. The fourth, fifth and sixth Indian amendments have also to a large extent been embodied in the revised draft. The seventh amendment is no longer applicable in view of a change in our wording to meet a Soviet suggestion. On the eighth Indian amendment, to enlarge the Disarmament Commission and to request it to expand the sub-Committee, we agreed that we could take the line suggested in my telegram under reference, namely that enlargement of United Nations bodies would be considered in the context of the admission of new members.

3. We agreed that we could not accept the eleventh Indian amendment asking the Disarmament Commission to draft a disarmament convention without delay since the essence of the Western approach is that a general disarmament convention must grow out of the detailed work of the sub-Committee. Finally we agreed to accept the twelfth Indian amendment.

4. Our immediately following telegram contains the text of the Western draft resolution as revised to incorporate these Soviet and Indian suggestions. We believe that the changes made in the draft resolution serve to strengthen it and to reduce the opportunities of the Soviet delegation for claiming that we have gone back on earlier positions. We have therefore agreed with the tabling of this revision of the joint draft resolution. The United States and United Kingdom are also ready to table but the French delegation must await word from Paris on the insertion in the new first paragraph of a reference to the Bandung Conference. We hope during the course of the afternoon to ascertain from the Indian delegation to what extent they are satisfied by this revision and whether they will be willing not to press their other amendments.

1. Disarmament

United Nations Division: On December 16, the General Assembly adopted by a vote of 56 in favour, 7 against (Soviet Bloc) and no abstentions, the disarmament resolution approved by the Political Committee on the initiative of the Western members of the Disarmament Sub-Committee (Canada, France, United Kingdom, United States). The Communist countries had been the only opponents of the Four Power resolution in the vote of the Political Committee.

The resolution urges the States concerned and, particularly countries members of the Sub-Committee (1) to continue their efforts towards reaching agreement on a comprehensive disarmament programme and (2) "as initial steps, to give priority to early agreement on an implementation of (A) such confidence-building measures as President Eisenhower's plan for exchanging military blueprints and mutual aerial inspection, and Marshal Bulganin's plan for establishing control posts at strategic centres; and (B) all such measures of adequate safeguarded disarmament as are now feasible" in spite of the technical difficulties which have arisen in regard to the detection and control of nuclear weapon material. The resolution at the same time suggests that account be taken of the French proposals for the exchange of information on military budgets and the allocation of savings resulting from disarmament for economic development, of the Eden proposal for a "pilot scheme" on inspection and control and also of the Indian proposals regarding the suspension of nuclear tests and an "armaments truce".

The final text adopted embodied a number of Soviet and Indian amendments.<sup>118</sup> In spite of this, both countries insisted on a number of additional amendments all of which were defeated by a substantial majority. The closest vote was on the Syrian (and Indian) suggestion that the disarmament Commission and the Sub-Committee be enlarged. At the suggestion of the United States the Assembly decided by 35 votes in favour, 18 against and 7 abstentions that the Syrian amendment should not be put to the vote.

On December 12, 1955, the Western draft resolution was adopted by the First Committee by a vote of 53 in favour (Canada), 5 opposed (Soviet bloc) and no abstentions.

A United Kingdom motion that no vote be taken on a Soviet resolution under the Soviet item "Measures for the Further Relaxation of International Tension and Development of International Co-operation" was adopted by the Political Committee by a vote of 40 in favour (including Canada), 11 against (including Soviet Bloc, India, Indonesia, Yugoslavia) and 6 abstentions (including Burma, Argentina, Lebanon). The Soviet draft resolution referred inter alia to the reduction of international tension as a result of the first Geneva meeting and the Bandung Conference and underlined the importance of the Soviet disarmament proposals of May 10 and July 21, 1955.<sup>119</sup> In plenary, the Soviet Union did not ask for a vote on its resolution.

By the adoption of their resolution, the Western members of the Sub-Committee achieved their main purpose of securing General Assembly approval of the suggestion that priority be given by the Sub-Committee to the study of proposals aiming at the establishment of a warning system against a surprise attack and also to disarmament measures susceptible to adequate control. At this stage there are indications that the Sub-Committee will resume its work in February.

THE ALGERIAN QUESTION

Thirteen Arab-Asian nations have asked that the Algerian question be inscribed on the agenda of the Tenth Session of the United Nations General Assembly. This question has not been discussed before. The French are almost certain to object and to attempt to rally sufficient support to avert a two-thirds majority in favour of its inscription.

2. We have made a preliminary assessment of this question and I am attaching a paper which reaches the following conclusions:

(a) From the point of view of our interpretation of Article 2 (7) of the United Nations Charter, a discussion of the Algerian question appears to be within the competence of the United Nations.

(b) A discussion at this time of the Algerian question might do more harm than good. It might inspire increased unrest and undermine French efforts to implement constructive policies in North Africa.

(c) Although a vote against inscription might arouse suspicions concerning our sincerity on questions of self-determination, and although the present French policy of assimilation in Algeria is not very realistic, a United Nations discussion might only serve to arouse French resentment while making the situation more difficult to solve.

3. It seems to me that from the point of view of our own interests and those of North Atlantic security the strategic considerations are of first importance. A peaceful situation in North Africa would not only help to secure East-West communications through the Mediterranean and Africa but would also assist France to meet its commitments to NATO and SACEUR.<sup>120</sup> The Algerian problem is not capable of a quick solution and meanwhile French authority appears to be the only alternative to anarchy and violence. For these reasons I am inclined toward a vote against inscription of the Algerian question, accompanied by a frank explanation that although we recognize the gravity of the situation, a discussion at this time would only serve to increase unrest; in view of the constructive policies and the concessions which brought about a peaceful settlement in Tunisia, we are confident that measures will be introduced and implemented which will satisfy the aspirations of the peoples of Algeria and Morocco. An attitude of this kind would support the French position while putting that country on notice that political reforms must be promulgated in Algeria as well as in Morocco.

4. The situation in Algeria is still very fluid and it is too early to make a firm decision on this question. In addition, it will be necessary to synchronize our attitude with that we decide to adopt on other items of the Assembly agenda such as Cyprus and Morocco. Nevertheless, I would appreciate an indication of your views on this question as a preliminary to sounding out other governments.

5. In the light of alignments on the Tunisian and Moroccan questions at last year's General Assembly, the vote on inscription of the Algerian question is likely to be close and we will be under great pressure from both the French and the Arab-Asians. While my preliminary inclination is that outlined in paragraph 3 above, the situation is changing so rapidly that the instructions to our Delegation should be sufficiently flexible to allow for the possibility of an abstention in certain circumstances or even an affirmative vote if there should be a serious deterioration as a consequence of harsh French repressive measures in Algeria.<sup>121</sup>

INSCRIPTION OF THE ALGERIAN QUESTION ON THE AGENDA OF THE TENTH SESSION OF THE UNITED NATIONS GENERAL ASSEMBLY

Thirteen of the Arab-Asian nations have requested the Secretary-General of the United Nations to include "The Question of Algeria" in the agenda of the Tenth Session of the General Assembly. Although Tunisia and Morocco have been considered at previous

This is a balanced and cogent series of arguments on a very tricky subject. J.W. H[olmes]

Assemblies and a discussion on the latter territory has also been requested at the forthcoming session, this is the first time that the Algerian question has been raised. As a preliminary step it seems advisable to consider our attitude toward inscription of this item.

2. The French Government has consistently opposed discussion at the United Nations of Tunisia and Morocco and has boycotted the pertinent meetings on the grounds that the questions were of domestic jurisdiction. It seems probable that the French representatives will take an even more adamant stand on Algeria because whereas Tunisia and Morocco are protectorates of France, Algeria was conquered by the French in 1830 and is constitutionally a part of metropolitan France. The French will probably insist that Article 2 (7) of the United Nations Charter is applicable:

"Nothing contained in the present Charter shall authorize the United Nations to intervene in matters which are essentially within the domestic jurisdiction of any state or shall require the members to submit such matters to settlement under the present Charter; ..."

Initially, therefore it is necessary to decide whether in our view Article 2 (7) precludes a discussion on Algeria at the United Nations.

3. A United Nations Division's working paper (No. 54/21) in the "Charter Review Studies" examined this question.<sup>122</sup> The paper summarized the Canadian position in these words:

"In summary it may be said that Canadian policy with regard to Article 2 (7) has been consistently to favour a liberal interpretation i.e. one that safeguards the right to discuss and make recommendations for the peaceful adjustment of any situation, regardless of origin, which is deemed likely to impair the general welfare or friendly relations among nations".

The paper went on to suggest that the question of whether any given situation was one "likely to impair the general welfare or friendly relations among nations" should decide the competence issue.

4. Consistent with our position on Article 2 (7) we could vote in favour of including the Algerian item on the agenda, if we consider that the situation in Algeria is likely to impair the general welfare or friendly relations. Some observers have suggested that the Algerian situation is potentially even more explosive than that in Morocco and a French Parliamentary investigating commission recently reported that although there were relatively few rebels in Algeria (about 2500) the vast majority of the non-European population condoned or supported terrorist activities. Furthermore, the only logical explanation for the deployment of some 150,000 French troops in Algeria seems to be as a precautionary measure to enable the French to take effective action in the event of a popular uprising. In the first place then, this seems to be a situation likely to impair the general welfare. Is it also likely to impair friendly relations among nations? Although one reason for the Arab-Asian request that Algeria be discussed in the General Assembly is undoubtedly a desire to substitute the Algerian for the Tunisian question which is no longer suitable as a basis for criticising French "colonial" policy,<sup>123</sup> there is little doubt that the Algerian situation is affecting friendly relations and that it may be pushed to the point where it will affect them to a greater degree. From the point of view of our interpretation of Article 2 (7) of the Charter which has been stated on several occasions at previous General Assemblies, the Algerian question appears to be within the competence of the United Nations to discuss.

5. On the other side of the problem we could vote against inscription of an Algerian item if we deem a discussion of the question likely to do more harm than good. This facet of our position was explained by the Canadian Representative during the Seventh Session of the United Nations in these words:

"Although I make a distinction between discussion and intervention, I do not, of course, exclude the right of member states to oppose discussion of a question within the competence of the United Nations whenever it considers that a discussion at that particular time would be harmful rather than helpful ... But when a question is really one of timing, the case against discussion should not, it seems to us, be made on the grounds of the Assembly's incompetence".

Moreover, during the debate on inscription of the Cyprus item at last year's General Assembly our Representative maintained that a discussion of the item would not contribute to an improvement of the situation and might well have the opposite effect.<sup>124</sup> What effect would a United Nations discussion have on the situation in Algeria? On the one hand, there is reason to believe that United Nations discussions on Tunisia and Morocco have helped to force the French hand in those territories and that a discussion on Algeria would bring a smouldering situation into the open, thereby relieving some of the tension and the frustration of Algerian nationalists. On the other hand, it could be argued that a discussion would inspire an increase in rebel activities and general unrest in Algeria, and that it would be prejudicial to the development of constructive French policies not only in Algeria but also in Morocco. (It is too late to turn back in Tunisia). The recent debates in the French Parliament on North African policies showed that the Deputies realized the need for a new approach to the development of France's dependent territories. Reforms designed to bring the administration into closer contact with the Algerian population and to give the latter a greater say in its government are being planned and implemented. The French Government is also attempting to work out a solution of the Moroccan situation along lines similar to the successful settlement in Tunisia. French reaction to criticism at the United Nations might undermine the tenuous position of French liberals who have given the impetus to these measures. On the whole, it seems evident that a discussion at this time would do more harm than good.

6. There are a few other factors that should be considered in determining our attitude toward inscription of an Algerian item:

(a) The principle of self-determination is involved. The memorandum presented with the Arab-Asian request for inscription stresses that this is the basis of the argument for discussion of the Algerian question. The memorandum states:

"The right of self-determination occupies a position of decisive importance in the structure of the United Nations. In the first Article of the Charter it is specifically enumerated among the purposes and principles of the organization ... The emergence into independence of the peoples of many nations previously dependent is among the most encouraging features of the first decade of United Nations history. On the other hand the denial of the right of self-determination to other dependent peoples or undue delay in its implementation is a potential source of international friction and of concern to the international community".

In this particular case it might be difficult for us to explain away opposition to inscription of an Algerian item by saying that although we support the principle,<sup>125</sup> self-determination can be accomplished in many ways, and in questions of methods or timing the administering nation is often in the best position to adjudicate. The Arab-Asian emotional arguments would tend to make such a position appear as an equivocation thinly concealing sympathy for "colonial" policies. The French Parliamentary commission which investigated conditions in Algeria frankly revealed the serious shortcomings of the French administration and the political, economic and social discrimination against the indigenous inhabitants. In this light if we adopt a weak position on this question of principle, we might endanger our carefully cultivated reputation for objectivity in discussions on trust and dependent territories and we would run the risk of being classed as a "colonial" sympathizer or an unconvinced advocate of self-government.

(b) It is difficult to see how the French can continue indefinitely to insist that Algeria is an integral part of metropolitan France and that eventually the population will be assimilated. In the short run this position can only be maintained by force and there is evidence that, to a considerable degree, the necessary armed forces must be found at the expense of France's commitments to NATO. There is no doubt about the strategic importance of a peaceful situation in North Africa in order to ensure East-West lines of communication. Nevertheless, so far as NATO is concerned the threat of aggression is not from North Africa and adequate forces must be deployed in Europe to deter and if necessary combat aggression. In the long run the present French North African plans which grant autonomy to Tunisia and hold out the same prospect to Morocco while denying it to Algeria, do not seem sound. From this point of view it might not be desirable to support an untenable French position which will tie down a large part of the French armed forces for an indefinite period. A discussion of the problem during the forthcoming General Assembly might convince the French that Algeria must eventually be given self-government and that the present military and political situation in that territory is unrealistic.

(c) Finally, the French would strongly resent a Canadian vote in favour of discussing the Algerian question. In a recent despatch† our Embassy in Paris pointed out:

"The French are very sensitive about North Africa. They are perfectly aware that all is not well and much remains to be done. Lest they forget, they are reminded every day of their shortcomings by their own compatriots in the press and through other media of information."

It is one thing for us to draw a careful distinction between a United Nations "discussion" and United Nations "intervention" in Algeria, but it is quite another to keep a discussion and eventual recommendation from becoming intervention. Overt and implied criticism of French policies would be inevitable during a debate on Algeria and this might be particularly unfortunate at a time when the French Government is courageously endeavouring to overcome strong political opposition to progressive policies in Morocco. This consideration probably outweighs any advantages that might be gained in relations with the Arab-Asian nations if we were to support the request for inclusion of this item on the agenda. It probably also over-shadows the negative thought that whatever the progressive intentions and plans of the French Assembly, the latter has never been noted for its consistency and it is questionable how long the present Government and its North African policies may survive.

Do we? as a right? [auteur inconnu/author unknown]

7. In summary, according to our interpretation of Article 2 (7) of the Charter, a discussion of the Algerian question is within the competence of the United Nations. However, a discussion at this time might do more harm than good. A vote in favour of inscription would annoy and embarrass France and might contribute to additional unrest in Algeria and Morocco. A vote against inscription would run the risk of suspicions concerning our objectiveness and sincerity. An abstention would involve substantial elements of the objections on both sides of the question.

THE ALGERIAN QUESTION

I am seriously concerned over French policy in North Africa. French North Africa is of considerable if not vital interest to us militarily and politically because of our particularly close association with France and of our NATO relationship. Further, any serious disturbances in North Africa can upset the Strategic Air Command.

2. Personally, I believe that the policy of the French Government in North Africa during the last few years has been unimaginative, erratic and at times unrealistic. In the long run, it could have disastrous effects. We can pretty well foresee the results of a repressive policy: bloodshed, chaos and the eventual setting up of weak, independent states partly run by the Arab League. It is in our interest that such developments be avoided. On the other hand, there is little we can do directly. The solution can only be found in continued cooperation between the French and the North Africans. The pattern set for Tunisia is important in this respect. The French will not let go this — the last important — part of their empire and I don't think they should if it is possible for them to find ways to retain a type of control in defence and foreign affairs acceptable to the North Africans. Over the years — but I think within our own generation — the whole African Continent will be attaining a measure of self-government which will profoundly influence the balance of power in the world. If something goes wrong, developments there could seriously weaken what is now called the West. Within this context, French policy in North Africa as well as British policy in its colonies not to mention developments in South Africa are most important.

3. As pointed out earlier there is little we can do to help the French although I hope that anything we need do in connection with debates at the United Nations on the Moroccan, Tunisian and Algerian issues will be as constructive as possible. Directly, it would be inappropriate and undesirable for us to try to influence the French, although we might be more forthcoming in participating in technical assistance projects. (Our technicians might be as welcome there as they seem to be in Indochina). Indirectly, and mostly through the United Nations but possibly in due course also through NATO, we should show considerable understanding of the difficulties with which the French are faced and bear in mind the importance of that region for the whole of the NATO structure. It would not be in our interest at this stage in world affairs that French power be shaken and French power would be shaken considerably were present disturbances in its North African empire to continue for any length of time.

4. Bearing those general considerations in mind, the attached memorandum, dated August 23, on the Algerian question appears to suggest a fairly well balanced policy. I think it could be used as a basis on which to build our line of approach for the General Assembly.<sup>126</sup> We should consult Washington in the very near future; their stand on the North African issues will be very important particularly if they decide to try to keep in line the more irresponsible Latin American countries.

2. Algeria and the United Nations

European Division: France has withdrawn its delegation to the United Nations General Assembly in protest against the Assembly's decision (by one vote) to discuss the Algerian question. When Mr. Pearson arrived in Paris en route to Moscow two days after the vote, he was asked for the views of the Canadian Government on the Algerian decision. The Minister replied in part:

"I can only say that we opposed and regret this unfortunate decision to inscribe on the agenda a question which, under the Charter, falls so clearly within the domestic jurisdiction of France. Decisions of this kind can, in our view, only harm the United Nations, without advancing the cause of freedom and self-government in whose name they are made".

Although France will remain on the Security Council and the Sub-Committee on Disarmament, it is not clear whether the French intend to absent themselves from the entire session. Some delegations that had voted in favour of inscription are already having second thoughts. The French Government is particularly disturbed by the fact that two NATO countries, Greece and Iceland, had not voted against inscription of the Algerian item.

The Assembly rejected the General Committee's recommendation against inscription by a vote of 27 (including Canada, the United States and the old Commonwealth countries), to 28 (including the Afro-Asian nations and the Soviet bloc) and 5 abstentions. The Latin-American nations were split. The highlight of the debate was a dramatic intervention by the Belgian Foreign Minister, M. Spaak, who said that the very existence of the United Nations and of the continuation of the "spirit of Geneva" were threatened by this attempt to inquire into questions which were "clearly of domestic jurisdiction". After the vote the leader of the French delegation, M. Pinay, stated that the United Nations and not France would have to face the consequences of this clear violation of Article 2 (7) of the Charter. The French delegation then walked out.<sup>127</sup>

CHINESE REPRESENTATION IN THE UNITED NATIONS

The attached telegram from the Permanent Delegation to the United Nations† outlines a United Kingdom proposal to change the wording of the moratorium resolution, which was adopted at the Sixth, Seventh, Eighth, and Ninth Sessions, postponing consideration of the question of Chinese representation at the General Assembly for the current year. The United Kingdom is concerned lest a resolution along the lines of the one adopted at the Ninth Session ("The General Assembly decides not to consider at its Ninth Session during the current year any proposals to exclude representatives of the Republic of China or to seat representatives of the Central People's Government") might be adopted only with a reduced majority, the psychological effects of which might be harmful to the Western position. The United Kingdom, therefore, offered "as a very tentative suggestion" that the resolution be re-worded to read that ("The General Assembly decides that the time has not yet come to consider, etc."). While Wadsworth of the United States delegation is apparently also concerned about the possibility of a reduced majority in support of the moratorium, he said that he did not think that the State Department would like the United Kingdom proposal. However, Crosthwaite of the United Kingdom delegation told a meeting of old Commonwealth representatives that the United Kingdom did not intend making an issue out of the wording of the moratorium resolution. The United Kingdom was not formally committed to supporting the moratorium resolution, whatever its wording, but he was sure that it had every intention of doing so. Finally, the United Kingdom would like our views on the wording of the resolution, and on the substantive question whether there should be such a resolution to dispose of the question of Chinese representation.

2. There are many disadvantages to a moratorium resolution, whatever its wording. It is a delaying tactic which does nothing to solve the problem at issue at a time when many countries believe that the time is becoming ripe to attempt its solution, or at least to explore avenues which may lead to some satisfactory result. Since the moratorium resolution has been used as a tactical device since the Sixth Session, its reintroduction this year may give the appearance that on this particular issue the West is being intransigent. We should try to avoid a split on the issue that takes the form of the Soviet bloc plus the non-involved Asian nations against the West. The nations of Asia may consider with some justice that since the Bandung Conference and the other signs of an improved atmosphere for negotiation, the West should make an effort to modify its position. In such circumstances, the maintenance of our previous stand on the question of Chinese representation may give a semblance of validity to the Chinese claim that the Western countries are trying to avoid the discussion of Far Eastern problems, especially since Mr. Dulles has in fact been cool to the idea of a Far Eastern Conference at this time in spite of the fact that the Indians (as well as the Chinese) have supported the idea.

On November 25, the General Assembly agreed not to consider the Algerian question and, as a result, the French Delegation returned to the General Assembly. For additional details, see Canada, Department of External Affairs, Canada and the United Nations 1954-55, Ottawa: Queen's Printer, 1956, pp. 18-20.

3. From our own point of view, a modification of our stand may be desirable. If the Chinese can be convinced that our desire to move forward, and eventually to evolve a satisfactory pattern of relations with them, is sincere, then they may themselves be encouraged to make some concessions on fundamental problems. It is admittedly arguable whether we should make any concessions, and the State Department believes that the recent Chinese moves do not call for any counter-moves by the United States. When the matter is looked at objectively, this is undoubtedly so. The Chinese treatment of Colonel [John K.] Arnold [Jr.] and of the others in his group betrays a complete disregard for the individual, and the mildness of the United States reaction to the account of the tortures they underwent is remarkable.<sup>128</sup>

4. Nevertheless, if, as President Eisenhower said at San Francisco, we should not overlook any opportunity to promote the chances of peace,<sup>129</sup> then we should also be prepared to make concessions if only to avoid the re-occurrence of such an atmosphere of crisis as that which prevailed last winter and spring. We should take into account that the Chinese may themselves be pushed back into intransigence by what they consider to be intransigence on our part, an eventuality which is not unlikely in view of the gulf which still separates them from us. In these circumstances the United Nations may be the most appropriate forum for us to make known new proposals, since it is almost unanimously admitted that the admission of Communist China to the United Nations is inevitable, given the continued avoidance of a general war. Concessions made at this time would, therefore, not change the long term result, while their political value on our relations with the Asian countries (not to speak of the Chinese) would be much greater if made now than if postponed. In any case, we might at least consider other alternatives which would avoid the question of a vote on a moratorium resolution.

5. At the Fifth Session, our Delegation proposed the appointment of a committee to consider the question of Chinese representation in the United Nations and make recommendations on the issue.<sup>130</sup> This proposal was adopted, but the committee was not able to agree, and the Assembly took no further action. However, since the conditions leading to successful negotiation seem to be more hopeful now than they were in 1949-50, it is not certain that the result of a similar committee's work would be failure as it was on the previous occasion, and it would seem to be more desirable to have the question discussed in a United Nations context than outside it as at present. The resolution setting up such a committee might take the following form: "The General Assembly decides to set up a Committee empowered to hold hearings on the question of Chinese representation within the United Nations, and to receive the views of the delegate of the Republic of China and of representatives of the Central People's Government as well as those of any interested member of the United Nations". The committee might be instructed to circulate a written report by a certain date (say May 30) embodying the result of its discussions, but it need not be instructed to make firm recommendations. It is difficult to say what would be the chances of acceptance of such a plan, and in any case our immediate object should be to try to gain the adherence of our friends to the proposal, whose main advantage would be to overcome the defects of the moratorium.

6. On the attitude to be taken by the Western nations and ourselves in the work of such a committee, we might propose as a partial solution of the problem that the General Assembly take preliminary action by de-recognizing, in effect, the delegation of the Republic of China and making clear that it only considers the Republic of China as qualified to speak for Formosa pending a solution of the problem regarding the island's final disposition. While such a proposal would not solve the problem entirely, it would have the effect of demonstrating our willingness to work towards a solution and would be an effective first step in that direction. It would at the same time clear up the illogicality of the present position of the delegation of the Republic of China.

7. The advantages of action of this kind in the General Assembly would be the following:

- (1) It would prepare the way for further progress on the issue.
- (2) It would make more logical the position of the Nationalists in the United Nations.
- (3) It would gain time in the hope that the recent favourable developments in the Far East would continue, and so prepare Canadian and American public opinion for eventual recognition of Communist China.
- (4) It would demonstrate our willingness to seek solutions to the problems at issue and to abandon the status quo.
- (5) It would not be a concession on a matter of principle, since it is generally admitted that the Chinese will eventually be admitted to the United Nations. On the other hand, the effect on the non-involved countries of such preliminary action at this time would be greater than if we postponed it.
- (6) It would mark progress towards a de facto solution of the China problem along "two Chinas" lines.
- (7) Although it might be objected that the time is not yet ripe for re-opening the question, it was not in fact ever closed. Our proposal would simply return it to its United Nations context.

8. The disadvantages are the following:

- (1) The proposal might be too far-reaching to be accepted by the United States at this time.
- (2) The Russians themselves might prefer a straight vote on a moratorium in order to emphasize the split between Asia and the West on the issue. However, if we managed to convince India of the soundness of our approach, the Russians might be forced to accept a compromise.

(3) Discussion of the question now in the United Nations, by exacerbating the problem, might retard its solution.

9. Although these suggestions may on further examination appear to be quite impracticable, they may have the merit of interesting some of the other Western delegations (especially the French) and so start a current of opinion in favour of going beyond the present unsatisfactory situation. Discussion with other delegations could also turn up alternative proposals. In any case such discussion would be salutary, and especially if it could be made clear to the United States that some of their allies are unhappy about the device of the moratorium resolution.

10. If you agree with this approach, we might then engage in discussions with the United States and other delegations in order to see how far we can proceed with our proposal.<sup>131</sup>

PRE-ASSEMBLY TALKS — CHINESE REPRESENTATION

At the invitation of the Australian Mission members of the whole Commonwealth met yesterday afternoon at the former's offices to discuss the main items on the Assembly's agenda for the Tenth Session. We propose to report on the items separately and in the order in which they were discussed.

2. Regarding the above-mentioned subject Crosthwaite of the United Kingdom Delegation said that as yet they had no reply on their proposal to change the wording of the moratorium resolution adopted at the last four sessions of the Assembly. His feeling was that the Foreign Office would once again rally itself to the United States views that last year's wording was possibly still the most acceptable at this stage.

3. While both Australia and New Zealand agreed in their general remarks with the view which you expressed in Vancouver on August 25,<sup>132</sup> they still felt that the time was not yet ripe for the Assembly to agree to a change in the moratorium resolution, such as proposed by the United Kingdom. The South Africans reported that Pretoria saw no particular advantage in the United Kingdom formula. According to Australia, Thailand reported that notwithstanding the Bandung Conference the Asian Powers would be quite prepared to abide again this year with the status quo.

4. On the question of procedure, the United Kingdom Delegation hope that the Secretariat will brief the new Assembly President sufficiently well in advance that he may dispose summarily of objections such as those voiced by Krishna Menon last year (our telegram No. 8 of September 21, 1954, refers), by calling an immediate vote in accordance with rule 93 of the first proposal which might be made in plenary with respect to the question of Chinese representation.

RECOGNITION OF COMMUNIST CHINA

The United States Ambassador has now made the démarche forecast in your telegram. He placed most of the emphasis, however, on the undesirability of a shift in our policy regarding Chinese representation at the United Nations rather than the prospect of Canadian recognition per se.

2. The gist of what I have told Mr. Stuart is given below, but I should be grateful if you would also take an early opportunity to convey these views to the State Department at an appropriate level.

3. I do not consider that the argument for recognition of Peking at once has yet been established, and Cabinet has not yet considered the matter. What I said at Vancouver was that the atmosphere for a searching and comprehensive re-examination of the whole subject seemed more favourable than for a long time and that to some degree this had been brought about by the exercise of restraint on the part of the Chinese Government itself. There still seem to be many factors counselling delay as well as the reverse, and important among these is the need to settle before hand on a generally acceptable policy regarding Chinese representation in the U.N.

4. Logically any move on our part towards recognition of Peking should be accomplished by a change in our policy in the direction of supporting their claim to membership. Illogical and undesirable as it may be, however, the two questions can be separated: one has only to note the policy of the United Kingdom Government for a demonstration of at least the technical feasibility of extending recognition while at the same time withholding support at the United Nations. The probability is that we shall not be ready to decide one way or the other on the recognition question for some time, and in the circumstances the State Department need not worry too much about our policy diverging from theirs suddenly and without warning.

5. I did not mention to Mr. Stuart our doubts about the wisdom of the moratorium resolution as a solution for the Chinese question this year, but I think no harm would be done if you brought this up in conversation with the State Department. Moratorium has always had obvious disadvantages, and the tendency is for them to become more serious as time passes. We have now supported it through four General Assemblies, and while there may well be no alternative to doing so again, I am concerned about the possibility that on this particular issue we and our allies are beginning to look intransigent. If a way could be found to avoid a split on an issue which takes the form of the Soviet bloc plus the non-involved Asian nations against the West, we should certainly welcome it. On the other hand, we understand perhaps better than anyone else the implications of this question for American domestic and foreign policy, and you could indicate that while we are continuing the search for a better solution than moratorium, no clearly acceptable alternative has yet come to light.<sup>133</sup>

TENTH SESSION OF THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY

Attached is a delegation assessment of the tenth session of the General Assembly. This assessment is concerned mainly with the proceedings in the political committees of the General Assembly but it includes remarks concerning the work of the other committees. The comments concerning the other committees are based on assessments made by officers who were members of the Delegation to the General Assembly but who have since returned to the Department.

DELEGATION ASSESSMENT OF THE TENTH SESSION OF THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY

This assessment is intended to be general in scope with specific reference only to some of the more important questions which were discussed at the tenth session. The aim is to re-create, as far as possible, the atmosphere of the recent Assembly and thus to provide a suitable background for the detailed reports which the Delegation has prepared on the various agenda items. The present assessment is, moreover, designed to place in perspective the broader political issues, which although not formally on the Assembly's agenda, influenced to a large extent the debates not only in the political committees but in almost all the committees of the Assembly.

The Geneva Spirit

2. At the opening of the tenth session two extraneous factors helped to shape the attitudes of the majority of delegations. One was the widely heralded "spirit of Geneva" which had emanated from the meeting of Heads of Government in July; the other was the impending meeting of the Foreign Ministers, who were to meet about the half-way mark in the scheduled timetable for the tenth session. The first factor stimulated a strong hope that the tenth session would prove to be a turning-point in the struggle to achieve the aims and purposes of the United Nations Charter; the second provoked a tendency to hold in suspense the Assembly's discussion of the clearly controversial items on its agenda. The general desire of delegations seemed to be to preserve the "Geneva spirit" as long as possible and in order to do this members of the Assembly were prepared to postpone the potentially bitter debates until after the Foreign Ministers had had an opportunity to pursue in detail the directives issued in July by the Heads of Government.

3. Accordingly the statements in the general debate rang with abundant and cheery references to the improved international situation. These speeches were on the whole conciliatory in tone and in many cases too blatantly optimistic. There was a noticeable absence of propaganda as between the Western and Communist speeches and a widely voiced appeal was made to all protagonists to moderate the advocacy of their pet causes. Except for some discordant notes in later stages of the session, the avoidance of extreme propaganda by spokesmen for the two main camps prevailed, a significant and welcome change from previous sessions. The Soviet speakers, in particular, seemed at pains not to provoke the acrimony of cold-war debating at the United Nations. This did not prevent them from pointing out, whenever the opportunity arose, the superior qualities of Soviet communism and the shortcomings of other ways of life. In the Second Committee, for example, they deplored the alleged discriminatory trade practices of the Western democracies against the countries of Eastern Europe.

4. Of course these developments were more pronounced before than after the Foreign Ministers' meeting, which produced flatly negative results as regards the two most important subjects on the agenda of the tenth session — disarmament and the admission of new members. After that meeting, however, there was no clear-cut return to cold-war tactics by anyone concerned. Perhaps it became less appropriate to refer glowingly to the new era of rapprochement. The antics of Bulganin and Khrushchev in Asia added to the doubt and dismay about East-West relations but there seemed to be little inclination to draw the lines for a renewed cold-war struggle in the Assembly. Co-existence, by then clearly recognizable as competitive rather than co-operative co-existence, continued as the alternative to be preferred. Exchanges between the United States and Soviet representatives became more frequent and perhaps less restrained than earlier in the session but the debates continued to be moderate on the whole. Clearly distinguishable, however, in the proceedings after the Foreign Ministers' talks was the acute disappointment of many delegations about the rapid evaporation of the "Geneva spirit" in which the tenth session had been launched.

5. Notwithstanding the disappointment on that score, there seemed to be some satisfaction among delegations at the end of the session that this year the General Assembly had been able to produce positive results of considerable importance and that the United Nations had been strengthened in the process. The withdrawal from the rim of thermonuclear hell which had begun by the time of the ninth session was clearly continuing at the tenth, notwithstanding the halting steps and backward glances. The tenth session could take some pride in the admission of sixteen new members, the unanimous approval of the resolutions on peaceful uses of atomic energy and on the effects of atomic radiation, and the relative calm in which the colonial questions were discussed and disposed of — at least for the time being. Therefore, it is perhaps a fair conclusion that the tenth session of the Assembly, particularly when compared with the Assemblies between 1948 and 1953, did show the most promise since the founding of the United Nations that the organization might survive to fulfill its high purposes.

Disruptive Influences

6. Notwithstanding the happier side, the tenth session did reveal ominous signs of divisions which could wreck the United Nations. It was paradoxical, for example, that the session which succeeded in breaking the deadlock on new memberships witnessed the withdrawal from the Assembly of two important members. The implications of the French<sup>134</sup> and South African walk-outs could be far-reaching, if they were held to be precedents for the proposition that any member who should find the Assembly's discussion distasteful to him could on short notice withdraw from the session. There seems little doubt that the French walk-out was unnecessary and that the situation which provoked it could have been avoided; that the South African walk-out was premature and poorly performed. Neither of these acts added to the stature of the United Nations; both, but particularly the French withdrawal, caused grave embarrassment to many other delegations; neither eased the burden of the colonial questions which weigh heavily on the Assembly's agenda.

7. The Governments of France and South Africa may have hoped by withdrawing their delegations to dissuade the anti-colonial powers from pressing what they consider to be legitimate causes. There seemed to be little likelihood that those tactics would ever succeed. The new nations in Asia and Africa are clearly determined to press for the political and economic independence of all kindred peoples. The resolve to eradicate political domination by the white race of peoples of the coloured races is at the heart of all the problems facing the United Nations and lumped under the general heading of "colonial issues". (This explains the coolness of the Afro-Asians to the Greek side of the Cyprus issue.)<sup>135</sup> This aim was pressed energetically not only in the political committees but in the Third and Fourth Committees where the questions of self-determination and colonial exploitation arose in several forms. Legal and historical arguments hardly prevail against the strong emotion which that broad issue evokes. Nor does it help to remind the Afro-Asians about the backwardness in some of their own countries. Threats of walk-out and the actual withdrawal of delegations from the Assembly are equally ineffective. Some of the Afro-Asian delegations have recognized that a succession of withdrawals would weaken and perhaps wreck the United Nations but for the anti-colonialists the organization is not worth preserving, if it cannot deal with the urgent problems of colonialism.

8. For their part the colonial powers (and indeed others interested in the orderly development of the United Nations) cannot accept the contention that the General Assembly should have a free hand to re-organize the various colonial areas of the world or even to exert undue influence on the course of events there. The problem seems to be to persuade the anti-colonial powers that these complex problems cannot be settled arbitrarily, and certainly not by the decisions of chance majorities in the General Assembly, in complete disregard of the rights of the colonial powers and of their citizens. At the same time a division on these matters between the two main racial groups — white and coloured — must be avoided.

9. At the tenth session there were some indications that the Afro-Asians as a group were aware of that problem. This was illustrated in painstaking negotiations to bring about a return of the French Delegation, an accomplishment which required the co-operation, perseverance and tact of many delegations. The Afro-Asians were equally reasonable in their attitude toward the questions of Morocco and West New Guinea, the plebiscite in British Togoland, and the treatment of people of India origin in South Africa. They showed that they were prepared to make temporary concessions in the interests of wider harmony but without abandoning in any way the colonial causes which they had espoused. The Afro-Asians undoubtedly sensed that the General Assembly was in no mood this year for repetitious debates on the perennial items, that it would resist all but the most innocuous resolutions and that the colonial questions could be raised with renewed vigour at future sessions. Accordingly the calm and reasonableness with which the tenth session dealt with the colonial issues were more likely the marks of shrewd and responsible judgment than indifference or faint-heartedness on the part of the Afro-Asians.

10. On one issue there was no compromise and no conciliation. It had been earlier supposed that the item on Palestine refugees might be dealt with at the tenth session almost as an administrative and budgetary matter. The hope was that the political complexities of the Palestine question would not be touched upon. These illusions were shattered shortly before the tenth session began by the renewal of border violence along the Gaza strip and later by the announcement that Czechoslovakia had negotiated with Egypt for the supply of arms from the communist world.<sup>136</sup> These developments provoked sharp reactions in the Middle East and elsewhere and by the time the Palestine refugee question came up for discussion in the Ad Hoc Political Committee Arab-Israeli tension was as grave as any time since 1948. Accordingly the debate was a prolonged and bitter exchange of invective and accusation which encompassed every aspect of the Palestine impasse.

11. The Committee was, however, not prepared to tackle the broader issue, particularly since it now seemed to involve a head-on collision between the Western democracies and the Soviet Union. The draft resolution, which concentrated on the administrative problems of continuing the work of the United Nations Works and Relief Agency was passed in the face of Arab objection and the item was thus disposed of, although the situation in the Middle East grew worse with new armed clashes between Israel and Syria and rumours that the Soviet Union's excursion into Middle East politics would be extended to include assistance to Syria and Saudi Arabia. These Soviet manoeuvres seemed clearly designed to counteract the Baghdad Pact which during the Assembly began to assume more concrete form. In this endeavour, the Soviet Delegation had a willing ally in Krishna Menon, who in the disarmament debate so strongly attacked the "bad-bad pact", among others, that he drew fire from the representatives of Iraq, Pakistan and Turkey.

12. Another source of division was the noticeable failure of the Western Powers to co-ordinate their policies on some important subjects. The impasse in the election of the third non-permanent member to the Security Council derived from a difference between the United States and United Kingdom which remained unresolved at the end of the Assembly and which made necessary the highly questionable solution by lottery of the deadlock between the Yugoslav and Philippine candidatures. The Western Great Powers managed only at the last moment to correlate their policies on disarmament. The inflexibility of the United States position on the peaceful uses of atomic energy nearly caused a split in the Western ranks. The most serious divergence, however, arose in the consideration of the admission of new members. The combined result of these divisions within the Western group was undoubtedly damaging to Western interests and a considerable advantage to the Soviet Union. As in the past, the Soviet Delegation, notwithstanding their smiles and restrained conduct in debate, showed no disposition to forego any opportunity which came their way to embarrass the Western democracies.

13. Nevertheless, the Western Powers held together in their attitude toward Chinese representation in the General Assembly. They succeeded in maintaining majority support for the contention that no change in that representation should take place during 1955. In the plenary session on September 20 the United States draft resolution deferring action was adopted by a vote of 42 in favour, 12 against with 6 abstentions. Notwithstanding this success, the United States Delegation were most concerned about the prospects for the eleventh session. Their attitude toward the admission of new members was governed to a large extent by their fears about Chinese representation. They were, of course, particularly concerned about the effects of the veto by Nationalist China of the application of Outer Mongolia. Even though the harmful (from the United States point of view) effects of that veto were offset by the eventual admission of sixteen new members, the United States Delegation continued to view with alarm the prospects for an early reconsideration of the Chinese representation issue. They, of course, had very much in mind the forthcoming election campaign in the United States.

Role of Various Delegations

14. Perhaps as at no other Assembly the most striking development in relations between delegations at the tenth session was the shifting of the traditional voting alliances. The Soviet Delegation tried to make friends with practically every other delegation except that of the United States. The Soviet representatives worked in conjunction with the United Kingdom Delegation for the election of the third non-permanent member to the Security Council. The Soviet bloc was more closely aligned with the twenty-seven co-sponsors of the draft resolution on new members than were the United States, France or Belgium. During the proceedings on the peaceful uses of atomic energy and on the effects of atomic radiation the Soviet bloc most frequently voted with India and some of the Arab States. On the colonial questions the Soviet representatives maintained their traditional support for the anti-colonial powers.

15. The United States Delegation, on the other hand, tended to be isolated from the majority of other delegations. It seemed to have lost its ability to mobilize supporters. It salvaged little from the proceedings on the admission of new members and found itself among a very small group of abstainers in the voting. The United States position on the peaceful uses of atomic energy and on the effects of atomic radiation came under heavy fire, not only from Krishna Menon but from other Asian, Latin American and Scandinavian representatives. To win acceptance the United States position on disarmament had to be modified considerably, although the resolution which was finally adopted gave priority in future consideration of the problem to President Eisenhower's proposal. The United States suffered a further setback in the proceedings on Charter review, since clearly a committee of the whole is much less likely to agree than the smaller committee originally envisaged on the holding of an early conference. In the Fifth Committee the United States succeeded, but only with difficulty, in having adopted its proposal providing for the review, in certain cases, of decisions of the United Nations Administrative Tribunal.

16. Ostensibly the Afro-Asian group appeared more closely knit than at earlier sessions. The Bandung Conference undoubtedly had a unifying influence as regards Afro-Asian policies at the General Assembly. Nevertheless there was ample evidence, both in the debates and behind the scenes, that the Afro-Asians have their own differences about aims and the leadership of the group. Notwithstanding the public attention with Krishna Menon received as the leading spokesman for the Afro-Asians, it seems very clear that he is not so accepted by all members of the group. His attempts to steal the limelight were undoubtedly resented by the representatives of such countries as Burma, Egypt, Iran, Iraq and Pakistan.

17. The Latin American solidarity was much less in evidence at the tenth session. The Latin American caucus split eleven to nine on the election to the Latin American seat on the Economic and Social Council. The more responsible Latin delegations, those of Brazil, Chile, Colombia, Ecuador and Mexico, showed a desire to approach the colonial issues with less emotion than in the past. These delegations proved themselves in some of the delicate negotiations behind the scenes on such matters as the return of the French Delegation, the admission of new members, the peaceful uses of atomic energy. The President of the Assembly [José Maza] also contributed to the success of the manoeuvring off-stage.

18. A development of some significance was the unwillingness of many delegations to accept blindly the leadership of the Great Powers. In informal discussions Krishna Menon repeated his earlier pronouncement that agreement between the Soviet Union and the Western democracies did not necessarily mean that the whole world was in agreement. Menon, however, learned in the proceedings on atoms for peace that because he and the Soviet Union happened to agree with the Western Powers, the rest of Asia did not necessarily concur. The Scandinavians too demonstrated their independence in that regard. The delegations of the middle and small powers showed, moreover, that they were not prepared to accept meekly the stalemates resulting from Great Power disagreement. The pressure for the admission of the largest possible number of new members developed as a minor power movement which began in the face of varying opposition from all the Great Powers, although the Soviet Union was quick to take advantage of the situation. To a lesser extent the debate on disarmament produced similar results; there were clear signs of impatience among the smaller powers that the Great Powers had made so little progress in the matter.

19. This "small power revolt", as some press correspondents have described it, may well have resulted from the indecisiveness and an indifference which characterized the conduct at the tenth session of all the delegations from the Great Powers. Probably, because of preoccupations elsewhere, they offered practically no leadership at the Assembly and seemed reluctant to come to grips with controversial problems. The Soviet Delegation was amiable but not particularly aggressive in pursuing its aims. The United States Delegation shuttled between arrogance and despair. The United Kingdom Delegation appeared vacillating on many subjects. The French were absent for most of the Assembly. The Chinese Nationalist showed as much dignity and forthrightness as any of the Great Power delegates but only on the one subject. It was no accident, therefore, that the leading roles at the recent Assembly were played by representatives of the lesser powers. Sir Leslie Munro, Krishna Menon, Mr. Martin, Sir Percy Spender, Entezam of Iran, Urrutia of Colombia and Engen of Norway were among the leading figures at the tenth session. As this list indicates the Commonwealth delegations played an active role at the tenth session.

Principal Work of the Session

20. Measured by any yardstick, the admission of the sixteen new members was for the United Nations by far the most important achievement of the tenth session. It gave the organization a lift it badly needed. Not only was a deadlock of long standing broken, not only was new blood injected at a time when the organization was weak from many years of cold war, but the General Assembly reasserted its claim to be a centre for harmonizing international action. In the immediately preceding years a number of international arrangements had been made outside the United Nations. The Indo-China settlement, the Bandung Conference, the "Geneva spirit" were signs of the drift away from the United Nations.

21. The failure of the Foreign Ministers to agree in November broke the trend. They had tried, perhaps half-heartedly, and failed to reach agreement on the admission of new members, even as a by-product of their Geneva talks. Unwilling to accept this particular failure, because of the high hopes which had been raised, the majority of the General Assembly pursued the move to admit new members. The pressure of opinion became so strong that in the end it proved irresistible. Whereas it may not be true to say that the Soviet authorities bowed to Assembly pressure, there can be little doubt that they were strongly influenced by it not to let the opportunity pass and, by a sudden change of position, to allow the admission of the group of sixteen. The Soviet Union gained solid credit for its part in the Security Council proceedings, so much so that the Western Great Powers were left in the shade. Had it not been that the initiative in the Assembly had been maintained by smaller Western powers, the admission of sixteen might have represented a setback for the West. Whatever the results were in terms of East-West positions, there was no doubt about the substantial gain to the United Nations through this striking demonstration that at least some international problems could be resolved when the members of the United Nations sought the solution with sufficient determination.

22. The resolutions on the peaceful uses of atomic energy and on the effects of atomic radiation provided similar evidence that the United Nations might yet learn to work together. The Western Great Powers were required, in promoting their ideas, to make modifications to meet objections largely from the Afro-Asians and Scandinavians. The Soviet Union, however, had very little success in selling its point of view. It was not necessarily a bad thing for the United Nations, nor for the world, that the Great Powers should have been obliged to trim their sails to the expressions of genuine doubt from others no less interested but not to date as closely concerned with the atomic matters. Contributions to these debates from representatives of the Scandinavian countries, the Netherlands, Colombia, India, Pakistan and Burma illustrated that point.

23. It would be a mistake to gloss over the difficulties of implementing the resolutions on the atomic items. The complexities of running the proposed atomic energy agency have only begun to appear. The negotiations on the statute are likely to be protracted, particularly if the United States policy continues to lack resilience and adaptability. The agency may be a long time coming into being, and the committee to study the effect of radiation on man and his environment may not accomplish much in the near future. But both these bodies would appear to be essential in a world of atomic development. Therefore necessity, if not determination to succeed, may compel the powers concerned to reach agreement. In any event the tenth session brought the negotiation of an international atomic energy agency very much more within the area of United Nations responsibility and created the committee on radiation. The majority of members, as well as the Secretary-General, are unlikely to relax their interest in these matters and will continue to press for practicable solutions to the atomic problems.

24. The debate on disarmament was disappointingly inconclusive after the hopes raised at the ninth session. What little progress the Sub-Committee made early in 1955 had been thrown in reverse by the time the Assembly began to debate this subject. The voluminous records of the proceedings in the Sub-Committee revealed little more than a dreary and discouraging reiteration of national positions and, on the part of the Western Powers, an absence of agreed aims. The Soviet item on international co-operation, which was injected into the disarmament debate, provoked sideline quarrels between minor contenders and thereby disrupted the main debate.

25. After the failure of the Conference of Foreign Ministers no great enthusiasm continued for President Eisenhower's proposal on aerial inspection. The General Assembly did accept the Western Powers' draft resolution, which gave priority to the study of the Eisenhower proposal, but the passing of the resolution, even by a large majority, produced little sense of achievement or satisfaction. There was no foundation of agreed Western policy on which to build a significant disarmament resolution or serious negotiation with the Soviet Union. The most that can be said for the Western resolution is that it served to dispose of the item and to provide at least a little more time for reaching an agreed Western policy. Nevertheless, there was clear evidence that a number of important members are growing restless about the continuing stalemate on disarmament. This may eventually require the Sub-Committee to show positive signs of progress or declare itself unable to do so. The second of these alternatives would likely produce a strong reaction in the General Assembly.

26. A long debate on Korea, held late in the Assembly, indicated no progress towards the goal of peaceful unification of Korea and was the occasion for perhaps the harshest and most combative exchanges between Soviet and Western delegations. The Indian and Yugoslav representatives tried without much success to introduce some element of reasonableness and impartiality. The statement of the Canadian Delegation indicated a strong misgiving at the rigidity of the United Nations attitude toward Korea. This statement was calculated to serve notice that even member states which had unhesitatingly supported South Korea against aggression were not necessarily content to support all subsequent South Korea actions, or to see the United Nations always and solely in a partisan role in Korean affairs.

27. In the field of economic affairs the results of the tenth session were on the whole satisfactory. It was generally agreed that encouraging progress was being made in the field of technical assistance. Increased pledges to the Expanded Programme were given at a pledging conference. The forthcoming establishment of the International Finance Corporation was welcomed in the Second Committee, although some delegations expressed the view that the International Bank had acted precipitately in opening for signature the draft statute before referring it to the General Assembly for consideration. The main difficulty in the Second Committee's proceedings related to the question of establishing a Special United Nations Fund for Economic Development. The under-developed countries have increased with each passing year their demand for its establishment. With some difficulty the extremists among the under-developed group were restrained this year from forcing an early decision on that matter. A compromise resolution, adopted unanimously, requests the Secretary-General to invite comments from member states and from the Specialized Agencies about the establishment, role, structure and operations of a special fund. An ad hoc committee was appointed to analyze the replies of governments and hope was expressed that the idea of SUNFED would win increased support.

28. At the tenth session the Third Committee produced few useful results. In the discussion of the Report of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees the Soviet Delegation, without abandoning in any way its basic position in favour of the early repatriation of refugees, modified its earlier attacks on the sincerity of purpose of the High Commissioner and accepted resettlement and integration as possible alternatives for a small number of refugees. A Soviet draft resolution was submitted which, among other things, instructed the High Commissioner to assist the early return of refugees and displaced persons to their country of origin. The Soviet contentions were, however, so clearly contrary to the spirit of United Nations assistance to European refugees that they failed to commend themselves to the Committee, even though the Arab delegations showed considerable sympathy for the Soviet position. The Committee adopted a nine-power draft resolution which underlined the High Commissioner's responsibility to seek solutions for the problems of refugees through voluntary repatriation, resettlement and integration and requested him to continue his efforts to effect solutions by these three means. However, because of the lack of response among many Arab, Asian and Latin American delegations, the prospects for obtaining the target figures for the refugee fund in 1955 and 1956 are not promising.

29. In the field of human rights the Third Committee devoted a large part of its time to debating the question of self-determination, mostly in the context of Article 1 of the draft Covenant on Human Rights.<sup>137</sup> The efforts of the Western powers have been directed to preventing precipitate and questionable action on this subject in the various United Nations bodies dealing with it. The Afro-Asian delegations have been most assiduous in pressing, with the support of the Soviet bloc and many of the Latin Americans, for the establishment of the "right" of self-determination and for its inclusion in the draft Covenant on Human Rights. These efforts were intensified during the tenth session and, as an outcome of a difficult and inconclusive debate, a text was adopted for Article 1 of the draft Covenants which was far from satisfactory to many delegations. The adoption of this article would seem to rule out automatically the consideration of a United States proposal to study the "concept of self-determination". At the same time the delegations dissatisfied with the text of the article are unlikely to give their unreserved support to the recommendations of the Commission on Human Rights concerning the establishment of commissions for the purpose of ensuring the realization of the right of self-determination. The prospects for the future are therefore clouded with doubt.

30. One of the main achievements of the Fourth Committee was the adoption of a resolution whereby the Assembly recommended that the United Kingdom organize and conduct without delay, under the supervision of the United Nations, a plebiscite in British Togoland. The plebiscite, the first of its kind to be held in a United Nations trust territory, is to ascertain the wishes of the inhabitants on their political future, that is, whether the territory should be linked with an independent Gold Coast, or should continue under trusteeship pending an ultimate determination. The Fourth Committee also endorsed the views of a visiting mission to French Togoland that implementation of the political reforms contemplated by France would be helpful in enabling the inhabitants of that territory to decide their future status at an early date. In these developments, the anti-colonial powers showed the same spirit of accommodation which had been discussed earlier in this assessment. On the question of South-West Africa, however, they pressed their attack against the Union Government which had continued to resist United Nations efforts to bring the territory under the trusteeship system.

31. Perhaps the most important matter discussed by the Sixth Committee was the Draft Convention on Arbitral Procedure. It was apparent that, whereas most member states agreed that arbitration was a necessary means of solving disputes between states, few, and in particular the Soviet Union, were prepared to underwrite the provisions of the Draft Convention which would ensure that an obligation to arbitrate once entered into could not be frustrated. The discussion of this subject, as was generally the case this year in that Committee, was free from political controversy. The leading roles were played by the representatives of the Soviet Union and the United Kingdom.

*Draft Memorandum from Secretary of State for External Affairs

CONFIDENTIAL

Ottawa, September 28, 1955

CONTRIBUTIONS TO UNITED NATIONS EXTRA-BUDGETARY PROGRAMMES

This submission is concerned with Canadian participation in the following programmes:

United Nations Expanded Programme of Technical Assistance to Under-Developed Countries (ETAP)

United Nations Children's Fund (UNICEF)

United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees (UNRWA)

United Nations Refugee Fund (UNREF)

United Nations' Expanded Programme of Technical Assistance to Under-Developed Countries (ETAP)

2. The multilateral technical assistance programme is an important part of the activities of the United Nations and enjoys broad public support throughout the world. It offers one of the best means of effectively assisting the economically less well developed countries with their problems and, in this respect, supplements and fits in well with our own Colombo Plan activities. It also aids appreciably in better understanding among peoples and governments and provides a continuing expression of concerted international cooperation to raise the standards of living of the less well developed countries.

3. In 1954 a record number of countries contributed a total of $24.5 million. In that year Canada's contribution was raised to $1.5 million. In 1955 our contribution was maintained at that figure while total contributions reached the gratifying level of $27.9 million.

4. It had been agreed, when the Cabinet authorized the 1955 contribution of $1.5 million, that the amount of that contribution might be reconsidered if it became apparent that total contributions would be appreciably in excess of the amount then anticipated ($25.0 million). On the basis of the relationship of our original pledge to the total then envisaged (i.e. the ratio of $1.5 million to $25.0 million) an increase of the order of some $200,000.00 in respect of 1955 might seem appropriate. It has been felt, however, that it would be preferable not to consider a supplementary contribution for this year but rather to take account of the unexpectedly high total for 1955 in arriving at a decision regarding the appropriate size of Canada's contribution in 1956.

5. In spite of the larger total contributions made in 1954 and 1955, and the economies effected in administrative arrangements, the need for funds continues to rise. This is due, in part, to the increasing awareness of the recipient countries of the benefits which stem from such assistance programs and to the development and growth of projects embarked upon in the earlier years of the program. To carry out the increased program, which seems justified by present needs, and which has been suggested as a target for pledges next year, a 20 percent increase in the level of contributions would be needed.

6. We have received an intimation that the United Kingdom Government will recommend a modest increase in their contributions. It is also indicated that The Netherlands has already decided to increase its contribution. The United States has committed $15.5 million to the program for 1956, which represents a further increase over their 1955 appropriation, despite the fact that in that year they were financing over 50 percent of the program. There is, however, a strong feeling in the United States that other governments should bear a somewhat larger proportionate share of the cost. The Executive Branch has made a firm commitment to Congress that their contribution for 1956 will not exceed 50 percent of the total contributions from all governments. It will, therefore, be necessary for the contributions of other governments to reach a total of $15.5 million. Also, if the full amount of the American contribution were to be taken out, this would mean that such other governments would have to increase their pledges by a total of $2.5 million, or approximately 20 percent over the figures for 1955.

7. A moderate increase in the size of the Canadian contribution, in the order of 20 percent over last year, would, therefore, seem to be desirable in order to:

(a) take account of the extent to which the performance of others last year exceeded our expectations (a consideration which by itself might seem to justify an increase of 15 or 20 percent);

(b) help meet the greater needs of the program this year, both directly and also indirectly through the effect which our action would have on the contributions of others (an effect which would be automatic in the case of the U.S. and probably no less influential on others who value our example);

(c) reflect the widespread interest and support in Canada for this worthwhile activity of the United Nations.

8. It has become apparent that for the most effective operation of the program the Technical Assistance Board must have a more dependable basis upon which to plan its projects in advance. In the face of the necessity to be prudent and not exceed the funds in hand, the Board has had no alternative but to reduce the level of technical assistance below what would have been possible and desirable had they had a more definite budget upon which to plan the program fully over a whole year or for a period of years. By its very nature, for the program to be effective, it is essential that it be planned on a long term basis. Under the present arrangements—whereby funds are only forthcoming for a period of one year and then not on an early and reliable basis, it is rarely possible to undertake other than relatively short-term projects, whereas some of the most fruitful undertakings suggested to the Board would require finance and execution over a period of years.

9. It is also difficult to arrange realistic priorities within the present fiscal arrangement. An answer to the problem would be for contributing governments to guarantee definite contributions for several years ahead and to pay them at the beginning of each year. If that is not possible, an assurance of at least minimum contributions would be helpful. A commitment of this kind would go a long way to assist the agencies in their planning and also to improve the morale of those involved in these activities by reducing any uncertainty that their operations may be terminated at short notice. Such action by some of the more responsible countries would also encourage other countries to maintain their contributions and, by so giving an assured life, make it less likely that some under-developed countries would press for substitute arrangements which would be more unsatisfactory from our point of view (e.g. a scheme for internationally determined assessments towards technical assistance programs, precipitated action on SUNFED, etc.).

10. At the recent session of ECOSOC a number of delegations, led by those of The Netherlands and the United Kingdom, announced that their governments were prepared to guarantee certain minimum contributions for each of the next three years, subject to annual parliamentary approval. The United States have gone as far as they deem it possible to go at the present time by budgeting 18 months in advance. This is felt to be a not insignificant development on the part of the United States in view of the reluctance shown by them in the past to make advance commitments towards multilateral or even bilateral programs. Administrative officials believe they have been able to impress members of Congress with the need for making advance appropriations for the United Nations' program and the Special Senate Committee which is studying technical assistance programs in which the United States participates has in particular shown sympathetic appreciation of the necessity for long range planning of United Nations technical assistance activities. There is a possibility that they will recommend that the United States should consider authorizing contributions on a long term scale. The American authorities feel if a reasonable number of responsible countries follow the United Kingdom and The Netherlands lead in pledging three years in advance, the Administration's advocacy of this policy for the United States will be greatly strengthened.

11. In view of the experience gained over the years and the prospect of increased efficiency and support which would result from such an announcement, it is suggested that it be announced that it is the intention of the Canadian Government, subject to the annual approval of Parliament, to make contributions to the program for 1957 and 1958 at least on the order of those of recent years as an indication of continued support and in the interests of effective administration and on the condition that the program will continue with the broad support of other countries.

United Nations Children's Fund (UNICEF)

12. UNICEF was created in 1947 under the name of the United Nations International Children's Emergency Fund in order to help children from war-devastated countries. In 1950 the Fund was authorized to undertake for a period of three years ending December 31, 1953, long-range welfare projects for needy children in under-developed countries.<sup>138</sup> On October 8, 1953, the General Assembly provided by a unanimous vote for the contribution of the Fund for an indefinite period.<sup>139</sup>

13. UNICEF is regarded as a well-administered organ whose programmes are carried out effectively. There is no doubt that the Fund has made a substantial contribution towards enhancing the prestige of the United Nations. However, the Fund's budget target of $20 million has never been reached. It is desirable for the Fund to reach this target in order to derive maximum results from its present establishment which cannot be reduced since it represents the minimum permissible for an organization of its kind operating on a world-wide basis. Additional contributions are also required to enable the Fund to utilize in full the United States contribution which should not exceed 57.5 per cent of total payments in 1956. Each year, legitimate requests for assistance on the part of under-developed countries have to be refused as a result of lack of funds.

14. Both the number of contributors to the Fund and the amount of contributions other than those of the United States have consistently increased since 1950 as shown in the following table:

	Governmental Contributions, Excluding United States	No. of Contributing Governments
1950	$3,162,000	31
1951	4,101,000	34
1952	4,140,000	39
1953	4,453,000	55
1954	5,308,000	61

15. Except for last year there has also been a steady increase in United States contributions since 1950. The United States Congress has just given final approval to a contribution of $9 million for 1955 and of $9.7 million for 1956. As of July 21 last, 51 Governments had contributed or pledged $9,370,000 for 1955 and the number of additional contributors during the remaining months is expected to bring the total of contributors to about 70 for this year. Fourteen governments have so far increased their contributions or pledges over those of 1954 and in seven cases the increase amounts to 50 per cent or more. The French have increased their contribution this year from $500,000 to $785,000 and we are told that the Australians will contribute $550,000. The U.S.S.R. has made its first contribution ($500,000) to the Fund during the current year.

16. The Canadian Government has contributed $9,333,634.00 (U.S.) to the United Nations Children's Fund since its inception. In addition the Fund has received over $1.5 million from private sources in Canada. The Canadian Government has contributed $500,000 annually for the last five years. In the light of the above, a substantial increase in the Canadian contribution appears desirable. Bearing in mind the nature of UNICEF programmes and the amount of Canadian contributions to the Expanded Programme of Technical Assistance, it seems reasonable to suggest that the Canadian contribution for 1956 be increased so as to represent approximately 1/15 of the United States contribution of $9.7 million for that year, i.e., $650,000.

United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees (UNRWA)

17. The United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East (UNRWA) was established by the General Assembly in December, 1949 (Resolution 302 (IV)).<sup>140</sup> It was asked to "carry out in collaboration with local Governments direct relief and works programmes" for the benefit of the odd 950,000 Arab refugees who had fled Palestine in 1948 following the establishment of the State of Israel.

18. It was hoped that refugees would be either repatriated or resettled in the areas where they took refuge in a relatively short time. Very little progress was made, however, during the first years of the Agency's operations and on January 26, 1952, the Assembly endorsed the so-called Blandford Plan which recommended a three-year programme as follows:

	Relief	Rehabilitation
1951-1952	$27 million U.S.	50 million
1952-1953	$18 million U.S.	100 million
1953-1954	$ 5 million U.S.	50 million

This programme was approved without prejudice to the rights of repatriation or compensation recognized in paragraph 11 of Resolution 194.

2. By the end of the fiscal year 1953-1954, there were still some 800,000 refugees on relief roles so that at its ninth session the Assembly extended the mandate for five years, ending June 30, 1960. This decision was taken again without prejudice to the rights of the refugees to repatriation or compensation.

20. The Canadian Government voted in favour of the establishment of the Agency and also in favour of the extensions of its mandate authorized at the ninth session.<sup>141</sup>

21. In the past the Canadian Government made the following contributions to Palestine refugee programmes under UNRWA and its predecessor UNRPR (United Nations Relief for Palestine Refugees) which operated between December 1948 and April 1950:

December 1948 to April 1950	$ 1,040,616	(in kind)
May 1950 to June 1951	894,313	(in cash)
May 1951 to June 1952	505,000	(in kind)
July 1952 to June 1953	600,000	(in cash)
July 1953 to June 1954	515,000	(in cash)
July 1954 to June 1955	515,000	(in cash)
TOTAL	$ 4,070,929

22. As of June 30, 1955, Canada was the fourth largest contributor to these programmes, the other major contributors among non-Arab states being the United States ($137,000,000), United Kingdom ($38,000,000), France ($11,000,000), Australia

($1,500,000), and New Zealand ($950,000). The Arab states have made contributions to UNRPR and UNRWA of $4,800,000. The Arab governments have also made each year substantial contributions in kind direct to refugees, the total amount of such contributions for the fiscal year 1954-1955 being approximately $2,300,000.

23. Although the report of the Director-General of the Agency is not yet available it can be assumed that the number of Palestine refugees is still in the neighbourhood of 850,000 judging from the provisional relief estimate of 28.1 million for 1955-56.

24. During the last 12 months the Agency has nevertheless been actively engaged in preparing the way for the implementation of one of its two major projects in the Sinai Peninsula. Progress on the other major project in the Yarmuk River Valley depends largely upon the outcome of negotiations on the Johnston Plan. In the meantime the Agency is performing a most useful function by carrying out an energetic educational programme among the refugees within the limits of its resources.

25. The success of the Agency's resettlement programme is of course dependent on the progress made in stabilising the political situation in the area. The first hopeful prospect of long-term co-operation between Israel and its neighbours on matters of substances occurred last year when agreement was reached in principle on the Johnston Plan for the unified development of water resources in the area.<sup>142</sup> Although final agreement has not yet been reached, the points of difference have been reduced to a minimum.

26. In addition to this encouraging development, there has been a hopeful improvement in Arab-Israel relations in recent months. UNTSO has been largely successful in its efforts to stabilize the situation on the Israel-Jordan border. A local Commander's agreement has been concluded in the trouble spot of Jerusalem and negotiations are now taking place to make similar arrangements along the entire line of demarcation between the two countries. Incidents on the borders of Lebanon and Syria have been reduced to a minimum. A similar situation is now hoped for in the relations between Israel-Egypt notwithstanding the sharply increased tension earlier this year along the Gaza strip. Major General E.L.M. Burns of Canada with his reputation for impartiality has played a significant role in these developments.

27. In a statement on the Palestine question which he made on August 26, 1955 and which has been endorsed by the United Kingdom, Mr. Dulles suggested that an international loan be made to the State of Israel with a view to enabling it to pay compensation to Palestine refugees.<sup>143</sup> United States proposals were accompanied by suggestions for the guaranteeing of present frontiers with some rectifications. The official attitude of the Arab states to the Dulles proposals has been non-committal and public criticism was more restrained than had been expected. Israeli officials indicated that they regarded the Dulles suggestions as constructive proposals though they had some misgivings about some of its features. In the light of the progress made on the Johnson Plan and Mr. Dulles' suggestion for an overall settlement of the Palestine issue, it is hoped that some headway will be made in the settlement of the refugee problem in the relatively near future.

28. The refugee issue has become the hub of the Palestine problem. The maintenance of refugees at their present subsistence level (at the low cost of $27 per head per year) is an essential condition of any further improvement in Israel—Arab relations and of maintaining law and order in the border areas. The refugees are of course the kind of political tinder upon which political opportunists of all shades in the Middle East thrive.

29. The maintenance of these Palestine refugees on a reasonably satisfactory basis is an important element in ensuring continuing peace in the Middle East: the financial burden involved must be shared by the members of the United Nations as their contribution to the maintenance of peace. Canada being generally regarded as a relatively wealthy member of the international community particularly by the Asian people, is expected to contribute to UNRWA expenses on a fairly substantial basis.

30. For these reasons and in the light of the continued support of the Agency by Western countries during 1954-55 (United States: $13 million; United Kingdom $4.5 million; France: $557,000; New Zealand $140,000), it is suggested that Canada should continue in the year 1955-56 the financial support given to UNRWA in 1953-54 and 1954-55, i.e., $500,00.

United Nations Refugee Fund (UNREF)

31. The High Commissioner for Refugees has under his mandate 300,000 refugees in Europe whose problems remain unsolved and of whom 75,000 are still living in camps. In addition, there are among the European refugees in China 900 in Shanghai alone who are totally dependent on United Nations' aid until they can be resettled in other countries. With a view to achieving a permanent solution to the problem, the High Commissioner submitted to the ninth session of the General Assembly a four-year programme (1955-58). The General Assembly authorized him to undertake this programme and member governments were asked to contribute for the first year's operations. The cost of the programme was estimated at sixteen million dollars for a four-year period and the target figure for 1955 was set at 4.2 million dollars. The main portion of the funds is to be used to finance projects leading to the integration of refugees in their present countries of residence and a smaller portion for continued emergency aid.

32. In 1954, Canada contributed $50,000 to the United Nations Refugees Fund specifically for emergency aid to the European refugees in China. In view of the broader and more comprehensive programme envisaged in 1955, the Cabinet approved in principle the grant to UNREF at its meeting on May 5, 1955. It was later agreed between the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration that Canada's contribution for 1955 would be $125,000.

33. In deciding on Canada's contribution for 1956 it would seem appropriate that we should repeat our 1955 contribution of $125,000. The High Commissioner's programme is directed mainly at helping refugees, many of whom would like to immigrate to Canada but who are not acceptable as immigrants. Since there is a continuing pressure on Canada to take in at least some of these refugees, $125,000 would not seem to be too high a price to pay for "other solutions". Moreover, very little financial support for UNREF is likely to be forthcoming from the non-European Members of the United Nations, since European refugees only are involved. Thus the main burden of financing the programme necessarily falls on the Western European Members and on the United States, United Kingdom, Canada, Australia, etc. The European, United States and Australian contributions to UNREF are additional to what they are spending each year on their own national programmes for refugees. The Canadian contribution to the solution of the refugee problem, on the other hand, is limited almost exclusively to a financial grant to UNREF and the sum of $125,000 does not seem to be more than our fair share.

IT IS THEREFORE RECOMMENDED:

ETAP

(1) that Canada contribute $1.8 million to the United Nations Expanded Programme of Technical Assistance in 1956, and

(2) that the Canadian Government undertake, subject to the annual voting of funds by Parliament, to make contributions to the programme for 1957 and 1958 as well, at least in the order of those of recent years on the condition that the programme continues to receive the broad support of other member countries of the United Nations;

UNICEF

(3) that authorization be given to announce the Government's intention to seek parliamentary approval for a contribution to the United Nations Children's Fund for the fiscal year 1956-67 of $650,000; and

(4) that the Fund be encouraged to continue its favourable record of purchases in Canada;

UNRWA

(5) that authorization be given to announce the Government's intention to seek parliamentary approval for a contribution of $500,000 to the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees relief programme for its financial year 1955-56; and

(6) that payment of the Canadian contribution be made subject to informal assurances by UNRWA that this contribution will be used as far as practicable for the procurement in Canada of commodities required by the Agency for its operations;

UNREF

(7) that authorization be given to announce the Government's intention to seek parliamentary approval for a contribution of $125,000 to the United Nations Refugee Fund for expenditure on the 1956 programme of the High Commissioner for Refugees.<sup>144</sup>

Memorandum from Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to Secretary of State for External Affairs

[Ottawa], January 1, 1955

PROPOSED VISIT BY CANADIAN MINISTERS TO WASHINGTON THIS THURSDAY
 TO DISCUSS THE SITUATION IN THE GATT REVIEW AND U.S. AGRICULTURAL IMPORT RESTRICTIONS<sup>145</sup>

I am attaching a copy of the draft memorandum<sup>146</sup> prepared by the Inter-departmental Committee on External Trade Policy which it was thought Ministers might wish to leave with the U.S. Cabinet members with whom they will be meeting on Thursday. I understand that Mr. Howe will be discussing this draft with the Prime Minister early this afternoon.

2. Of the various points made in this draft memorandum, you might wish to give particular emphasis to those which would seem likely to have some appeal to Mr. Dulles. For example:

(a) you might think it desirable to emphasize the demoralizing effect which pressure by the U.S. to have its obligations waived (or a split between the U.S. and Canada on this issue) would be likely to have on international cooperation generally. It is quite possible that the U.S. could induce the necessary number of contracting parties to agree to such a waiver but only in return for a weakening of the obligations imposed on those countries under the GATT. For the U.S. to secure a waiver on such terms (with Canada, the principal country affected, continuing to oppose it) would appear to be very short-sighted. The shadow of cooperation under the GATT might have been retained, but the substance would have been largely lost. Such a deterioration in the position of the GATT could hardly fail to have damaging effects on the prospects for genuine and meaningful cooperation not only in the economic field but possibly in other areas as well;

(b) you might wish to refer specifically to the injurious effects which such a situation would have on attitudes in Canada towards the United States and, hence, on relations between the two countries; and

 The final version of this document is reproduced below as the enclosure to Document 103.

(c) you might draw attention to the observation in paragraph 3 of the memorandum that "in particular, if such a waiver were in effect, or likely to come into effect, it would be most difficult for the Canadian Government to take part in tariff negotiations under the Agreement." You might refer to the hope of the United States that Canada would be able to join in the tariff negotiations involving Japan next month. While it would be difficult at any time for Canada to enter into negotiations affecting trade with Japan (especially since our most-favoured-nation rates which are now applicable to Japanese goods are relatively low), the Canadian authorities have been attempting to find some basis on which Canada could participate in such negotiations. If, in addition to the problems which negotiations involving Japan would ordinarily present, it was now to appear that our trade in agricultural products with the United States was likely to be subject to a general waiver of U.S. obligations, it would be virtually impossible for Canada to contemplate joining in the proposed negotiations (particularly as many of the concessions which might benefit Japan would have to be negotiated with the United States). Accordingly, apart from the difficulties which such a waiver would create for possible Canadian participation in subsequent general tariff negotiations, the U.S. Administration should appreciate that the more immediate decision concerning negotiations with Japan would almost certainly be adversely affected if the U.S. were to insist on the waiver which it is now seeking. Although we are (like Mr. Dulles) fully conscious of the desirability from a political point of view of helping to ease the admission of Japan fully into the GATT, insistence by the U.S. on its proposal for a waiver would make this practically impossible.

3. In short, it might be represented to Mr. Dulles that the present U.S. proposal (which we regard as unreasonable in itself) would:

(i) adversely affect international [economic] cooperation generally [and this weakens political co-op];

(ii) damage [each of which is other's best customer & I hope closest friend] relations between the United States and Canada;

(iii) impair Canada's ability to enter into tariff negotiations [under GATT] aimed at making Japan a full member of the GATT.<sup>147</sup>

Mr. Dulles might be asked whether he really considers that it is worth incurring these consequences in order to get complete freedom (or at least greater freedom than would seem to be necessary) for the U.S. in agricultural matters.

MINISTERIAL TALKS WITH UNITED STATES ON GATT

1. Frank Lee and Edgar Cohen had dinner with Sharp and myself on Monday evening to discuss current GATT issues. Lee outlined attitude which the United Kingdom will take on several major issues as a result of "agonizing re-appraisal" during Christmas recess. Sharp will report in greater detail after reaching Geneva.

2. It is fair to say that, in the main, Canadian and United Kingdom re-appraisals have come out at about the same point. The major and perhaps only exception is our respective attitudes towards the request by the United States for a waiver on agricultural import restrictions which differ fundamentally and widely. It is extremely fortunate that we were able to tell Lee and Cohen about the nature of the discussions that are taking place Thursday in Washington, and were able to persuade them to withhold disclosure of their proposals in the GATT or to any other country until the outcome of the Washington meetings can be transmitted to them. We have undertaken to let them know what happens not later than Friday. Lee requested particularly that the message to Geneva should be repeated to London so that I can inform him at the same time.

3. The United Kingdom proposal which I repeat has not been and will not be disclosed to anyone else pending the outcome of the Washington talks is based on the premise that the United States cannot be persuaded to drop its request for a waiver to cover future action under Section 22 and that if a waiver is granted for the benefit of the United States it will have to be in a form suitable for application to European countries with agricultural price support programmes. Indeed, as you will see and as we pointed out, the United Kingdom proposal really fits the agricultural programmes of European countries much better than it does those of the United States.

4. Briefly the United Kingdom proposal is to grant waivers in the following form and subject to the following conditions:

- (a) On agricultural products only;
- (b) On agricultural products which are being price supported or which have certain seasonal characteristics (this seasonal qualification was not clearly explained);
- (c) Subject to approval in advance of the particular products on which restrictions may be applied during the ensuing year and of the minimum quotas. We pointed out that this particular condition would lead the Americans if they accepted the proposal, which we seriously doubted, to cast the net as widely as possible so as to include every product on which they might possibly wish to apply import restrictions whether they had any intention of doing so or not;
- (d) Subject to review by the contracting parties of restrictions actually applied under the waiver to determine whether supplying countries had rights to demand compensation or to retaliate. The implication seemed to be that compensation or retaliation would be appropriate if restrictions offended against the principle of fair shares or against such other principles as might be agreed upon.

5. Unless there are some major changes in United States attitude as a result of the Washington talks, the United Kingdom intends to advance its proposal probably over the week-end in anticipation of the OEEC meetings scheduled for Thursday and Friday of next week. Lee believes it to be essential that countries like West Germany and Belgium should know that the United Kingdom will insist on strict limitations on the use of waivers. Sharp explained in detail the position that the Canadian ministers would take in Washington, emphasizing that Canada was opposed to a waiver in any form which relieved the United States in advance of its GATT obligations. Lee said that the United Kingdom had tried unsuccessfully to persuade the United States to drop its request for a waiver and predicted the same outcome for the Canadian démarche. However, he was willing to await events.

6. It is of the utmost importance that some message be sent to Geneva from Washington at the conclusion of the talks between the ministers and secretaries if we wish to prevent the United Kingdom from taking the lead over the week-end in attempting to negotiate a compromise settlement along the lines of their proposal outlined above.

MINISTERIAL TALKS WITH THE U.S. ON GATT

We are most disturbed at the course which the U.K. is apparently contemplating.

2. As you will appreciate, the discussions which are expected to take place in Washington on Thursday will not be of the kind from which concrete results can be expected immediately. We have no exaggerated hopes, but we think it most important that the U.S. Cabinet members concerned should have sufficient opportunity to consider the representations which our Ministers will have made to them. We fear that a proposal on the lines envisaged by the United Kingdom would merely confuse matters and divert their attention from our serious anxieties about a subject which is of vital importance to us. We would hope the United Kingdom would recognize that this is a field in which our interests are much more deeply involved than theirs. We would strongly urge, therefore, that they should not put forward any proposal of this sort.

3. You might remark to the U.K. officials that we have not been able to appreciate why this is a subject on which they feel bound to intervene as a matter of such urgency. In particular, we consider entirely inappropriate their apparent intention to have their proposal brought up for discussion first in the OEEC (although we recognize that it would, of course, be tabled at about the same time in the GATT). You might add that, although we do not profess fully to understand the U.K. proposal as summarized, we cannot believe that it would be acceptable to the United States. Whether or not we are right in this judgement, you might emphasize to the U.K. that it would be objectionable to us.

4. A following telegram will provide the text of the memorandum to be left with U.S. Ministers. You might at your discretion give a copy of that memorandum to the U.K. on Thursday afternoon.

PROPOSED VISIT BY CANADIAN MINISTERS TO WASHINGTON THIS THURSDAY
TO DISCUSS THE SITUATION IN THE GATT REVIEW AND U.S. AGRICULTURAL IMPORT RESTRICTIONS

In my memorandum of January 1, I indicated that we hoped shortly to provide you with some supplementary background material. You will by now have received an advance copy of the attached supplementary paper. I should explain that this paper was prepared jointly by officials of this Department, the Departments of Finance and Trade and Commerce and the Bank of Canada. Copies are also being supplied to Mr. Howe and Mr. Harris.

SECRET

BACKGROUND MATERIAL ON AGRICULTURAL IMPORT RESTRICTIONS

This memorandum has been prepared for the use of Canadian Ministers, to supplement the Note which is to be left with the United States Secretaries.

In seeking a constructive solution to the problem, which might be acceptable to the Americans as well as to ourselves, we have considered two different approaches. The first might be called "Waiver for past actions" approach and the second a "Fair shares of the United States market" approach. The following sets forth some information pertaining to these two approaches. In addition, a brief analysis is provided of the more important agricultural tariff concessions which have been received from the United States.

The meeting with the U.S. Secretaries is essentially for the purpose of registering the Canadian point of view, that it is impossible for Canada to accept the U.S. proposal. Even though no immediate change may be brought about in the U.S. position, it is important for the future that the Canadian attitude should have been effectively presented.

It may be very dangerous, however, to go very far in attempting to negotiate a solution with the Americans which would go any further than the "waiver for past actions." The Americans would be able to concede very little to our point of view. On the other hand, they would ask us to pay a price for any concessions at all from them. In particular, the Americans would expect us to support their waiver proposal if they modified it at all to meet our concerns. Whether the Government can give support to any modification of the U.S. position, and justify it in public, is obviously the most important question for ministerial decision.

It is quite possible that the Americans will say they simply must have the waiver for their own political reasons, but that Canada need not be apprehensive, that the Americans will always consult us and the waiver will not be used against us. The Canadian reply to this would merely be as set forth in the official Note, that such a waiver could not be explained in Canada and that it would have destructive effects on GATT.

The Americans may also point to their record of past actions as being not unreasonably damaging in the circumstances. While we need not contest such an assertion, the restraint which they may have shown in the past is no guide to what they might choose to do (or be forced to do) in the future if they had access to a blanket waiver. When Mr. Howe was confronted with this point in Geneva, he observed that we would not be in as strong a position to negotiate with the Americans in the future if they were to be relieved of their contractual obligations.

A. "WAIVER FOR PAST ACTIONS" APPROACH

The basic purpose of the United States in seeking a waiver of any sort in connection with agricultural imports is that the Administration is now apparently committed to submitting the General Agreement to Congress and that in order to enlist Congressional support it appears essential that the United States should not be acting in contravention of a major obligation under the Agreement. Accordingly, the minimum waiver (or set of waivers) required for this purpose would seem to be a waiver (or waivers) covering the existing situation. If Canada showed its willingness to go this far, it could not fairly be accused of obstructing Congressional approval.

If it is represented by the U.S. Secretaries that nothing less than a complete waiver, for the future as well as the past, would enable them to get favourable action by Congress on the GATT instrument, our reply might be that Congressional approval at this time would not be worth such a price.

The United States has always found the Canadian Government willing to discuss the agricultural trade problems which have arisen. In 1953, for example, the United States Government sought agreement with us on oats<sup>149</sup> and in 1954 on barley<sup>150</sup> and rye.<sup>151</sup> In each case it was found possible to formulate a basis of agreement that both governments could live with.

As and when the Americans confront real problems with regard to their agricultural imports in the future, requiring actions on their part inconsistent with their GATT obligations, it is our view that they should seek appropriate waivers in individual cases, subject to conditions to be agreed upon with the Contracting Parties. We would hope the United States would have confidence that the Contracting Parties, including Canada, would continue to behave fairly in the future, provided the United States proposals were reasonable.

The Canadian Government has committed itself to observe GATT rules in its trade with the United States and we could not accept blanket waivers of these rules for the United States by which we would agree in advance to relieve the United States of some of its most important obligations under GATT.

We may tell the Americans that we would be prepared to discuss appropriate waivers from GATT rules where necessary to cover their existing restrictions. The implication of this is, of course, that we would be prepared to examine similar proposals in the future, if necessary. We should not give assurances in advance, however, which would have the effect of compromising in advance our attitude towards any request which the Americans might make in the future for a waiver on a particular product.

If the Americans were to be relieved of their GATT obligations with respect to future agricultural import restrictions, they might find it much more difficult to resist the unreasonable demands of their own agricultural protectionists. This point should carry considerable weight in at least some important quarters in the Administration.

The Contracting Parties to the GATT have not had occasion to consider whether any restrictions imposed by the United States under Section 22 of the Agricultural Adjustment Act are, in fact, in violation of the provisions of Article XI of GATT. Only in the case of dairy products have the Contracting Parties taken official cognizance of any of the restrictions imposed by the United States.<sup>152</sup> With respect to the latter, the Contracting Parties have noted their undesirable influence on trade and have requested the United States to remove them as quickly as possible. It is difficult to say with certainty in how many cases the Americans have already broken the GATT rules in such ways as to require waivers, although we have represented in several instances that the actions they proposed were in violation of the GATT. Waivers would only be required in cases where the United States felt itself to be in contravention of GATT rules or where the Contracting Parties found the U.S. to be contravening the rules.

Agricultural Escape Clauses (Article XI of GATT)

The GATT at present permits the imposition of quantitative restrictions against agricultural and fisheries products in certain carefully stated circumstances. Article XI allows such restrictions if (1) a product is subject to production or marketing limitations, or (2) if, in order to remove a temporary surplus, a product is made available to domestic consumers at prices below the current market level or free of charge.

The relevant passage in Article XI reads as follows:

“Import restrictions on any agricultural or fisheries product, imported in any form, necessary to the enforcement of governmental measures which operate:

- (1) to restrict the quantities of the like domestic product permitted to be marketed or produced, or, if there is no substantial domestic production of the like product, of a domestic product for which the imported product can be directly substituted; or
- (2) to remove a temporary surplus of the like domestic product, or, if there is no substantial domestic production of the like product, or a domestic product for which the imported product can be directly substituted, by making the surplus available to certain groups of domestic consumers free of charge or at prices below the current market level.”

The maintenance of a price support policy is not a justification under Article XI for applying restrictions. Such a support policy must also be accompanied by a program of the type mentioned in the preceding paragraph.

The agricultural "escape" clause in the GATT is more restrictive than that contained in the Canada-United States Agreement of 1938.<sup>153</sup> In the latter Agreement, the "escape" clause permitted the application of restrictions if a price support program were in force and did not make their application conditional on production limitations or surplus disposal schemes. In spite of this, no restrictions were applied until 1941.

The restrictions at present in force are described below:

Agricultural Restrictions in Force in the United States. (Not all of which are of concern to Canada)

1. Wheat and Wheat Flour

Wheat: Total import quota of 800,000 bus./annum.
795,000 bus. of quota allocated to Canada.

Flour: Total import quota of 4 million lbs./annum.
8,915,000 lbs. of quota allocated to Canada.

Comments: Restriction imposed since 1941.

Wheat is subject to price support.

Exports of wheat and flour are subsidized.

Production subject to acreage control.

2. Oats

Total import quota of 40 million bus./annum.
39,312,000 bus. of quota allocated to Canada.

Comments: Restriction first imposed in 1953.

Subject to price support

Under the existing arrangement this restriction is in force until September 30/55.

Feed grains are being given away as a part of the U.S. drought relief program.

There are no production restrictions.

3. Barley and Barley Malt

Total import quota of 27.5 million bus./annum.
27,225,000 bus. of quota allocated to Canada.

Comments: Restriction first imposed in 1954.

Subject to price support.

Under the existing arrangement this restriction is in force until September 30/55.

Feed grains are being given away as a part of the U.S. drought relief program.

There are no production restrictions.

4. Rye

Total import quota of 186 million lbs./annum.
Quota not allocated to individual countries.

Comments: Restriction first imposed in 1954.

Subject to price support.

Feed grains are being given away as part of the United States drought relief program.

There are no production restrictions.

5. Dairy Products

The following products are subject to import quota — Butter, dried cream, malted milk, dried whole milk, dried skimmed milk, dried buttermilk, cheddar cheese, blue-mould and italian-type cheese.

Comments: Restrictions imposed since 1951.

These products are subject to price support. While there are no production controls, there are a number of give-away programs designed to reduce the surplus stocks. The Contracting Parties to GATT have approved of a Decision requesting the United States to remove them as soon as possible.

6. Peanuts

Import quota of 1,709,000 lbs./annum.

Comments: Additional fee imposed in 1953.

Subject to price support.

7. Peanut Oil

Imports in excess of 80 million lbs./annum are subject to an additional import fee of 25%.

Comments: Additional fee imposed in 1953.

Subject to price support.

8. Long-staple Cotton

Imports restricted since 1939.

Production subject to acreage control.

9. Flaxseed

All imports are subject to an additional fee of 50%.

10. Linseed Oil

All imports are subject to an additional import fee of 50%.

11. Almonds

Imports in excess of 5 million lbs. are subject to an additional import fee of 10¢ lb. There is a program for reducing surpluses by diverting excess supplies from normal markets. Financial assistance is made available for this purpose.

12. Filberts

Imports in excess of 6 million lbs. are subject to an additional import fee of 10¢ lb. There is a program for reducing surpluses by diverting excess supplies from normal markets. Financial assistance is made available for this purpose.

B. "FAIR SHARE OF THE UNITED STATES MARKET" APPROACH

An approach which has been explored in the past is that a country with agricultural price supports should not be obliged to accept additional imports which are attributable solely to the existence of the support program, so long as agricultural exporting countries were guaranteed access for their normal trade (i.e. a "fair share" of the American market). It is not unreasonable to argue that the United States should not be obliged to support the agriculture of the whole world, merely because it has domestic price supports. While it would be difficult, in a particular case, to determine what imports into the United States might have amounted to in the absence of a support program, some formula might be devised based on past trade as well as present trends of consumption in the United States and other relevant factors.

The Americans might find even this approach to be in conflict with Section 22 of the Agricultural Adjustment Act. Section 22 provides for the imposition of restrictions where imports are interfering with a program of the Department of Agriculture and it is set forth in the Agricultural Adjustment Act that the Act is to take precedence over any trade agreement entered into by the United States. A "fair shares" formula, which would in fact limit the extent of possible restrictions, might appear therefore to be explicitly in conflict with the Agricultural Adjustment Act.

If we were to suggest a "fair shares" approach and the Americans were unexpectedly to accept it, we would then be committed to support it. On the other hand it is doubtful that the Americans could possibly agree to a formulation of this approach which would go far enough to meet our position and be publicly defensible in Canada.

C. IMPORTANT TARIFF CONCESSIONS MADE ON AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS BY THE UNITED STATES TO CANADA SINCE 1930. A NUMBER OF SMALLER ITEMS ARE NOT INCLUDED IN THIS LIST.

Note du secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures
Memorandum by Secretary of State for External Affairs

[Ottawa], January 6, 1955

The Canadian Government has been reviewing the position reached at the current meeting in Geneva of the Contracting Parties to the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade. The Canadian Government had hoped that the review of the General Agreement would result in a stronger set of trade rules and that any weakening of the Agreement would be avoided; this hope was expressed at the meeting last March of the Canada-United States Joint Economic Committee.<sup>154</sup>

Accordingly the Canadian Government was deeply concerned to learn of the intention of the Government of the United States, as communicated to the Canadian and other delegations in Geneva, to seek a waiver of very important obligations under the Agreement. This waiver would sanction the imposition of restrictions and fees on any imports into the United States covered by Section 22 of the Agricultural Adjustment Act, whenever such imports were considered to interfere with a program of the United States Department of Agriculture. It is the view of the Canadian Government that any such blanket waiver would strike at the foundations of Canadian-American commercial relationships and of the General Agreement under which those relationships have developed so substantially during the past seven years.

In successive rounds of tariff negotiations under the Agreement, the Canadian Government has made substantial concessions to the United States. As compensation, tariff concessions have been received from the United States, and among the most important of them have been concessions facilitating traditional Canadian exports of agricultural products to the United States. In Canada much of the support for present commercial relations with the United States under the General Agreement comes from those sections and interests which rely on these traditional exports. It would not be possible to convince the Canadian people that it was necessary for the United States to get a waiver giving formal release from its obligation not to impair its tariff concessions; nor would it be reasonable to ask the Canadian Parliament to condone such a waiver. In particular, if such a waiver were in effect, or likely to come into effect, it would be most difficult for the Canadian Government to take part in tariff negotiations under the Agreement. Accordingly, the Canadian Government must inform the Government of the United States that it will have to oppose actively any waiver of the type proposed.

The Canadian Government is aware of the constructive efforts now being made by the United States Administration by the revision of certain agricultural price support programs to alleviate some of the difficulties affecting trade in agricultural products. The Canadian Government has also appreciated that United States price support programs have acted as a special magnet for agricultural imports.

Accordingly, when particular problems have arisen, the Canadian Government has consistently been willing to cooperate in seeking solutions. Such solutions have been worked out with reference to the principles set forth in the General Agreement and without any general impairment of those principles. The Canadian Government would not be prepared to accept any proposal which would leave the United States free to impose agricultural import restrictions in the future or which would compromise the important principles contained in the existing trade agreement. A waiver, such as that proposed, would involve a fundamental departure from the principles and practices of the Agreement, and would seriously upset the balance of the Agreement between the two countries — both the balance in respect of existing tariff concessions and also the balance in respect of the general obligations.

Apart from its direct effects on Canada, the proposed waiver, in the opinion of the Canadian Government, is having most unfortunate effects on the current review of the Agreement in Geneva. The granting of such a waiver would also seriously impair the subsequent operation of the Agreement. In the first place, both Canada and the United States have been attempting, in their own interests, to negotiate stricter general trade rules in order to reduce the resort by overseas countries to trade restrictions and discrimination; and such negotiations can scarcely be expected to succeed if the United States is at the same time insisting that it must have complete freedom to impose restrictions on a very important segment of its imports. Secondly, far from giving up existing rights to impose restrictions, governments of other countries are likely to be incited by the example of the United States to seek broad waivers to release them from obligations, agricultural or otherwise, which they anticipate may involve them in economic difficulty or political embarrassment. Thirdly, the balance of the Agreement for many countries besides Canada will be seriously upset if the United States seeks and obtains a waiver covering agricultural imports; indeed many members of the Agreement are concerned that it is already unbalanced in favour of countries exporting foodstuffs and materials. Finally, it would seem that the integrity of the Agreement would be threatened if a major country used the waiver procedure to gain exemption from obligations relating to a major segment of its trade. This would be particularly the case if such waivers were obtained against the opposition of the country or countries chiefly affected.

Under the General Agreement, the Governments of Canada and the United States have stood together and worked together for the reduction of trade barriers and the elimination of discriminatory restrictions. Trade between Canada and the United States constitutes the most important sector of the trade facilitated by tariff concessions under the Agreement; each country is the other's best customer.

In all the circumstances, the Canadian Government would urge that the Government of the United States should not press forward, in Geneva, with a request for a waiver which the Canadian Government has no alternative but to oppose.

Compte-rendu d'une réunion entre les ministres du Canada et des États-Unis

Record of Meeting between Canadian and United States Ministers

[Washington], January 6, 1955

The meeting between Canadian and United States Ministers that took place at the State Department on the 6th of January might be described as a series of variations played over a fundamental deadlock. The presentation of the Canadian case clearly had some effect on the United States representatives; but it is impossible to predict whether the United States position will be modified in consequence. No compromise solutions were suggested by either side, although the examination of what some of the United States representatives took to be the implications of remarks made by the Canadian Ministers led to discussion of several possible expedients to solve the problem. Most, if not all, of these expedients, however, were rejected as impracticable during the course of the meeting.

2. The fundamental Canadian position was enunciated by Mr. Pearson in his opening statement. The Canadian public, he said, was becoming restive about the General Agreement. The view was common in Canada that, whereas tariff concessions granted by Canada under the Agreement had been maintained intact, there was a good deal of flexibility, to say the least, in the reciprocal concessions granted by the United States. As a result of this sense of dissatisfaction, pressure was increasing in Canada for higher tariffs. The United States demand for an unlimited waiver to operate Section 22 of the Agricultural Adjustment Act would certainly increase this pressure. It would also weaken the value of the whole GATT system in Canada, since no agricultural concessions granted under its auspices could be regarded as firm.

3. It was appreciated in Canada that in administering Section 22, the United States Administration had endeavoured to injure Canadian economic interests as little as possible. On the United States side, it might be argued that in the light of this experience Canada should be willing to trust the United States to make mild and sparing use of the proposed waiver and to consult fully with the Canadian Government with a view to minimizing the adverse effects in Canada of action taken under it. With at least equal force, however, it could be replied that the Canadian Government had tried to cooperate sympathetically whenever the United States felt obliged to invoke Section 22 because of its pressing agricultural problems. In the past, ad hoc solutions had proved adequate. Why could the United States Government not trust Canada to show a similarly cooperative spirit in future when particular problem had to be solved, instead of seeking a general waiver?

4. It should be realized that such a waiver would involve an open split between the United States and Canada that could not help but disturb relations between the two countries. This would be a high price to pay for getting Congressional approval of the General Agreement. Further than that, the effort to obtain a two-thirds majority from the Contracting Parties would have an adverse effect on international cooperation generally. It should also be borne in mind that as payment for the support that would be required from other countries, the United States would almost certainly have to release certain of those countries from their GATT obligations. Far from giving up existing rights to impose restrictions, other countries would be incited by the example of the United States to seek broad waivers to release them from commitments, agricultural or otherwise, which they anticipated might involve them in economic difficulty or political embarrassment.

5. Canada would be caught in the middle between the forces that would thus be unleashed. But the broad consequences of the United States effort to obtain a general waiver would perhaps be even more serious; and in the process the benefits anticipated by the United States might well be more than neutralized. In particular, the promising movement towards convertibility would suffer a set-back; and the whole GATT system might become more shadow than substance.

6. If a major country were to suggest a waiver procedure to gain exemption from obligations relating to a major segment of its trade, it would be difficult, if not impossible, for Canada to participate in subsequent tariff negotiations under GATT auspices. Specifically, this difficulty would arise in the case of the forthcoming negotiations with Japan, since many of the Canadian concessions which would benefit Japan would involve triangular negotiations with the United States.

7. After summarizing the arguments he had presented, Mr. Pearson concluded his statement by putting the question whether it was wise or necessary to abandon the procedures that had been previously followed for ad hoc solutions and to seek instead a general waiver in the hope that this would ensure approval for GATT by Congress. It would be for the United States authorities, of course, to answer that question. But he and his colleagues believed they had a duty to let the United States Government know their position on this matter as something which might have a bearing on the decision. They had therefore come to Washington to make it clear that Canada would have no alternative but to oppose the granting of such a waiver.

8. Mr. Howe spoke next, and began by saying that he was not disturbed over the past. Canada would be quite prepared to support actions taken hitherto under Section 22. However, he would like the United States to solve its problem by something other than a blanket waiver. He felt that he could rely on the United States to recognize that Canada must live, and not to take actions that would make that impossible. He was more worried about the repercussions elsewhere of a general waiver. Counter proposals were being prepared by OEEC countries, and they could be extremely damaging to Canada's overseas trade.

9. Mr. Howe also suggested that the latitude permitted by Article XI of the existing General Agreement had not been fully explored by the United States. Was it not possible within the terms of that Article to accommodate past restrictions imposed under Section 22 and also any future restrictions that might be necessary? It seemed to him that the United States authorities had overlooked this possibility. He also pointed out that there were very few agricultural commodities at present under price support in the United States which had not yet been subjected to the operations of Section 22. Among them were wheat (other than milling wheat), potatoes, wool, beans and honey. It might be possible, he indicated, for Canada to agree to waivers covering those commodities. In view of these alternative possibilities open to the United States, he could not see why a blanket waiver was necessary.

10. Referring to his responsibilities for the Canadian tariff and for the budget, Mr. Harris said that the one thing that was continually mentioned by applicants in Canada for higher protection was that Canada had never chipped away at the tariff concessions it had granted, while tariff concessions granted to Canada in exchange had been reduced by one means or another. This argument would acquire added force and urgency if the United States were to press for a general waiver to operate Section 22. The tariff concessions that Canada had obtained to facilitate the entry of its agricultural commodities into the United States market were among the most important that it had secured in multilateral negotiations. In ordinary circumstances Canada would want to participate in further rounds of tariff reductions. But that would become virtually impossible if the United States obtained a general waiver to justify future restrictions on agricultural imports.

11. The formal United States reply was delivered by Mr. Dulles. He claimed that in its foreign economic relations the United States had followed in recent years a responsible course in the face of very considerable difficulties. Because of the continental scale of the United States economy and its great productive power, it was difficult for the voters in this country to grasp fully the importance of foreign trade. More than most other people, Americans inevitably were prone to the illusion that they could get along without trading outside their own borders. As a result, there had been zigzags in United States foreign economic policy. At the last session of Congress, the President had not been able to make so much progress as he would have liked. But legislation was being sent to the new Congress to stabilize the commercial relations of the United States, which, if passed, should be of immense value. It was not yet certain that this effort would be successful, although the Administration was very hopeful. It would be unfortunate if just as the United States was hoping to take a step forward there should be a collapse of the GATT negotiations as the result of the United States request for a general waiver.

12. However, Mr. Dulles argued that the waiver was intended to deal with a special situation which it was believed would be temporary. Past agricultural policies in the United States had resulted in huge surpluses. Now the Administration was embarked on a programme which should reduce that abnormal situation. At the moment, it was not certain that the flexible price supports which had been enacted at the last Congress would stick; but there were grounds for confidence that the new policy would not be reversed. If that expectation were justified, the practical occasion for a general waiver would not persist for many years, although no one was yet in a position to set a date at which the need for the waiver would disappear.

13. The reason the United States had to adopt the stand it had taken in Geneva was contained in domestic legislation. There was no possibility for the present of having Section 22 repealed or amended. He hoped that an opportune time to amend the Section would come before long. But for the moment, he did not see how the United States could take any other course but to ask for the indulgence of its friends, whom he could see would face serious political difficulties as a result.

14. However, he would urge that the most important single thing that could be done to improve trade relations throughout the world would be for the United States to remove as large a measure as possible of the known instability in its own commercial policy. Extensive progress in this direction would be made if the President's foreign trade measures were approved at this session of Congress, including a three-year extension of the Trade Agreements Act, a customs simplification measure and ratification of the organizational provisions of GATT. He knew and regretted that a general waiver from the Contracting Parties to operate Section 22 would create a new area of instability. But this would be far more than offset by the stabilizing effect of what the Administration thought it could get Congress to approve.

15. After this opening cannonade, the meeting developed into a musketry engagement, which, like any real battle, is difficult to describe. In the rapid cross-fire, a number of hares went skipping about. But none of them were brought down; and perhaps none of them had been real.

16. It began with Mr. Dulles asking Mr. Clarence Randall to comment on the suggestion that Article XI of the existing Agreement might be an adequate cover for any action which the United States might wish to take under Section 22. Mr. Randall disagreed. In this opinion, there were many actions which the President might be authorized to take under Section 22 that could not be justified within the terms of Article XI; and Dr. Hauge mentioned specifically the price support programme for nuts and filberts and the import restrictions that might be necessary for its success. More generally, Mr. Randall tried to explain that many of those in Congress who would oppose the General Agreement would do so on constitutional grounds which might have little or nothing to do with trade policy. It was therefore important that the GATT provisions applicable to United States agricultural import restrictions should be clearly and unquestionably compatible with Section 22. If the opponents of GATT could argue successfully that the international instrument which Congress was being asked to approve would operate to limit the effectiveness of a domestic law, the measure would be defeated in Congress. Without a general waiver, he insisted, there could not be Congressional approval for GATT; and without Congressional approval for GATT, the President's foreign trade programme would founder.

17. Mr. Harris interjected that it seemed to him that the Administration would acquire merit rather than the reverse in the eyes of Congress if in presenting its case it made a virtue of the gap between Section 22 and the agricultural provisions of GATT and boasted that in the past it had scrupulously followed Congressional wishes by implementing Section 22 even though this had involved them in trouble with the Contracting Parties. Mr. Randall replied that the past would be almost irrelevant to Congress. When the organizational provisions of the General Agreement were submitted to Congress, that would be the first time that Congressional approval had been sought. It would be fatal to the success of the measure if opponents to it could argue that the provisions of GATT were at variance with the provisions of Section 22, and that for that reason the Administration would be forced to choose in future between implementing Section 22 more narrowly than would otherwise be possible or, alternatively, carrying out the full intent of the domestic legislation and breaking its international obligations.

18. If the present Article XI of GATT was not wide enough to justify all the restrictions that might be imposed under Section 22, Mr. Humphrey wondered whether, instead of seeking a general waiver, a better approach might not be to amend Article XI so that it became as broad as Section 22. Mr. Howe said that that course could hardly be worse than asking for a general waiver. However, Mr. Randall recalled that the Canadian delegation in Geneva had taken the position that a waiver would, if anything, be a lesser evil than broadening Article XI; and after some discussion the Canadian Ministers expressed the view that an amendment to Article XI would certainly be no better than a general waiver. In an effort to explain why the United States had decided to seek a waiver, Dr. Hauge directed two questions to the Canadian representatives. "Do you conceive," he asked first, "of any position we can take short of asking us to amend Section 22?" The Canadian Ministers replied that they realized that in present circumstances there was no hope of securing an amendment to Section 22. Dr. Hauge's second question was: "Is the kind of GATT you want compatible with Section 22?" Mr. Howe replied that it was not. If that were the case, Dr. Hauge argued that what was in the question was a fundamentally incompatible situation and that this would be recognized by the granting of a general waiver.

19. Putting a new edge on the problem that a general waiver would raise for the Canadian Government, Mr. Howe said that, if he were to accept it, he would have to rise in the House of Commons and say that he had agreed that the United States could shut out Canadian agricultural exports any time it wished. That would be an impossible situation for him to be in. Twice in the past the Canadian West had been ruined by restrictions imposed by the United States against exports of Canadian cattle. If there were a general waiver, the West could be ruined again merely by the United States adopting a price support programme for cattle and then invoking Section 22.

20. When it was recalled by Mr. Randall that the 1938 Trade Agreement between Canada and the United States had contained a waiver wider in scope than the waiver now being sought from the Contracting Parties, Mr. Howe repeated that, leaving his political problems aside, he was not so much worried in practical terms about action that might be taken by the United States as about action that might be taken by European countries. During the 1930's there had been high tariffs in almost every Western European country against Canadian wheat and other agricultural exports. If the United States were to secure a general waiver, that situation might well be duplicated.

21. Speculating further afield, Mr. Howe said that he was coming to believe that GATT might perhaps have served its day. In the past, Canada had had bilateral agreements with the United States which had worked very satisfactorily; and he was beginning to wonder whether it might not be better to go back to arrangements of that kind, especially since the kind of waiver that the United States was seeking could conceivably result in thinning the GATT right out. At any rate, he questioned why it was necessary to seek Congressional approval this year of a revised General Agreement. Could not the President's trade programme be passed this year and the GATT legislation be put over until next year, when it might be possible to write more acceptable agricultural provisions?

22. Once he had succeeded in grasping that suggestion, Mr. Randall put forward numerous arguments in rebuttal. So long ago as in his Message to Congress of March 30th, 1954,<sup>155</sup> the President had committed himself to submit the organizational provisions of GATT to Congress, he recalled. It was true that a three-year extension of the Trade Agreements Act would be debated and voted on by Congress before the GATT review was completed. Indeed, that sequence was being deliberately followed by the Administration so that GATT problems would not complicate the debate over the Trade Agreements Act. If it became known, however, within the next sixty days that a new instrument was not to be presented to Congress this year, or that the United States delegation in Geneva was not pressing for freedom to operate Section 22, GATT problems would be injected into the discussion of the Trade Agreements Act with disastrous results on its fate in Congress. Moreover, as a practical matter, it would be impossible for the Administration to continue with the present unratified Agreement. A new Agreement, approved by Congress, would be the indispensable machinery for administering the Trade Agreements Act. The President had stated publicly that he would use the new authority he hoped to gain in the context of multilateral negotiations — by which he meant GATT negotiations. The President had also given many private assurances to Senators and Congressmen that the new negotiating authority would not be used until Congress had approved the organizational provisions of GATT. The only course to follow, Mr. Randall claimed, was to go forward with existing plans. The Trade Agreements Act must be extended; the GATT must be lawfully preserved; and on that basis the new trade legislation should be implemented. As for the argument that the Agreement might be thinned away by a general waiver until there was very little left, Mr. Randall claimed that a weaker GATT that had been approved by Congress would be a stronger GATT than there was at present.

23. In spite of the vigour of Mr. Randall's remarks, it was noticeable that Mr. Humphrey thought that it might be possible to separate the Trade Agreements legislation from the GATT legislation and postpone ratification of the organizational provisions of the Agreement until next year. Although the United States representatives were scattering their shots, for the most part they were standing shoulder-to-shoulder, except occasionally for Mr. Humphrey, who now and then was off on the flanks on his own.

24. Although Mr. Randall could see no alternative for the United States but to follow its present course, he said that the difficulty over Section 22 caused him great anguish. He admitted that there was very considerable justice in the Canadian case. But the United States was locked in behind words and was not at liberty to consider merely what would be right. Unfortunately, they were forced to concentrate instead on what would be feasible. He was not sure whether the United States could secure a two-thirds majority from the Contracting Parties for a general waiver. Certainly they would be very unhappy to reach that goal against Canadian opposition. When he was asked by Mr. Howe what would happen if the United States failed to get a two-thirds majority, Mr. Randall said that the United States delegation would have to announce that they could not sign the Agreement.

25. Before the meeting concluded, Mr. Waugh enquired whether it would be any easier for Canada to accept a general waiver if it contained a time limit. However, the Canadian Ministers declined that gambit and the meeting ended, as it had begun, with Mr. Pearson declaring that Canada would have no alternative but to oppose a general waiver.

26. Present on the United States side were:

The Hon. John Foster Dulles, Secretary of State
 The Hon. George Humphrey, Secretary of the Treasury
 The Hon. True Morse, Under-Secretary of Agriculture
 The Hon. R. Douglas Stuart, Ambassador to Canada
 Mr. Clarence Randall, Special Assistant to the President
 Dr. Gabriel Hauge, Administrative Assistant to the President for Economic Affairs
 Mr. Sam Waugh, Assistant Secretary of State for Economic Affairs
 Mr. Livingston Merchant, Assistant Secretary of State for European Affairs
 Mr. Ben Thibodeaux, Director of the Office of Economic Defence and Trade Policy in the State Department and Mr. Leonard Weiss of the Commercial Policy Staff of the State Department.

Present on the Canadian side were:

The Rt. Hon. C.D. Howe, Minister of Trade and Commerce
 The Hon. L.B. Pearson, Secretary of State for External Affairs
 The Hon. Walter Harris, Minister of Finance
 Mr. A.D.P. Heeney, Ambassador to the United States and Mr. D.V. LePan of the Canadian Embassy in Washington.

27. At the conclusion of the meeting, Mr. Pearson handed to Mr. Dulles the attached Memorandum.<sup>156</sup>

UNITED STATES WAIVER AND GATT

Since receiving the news that the United States intends to continue to seek a blanket waiver for actions under Section 22, we have been considering what course by the Canadian delegation would be most favourable to Canadian interests and the future of the GATT. The situation as we see it is as follows:

2. The United States decision (group corrupt) for a blanket waiver produces a new situation; some delegations here are going to be facing up to implications for GATT and for themselves that we have foreseen for some time but that are new to them. The chain-reaction is sure to begin spreading and it would seem to be in our interest to try to contain it.

3. Several European countries, notably West Germany and Belgium, are seeking or will seek waivers with respect to hard core problems in industry as well as agriculture now covered and camouflaged by balance of payments, import restrictions or the protocol of provisional application. German Ministers have made clear that they will not present GATT and the new trade rules to their Parliament unless their agricultural problems are recognized and provided for in GATT. The United States draft waiver, while of a blanket nature, is not adapted to trends of these European countries. As Brown told us, and as we reported yesterday, the United States draft waiver may indeed be altered to make it even less directly applicable to the European situation.

4. We are aware of two lines of thought as to the proper method of limiting the scope of possible waivers.

(a) The United States view, which is apparently supported by Australia (the latest Australian draft waiver is no improvement over the first), that the United States situation is unique and should be dealt with as such and that all other waivers including those for European countries should and can be effectively resisted. We doubt that the resistance will be effective particularly if United States gets its waiver.

(b) The view held by Wyndham White, the Executive Secretary, that the European situation should be tackled first and an attempt made to work out a memorandum of understanding under Article 25 which would require signature by at least 2/3 of the contracting parties. This would set out conditions under which individual waivers would be granted for hard-core problems as and when they were sought in the future. The endeavour would be to include in the memorandum rigid conditions as to duration, fair shares, period review and progressive removal; and commodities that were under restriction on a date laid down in the memorandum would be eligible for a waiver and all of these would not necessarily be approved. Saunders of the United Kingdom delegation showed us a document prepared by the German delegation which indicates that they could accept such conditions. He also indicated that the Belgians could accept something of the same sort.

5. We have fought vigorously during the present session against both European and American waivers. We shall continue to state our unalterable opposition to the present American proposal. We do propose for consideration, however, that in view of the way the situation has developed Canadian delegation, while not necessarily at this stage supporting a memorandum applicable to European hard-core problems, should actively encourage the Executive Secretary to negotiate such a memorandum on as strict terms as possible to deal with European problems as they arise. Our reasons for proposing this line of approach are as follows:

(a) The European request for accommodation will, in any event, have to be met in some form or other;

(b) It is true that the memorandum will in effect guarantee the grant of waivers if and when they are sought but as indicated above the Germans insist on this as a minimum;

(c) The conditions which it may be possible to write into the memorandum will probably be more restrictive than those which could be forced into each individual waiver when sought. A number of countries including the Scandinavians, United Kingdom and ourselves and indeed the United States itself are worried about the effect of European protectionism and can be counted upon to insist on a memorandum with the strictest possible conditions.

(d) It will be in the interest of European countries, the United Kingdom and Canada to resist the American effort to obtain a blanket waiver to cover particular United States problems since such a waiver would tend to undermine the effort to get agreement on strict conditions to apply to European waivers. If agreement can be reached we may be able to count on the opposition of all European countries to a blanket United States waiver.

(e) In short, we believe that such an approach if successfully carried through would make it extremely difficult for the Americans to carry their present blanket waiver in GATT.

6. We have shown Saunders of the United Kingdom a copy of our message No. 4 of January 11† giving the results of Canadian representations in Washington as reported to us and told him that of course we now had no reason to ask the United Kingdom to delay discussions with the Europeans. We encouraged him to let Wyndham White take the initiative in preparing a draft memorandum having in mind the undesirable United Kingdom type of waiver outlined to Sharp and Robertson in London by Lee and Cohen and reported in message No. 5 of January 4 from London to Ottawa.

7. You will be in a better position than we are to assess the results of possible failure by the United States to mobilize the required majority (2/3 of those voting and 1/2 of the contracting parties) in support of their blanket waiver. Our analysis, for what it is worth, is that such a situation would require the United States to give more serious consideration than they have hitherto given to the detrimental effects on the GATT as a whole of their extreme demands. In their present mood the Administration obviously wish to facilitate passage of the GATT organization through Congress and are trying to get as broad a waiver as possible for that purpose. Congress may, however, be prepared to take either no waiver or a more limited form of waiver; even if the Congress imposed conditions on GATT's ratification it is better in our view to have Congress impose those conditions (which in effect are already in Section 22) than for the GATT to agree to them in advance. In any event, it is United States action rather than United States law about which we are concerned.

8. Looking to the immediate situation, the United States delegation is already starting to broaden the discussion and to seek support for their waiver. Accordingly you will wish to consider what action we should take in relation to this activity. We assume that you will not wish us to withdraw from all discussion of these fundamental matters and, accordingly, that at the very least you would wish us to put forward the Canadian position whenever called upon to do so along the following lines:

(a) While a blanket waiver might facilitate passage of the GATT organization through Congress it is by no means certain that it is needed for this purpose;

(b) In any case, such a waiver would be so damaging to the fabric of GATT and Canada-United States relations that the Canadian delegation would unquestionably vote against it;

(c) If the United States delegation wishes to seek a reasonable sort of waiver bearing some resemblance to waivers that may be given to European countries in future they should put it forward for consideration. In regard to the form of waiver that might possibly emerge under (c) above, we are now inclined to believe that "waivers for past actions" might be of less help to the United States Administration in Congress and would probably gain less support amongst the other delegations here than a waiver based on the "fair shares" approach covering a limited period and providing for periodic reviews and removal of basic causes. Waivers for past United States actions involve explicit admission by the United States that they are infringing the GATT; and Brown emphasized to us that such waivers were of very little interest to them.

9. We think that on the basis of evidence available now there is a fair chance (although by no means a certainty) of enlisting sufficient opposition to prevent the approval of the present United States waiver or anything like it. To do this we shall have to enter the field far more actively than suggested in the preceding paragraph. We appreciate the serious implications which this involves, not only with respect to Canada-United States relations, but also in the partial abandonment at least of our opposition to a continuation of European protectionism. Moreover, this approach might sooner or later involve us participating in the review or amendment of a limited United States waiver and thus the delegation would become in a measure associated with it even though we might fully reserve the position of the Canadian Government in regard to a final vote.

10. We need instructions most urgently. (Please repeat them to Canac Paris).

UNITED STATES WAIVER AND GATT

We have not had an opportunity to obtain the views of Ministers on your message but have discussed it interdepartmentally and wish you to know our views immediately.

2. We recognize that a carefully circumscribed waiver, if it were acceptable to the Americans and the Europeans, would not be as damaging as the general waiver proposed by the United States. However, there is no chance whatever that the U.S. will accept a waiver along the lines of paragraph 4(b) of your message on which we would, in any case, have reservations e.g. the apparent absence of a price support or other type of agricultural programme as a necessary condition for import restrictions. The European proposal taken by itself is clearly against our interests and our only reason for being associated with it in any way would be to defeat the American proposal. This is a very hazardous position for us to take. First, once the Europeans have what they want for themselves, they will have little reason (except in one or two cases) to oppose the American waiver. Second, if the Europeans get their waiver with our support or acquiescence and the Americans subsequently get their waiver despite our opposition, we shall have the worst of both worlds. Our relations with the United States will be impaired and we shall be in a weaker position to make representations to them in particular cases because we shall have compromised our principles in dealing with the European waiver. For these reasons, though we must continue to oppose the American waiver, we do not believe that we should assume the special responsibilities involved in siding with the Europeans (from whom we may have still more to fear) in an attempt to defeat it.

3. In the circumstances our view is that the right course is for us to continue to oppose the American waiver and not to promote or support the European proposal.

4. We shall be consulting Ministers as soon as possible and we expect that they will confirm these instructions.

5. Incidentally, as indicated in an earlier message, we are still awaiting a formal reply from the United States Government. Until we receive such a reply, we are not assuming that they have taken a final decision on our ministerial representations.<sup>157</sup>

GATT—UNITED STATES WAIVER

The position taken by Waugh in Paris as reported in our telegram No. 12 of January 18† would seem to constitute a definite reply to the representations made at the ministerial meetings in Washington. Although formal confirmation of this position is yet to be received we are now forced to the conclusion:

(a) That the United States will press forward in its intention to complete the GATT review and put the GATT organization before Congress at this session and

(b) That for this purpose they will use all means at their disposal to get the contracting parties to give them a waiver permitting the administration full freedom to operate Section 22. In these circumstances it seems necessary to reconsider what course is least damaging immediately and ultimately to the position of the Canadian Government.

2. One course would have been to obstruct the United States intentions as far as possible. This delegation might have actively enlisted opposition to the United States proposed waiver. This course was valid as long as there was any hope of employing it as a means of dissuading the United States from their blanket waiver or from pressing forward with the review. However, the United States position appears quite immovable. Further the time is passing, indeed may already be past, in which this course is practicable; the United States are already hard at work firming up support for their waiver.

3. Another course is for Canada to continue to stand aside and let the United States waiver take its course. In this case we believe that the waiver will be adopted in some form not far removed in essentials from the present. Our position might be interpreted (as indeed Frank Lee interpreted it in London) as Canada being prepared to vote against the United States waiver in the confident expectation that the waiver would carry thus preserving Canada's bilateral bargaining position with the United States while avoiding all the serious and far-reaching consequences in the United States and in the GATT review which would now, in the light of discussions in London and Paris, appear to follow from defeat of the United States proposal.

4. We have been giving a lot of thought to the implications of voting against an eventually successful American waiver. It is true that in future bargaining with the United States it would provide us with a useful grievance; further, any evidence that the Canadians are "standing up to" American pressures is likely to be popular in Canada. On the other hand, the degree to which our bargaining position would be strengthened can be exaggerated. Further, and far more important, the position of the Government in resisting rising protectionist pressures at home would be greatly weakened. Those who oppose GATT and all it represents would be able to claim with some force that they fully agreed with the Government in opposing the waivers; that it had indeed weakened the GATT and undermined the basis of Canadian-American trade relations; and that accordingly little attention need be paid to Canadian obligations under the GATT.

5. Our growing worries on this score have forced us to examine with little enthusiasm still another course. The United States is demanding, for presentational purposes, a waiver which gives them complete freedom to operate Section 22; in other words, it must be a blanket waiver which we have said we shall oppose. This would seem to rule out any possibility of compromise. Nevertheless, it may be worth considering whether the waiver could not be drawn in such a way as to state, or clearly to imply, that the continuance of the waiver is subject to good international behaviour on the part of the United States.

6. We have therefore thought over the possibility of meeting their presentational needs while introducing into the same waiver (A) some language that is sufficiently firm to serve Canada as a basis of negotiation in Washington if and when new restrictions are imposed, and (B) some further language which can serve to make the waiver reasonably defensible in Canada. All this would be the height of hypocrisy if we believed the United States intended to make broad use of the sweeping escape that they are demanding; but since their need is essentially formal and presentational it may be that we can meet it in a similar vein.

7. You will, of course, have noticed that first Weiss (our telegram No. 18 January 12 re WA-38)† and then Waugh and Brown (our telegram No. 12 of January 18) have invited us to try to "tighten up" their waiver. These invitations may be a trap. On the other hand we are inclined to think that they were given in good faith on the basis of the deep impression left by our Ministers in Washington and that if we can allow the United States what they consider they need in the waiver they may be disposed to go just as far as possible in adapting it towards our needs. If such a composite waiver exists (and we are not convinced that it does) it would, of course, permit the United States to move forward in its course while allowing the Canadian Government to continue its traditional support for the GATT as bulwark against protectionist pressures.

8. Any such possibility should, of course, be explored in the first instance not in Geneva but in Washington. It would constitute a response to the invitations mentioned in the previous paragraph. Further, the matter is too important to be raised here and the United States Delegation exercises too little influence at home. If you see merit in this course a member of this delegation, presumably Sharp, could return at short notice.

9. In order to give shape to our thoughts we have tried our hands at a first draft of a composite waiver which will be found at the end of this telegram. In preparing this draft we have, as you will gather, depended on the doctrine (which Weiss said the Washington legal experts accepted) that as long as a waiver does not include a time-limit it can be withdrawn at any time (and we would add by a simple majority of the contracting parties). If this doctrine can be effectively linked with firm review procedures and the existing provision for fair-shares to be found in Article XI as a criterion for the review — then we on our side can claim that while the United States may have been given a "blanket waiver", they have only been given it subject to good behaviour. This might make the waiver presentationally possible in Canada; further, the embodiment of the fair shares doctrine would serve as a basis of negotiations from time to time on particular products in Washington.

10. Here follows the substantive paragraphs (10), (11) and (12) of a composite draft. It is based on the United States draft. The first nine paragraphs of that draft constituting the preamble would also require some alterations but these can be left for later discussion pending consideration of the major issue.

Proposed redraft of concluding paragraphs of United States waiver

(10) The contracting parties decide in accordance with paragraph 5(a) of Article XXV of the general agreement that the provisions of Article XI of the agreement shall be waived to the extent necessary to prevent a conflict with such article in the case of action required to be taken by the Government of the United States under Section 22 of the Agricultural Adjustment Act as amended and annexed to this waiver in cases in which it is found by the President of the United States after investigation that such products are being or are practically certain to be imported in such quantities and under such conditions as to interfere materially with, or render ineffective, a programme undertaken by the United States Department of Agriculture or any agency under its direction with respect to an agricultural commodity or product thereof.

(11) As a condition to the granting of this waiver the United States undertakes

(a) To give notice in advance of any proposed action under Section 22 to any contracting party likely to be affected by that action and to provide an opportunity to each of them to express their views in ample time to affect the proposed action;

(b) To take into consideration when applying restrictions under this waiver, the provision of Article XI of the general agreement that restrictions shall not be such as will reduce the total of imports relative to the total of domestic production as compared with the proportion which might reasonably be expected to rule between the two in the absence of restrictions; and that in determining this proportion due regard shall be paid to the proportion prevailing during a representative period and to any special factors which may have affected or may be affecting the trade in the products concerned;

(c) To report promptly to the contracting parties any measures taken under this waiver;

(d) To relax or remove any restrictions imposed under this waiver as soon as it is found under the provisions for the administration of Section 22 that circumstances no longer require their imposition;

(e) Upon request by a contracting party which considers that its interests are seriously prejudiced by reason of restrictions imposed under this waiver, to discuss with the contracting party or parties concerned, or with the contracting parties, the need for or the level of the restrictions.

(12) At least once every twelve months the contracting parties shall review this waiver. They shall consider whether and to what extent the circumstances including those in paragraphs (2) and (3) leading the contracting parties to grant a waiver still obtain. They shall review the measures taken by the United States under this waiver in the light of the undertakings in paragraph (11), the explanations in paragraph (5) and the assurances in paragraph (8).

GATT U.S. WAIVER

Your thoughtful message has been very carefully considered by Mr. Howe, Mr. Harris and Mr. Pearson. The following are their views.

2. The considerations mentioned in your paragraph 4 are fully appreciated. We realize that the effectiveness of the GATT in restraining protectionist pressures here and elsewhere will inevitably be weakened by the action which now seems likely to be taken on the United States waiver. We feel, however, that acceptance by us of a waiver which had merely been changed superficially would be a quite transparent device and would not significantly increase the usefulness of GATT in enabling the Government to resist claims for protection, so long as the United States was given what in effect would be (and would necessarily be represented to Congress as being) a blanket waiver. Justification of the Government's trade policies would have to rest essentially (as in the past) on a recognition by various groups in the country and by the country at large that such policies were in our own national interest. Even if acquiescence by us in a somewhat embellished waiver might contribute to an impression that the integrity of the GATT was somehow being preserved, such acquiescence would at the same time alienate the support of important agricultural groups who felt threatened by actions which the United States might choose to take. Equally important, if we were to go along with a slightly modified U.S. waiver, it would be difficult to find grounds to oppose similar waivers for European countries. As indicated in our telegram No. 28 of January 14 we wish to keep ourselves in a position to oppose such European waivers as effectively as possible.

3. It would seem clear that what we (and the United States Administration) are confronted with is a situation in which the positions of the United States and Canada are fundamentally irreconcilable on an issue to which both countries attach great importance. This is obviously not a happy situation for either country. While we see no way out of this impasse we are naturally anxious to do what can reasonably be done to minimize the damage to our relations and to the status of the GATT. With these considerations in mind our Ministers (while at the same time reaffirming the instructions in our telegrams Nos. 28 and 30) feel that the reply to the invitation from the U.S. referred to in your paragraph 7 should be along the following lines:

(a) You might point to our common interest in avoiding unnecessary damage to the GATT and to relations between us.

(b) You might reiterate that we have no alternative but to oppose the blanket waiver requested by the United States regardless of any minor modifications which may be made in it.

(c) You might express the hope that the United States would be sufficiently impressed by the representations made by our Ministers to volunteer on their own initiative certain changes in the waiver proposal which would provide a clear indication of a desire to meet our views to the maximum possible extent.

(d) If such changes are introduced on the initiative of the United States and if their waiver is approved by the Contracting Parties we would be prepared to make a statement recognizing the efforts which the United States had made to meet our position. We would, of course, have to conclude by saying that despite the efforts which had been made it had not been possible to reconcile our positions, and that accordingly we should have to oppose the waiver. Such a statement would then become the keynote of what was said in Canada in attempting to minimize the damage to Canadian-American relations and in explaining our continued support of GATT.

(e) At the same time you should make it clear, in order that they might be under no illusion, that in the statement referred to above we would have to reserve our freedom subsequently to take whatever steps seemed appropriate with respect to United States exports to Canada in the event that, contrary to our hopes, actions are taken under the waiver which injure our trade or impair concessions which we had previously secured.

4. Incidentally there might be some implication in the version of our position attributed to Frank Lee in your paragraph 3 that Canada would not be unhappy if the U.S. waiver were to be granted over our opposition. We would in fact welcome the defeat of the waiver by a vote of the Contracting parties acting independently and in their own interests.

London, January 21, 1955

CONFIDENTIAL

Following personal for the Minister from Robertson, Begins: You asked me to give you my personal views on the way GATT negotiations are going. I must say that I am worried about the isolated position our delegation must be in as a result of their instructions to hold the line against a waiver for the United States and to take no part in the drafting of such a waiver, and for practical purposes to remain outside any substantive negotiations that may be undertaken in Geneva to limit and define the terms of a waiver for the European countries.

2. From the Embassy's report on the Ministerial discussion in Washington it seems clear that unless the United States gets an acceptable waiver it will not sign the revised general agreement. Indeed I think it had been apparent from earlier telegrams from Washington and other evidence that it would be politically impossible for the administration to present to Congress the organizational provisions of the new general agreement if the substantive provisions were quite inconsistent with Section 22 of the Agricultural Adjustments Act and there was no waiver. I think we have to take it for granted that there must be a waiver for the United States if there is to be a new general agreement, and I do not think this difficulty can be overcome by persuading countries to scrap the review and carry on the old general agreement. Too many countries — the under-developed group, Australia, the United States itself — are publicly committed to the revision of the agreement at this session.

3. Even if we found that we could muster enough votes to keep the United States from getting the necessary two-thirds in support of their waiver, I am far from convinced that it would be wise to defeat the United States on this issue. Have we really examined the implications of driving the United States out of GATT and presumably destroying the agreement? In any case I do not suppose there is any real chance that we can muster enough votes. Most of the countries which do sympathize with our point of view and have given us some support up to now would probably not vote against a waiver in the last resort. Certainly the United Kingdom does not think it could. It is most probable therefore that the United States will get a waiver that it can accept. Do we intend to leave GATT when we find that we cannot prevent the United States from getting a waiver? Surely an incomplete and unsatisfactory agreement would still be far better for us than no agreement at all. If then we intend to remain in the agreement, I think we would have far more chance of getting a tolerable United States waiver if our delegation could participate in the drafting and negotiating stages. If they were free to participate I think they would have a pretty influential position. Otherwise they are very likely to find themselves in a position similar to that of our delegation to the OEEC during the discussion of dollar import restrictions a few weeks ago when they were unable to get amendments made to a draft resolution which had been worked out in long and difficult negotiations in which we were not represented.

4. I had always been attracted by the notion of according to the United States in a waiver a transitional period during which they could gradually get their agriculture into balance. I had hoped it would be possible to have the United States case treated as a unique situation and one for which there was some historical justification. This was the basis of my telegram No. 1573 of December 22. It is apparent now, however, that other countries such as Germany and Belgium are determined to have some kind of waiver for their own agricultural protection. If so, it will be very hard for any United Kingdom Government to forego the right of following their example. In these circumstances I thought there was some tactical merit in the suggestion in the delegation's telegram No. 6 of January 13 to you that a memorandum of understanding embodying pretty rigid conditions for waivers to European countries should be worked out under the leadership of Wyndham-White with the United States and ourselves actively participating in the negotiations. Once such a precedent was established for applying strict safeguards to agricultural waivers the terms of a subsequent waiver for the United States could hardly fail to be affected.

5. I agree that in principle waivers for European countries are against our interest. At the same time I think it can be taken for granted that some of these countries are going to maintain their agricultural protection in one way or another. I think it is easy to overestimate the implications of this for Canada. I doubt whether many of our agricultural products, with the exception of grains, are really competitive in terms of price in most European markets, and I would not expect grains to be seriously affected. In any event it would surely be preferable to ensure that any restrictions these countries retain are carefully circumscribed, periodically reviewed and progressively removed. Ends.

GATT — UNITED STATES WAIVER

We have read with great interest both the telegram under reference from our delegation in Geneva and your reply. Although we know that it is impossible for us here to estimate accurately all the factors involved and in particular to assign due weight to political considerations and the state of opinion in Canada, we think it is our duty to let you know what, in our view, might be the consequences of adopting policies other than those which have been recommended by our delegation in Geneva. We do so, of course, only on the basis of information available to us in Washington.

2. First, however, we should like to offer some recent evidence which serves to corroborate the analysis of the present United States position given by our delegation in Geneva. We agree with them that it must now be accepted as a fact that the administration intends to submit the organizational provisions of GATT to Congress at this session, and has not been deflected from that purpose by the representations made by Canadian Ministers on the 6th of January. On Monday of this week, when the Secretary of State was testifying before the House Ways and Means Committee on an extension of the Trade Agreements Act, he was asked if the general agreement would be submitted to Congress for approval when the present review session in Geneva was concluded. Mr. Dulles replied that GATT would be submitted; and he made it clear that he meant at this session by adding that the conference at Geneva had been expected to finish at the end of January, but that it now looked as if it would run into February.

3. We also agree that the administration is determined to retain full freedom to operate Section 22 of the Agricultural Adjustment Act. A further indication of this was provided by the Secretary of Agriculture testifying on the same day as Mr. Dulles. Although HR1 (which is the bill to extend the Trade Agreements Act) is sponsored by the administration, Mr. Benson said that he was worried that some provisions of the bill might disturb the protection granted by Section 22 to United States agriculture. "So long as the United States has a domestic farm support programme", he stated, "which maintains domestic prices above the world level, it is essential that authority be retained to restrict imports into the United States under the domestic price support programme". We have learned from the State Department that Mr. Benson's worries arise from a misinterpretation of one section of HR1 and that an attempt has already been made to set him straight. However, his statement provides additional evidence, if any were needed, that the administration is determined to secure an unlimited waiver from the contracting parties to operate Section 22.

4. Turning now to the course that has been reluctantly recommended by our delegation in Geneva, we are keenly aware that it would involve very serious difficulties in Canada. Nevertheless, we think that the possible consequences of the only alternative policies should be fully explored and appreciated.

5. As we see it, there are three possible courses open to us if it is decided not to work for a waiver that would be at least "presentationally" more attractive than what has been proposed by the United States hitherto:

(a) We could vote against a general waiver, without endeavouring to marshal support against it, and then sign the agreement even though the waiver had been approved by two-thirds of the contracting parties.

(b) We could vote against the waiver and use all our influence in the hope of defeating it.

(c) We could both vote against the waiver and refuse to sign the agreement if the waiver were approved.

From your telegram under reference to Geneva, we infer that there is now little disposition to refuse to sign the agreement, so that that possibility may perhaps be left out of account.

6. Although the other two possible courses shade into one another, they are nevertheless separable; and indeed our tactics, both in Geneva and, to a lesser extent, here, would be largely determined by which of them might be adopted. What would be the consequences if we were to follow one or the other of these policies?

7. In my telegram WA-10 of January 4,† I pointed out that it might be difficult to explain in parliament why we supported the agreement although disapproving so strongly of the waiver, which by that time would be for all practical purposes an integral part of the agreement. Our delegation in Geneva has gone further and drawn attention to the fact that in that case the position of the government in resisting rising protectionist pressures would be greatly weakened. I agree. However, it seems to me that they have not dealt with sufficient vigour with the argument that our bargaining position in future negotiations with the United States would be strengthened if we voted against the agreement, even though it were approved over our opposition. It seems to me that our position in negotiating with the United States over agricultural import restrictions in future would, in all probability, be weakened rather than strengthened by such action. In my mind there is little doubt that such action by the Canadian delegation in Geneva would lessen the previous predisposition that has been shown here to find solutions that would do little, if any, injury in Canada. It seems to us that United States negotiators would be likely to enter future negotiations on such issues in a more cold-blooded temper; and calculations of the immediate interest of the United States would be held in check by little more than the President's benevolence towards the allies of this country and by his appreciation of the importance of Canada in continental defence. United States negotiators would no doubt be wary of precipitating a trade war with Canada. But they would also know that in such a situation Canada would not hold all the trumps.

8. So much for the consequences of voting against the waiver but not working actively to have it defeated. But from the concluding sentence of your telegram under reference, we gather that you would be glad to see the waiver defeated. What then would be the consequences of joining battle and winning? It is difficult to be sure. But in that situation the argument outlined in the paragraph above would be likely to apply with redoubled force. Further, it would be mistaken, in my opinion, to discount too confidently the United States argument that if the waiver were defeated, Congress would refuse to ratify the organizational provisions of GATT and the administration would be unable to join in tariff negotiations to make use of the new authority that it is hoped will be given to the President.

9. That there would be sharp recriminations against Canada in that event is not open to question, in my view. One unfortunate and no doubt unintended result of the representations made to United States Ministers on the 6th of January has been that the idea has gained currency here that the Canadian Government no longer attaches importance to multilateral arrangements for regulating world trade and is ready to return to bilateral agreements. It should also be remembered that there is some fertile soil here for such suggestions. Mr. Humphrey, for example, would be far from unreceptive to bilateral arguments, which he might interpret in ways that we might not find wholly congenial. If the waiver were to be defeated in large measures because of Canadian opposition, the novel suspicion which has been troubling many minds here during the last few weeks that Canada would be ready to abandon its multilateral doctrines, might easily harden into a conviction, however unwarranted, that we were prepared to precipitate a retreat into bilateralism.

10. We are not clairvoyant enough to see what the wider consequences would be of a refusal by Congress to ratify the general agreement. We do believe though, that the administration is on the point of taking a decisive, although modest, step to set United States foreign economic policy in the direction of freer trade. On the other hand, we know there is considerable sentiment within the Cabinet that is opposed to the President's liberal views. If the administration were to suffer such a serious disappointment as failure to secure Congressional approval for GATT because of inability to obtain a general waiver from the contracting parties we think there would be a real risk of the trend that it is trying to set towards freer trade being reversed. We realize that you are giving consideration not only to Canada's immediate commercial interests and to the political problems that the request for a general waiver has raised, but also to those principles of international trade which are most likely in the long run to produce the kind of climate throughout the world in which Canada can prosper. At the same time, we hope you will consider the paradoxical possibility that in present circumstances some sacrifice, both of principle and perhaps of immediate interest, may be the course best designed to promote the establishment of those economic conditions throughout the world that would be to our lasting benefit.

REPRESENTATIONS TO THE UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT
CONCERNING THE GATT REVIEW

Late this morning I was called to the State Department by Sam Waugh, Assistant Secretary for Economic Affairs, to receive the United States reply to the memorandum that was left by Canadian Ministers on the 6th of January. My immediately following telegram† contains the text of the memorandum in reply, together with the text of the revised United States proposal for a general waiver, which was annexed to the memorandum.

2. Waugh explained that the text of the United States proposal was being given to the Canadian Government before being shown to any other of the contracting parties. He said, however, that the United States delegation in Geneva was anxious to discuss it informally with other delegations as quickly as possible, and to have it formally tabled at the beginning of next week. He therefore hoped that if the Canadian Government had any comments to make on the revised proposal that might have a bearing on the time at which it was submitted to the contracting parties, some indication to that effect might be given without delay. It was hoped to circulate the revised draft among a number of delegations at Geneva on Friday, January 28. However, Waugh said that he would not send a telegram to the United States delegation in Geneva authorizing them to circulate the draft until 5 o'clock tomorrow afternoon.

3. Waugh drew my attention to the suggestion in the United States memorandum that negotiations concerning the United States proposal for a waiver should be conducted in Geneva. He added, however, that the United States Cabinet Ministers who had met with Canadian Ministers earlier this month would be grateful to receive through me some word of the Canadian reaction to the United States reply.

REPRESENTATIONS TO THE U.S. GOVERNMENT
CONCERNING THE GATT REVIEW

Would you please inform the State Department orally that the U.S. memorandum has now been studied carefully and compared with the earlier version of the waiver proposal which had been supplied to our Delegation. Our conclusion is that the new draft represents no improvement and, in fact, in some respects is worse than the earlier version, since it makes even more clear that all of the provisions of Section 22 are to prevail.

2. Consequently, the position taken by Canadian Ministers during their discussions with the U.S. Secretaries remains unchanged. It will therefore be necessary for the Canadian Delegation to vote against the U.S. request for what in effect would be a blanket waiver.

3. You might add that our Delegation will, of course, be participating in the further discussions on this matter in Geneva.

GATT — U.S. WAIVER

In your statement in plenary you should indicate our intention to vote against the U.S. waiver proposal and you should explain why we are unable to accept it. You should also recount the attempts which we have made over the past several months to persuade the U.S. to modify their views. We think that some reference to the constructive suggestions which we had made in the past would be desirable for the record and also in order to make clear to the other contracting parties the efforts which we had made to find a solution within the principles of GATT. For the purpose of any such statement, you might be guided by the exchanges (relating to "fair shares", normal trade, etc) which took place between U.S. and Canadian officials last July and September in preparation for the GATT meeting, by the statement which Plumptre made to representatives of other interested delegations just before Christmas (including "forgiveness for past sins", time limits, etc.), by the memorandum which our Ministers left in Washington this month, and by the background memorandum which they had with them on that occasion (copies of which were sent to you on January 17). You might express regrets that these earlier discussions are not reflected in any way in this latest U.S. proposal which does not envisage any effective limitations on the freedom of the U.S. Administration to do whatever it considers appropriate under Section 22 of the A.A.A.

2. With respect to your enquiry concerning participation in the working party, you should take part fully and actively. In doing so, however, you should make it quite clear that our participation does not imply any change in our attitude toward the U.S. proposal and that in the end we shall be bound to vote against the kind of waiver which has been suggested. Your main object in taking part should be to point out in detail the defects in the U.S. proposal. You may, at your discretion initiate and support during the "second reading" stage, modifications which would make the waiver less offensive. Such activity would not be open to misunderstanding since it would be against the background of our clearly stated and continuing opposition to the waiver as a whole. You should, naturally, be very careful not to be manoeuvred into any position where you would seem to be going along with the waiver. You should make certain that when the "third reading" stage is reached, we are completely free to re-state our opposition to the waiver.

3. Although in any statement which you may be making you would probably not want to make comparisons between the present U.S. proposal and the earlier one which was never tabled formally, we are sending you a following telegram† indicating some of the respects in which we consider this edition to be even worse than the original version.

GATT — UNITED STATES WAIVER

Yesterday's (February 2) debate in the contracting parties on the United States request for a waiver to cover restrictions under Section 22 was opened by the United States representative (Brown). He spoke briefly and quietly about the desire of the United States administration to place the work of the new GATT organization on the firmest possible basis. Hence their intention to lay before Congress immediately after the present session of the contracting parties the results of the current review. Any legislature naturally took very seriously the question of participating in a new international organization. Congress had already addressed itself on a number of occasions to possible conflicts between GATT rules and freedom to apply Section 22. Indeed in recent Committee hearings Secretary Benson had already been questioned closely on the relation between Section 22 and the extension of the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act. After explaining that there was no conflict between that Act and Section 22, Secretary Benson had gone on to state that the basic policies of the administration in regard to agriculture were such as to render less likely future conflicts between Section 22 and international obligations.

2. Following this introduction sixteen countries took part in the debate which lasted over a period of two and one half hours. It was, as might have been expected, a sad debate and most of the speakers expressed deep regret that a major country should find itself impelled to seek a waiver from fundamental obligations of the agreement. It was pointed out time and again that such a waiver would be deeply disturbing to the balance of the agreement and to the obligations of other contracting parties under it.

3. Nevertheless, almost all speakers indicated either explicitly or implicitly that since the United States, after the most serious consideration, had concluded that they needed a waiver such a waiver would have to be granted. Canada and Brazil made the only statements that were clearly in the opposite sense, although the positions of New Zealand and possibly South Africa as emerging from their statements might be open to question. (The South Africans have told us that they are likely, in the last analysis, to follow whatever lead we may give them but we doubt whether the New Zealanders would stand out from the majority).

4. The countries most affected by the United States import restrictions indicated, in very general terms, some of the limitations that they would like to see in a waiver. (As explained in our telegram under reference, which conveyed the text of our statement, the actual terms of the waiver which the United States is putting forward had not been presented to the conference and was not in the hands of most delegations). We referred to restricting the waiver to existing conflicts, to the need for periodic reviews and gradual relaxation and to the importance of "fair share". New Zealand emphasizing the extent to which their dairy products had already been hurt strongly urged that the waiver should contain undertakings for future improvements. The same point was stressed by Australia. Italy hoped that the waiver would be for a limited period and subject to frequent reviews and that it would provide for complaints to be presented to the contracting parties. Denmark and The Netherlands, while making no specific points of their own, associated themselves with the points raised by previous speakers.

5. The United Kingdom, speaking early in the debate, led the parade of those who insisted that whatever freedom was allowed to the United States would have to be available to themselves. (The text of the United Kingdom statement is contained in our immediately following telegram†). Indeed, while the United Kingdom made this claim explicitly, most of the others did so by implication only: they expressed preference more or less strongly for putting the United States request for a waiver into the review working party concerned with European "hard core" problems rather than into a special working party of the 9th Session which would nominally at least deal with the United States request in isolation. Germany, France, Italy, Greece, Sweden and Austria all associated themselves with this point of view and made it all too clear that the United States request for a waiver would have a very softening effect on whatever dispensation may be provided for the hard core.

6. Four countries, Australia, New Zealand, South Africa and Uruguay, all emphasized that the United States request could not be dissociated from United States policies and undertakings under GATT in other agricultural fields, specifically subsidies and disposal of surpluses.

7. Two countries, Turkey and Greece, indicated a lively appreciation of past benefits received from the United States and a hope for further benefit to come.

8. The Brazilian representative (not Machado) made the shortest speech. He said, in a sentence, that he was opposed to any waiver in any form whatever. (It is not clear whether this was an outburst of anti-Americanism or just an attempt to establish a strong initial bargaining position).

9. The French representative said that he was not concerned in the question of a legal conflict between Section 22 and the GATT. In the United States it appeared that domestic legislation overrode an international obligation; in France and in most European countries the opposite was the case. However, he was very sympathetic towards any country that found itself in a position where international obligations apparently interfered with the execution of domestic policies designed to maintain prices, raise standards of living and promote social benefits. France had such social policies and it was undesirable that international obligations should interfere with them. It was in this spirit that the French delegation would review the United States request. The Greek representative expressed broadly similar views.

10. In summary, it may be said that while there was a good deal of barking and howling and a regrettable although understandable disposition to sniff to titbits there was very little disposition to bite back.

11. At the end of the debate the chairman appointed a special working party of the 9th Session to examine the United States request and to report back with recommendations to the contracting parties. He named the following countries to the working party: Austria, Canada, Cuba, Denmark, France, Germany, South Africa, India, Italy, The Netherlands, New Zealand, Pakistan, Turkey, United Kingdom, United States and Uruguay. He named Mr. Suetens of Belgium as Chairman.

12. The United States proposed waiver in the form you received it from Washington has today (February 3) been circulated as a conference document.

GATT: UNITED STATES WAIVER

In accordance with our anticipation latest draft of United States waiver approved by drafting sub-group and which will be debated in Working Party at beginning of next week does not impose any restraint or limitation upon the United States Government in the administration of Section 22. All attempts to impose such restraint and limitations were rejected by United States delegation.

2. However, in response to Canadian and Australian pressure the concept of normal imports is introduced in an indirect way and the waiver will be subject to an annual review.

3. Following is the draft text of the paragraph including the reference to normal imports:

"3. The United States will give due weight to any representations submitted to it including

(a) When investigating whether any existing import restriction should be modified, terminated or extended representations that a greater volume of imports than is permitted under the import restriction would not have the effects required to be corrected by Section 22, including representations that the volume of imports that would have taken place in the absence of governmental agricultural programmes would not have such effects.

(b) When investigating with respect to import restrictions on additional products representations with regard to

(i) The effect of imports of any such product upon any programme or operation undertaken by the United States Department of Agriculture or any agency under its direction or upon the domestic production of any agricultural commodity or product thereof for which such a programme or operation is undertaken, including representations that the volume of imports which would have entered in the absence of governmental agricultural programmes will not have the effects required to be corrected by Section 22.

(ii) The representative period to be used for the determination of any quota."

4. The provision for annual review is in the following terms:

"7. The contracting parties will make an annual review of the actions taken by the United States under Section 22. For each such review the United States will furnish a report to the contracting parties showing any modification or removal of restrictions effected since the previous (group corrupt) controls in effect and the reasons why such restrictions (regardless of whether covered by this waiver) continue to be applied under Section 22 and any steps it has taken with a view to a solution of the problem of surpluses of agricultural commodities."

5. Unless instructed to the contrary we will continue to oppose and to vote against the United States waiver when it is debated in plenary on the grounds that waiver in effect writes into the GATT the provisions of Section 22 — "unqualified and virtually unsupervised"

GATT: UNITED STATES WAIVER

This will confirm your conclusion in your final paragraph that you should oppose and vote against the United States Waiver.

We assume that it is still probable that the Waiver will be passed by the Contracting Parties. If so, you should make a brief statement after the vote. Such a statement should begin by recapitulating the serious implications of the Waiver in relation to Canada-U.S. trade (along the lines of the first paragraph of your statement in the Contracting Parties of February 2).

After that you should speak along the following lines:

The Canadian Delegation accordingly wishes to re-emphasize the extremely difficult position created for the Canadian Government by the passage of the U.S. Waiver. The United States has now been relieved of its formal obligations under the GATT in the Agricultural field. The Canadian Government is watching the course of events very closely and the Canadian Government feels sure that any action which they may feel compelled to take as a result of this Waiver will be recognized in a sympathetic and understanding manner by the Contracting parties who have now assumed the responsibility for granting this sweeping dispensation to the United States.

GATT: UNITED STATES WAIVER

You may already have read telegram No. 89 of March 5 from our GATT delegation, which contains the text of the statement which the delegation made following approval of the United States waiver by the Contracting Parties.<sup>158</sup> I think, however, that I might appropriately bring the telegram to your attention because I know you are interested in the terms in which we explain our position following the passage of the waiver.

You will note that the delegation has followed their instructions in emphasizing the importance to Canada of the trade which may be affected by the waiver, and by drawing attention, in a tactful manner, to the possibility that Canada may feel compelled to take action as a consequence of action taken under the waiver. The intervening parts of the statement have been composed by the delegation and, I think, add to its force. Geneva has been requested to repeat the missing groups on page 2.

You will note that the United Kingdom is not listed among the countries which opposed or abstained on the waiver and therefore, presumably, supported it. I think Mr. Howe may find this a little disturbing. However (particularly in view of the Prime Minister's remarks at the London meeting)<sup>159</sup> the United Kingdom authorities may very well have assumed that we neither expected nor wished them to vote against the waiver. Moreover, when the waiver was under discussion the United Kingdom did its utmost to discourage the United States from persisting in its demand for a "blanket" type of waiver.

Geneva, March 5, 1955

CONFIDENTIAL. IMPORTANT.

GATT: UNITED STATES WAIVER

The contracting parties approved today the United States waiver by a vote of 23 in favour, 5 opposed and 6 abstentions. Cuba, New Zealand, Denmark, Netherlands and Canada opposed the waiver. Brazil, Burma, Ceylon, Haiti, South Africa and Czechoslovakia abstained.

2. Prior to the vote we made a statement explaining our opposition in terms familiar to you. Following the vote we made the following statement in accordance with your instructions:

"The Canadian delegation considers it necessary to make the following observations concerning the important decision that has just been taken by the Contracting Parties to grant the United States a waiver from its GATT obligations relating to quantitative restrictions and fees imposed on the importation of agricultural products.

"We have on several occasions explained to the Contracting Parties the importance to Canada of exports of agricultural products to the United States. Canada is not of course the only country affected by the decision which has just been taken. Many countries here represented are dependent on the United States market for a significant part of their agricultural export. We think it is true to say however that no contracting party is more affected by this decision than Canada. Two-thirds of our total foreign trade is with the United States; an important part of that trade is in the field of agriculture. Tariff negotiations between Canada and the United States have been the most extensive of all the negotiations held under the general agreement. Among the most important concessions we have paid for are concessions by the United States on agricultural products covering a large part of our total agricultural exports. It is these exports and these concessions that are threatened by the waiver which the contracting parties have now decided to grant. Action which the United States can take under this waiver to restrict our exports could serve to unbalance our tariff bargain with that country. Contracting Parties will appreciate therefore how seriously the Canadian Government must regard the waiver just granted to the United States and how closely they will observe the future behaviour of the United States pursuant to it.

"Although the United States waiver does not contain a terminal date this does not mean and could not possibly mean that the States is relieved for an indefinite period from its obligations under Article II or Article XI. On the contrary the contracting parties have it clearly within their power at any time to modify the terms of the waiver or indeed to withdraw it entirely. Furthermore, all waivers including the present waiver are in effect granted conditionally; they are granted subject to good behaviour having in mind the terms of the agreement and the interests of all the contracting parties. Indeed that is one of the main purposes of the provision for an annual review contained in the United States waiver.

"We wish to emphasize this point because it is our intention should restrictions be threatened under this waiver against Canadian agricultural exports to press just as strongly as we have in the past for adherence to the provisions of Articles II and XI. In particular we shall continue to press for adherence by the United States to the principle of 'fair shares'.

"The Contracting Parties will have noted that 'the United States undertakes to give due consideration to representations ... etc.' (paragraph 3 of waiver). We would have preferred the language to be stronger to lay a formal obligation on the United States not to interfere with 'normal imports'.

If such an obligation had been accepted by the United States our attitude to their request might well have been different.

"We wish to make one point clear however. Even though the waiver does not impose a firm obligation on the United States in respect to normal trade we would regard it as unreasonable and unwarranted if the United States were to use this waiver to exclude normal imports, that is imports which would have entered normally and in the absence of any United States price support or other domestic agricultural programmes. Should such a situation develop the contracting parties would in our view be entirely justified in withdrawing the waiver and we would so recommend.

"Finally Mr. Chairman my delegation would emphasize again the extremely difficult position created for the Canadian Government by the decision to grant this waiver to the United States. This important country has now been relieved of its formal obligations under the GATT in the agricultural field.

The Canadian Government will be watching the course of events very closely. The Canadian Government feels sure that any action which it may feel compelled to take as a consequence of action under this waiver will be recognized in a sympathetic and understanding manner by the Contracting Parties which have now assumed the responsibility for granting this sweeping dispensation to the United States."<sup>160</sup>

THE REVISED GATT

Last autumn, after seven years' experience of the GATT, several of the member countries decided that the time had come to review its provisions to see if improvement could be made. It was also hoped to bring the GATT more closely into line with present-day trading conditions. Although the Canadian Government was in favour of strengthening the "trade rules", in order to hasten elimination of the remaining restrictions to trade, it was rather doubtful about the timing of the review. The Canadian view was not accepted, and the review was undertaken. The results were somewhat better than had been feared.

2. The General Agreement was revised, a declaration on the continued application of tariff schedules was opened for signature, and an agreement on an Organization for Trade Co-operation, which would give the GATT permanent status as an international organization, was drawn up. The formal instruments which would give effect to these changes are: (1) Protocol Amending Part I and Articles XXIX and XXX of the General Agreement; (2) Protocol Amending the Preamble and Parts II and III of the General Agreement; (3) Declaration on the Continued Application of Schedules to the General Agreement; (4) Agreement on the Organization for Trade Co-operation; and (5) Protocol of Organizational Amendments to the General Agreement. These instruments are contained in Annexes A† and B.†

3. There is also attached to this memorandum, as Annex C,† a paper prepared by the United Kingdom Government which contains the text of the revised agreement. Differences between the present text and the amended text are indicated.

The Revised GATT and the Continued Application of Schedules

4. In connection with the revised GATT and the continued application of schedules, the following paragraphs briefly described the main changes of importance to Canada:

(a) Tariffs

The assured life of existing tariff schedules, subject to adjustments now being negotiated in accordance with GATT procedures, would be extended from July 1, 1955, to December 31, 1957, and indefinitely thereafter by means of automatic three-year extensions. Provision is made for renegotiation of concessions either periodically every third year or under special circumstances in the meanwhile; in such renegotiations the aim is to be the maintenance of a general level of reciprocal and mutually advantageous concessions not less favourable than those previously in force.

The instruments giving effect to these changes are the Declaration on the Continued Application of Schedules to the General Agreement and the Protocol Amending the Preamble and Parts II and III of the General Agreement.

(b) Quantitative Restrictions

The provisions of the Agreement with respect to general elimination of quantitative restrictions remain unchanged. So does the basic principle that Contracting Parties which maintain quantitative restrictions for balance-of-payments reasons are to eliminate them as soon as they can no longer be justified on these grounds. It has been hoped that the "trade rules" might be tightened so as to allow much less latitude with respect to the maintenance of quantitative restrictions for balance-of-payments reasons. This did not prove possible but, in order to make the basic principle more effective in practice, and particularly in order to adapt it to a period when the major currencies may become convertible, there would be annual consultations with all Contracting Parties still applying restrictions of this type. The revised Agreement also envisages stricter safeguards against discrimination when such safeguards are brought into effect by the I.M.F.

The instrument giving effect to these changes is the Protocol Amending the Preamble and Parts II and III of the General Agreements.

(c) Export Subsidies and "Countervailing" (Anti-Subsidy) Duties

Provisions, additional to those already in the Agreement, are proposed to limit the harmful effect of export subsidies. In the field of primary products Contracting Parties would be under an obligation not to use subsidies which increase exports so as to obtain for themselves more than a fair share of world trade. In the field of non-primary products no new or increased export subsidies would be permitted. Also, provisions for the use of anti-dumping and anti-subsidy measures by importing countries were elaborated in the Agreement.

The instrument giving effect to these changes is the Protocol Amending the Preamble and Parts II and III of the Agreement.

(c) Governmental Assistance to Economic Development

The need to facilitate the development of the economies of countries which can support only low standards of living and which are in the early stages of development is recognized in the existing Agreement. The revised Agreement would allow Contracting Parties in the early stages of development to adjust bound tariffs to protect particular industries, and to apply quantitative restrictions on imports in order to protect their balance of payments against the demand for imports generated by their development programmes. Any such quantitative restrictions are to be applied in a non-discriminatory manner.

A country whose economy is "in the process of development" but which could not be described as "supporting only a low standard of living" could also enjoy these privileges if the need could be established.

Because the underdeveloped countries felt a pressing need to have immediate access to the new provisions relating to economic development, the Contracting Parties decided that these provisions could go into force, for the underdeveloped countries, pending entry into force of the relevant Protocol of Amendment.

The instrument giving full effect to these provisions is the Protocol Amending the Preamble and Parts II and III of the Agreement.

(Details of the changes described in paragraph 4 will be found in the Annexes, which contain the relevant Articles and supplementary provisions of the revised Agreement, as follows: (a) Tariffs: Annex B and Annex C, pp. 35-36 and 53-55 (Article XXVIII); (b) Quantitative Restrictions: Annex C, pp. 12-19 and 47-49 (Articles XI-XV); (c) Export Subsidies and "Countervailing" Duties: Annex C, pp. 7-8, 19-20, 46, and 49-50 (Articles VI and XVI); (d) Governmental Assistance to Economic Development: Annex C, pp. 22-26 and 50-53 (Article XVIII).

5. The revised GATT is not substantially different from the present Agreement. It has been strengthened in minor respects but the main changes are in the direction of a greater emphasis on consultation. The weaknesses which became evident during the Ninth Session resulted mainly from a tendency on the part of some countries to seek special exemptions from the provisions of the Agreement — in particular, from the insistence of the United States on securing a "blanket" waiver from its GATT obligations insofar as these conflict with the requirements of Section 22 of the Agricultural Adjustment Act; and, to a lesser extent, from the insistence by some European countries on a procedure for securing individual waivers to assist them in resolving the problems involved in eliminating the so-called "hard-core" of their import restrictions. On balance it might be said that, while the GATT has not been significantly strengthened, the changes which have been made in its actual provisions (excluding the waivers which are not, of course, provisions of the GATT itself) are acceptable; the test will lie in how the Contracting Parties administer the Agreement in the period ahead.

6. There is nothing in the revisions now being recommended for acceptance which would require subsequent implementation by legislative action. It is for consideration, however, whether Parliament should be provided with any special opportunity to discuss them. No formal action was taken by Parliament when Canada adhered to the GATT in its present form.

7. When the GATT was drawn up it was applied provisionally, the expectation being that an International Trade Organization would be set up. This did not happen and the GATT is still applied provisionally. At the Ninth Session the Contracting Parties recognized that it would be desirable for them to accept the Agreement definitively at the earliest possible date subject to the progressive modification of any mandatory legislation which may be in conflict with it. It is expected that a separate recommendation will be made to Cabinet on the depositing of an instrument of acceptance, when the situation with respect to the amendments now being proposed has become clear.

The Proposed Organization for Trade Co-operation and the Relevant Amendments to the GATT

8. It would appear desirable to replace the present informal operational structure of the GATT with a permanent organization. To this end, an Agreement on the Organization for Trade Co-operation has been drawn up. Though comparable to the International Trade Organization proposed several years ago, this new Organization would be less elaborate. There would be an Assembly, an Executive Committee and a secretariat headed by a Director General; the Assembly, in which all Governments are represented, would be supreme. The main function of the Organization would be to administer the General Agreement; in addition, it would sponsor international trade negotiations and serve as an intergovernmental forum for the discussion and solution of other questions relating to international trade. The Agreement would enter into force, among the governments which had accepted it, after it had been accepted by governments whose territories account for 85% of the trade of the GATT countries.

9. Since the United States and the United Kingdom each accounts for about 20% of the trade of the GATT countries, the Agreement on the OTC could not come into force until it had been accepted by both these countries. A Bill to provide for United States membership in the OTC has been introduced in Congress but it is not possible to predict with certainty that it will be passed. The United Kingdom Government will probably wait until the United States attitude is clear. It would seem desirable for the Canadian Government also to defer action on the proposed OTC and on the Protocol of Organizational Amendments to the General Agreement, which would amend the GATT to take account of the functions of the OTC when it comes into existence.

Recommendations:

It is recommended:

(a) that authority be sought from the Governor-in-Council for Mr. L.D. Wilgress, Chairman of the Canadian Delegation to the Ninth Session of the Contracting Parties, or in his absence, Mr. H. Allard, Permanent Representative of Canada to the European Office of the United Nations in Geneva, to sign and accept the following instruments on behalf of the Canadian Government:

The Protocol Amending Part I and Articles XXIX and XXX of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade;

The Protocol Amending the Preamble and Parts II and III of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade; and

The Declaration on the Continued Application of Schedules to the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade;

(b) That Cabinet defer action with respect to the organization for Trade Co-operation and the Protocol of Organizational Amendments to the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade until after the attitude toward the OTC of the major trading nations of the GATT, in particular the United States, without whose adherence the OTC cannot come into force, has become clear.<sup>161</sup>

TENTH SESSION OF GATT

The Tenth Session of the Contracting Parties to the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade begins in Geneva on October 27. This will be one of the regular business sessions which take place periodically to administer the Agreement, to consider complaints and to seek solutions of particular points of difficulty.

I recommend that a Canadian delegation should attend this session to participate in the discussion of agenda items, to represent Canadian interests, and to seek as in the past to strengthen the GATT arrangements as much as possible.

These recommendations were approved by Cabinet on June 15, 1955. For the text of the protocols, declaration, and agreement on the Organization for Trade Cooperation, see General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, Final Act adopted at the Ninth Session of the Contracting Parties, Geneva: Contracting Parties to the GATT, 1955. Canada signed the protocols and declaration on June 23, 1955.

In the lengthy agenda there are several items of some importance from a Canadian point of view:

(a) Belgian and Luxembourg Applications for Waivers

With respect to a considerable number of agricultural and fishery products the Belgian Government has requested a waiver from its obligation not to maintain quantitative import restrictions. It has asked that a waiver be granted for seven years.

It will be recalled that at the Ninth Session the Contracting Parties took a decision that five-year waivers, to which strict conditions would attach could be granted in certain circumstances to countries removing the import restrictions they had maintained for balance of payments reasons. The purpose of such waivers would be to make more gradual the impact on sensitive domestic industries of the elimination of the so-called "hard core" of import restrictions.

While the Canadian interest in the commodities involved is not substantial, a special waiver for Belgium (outside the terms of the "hard-core" decision) would set an unfortunate precedent of which other countries might take advantage later.

I suggest that the Canadian delegation should therefore resist any proposal to grant such a special waiver. If, however, most of the contracting parties seem prepared to consider a special waiver instead of a waiver under the "hard-core" decision, the Canadian delegation should do its best to keep the terms of such a waiver as close as possible to the requirements and criteria of the "hard-core" decision.

Luxembourg has also requested a waiver, in this case a permanent one. This request raises similar difficulties, and the Canadian delegation should be guided by the foregoing considerations when it is examined.

(b) Disposal of Agricultural Surpluses

On the initiative of Australia a discussion of the disposal of agricultural surpluses has been included in the agenda. The Canadian delegation should participate in this discussion in a manner consistent with the statements made by Canadian Ministers in the recent meeting of the U.S.-Canada Joint Committee on Trade and Economic Affairs, having also in mind the bilateral discussions in Washington on the surplus disposal of grains.<sup>162</sup>

(c) Proposed Agreement on International Commodity Arrangements

At the GATT Review Session early this year a Working Party was established to draft an agreement on the basic principles that should apply in the negotiation of any international commodity agreements; for example, the principle of equal representation for producers and consumers. Support of this proposed agreement on basic principles would not, of course, commit countries to participate in any particular commodity arrangement.

The United States decided not to take part in these discussions, since they thought this would increase their presentational difficulties in submitting the GATT organizational proposals to Congress. Although we had doubts about the practical value of these discussions, most GATT members were very anxious to have them and the Canadian representatives were authorized to participate in the Working Party.

As the draft agreement now stands, there are certain features which may ultimately make it unacceptable to Canada unless modified. Further debate on the draft agreement is expected, but it seems unlikely that any firm decision on Canadian acceptance will be called for at this session.

I recommend that, as on past occasions, the Chairman of the Canadian delegation should be Mr. L.D. Wilgress (who will no doubt be re-elected Chairman of the Contracting Parties); that Dr. C.M. Isbister of the Department of Trade and Commerce should be Vice Chairman of the delegation; and that the following officials from Ottawa should be included in the delegation:

Mr. A.B. Hockin
Mr. C.A. Annis
Mr. R.E. Latimer

Department of Finance
Department of Finance
Department of Trade & Commerce; and that Mr. G.N. Vogel, Department of Trade and Commerce and Mr. C.F. Wilson, Commercial Counsellor at Copenhagen, both of whom will be in Geneva for the U.N. Wheat Conference, should assist the delegation as may be necessary.

I also recommend that the delegation be instructed:

(a) to participate in the discussion of agenda items, to represent Canadian interests and to seek as in the past to strengthen the GATT arrangements as much as possible;

(b) to resist any proposal to grant a special waiver to Belgium or Luxembourg, but if the concession of such a waiver cannot be prevented to do its best to keep its terms as close as possible to the requirements and criteria of the "hard-core" decision;

(c) to participate in the discussion on the disposal of agricultural surpluses in a manner consistent with the statements made by Canadian Ministers in the recent meeting of the U.S.-Canada Joint Committee on Trade and Economic Affairs, having also in mind the bilateral discussions in Washington on the surplus disposal of grains;

(d) to participate constructively in the further discussion of the draft agreement on commodity arrangements, but to reserve any decision about Canadian participation in an agreement.<sup>163</sup>

UNITED STATES PROPOSALS FOR FURTHER TARIFF NEGOTIATIONS
UNDER GATT

1. United States officials have informed us that the Administration intends to make use of the powers contained in the Trade Agreements Extension Act of 1955 to enter into tariff negotiations with other countries. This information is not to be disclosed to the public for the present.

2. As far as the United States is concerned, the possible scope of the tariff negotiations is limited by the terms of the new Act. The President may authorize negotiations to reduce individual tariff items in three annual instalments by a maximum of 15% of the present levels. In addition, the President is empowered to negotiate reductions down to 50% ad valorem, of rates which are in excess of that level. These not very extensive powers will be curtailed, perhaps substantially, by the "peril point" procedures, which are designed to limit and restrict, in favour of tariff-sensitive domestic industries, the extent to which the President makes use of his statutory powers to negotiate tariffs.

3. To take advantage of the first 5% instalment of the President's 15% powers, negotiations must be concluded by June, 1956, a year after the effective date of the new Act. The American proposals therefore include a time-table. Preferably by July 15, and at the very latest by August 1, other countries planning to participate in the negotiations are requested to inform the United States. By August 15, the United States Government wishes to receive itemized requests for tariff concessions. At the beginning of September, the President will formally announce that the United States will carry on tariff negotiations with other countries. By October 1, public hearings will be commenced and the Tariff Commission will initiate its studies for the determination of peril points. These hearings and studies are required by statute and the results will determine, product by product, the extent to which the President's negotiating powers will be used. The target date for the commencement of the actual tariff negotiations is January 15, 1956.

4. Tariff concessions resulting from negotiations with the United States are of more questionable value than formerly, because of the enlarged escape procedures for the subsequent withdrawal of concessions. It will be remembered that the necessary majority of Contracting Parties to the GATT granted a "waiver", at their Ninth Session, which will facilitate withdrawals by the Americans from their commitments with respect to agricultural tariff items and agricultural import restrictions. In addition, in the Trade Agreements

Extension Act of 1955, there has been included a new and still untested escape procedure to be used in considering tariff increases where imports "threaten to impair the national security".<sup>164</sup> This same Act provides for certain extensions to existing tariff escape clauses. The Contracting Parties have as yet had no opportunity to determine whether the new national security escape clause is consistent with the GATT and, quite obviously, a great deal will depend upon the way it is administered. Aside from this legal point, there will clearly be more scope under the new Trade Agreements Act than under the old for United States industries to appeal for increased tariff protection and the Administration will have weaker grounds for opposing such increases.

5. From what has been said, it appears that there may be public criticism of Canadian participation in further tariff negotiations with the United States in present circumstances. The negotiations are bound to be difficult and they may lead to meagre results. United States officials have indicated that they will bargain to be paid in full for any tariff concessions the United States may make.

6. There is a further element of difficulty for us in the particular form of negotiations planned by the United States. Their law provides for tariff reductions of 5% in each of the three coming years, but the Administration apparently anticipates that one round of negotiations, in 1956, will provide the basis for all three reductions. In short, in June 1956 the United States will be announcing, for a list of products, a series of reductions which will become effective, in part immediately, but in part in one and two years' time. Other countries participating in the negotiations will probably find it expedient to do the same; indeed there does not seem to be any satisfactory alternative. This implies that certain Canadian tariff reductions would be announced one or two years before they came into effect. Such a departure from traditional Canadian practice is, of course, undesirable. On the other hand, considering the limitations on what the United States can offer — limitations which will circumscribe the whole of the multilateral negotiations — it can be anticipated that the reciprocal tariff reductions on our side would not be very many or very extensive. Further, all Canadian importers affected would be in the same position; the situation must be distinguished from one in which there is a "budget leak" and certain importers can get an advantage over others.

7. It may well be asked whether it is worth while for Canada to participate in the negotiations. In this connection, however, it should be observed that Canada can hardly refuse to cooperate with a move, however slight, towards lower tariffs by a Republican President, in the face of stubborn opposition from protectionist elements in the United States Congress. Though the new United States legislation may be limited and even disappointing in certain respects, it sets forth a policy which appears much more attractive if it is remembered that the alternative would possibly be large and widespread tariff increases.

8. Various matters of trade and commercial policy are still pending before Congress such as the customs simplification bill, the bill for participation in the Organization for Trade Cooperation, and the hardboard bill.<sup>165</sup> It is perhaps unfortunate that the Canadian Government must make a decision in the immediate future as to whether or not to participate in the tariff negotiations which will not actually commence until another six months have passed. If it is now decided that Canada should participate, it would nevertheless seem desirable to advise the United States Government that this decision might have to be reversed if adverse developments were to take place in United States legislation in the meantime or if our interests were adversely affected by the use of escape clauses. A draft note to the United States Government is attached.

9. Recommendations:

(a) That the Canadian Government should inform the Contracting Parties to the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade of its present intention to participate in the proposed tariff negotiations early in 1956;

(b) that the attached Note be transmitted to the United States Government.<sup>166</sup>

Projet de note pour le Gouvernement des États-Unis

Draft Note to United States Government

CONFIDENTIAL

1. The Canadian Government has been officially and confidentially informed of the decision on the part of the United States Government to carry on tariff negotiations with other countries under the provisions of the Trade Agreements Extension Act of 1955. The Canadian Government has been asked to indicate by July 15 if possible, and by August 1 at the latest, whether it plans to participate in these negotiations. The Canadian Government appreciates that the urgency of this request is necessitated by statutory requirements in the United States, even though the negotiations will not commence until early in 1956.

2. The Canadian Government welcomes this initiative on the part of the United States Government to reduce tariffs, and thus promote the restoration and expansion of multilateral world trade. Even though the tariff negotiations will be somewhat limited in their scope, they may constitute a worthwhile step forward in the general reduction of barriers to international trade, a task which is of crucial importance to friendly and co-operative working relations among countries of the free world.

3. The Canadian Government has decided, in principle, to participate in the tariff negotiations which are planned to commence early in 1956. At the same time the Canadian Government must reserve the right to reconsider the decision if circumstances alter materially during the six months which will elapse before actual negotiations are commenced. In making this reservation, the Canadian Government has particularly in mind the uncertainty that prevails regarding possible restrictive legislation by the U.S. Congress and regarding the use that may be made of the new and revised escape procedures incorporated in recent legislation and of the waiver granted to the United States by the Contracting Parties to the GATT with regard to agricultural products. The Canadian Government naturally hopes that there will be no developments in the United States which would impair commitments made to Canada in trade agreements, and that the United States in administering its laws will

PROPOSED TARIFF NEGOTIATIONS RELATING TO JAPAN

At the present time Japan participates on a provisional basis in the sessions of the Contracting Parties of the GATT, and commercial relations between Japan and certain Contracting Parties (including Canada) and governed temporarily by the provisions of that agreement. The press release announcing Canadian acceptance of the Declaration to this effect (pursuant to Order in Council P.C. 1954-517) referred to it as "part of the arrangements which were adopted for Japan to participate in the General Agreement on a provisional basis pending tariff negotiations."<sup>167</sup>

The bilateral agreement between Canada and Japan, which, of course, continues in force during this interim period, was worked out in accordance with the GATT and will still apply if Japan accedes fully to the GATT.<sup>168</sup> That bilateral agreement provides for certain specific protection against imports which might cause serious injury to Canadian production, and, by reducing discrimination against Canadian goods, secures certain substantial advantages to Canadian exports.

It has now been agreed in Geneva that the tariff negotiations relating to Japan, which were envisaged when the provisional arrangements with respect to Japan were made, should take place in Geneva on or about February 21 with a view to the full accession of Japan to the General Agreement. The participation countries will be those which have indicated that they would be prepared to enter into tariff negotiations with Japan. Those which have so far indicated their willingness are Burma, Ceylon, Chile, Denmark, the Dominican Republic, the Federal Republic of Germany, Indonesia, Italy, Norway, Peru, Sweden, the United States and Uruguay.

Canadian participation in the proposed tariff negotiations could take two forms. There might be direct bilateral negotiations with Japan, which would be very limited in scope, and there might be triangular negotiations with Japan and the United States under which, in order that Canada might give additional concessions to Japan, the United States would give concessions to Canada. The United States Government has authority to enter into such negotiations under the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act which was renewed last June for one year. Despite any uncertainty concerning particular aspects of future United States commercial policies, there would seem to be considerable merit in Canada taking a small part in these negotiations which will represent the first tariff negotiations undertaken in some twenty years by a Republican Administration.

The negotiations would be conducted on the basis of the principal supplier rule, and of other principles similar to those which guided the tariff negotiations at Annecy in 1949 and Torquay in 1951, although the proposed negotiations would be more limited. Pursuant to the most-favoured-nation clause of the GATT, all tariff concessions granted by any participating country would be extended to Canada whether or not the concessions were negotiated with Canada. Similarly, Canada would extend to all Contracting Parties any tariff concessions which it might negotiate.

While Canadian negotiations would be modest in scope, several of the items likely to be put forward by both Japan and the United States are items with respect to which Canada has some hope of obtaining concessions which would be of considerable value to particular Canadian industries. On the other hand it does not appear that Canada would have to make any concessions which would be embarrassing.

There are perhaps also economic and political grounds for favouring tariff negotiations with Japan. There has recently been a change of Government in Japan and an election is to be held there fairly soon. By entering into tariff negotiations with Japan in the near future, the Canadian Government might be better able to maintain closer commercial relations with Japan; not to enter into negotiations might increase the difficulty of maintaining such relations under a Japanese Government twice removed from the one which negotiated the bilateral agreement with Canada. At any rate Japan's general attitude toward trade with Canada would probably be influenced in some degree by Canada's willingness to participate in these tariff negotiations. On the political side, it is clear that, as part of her general effort to re-establish herself in the international community, Japan attaches importance to full membership in the GATT. It would seem desirable for Canada to join with other like-minded countries in facilitating the entry of Japan into the GATT.

In addition to the question of new tariff negotiations, it is necessary to consider the related matter of the temporary arrangements for associating Japan with the GATT. Because the Declaration which temporarily brought Japanese trade with certain Contracting Parties under the provisions of the GATT and to which Canada adhered, will expire on June 30 next, a new Declaration has been opened for signature. It would extend the validity of the earlier Declaration until December 31, 1955, unless before that date the Declaration has ceased to have effect by reason of Japan's accession to the GATT.

Recommendations

1. With the concurrence of the Minister of Trade and Commerce and of the Minister of Finance I recommend that Cabinet authorize the Canadian Delegation to the GATT Conference in Geneva, under the chairmanship of Mr. Wilgress, to negotiate on a reciprocal and mutually advantageous basis and in accordance with Section 10 of the Customs Tariff Act:

(a) directly with Japan on items with respect to which one country is the other's principal or major supplier;

(b) in triangular negotiations, — to the extent that the United States may be in a position to offer concessions to countries other than Japan.

It would be understood that the results of the negotiations, when completed, would be subject to confirmation by the Canadian Government.

2. With the concurrence of the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Minister of Finance I also recommend that an Order in Council be issued authorizing Mr. Wilgress to sign, on behalf of the Government of Canada, the new GATT Declaration which would extend the validity of the earlier Declaration on commercial relations between Japan and certain Contracting Parties until December 31, 1955, unless before that date the Declaration has ceased to have effect by reason of Japan's accession to the GATT.<sup>169</sup>

Press Release

If the Cabinet should decide to authorize Canadian participation in the proposed tariff negotiations it might be deemed advisable to issue a public statement. A draft press release† is attached for consideration.

[Ottawa], February 15, 1955

NEGOTIATIONS ON UNITED STATES TARIFF ON FISH STICKS

In September 1954 the United States Congress enacted legislation which provided increased duties applicable to imported fish sticks; the rates to become effective as soon as conflicting international obligations of the United States relating to this product had been properly modified. The new legislation included provision for a rate of 20% ad valorem on uncooked fish sticks, a substantial increase over the present effective rate of one cent per pound under item 720(b) of Schedule XX of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade which was a result of tariff concessions initially negotiated with the Government of Canada at Geneva in 1947.

Steps to modify existing international obligations of the United States and thus prepare for application of the new duties were undertaken when, on October 26th, 1954 at an inter-cessional meeting of the GATT Contracting Parties in Geneva, the United States Delegation requested authority of the Contracting Parties to re-negotiate the bound rate of duty applicable to uncooked fish sticks. The Contracting Parties granted the requested authority. Canada was recognized as the country to which the present rates were bound and no other country claimed a substantial interest.

It is to be expected that the United States will offer compensation, in the form of tariff reductions, for the increase in the bound rate that they are now proposing.

On January 29th the State Department inquired as to the position with respect to negotiations concerning concessions to be granted in compensation for an increase in the duties on fish sticks. On February 3rd the Canadian Ambassador in Washington notified the State Department that Canada would be prepared to carry on these negotiations in Geneva in late February at the close of the present GATT session. The procedures for negotiating appropriate compensation for an increase in the United States duties on fish sticks have not as yet been agreed upon in detail.

Recommendation

The Secretary of State for External Affairs with the concurrence of the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Minister of Finance recommends that Cabinet agree that the Canadian Delegation to the GATT Conference in Geneva, under the chairmanship of Mr. L.D. Wilgress, be authorized to negotiate appropriate compensation for increased United States tariffs on imported uncooked fish sticks, and that any agreement on compensation which is negotiated be subject to Cabinet approval.<sup>170</sup>

FISHSTICKS

At an informal discussion today Dan Lyons who is heading the United States "third country" team asked us whether we could help them in appraising what compensation if any they could justifiably recommend in their fishstick negotiation. He said that on the basis of the information available to them they could see no practical trade interest, present or potential for Canada on uncooked fishsticks. He doubted whether sale of the uncooked product was a realistic commercial proposition. He said they had no evidence as to the proposed increases upsetting any concrete plans being made by Canadian industry. He indicated that while they could approach us formally along the above lines they would prefer it if we could give them some guidance and factual evidence, enabling them to conclude a satisfactory settlement of this matter. In the conversation he pointed to the fact that herring and some other fish items were included in the United States list.

2. In our comments we confined ourselves to indicating our interest in fishsticks as an item of potential trade and repeated the views outlined in paragraph 2 of our telegram No. 66.

3. We shall appreciate further guidance and briefing as requested in paragraph 3 of our telegram No. 66.

FISHSTICKS

Ministerial approval for an appropriate course of action has now been secured.

2. In replying to Lyons of the United States Delegation you should assure him that Canadian fish stick producers did have a very real interest in developing a market in the United States for Canadian uncooked fish sticks. Canadian processors began a substantial expansion of their facilities a little more than a year ago based on the assumption that the Canadian and United States markets would be open to them. Production costs in Canada are very competitive with those in the United States and Canadian producers had no doubts that they could sell over the existing tariffs. In view of this we were informed that certain Canadian firms were actively planning to develop sales in the United States. These plans had to be scrapped when legislation was enacted by Congress to increase the duties on fish sticks. Because of this development, Canadians, who have entered a new field, who are competitive and who had an active export interest, were denied access to a large and growing market in the United States for their product. There is no question in our minds that this involves serious impairment of a tariff concession.

3. We note that Lyons has asked whether we could help him respecting the question of compensation. There is, of course, no question but that we would wish to receive satisfactory compensation. We have therefore given the matter careful consideration and have looked into a number of possible alternatives. We have selected one of these and you should inform Lyons that we believe that it would constitute appropriate compensation.

4. The product is pickled or salted cod, cusk, haddock, hake and pollock, not skinned or boned (except that the vertebral column may be removed). It is classified under para. 719(2). If the fish contains not over 42% moisture content it is at present dutiable at 8/16¢ per pound. If the moisture content is more than 43% the duty is 4/16¢ per pound. The President has authority to reduce these rates to 5/16¢ and 3/16¢ per pound. This item is not included in the published negotiating list and it would be necessary to initiate peril point investigations before negotiations could be entered into.

5. A concession in these rates would be of considerable benefit to both Canada and the United States, particularly Puerto Rico. In 1954 Canada exported 21.2 million pounds of these types of fish to Puerto Rico and 14.9 million pounds to the Continental United States. We are informed that this produce is the cheapest non-vegetable source of protein available to the low income population of the Island. It is therefore in the interest of the Islanders to have any obstacles removed which hinder its entry.

6. Imports into the Continental United States are further processed, e.g. boned and packaged, before going on sale. This product does not compete with fresh or frozen fish and there is practically no domestic salting industry. There therefore should be no obstacles to reducing the duties.

7. This item has thus been carefully chosen as possible compensation. You shall emphasize the following points. Firstly, it would compensate, in part at least, the fisheries industries in Newfoundland and Nova Scotia, which have lost out through the imposition of increased obstacles in the United States on the importation of fishsticks. The bulk of Canadian exports of pickled or salted fish are from Newfoundland with substantial quantities from Nova Scotia. Secondly, we know of no domestic United States industry which is producing this product. Lastly, it is an important basic foodstuff to consumers in Puerto Rico and any move to facilitate its importation would no doubt be welcome to them.

Geneva, May 5, 1955

Dear Claude [Isbister],

JAPANESE NEGOTIATIONS

Our Japanese agreement is limited and innocuous and has nothing very exciting about it. We could have pressed for more, but in view of the lack of enthusiasm or interest shown by Ottawa about additional products, we felt it safer to stop where we stood and try to use our ammunition elsewhere. I must say we were surprised and quite skeptical when we first learnt of the Japanese position on wheat and barley, but we have had to accept this. Had our instructions been different in this respect, we would have made an issue of this and might have had the Japanese reconsider their stand, but such was not the case. Kondo assured us, both in meetings and privately, that their unwillingness to include these items in the GATT schedule in no way affected their intention to continue purchases of these products from us.

You will recall that flaxseed and hides were two of the four additional items which the Japanese offered us. Your reply referred to our small tariff interest in flaxseed and hides; I assumed that our tariff interest in platinum and logs was even lesser. Was that assumption correct? You will be interested to know that, as we expected, Japan has now offered bindings on flaxseed and hides to Uruguay.

U.S. Negotiation

The U.S. team here is obviously not too closely familiar with the fine points and implications of GATT procedures and provisions and we have had to put them straight on a number of things. Their anxiety about double bindings emerged only recently and was accompanied (or motivated) by the arrival here of Mrs. Potter from Washington. Their first suggestion was for an understanding in the protocol of Japanese accession that the U.S. would have certain "rights" over the third country concessions to Japan for which they had paid.

Our initial reaction was to oppose any such idea since the U.S. will themselves be getting paid fully by Japan for anything they give the third country. We were also disturbed over the granting of vague additional rights to the U.S. other than those implicit in GATT, unless the items were specifically bound to the U.S. Partly as a result of our talks with them, the U.S. dropped their idea of amending the protocol and proposed instead to have the third country bind its concessions for Japan both to Japan and to the U.S. They said it would be understood that the rights of Japan and the U.S. over such bindings would be split up in this way: Japan alone would seek compensation and, if this was not forthcoming, the U.S. alone would have the right to retaliate. Further, any retaliation by U.S. would be confined to withdrawal of items bound to the third country by the U.S. in these negotiations. On the basis of your instructions, we have told the U.S. we would agree to this procedure but would want the above limitations clearly spelt out in a written agreement between Canada, U.S. and Japan. The U.S. proposal was that their rights over the double-bound items would extend to any third country withdrawals, whether under Article 28, Article 19 or even the security and health exceptions. They feel it is their mission to ensure that third country concessions for Japan resulting from these negotiations are untouchable, permanent and immutable and sheltered from all the vagaries of normal GATT action. We have had to educate them in this respect and are making it clear that the U.S. rights over any binding are limited to their normal GATT rights. One possibility under the U.S. proposal: if we bound an item to both Japan and U.S. and we took action on this item under Article 19 and our bilateral Japanese trade agreement, we would face possible discriminatory retaliation against us by the U.S., even though U.S. trade was not affected by our action. Wyndham White, with whom we have discussed this, agrees this is going too far.

We are on the threshold of our U.S. "third country" negotiations. The detailed priority list you have sent me is excellent, just what we need. The U.S. have still not got their approval on the supplementary list — a strange situation after all the pressure for speed. They have started by asking us for a complete list of our possible offers so that they can determine how far to push approval of items on the supplementary list. While not giving them details of specific items, we propose to show them that we have enough in dollars and cents to buy all we want. George calculates our remaining concessions for Japan as covering about $12 million imports from U.S. and Japan and possible duty reductions as amounting to $500,000.

Of the items in the priority list you sent us, "canned hams" seems to be out. The U.S. tell us it has been dropped from their list because the main suppliers (Netherlands) are not negotiating here. We ourselves have deleted "wallpaper", on which the U.S. has now offered Japan a full reduction in the specific (none on the ad valorem). The U.S. also tell us any concession on slippers, upper leather or soybeans will be difficult for them.

Once we exclude canned hams, our priority list boils down to a trade coverage of only $7 million Canadian exports in 1954, and on many of the items (e.g. methanol) it is questionable whether even a maximum reduction by U.S. would improve our trade. We understand also that one of the amendments to H.R.1 may have the effect of excluding from further negotiation any item now being reduced by more than 15 per cent. We feel, therefore, that what we are prepared to offer the U.S. may be worth much more than the totality of the requests on the priority list you sent us. Accordingly, I have added "chicken eggs" and "fox furs" to our list (both items were recommended by Ab Richards before he left) and have also added "carbon tetrachloride". If you have additional suggestions, I would appreciate having them. Also any further estimate of how much particular U.S. concessions are worth to us will be useful.

However, the main problem and one which may prove insoluble is the Japanese ability to pay the U.S. We have just had an informal visit from Kondo. He plans to fly back to Ottawa on May 8. Talking about our U.S. negotiations he has told us some disturbing news: Japan has practically nothing left with which to pay U.S. for third country concessions. Kondo said he thought they would be unable to pay the U.S. even for a Canadian duty reduction on toys. The reason, as he explained it, is that the U.S. have already extracted the maximum out of Japan in their own direct negotiations. One possible solution for this impasse is to persuade the U.S. to pay only for their own share of possible Canadian concessions, letting Japan benefit indirectly without having the item bound to Japan. However, the U.S. seem very averse to breaking up the triangle.

Fishsticks

The U.S. have retired to mull over our request. I was told privately that the Trade Agreements Committee (which is sitting permanently and invisibly at the Hotel du Rhône) have definitely turned down our proposed compensation and that they will be coming up with some alternative. I shall let you know of developments as they occur.

We are making arrangements to corner the various delegates as they get off the plane.

With best regards, etc.

Dear Claude [Isbister],

FISHSTICKS

This is a postscript to the attached letter. We had quite a time on the final deadline night.

When I pointed out to the U.S. legal man that our agreement on this would of course cover only fishsticks and not the other items in their law, we stirred up the biggest hornet's nest you can imagine. We had the whole U.S. delegation running in circles, the TAC was convened and the U.S. went from initial confusion and dismay to indignation at our not having raised this matter with them before. They were going on the assumption that the "fishsticks" we had been negotiating was the generic term used loosely to cover all the items in their law. They had to admit someone on their side had blundered and to my surprise, they seemed to be seeing the text of their GATT notification for the first time.

At first I was quite prepared to sit this out and have them go through the hoops of applying under Article XXVIII for action on the fillets. On further consideration, we felt they might very well decide to act both on fishsticks and fillets under Art. 28 and that our embryonic settlement (including Canada's Art. 28 action) might be broken wide open. It was then I decided to phone you.

I do feel now that I should have been advised to raise this matter with the U.S. at an earlier stage in the negotiations. I was aware of course of the discrepancy between the U.S. law and the U.S. notification but, in view of the complete absence of instructions from Ottawa on this point, I had no idea what our position should be.

After talking with you, we decided it would be in our best general interests to try and reach settlement on everything now rather than run the obvious risks of failure and mutual recriminations. We met with the U.S., told them we would let them off the hook if we could reach reasonable settlement on everything. The list of possible concessions from the U.S. was limited because we had just obtained concessions on turkeys etc. in our third country agreement. We pressed for reduction on crab meat and in view of the strong resistance to this, I decided a binding on this item might be good security for the future. In addition we obtained U.S. agreement on our Art. 28 action on what George considered reasonable terms.

So the deed is done — I hope you will find it acceptable.

Geneva, May 24, 1955

Dear Claude [Isbister],

FISHSTICKS

Our very sparse cable† telling you of the U.S. offer on herrings necessarily failed to give you the atmosphere and background of our fishsticks discussions. This cable was written at 2:30 in the salon of the Hotel de la Paix after an arduous late night session with the Americans, and we had the courier (who had arrived from Paris with your instructions that same day) take it back to Paris in the morning.

I must say that I found my position on fishsticks quite difficult. As you know, the Americans had been after me ever since they arrived in Geneva asking whether we could help them in their search for satisfactory compensation by given them factual data about fishstick trade and production and by suggesting items of interest to ourselves. Although I was skeptical at first, I do think they were sincere in their claim that they had no idea as to what importance we attached to the item.

It wasn't until quite recently that you asked me to propose the salt cod item as acceptable compensation. Their immediate reaction was that this item wasn't on the U.S. public lists and that it seemed too late to have it included now. In my discussions with them I made the most of all the arguments you had given me and placed particular emphasis on the regional and political aspects of the problem. I also stressed that it was up to them to solve their procedural and legal difficulties which appeared to be the only ones in the way of settlement.

When the U.S. put forward their package offer to settle both fishsticks and the Canadian withdrawals, we reacted much along the lines you did. However, the U.S. asked us to put this package to Ottawa and to come up with substitute proposals if we wished. As you know, your cable† to us simply turned down the U.S. package and did not suggest any substitute compensation for fishsticks other than the cod item. When I received these instructions I concluded that you were either interested in pressing for cod to the exclusion of anything else or that, for our own reasons, we wanted to block action by the U.S. under the sympathetic procedure. I felt that after having pressed so strongly for an item that would benefit the East Coast fisheries I could not, without your specific instruction, pick out some other (non-fish) item from the U.S. list as acceptable compensation. As you know, herrings and crab are about the only fish items on the U.S. public lists and you had never mentioned either of these in your messages to me.

Our meeting with the U.S. started at 9:00 p.m. and went on until early in the morning. We covered all the points included in your message. On fishsticks I again urged them to cut through their procedures and grant a concession on cod. I also gave them a little speech on our concern lest purely technical reasons on their side should prevent settlement. The U.S. reaction was unexpectedly violent — at one point Lyons even banged the table. They said we were being completely unreasonable since we had held off making any suggestions till quite recently, and that the only item we had suggested was one we had never requested for inclusion on the public lists. He said we had been given an opportunity to make counterproposals and had none to make other than one which they had turned down and which Ottawa must know was just not a practical possibility. They said they had made sincere efforts to study the problem and to meet us but had received no co-operation. I expressed surprise that they should have found it necessary to renegotiate fishsticks if their information was that there were no trade possibilities in the item. We ended a lengthy discussion at about midnight with the U.S. team calling a special meeting of the TAC (one of whose members was in bed). We waited in another office until the TAC had finished their meeting and Lyons came in with their new proposal on herrings. He said the primary reason for their making such a “substantial offer” was their earnest and overriding desire to comply with their obligations and reach agreement. Also, he said if no agreement was reached Congress would react unfavourably towards Canada and would conclude that the kind of proviso in the fishstick bill was just a waste of time. He privately told us that some TAC members felt that in these negotiations Canada was being very sticky and difficult. He asked whether the broader implications on our general U.S.-Canadian relations were being kept in mind in Ottawa. We told him that the instructions we were getting obviously reflected serious concern in Ottawa both about fishsticks and about the third country operation. We left on this rather ruffled note and sent off our cable.

We are now awaiting your reply. Tomorrow, Wednesday, is the final deadline for any concessions by the U.S.

With all best regards,

YOURS SINCERELY,
M. SCHWARZMANN

CABINET DOCUMENT NO. 124-55

[Ottawa n.d.]

RESULTS OF TARIFF NEGOTIATIONS AT GENEVA

Pursuant to earlier decisions of the Cabinet the Canadian delegation which attended the recent GATT conference has been participating in tariff negotiations with Japan and the United States, in preparation for the accession of Japan to the GATT, and with the United States on fishsticks. The delegation has also been negotiating certain changes in the Canadian tariff under Article XXVIII of the GATT; these negotiations have been conducted with the United States.

2. The results of all these negotiations, which have just been completed, are annexed to this memorandum for the consideration of the Cabinet.<sup>171</sup> As was anticipated, the scope of the negotiations was limited but they embody a number of concessions of value to Canadian producers and appear, in sum, to be satisfactory. I understand that the increases on Canadian rates of duty and some of the reductions negotiated under Article XXVIII will be the subject of a resolution to be presented in Parliament on June 2 by the Minister of Finance, and that these increases and reductions would become effective on June 3. This matter is referred to in a separate memorandum to Cabinet from the Minister of Finance.†

3. A Protocol providing for the accession of Japan has now been opened for signature in Geneva.<sup>172</sup> The concessions negotiated by Japan and other contracting parties are to be annexed to this Protocol, and it is desired by the United States, in order that it may implement its concessions under the authority of existing legislation, that the Protocol be signed before June 10 by all the Contracting Parties with which it negotiated concessions. By signing the Protocol a Contracting Party would certify that the concessions it had negotiated were correctly recorded and it would agree to the procedures set forth in the Protocol for giving effect to the concessions and for arranging for the accession of Japan.

4. The Protocol provides that the concessions negotiated by a Contracting Party would not come into effect until after it had notified the Executive Secretary of the GATT of its intention to apply them. Japan would accede to the GATT, through the entry into force of the Protocol, after a Decision on the accession of Japan, which is to be circulated separately, had received favourable votes from two-thirds of the Contracting Parties.

5. The United States authorities have prepared a document, constituting an agreement on fishsticks and similar products, which requires signature before June 11 if the United States concessions on this item are subsequently to become effective. This document, which will be annexed to a Presidential proclamation, will set forth the new duties on fishsticks and similar products and list the United States compensatory concessions to Canada.<sup>173</sup>

Recommendation

With the concurrence of the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Minister of Finance, I recommend that Cabinet agree

(a) that I be authorized to execute a full power authorizing Mr. L.D. Wilgress to sign, on behalf of the Government of Canada, the Protocol providing for the accession of Japan, and that an Order-in-Council be passed accordingly;

(b) that Mr. L.D. Wilgress be authorized to sign, on behalf of the Government of Canada, the agreement on fishsticks which has been drawn up by the United States authorities;

(c) that I may notify the Executive Secretary of the GATT, at the appropriate time, that the Canadian Government intends to apply the concessions relating to the accession of Japan; and

THE FUND AND THE MOVEMENT TO CONVERTIBILITY
THE TRANSITION FROM ARTICLE XIV TO ARTICLE VIII

Under Article VIII of the Fund Agreement, members undertake, subject to specified exceptions, not to impose restrictions on the making of payments and transfers for current international transactions without the approval of the Fund. This Article also prohibits the use of discriminatory currency arrangements or multiple currency practices, except as authorized by the Agreement or approved by the Fund.

Approved by Cabinet June 2, 1955. Canada voted in favour of Japan's accession on June 24, 1955.

A major exception to the above obligations is contained in Article XIV which provides that in the postwar transitional period members may maintain and adapt to changing circumstances their restrictions on current payments and transfers. Additionally, members whose territories were occupied by the enemy may, under this Article, introduce new restrictions on their payments. It is, however, laid down that members availing themselves of these transitional arrangements shall withdraw their restrictions as soon as they are satisfied that in their absence they will be able to settle their balance of payments in a manner which will not unduly encumber their access to the resources of the Fund. Thus, the criterion for the continued maintenance of restrictions under Article XIV is the balance of payments position of the member concerned.

The great majority of Fund members are still availing themselves of the Article XIV transitional arrangements. A few, such as the U.S., Canada, and certain Latin American countries whose currencies are convertible, have accepted the full obligations of Article VIII. The currencies of members who have accepted Article VIII are regarded by the Fund as convertible, whereas those of Article XIV countries are regarded as inconvertible. Apart from this, the most important difference between the régimes under the two Articles is that under Article VIII the prior approval of the Fund must be obtained for the introduction of restrictions, whereas under Article XIV members may adapt and change their restrictions, being obliged only to consult with the Fund. Whereas the criterion for the maintenance of restrictions under Article XIV is the member's balance of payments position, the criterion for approval of the restrictions under Article VIII is not spelled out in the Agreement and depends on the purposes of the Fund, particularly the establishment of a multilateral system for current payments.

With the general improvement in the world's payments situation in recent years, and with the approach of sterling and certain other European currencies to general convertibility, questions arise as to the appropriateness of such countries remaining under Article XIV, whether the transitional period as such could be ended, and as to the policies and practices to be followed by the Fund when additional countries make their currencies generally convertible and come under Article VIII.

The various issues involved in the possible movement of a number of important Fund members from inconvertibility to convertibility for their currencies and from the régime of Article XIV to that of Article VIII were discussed in the Fund Executive Board on June 8, 1955, taking as a point of departure the most recent staff paper on the subject, (SM/55/35, a copy of which is attached together with a related legal paper setting forth the comparative obligations of members under Articles VIII and XIV).† Special significance is attached to this discussion not only because of the possibility of early moves to convertibility by the U.K. and certain European countries, but also because entry into force of important provisions of the revised GATT (annual consultation on trade restrictions and exceptions to the rule of non-discriminatory trade) is tied to the assumption of Article VIII responsibilities in the Fund by members accounting for 50% of world trade. (Since Canada and the U.S. which account for over 27% of world trade are already under Article VIII the 50 per cent figure would be reached if the obligations of Article VIII were assumed by the U.K. and one other country). Moreover, the right to impose discriminatory trade restrictions under the new GATT is tied almost exclusively to restrictions on payments and transfers permitted by the Fund under either Article XIV or Article VIII.

In considering the question of the transition of members from Article XIV to Article VIII, the Fund staff rejected two extreme possibilities. First, the wholesale transfer of all members to VIII, which would involve the approval under VIII of a high proportion of restrictions now maintained under XIV, and, on the other hand, a strict policy of admitting to Article VIII only members whose currencies have been made convertible in the truest sense of the word, i.e. countries which have completely liquidated their exchange restrictions and discrimination. The reasons leading the staff to reject these two possibilities are set forth on pages 3 and 4 of the attached paper, SM/55/35.

As a practical programme of action, the staff proposed that on the introduction of general convertibility for their currencies, such countries as the U.K. should immediately come under Article VIII with the exchange restrictions remaining in their system at that time. They would be given a specified period in which to eliminate such remaining restrictions, which in the meantime would enjoy the temporary approval of the fund under Article VIII. According to staff thinking on the subject, the specified time period could be either uniform for the various countries becoming convertible or vary from country to country depending on circumstances. To help in the process of removing the remaining restrictions, the Fund resources would be available to members. At the end of the period the new Article VIII country would be expected to have eliminated its restrictions on the convertibility of its currency among members of the Fund for current transactions. (Note that this would appear to rule out Swiss-type convertibility).

A number of countries, particularly the Netherlands and Belgium, fear that in moving to convertibility and Article VIII, their position would be prejudiced, particularly from the trade point of view, by the right which inconvertible countries remaining under Article XIV would continue to enjoy in changing their exchange restrictions without the necessity of obtaining prior Fund approval, or put another way that the inconvertible countries would take the occasion to discriminate against them. To meet these fears, the staff envisaged some strengthening of existing policies and procedures in relation to Article XIV countries which would encourage the remaining Article XIV countries to eliminate their restrictions so far as possible consistent with their balance of payments position. In this connection, use might be made of that part of Article XIV which permits the Fund to make a formal "representation" to a member that conditions are favourable for the withdrawal of its restrictions.

The discussion in the Executive Board may be summarized under two main headings: (a) timing and procedure of the move from Article XIV to Article VIII, and (b) policy to be followed in approving restrictions under VIII. These subjects are dealt with in the following paragraphs. At the end of the paper an attempt was made to indicate the areas of agreement established and the probable direction of future discussions. This latter section also covers certain points which came up in private talks of Rasminsky with various Board members after the meeting.

TIMING AND PROCEDURE OF THE MOVEMENT FROM ARTICLE XIV TO ARTICLE VIII

U.S. Position

Southard indicated his sympathy with the staff view that the advent of convertibility for sterling and other currencies should be the signal for a new Fund policy vis-à-vis its members. However, if this hoped for development were to be long delayed he considered that something would in any case have to be done to overcome the anomaly that some Fund members were under Article VIII and others continued under a different régime, which could no longer be justified on the basis of postwar difficulties. He agreed that at the time of convertibility the countries concerned would not be in a position simultaneously to do away with all their remaining restrictions and discrimination. He, therefore, agreed that a transitional period of limited duration should be provided in which such restrictions would be eliminated. He was of an open mind whether this transitional period should be under Article XIV or whether on C-day countries should, as the staff proposed, come under Article VIII. He expressed two main doubts about the staff proposals. Firstly, they did not look to a definite termination of the Article XIV transitional period and secondly, the proposals would continue the differential treatment with respect to restrictions as between convertible (VIII) and inconvertible (XIV) countries. While he agreed that some differentiation was inevitable, he felt that the staff paper went too far in the direction of leaving countries under Article XIV for an indefinite period — a position which might prejudice the willingness of stronger countries to make their currencies convertible and come under Article VIII. In this connection, he proposed that consideration should be given to ways and means of ending the transitional period, including study of the legal issue involved. It might not be possible to set a date related to the introduction of convertibility for certain currencies, but the Fund should be able to look forward to the definite end of the traditional arrangements in the not too distant future.

Canadian Position

Rasminsky suggested that in general the Fund's attitude to the problems before it should be conditioned by the desire to attain the objective of multilateralism and to serve the interests of its members. He agreed that it was realistic to assume that on the introduction of legal convertibility the countries concerned would still be maintaining a body of restrictions and discrimination. For this reason, he was in favour of a transitional or grace period of specified and short duration, during which the Fund would expect such members to liquidate their remaining discrimination and restrictions (except for such nominal restrictions as the Fund could properly approve under Article VIII). The Fund should be prepared to make its resources available to aid in this process. At the end of the prescribed period there should be no substantive restrictions on the convertibility of the currencies of the countries concerned among members of the Fund so far as current transactions were concerned. In this connection, he questioned the staff view that after convertibility there might be special problems in the early elimination of regional discrimination since once currencies were convertible it was, from a payments standpoint, a matter of indifference where imports came from and the sensible thing would be to buy from the cheapest source. Rasminsky disagreed with the staff suggestion that the transitional period should take place under VIII. He believed that during the prescribed period the convertible countries should remain under XIV, and when their restrictions had been eliminated at the end of the period they should come under VIII — thus Article VIII would be reserved for countries whose convertibility was real. The alternative policy would mean diluting Article VIII which contains the essence of the rule of multilateral payments. Moreover, if countries were brought under VIII with their present restrictions and discrimination, dangerous precedents of approval for such restrictions would be set. Finally, technical difficulties would arise in connection with repurchase obligations — a repurchase obligation might be incurred by the accumulation of an Article VIII country's currency which, because of approved restrictions, was not fully convertible in the hands of the holder. Rasminsky was not inclined to regard as decisive the fact that the entry into force of certain of the GATT provisions was linked to the assumption of Fund Article VIII responsibility by members accounting for 50% of world trade. He was of the opinion that this consideration of itself should not lead the Fund to opt for placing members under Article VIII as soon as their currencies had been made convertible, irrespective of the restrictions on payments which they maintained. So far as the right to discriminate under GATT was concerned, it was mainly the U.K. and one or two other sterling area countries operating under the "Havana option" which would be affected by the coming into force of the new Article XIV of GATT, and the 50% condition would be fulfilled as soon as the U.K. and one other country had come under Article VIII.

As a practical procedure, Rasminsky thought that countries going convertible should remain under Article XIV for a fixed period of short duration, after which they would be expected to come under Article VIII without discrimination or any significant non-discriminatory restrictions on current payments. At the same time, the Fund should let it be known that it intended to examine closely all the restrictions being maintained by the other Article XIV countries in view of the new conditions which had been established. During the course of this examination, which might last for a year or so following C-day, the Fund would expect those Article XIV countries whose payments position did not justify the maintenance of restrictions to move under Article VIII. The other Article XIV countries whose payments difficulties warranted the substantial use of restrictions would be expected to remain under XIV until their payments situation had sufficiently improved to warrant their coming under VIII.

The U.K. Position

Lord Harcourt, while appreciating the difficulties, considered that the staff arguments against the fairly early termination of the postwar transitional period were not conclusive. He expressed the hope that in due course, and as a matter of policy, the Article XIV transitional period could be brought to end. A logical point of time would be when a number of major currencies, including sterling, had been made convertible. He recognized that this implied the approval of a body of restrictions under Article VIII with its consequent dilution. However, he believed that for some of the member countries restrictions were pretty well inevitable and it would be more realistic to recognize them under a universal Article VIII régime than to maintain the pretence that they were the result of postwar difficulties (the U.K. is clearly anxious that in due course other countries should be made subject to the same régime of Fund discipline as they themselves expect under Article VIII).

Harcourt was not prepared to agree, as the staff had argued, that the introduction of convertibility and the acceptance of Article VIII obligations should be simultaneous. He believed that countries going convertible would still be maintaining restrictions and discrimination and would need a transitional period in which to get rid of them. In the U.K. view, this transitional period should be under Article XIV rather than Article VIII. A transitional period was required because the abandonment of discrimination would increase the totality of the payments burden of the countries concerned. There should, therefore, be a year or perhaps more in which the strains of convertibility could be taken gradually, at the end of which the countries would come under Article VIII with restrictions and discrimination eliminated so far as possible. (Rasminsky registered his reservation about the view that a justification for discrimination could be found in the need to control aggregate imports and pointed out that this could be done by other non-discriminatory methods).

As a second stage after a number of countries had made their currencies convertible and come under Article VIII, a further transitional period might be prescribed at the end of which all the remaining Article XIV countries would be expected to reduce their restrictions so far as possible and then come under Article VIII.

In the discussion of Harcourt's proposal for a two-stage universal transition to Article VIII, he was closely questioned as to the position of the U.K. so far as its restrictions would be concerned at the end of the first grace period, when the U.K. would expect to come under VIII. Bury, the Australian Director, argued that one year would be far too short a period to expect sterling area countries to get rid of existing trade and payments discrimination. The dismantling of discrimination would involve heavily increased calls for dollars on the central reserves and should not be contemplated in so short a period. This view related particularly to the early introduction of sterling convertibility. If on the other hand sterling convertibility was delayed for another year, it should be possible to move in the direction of non-discrimination and a one-year transitional period after the formal act of convertibility might then be feasible. Even so, he was of the view that the degree of liberalization and non-discrimination would vary between sterling area countries at the end of the grace period. Under this pressure, Harcourt altered his position and emphasized that the U.K. could not, of course, guarantee to eliminate all its restrictions and discrimination at the end of the prescribed period after the introduction of convertibility. He thought it might be necessary at that stage to ask the Fund to approve whatever restrictions remained under Article VIII. At one point, he seemed to agree that a fixed period for the elimination of restrictions remaining after convertibility might not be appropriate. Later in the debate, Keogh, the U.K. Alternate, endeavoured to clarify the U.K. position and to emphasize that it was the U.K.'s intention to do away with all restrictions and discrimination so far as possible during any grace period which might be prescribed. It was made clear in the U.K. presentation that the U.K. was not considering the elimination of its exchange control machinery which would be maintained to control capital movements, as provided for under Article VI of the Agreement.

In response to a question whether other independent sterling area countries would move to Article VIII with the U.K. at the end of the grace period, Harcourt indicated that this was his understanding. This statement forced comments from both Bury and Prasad to the effect that such an assumption might not be warranted. Bury reiterated that it might not be possible for Australia to eliminate its discrimination in a fixed time period since important switches of resources allocation would be involved. Prasad emphasized that the question of whether independent sterling area countries would move with the U.K. was entirely open and would be for discussion and agreement amongst the countries concerned when the time came. It was not clear that an underdeveloped country, such as India, could forego Article XIV at the same time as the U.K.

The German Position

The German attitude as expressed by Donner was similar in most respects to that of Harcourt in his initial statement. He believed that there should be a fixed grace period for convertible countries under Article XIV before they would be expected to come under VIII, and that countries coming under VIII should have eliminated, or all but eliminated, their restrictions. (His position on this point was close to Rasminsky's). Finally, he considered that in due course and perhaps after a further grace period the Article XIV transitional arrangements might be brought to an end, with all countries assuming the obligations of Article VIII.

The Benelux Position

Van Campenhout expressed the view that the Fund should not take a doctrinal position on the obligations of its members under Article XIV on the one hand, and Article VIII on the other. The objective should be to work for the elimination of restrictions. He was opposed to pushing countries under Article VIII, until all but their marginal restrictions had been eliminated. He hoped that these conditions could be established by countries in a reasonable period after the introduction of convertibility for their currencies. He believed that world traders would expect countries coming under Article VIII to have reduced their restrictions to a minimum.

Van Campenhout questioned the staff view that at the end of the prescribed transitional period convertible countries should have no restrictions on the convertibility of their currencies for current transactions among members of the Fund. He believed it would be difficult to apply this principle to relations with certain countries remaining inconvertible, — Swiss-type convertibility. From this point of view, he believed that it would be difficult to fix a realistic grace period since the ability of countries like Belgium to eliminate all restrictions of payments would depend on the policies of the inconvertible countries. Although Crena de Iongh did not speak specifically to this point, it can be assumed that the Netherlands position is much the same since they are the leading advocates of the right of convertible countries to maintain restrictions vis-à-vis inconvertible countries. Crena limited his contribution to this part of the debate to an expression of agreement with the U.S. view that the transitional arrangements should be brought to an end and all countries subjected to the Article VIII provisions.

The Japanese Position

Yumoto was attracted by Harcourt's plan that countries going convertible should stay under Article XIV for a specified grace period before assuming the full obligations of Article VIII. This seemed sound to him since all countries had an interest in the strength and convertibility of major currencies, particularly sterling, and it would be most unfortunate if, having moved forward, it became necessary to retreat into inconvertibility. He thought that the U.K. and other main trading countries should in advance of the introduction of convertibility relax their restrictions in order to see in advance what the pressures of convertibility would be, and thus ensure success for the move when it was made. As to remaining Article XIV countries, he thought that they should reduce their restrictions, particularly after major currencies had been made convertible, and if the improvement in the payments situation was maintained the Fund might take policy decisions designed to bring about the removal of restrictions by these countries. The Japanese view was that countries whose currencies became convertible should abandon their discrimination, including any regional discrimination which might still be in existence.

The Position of India, Italy and China (Taiwan)

These countries may be grouped, broadly speaking, as in agreement with the staff view that it may be necessary for some countries to continue under Article XIV for a considerable and possibly an indefinite period. They also subscribe to the view that the Fund should not declare the termination of Article XIV, that countries should not be pushed to accept the obligations of Article VIII, and that in general the Fund should proceed to attain its objectives through persuasion and flexibility of approach and through the liberal use of Fund's resources, rather than in any aggressive or doctrinal way. Prasad, for India, made the additional point that underdeveloped countries undertaking development programmes are in a special position not contemplated when the Articles of Agreement were drawn. They are likely to encounter continuing payments difficulties over a considerable period of time and will probably have to resort to the use of both discriminatory and non-discriminatory exchange restrictions. In the circumstances, it might not be possible for such countries to accept the prior approval procedure and other obligations of Article VIII. It would be undesirable to set up strict rules if countries would not in practice be strong enough to live up to them. In general, it was Prasad's feeling that progress in the commercial policy field had not gone far enough to create an environment in which all countries could be expected to accept strict obligations on the payments side. In the light of these considerations, he thought that the idea of a transitional period for countries going convertible was useful and should be longer rather than shorter. While he agreed that approval for restrictions under Article VIII should be temporary, he believed the Fund should hesitate to prescribe a fixed time limit which, he thought, would encourage speculation. As regards countries continuing under Article XIV, he would agree to the Fund exerting a little objective pressure in the direction of having restrictions removed in the new circumstances created by the convertibility of currencies.

The Position of France

De Largentaye, the French representative, took no important part in the debate. The French position on the general issues is, however, well known. Broadly speaking, the French give lip service to the objective of multilateralism but believe in practice that discrimination and regionalism should be the rule until the conditions are such that multilateralism is a practical objective. De Largentaye's main point in the debate was that the Fund does not have the legal right to terminate the postwar transitional period and Article XIV. In this, he had the support of the Belgian, and apparently the Italian, Executive Directors. Neither the U.K. nor the U.S. Director is convinced that the legal obstacles to termination of Article XIV cannot be overcome. However, even if this turns out to be the case, and the Board agrees to a legal opinion to this effect, Southard believes that the substance of the ending of the transitional period can be accomplished. For example, the Fund could issue a policy declaration that within a certain period countries should accept the obligations of Article VIII; if certain of them were not prepared in practice to respond, the Fund could use the formal "representation" procedure provided for in Article XIV, Section 4.

POLICY TO BE FOLLOWED IN APPROVING RESTRICTIONS UNDER ARTICLE XIV

The lead in this discussion was taken by the Canadian representative, because the question is critical to the future effectiveness of the Fund in dealing with restrictions, because it is a matter on which clarification is necessary at a time when countries are considering moving to Article VIII, and because in earlier Fund discussions doubt had been expressed in some quarters about the extent to which the balance of payments criterion should be the main standard against which the need to impose restrictions should be judged.

Article VIII indicates that prior Fund approval is required for the imposition of restrictions but does not indicate on what basis such approval would be given. Accordingly, reference must be made to the Fund's "Purposes" of which the most relevant is "to assist in the establishment of a multilateral system of payments in respect of current transactions between members and in the elimination of foreign exchange restrictions which hamper the growth of world trade."

Rasminsky suggested that restrictions on payments under Article VIII should only be approved if, after careful examination of all the circumstances, the Fund was satisfied that the restriction proposed was necessary to meet balance of payments problems which could not adequately be dealt with by measures consistent with the general purposes and policies of the Fund. This should be the general rule. However, he recognized that the Fund's authority to approve restrictions under VIII was not legally limited to restrictions arising from payments difficulties. Accordingly, he agreed that on a case-by-case basis the Fund would be prepared to look at applications to impose restrictions for non-payment reasons. Such cases were likely to be the exception rather than the rule, and it would be difficult to prescribe in advance the criterion against which such applications would be judged. Therefore, the Fund should not, at this stage, go beyond indicating that in examining requests for restrictions particular regard would be had to the payments position and prospects of the member.

Rasminsky recalled that some countries (Belgium and the Netherlands) had expressed fears that strict application of the balance of payments criterion under Article VIII would not give protection against the damage which might be done to the member's trade by discrimination against the member by inconvertible countries. In this connection, he noted that it would be unrealistic to expect that the pattern of trade established in conditions of inconvertibility would remain unchanged with the advent of more general convertibility. Thus some adjustments in countries' trade patterns should be expected. He believed that the policy he had outlined for the Fund would give such countries as much protection from the trade point of view as they could expect to see under an alternative system. All convertible countries who were in fact likely to be the main competitors in inconvertible markets would be under the same Article VIII régime. As for the inconvertible countries, the Fund would be taking a closer look at the justification for their discrimination and other restrictions in conditions of general convertibility. Thus, vis-à-vis both convertible and inconvertible countries there would be a reasonable degree of protection against discriminatory restrictions. The alternative proposed was to give convertible countries the right to discriminate vis-à-vis inconvertible countries. This right would inevitably have to be generalized and there would be no advance from the present position. The Fund could not authorize one member to impose restrictions etc. in order to obtain trade advantages without doing the same for all members.

Rasminsky emphasized that he was addressing himself to the substance of discriminatory restrictions and not to the form. Thus if a country wished to handle payments to and from another country in a particular way through its exchange control machinery, there would be no reason for the Fund to object provided there was no payments discrimination in substance. For example, a country might permit its citizens to make payments to another country without any formality whatsoever and require that permission should be obtained for payments to some other country. Provided such permissions were freely granted, there would be no restrictions in substance and the Fund should not object. It cannot be said that the Dutch and Belgian representatives were swayed by these arguments but Crena de Jongh did admit that the more countries which became convertible, the less would be the risk to the trade of any one of them through discrimination by an inconvertible country.

In the discussion, the Canadian view was supported by the German representative who advocated a collective approach to the problem of trading with inconvertible countries. Some difference of opinion between Canada on the one hand and the U.S. and the U.K. on the other became apparent. This divergence reflected the U.S. and U.K. desire to get rid of Article XIV, in due course, in contrast with the tentative Canadian view that countries should remain under Article XIV for so long as their restrictions were such that they could not properly be approved under Article VIII. In the discussion, Southard said he was not dismayed by the prospect that in the end countries with considerable restrictions would have to be admitted to the company of Article VIII, and cited as examples countries with multiple rates, de facto rates, and free markets, all of which had some restrictive effects. He noted that the Fund had already approved many restrictions under Article VIII and was likely to go on doing so. Keogh, for the U.K., spoke along the same lines, emphasizing that it would be unrealistic to expect that all countries could eliminate restrictions. It was not clear from these statements whether the U.S. and the U.K. would be prepared to give broad approvals for restrictions under Article VIII for non-payment reasons, or whether it was envisaged that such approvals would be given under a liberal interpretation of the balance of payments criterion.

Conclusions

The discussion of Article VIII and Article XIV questions revealed a considerable area of agreement between the U.S., Germany, Canada and a number of other countries on the timing of the movement of countries to Article VIII after the introduction of convertibility for their currencies. Some of the main points of agreement and disagreement may be summarized as follows:

(a) countries making their currencies convertible would not at that point of time be expected to have done away with all their restrictions and discrimination;

(b) countries making their currencies convertible should not be expected immediately to accept the obligations of Article VIII;

(c) such countries should, however, accept these obligations after a period of grace (six to eighteen months was mentioned) during which time they would be expected to get rid of their remaining restrictions and discrimination;

(d) it might not, in practice, prove possible for these countries to have eliminated the totality of their restrictions and discrimination by the end of the grace period. Provided however that the remaining restrictions had been reduced to the practicable minimum, most of the major countries believed that it would be appropriate for the residual restrictions to be approved under Article VIII. The Canadian view was that situations of this kind should be examined on their merits to see whether in fact the remaining restrictions could properly be justified and approved under Article VIII in the light of the payments position of the member concerned;

(e) there was a considerable measure of agreement that after a number of member countries had made their currencies convertible and accepted the obligations of Article VIII, there should be a further period of perhaps one year in which the remaining Article XIV countries would be expected, in consultation with the Fund, to reduce their restrictions to a minimum. A number of countries — the U.S., the U.K., Germany and the Netherlands — considered that at about that time all countries should be brought under Article VIII in order to avoid the continuation of two different kinds of Fund régime with respect to restrictions. It was left open as to how this should be accomplished, but two main possibilities were considered. First, the termination of the postwar transitional period if this was legally possible, and secondly, the increased use of the powers of persuasion of the Fund to induce countries to come under Article VIII, whether or not the postwar transitional period was formally terminated. The Fund staff, Canada, and a number of other countries, expressed doubt, for a variety of reasons, whether it would be desirable to proceed in this way. In general they preferred to continue Article XIV in being until the payments position of Article XIV countries was such that they could come under Article VIII without substantial restrictions while strengthening the administration of Article XIV.

After the meeting, Rasminsky indicated to Southard, the U.S. Director, that the Canadian position on the question of termination of Article XIV was still open and that he did not rule out the possibility of a universal move to Article VIII in due course.

(f) There was agreement that the prior approval requirement of Article VIII could be made to work in practice. Either countries would give the Fund sufficient notice to enable considered decisions on the imposition of restrictions to be taken or, more probably, the Fund's approval would only be given for a short temporary period during which time a more complete consultation could be organized, after which the temporary approval would be reviewed;

(g) there appeared to be pretty general agreement that, as a rule, the approval of restrictions for balance of payments reasons under Article VIII should be for a temporary period, and that the Fund would at intervals possibly of one year duration, consult with the member about the need to continue the restriction, including the question of whether the Fund's approval would be renewed.

POSSIBLE RELATIONSHIP BETWEEN THE FUND'S DECISION ON ARTICLE XIV AND ARTICLE VIII AND A STAND-BY FOR STERLING

In a private discussion after the meeting, the U.S. Executive Director indicated his satisfaction with the way the discussion had gone. He suggested that a formal Fund policy statement on the transition to Article VIII of countries making their currencies convertible might be of considerable assistance in connection with the arrangements which might have to be made between the Fund and the U.K. about the possible use of the Fund's resources to support the convertibility of sterling. If the Fund policy statement indicated that countries making their currencies convertible would be expected to come under Article VIII after a short prescribed period at the end of which discrimination would have been eliminated and other restrictions on their payments almost entirely eliminated, then the U.K. on going convertible might inform the Fund and indicate publicly that it accepted the procedure outlined in the policy statement. A technique of this kind might avoid the necessity of writing detailed quid pro about the nature of the convertibility which the U.K. would maintain into any stand-by agreement. Similar considerations might apply in case the U.K. decided not to conclude the stand-by and it was agreed to proceed instead by way of a fund policy declaration to the effect that countries going convertible could count on maximum support from the Fund, i.e. drawings up to 100% of quota.

Southard also indicated in this discussion that he was more attracted that he had previously been to the idea of leaving Article XIV in existence for the time being and deferring consideration of general action to terminate it until some experience with the effects of convertibility had been gained.

COUNTRIES TO ARTICLE VIII

Following for L. Rasminsky, Bank of Canada, from Warren, Begins: My immediately following message contains the text of the draft policy statement as revised after Friday's meeting with Harcourt and Southard. Changes other than those dealt with in this message are underlined. We did not attempt to clean up drafting at this stage.

2. The main alteration of our initial text is the insertion of alternative 1 for Section III, under which Article XIV would be terminated after post-convertibility interim period. This alternative is strongly preferred by Harcourt; and on balance by Southard, who seems satisfied legal difficulties can be overcome. Both appear to regard alternative 2 as second best, to be resorted to if Article XIV cannot be dispensed with; but question is still open.

3. It has been agreed that we should put the two alternatives on timing, and the suggested criteria for Article XIII [sic] approvals before our respective authorities as a matter of urgency. We hope to have a further informal meeting at the end of this week, in an effort to reach an agreed or nearly agreed position before the matter goes to the board on July 6th.

4. My guess is that the main question at our next meeting will be whether Canada can accept alternative 1 given agreement on the criteria to be applied under Article VIII. This appears to turn on whether we can expect the fund in fact to disapprove restrictions not consistent with the criteria. If we could be confident of this, then the matter of outstanding restrictions at the end of the interim period under alternative 1 would look much less large. Theoretically, at least, countries would have to come under Article VIII, but any remaining restrictions not consistent with the criteria would not be approved. It is probably unrealistic to expect the fund to be this strict when it comes down to cases, and some exceptions would no doubt be made. But if we had a firm understanding with the United States and the United Kingdom to support as strict as possible observance of the criteria then the exceptions might be kept to a real minimum.

5. You will notice that the paragraph on the criteria to be applied to under-developed countries under VIII has been strengthened by the addition of a sentence to the effect that so far as discriminatory restrictions are concerned these countries would be on an equal footing with the rest of the membership.

6. There is some confusion about the status of the last sentence of the final paragraph of alternative 2 concerning fund support for convertibility. Southard and I had understand that for purposes of our further discussions it should be deleted. However, Harcourt has put it back to London for consideration.

7. Harcourt and Keogh think that the introductory section 1 should be strengthened by the deletion of the second sentence concerning the attainment of the fund objectives, and the substitution of something along the following lines:

“Such a development would mean that virtually all international trading transactions would be conducted on the basis of convertible currencies. In conditions in which countries will receive convertible currencies for the bulk of their exports and will be obliged to pay convertible currencies for the bulk of their imports, the reasons for and the incentives to maintain discriminatory exchange restrictions will in the opinion of the fund substantially diminish and tend to disappear. Such a situation would raise ...”

8. It would be helpful to have your instructions by the close of business on Thursday, June 30. Ends.

INTERNATIONAL MONETARY FUND — TRANSITION OF ARTICLE XIV
COUNTRIES TO ARTICLE VIII

Following for L. Rasminsky, Bank of Canada, from Warren, Begins: Following is text of the draft policy statement as revised in talks with Harcourt and Southard:

Quote. Draft policy statement on the transition of Article XIV countries to Article VIII.

I. A number of important countries, in addition to those members who have already accepted the obligations of Article VIII, intend to make their currencies legally convertible at an early date. Such a development would create conditions favourable for the attainment of the fund's objectives. It would raise the question of when countries taking this step should come under Article VIII and whether the remaining countries with inconvertible currencies should remain under the transitional arrangements provided by Article XIV or whether they also should accept the obligations of Article VIII and if the latter, under what conditions.

II. The approval of restrictions under Article VIII

In administering Article VIII the fund will examine the situation of each country individually and will take account of special circumstances present in each case. It will be guided in its decisions by certain general principles which are set out in the remainder of this section. In principle the fund will expect members coming under Article VIII to have eliminated all their discriminatory exchange restrictions. When the circumstances warrant the fund will approve the maintenance or introduction of non discriminatory exchange restrictions. However, except in special circumstances, the fund would approve such restrictions only when satisfied that they were necessary to overcome balance of payments difficulties which could not be dealt with satisfactorily or in reasonable time by alternative measures consistent with the purposes and other articles of the fund agreement, including appropriate use of the fund's resources.

The fund's approval of exchange restrictions under Article VIII would be given for specified periods (ordinarily one year?) and the fund would consult with the member concerned with respect to the justification for the continued maintenance of restrictions so approved.

In considering requests for the approval of restrictions in accordance with the principles set forth above the fund will take into account the special problems of countries with a low standard of living whose relatively less advanced economies are undergoing the process of development. However, in view of the considerations outlined especially in section I above, there would appear to be no more justification for discriminatory restrictions by these countries than by other countries.

Alternative 1

III. The timing of the movement of Article XIV countries to Article VIII

The fund would declare, in accordance with the considerations set forth in section I, that the circumstances and conditions comprising the postwar transitional period would be ended after a reasonable period following a general convertibility. This period would be agreed upon and might be 12 months. Thereafter Article XIV would be declared to be without effect, and all countries would be transferred fully to Article VIII in accordance with the principles set forth in II.

During the interim period the fund would consult with all Article XIV members concerning the level of their restrictions, the ways in which the fund could facilitate their removal, and the extent of any restrictions which at the end of the period the fund might be willing to approve under Article VIII.

*Alternative 2III. The timing of the movement of Article XIV countries to Article VIII

Article XIV countries making their currencies legally convertible (for residents and non-residents, or for non-residents only) will accept the obligations of Article VIII after a specified interim period (for example 12 months) in which they will eliminate all exchange restrictions of a discriminatory character, and all non-discriminatory exchange restrictions which could not be approved by the fund under Article VIII in accordance with section II above.

Countries not making their currencies legally convertible at the time when the United Kingdom and other important trading countries do so would also assume the obligations of Article VIII by the end of the interim period referred to in the preceding paragraph. These countries should also have eliminated their exchange discrimination and reduced their non-discriminatory restrictions to the practicable minimum. In this connection it is recognized that consistent with the criteria stated in Section II the fund will be prepared to give its approval under Article VIII to a residue of non-discriminatory restrictions.

In cases where Article XIV members have not eliminated discrimination and reduced their non-discriminatory restrictions to the extent that the remainder could properly be approved under Article VIII, the fund would consider whether the members position was such as to warrant a "representation" under Article XIV, section 4, that conditions were favourable for the withdrawal of the restrictions which the fund was not prepared to approve under VIII. Alternatively, and if in the fund's judgement such an exception seemed necessary, an extension of the interim period could be given in which the member could be expected to complete the process of eliminating such restrictions.

During the interim period the fund would consult with all Article XIV members concerning the level of their restrictions, the ways in which the fund could facilitate their removal, and the extent of any restrictions which at the end of the period the fund might be willing to approve under Article VIII. (Article XIV countries requesting access to the fund's resources in support of a move to general convertibility could expect a favourable response from the fund on certification to the fund that they intend to move to Article VIII in accordance with this section.) Unquote.

INTERNATIONAL MONETARY FUND
TRANSITION FROM ARTICLE XIV TO ARTICLE VIII

Warren and I took part in discussions with the U.S. and U.K. directors and alternates in Washington on June 23rd.

The British remain anxious to force a general move from XIV to VIII and the Americans also lean increasingly in that direction. The British feel that it will be easier to "get at" countries under VIII, and that the Belgians and Dutch will remain under XIV and play games if given the opportunity. The U.S. seem to be receiving more and more complaints about discrimination and are finding it increasingly difficult to explain the persistence of the transitional period arrangements in the Fund.

The talk centred largely around the criteria the Fund could apply in administering VIII. It is apparent that if a large number of countries were to be brought under VIII, many restrictions will have to be authorized but the thought was developed that the damage would be minimized if the Fund was lenient with underdeveloped countries but tough with others. It was agreed that after convertibility of the major currencies the Fund should not authorize currency discrimination under VIII.

It was decided to try to reach agreement among the three countries before taking the matter to the Board on July 6. Warren and I prepared a draft policy statement which was submitted to the others on June 24. Telegrams 1055 and 1056 of June 27 give the text of the statement as it emerged from discussion with the U.S. and U.K.

It is apparent that the main question is whether there should be a formal termination of Article XIV as proposed by the British in Alternative 1 of Section II, or whether we should seek to get the great majority of countries under Article VIII, while leaving XIV in existence for really bad cases, as we proposed in Alternative 2.

After discussion with Plumptre, Ritchie and Isbister, I phoned Warren along the following lines:

1. We very much prefer Alternative 2 and would in fact not find it possible to support 1, though we can have no objection if the U.K. and U.S. decide to put it forward.

2. Without going over the whole ground again, our reasons for not supporting Alternative 1 are these:

(a) We strongly doubt whether it will in fact be possible to apply the criteria of Section II if countries are brought under VIII by force rather than by persuasion. We believe that as a practical matter the Fund will have to agree to restrictions which cannot be justified on balance of payments grounds or other grounds which commend themselves to us, and this will compromise the administration of Article VIII for the future.

(b) We have misgivings about the propriety of the Fund making formal representations under XIV and then positively approving the same restrictions, even for a limited period, under VIII. (The Americans have this method of ending the transitional period in mind.) This may get round the legal difficulty of terminating XIV, but it makes the Fund look foolish.

(c) We doubt that a majority of the members of the Board would willingly agree to Alternative 1, and in a matter of this kind where there is reason for difference in judgment as to what course the Fund should pursue and where there is some question as to the legal powers of the Fund, we think it would be unfortunate to take a decision which was not supported by the majority of heads.

3. Perhaps we could go some way to meet the British (and U.S.) view by something along these lines:

“Within 12 months after the time when countries responsible for 50 per cent or more of the foreign trade conducted by members of the Fund in 1954 have assumed the obligations of Article VIII, the Fund will give consideration to terminating the transitional arrangements provided by Article XIV.

4. Drafting Points:

(a) Harcourt's proposal for introductory section is acceptable.

(b) “ordinarily one year”—better not say this as we may wish to give shorter approvals to provide time for GATT consultations.

(c) added sentence on discrimination at end of II is acceptable.

(d) first sentence of second paragraph of Alternative 2 is not quite accurate as the interim period may be extended under the following paragraph.

INTERNATIONAL MONETARY FUND — TRANSITION OF ARTICLE XIV
COUNTRIES TO ARTICLE VIII

Following for L. Rasminsky, Bank of Canada, from J.H. Warren, Begins: The instructions which have been received from London confirm the advance indications of United Kingdom views provided by Keogh and Harcourt. The United Kingdom intends to accept the obligations of Article VIII after an interim period (twelve months) following the introduction of legal convertibility for sterling. The hope is that other countries, convertible and inconvertible alike, would also be prepared to come under VIII at that time. Indeed the United Kingdom would support the termination of the Article XIV transitional period at the end of the interim period if this could be unanimously agreed by the board. Failing unanimity or overwhelming support for termination, United Kingdom views on timing seem very much like our own, although a good deal less precise. They seem to envisage other countries coming under VIII on their own initiative and in their own time within reasonable limits. Thereafter the "representation" procedure of Article XIV might be directed at laggards and finally if such countries failed to respond, the question of terminating the post-war transitional period would arise. All this represents a reversal of position previously taken here by United Kingdom representatives that United Kingdom must move to VIII in company and the best way to achieve this would be to obtain a decision on termination of XIV, even if over opposition.

The most disturbing feature of the United Kingdom position is the apparent willingness to see the fund approve an undefined level of restrictions under Article VIII, including discriminatory restrictions where a country has no other reasonable course of action. Southard and I have left Harcourt in no doubt about how seriously we regard this development and London has been asked to reconsider the matter and explain what is intended. Since United Kingdom instructions are believed to have been cleared with ministers, there is a danger that their position on discrimination may already be frozen.

From here it is a little difficult to understand what lies behind the apparent reversal of the United Kingdom attitude on discrimination and Harcourt is unable to shed much light on the subject. General scarcity of a particular currency is a matter to be determined initially under Article VII, Section 1, and conceivably a next step might be the approval of discriminatory restrictions for certain countries under VIII. Harcourt and Keogh both mentioned "hardcore" restrictions and mistakenly seemed to believe that under the GATT they could be discriminatory. So far as sterling area discrimination is concerned, Harcourt has told us that at the end of the interim period the United Kingdom will not be asking ISA countries to discriminate in favour of the United Kingdom. The situation is thus particularly confused and we must await further clarification from London.

I suspect that in addition to whatever their own interests may be, United Kingdom views on this issue are not unrelated to their desire to bring the Europeans along with them. Whitehall officials apparently consider that our draft policy statement is much too precise and rigid and would frighten members from accepting the obligations of VIII. For this reason, inter alia, they would prefer a much more general and looser decision. Incidentally, United Kingdom authorities seem to believe that their views on what might be approved under VIII, including discriminatory restrictions, correspond to statements made by Overby when he was in Europe. I gather also that the London people were shocked by Southard's proposal that the fund should insist on non-discrimination after the interim period, whether a country was under Article VIII or Article XIV. At the moment the gulf between the United Kingdom position on discrimination and the development of our thinking here appears to be very large indeed.

Southard and I have had some further talks about tactics at the meeting on the 20th. He has not given up hope of reaching something like a tentatively agreed draft decision before the annual meeting. This appears also to be the United Kingdom's desire. Southard suggests that at the beginning of the debate he and Harcourt should argue very strongly for the termination of Article XIV after the interim period. He assumes that thereafter a number of other directors would speak in opposition to this on legal and other grounds. He hopes that we would then intervene and outline our ideas on how Article VIII should be administered and how the transition to VIII should be brought about. If our views seem to represent something like middle ground, Southard wonders whether you would be prepared, on a personal basis and without committing the Canadian authorities, to circulate, at that stage, a draft policy statement for consideration. This being done, it might be agreed to hold a further meeting on Friday, 22nd, to see if broad agreement could not be reached on language which might be sent back to governments for further study with a view to informal discussion at Istanbul and possibly a formal board decision in October or November. I personally see some virtue in circulating a draft in order to focus the further discussion and to ensure that something moderately clear and coherent goes back to other governments.

In my immediately following telegram, you will find a revised version of our draft statement which reflects the latest discussions here with Southard and others and which is designed to go as far as possible to meet the United States position without compromising our own. The draft is for your consideration. Southard says that if you felt able to produce this draft or something very like it at the end of the meeting on the 20th, he would be able to welcome it and accept it as a working basis for further discussions. Perhaps you will wish to discuss some of the points in this new draft with me on the telephone. Ends.

COUNTRIES TO ARTICLE VIII

Following for L. Rasminsky, Bank of Canada, from J.H. Warren, Begins: Following is a revised text of our draft policy statement, Begins:

1. A number of important trading countries whose currencies are not yet fully convertible are expected to introduce legal convertibility at an early date. Such a development would mean that virtually all international payments would be effected in convertible currencies. In conditions in which countries will receive convertible currencies for the bulk of their exports and services and will pay convertible currencies for the bulk of their imports and other external expenditures, the reasons for and the incentive to maintain discriminatory exchange restrictions for payments reasons will diminish and disappear.

The introduction of more general convertibility would raise the question of when and under what conditions Article XIV countries, including those whose currencies remain inconvertible as well as those whose currencies are made legally convertible, should assume the obligations of Article VIII of the Fund's articles of agreements.

II. The Fund's policy on the approval of restrictions under Article VIII.

In administering Article VIII, so far as the approval of restrictions is concerned, the Fund will carefully examine the situation of each country wishing to introduce or intensify restrictions and will take into account of the special circumstances present in each case. It will be guided in its decisions by certain general principles as follows:

(a) Except in conditions of general scarcity of a particular currency as determined under Article VII, Section I, the Fund would not be disposed to approve discriminatory exchange restrictions for payments reasons under Article VIII. Members assuming the obligations of Article VIII should have eliminated all such discriminatory payments restrictions.

(b) When the circumstances warrant, the Fund will approve the maintenance or introduction of non-discriminatory exchange restrictions by a member. However, except in special circumstances, the Fund would approve such restrictions only when satisfied that they were necessary to overcome balance of payments difficulties which could not be dealt with satisfactorily, or in reasonable time, by alternative measures consistent with the purposes and other articles of agreement, including appropriate use of the Fund's resources.

(c) In considering requests for the approval of restrictions under Article VIII, in accordance with the principles set forth in (a) and (b) above, the Fund will take into account the special problems of countries with a low standard of living, whose relatively less developed economies are undergoing the process of development. However, in view of the considerations outlined in Section I, the Fund would be no more disposed to approve the introduction of discriminatory restrictions by these countries than by other Fund members.

(d) The Fund's approval of exchange restrictions would be given for specified temporary periods and the Fund would periodically consult with the member concerned (not less frequently than once a year) with respect to the justification for the continued maintenance of restrictions so approved.

III. Consultations with the GATT concerning import restrictions.

When consulted by the contracting parties to the GATT with respect to the justification for import restrictions maintained or proposed for balance of payments reasons by a GATT member which has accepted the obligations of Article VIII of the Fund agreement, the Fund's findings will be consistent with the general principles set forth in (a), (b) and (c) above, for the approval of exchange restrictions.

IV. The timing of the movement of Article XIV countries to Article VIII.

Subject to the following paragraphs, all Article XIV countries will accept the obligations of Article VIII after a specified interim period (for example twelve months) following the introduction of legal convertibility by the United Kingdom and such other countries as make their currencies convertible at that time. During this interim period, Article XIV countries will eliminate all their exchange restrictions which could not be approved by the Fund under Article VIII, in accordance with Section II above.

During the interim period, and until all members have assumed the obligations of Article VIII in accordance with this section, the Fund will consult with each Article XIV member concerning the elimination of its discriminatory restrictions, the reduction of its other exchange restrictions to a level consistent with their being approved under Article VIII, and the assumption by such countries of the obligations of Article VIII.

In cases where Article XIV members have not reduced their restrictions to the extent that the remainder could properly be approved under Article VIII at the end of the interim period, the Fund would consider whether the member's position was such as to warrant a "representation" under Article XIV, Section 4, that conditions were favourable for the withdrawal of the restrictions which the Fund was not prepared to approve under VIII. Alternatively, and if in the Fund's judgment such an exception seemed necessary, a brief extension of the interim period might be given in which the member would be expected to complete the process of eliminating such restrictions and come under Article VIII.

In any event, within twelve months after the time when countries responsible for 50 percent of foreign trade conducted by members of the Fund in 1954 have assumed the obligations of Article VIII, the Fund will give consideration to terminating the transitional arrangements provided for by Article XIV.

In view of the circumstances outlined in Section I above, the Fund, as a matter of policy, would expect all members, whether or not still remaining under Article XIV, to have eliminated all discriminatory exchange restrictions maintained for payments reasons by end of the interim period.

INTERNATIONAL MONETARY FUND — TRANSITION FROM ARTICLE XIV
TO ARTICLE VIII

The following for L. Rasminsky, Bank of Canada, from J.H. Warren, Begins: Harcourt called Southard and me to his office this morning to explain further the United Kingdom position with respect to the possibility of approval being given for discriminatory restrictions under Article VIII.

The United Kingdom agrees that there would be no balance of payments justification for discrimination by convertible countries after the interim period. The United Kingdom itself intends to abandon its discrimination by that time. However, the United Kingdom considers that some countries (notably France which has nil liberalization vis-à-vis the dollar area) may not have been able to eliminate their discrimination in so short a period and will argue payments reasons for their remaining discriminatory restrictions. In the circumstances it is considered that the fund's decision should not preclude the possibility of approving discriminatory restrictions for payments reasons under Article VIII.

The position of France and the desire not to leave France behind appears to be very important in United Kingdom thinking. In the United Kingdom view, it would be virtually impossible, for political and administrative reasons, for France to rid itself of discrimination in twelve months, after legal convertibility. They believe that if France is to take part in the forward movement and is not to fall back into strictly bilateral trade and payments arrangements, the international framework must be such as to accommodate the French and to permit them to progress slowly under international surveillance. Accordingly, the United Kingdom believes that the régime under VIII should be neither "rigid" nor "doctrinaire" and that the fund's decision should reflect a flexible attitude and should be of a nature to be passed in the board without a vote. My immediately following telegram contains the text of a decision which would be acceptable to the United Kingdom. Harcourt is asking Southard not to feed this text into the administration for the time being. In the next three or four days we are to try and work out an acceptable compromise. You will note that the United Kingdom draft maintains the idea of a universal transition to Article VIII after the interim period. This is the United Kingdom's opening position, but Harcourt's instructions are such as to allow him to abandon this in favour of something along the lines of our own proposal on timing.

So far as United Kingdom discrimination is concerned, the hope is to have entirely eliminated all discriminatory restrictions by the end of the interim period. However, no guarantee to this effect can be given at present and there is a possibility that for protective reasons some import discrimination would continue to be necessary. Apparently there are a few items where the major competition will come from dollar sources and in connection with which non-discriminatory quotas would involve going back on United Kingdom's liberalization vis-à-vis non-dollar countries. As presently advised, United Kingdom officials tend to the view that any such discrimination for protective reasons would not be the affair of the Fund but could be approved under the GATT (presumably under some waiver provision).

INTERNATIONAL MONETARY FUND — TRANSITION FROM ARTICLE XIV
TO ARTICLE VIII

The developments in the U.K. position reported in your telegrams have been very disappointing to us.

2. As you know, there has been a difference of opinion between the British and the Americans on the one hand and ourselves on the other regarding the desirability of forcing Article XIV countries which were not making their currencies legally convertible to assume the obligations of Article VIII. The British and Americans were anxious to bring Article XIV to an end by Fund decision, while we were afraid that in order to do so it would be necessary for the Fund to give its consent under Article VIII to a degree of restriction and discrimination which, for a good many countries, would go beyond what could be justified on balance of payments grounds. We were afraid that if the Fund started approving restrictions under Article VIII on this basis it would weaken its position for the future, and that it was therefore preferable not to put pressure on countries to accept the obligations of Article VIII unless they were in fact able and willing, within a reasonable time, to virtually do away with discriminatory exchange restrictions and reduce others to minimal proportions which could be objectively justified on balance of payments grounds. The Fund would apply pressure to the countries remaining under Article XIV to reduce restrictions and eventually come under Article VIII. We recognized that under Article VIII the Fund would have to be relatively lenient in authorizing restrictions for under-developed countries.

3. In the past few weeks our representatives in the Fund have been trying to work out with the British and American representatives a statement of policy which would indicate the criteria the Fund would apply in administering Article VIII and which would indicate how the transition from Article XIV could take place. It seemed that real progress was being made at this level and a draft policy statement was under active discussion which, despite its compromises and generalities, was nevertheless, in our view, neither doctrinaire nor unrealistic.

4. However, in the past week or so both the Americans and the British shifted their positions, probably in consequence of consideration of the problem at the ministerial level. The Americans, who had previously had as their main objective the formal termination of the "transitional period" and who, in order to accomplish this, were prepared to have the Fund under Article VIII, approve for many countries the present state of affairs, suddenly decided that the really important thing was for the Fund to declare boldly that, when a brief interval had elapsed after the major currencies had become convertible, the Fund would neither approve discrimination under Article VIII nor acquiesce in it under Article XIV. On the other hand, the British, who had previously argued that it was of vital importance to them to terminate Article XIV because sterling must, after convertibility, be protected against discrimination, and that it was essential to get the Belgians, Dutch, etc., away from Article XIV where they could play tricks and into Article VIII where the Fund could "get at" them, have now suddenly reversed the field and want the Fund to make an explicit statement encouraging countries to expect the Fund to authorize discrimination under Article VIII.

5. Taken in conjunction with the most recent developments in Paris regarding trade rules, etc. we find the latest British move discouraging and fear that it reflects a revival of regionalist thinking.<sup>175</sup> Admittedly, our representatives in the Fund have been told by Harcourt of the British view that there will be no balance of payments justification for discrimination by convertible countries after an interim period of say one year following convertibility, and that the United Kingdom hopes to have eliminated all discriminatory restrictions by the end of this interim period; but we are puzzled to find no reflection of this in the statement Rowan gave you, and have said so to Harcourt. Moreover, Harcourt has also told us and the Americans that the U.K. will expect the Independent Sterling Area to have abolished discrimination in its favour by the end of the interim period; on the other hand, he has also said that the U.K. may wish to maintain discriminatory import restrictions for protective (rather than balance-of-payments) reasons after the interim period and that this will be a matter for GATT rather than the Fund. We have not as yet examined in detail the implications of this, but it is obvious that they are disturbing.

6. In the circumstances it is clear that there is no point in pursuing the search referred to in paragraph 3 for an articulated statement of how the Fund proposes to administer Article VIII. Our immediate objective is to prevent the Fund from taking a decision which compromises the future by actually encouraging countries to look to it for approval of discrimination in circumstances in which approval is unwarranted. We and the Americans have been working on a draft decision given us by Harcourt and have suggested certain modification. We would like you to tell Rowan that we hope that the British will give serious consideration to the changes we have suggested. In essence they are directed towards eliminating the compromising references to possible Fund approval of discrimination under Article VIII and to strengthening the references to the relationship between convertibility and non-discrimination. If the British accept our suggestions on the terms of the decision we very much hope that their statement in the Board will not go beyond them.

7. If the British are unable to accept our suggestions then we think it would be better not to have the Board take any decision at all at this time. Our representatives would have to oppose the draft Harcourt has shown them, and we think it would be unfortunate to have a split with the British on this important issue. But we do not think the Fund should compromise its ability to deal with discrimination in the future for the sake of a short-run advantage, which may in any case be illusory, in dealing with the French.

8. We realize that you have not been too close to the technical problems involved in the move from Article VIII to Article XIV but would very much welcome any comments you and Wilgress have to make on the general issues involved.

Extract from Report on Tenth Annual Meeting of the Board of Governors of the International Monetary Fund and the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development

CONFIDENTIAL

[Ottawa, n.d.]

The Tenth Annual Meeting of the International Monetary Fund and the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development was held in Istanbul, Turkey, from September 12 to September 16, 1955. The Hon. W.E. Harris, the Canadian Governor of the Fund and of the Bank, and Mr. J.E. Coyne, Alternate Governor of the Fund, were unable to attend and the Canadian delegation consisted of Mr. Louis Rasminsky, Acting Alternate Governor of the Fund, Mr. A.F.W. Plumpton, Alternate Governor of the Bank, Mr. J.H. Warren, Alternate Executive Director for Canada of the Fund and of the Bank, Mr. Ross Campbell, Canadian Embassy, Turkey, and Mr. D.J.R. Humphreys, Bank of Canada.

The business to be transacted by the Governors of the Fund and the Bank at their Annual Meetings is usually of a formal nature. The debates on the two Annual Reports provide an opportunity for Governors to make general statements about the operations and policies of the two institutions and about the international economic position, but this year little advantage was taken of this opportunity. The debate on the Fund Report produced little that was controversial. In the debate on the Bank's Annual Report there was the usual pressure from the underdeveloped countries for more liberal, more flexible, and less expensive Bank lending, but the tone was, on the whole, quite restrained.

The highlights of the debates are summarized in the following paragraphs; notes are also included on the disposition of routine agenda items.

General Debate on the Fund's Annual Report

(a) The movement towards freer payments and convertibility

In his opening address Mr. Rooth, the Managing Director, reviewed the extent to which postwar economic recovery had been completed and progress had been made in reducing restrictions and discrimination in the payments fields. While recognizing that U.S. aid and military expenditures were still an important element in the situation, he emphasized that international trade was steadily approaching a more satisfactory pattern and that the conditions necessitating the Fund's postwar transitional arrangements were passing away. In this connection he noted that the payments difficulties still being faced by a number of countries, including those arising from internal inflation, unusual fluctuations in the prices of agricultural products, or uncertainties arising from attempts to dispose of agricultural surpluses in world markets, were ordinary problems of a dynamic world economy and not transitional problems arising from wartime dislocations. Rooth urged the adoption of fiscal and monetary policies designed to avoid inflation as an indispensable element in a strong balance of payments and welcomed the adoption by many countries of a flexible monetary policy. In an oblique reference to the position of the United Kingdom and certain other countries he added that in some situations stronger fiscal measures would also be required. As regards convertibility the Managing Director noted that economic conditions, financial policy and international cooperation were moving the world steadily forward to a multilateral system of payments based on the convertibility of currencies and that while some governments were still preparing to make their currencies convertible, international markets were already giving a practical recognition to their de facto convertibility.

It was noticeable that while many of the subsequent speakers referred to the general improvement in international payments and to the desirability of further progress being made towards the multilateral objective, there was little or no sense of urgency in what was said. It seemed to be generally agreed that this time the convertibility of currencies was really coming, even though it might not be imminent. In the meantime the Governors seemed fairly content with the status quo and to allow the key countries, notably the United Kingdom, to make their own decisions regarding timing, without outside pressure. Significantly, the European Governors, many of whom had been pressing in earlier meetings for more rapid progress and for a clear definition of the Fund's attitude towards restrictions and discrimination in circumstances of convertibility, were silent in this year's debate, (perhaps because they preferred to discuss their problems and make some of their arrangements within the narrower European regional framework). Even the German Governor was silent, although in the debate on the Bank's Report Dr. Erhard did take issue with those who argued that the present boom conditions are not suitable for the transition to convertibility. Only the Chancellor of the Exchequer referred extensively to problems surrounding the introduction of convertibility and his statement was mainly directed to the more immediate position of sterling. Randolph Burgess, who spoke for the United States, was highly circumspect in his remarks about the relationship between the improved international payments situation and the further dismantling of restrictions and discrimination. Referring to the outflow of gold from his country and the consequent redistribution of international reserves, Mr. Burgess said "these gains and reserves will not serve their purpose if they do not lead the accumulating countries to expand their trade by reducing restrictions, particularly discriminatory restrictions".

Mr. Butler, in one of the few substantial contributions to the debate, outlined the measures being taken in the credit field to contain inflation in the United Kingdom. He said that if necessary other steps would be taken to bring the situation under control and that in this connection the whole field of public expenditure was being examined. The Chancellor emphasized that physical controls would not be resorted to and that there would be no retreat from the United Kingdom's policy of widening trade and freeing payments. On the other hand, he said that the present was a period for consolidation and strengthening of the home front before further forward movements could be made in the field of trade and exchange. Referring to the oft-stated preconditions for successful convertibility, Mr. Butler mentioned the shortcomings of United States policies as measured by what might be expected of a good creditor. Nevertheless, he said he recognized that the perfect moment never comes and assured his fellow Governors that in deciding when to go forward he would not forget Churchill's comment that "... while the historian may easily mark what would have been the best possible moment for any great undertaking, the good moment must content the administrator".

One of the major purposes of Mr. Butler's speech was to quash rumors which had been circulating about a possible devaluation of sterling or widening of the spreads within which sterling is traded, and so to bring to an end the heavy bear speculation then current against the pound. He emphasized that it was, and would continue to be, United Kingdom policy to maintain the exchange parity of $2.80 to the pound either in existing circumstances or when sterling is convertible. He said "my Government has taken no decision on the timing of the convertibility of sterling nor on the nature of the exchange arrangements after that date ... discussions and rumors about impending changes of the parity of, or margins for sterling, are unrealistic and irrelevant".

A number of spokesmen from the underdeveloped countries noted that their countries had not fully shared the improvement in world economic conditions and called attention to the special problems associated with their development and the marketing of their exports of agricultural commodities. Sir Arthur Fadden, the Australian Minister of Finance, noted that the treatment of manufactured goods had to a considerable extent become regulated by agreed international rules but that primary producing countries remained largely defenceless against the heavy price fluctuations to which their exports were subject. He criticized the subsidies, quota restrictions, and bilateral trade deals indulged in by many industrial countries in the primary product field. Sir Arthur did not repeat the criticism he has made on other occasions of United States policies giving rise to surplus accumulation of farm products and problems of disposal, but contented himself with the remark that the situation was now worse than last year, despite the efforts made to cope with it by the United States Administration. He picked as the special target for his speech this year the excessive agricultural protection of European countries.

(b) The ending of the postwar transitional period — Article VIII and Article XIV

The Executive Board of the Fund has for some time been discussing the possible termination of Article XIV after the introduction of more general convertibility, and the relative merits of a universal as opposed to a country by country movement from Article XIV to Article VIII. A considerable divergence of opinion had emerged in this debate between the United States and Canada on the one hand and the United Kingdom and the European countries on the other, about the administration of Article VIII with respect to the approval of discriminatory restrictions. Very little was heard of these questions from the main trading countries in the debate on the Annual Report at the Governors meeting. It was felt by them unwise to pursue the discussion in Istanbul in view of the deadlock which has arisen, and unnecessary to do so since formal convertibility of sterling and other currencies was not imminent. The Chancellor of the Exchequer referring to these matters said it would be a mistake to under-estimate the intricacy of the problem or to try to reach rushed decisions. Mr. Burgess said it would be premature to anticipate the outcome of the Executive Board's examination but added "each passing year makes it more essential to arrive at a procedure to bring to an end the so-called postwar transitional period."

The tacit understanding of the major countries not for the time being to fish in the troubled waters of Article VIII and Article XIV did not extend to a number of the underdeveloped countries. The Governors for India, Pakistan, Egypt, Thailand, and Ceylon took the occasion to argue that even after the industrial countries had made their currencies convertible, exchange restrictions would in many cases continue to be necessary for their countries in order to insure that available foreign exchange resources were safeguarded for development purposes. The Governor for Thailand pointed out that in a country such as his own credit restrictions could not really be effective, fiscal measures took time to take effect, and restrictions on trade and exchange were therefore necessary to safeguard the payments position. A number of the spokesmen of the underdeveloped countries drew attention to the fact that the special position of their countries had been recognized in the review of GATT. The implication of their remarks was that so far as the right to impose or maintain exchange restrictions was concerned, the Fund should also be prepared to recognize their position either by allowing them to continue under Article XIV or through the flexible administration of Article VIII.

In connection with the Minister's remarks this morning regarding the status of the mutual aid item in the estimates of the Department of National Defence, I have now spoken with Mr. Elgin Armstrong, the Assistant Deputy Minister in charge of finance in D.N.D.

2. Mr. Armstrong confirms that the allowance for mutual aid in the present Defence estimates is some $100 million below the figure for last year. He also confirms that this figure has been agreed between Mr. Campney and Mr. Harris and that the estimates containing this figure are on the verge of, or in the process of, being printed.

3. According to Mr. Armstrong, D.N.D. has prepared a paper on the Mutual Aid Programme for consideration by the next Cabinet Defence Committee and he expects that copies of this paper will be available later today or tomorrow morning. He realizes that it is a little anomalous to have this matter discussed in the Cabinet Defence Committee at the same time as a more or less final figure is apparently being included in the printed estimates. He assumes that Cabinet Defence Committee will, however, be more concerned about the composition of the programme than about the total.

4. I told Mr. Armstrong that our Minister was disturbed that agreement had evidently been reached regarding the size of the programme without inter-departmental consultation — or at least without consultation involving this Department. He recognized that this was regrettable but observed that the figure for the programme became almost inevitable when a ceiling was set for total defence expenditures. He did not suggest that informal conversations which had taken place previously with officers of this Department constituted "consultation". He remarked that formal consultation, particularly at the ministerial level, had been made a little difficult by the fact that the Ministers concerned had not been in Ottawa at the same time very frequently. The proposed Cabinet Defence Committee meeting was being arranged at about the earliest date feasible.

5. In the circumstances, you may wish to suggest to Mr. Drury, or Mr. Taylor in Finance, that the final printing of the part of the estimates containing this figure should at least be deferred until after the Cabinet Defence Committee meets.

6. In connection with any conversation which you may have with the Minister on this situation you may wish to have in mind the two memoranda flagged on the attached file.

7. The first of these is dated October 25 and contains information given to me by Mr. Armstrong at that time about the current thinking in National Defence.<sup>1</sup> It will be noted from paragraph 5 of that memorandum that I had warned Mr. Armstrong that "no doubt anything which Mr. Pearson might have said regarding a possible reduction in mutual aid was related to the likelihood of increase in certain other expenditures of interest to this Department such as our contribution under the Colombo Plan". The second memorandum, dated December 8, passed on to the Minister certain information which had been given to us informally at a meeting of the Sub-Panel (when, incidentally, we had made it quite clear that we did not regard this informal notice as constituting "consultation" and had added that we believed Mr. Pearson had told Mr. Harris only a few days before of his dissatisfaction with a reduction of anything like $100 million in the Mutual Aid Programme).<sup>2</sup> In that memorandum we explained some of the difficulties standing in the way of a substantial increase in the programme and indicated the possibility that the programme might be reduced still further if the F-86's were to be withdrawn. We concluded that "since the programme will need to be settled shortly, (the Minister) may wish to discuss it with Mr. Harris and Mr. Campney before the NATO Delegation leaves for Paris; and with Mr. Howe after arrival in Paris".

A.E. RITCHIE

P.S. The Department of National Defence estimates including the figure for mutual aid have been approved by the Treasury Board as a whole as well as by Mr. Campney and Mr. Harris.

CANADIAN MUTUAL AID PROGRAMME 1955-56

You will, I think, be interested in looking over the attached Memorandum to Cabinet Defence Committee which was sent to us by officials of the Department of National Defence and which, I understand, is to be considered at an early meeting of the Committee.

The Memorandum seeks Cabinet approval of a Mutual Aid Programme for 1955-56 with an expenditure ceiling of $175 million. It is important to note, however, that of this amount only some $146 million has actually been programmed. Expenditure for mutual aid purposes of the remaining $28 million is by no means certain. If the Canadian Services find, during the current fiscal year, that they are able to transfer additional equipment on hand within this ceiling, they receive cash for service activities. This is the way this part of the programme has been administered in the past. However, under the proposal which will be before Cabinet Defence Committee, the Services will obtain the additional $28 million for additional Service expenditures whether or not they make available additional equipment for the Mutual Aid Programme. Thus from the Service standpoint, it might be better not to transfer as mutual aid any additional equipment.

Incidentally, it might be noted that the programme proposed for 1955-56 is inflated in still another way. This year's programme includes the $25 million representing the whole of our contribution for infrastructure and military budgets. In previous years, these expenditures have been met from the Mutual Aid Programme only to the extent that our assessment for these purposes was over the Canadian share on a capacity-to-pay basis.

You may be interested in the following comparison of the Programme approved last year and the Programme proposed for the fiscal year 1955-56:

CANADIAN MUTUAL AID PROGRAMME — 1955-56

1. The statement on Mutual Aid given by the Canadian Delegation at the recent Ministerial Meeting of the North Atlantic Council is attached as Appendix "A".<sup>3</sup>

2. The attached detailed programme† for 1955-56 totals $146,651,219. The sum of $28,348,781, for which there is no detail, has been added to give a total of $175,000,000 which has been included in the Estimates for the Department of National Defence. The programming of this additional $28,348,781 will depend on whether it is possible to release service equipment for Mutual Aid. The amount has been applied against Service cash estimates and it is, therefore, not available for additional direct production for Mutual Aid.

3. The whole of Canada's estimated contribution for Infrastructure, Military Budgets and that portion of NATO Civil budget over the Canadian share on a capacity to pay basis have been included as Mutual Aid. Heretofore only the amount considered to be in excess of a contribution based on capacity to pay has been charged to Mutual Aid, the balance to a separate portion of the National Defence appropriation.

4. The amount estimated for "direct production for Mutual Aid" consists of carry-over on approved items, with the exception of $3,454,000 provided to maintain minimum production of cannon powder, flashless cordite, composition "B" and rifle powder and $1,800,000 against a $3,300,000 programme for spare parts for overhaul of R1340 Wasp aero engines. This will provide spares needed for second and final overhaul period for Wasp engines which have been given by Canada as Mutual Aid and provides further support to this manufacturing facility pending the development of additional commercial business and the R1820 engine programme for the Grumman Naval Aircraft.

5. The new items of equipment acquired since March 31, 1950, planned for transfer by the Services in next year's programme are:

(a) 80,000 90 mm shells

(b) 45 Sabre II aircraft and 35 J 47 engines

(c) 25 T 34 aircraft with one year's spares

(d) Second year spares for Sabre II aircraft transferred to Greece and Turkey, plus commitment for third year spares.

6. The 90 mm shells will be provided from present orders of the Canadian Army and no replacement is required. The Sabre II aircraft and the J 47 engines will complete the transfer of all Sabre II aircraft and J 47 engines held by the RCAF. Provision has been made to replace these with Sabre V and VI aircraft equipped with Orenda engines. The T 34 aircraft comprise aircraft procured by the RCAF to support the production facilities in Canada for these aircraft and to provide a small number of aircraft to the RCAF for experimental two stage training. It has been decided not to adopt this type of aircraft for RCAF training but to procure Chipmunk, a less expensive and more satisfactory aircraft for this purpose.

7. As there is considerable advantage in obtaining recommendations on allocations of equipment from the Standing Group early in the fiscal year, it is recommended that new offerings of Canadian Mutual Aid should be made at the earliest date possible, and that the programme for 1955-56 be approved on the basis referred to above and detailed in the attached appendices.

Ottawa, January 18, 1955

My dear Colleague,

CANADIAN MUTUAL AID PROGRAMME — 1955-56

In advance of any discussion in the Cabinet Defence Committee, I feel that I should let you have my reactions to the paper of January 6 which you have circulated on this subject.

I am seriously concerned at several aspects of that paper, and I would hope that you might find yourself able to re-consider it in the light of my observations below.

Before commenting on the substance of the paper, I should say how regrettable I think it is that planning for 1955-56 in respect of a matter which has such an important bearing on our international relations should have reached the stage which it apparently has before the matter had been considered further by all Ministers concerned following on the general discussion in Cabinet Defence Committee on November 12.<sup>4</sup> You will recall that, in the course of that earlier discussion, the point was made (and was recorded in the minutes) that, in addition to the military and other criteria which you had suggested at that time, there was an added criterion of a political nature governing Canada's Mutual Aid policy. So far as I am aware, this political aspect has not been taken into account in the preparation of the programme which you are now proposing and certainly has not been the subject of any Ministerial discussion in which I have participated. I also understand that, while officials in my Department have been informed occasionally of developments in the thinking of your Department regarding the programme for the coming year, there has been no inter-Departmental consultation at that level, involving External Affairs, about the size or composition of the programme.

Regarding the contents of your paper of January 6, the following are the main points which trouble me and to which I would hope that you might give further thought:

(a) the outside total for next year's programme would appear to me to be lower than might reasonably be expected of us in relation to our programme in the current year and in the light of our own economic capabilities and of the efforts of other countries. A reduction of more than $100 million would seem to me to be excessive in all the circumstances, which include our inability to increase foreign aid significantly in other directions. It would seem difficult to justify what would in effect amount to a reduction of more than one-third in our total foreign aid effort, especially when even the United States, according to the President's Budget Message of yesterday, will be pretty well maintaining the scale of its military and economic aid programmes.<sup>5</sup> (In fact, it would appear that the President is asking this year for some $100 million more than he asked for last year.) I should have thought that it would have been desirable to have examined the total size of our Mutual Aid programme in the context of our foreign assistance effort as a whole. In that event, I would have hoped that we might have agreed that it would have been desirable to have avoided such a large reduction in the total, so long as we were confident that such an amount of money could have been put to good and effective use;

(b) within this total, I am puzzled by the status of the $28,348,781 which are described as unallocated. While I can see the reasoning behind the inclusion of certain items in next year's programme which previously had been at least partially dealt with outside the Mutual Aid element of your estimates (e.g., infrastructure and NATO military budgets), I should like to see some clarification of the position of this other twenty-eight million dollar item. Unless this can pretty definitely be counted upon for Mutual Aid in the coming fiscal year, why should it be included in any total figure which we may be making public and communicating to our NATO partners? If this item were to be deducted, the total for our programme would be that much smaller, and the misgiving which I have expressed above would become that much more serious;

(c) regarding the composition of the programme proposed in your memorandum, I understand that a considerable number of F-86 Mark V's have been deleted from the earlier draft which your officials had shown to officials in this Department. Although I can appreciate the problems which might have been involved in including these all-Canadian aircraft in the programme (relating, for example, to the possible implication that we might be accepting responsibility for expensive repairs and replacements in future years, and to the needs of our own Reserve Units), I would have thought that it might have been desirable to have had some discussion of this question among the Ministers concerned, especially in view of the effect which the omission of these aircraft might have on the total amount of assistance which we could make available to our NATO allies.

I am well aware of the difficulties which might be encountered in constructing a programme of what we and the other NATO countries would regard as an adequate size. I gather that to provide an increased amount of some items under Mutual Aid, e.g., walkie-talkie radio sets, explosives and ammunition, it would be necessary to utilize our existing production facilities more fully than would be necessary merely to maintain output at an economic level. I also understand that it might be going rather far to maintain in operation production facilities for other items required by the European NATO countries when our own requirements are looked after and those facilities could be closed down or switched to other products. Nevertheless, I think it so important from the point of view of our own interests in maintaining an effective collective defence system to have a Mutual Aid programme of reasonable size and quality that I feel we should have made (and, in fact, should now make) the special effort which can reasonably be required of us. As the debates now proceeding in Europe so clearly demonstrate, the Western defence system on which our security very largely depends is still pretty fragile. It would be most unfortunate if we were to fall down, or appear to be falling down, on our part in this system at a time when we should be helping to build up and maintain confidence among the NATO allies. While I agree that there should be a reduction in our Mutual Aid to which other NATO Governments should not object, I do not feel that the position which we have taken in the various NATO Council discussions foreshadowed a cut as drastic as that now contemplated.

I am sending copies of this letter to our colleagues, Mr. Howe and Mr. Harris.

Yours sincerely,

L.B. PEARSON

II. CANADIAN MUTUAL AID PROGRAMME, 1955-56

4. The Minister of National Defence submitted the Mutual Aid programme for 1955-56 totalling $175 million. Of this figure there was no detail for an amount of $28.35 million, the programming of which would depend on whether it was possible to release service equipment. It had been applied against Service cash estimates and was therefore not available for additional direct production. The whole of the estimated contribution for Infrastructure, Military Budgets and that portion of NATO Civil Budget over the Canadian share on a capacity-to-pay basis had been included as Mutual Aid. Heretofore only the amount considered to be in excess of a contribution based on capacity to pay had been charged to Mutual Aid, the balance to a separate portion of the National Defence appropriation. The amount estimated for direct production consisted of carry-over on approved items with certain exceptions. The new items of equipment acquired since March 31, 1950, planned for transfer by the Services, included: 80,000 90 mm shells; 45 Sabre II aircraft and 35 J 47 engines; 25 T 34 aircraft with one year's spares; second year spares for Sabre II aircraft transferred to Greece and Turkey, plus a commitment for third year spares. There was considerable advantage in obtaining recommendations on allocations of equipment from the Standing Group early in the fiscal year, and it was recommended that new offerings should be made at the earliest date possible and that the programme as submitted and detailed in the appendices which were attached be approved.

An explanatory memorandum had been circulated.

(Minister's memorandum, January 6, 1955 — Document D2-55).

5. The Secretary of State for External Affairs said that the reduction in the programme to $175 million was too great and it would be difficult to defend, particularly as the U.S. Administration was recommending an amount for mutual security in the neighbourhood of what that country was spending at the present time. It would also make it more difficult to encourage support for the collective defensive system which had been established. He would have preferred a figure of approximately $200 million, even if it had been necessary to make reductions in other defence items. As far as detail was concerned, he felt it was not right to consider as part of the programme funds for mutual aid the expenditure of which appeared highly doubtful. Nor should the programme include the full Military Budget and Infrastructure costs of NATO. He expressed some doubt as to whether the United States was following a similar policy in its mutual security planning in regard to this latter point.

6. In the course of discussion the following points emerged:

(a) In preparing the programme, account had been taken of U.S. policy to include in their Mutual Security programme the U.S. contributions to the Military Budget and Infrastructure costs of NATO. However, if this were not current U.S. practice, it would be desirable to revert to the procedure followed for the current fiscal year.

(b) No decisions had been taken on how the $28.35 million would be expended. It could cover 30 Sabre V's which would be available, but if these aircraft were not transferred it might be used for other purposes. It could be used for financing Service programmes if transfers of equipment were made from stocks, but if it were applied to direct production then the Service programmes would be short that much cash. It was difficult to regard this figure as something available for the Services, although it was a cash requirement.

(c) There had been indications in the United States some months ago that their mutual security programme would be reduced quite substantially. More recently the President had recommended otherwise, although what would ultimately be granted would depend on the action of the U.S. Congress. One of the problems in arriving at a figure of suitable size for mutual aid was found in the fact that if a decision was taken to provide assistance in certain new lines, this meant a continuing programme lasting three or four years and it seemed to be the view at the moment that mutual aid should decrease. Indeed, the hope was expressed that in two or three years' time our mutual aid contribution might consist of not much more than NATO aircrew training.

7. The Committee, after further discussion, agreed to recommend for 1955-56, as submitted, a Mutual Aid programme totalling $175 million, subject to confirmation that the U.S. contributions to the Military Budget of NATO and to Infrastructure were charged to mutual security in the United States.<sup>6</sup>

NATO ANNUAL REVIEW, 1955

I attach for your consideration a memorandum prepared for inclusion in the Canadian reply to the Annual Review Questionnaire for 1955. In accordance with the directive issued by the NATO Secretariat, this memorandum is divided four parts. Part I is intended to contain a general statement on defence policy describing the main political, economic and military assumptions on which current plans are based, with particular reference to any important changes, either financial or military, since the last Annual Review. Part II contains sections on each of the Services intended to provide a full picture of each part of the military programme. Part III is supposed to be concerned with economic and financial questions, but since these questions are dealt with either in Part I of the memorandum or in the OEEC submissions, it was not thought necessary to include further material here. It was determined that U.S. contributions to NATO's military and infrastructure budgets were charged to Mutual Security and the Cabinet Defence Committee's decision was confirmed by the full Cabinet on January 26, 1955.

This memorandum was prepared by National Defence, in consultation with Finance and this Department, and has now been approved by the Panel on the Economic Aspects of Defence Questions, on the understanding that each member of the Panel would obtain the necessary Ministerial clearance individually.

3. I should therefore be grateful if you would indicate whether you have any objection to the release of this memorandum to the NATO Secretariat in Paris. It is planned to put the memorandum, if it is acceptable, into the bag for the NATO Delegation in Paris on Thursday noon. This will mean that it will be only a few days later than the July 1 deadline.

TOP SECRET

Ottawa, June 28, 1955

MEMORANDUM TO ACCOMPANY THE CANADIAN REPLY TO ARQ(55)

PART I — GENERAL STATEMENT

Canada's defence programme continues to be planned for the immediate defence of Canada and North America, in cooperation with the United States, for the building up of a collective force capable of deterring aggression, in cooperation with other members of NATO, and for the implementation of whatever other obligations for collective security Canada may assume as a member of the United Nations. For the period under review it is assumed that there will be no substantial increase in international tension, that the Canadian economy will continue to be capable of supporting a defence effort of the present order of magnitude, and that the chief means of deterring aggression against the NATO area will continue to be the maintenance of the Allied capacity to retaliate instantly with nuclear weapons.

2. In approving M.C. 48 as a basis for defence planning and preparations by the NATO military authorities, Canada has recognized that adjustments in defence programmes will undoubtedly become necessary in order to maintain a suitable balance between conventional forces and weapons and those for nuclear warfare, and to meet the increasing threat to the Allied retaliatory capacity.<sup>7</sup> The implications of M.C. 48 for Canadian defence planning will not become clear until the studies, both by the NATO authorities and by the Canadian authorities, are much further advanced. However, it is already evident that the defence of the retaliatory capacity of the Strategic Air Force<sup>8</sup> will require Canada to undertake much more extensive measures for early warning and interception in North America, involving a larger proportion of our defence facilities than heretofore for this purpose.<sup>9</sup>

A matter of primary importance to NATO [L.B. Pearson]

3. The Canadian Government anticipates that the funds available for defence in 1956-57 will be of the same order of magnitude as in the current year.<sup>10</sup>

4. It follows from paragraphs 2 and 3 above that any over-all increase in commitments to the Supreme Commanders cannot be contemplated. However, force goals for previous years are being continued and recommendations for increases in particular commitments will be considered insofar as they can be matched by decreases.

5. In fact, SACEUR's recommendations in the previous Annual Review related to the effectiveness of forces which, it is considered, can be considerably improved without any great increases in expenditure.

6. As noted in SACEUR's Effectiveness Report with respect to the Canadian Air Force, the low effectiveness rating of No. 1 Air Division at that time was primarily due to the conversion programme to a later mark of Sabre. The Division's effectiveness will show considerable improvement in future, though it may vary from time to time as further conversion is effected.

7. With regard to the logistic recommendations, Canada is hesitant to make any serious changes in logistic arrangements until studies now being undertaken by SACEUR are completed and there is a firmer indication of ultimate requirements.

PART II — SERVICE SECTIONS

ARMY

8. The main features of the Canadian Army Programme for 1955 are essentially the same as those outlined during the various processes of previous Annual Reviews. The main components of the Canadian contribution of ground forces to the Integrated Force in Europe comprise one infantry brigade group assigned to SACEUR in peacetime which is to be raised to a full infantry division by M-day plus movement time. Canadian Army plans cater for the maintenance of its brigade group in Germany in accordance with the principles set forth in SHAPE/450/54. The division, less the brigade group in Germany, held in Canada as an M-Day force will be built up to about the same level of effectiveness as the M-Day forces in Europe.

9. Most of the Canadian Army forces which were assigned to the United Nations Command in 1951 for operations in Korea have now returned to Canada and provide the initial battle replacements for the Canadian Army contribution to SACEUR.

10. In addition to the above forces assigned to or earmarked for SACEUR, the Canadian Army contributes three infantry parachute battalions towards the defence of the Canadian-United States Region together with their support units. These forces are maintained at M-Day readiness.

11. The Canadian Army holds, or has made provision for, the 90-day war reserves for the brigade group in Germany, and for the 60-day war reserves for the balance of 1st Canadian Infantry Division. Canada now plans to store on the Continent the 90-day war reserves for the brigade group in Germany in accordance with arrangements to be made with the United Kingdom authorities with whose forces the Canadian Army forces will be associated. The Canadian Army hopes to complete the storage programme in the Gondola base for the first 30-day war reserves for the brigade group in Germany by the end of 1955. The remainder of the storage programme for the brigade group will take some time to complete.

12. As shown in the 1954 Country Report on Canada, the Canadian Army plan provided for the storage in the United Kingdom of certain heavy equipment and war reserves for 1st Canadian Infantry Division.<sup>11</sup> Because of new factors a re-assessment as to the location of the storage point for the heavy equipment and the war reserves for the balance of the division is being made. These new factors include the thermo-nuclear threat generally, particularly against the United Kingdom, the channel and continental ports; the risk of cross-channel movement in wartime; and the development of the German Federal Republic's contribution to SACEUR's forces. This re-assessment will also have to take account of the limitation on the quantities of stocks which can be held in the Canadian intermediate depot in Antwerp. This limitation also affects the planned storage programme for the brigade group in Germany.

13. The Canadian Army is holding divisional training exercises during the summer of 1955. The troops engaged in these exercises will be supported by aircraft of the Royal Canadian Navy and the Royal Canadian Air Force.

14. The training of Canadian regular troops in Canada is being adapted to modern war conditions. When the Agreement for Cooperation Regarding Atomic Information comes into effect, the training of personnel in the employment of and defence against atomic weapons will be made more realistic.<sup>12</sup> Canadian participation in the spring series of atomic tests conducted in the United States has been most beneficial.

15. With regard to progress made towards actions indicated in M.C. 48, the Canadian Army gives first priority to the requirements of 1st Canadian Infantry Division, including the brigade group in Germany. The Canadian Army is carrying out a comprehensive long range study of the organization of field formations to meet the conditions of future warfare. This study takes SACEUR's Capabilities Plan, 1957, into account, and SACEUR has been informed of its object and scope.

16. In the course of the 1953 Annual Review processes, the Council was informed of steps being taken to improve the effectiveness of the Canadian Army reserve forces. A re-organization of the Canadian Army (Militia) is being directed towards increasing its efficiency by establishing a balance among the various arms and services suited to the conditions of modern war, while at the same time adjusting the number and location of units in accordance with population distribution. This re-organization is almost complete.

NAVY

17. The present Canadian Naval Programme calls for a Navy of 20,000 officers and men. It is anticipated that this figure will be reached during 1955 and will continue at the same level during the period 1955-58.

18. As the initial training effort, consequent upon expansion, nears completion a greater number of ships will be put into active commission. While this increase will not affect the numbers available from D-Day onwards, it will mean improved standards of operational training and may to some degree improve the time phasing of post D-Day commitments.

Personnel

19. While the overall numbers of naval personnel are reaching the programmed figure, further training in certain technical categories is still required. Recruiting is generally now limited to the numbers necessary to replace men retiring, or failing to re-engage on completion of their engagement period.

See Chapter 4, Part 4, Section B.

20. The strength of the RCN(R) is maintained at approximately 7,000 officers and men who attend drills in the Naval Divisions and undergo summer training in the Great Lakes Training Centre or on the coasts in the Fleet.

Training

21. Improvement in the availability of live submarine services for air and surface force training has been achieved. The formation of the 6th Submarine Squadron in Halifax, N.S., on March 15, 1955, has enabled the RCN, by arrangement with the Admiralty, to have three submarines available in operational service while a fourth refits. At present no improvement in submarine facilities is envisaged for the use of RCN West Coast ships, which will continue with existing loan arrangements on a quarterly basis with the USN.

22. Increasing numbers of ships in active commission will permit adequate RCN participation in NATO exercises as appropriate.

23. While shore training facilities are generally adequate, improvements are being undertaken or considered by means of new construction as follows:

- (a) Navigation Direction School.
- (b) Maritime Warfare School.
- (c) Anti-Aircraft Firing Range.
- (d) Technical Apprentices Training School.

For naval gunfire support training, RCN ships on the West Coast have been using USN facilities at Pearl Harbour, and arrangements are being made for East Coast ships to use USN facilities at Chesapeake Bay.

Logistic Support

24. Studies are continuing insofar as the support overseas for RCN ships earmarked for assignment to NATO is concerned.

Communication Equipment

25. Active investigation is presently being conducted to ascertain the most suitable type of ECM (Electronic Counter-Measures) jamming equipment to meet the requirement. Developments of this type of equipment, being carried out by other NATO countries, are being closely followed.

26. Fitting of infra-red equipment in forces earmarked for assignment to NATO is partially completed. Plans are being progressed to complete fitting in ocean escorts and above.

Maritime Aircraft (Provided and Operated by RCAF)

27. Maritime Air Units will undergo two conversion programmes during the period covered by this reply. The first conversion (of a portion of the force from Lancaster to Neptune aircraft) is an interim measure designed to meet the Canadian commitment pending receipt from production of the new CL-28 (modified Britannia-type) maritime aircraft. Conversion to this latter type will start in 1958.

AIR FORCE

General Description of Air Programme

28. Canada has accepted the recommendation made in C-M(54)100 that four all-weather squadrons be substituted for four interceptor day fighter squadrons in No. 1 Air Division. The unit establishment for an AWX squadron is 18 aircraft compared to a unit establishment for an IDF squadron of 25 aircraft. Consequently, the force goals for air units to be contributed by Canada are revised as follows:

As of Dec 31	IDF		AWX		Total
	Sqn	Aircraft	Sqn	Aircraft	Sqn	Aircraft
1955	12	300	0	0	12	300
1956	11	275	1	18	12	293
1957	8	200	4	72	12	272
1958	8	200	4	72	12	272

29. The recommendation that Canada phase forward the radar plan for the Air Division is being implemented. See paragraphs 31-35 below.

30. The RCAF agrees in principle that there is a requirement for an Air Sub-Supply Depot on the Continent, and for the establishment in peacetime of a nucleus Construction and Maintenance Unit, a Repair and Salvage Unit and a Mobile Equipment Repair Unit. A decision as to the size and location of these organizations cannot be made until certain SHAPE studies are completed and the results known. These are the studies on Air Defence and on measures to be taken to enable the air forces to survive atomic attack, with special reference to SHAPE policy for dispersal.

Aircraft Control and Warning Organization

31. With respect to primary facilities, a high track handling CRC (Control and Reporting Centre) is programmed for Mercy-les-Metz during 1955. This CRC will be capable of providing all facilities called for by SHAPE standards, working to the performance specified.

32. With respect to back-up reserve facilities, part of the equipment of the CRC will be capable of deployment and operations as a fully self-contained mobile CRP (Control and Reporting Post). Under normal circumstances, this unit will remain integrated into the static CRC facility. When deployed as a CRP or in the role of gap filler, it will have limited control capability and a performance slightly below that specified in SHAPE standards for a CRP.

33. Because of the apparent impracticability of designing, building and fitting out an operations room capable of fully exploiting the radar capabilities of the primary facilities coincident with availability of equipment, the programme is divided into two phases. Phase I will provide, by July 1, 1955, a six position control capability in a temporary operations building. All equipment programmed is expected to be in place by that date. Phase II calls for the construction of an RAF R3-type underground building during the period 1955-56 and the installation of full control facilities including indicators, video display, video mapping, communications controls, display equipment, etc.

34. Technical personnel for these facilities are under training in the UK and in the USA. Operational personnel are undergoing training in the UK. It is expected that 85% of the establishment will be available in the Air Division by July 1, 1955.

35. Ninety days' operating spares are being provided with all major equipment. The matter of depot spares is still under consideration between the RCAF and USAF for American supplied equipment and between RCAF and RAF for British supplied equipment. Third and fourth line maintenance is another matter under discussion between the above services. For Canadian supplied equipment, it is expected that third and fourth line maintenance will be carried out by contract.

Personnel Problems

36. The significant information on personnel has already been provided.

Training

37. Weapons training for the Canadian squadrons in Europe has been obtained at the French installation at Rabat through bilateral arrangement with the French Government which arrangement is to terminate at end 1955. Since the earliest date that any of the proposed new NATO air weapons training installations are expected to be ready is end 1956, negotiations are continuing with the French to permit RCAF use of French gunnery training installations through 1956.

Logistic Support

38. A logistic Agreement with the USAF was concluded in May 1953 for the provision to No. 1 Air Division on repayment of specific types of rations, petroleum oils and lubricants, ammunition, gun camera film and medical services including aero-medical evacuation, during peacetime only. This agreement was revised in December 1954 to include:

- (a) Current peacetime requirements,
- (b) 90-day stock level for war reserve, where applicable,
- (c) Storage on prepayment as required for the 90-day war reserve in excess of that which is now provided by infrastructure programmes, and
- (d) continued wartime support. Aero-medical evacuation in wartime will depend on the availability of transport after the needs of the USAF have been met.

39. Provision has been made in the Agreement with the USAF for a 90-day stock level for war reserve to support a force of 300 Sabres without reserve aircraft, i.e., a "diminishing force." The "diminishing force" concept allows for an attrition-rate of 30% per month and an addition-rate from new production of 20 aircraft per month from D plus 30 to D plus 89, which would leave a force-in-being of 137 aircraft at D plus 89.

40. The 90-day stock level for war reserve as well as peacetime requirements will vary as the aircraft complement or armament changes.

Aircraft Serviceability

41. As aircraft technicians are receiving more rounded training in Canada and are becoming more proficient in maintenance and servicing in Europe, the serviceability rate has been improved during the year and will continue to improve commensurate with the learning curve.

Equipment and Ammunition

42. As stated in paragraph 38 above, an agreement has been concluded with the USAF to provide current peacetime requirements, 90-day stock level for war reserve and continued wartime support for specific types of rations, petroleum oils and lubricants, ammunition and gun camera film.

43. The USAF has also agreed to provide storage facilities for that part of the 90-day war reserve in excess of that already provided by infrastructure programmes. Stocks will be placed in storage by the USAF when construction is completed. The estimated date of completion is March 31, 1956.

Spare Parts

44. Spare parts for No. 1 Air Division are provided from 30 Air Material Base, Langar. RCAF peacetime stocks are sufficient to meet a 90-day war reserve. Reference should also be made to Table 3, Planned Status of 30 Air Materiel Base, Langar, and the note accompanying that table.

Other Subjects

45. There are, at present, no plans to provide in peacetime a wartime reserve of aircraft to support No. 1 Air Division.

46. It is anticipated that the Sabre VI will continue in service through the period covered by this reply. Canada is developing a new all-weather fighter to replace the CF-100 and, as was the case with the latter, the new aircraft is designed primarily to meet conditions prevailing in North American.

PETROLEUM PRODUCTS

47. Bilateral arrangements have been made with the UK and US authorities for the supply of POL to the Canadian Army Forces in Europe and to No. 1 Air Division respectively. The requirements for these forces on the continent are therefore included in the requirements of the UK and US forces.

48. Discussions are underway with a view to arranging for the provision of Canadian naval POL requirements in Europe. No problem is foreseen in providing total POL requirements in Canadian ports.

PART III — ECONOMIC AND FINANCIAL QUESTIONS

49. The relevant information is contained either in Part I of this memorandum or in the OEEC submissions.

PART IV — ANNUAL RECURRING COSTS

50. The financial provision for the Canadian defence programme in 1955-56 is consistent with the financial policy of previous fiscal years' programmes in that full provision is made for the estimated annual recurring costs of the forces in being during the 1955-56 fiscal period. This includes increased provision for military personnel costs in keeping with the numerical increases in the military forces scheduled to occur in 1955-56, provision for purchases of consumable materials and supplies necessary to meet current requirements and maintain stocks at desired levels. Provision has been made for replacement of equipment to cover attrition and to replace equipment with improved types as described in the statement on equipment programmes.

51. Intensive studies are being undertaken with respect to the long-term problems raised by the introduction of new weapons. Certain steps have been taken, as referred to in Part I of this memorandum, to provide additional early warning systems for the defence of the North American continent and to develop a supersonic all-weather aircraft to replace the CF-100. Canada has not, however, progressed far enough in its studies to determine the long-term financial impact on the Canadian defence programme.

NATO ANNUAL REVIEW — 1955

The Canadian memorandum has now been approved by Ministers and may be released to the NATO Secretariat with the following changes:

(a) The last three lines of para. 1 should be revised to read: "... and that, until there is a genuine détente between East and West, the chief means of deterring aggression against the NATO area, etc."

(b) The last sentence of para. 2 should be revised to read: "However, it is already evident that the defence of the retaliatory capacity of the United States Strategic Air Force, which is a matter of primary importance to all NATO countries, will require Canada to undertake much more extensive measures, etc."

2. We assume that you will prepare a new stencil for the revised first page of the memorandum and submit it as soon as possible. This, with the tables† we have already sent you, completes the Canadian reply to ARQ(55). Ends.

CANADIAN MUTUAL AID PROGRAMME 1956-57

At a recent meeting of the Sub-Panel on the Economic Aspects of Defence, the Assistant Deputy Minister of National Defence outlined the preliminary thinking in his Department regarding the likely size of our mutual aid programme next year. He said that in line with Mr. Campney's statement in the House on July 14, his Department had engaged in planning on the assumption that the mutual aid programme would be lower next year.<sup>13</sup> Accordingly, a preliminary review of next year's programme revealed that NATO air crew training expenditures would be slightly lower and expenditures on direct production items would be sharply reduced. Moreover, unless a decision is taken to transfer to NATO countries certain "surplus" F-86 aircraft powered by the Orenda engines, transfers of new pattern equipment would also be sharply reduced and the main component of the programme would be World War II type equipment. In total, as the following table reveals, the programme for next year might be reduced from the present year's figure of $175 million to between $125 million and $160 million, with the $160 million figure being reached only if a decision was made to transfer some $35 million worth of F-86 aircraft (either with or without any responsibility for providing as mutual aid subsequently the rather costly engines and other equipment which might be needed for the operation and maintenance of this aircraft over any considerable period of time).

In revealing the present state of mutual aid planning for next year, the Assistant Deputy Minister of National Defence indicated that he would appreciate receiving the comments of this Department. In the present circumstances, there would appear to be some wisdom in reducing somewhat the amount of Canadian mutual aid to NATO countries and, considered in terms of likely U.S. reductions in military aid to NATO, a figure of somewhere between $125 million and $160 million will likely appear respectable, especially if we provide substantial (and preferably increased) amounts of foreign aid in other forms, such as our contribution under the Colombo Plan.<sup>14</sup> The difficulty is however that, in the past few years, it has not been possible to relate increases on foreign aid to decreases in mutual aid.

I should be grateful if you would let me know whether you agree with these views.

HUNTER-SABRE AIRCRAFT EXCHANGE

I understand that when you discussed the above subject with Mr. Macdonnell, Deputy Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs, on August 15, you mentioned that you would like to have some indication as to the disposition of the Canadian equipments which are being turned over to the United States by the United Kingdom. I now attach a copy of message No. 1505 of September 1 from our Embassy in Washington, which contains the information which you have requested.

You will recall that when this matter was discussed by Cabinet Defence Committee on June 24, 1954,<sup>15</sup> it was then expected that the United States would make the F86 aircraft available to Italy and Yugoslavia. The United States Air Force had encouraged the Hunter-Sabre exchange on the grounds that it would permit the grouping of Hunters in Northwestern Europe, i.e. the United Kingdom, the Netherlands and Belgium, with the United King-

HUNTER SABRE AIRCRAFT EXCHANGE

We are informed by the USAF Directorate, which handles mutual aid, through CJS, that the United States intend to distribute the Canadian built Sabre aircraft involved in the Hunter-Sabre exchange, equally between Italy and Yugoslavia. This information was obtained informally, as a routine matter.

2. The United Kingdom received 370 aircraft directly from Canada and 60 Canadian aircraft purchased by the United States. It is estimated that by the time of handover, attrition will have reduced the figure of 430 to somewhere in the neighbourhood of 360 to 370 aircraft. It is expected, therefore, that Italy and Yugoslavia will receive approximately 180 to 185 aircraft each. It is not possible at this stage to identify how many of these aircraft will come from the original Canadian contribution. This information is not for public use.

REVISED ESTIMATE OF EXPENDITURE

1. Cabinet Defence Committee approval was given on January 24, 1955 to an appropriation of $175 million for the 1955-56 Canadian Mutual Aid Programme and this amount was included in 1955-56 Estimates. An amount of $28,348,781 was not supported by detailed programming and was included against the possibility of releasing additional service equipment for mutual aid. For financial planning it was assumed the unallocated amount would be available to meet service expenditures either by reason of credits resulting from transfer of equipment acquired after March 31, 1950 or if such equipment was not available for mutual aid by transfer of the funds from mutual aid to the service allotment.

2. A review has been completed by each of the services to determine any additional equipment that could be made available from their holdings for mutual aid without necessitating new commitments for replacement purposes. The release of certain additional equipment acquired since March 31, 1950, has been found possible. In addition, the cost of spares support for F86 aircraft has increased over the earlier estimate. A supplementary list of Army equipment acquired prior to March 31, 1950, and available for release in 1955-56 and 1956-57 valued at $45,210,472 and $22,326,709 respectively, has been prepared. (Schedules "C" and "D" attached†).

3. The amount of equipment which can be transferred in the 1955-56 Mutual Aid Programme will be limited by the maximum funds available for mutual aid and the ability to finance transfers that result in credits to the Replacement Account and at the same time finance the service expenditures. At the present time it appears that the limiting factor will be the maximum amount allocated to mutual aid.

4. A review has been made of the original programme, taking into account the additional offerings, actual expenditures, changes in production forecasts, equipment availabilities, etc., and the original programme has been revised as follows including the addition of $25,307,310 in respect of the additional offerings of Army equipment:

5. The equipment listed in Appendices "C" and "D" has been referred to the Standing Group for recommendations as to allocations in accordance with the policy of transferring Army equipment of this type to NATO countries when the Canadian Army is able to release it. Subject to the needs of the Canadian Army as much of this equipment will be transferred in 1955-56 as can be financed within the 1955-56 Estimates.

MUTUAL AID

At his Joint Staff briefing this morning General Foulkes referred to the consideration now being given by the Chiefs of Staff Committee, in preparation for a Cabinet Defence Committee meeting probably next week, to the problems of continental air defence over the next few years and their implications for the Canadian Defence programme.<sup>16</sup> General Foulkes said that he was examining where cuts could be made to permit increased expenditures on air defence without raising the ceiling on overall defence expenditures, and that the Mutual Aid programme seemed to be a logical candidate for reduction. The aircrew training programme in particular should be "chopped in half" and a special study on this was being carried out.

2. Any sizeable reduction in our Mutual Aid programme could have major repercussions on our relations with our NATO allies, and in my view should only be effected after careful consideration, in which this department had a full share. I suggest, therefore, that it would be desirable for the interested divisions to have in mind the likelihood that it may be necessary to brief the Minister on this subject in the near future.

3. In this connection it should be noted that the NATO Country Chapter on Canada, which we have just received, highlights the fact that our NATO aircrew training programme is supposed to continue at about its present level at least until the end of 1957. It also points out that Canadian Mutual Aid equipment programmes have already declined very considerably.

4. The first draft of the General Chapter of the 1955 Annual Review emphasizes the great dependence of European countries upon external aid and says that those countries whose military equipment has been built up almost entirely from Mutual Aid will face virtually insuperable problems if this aid is cut off. It states that the United States and Canada have re-affirmed their intentions to continue to support their allies with military assistance but does add that, "both countries expect that such assistance will be progressively reduced and in some fields eliminated".

NATO ANNUAL REVIEW 1955 — GENERAL CHAPTER

Our general comments on the draft General Chapter, developments in the Annual Review process so far, and statement made at the recent meeting of Defence Ministers are as follows:

2. As reported in our telegram No. 1182 of October 12,<sup>17</sup> the general assessment by NATO military commanders indicates that the force levels now anticipated are not only below the levels on which NATO military authorities have based their forward planning strategy, but are assessed by the military generally at around 50 percent effectiveness. On the other hand, developments thus far in the 1955 Annual Review indicate firstly that European governments are not prepared in many cases to bring their force goals up to the levels which they agreed in the 1953 Annual Review, nor secondly are they prepared to vote sufficient funds to support adequately and maintain the forces so far developed. Relevant to this whole situation is, of course, the request made at the Defence Ministers conference that serious consideration be given to a revision of force goals (see Document C-M(55)90 of October 19). Furthermore, there has been no change in the policy announced by the United States two years ago, and since then consistently adhered to, that Mutual Aid, initiated for the build-up period, would gradually taper off. There accordingly exists a major anomaly. It appears evident that, if the present circumstances prevail, present NATO planning will never be achieved and, as indicated by General Gruenther, it may become necessary for the NATO military authorities to reconsider the present forward strategy. You may accordingly wish to consider, in conjunction with the United States authorities, the position which we should adopt in the light of the general circumstances above described. You will note that the tenor of the General Chapter is to suggest that the "gap" will not be filled unless extensive North American aid continues. We assume that the "new look" carries with it very broad considerations of a military character which will significantly influence both Canadian and United States policies in respect of our contribution to the defence of continental Europe. For this reason, we feel that it would be highly desirable, if not imperative, that Canadian and United States policies in this connection are carefully coordinated and that on the basis of this re-appraisal an approach be formulated to the various proposals such as those already indicated in the recommendations under the General Chapter.

3. The following is a list with some comments of the various proposals which will be coming forward for consideration, as reflected in the recommendations under the General Chapter and elsewhere:

(a) You will note that the wording of paragraph 25(a)(i) in the draft General Chapter denotes that the establishment of an effective early warning service and coordinated Air Defence system in Europe is the responsibility of all NATO partners. This concept was stressed forcibly by SACEUR during the recent briefing of Defence Ministers. The possibility of including certain aspects of this requirement in common infrastructure was mentioned by the Standing Group in its comments to the Ministers of Defence. We understand, however, that this requirement is not included in the future three-year programme of £365 million proposed by the Standing Group.

(b) We do not yet know what the implications of paragraph 25(b) are. It may be directed towards the continuation of bilateral arrangements between the United States and European member countries. You will, however, note that the wording does not conform to our existing policy of offering aid through the Standing Group. We believe that the United States may have under review the whole question of the general advisability of continuing aid on a bilateral basis. The outcome of their review may considerably influence their future position on common financing of projects such as early warning, air defence and infrastructure.

(c) It would appear to us that paragraph 25(d) is a device prepared by the International Staff to offset announced reductions in United States and Canadian aid by getting those two countries to participate directly in an expanded base of common financing. As you already know, considerable pressure has developed to include mobile equipment within the definition of infrastructure. Furthermore, NATO military authorities have proposed that mobile equipment of logistic character on airfields be commonly financed. We suspect that this recommendation would propose to further broaden the base for common financing in the logistic field. We feel that our future approach to questions of a future infrastructure programme, the cost sharing arrangements, if any, for it or for an expanded base such as that proposed by the International Staff, should be derived from basic policy considerations, such as those referred to in paragraph 2 above. Apart from the financial implications which would be involved in Canadian participation in such a scheme, as an alternative to end-item deliveries from Canada, it is obvious that it would preclude the utilization of the Mutual Aid Programme as a means of maintaining our own defence production base.

(d) We expect to receive later today the short Canadian Country Chapter together with the recommendations of the International Staff. We will telegraph it to you upon receipt and you will no doubt wish to examine it closely in relation to the General Chapter. Final consideration by the Annual Review Committee of Country Chapters is scheduled for Wednesday, November 9.

NATO ANNUAL REVIEW 1955 — GENERAL CHAPTER

The text of the Country Chapter on Canada, which only contains three paragraphs under the heading "major defence problems", is as follows: Quote:

1. Canada is meeting the firm force goals for 1955 in all services. In general order of magnitude, Canadian defence plans will also provide forces to meet by the end of 1956 the goals on which MC.48 was based. The forces assigned to NATO are at a full state of combat readiness.

2. The NATO military authorities have, in general, endorsed Canada's present military plans, but have made certain detailed recommendations regarding modifications and improvement which are shown in the annex to the Country Study. In particular, Canada is recommended to ensure the availability of one effective light aircraft carrier during the transition from Magnificent to Bonaventure. The Canadian authorities have stated that though they are not prepared to keep two carriers in commission simultaneously, they will do everything possible to end the transition time.

3. The Canadian Government expect that their contribution to the defence of the North American continent, which will consist primarily in the provision, together with the United States, of an early warning system and a related interception force, will make increasing demands on resources. The implementation of this commitment is not expected to affect the achievement of the force goals shown in the present Canadian submission, and the NATO aircrew training programme will also continue, at about its present level, at least until the end of 1957. However, Canadian Mutual Aid equipment programmes have already declined very considerably; the value of deliveries planned for the current year is less than half what was attained in each of the two previous years. Unquote.

2. Conclusions and recommendations to Country Chapters, which will remain the responsibility of the International Staff, will not be issued until Monday, November 7, after all countries have been examined and the major issues in each country's defence effort reviewed by the International Staff. We will telegraph the recommendations made to Canada upon receipt. Although it is still the intention to finalize examination of Country Chapters in the Annual Review Committee on November 9, it seems unlikely that this timetable can be adhered to in view of the delay in the issuance of recommendations. In the meantime, we should be grateful to receive as a matter of urgency any comments which you wish to make on the body of the Country Chapter on Canada as quoted above. While the remark in the third paragraph regarding the reduction in end-item aid is true in terms of our submission [see Table 15 in Annex II to AR(55) Canada (Study)D/1], we do not believe that it is necessarily in accordance with the actual position at the present time in view of supplementary equipment offerings. However, you told us in your telegram No. 912 of August 24 that we should not attempt to alter any of the information given in our reply to ARQ(55).

NATO ANNUAL REVIEW 1955 — CANADIAN COUNTRY CHAPTER

We have just received the text of the conclusions and recommendations of the International Staff which will be included in the Canadian Country Chapter. The text is as follows: Text begins:

"Canada

"II. Conclusions and Recommendations of the International Staff

4. The International Staff note that since funds available for defence in 1956/57 are expected to remain of the same order of magnitude as in the current fiscal year, the additional needs of North American defence under present plans will probably be met at the further expense of Mutual Aid equipment programmes. The International Staff attach great importance to Canada's force contribution to NATO, including her contribution to North American defence. They consider, however, that the Mutual Aid Programme also continues to be of the utmost importance to NATO as a whole, since there are serious deficiencies in the provision of modern equipment, especially high performance combat aircraft, for the forces of several countries. They further consider that Canada's resources are such that it should be possible to maintain her Mutual Aid contribution, even though the commitment for North American defence is expected to increase.

5. The International Staff therefore recommended that:

The Canadian Government should consider increasing the delivery of modern equipment under Mutual Aid, especially high performance aircraft." Text ends.

I NATO ANNUAL REVIEW 1955; COUNTRY CHAPTER ON CANADA

1. Mr. Ignatieff said that the Delegation had been instructed to reserve Canada's position on the International Staff recommendation in paragraph 5 of the Canadian Country Chapter on the grounds that it was unrealistic to expect an increase in the amount of Mutual Aid. This reservation had been made known in the Annual Review Committee and would appear in the records of that Committee, but the Delegation had not asked that the reservation be written into the text of the Annual Review Report. The Delegation required instructions on whether to take further action.

2. Mr. Plumptre noted that the recommendation was made on the responsibility of the International Staff, and that other Delegations were relying on the proceedings of the Annual Review Committee to record their protests against similar recommendations made to them. It did not seem necessary, therefore, to ask that Canada's reservation be written into the text of the Annual Review Report.

3. General Foulkes said that the substance of the recommendation was bound to be raised by some countries at the meeting of Ministers in December, regardless of what action Canada took to protest against it at this time.

4. Mr. Golden remarked that from the point of view of the International Staff it was a sensible recommendation, and that we should not therefore protest against it too strongly.

5. Mr. Ignatieff suggested that the recommendation, might lead to discussion in the Permanent Council, in which case Mr. Wilgress should perhaps explain why the reservation had been made by referring to Canada's increasing obligations for North American defence.

6. The Panel agreed:

(a) that the Delegation need not ask that their reservation on the recommendation of the International Staff in the Canadian Country Chapter be written into the Annual Review Report; and

(b) that the Permanent Representative might explain in the Permanent Council why the reservation had been made, by referring to the increasing obligations of Canada for North American defence, but that he need do so only if discussion on the recommendation arose in the Council.

II. NATO ANNUAL REVIEW, 1955; DRAFT GENERAL CHAPTER

7. Mr. Ignatieff said that Canada was now on record as reserving its position on the text and the recommendations of the General Chapter. The Delegation needed instructions on whether to continue this reservation and on what action to take if some countries tried to have the Council endorse the recommendations for the purpose of increasing their "impact" upon Ministers at the December meeting.

8. The Delegation also needed guidance on what position to take regarding a United States proposal, supported by the United Kingdom, that the Ministerial Council should invite governments to consider whether a basic NATO-wide reassessment of the NATO defence effort was required to permit a better achievement of the strategic objectives of M.C.48 within available resources, and, if so, how such a reassessment should be carried out. Allied to the United States proposal was the question of priorities, raised at the meeting of Defence Ministers in October, which involved finding a way of reconciling the views of governments that defence expenditures could not be increased significantly with the argument of the military advisers that certain new projects were essential, particularly for the air defence of Europe.

(Document ED3-55,† Draft General Chapter, and Documents ED6-55† and ED7-55† concerning the Defence Ministers' meeting had been circulated; Telegram No. 1293 of November 11† from NATO Delegation, Paris, concerning the General Chapter had also been circulated by External Affairs).

9. Mr. Plumtre said that the General Chapter was a good factual statement of the present situation of NATO, and he thought we should withdraw our reservation on it. As for the recommendations, they represented the considered views of the International Staff, and deserved to go forward to the Council and to Ministers for consideration. The Delegation should, however, oppose any move to get Council endorsement for the recommendations, on the grounds that there has not yet been time for the approval of Ministers to be obtained. In addition, any procedure whereby the Council would try to increase the "impact" of the recommendations on ministers was objectionable.

Mr. Plumtre said that he thought it would be better to have the recommendations in the General Chapter go forth through the Council for the consideration of Ministers than to adopt the United States proposal, which he interpreted as being an alternative course. He noted that the first recommendation in the General Chapter invited the Council (that is, Ministers in December) to consider what adjustments should be made to the defence effort of the alliance; the third paragraph of the United States proposal, on the other hand, called for consideration by governments on whether a reassessment was required. Mr. Plumtre felt that the recommendation of the International Staff would allow serious reconsideration to take place in December, whereas the United States proposal, if accepted, might have the result of delaying a serious NATO-wide approach.

10. In the course of further discussion, the Panel noted some of the problems that should be considered in the reassessment that seemed to be required. Dr. Solandt remarked that one serious difficulty arose in connection with the air defence headquarters at The Hague, which had been set up with United States help, but which was in difficulties because the United States was not coming forth with men and technical information for its support. The Dutch argued that they were willing to do more for their air defence but that the United States was not giving them enough advice on the sort of weapons to employ. As a result, the Netherlands and other countries were having to work out slowly and expensively a programme for themselves. European industries were capable of producing guided missiles if governments knew what specifications to give them.

11. General Foulkes said that the conventional forces European countries had planned for, required virtually all their financial capabilities to maintain. Now that countries were faced with the need for new and different types of defence, they were eager to find out what conventional forces they could sacrifice to acquire the new types. The Standing Group, which in fact reflected the views of the United States, United Kingdom and French Governments, seemed incapable of advocating negative priorities. Mr. Miller remarked that the Standing Group could not give priorities which would influence conflicts of interest between services controlled by their own governments. The lack of a real international military staff made a reassessment of the sort contemplated very important.

12. The Panel, after further discussion, agreed:

(a) that the Delegation should be instructed to withdraw the reservation of Canada on the text and recommendations of the General Chapter, but to oppose any move to have the Council endorse the recommendations;

(b) that the Delegation should be instructed to oppose the proposal of the United States that the Ministerial Council should invite governments to consider whether a basic NATO-wide reassessment of the NATO defence effort was required;

(c) that, in anticipation of Ministers considering the questions of reassessment and priorities in December, it would be useful for the international staff or the Annual Review Committee to prepare a working paper setting forth the general problem and making alternative procedural suggestions; and

(d) that it would not, however, be desirable for a NATO working group to be set up now for the purpose of studying solutions to the priorities problem.<sup>20</sup>

MUTUAL AID

1. At the 1954 Annual Review and during examination of Canada's submission for the 1955 Annual Review, it was explained that, because of increasing North American commitments, it was to be expected that Canadian Mutual Aid would reduce but that Canada would, in any case, continue to meet its present undertakings, including aircrew training and spares support for Canadian produced equipment.

2. Based on this position, the content of the Canadian Mutual Aid Programme for the current year and planning for 1956/57 has been governed by the following considerations, which, with the exception of infrastructure and the provision of spares support in accordance with Canada's announced policy, do not involve the undertaking of new commitments solely for the purpose of Mutual Aid:

- (a) Canada's undertaking to provide aircrew training to 1958;
- (b) Canada's undertaking to contribute to infrastructure programmes and to the military budgets of NATO;
- (c) Canada's announced policy of providing spares support from Canadian production in respect of certain equipment transferred as mutual aid;
- (d) Continuing transfer of World War II equipment as it can be released on deliveries of new equipment;
- (e) Transfer of equipment acquired since March 31/50 that becomes available from Service stocks, subject to the condition that its transfer as mutual aid does not in itself result in the necessity to enter into additional commitments to procure alternative equipment;
- (f) Production as a direct charge on the mutual aid account where continuing production of a Canadian defence facility is regarded as in the Canadian interests, and there is a deficiency of the end product for NATO as a whole.

3. European members of NATO are, in some cases, finding it difficult to meet operating costs of their Forces within present budgetary levels, and generally are faced with the need for re-equipment programmes, particularly in the aircraft and guided missile fields, over the next five years, and the installation of a radar control and warning system for both defensive and offensive weapons. These projects cannot be done within some of the present national defence budgets.

4. The International Staff have recommended that Canada consider increasing delivery of modern equipment under Mutual Aid. Special reference is made to the need for high performance aircraft. They have also suggested, for general consideration, the multi-national financing of operational needs of European forces.

5. With respect to multi-national financing of equipment needs, while it would be a method of assisting in the financing of European defence and supporting European production capacity, it would result in Canada losing control of both the content and allocation of its Mutual Aid Programme. Moreover, it is questionable that a workable system could be devised and, at best, it would almost certainly be cumbersome, inefficient, and have serious shortcomings in directing external assistance into the most urgently needed European military requirements.

6. There is ample evidence to support the need for continued military aid to the European members of NATO and it would appear to be of considerable importance, particularly at the present time when there may be an impression that it is the intention of Canada that the Mutual Aid Programme will bear the whole weight of any reductions necessary on account of increased costs of North American defence, to provide some assurance to European nations that the magnitude of their defence problem is recognized and that the need for continuing mutual aid will be given every consideration in the re-appraisal of the direction of Canadian defence expenditures that is presently under-way.

7. Accordingly, the Panel recommend:

(a) that Canada indicate, at the Annual Review Ministerial meeting in December, that she recognizes the importance of Mutual Aid in the re-appraisal of the direction of its defence expenditures that is now under-way, and that while Mutual Aid will be at a reduced level, it fully expects it to continue at a substantial level with increasing emphasis on content, which, while fitting in to the Canadian defence and production pattern, will be of important assistance to the urgent needs in Europe;

(b) that the considerations listed in paragraph 2 continue to be applied in determining the content of the Mutual Aid Programme, with the removal of the restriction on new commitments and with emphasis on directing the content as far as possible to the support of the most urgent European defence requirements; for example, Canada will explore the reference by the International Staff to the need for high performance aircraft and will give careful consideration to the possibility of providing assistance of this type;

(c) that Canada should make a more critical appraisal, than has been the practice in the past, of the use of its Mutual Aid, both in assuring itself that the content meets essential needs and that the allocations are in accordance with those needs. In applying this, the Panel do not suggest abandoning the system that has been used heretofore of seeking the advice of the Standing Group or the International Staff on these matters, but rather to take more active participation in having Canadian views taken into account by these bodies in formulating their recommendations;

(d) that in the run-down of the programme of transferring stocks of World War II equipment, which should largely be completed in the next fiscal year, in addition to the content being examined critically, the valuation placed on the equipment be related to the actual cost to Canada of making this equipment available as Mutual Aid. This will reduce the dollar value placed on the programme of 1956/57;

(e) that Canada should pursue the efforts commenced in 1954 towards a greater interchange of information with United States with respect to Mutual Air Programmes, and to correlate the efforts where it may be desirable and possible without sacrificing Canadian control and direction of its own programme.

NATO COUNCIL OF MINISTERS; POLICY ON MUTUAL AID, COMMON INFRASTRUCTURE AND PRIORITIES WITHIN NATO

28. The Secretary submitted recommendations of the Panel on Economic Aspects of Defence Questions concerning the attitude which Ministers might wish to take, at the forthcoming NATO Ministerial Council meeting, on mutual aid on common infrastructure and on priorities within NATO.

In outline, the panel felt that mutual aid should be continued but that a more critical appraisal should be made of the types of items, their needs and their destinations. As regards infrastructure, it was recommended that the government agree, in principle, to another programme. One of the main matters to be discussed in Paris would be the problem of reconciling military requirements with the economic and budgetary positions of the individual partners in the alliance. The panel felt that Ministers might acknowledge the need for a general re-assessment of the NATO defence programme with a view to determining how best the common defence might be achieved.

Explanatory memoranda had been circulated.

(Memoranda, Panel on Economic Aspects of Defence Questions, Nov. 25, Nov. 29, Dec. 5, 1955 — Cab. Docs. 236,<sup>21</sup> 237,<sup>22</sup> 238-55).

29. During the course of discussion the following points emerged:

(a) In the past Canada had tended to rely too much on the recommendations of the standing group about the allocation of mutual aid items. In future, it would be useful to take a more active part in discussions on this matter in an effort to provide countries with the type of equipment for which there was a real need.

(b) It was quite likely that Canada and the United States would be asked not only to continue to provide mutual aid, but to make larger contributions to infrastructure. To meet such a request would be impossible. It was pointed out in reply that in the past, Canada had been prepared to assume as her proper share only a certain percentage of the infrastructure programme and that above this any share which it was felt Canada could bear, had been charged to mutual aid. Now that Germany was in NATO, she should pay her proper share of the costs of infrastructure, and this should reduce Canada's share proportionately.

(c) The air training programme was serving a useful purpose for many countries, but it was not sensible for Canada to train airmen from countries where there were already adequate facilities. If the U.K. and France looked after their own air training mutual aid costs could be reduced.

(d) At first, mutual aid amounted to $300 million. For the current fiscal year it was $175 million and for the next year would be approximately $143 million. Earlier figures had been inflated by the high values placed on second hand equipment transferred abroad. The new programme should be more realistic in this respect.

(e) While it would be difficult, Canada had to convince its NATO partners that the defence of North America with its air bases was just as important as the defence of the Rhine. Canadian efforts in the north were in the interests of the alliance as a whole, but they would of necessity limit the contributions Canada could make to Europe.

(f) The re-appraisal of the NATO defence policy was not of as much concern to Canada and to the U.S. as to the other NATO nations. However, it was important that it be carried out so that all the allies would have some compelling direction to undertake the most essential projects and justification for reducing or eliminating less essential programmes which had strong domestic support.

(g) Canada had one-third of a division stationed in Europe, and was committed to complete the division by D-Day plus shipping time. An impression existed in some quarters that Canada was committed to sending a second division to Europe after hostilities broke out. This matter had to be cleared up satisfactorily. In any event, the nature of war nowadays was such that it would not be possible to complete the one division by D-Day plus shipping time let alone send another one abroad subsequently.

(h) Now that the Korean commitment had been all but extinguished, there was one brigade which was surplus to immediate defence requirements. Housing these troops in permanent quarters would be expensive and add materially to defence expenditures. Perhaps the best course would be to disband it and absorb the personnel in other units. Meanwhile, the Chief of the General Staff had been asked for a report on the problem.

(i) An important item to be considered at the council meeting was the future of Germany, particularly the question of unification. Canadian policy and, indeed, the policies of other NATO nations, were based on the assumption that the Federal German Republic would stand firm in the face of Russian overtures, remain in NATO and rearm. An effort should be made in Paris to get an assurance from West German representatives that they were satisfied with the existing situation. It was possible that there would be a suggestion to postpone rearmament for 6 or 12 months to see if free elections for all Germany could be held within that period. Such a proposal might effectively call the Russians' bluff and should, perhaps, be accepted. There was no doubt what would happen now if elections were truly free.

30. The Cabinet noted the reports of the Panel on Economic Aspects of Defence Questions about matters to be considered at the forthcoming NATO Ministerial Council meeting, and approved the recommendations which were submitted regarding future policy on mutual aid and common infrastructure and with respect to the attitude to be adopted on the establishment of priorities within NATO through a general re-assessment of the NATO defence programme.

CANADIAN CONTRIBUTION TO THE COST OF NATO CIVIL AND MILITARY AGENCIES

In 1952, following the admission of Greece and Turkey to the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, it was agreed that the peacetime costs of all NATO civil and military agencies should be shared in accordance with the following formulae:

Country	Current Operating Costs	Capital Costs
Belgium	4.00%	2.68%
Canada	10.00	6.70
Denmark	2.25	1.51
France	22.50	10.73
Greece	0.50	0.33
Iceland	0.05	0.03
Italy	7.65	5.36
Luxembourg	0.13	0.08
Netherlands	3.50	2.18
Norway	1.30	0.84
Portugal	1.00	0.64
Turkey	2.12	1.42
United Kingdom	22.50	22.50
United States	22.50	45.00

2. On May 8, 1952 the Cabinet agreed that Canada should contribute to the costs of the NATO civil and military agencies for the year 1952 in accordance with the above formulae and on October 15, 1952 and July 6, 1953 Cabinet agreed that, for the years 1953 and 1954 respectively, Canada should continue to contribute to the current and capital costs of NATO civil and military agencies in accordance with the formulae agreed to in 1952. These formulae have been used to determine cost-sharing to date.

3. This cost-sharing agreement has been considered unsatisfactory by Canada but it has been agreed to by Cabinet on the conditions that Canada's acceptance was without prejudice to a review of the agreement in the future, and that the Canadian share beyond a percentage representative of current capacity to pay would be paid from the Mutual Aid appropriation without a resultant increase in that appropriation. Under the formula for current costs, Canada's share has been almost half that of the United States'. This lack of balance was offset to some extent by the high United States contribution, relative to Canada's contribution, under the cost-sharing formula for capital expenditures. However, capital expenditures have been decreasing in the last few years.

4. This year, with Germany's admission into NATO, it has been necessary to reach agreement on a new formula. At the outset of these discussions on a new single formula for operational and capital costs, the United States Delegation proposed a formula under which the United States contribution would be 22.5 per cent with a Canadian contribution of 7.75 per cent. The United States Delegation, in support of this proposal, stressed that no one member should pay a preponderant share of the regular running expenses of the NATO headquarters. The U.S. Delegation also took the position that their new percentage contribution must be lower than their contribution to the total 1955 operational and capital budgets under the old formulae (i.e., 25.89 per cent).

5. The Canadian Delegation was instructed to attempt to achieve a cost-sharing formula whereby the total North American contribution would be divided between the United States and Canada on a 5/6-1/6 basis and the balance divided among the European members. However, the European members were not willing to join with the Canadian Delegation in insisting upon a higher percentage contribution for the United States and, while in general sympathy with our position, believed that a contribution from Canada of 4.50 per cent (i.e., one-fifth of 22.50 per cent) would result in too wide a disparity between the Canadian contribution and that of European members. As a compromise, the United States agreed to accept a contribution of 24.2 per cent and submitted a final proposal which envisaged a Canadian contribution of 5.8 per cent. This proposal, which was found to be generally acceptable in the North Atlantic Council, is as follows:

Country	Contribution
Belgium	2.86%
Canada	5.80
Denmark	1.65
France	17.10
Germany	16.10
Greece	0.39
Iceland	0.05
Italy	5.96
Luxembourg	0.09
Netherlands	2.85
Norway	1.15
Portugal	10.65
Turkey	1.65
United Kingdom	19.50

6. While, under the new single formula given above, the relationship between the Canadian and the United States contributions is not quite as favourable as it had been hoped to obtain, it is a definite improvement over the relationship under the present operational cost formula. The relationship of our contribution to the contributions of all other countries under the proposed new formula is quite satisfactory. Further, the Canadian contribution under the revised formula (5.8 per cent of the total or 6.9 per cent of the total excluding the German contribution) will be substantially lower than our average contribution to the total of operational and capital costs during the years 1951 to 1955 (8.32 per cent) or than our contribution in the year 1955 (9.50 per cent).

7. During the discussions on the cost-sharing formula, the United States offered, in order to gain support for its main proposal, to have the construction costs of the new NATO headquarters shared in accordance with the previous formula for capital costs, with Germany contributing on the basis of the same relative relationship to France as that established under the new formula. On this basis, the Canadian contribution to the costs of construction of the new headquarters building is 6.08 per cent compared to 6.70 per cent under the old cost-sharing formula for capital expenditures. On September 22, 1954 Cabinet agreed that Canada share with other NATO countries the cost of constructing the proposed new NATO permanent headquarters.

8. I recommend, with the concurrence of the Minister of National Defence, that the Canadian Representative to the North Atlantic Council be authorized to accept:

- (1) a contribution to the costs of the civil and military agencies of NATO in accordance with the permanent single cost-sharing formula as given in paragraph 5 above;
- (2) a contribution to the cost of construction of the new NATO permanent headquarters building amounting to 6.08 per cent.<sup>23</sup>

NATO COMMON INFRASTRUCTURE

The Size of Coming Programmes

1. In December, the Permanent Council of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization will be asked to approve the common infrastructure programme for 1956, the sixth of its kind and the third and last to be financed from the £250 million sterling committed to this purpose in 1953 by member governments including Canada.

2. At the meeting of NATO Defence Ministers in October, the Standing Group outlined its common infrastructure requirements for the years 1957 to 1959. The programme is directed towards making possible of attainment the "minimum military measures which must be taken to ensure survival and ultimate victory in spite of new Russian developments and capabilities". Its cost is estimated at £365 million, broken down as follows:

For dispersal of forces (primarily air units)	£142 million
For early warning of enemy attacks	£ 47 million
To implement forward strategy	£125 million
For support by improved equipment and techniques	£ 15 million
For miscellaneous works and unforeseen requirements	£30-35 million

3. Canada will be expected to finance part of this programme. Her contribution under the expiring programme is 7.13%. The accession of Germany to NATO should reduce this percentage to about 6%. Canada's share in dollars would amount to approximately $60.2 million or to an annual average contribution of $10.0 million if actual expenditures are spread out over a period of six years.

4. Funds committed but not yet spent under previous programmes amounted to £393 million at the end of September of which Canada's share is $72.6 million. If this balance is spent in the next four years, Canada's average annual contribution towards approved programmes will amount to $18.0 million.

5. Thus, under these assumptions, Canada would spend a total of $132.8 million on common infrastructure in the next six years and average expenditures in 1958 or 1959 would be $28 million.

Reasons for a New Programme

6. The justification for making new commitments on common infrastructure rests primarily on military grounds.

7. The purpose of common infrastructure is to provide the fixed buildings and installations required to support the forces committed to NATO command in wartime. The programmes already approved are, by and large, achieving this purpose. There can be little doubt that NATO common infrastructure programmes have contributed significantly and perhaps decisively to the military strength of the alliance. Had radical new developments in military science not intervened, there would probably have been no requirement for additional large expenditures on common infrastructure beyond those for which financial provision has already been made.

8. However, the adoption of the new planning assumptions of M.C. 48 and the entry of Germany into NATO have generated a military need for new facilities to support NATO forces in carrying out the forward strategy, including an early warning system in Europe, the facilities required to permit the more widespread dispersal of air and naval forces, and the facilities required to accommodate the German contribution of armed forces.

9. The failure of member governments to assume the burden of providing the new infrastructure required to meet the changed military situation could seriously weaken the defensive strength of the alliance at a time when the solidarity and the unity of the alliance needs to be strengthened more than ever in the face of the Soviet tactics of reducing the incentives by apparently diminishing the military threat. It seems unlikely that the greater part of the new facilities required could be provided other than by the continuation of commonly financed infrastructure since, although the economic conditions of member nations have for the most part improved recently, there still remain few nations which could finance their own requirements entirely from their own resources.

10. It should be recognized moreover that commonly financed infrastructure programmes have themselves contributed to the economic strength of several members of the alliance, who have obtained direct and tangible economic benefits from them. Infrastructure has generated economic activities within the territories of most European member countries and has been a significant source of dollar revenue to them. Granted that the military need for further infrastructure programmes exists, the contribution which they make to the economic strength of the alliance provides further justification for continuing commonly financed infrastructure programmes.

11. The common financing of infrastructure programmes does involve a certain number of disadvantages among which might be mentioned the difficulty of effectively screening the programmes, the lack of direct control over the expenditures of common funds, the unavoidable and at times very lengthy delays both in the execution of programmes and in obtaining the agreement of all concerned to altering them, and the inevitable political pressures and vested interests which must be overcome in all phases of such programmes. This leads to the conclusion, not that a further infrastructure programme is unnecessary, but that its size and content require very careful scrutiny.

The Size of the Programme

12. Until the Standing Group has briefed the Council more fully, it is not possible to say whether a programme of the size contemplated by the Standing Group should be approved. In general, it might be said that it is preferable to have the Standing Group request the Council to commit funds now on projects whose value and usefulness cannot be immediately demonstrated.

The Content of the Programme

13. At present, to be eligible for common financing a project must conform to the following criteria:

- (a) it must be a fixed building or installation;
- (b) it must be essential to the implementation of NATO operational plans; and
- (c) it must have a sufficient degree of common use or interest.

The categories of projects which have been financed under this definition include airfields, naval bases, pipelines, communications, war headquarters, radar installations and air traffic control centres.

14. The programme outlined by the Standing Group will involve the extension of common infrastructure to new categories of projects conforming to the three criteria described above. The Council might also be asked to extend common financing to cover mobile equipment.

15. The extension of common financing to include mobile equipment could seriously weaken the degree of control which we can exercise over the size and particularly the content of the annual programmes. At the moment, the two main limiting factors are (a) the financial ceilings and (b) the criterion which confines infrastructure to fixed buildings and installations. The removal of the second factor would make it more difficult for Supreme Commanders to resist the pressures to extend in as many directions as possible the area of common financing. Such pressures are bound to arise in a programme such as the one under discussion and originate both within the military commands themselves and in host countries. Thus, the extension of common financing to mobile equipment would make it even more difficult to keep common financing within any well defined limits and to be sure that our contribution is put to its most effective use.

16. If, however, the need for certain types of mobile equipment is proven and if it is shown that it cannot be provided except through common financing, it would be preferable to list this equipment as an exception to the accepted definition of common infrastructure rather than to enlarge the definition itself.

Recommendation

17. It is recommended:

- (a) that the Government agree, in principle, to another common infrastructure programme;
- (b) that it do not at this time commit itself to a programme of a particular size and content; and

(c) that, when the time comes to assess and approve the programme, Canadian representatives should, in order to make it both effective and economical, review it carefully and critically.<sup>24</sup>

F86 AIRCRAFT — VISIT OF MR. JH DAVIS,
EUROPEAN REPRESENTATIVE OF CANADAIR

We were visited today by Mr. Davis, who was anxious to find out whether we were familiar with the details of German military aircraft procurement plans and whether any policy decision had been taken regarding Canadian mutual aid to Germany now that she has entered NATO.

2. On the first point, we told Mr. Davis that we in this delegation had not been closely concerned and it was most unlikely that we would be in future as all major decisions were a German national responsibility and would accordingly be taken in Bonn (Mr. Davis voiced his appreciation of informal assistance given by the Bonn Embassy in placing him in touch with influential Germans in Blank's office). We had, as yet, only very general preliminary contacts with the German delegation which had not been finally constituted. In particular, no German defence production adviser had been appointed to date and, even after his nomination, it was improbable that he would be directly involved in the detail of German procurement planning. His task would presumably be participation in the discussion of certain broader issues affecting all NATO partners within the Defence Production Committee. If, however, we did pick up any information which might properly and usefully be passed on to Mr. Davis, we would be glad to do so.

3. On the second point, we reminded Davis of our method of allocating mutual aid and, as a matter of principle, we did not believe that there could be any such thing as "a direct Canadian mutual aid contribution to Germany". We stated that we considered mutual aid to be generally on the decline, that emphasis was switching increasingly to North American defence and we, therefore, thought it unlikely that the Canadian Government would be prepared to enter into further long term mutual aid commitments such as the supply of Sabre VS or VIS which might, on standing group recommendation, be allocated to Germany. In spite of the foregoing, Davis asserted that Notman intended to visit Mr. Howe in the near future to see whether the latter would use his influence to press for a further Sabre mutual aid contribution on the grounds that it would assist very materially in maintaining in essential element of Canada's defence production base.

4. There remained the question of sales. Davis evidently hopes that the Canadian Government will use its good offices to influence the Germans to purchase defence equipment from Canada and that official pressure will also be exerted on the United States, either directly or through the Germans, to take active account of Canadian facilities in any United States MDAP programmes for Germany. The underlying motive would be to secure the equipment of German air units in the fourth ATAF with Canadair Orenda-equipped Sabres rather than with new North American J-47-equipped aircraft. Davis thought that the Germans themselves would be reluctant to accept used Sabre IIS under any re-transfer arrangement.

5. Davis admitted that he had come to "cry on our shoulder". Canadair's employment level had dropped to 7,000 and would be further reduced unless additional orders could be found in the immediate future. No stone could be left unturned in the search for orders. Canadair had, in recent months, lost a large proportion of highly skilled labour which would almost certainly be needed later on the Bristol 175 project. It would be most difficult to re-assemble this skilled labour force as many workers in it had gone to the United States. He thought that Canada's attitude regarding influencing the pattern of German defence procurement had been too gentlemanly. Neither the United Kingdom nor the United States had observed the rule during the last six months that the promotion of commercial interests should not be allowed to interfere with the ratification of the Paris agreements. This Canadian argument was in any case no longer valid, and, even if much time had been lost, he thought that the Germans would prefer to do business with Canada rather than with the United States. The latter had overplayed their hand. However, the Germans would shortly be taking firm decisions and further delay was most undesirable.

6. We gather from Davis that a visit to Canadair and to AV Roe was made recently by a Dr. Schellenberg and a Mr. Lengerke, who claimed to be undertaking a survey for the German administration of types, price and availability of aircraft in which the German air force might be interested. They are said to have quoted a requirement for 600 sabres. Davis, pending a further investigation of his own, has some doubts regarding the credentials of these two individuals and the German authority for their visit. He also mentioned in strict confidence that General Dynamics Corporation were actively considering the establishment of an aircraft plant in Germany which would be largely "germanized" in respect of both capital and personnel. Its object would be to cater for replacement equipment when either obsolescence or attrition demanded a changeover from initial aircraft to be obtained from abroad. He did not think that there would be any serious competition from pre-war German aircraft manufacturers.

7. Canadair may well try to pursue their enquiries and trade promotion efforts through us and it is possible that similar pressures may arise from other Canadian producers of defence equipment. We should accordingly be grateful for your guidance on the line which we should take on matters of this kind. We are sending by bag a copy of this telegram to Bonn and you may think it advisable to inform Washington.

ALLOCATION OF CANADIAN AIRCRAFT TO GERMANY

Davis of Canadair called today on the Commercial Counsellor and told him that his head office had informed him that at a meeting which Crawford Gordon and Notman had recently with Mr. Howe, the Minister agreed that "Canada would allocate 25 million dollars to NATO earmarked to provide three squadrons of military aircraft for Germany" which would be two Canadian Sabres and one Avro CF100. Davis said that at a meeting which he had had with Dr. Erhard this morning he had given him the foregoing information suggesting that it was one of the important results of Professor Erhard's visit to Canada.

2. Davis added that Professor Erhard had been visibly pleased by this information and that he had indicated that he would inform Chancellor Adenauer and Defence Minister Blank and write his thanks to Mr. Howe.

3. Representatives in Germany of Avro have informed the Commercial Counsellor that Morley and Davous will arrive here July 4 for talks with the Ministry of Defence regarding the supply of Canadian aircraft.

4. I have no means of knowing whether Davis' account of Mr. Howe's decision is accurate. On the assumption that this information is correct (which seems to me improbable) it seems highly inappropriate that the first information regarding it should reach the German Government not through the Canadian Government but through the Canadair representative. In addition there is the obvious consideration that such an allocation would have to be made on standing group recommendation.

5. On the assumption that the information received by Mr. Davis is incorrect a most awkward situation will have been created as Dr. Erhard and the Chancellor are now under the impression that Germany will be receiving these aircraft as mutual aid.

6. Needless to say Mr. Davis did not consult this Embassy before making his communication to Dr. Erhard. My own last information on the subject is contained in your telegram 120 of June 7† addressed to Canac Paris repeated Bonn to the effect that "it seems most unlikely that any F86 aircraft will be made available as mutual aid to Germany".

7. As you may recall I have frequently asked to be kept in touch with any changes of policy on this subject. I should be grateful for the earliest possible information on the situation together with your instructions as there is always the possibility that the German authorities may take this matter up with me or even may issue a public statement concerning it.

ALLOCATION OF CANADIAN AIRCRAFT TO GERMANY

The information which Davis claims to have received to the effect that "Canada would allocate $25 million to NATO earmarked to provide three squadrons of military aircraft for Germany" is quite inaccurate. The most that Mr. Howe said in a discussion with industry representatives was that he would be prepared to examine the problem carefully if other departments concerned, particularly National Defence, were prepared to recommend the provision of such aircraft to Germany. Mr. Howe was aware at that time that officials were not, repeat not, prepared to make such a recommendation.

2. In the circumstances, I think it would be desirable for you to seek an interview with Professor Erhard as soon as possible to deny the accuracy of what Davis is alleged to have told him. You will doubtless wish to explain to Erhard the procedures through which Canadian Mutual Aid is made available.

3. For your own information, DDP is protesting vigorously to the Canadian companies concerned at what they regard as a bare-faced attempt to force the Canadian Government's hand. We shall continue to keep you advised.<sup>25</sup> Ends.

ALLEGED OFFER OF JET AIRCRAFT BY CANADA

I saw Dr. Erhard this morning (after persistent but fruitless efforts to see him earlier) and explained to him that Davis' statement to him was inaccurate. At the same time I outlined our mutual aid procedures.

2. Dr. Erhard was plainly upset and disappointed. He said that he had already informed the Chancellor of the "Canadian offer" and that he would now have to tell him that the story was not true. He went on to say that he could not understand how a man in Davis' position could make such a statement and assure him that it was "official". I reminded Dr. Erhard that Davis does not represent the Canadian Government and that any communication on its behalf made in Bonn would come through this Embassy.

3. Dr. Erhard asked what explanation Davis had given to this Embassy for the story which he had told him. I said that I judged that Mr. Davis believed that he had information along the lines he had explained to Dr. Erhard but that I had since communicated with the Canadian Government and could assure Dr. Erhard that Mr. Davis' story was not accurate.

4. I then raised the question of the German Press Agency story referred to in your telegram No. 145† which also appeared in the German Press today. I said that I proposed to telegraph my government if he agreed that this was not an official German statement but merely a press rumour. Dr. Erhard replied that it was, of course, not official and that the story did not come from him. He added, however, that if pressed for a statement he would have to reply by giving a full account of what had transpired with Mr. Davis, otherwise people would think him "insane" for having believed such a story.

5. I said that the Canadian Government for their part might be pressed for a statement. I thought it would be unfortunate if statement and counter statement led to any misunderstanding between our two countries. I suggested that Dr. Erhard and I might keep in touch on the publicity aspect and that he would inform me, if possible, before making any public statement. He agreed and said that for his part he would like to be informed before any public statement was made in Canada. I agreed to this with the proviso that in the time interval between now and receiving your further instructions the Canadian Government might have been placed in a position where it had to make some form of statement. I think it is important, if at all possible, to maintain this understanding with Dr. Erhard about public statements and should therefore hope that you could furnish me with the text of any contemplated statement in advance. In this way we may hope to avoid further trouble.

6. No doubt Dr. Erhard finds himself in a very embarrassing position, having presumably taken credit with the Chancellor for obtaining this "gift from Canada". However, had he wished to confirm the accuracy on Davis' statement he had only to communicate with this Embassy. Moreover, for your personal information, I can only think that despite Dr. Erhard's denial the German Press Agency story "leaked" either from him or his assistant, Dr. Seipt, who was present at the interview with Mr. Davis. It certainly did not leak from this Embassy. I should be grateful if you could let me know as soon as possible what the position is regarding any possible Canadian Government statement so that I can keep in touch with Dr. Erhard.

Dear Mr. Ritchie,

As you know, Canadair have been attempting to sell Sabre Jet aircraft powered with Orenda engines to the Government of Germany. We both suffered some embarrassment through the suggestion made by an agent of Canadair that these aircraft would be a present from Canada as mutual aid.

However, it has now been determined that the United States will give Germany only one-third of her aircraft requirements (instead of two-thirds as originally suggested), and that West Germany has allocated approximately nine billion Deutsch Marks for their own military procurement programme. Canadair now believes that there is an opportunity to sell Canadian-built planes with Canadian-built engines to Germany for dollars. In the event that the Germans plan to build their own airframes, it is possible that we can sell the Orenda engines. In any event, Canadair will attempt to make the sale.

I will appreciate the favour if you and your staff will support this transaction in every way possible. Canadair is coming to the end of its Canadian programme and needs additional work. An extension of its Sabre programme would be an excellent solution.

Our squadrons in Germany are equipped with Sabre aircraft of the type that will be offered. I understand that these aircraft have built up a splendid reputation as against aircraft of other countries. I suggest that it may be possible to make the sale in spite of everything.

I enclose copy of letter† addressed to myself from J.G. Notman, President of Canadair.

My wife joins me in sending warm personal regards to Mrs. Ritchie and yourself.

Yours sincerely,

SALE OF SABRE JET AIRCRAFT TO GERMANY

As you are aware, Mr. Campney approached Mr. Wilson, United States Secretary for Defence, during the NATO meeting in Paris regarding the possible supply as mutual aid of between 75 and 130 F-86 aircraft, pointing out that the Supreme Allied Commander, Europe, had suggested that it might be a useful contribution as mutual aid to Germany. I believe that Mr. Wilson's initial reaction to this suggestion was favourable.

2. As you know from my telegram under reference, I had been going on the assumption, as a result of Mr. Howe's letter, that the proposal was for the sale of these aircraft as a commercial transaction for dollars. I assume, of course, that Mr. Howe knows of the new position with regard to mutual aid. Meanwhile, however, I am not, repeat not, mentioning this latter possibility to Davis of Canadair.

3. I understand that Mr. Campney invited Herr Blank, German Minister of Defence, to visit an RCAF Station to see a performance of sabre jets without, of course, giving him any indication that there was possibility of these planes being supplied as mutual aid to Germany. I am wondering whether it is intended to follow up this proposal with an official invitation to Herr Blank and whether this will be done direct on the ministerial level or whether any action is required by this Embassy. I assume that the air division will be informed in due course regarding the proposed visit.

4. In view of the embarrassment caused on a previous occasion by the leakage through Canadair's representative of information regarding the possibility of Canada supplying planes as mutual aid to Germany, I hope that this time if Canadair are informed in advance of the transaction they will be instructed to exercise discretion. There is another aspect of the activities of Canadair's representative, Mr. Davis, in Germany, which is causing me some concern. When he visited me recently, Mr. Davis told me that a certain Dr. Prentzel, a German contact of his, had suggested to him that the Germans were interested in the supply of uranium from Canada. Mr. Davis felt that this possibility would be "a carrot which could be dangled" before the Germans to encourage them in purchasing sabre jet aircraft. I told Mr. Davis at the time that the disposal of Canadian uranium was a matter of policy for the Canadian Government and was a matter also of considerable international delicacy and was a subject which should not be discussed in Germany. I was, therefore, disturbed to see a letter from Mr. Davis to G/C Edwards, Air Attaché at this Embassy, dated December 10, in which it is stated that he (Mr. Davis) had suggested to Canadair "that Mr. Notman should put forward to Mr. Howe the proposal made by Dr. Prentzel concerning the supply of certain material and he can dangle the appropriate carrot before Minister Strauss, and again I asked him to advise us as soon as possible." Mr. Davis' letter goes on to say, "I have now suggested to Dr. Prentzel that I feel we should lose no time, or leave a gap for our competitors, so that he might feel it advisable to talk to Strauss (German Minister for Atomic Affairs) and Rust, tell them of the position, and intimate that he would like to feel it possible to put forward a suggestion to the appropriate Canadian authorities through the Ambassador, that they might be able to help with the supply of the material in question, which would obviously not commit anybody, but perhaps keep the door firmly barred against competitors' activities in the meantime, and I have told him that if he would like me to be present I could be any time next week up to Wednesday, but I have suggested to him that it might be more appropriate if I were not present until we have some news from the other side." On my return from the NATO meeting in Paris today I telephoned Mr. Davis in London and told him once again that he should not discuss with his German contacts the possibility of Canadian supply of uranium to Germany.

5. In view of Dr. Menne's interest in the possibility of obtaining uranium from Canada (see my despatch No. 1030 of December 1†) and of the fact that the supply of uranium is a delicate matter in international relations in connection with Eura Atom, I suggest that Mr. Davis should stay out of this field entirely.

6. I should be grateful to be kept informed as fully as possible on all current developments in Ottawa affecting Germany regarding:

- (a) the possibility of sabre jets being supplied as mutual aid to Germany; and
- (b) the possibility of Canadian delivery of uranium to Germany.

7. I spoke to Mr. Pearson on this subject in Paris and he suggested that Mr. Howe should be informed of Mr. Davis' activities with regard to the supply of uranium. I should therefore be grateful if Mr. Howe could be informed of these developments.

MUTUAL AID TO TURKEY — SHIPPING CHARGES

I understand that the Minister of National Defence may raise the above subject at an appropriate time during the current meetings of Cabinet and you may therefore find helpful the following brief background note.<sup>26</sup>

For some time now the Turkish Government has been experiencing a good deal of difficulty in rounding up the necessary foreign exchange to meet shipping charges involved in the carriage of our mutual aid cargoes to Turkey. More recently it has become clear that the inability of the Turkish Government to pay the substantial amounts (some $750,000) already owing to shipping companies will mean that these companies will no longer be willing to take the additional financial risks involved in accepting further mutual aid cargoes for Turkey. Moreover, even should the shipping companies themselves be prepared to continue to accept cargoes there is evidence that the Turks will be loathe to add to their external indebtedness by bidding for substantial amounts of Canadian mutual aid equipment.

Early this month the Turkish Foreign Ministry sent a note† to our Embassy in Ankara outlining the difficulties which were being faced by the Turkish Government and requesting that arrangements be made for future mutual aid cargoes to be shipped from an east coast Canadian port in Turkish vessels engaged in a regular liner service between New York and Turkey. Officials are now generally agreed that meeting this specific Turkish request would involve the Canadian Government in fairly heavy inland transportation, storage and other costs as well as in substantial administrative problems. It would also constitute a departure from, and hence place in jeopardy, our present policy of shipping mutual aid cargoes in regular bona fide liner services operating between Canadian ports and recipient countries. Finally, it would provoke requests (which it would be difficult for us to reject) from other countries for similar treatment.

There would appear to be no easy solution to the Turkish problem but, on balance, officials have concluded that the most realistic way of meeting it would be for Canada to agree, as a temporary measure, to meet from funds appropriated for mutual aid the future ocean shipping cost arising from the carriage of mutual aid cargoes for Turkey.<sup>27</sup> While the payment of such charges for Turkey alone might result in requests from other NATO countries (and possibly Colombo Plan countries as well) for similar treatment, it was considered that in the case of Turkey unique considerations, particularly those relating to the present Turkish balance of payments position, apply. It was also agreed that, while a favourable decision with respect to the payment of shipping charges for Turkey might be considered as setting a precedent, it was not appropriate or necessary at this stage to define the conditions under which other countries receiving Canadian aid would be eligible for similar assistance.

Officials generally agreed that it was not appropriate for Canada to offer similar treatment to other NATO countries, many of whom could readily afford to meet their own shipping charges and many of whom were actually benefitting from the shipping arrangements which we make (which permit ships of other NATO countries, on a non-discriminatory basis, to participate in the carriage of mutual aid and other Canadian Government cargoes.) It will be appreciated however that our willingness to make special arrangements for Turkey might cause the Greeks some concern; nevertheless it is considered that unless there are strong political reasons for according the Greeks similar treatment we should refrain from action which would excite similar requests from Italy, Portugal and perhaps others as well.<sup>28</sup> A Greek request, when and if it is received, should probably be considered on its own merits. Mr. Campney will no doubt have these (and other) considerations in mind during his visit to Turkey and Greece.

Trade and Commerce officials did not disagree with this line; the question of arrears, I understand, is to be dealt with separately after Mr. Campney's return.<sup>29</sup>

[Ankara], October 10, 1955

On October 3, 1955, the Honourable Ralph Campney, Canadian Minister of National Defence and General Foulkes, Chairman, Chiefs of Staff, held separate conversations with Acting Foreign Minister Fatin Rustu Zorlu, and Deputy Prime Minister and Acting Defence Minister, Fuad Koprulu. General Tuanboylu, Acting Chief of the General Staff assisted at the second meeting; General Ariburun, Vice-Chief of the Air Staff, at both. The following is a brief summary of the principal questions raised and decisions taken.

I—CANADIAN MUTUAL AID SHIPPING CHARGES

The Canadian Minister of National Defence advised the Turkish Ministers of the Cabinet decision,<sup>30</sup> taken just prior to his departure, that the Canadian Government would assume as a charge against Mutual Aid funds the costs arising in future from the carriage of Mutual Aid cargoes from Canadian to Turkish ports. All future Mutual Aid cargoes for Turkey will therefore be delivered at Turkish rather than Canadian ports. The decision is being put into immediate effect.

The new arrangement constitutes a departure from Canada's established practice. It is an exception being made only for Turkey in recognition of special circumstances, including balance of payments difficulties. To avoid charges in discrimination or pressure from other recipients of Mutual Aid for similar treatment, the Canadian Government wishes that the decision neither be made public nor made known to other NATO countries. The NATO Council is not being informed of this purely private, bilateral Canadian-Turkish arrangement.

II—TURKEY'S AIRCRAFT REQUIREMENTS

(a) F-86E Sabre Jets

Turkey's need for 25 more IDF aircraft in each of the next two years in order to reach the force goals approved by SHAPE was put forward by Turkish Ministers and the possibility of their procurement in Canada was discussed.

The Canadian position as a source of supply was described as follows: Canada has come to the end of its supply of F-86E's powered with the American-made J-47 engine. Arrangements are about to be made to transfer to the USAF in December 1955 the responsibility for the future maintenance and spares support of these engines. Air Commodore Millard, RCAF, will visit Turkey shortly in that connection. The supply of spare engines remaining in Canada will be made available as Mutual Aid.

Any further F-86's which become surplus to Canadian requirements will, however, be powered by the Canadian-made Orenda engine, the maintenance and supply of which can only be carried out under commercial contract in North America and the United Kingdom. The allocation to NATO countries of the Orenda-powered F-86 as part of Mutual Aid would therefore present special maintenance and supply problems and would involve substantial additional cost to the Canadian Government. The Canadian Government will be reviewing the whole question shortly and will have to weigh carefully the special difficulties involved in embarking upon the inclusion, as Mutual Aid, of aircraft powered by the Orenda engine against the urgency of unfilled needs of her NATO partners.

(b) Elementary Trainers

Turkey's need for additional elementary training aircraft of the Harvard type will be studied by the Canadian Government. As the RCAF is in the process of switching to a more advanced type of elementary trainer, some surplus aircraft may be released as Mutual Aid. The question will be referred to the Canadian Chief of the Air Staff.

III—AIRFORCE TRAINING REQUIREMENTS

(a) Air Crew

86 pilot spaces in the Canadian Air Training Programme have been allocated to Turkey for the period July 1, 1955 to June 30, 1956 and this number is to be increased to 120 for the training year 1956-57; to reach the pilot/aircraft ratio approved by SHAPE, Turkey requires that the number be increased to 150 pilot spaces annually until 1958. Turkey's request that the additional facilities needed be made available under the Canadian Air Training Programme will be sympathetically considered. Since the requirements of the United Kingdom and other NATO countries may shortly be falling off, the possibility of making available to Turkey 30 additional spaces annually will be mentioned by General Foulkes to General Gruenther in Paris.

The Canadian Government has authorized the Canadian Air Training Programme at its present level only until 1958; new authority must therefore be sought for succeeding years. A review of the whole question of the Air Training Programme will shortly be undertaken and its structure may be substantially re-organized to involve more direct Canadian control over the allocation of spaces. The Programme, which is operated at the high cost to the Canadian taxpayer of approximately 65 million dollars annually, will therefore require careful justification in order to obtain renewed Government authority.

In this connection, it would assist the Canadian Government in securing the continuation beyond 1958 of the Air Training Programme if the NATO recipients of this form of Mutual Aid can improve the standard of their trainees. For Turkey the object should be to reduce the number of failures, now running at the unsatisfactory level of 60 percent. Language difficulties and personnel problems, arising out of lack of familiarity with a new and strange environment, are recognized as major obstacles to improvement. The Canadian Government is already assisting by providing 20 weeks' special language training for Turkish trainees and the Turkish Government, for its part, can assist by increasing the effectiveness of preliminary training in Turkey and selecting only the best-qualified candidates. It is understood that the Turkish Government will review and improve the standards of both training and orientation indoctrination at Turkish preliminary air training centres.

It was agreed that the following additional measures would be taken in an effort to increase the number of Turkish candidates successfully completing air training in Canada:

(i) At the invitation of the Canadian Government, two Turkish Liaison Officers, one to be stationed at each Programme training centre in Canada, are to be posted to Canada to deal with administrative and personnel problems.

(ii) The Canadian Government is prepared to give consideration to the posting of an Air Attaché to the Canadian Embassy, Ankara, for the same purpose.

Reference was made in the course of the discussions to the fact that, because the present training in Canada stops short of jet flying and gunnery, the Canadian Air Training Programmes does not produce a combat-ready pilot. On return to Turkey, successful trainees still require an additional six months training. It was explained that Canadian trainees go on to operational units for their advanced flying training and gunnery. The possibility of extending similar facilities to Turkish trainees at Canadian operational units as part of Mutual Aid will be referred to the Canadian Chief of the Air Staff.

IV—GROUND TRAINING

(a) Supply and Maintenance Specialists

To relieve the demands on Canada, steps should be taken to make the Turkish Airforce self-sufficient in supply and maintenance personnel. It was agreed that the Turkish Airforce will send for training to the RCAF Air Materiel Base, Langar, England, supply and maintenance specialists who will in time take over responsibility for these matters.

(b) Trade Training

Foreign exchange spent by Turkey on the passages to Canada of pilot trainees who prove unsuccessful is wasted under the present system whereby they are simply returned to Turkey for assignment to other duties. The Turkish Government's suggestion that they be switched to trade training (electronics, gun sights, etc.) in Canada will be referred to the Canadian Chief of the Air Staff for consideration.

V—ARMOUR

Canada is a producer of neither tanks nor armoured vehicles and is therefore not in a position to meet the Turkish Government's request for assistance in providing the major items of equipment for an armoured division. Regarding the availability in Canada as Mutual Aid of other components of an armoured division, the following observations were made:

(a) AA Guns

54 3.7" guns have already been delivered to Turkey as Mutual Aid. The possibility of further deliveries will be investigated.

(b) Vehicles (ordinary)

Substantial numbers of 3 and 4 ton trucks, 15 cwt's, jeeps, etc. have already been allocated to Turkey as Mutual Aid. The Canadian Government will give consideration to the supply of further quantities as Mutual Aid.

(c) Training

The Canadian Army has complete training facilities for armoured units in Canada and would be prepared to consider extending these facilities to Turkish trainees.

VI—OTHER MUTUAL AID EQUIPMENT

In future, available Mutual Aid equipment will be almost entirely new and will consist mainly of vehicles, ammunition and explosives, and electronics equipment — i.e., items for which the Canadian Government particularly wishes to maintain a high level of productive capacity.

ITEM 1: 105TH MEETING CABINET DEFENCE COMMITTEE, JUNE 7, 1955
 MEASURES TO BE TAKEN ON AND AFTER WARNING OF ATTACK

The preparation of this submission (Doc. D 11-55†) was begun following consideration by the NATO Council on July 1, 1953, of a paper outlining the three-phased alert system. At that time the Council agreed that negotiations should commence between military commanders and national authorities leading to the approval of the proposed NATO Alert Measures. The proposed SACLANT Alert Measures are listed in Appendix "A" to the submission; the proposed SACEUR Alert Measures are contained in Appendix "B". Paragraph 12(a) of the submission recommends that:

"(a) The Canadian Government accept the NATO Alert Measures which have been proposed by SACEUR and SACLANT."

2. The NATO Alert Measures which appear to be of some concern to this Department are listed in enclosure 1 to this memorandum. They relate to:

(a) the evacuation of non-combatants from Europe;

(b) the diversion and evacuation of merchant shipping from exposed areas.

These matters are referred to in the Departmental War Book. The specific provisions in the War Book relating to them will of course have to be reviewed.

3. In addition to requesting approval of the NATO Alert Measures, the submission recommends in paragraph 12(c) that:

"(c) the Canadian Government approve, for use in Canada, the three-phased system of alerts and the Canadian Military Alert measures contained at Appendix "C"."

As Reinforced Alert measure No. 20 in Appendix "C" will necessitate the calling out of certain Reserve Forces and units, paragraph 12(d) recommends that:

"(d) the Minister of National Defence be given authority to call up specified Reserve forces and units on the declaration of a Reinforced Alert, or a General Alert if the War Measures Act is not in force."

The fourth recommendation, in paragraph 12(b), is that:

"(b) the proposed amendments to Chapter II of the 1948 Government War Book as contained in the proposed revision, attached as Appendix "D", be approved."

4. The adoption by Canada of the three-phased system is logical, and perhaps inevitable, not only because standardization of procedure and nomenclature throughout NATO is inherently desirable, but also because substantial Canadian forces are committed to NATO commanders. This has, however, important political consequences. At present, as outlined in enclosure 2,† the Cabinet reserves the right to decide when the various precautionary measures are to be implemented, and when the War Measures Act is to be invoked and the Defence of Canada Regulations are to be put into effect. The NATO documents, while recognizing that each government reserves to itself the authority to commit its nation to war, and that agreement from political authorities to authorize the implementation of preliminary measures will be obtained through the Council if time permits, propose that in a sudden and extreme emergency:

(a) Supreme Commanders and their immediate subordinates be authorized to declare the Simple Alert;

(b) Supreme Commanders be authorized, in consultation with individual governments concerned and the Standing Group, to declare the Reinforced Alert;

(c) Supreme Commanders be authorized, in the event of an overt act of armed aggression anywhere in NATO area, to call upon national authorities to implement such of the General Alert measures as they deem necessary.

5. The only reference in the submission to procedures for declaring Alerts in Canada is in paragraph 9 which reads as follows:

"Under normal conditions it is expected that the Cabinet or the Cabinet Defence Committee will authorize the calling of an alert, but that under extraordinary circumstances it is expected that their authority would be delegated to the Minister of National Defence." (my underlining)

As you know, we have proposed in concert with the United Kingdom that tripartite agreement should be reached on procedures leading up to the declaration of Alerts.<sup>31</sup> The elaboration of Canadian procedures is dependent on the result of these negotiations. In the meantime, however, I am strongly of the view that the underlined part of paragraph 9 should not be allowed to stand unquestioned. I have already argued at a recent meeting of the Interdepartmental Committee on the War Book, when this submission was considered, that, if any Minister is to have the authority to declare an Alert under extraordinary circumstances, this must be the Prime Minister. Failing him, the authority would, I suppose, fall on the Minister of National Defence, who would, of course, consult other Ministers to the extent permitted by circumstances.

6. For your information, planning is well under way for the rapid and effective handling of indications intelligence, including the setting up of a full-time Indications Room in the Department of National Defence. No further action is being taken, however, until tripartite agreement has been reached.

[PIÈCE JOINTE/ENCLOSURE]

NATO ALERT MEASURES OF SOME DIRECT CONCERN TO THE DEPARTMENT OF EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Note: These are all SACEUR's measures, and are listed in Appendix "B" to the submission. SACEUR requests agreement by Governments now that they will implement these measures on request during an Alert.

I. THE EVACUATION OF NON-COMBATANTS FROM EUROPE

Category 2, No. 1

(a) "National authorities are requested and military commanders are directed to prepare to evacuate allied non-combatants (Category A) from the allied occupation zones of Germany and Austria, and from other countries in Allied Command Europe as designated by national authorities." (Simple Alert).

Category 2, No. 13

(b) "National authorities are requested and military commanders are directed to proceed with the evacuation of allied non-combatants (Category A) from the allied occupation zones of Germany and Austria and from other areas in Allied Command Europe, as designated by national authorities." (Reinforced Alert).

Comment:

"Allied non-combatants" would include dependents of service personnel for which the military authorities are responsible. However all other classes of Canadians in these areas would be the responsibility of our Missions under our Emergency Plan for Evacuation.

II. THE DIVERSION AND EVACUATION OF MERCHANT SHIPPING FROM EXPOSED AREAS

Category 2, No. 3

(a) "National authorities are requested to advise, discreetly, ocean and coastal shipping agencies and shipowners that a period of international tension exists and that efforts should be made to diminish traffic of allied or friendly shipping in certain specified European areas." (Simple Alert).

Category 2, No. 5

(b) "National authorities are requested and military commanders are directed to consider local problems and make all discreet preliminary preparations possible for the evacuation of shipping and port equipment from Allied ports in Europe which would be dangerously exposed at the outbreak of hostilities. This measure includes the issuing of "Discreet" and "Inspired Warnings" to shipowners." (Simple Alert).

Category 2, No. 17

(c) "National authorities are requested and military commanders are directed to recommend strongly the diversion of allied or friendly shipping from hostile ports and waters, and from those allied or neutral ports and waters which would be dangerously exposed at the outbreak of hostilities." (Reinforced Alert).

Category 2, No. 19

(d) "National authorities are requested and military commanders are directed to recommend strongly and to prepare the evacuation of merchant shipping and port equipment from allied ports in Europe which would be dangerously exposed at the outbreak of hostilities." (Reinforced Alert).

Comment:

Except in so far as this Department maintains liaison on shipping matters with the Department of Transport, it would not appear that questions relating to the measures to be taken are a departmental responsibility. The Canadian Missions in Brussels, Copenhagen, Helsinki, Oslo, Stockholm and The Hague are responsible for shipping matters in those ports. In all other European ports, the United Kingdom authorities take care of Canadian shipping matters. Consequently some arrangements will have to be made concerning simultaneous action through these two separate channels.

I. MEASURES TO BE TAKEN ON AND AFTER WARNING OF ATTACK

1. The Minister of National Defence said that the NATO Council had approved, as a basis for negotiations between Supreme Allied Commanders and national authorities, a three-phased alert procedure. This set out the Simple, Reinforced, and General Alerts which were designed to cover the transitional period from peace to war. SACEUR and SACLANT had compiled a list of alert measures based on this procedure. These were so designed that each alert on declaration would cause certain actions to be taken. The Simple Alert required the taking of measures to ensure the prompt implementation of the Reinforced Alert. The Reinforced Alert meant the taking of measures to place NATO Commands in the best possible position to meet any attack, and the General Alert required measures to be taken on the outbreak of hostilities. The Supreme Allied Commander would declare a Simple Alert on receipt of credible information indicating definite preparations for an attack against any element of NATO and Austria. The Reinforced Alert would come into effect if there were conclusive indications that hostilities were imminent and the General Alert would be initiated in the case of an overt act of aggression against the North Atlantic Treaty area.

The three Services had examined and were prepared to recommend acceptance of SACEUR's and SACLANT's Alert Measures in so far as they reflected the participation of Canadian military forces as agreed under the North Atlantic Treaty. No special measures had been designated for the Canada-U.S. planning group since instructions would be issued to Canadian and U.S. authorities on a national basis, but proposed measures for use in Canada on the declaration of an alert by the government had been drawn up.

It was assumed that the most likely attack against Canada would be launched from the air, and in this case immediate action would be necessary to bring the Air Defence Forces up to full operational strength as rapidly as possible. The Air Defence Commander had been previously authorized by the Committee to engage apparently hostile aircraft. In the Simple Alert phase, it would not be necessary to call out reserve force units but should that phase remain in effect for a period of time, some reserves might be needed. On the Reinforced Alert, however, as shown in the draft Canadian measures, the calling out of some units was recommended. An examination of these draft alerts revealed that there was only one step which could not wait the authority of the Governor in Council. This was the calling up of reserves on a declaration of a Reinforced Alert.

Normally, it was expected that the Cabinet or the Cabinet Defence Committee would authorize the calling of an alert but under extraordinary circumstances it was expected this authority would be delegated to the Minister of National Defence. To implement the system proposed, it was suggested that the Government War Book be revised and brought into line with a suggested revision of the National Defence Chapter of the War Book which had been based on the three-phase Alert procedure.

He recommended that the NATO Alert Measures, proposed by SACEUR and SACLANT, be accepted; that the revised National Defence chapter of the 1948 Government War Book be approved; that the three-phased system of alerts be approved for use in Canada; and that the Minister of National Defence be authorized to call up specified reserve forces on the declaration of a reinforced general alert if the War Measures Act was not in force.

An explanatory memorandum had been circulated.

2. In the course of discussion, the following points emerged:

(a) Most senior public servants concerned with War Book planning had considered the Alert Measures submitted and, in general, recommended that they be approved. They recognized that the proposals did not go into the details of civil defence planning and that the problem of who would call an Alert for the civilian population had not yet been solved. The suggestions made and the interdepartmental discussions would not prejudice the results of the talks now being held with the U.K. and the U.S. authorities regarding the rapid exchange of information necessary for the calling of an Alert. The Department of National Defence was ready to establish a system in Canada for this exchange of indications once general agreement had been reached with the U.K. and the U.S.

(b) The importance of the NATO Alert measures arose from the presence of Canadian troops in Europe and the U.K. who might be subjected to certain procedures abroad which did not immediately and directly affect Canadian forces at home.

(c) Under normal conditions it was expected that the Cabinet or the Cabinet Defence Committee would authorize the calling of an Alert, but it was recognized that, under extraordinary circumstances, the Cabinet or the Cabinet Defence Committee might not be readily available to consider such action and therefore arrangements should be made for the Minister of National Defence, or, in his absence, any Minister, to call an Alert. This matter, however, along with the many others which the submission raised, should be spelled out in detail in the Government War Book. The Book should contain details of the circumstances under which an Alert should be declared and the action which a Minister may be called upon to exercise on its declaration and thereby enable whatever Minister would be exercising that responsibility to be fully aware of the implications of the action.

(d) It might, at this stage, be desirable only to approve in principle, and as a basis for future planning, the Canadian Military Alert measures, and to have them brought forward to the Committee at a later date when the redrafting of the War Book had been further advanced. At that time, specific references should be made in these measures to the legal authority, or the lack of it, for the individual steps proposed. If such statutory authority was not available and the measures concerned were considered vital, it might be necessary to introduce in Parliament the appropriate legislation. For example, the Department of National Health and Welfare did not have authority at the present time to control illumination. The present War Book was, however, completely out of date. Revising it was a large undertaking and it would be some time before a modern version together with the suggested annotated Canadian Alert measures could be brought forward for consideration.

(e) In order that there be no doubt as to the extent of the calling up of reserves and what units would be involved, a list would be prepared and revised each year to keep it up to date. The Simple Alerts included measures to be taken only by the government and the Services and had been designed not to alarm the public. On a Reinforced Alert, however, reserves would have to be called out, and it was certain that the public would soon know an emergency or near emergency existed.

(f) Canada would accept its responsibility for the part it had to take in the North American warning system, including the possible calling of an Alert. But in planning and in discussing problems with the U.S., the Americans could not expect to be allowed to comment on, or criticize, or seek to make us justify the methods adopted for carrying out that responsibility. The Interdepartmental Committee established in December to review civil defence was grappling with the problem of who might declare an emergency and order the evacuation of populated centres. The Committee recognized the danger that if the U.S. moved ahead of us there might be panic in Canada and similarly if Canada called an Alert first there might be panic in the U.S. It would probably therefore be necessary to co-ordinate the plans of the two countries. There was no objection to this but it would be undesirable if the Americans attempted to ascertain in detail how we proposed to fulfil our role.

3. The Committee noted the report of the Minister of National Defence on measures to be taken on and after warning of an attack, and:

(a) agreed to recommend that the NATO Alert measures proposed by SACEUR and SACLANT, as submitted, be approved; and

(b) agreed that the Canadian Military Alert measures, as submitted, be approved in principle as a planning basis for the revision of the 1948 Government War Book; it being understood that these measures with references to the legal authority, or to the lack of it, for the individual steps proposed, be re-submitted for discussion at a subsequent meeting at such time as the revised War Book was under consideration; and

(c) agreed to recommend that the Minister of National Defence be permitted to call out a specific number of reserves on a Reinforced Alert, or on a General Alert if the War Measures Act were not in force, the number and character of reserves to be called out to be authorized on a yearly basis.

"ALERT" PROCEDURES

Mr. Dulles and Sir Anthony Eden both spoke to the Minister in Paris before his return to Canada on December 19 about their concern over the problem of "alert" procedures by which action could be coordinated in an emergency, reserving all the rights of governments but permitting the military to make quick decisions. As Eden may wish Sir Norman Brook to discuss with you the next steps which might be taken, I am writing to give you the substance of Mr. Pearson's conversations and a brief account of the background.

2. Mr. Dulles, who saw the Minister first, thought that the formula which had been worked out at the Ministerial meeting of the North Atlantic Council in regard to military planning for the use of atomic weapons was a good one, and that the unanimity revealed on this matter was encouraging, especially in view of the unfortunate and tendentious press speculations which had preceded the meeting.<sup>32</sup> He was worried, however, about the possibility of subsequent discussion in the Council as to how the governments would exercise their right of decision in regard to the use of atomic weapons if an emergency developed. He felt that such a discussion would likely not be helpful and might be dangerous. It simply was not possible to work out in advance an agreement between fifteen nations on a subject of this kind which would cover every situation. The constitutional difficulties, for instance, which would prevent governments delegating powers in such a vital matter, could not be discussed publicly without giving aid and comfort to a potential aggressor.

3. Mr. Dulles admitted that there might have to be some understanding reached with the powers principally concerned, notably the United Kingdom, France and Canada, as to the procedure which should be followed for making quick and necessary decisions if an emergency developed. He thought, however, that any such arrangements should be kept very secret, and that NATO Council discussion of these matters, let alone public discussion, should be discouraged.

4. Mr. Pearson told Mr. Dulles that he was inclined to agree because it was practically impossible to reconcile constitutional positions with practical necessities in a case of this kind; that in any event developments would determine decisions and probably in a way which could not now be foreseen. Mr. Pearson went on to say that there were two things which we should do: first, by continuous consultation keep our policies in alignment, especially if the political situation should deteriorate, and, secondly, agree if possible on "alert" procedures so that the military would know what had to be done in an emergency.

5. Sir Anthony Eden, when he called on the Minister, also expressed anxiety about the effects of any public discussion of this matter. Unlike Mr. Dulles, however, he thought that studies should begin at once to see if satisfactory arrangements could not be agreed on. He was emphatic that the first examination of the problem should be by the United Kingdom, the United States and Canada alone. He was going to ask Sir Norman Brook to apply his mind to a solution. They would then take the matter up with Washington and Ottawa in the hope that the three governments could agree on plans. Only then would they discuss it with the French, and later with the other NATO members. He felt that the procedure adopted in regard to the formula for reconciling the necessities of military atomic planning with the ultimate responsibilities of governments for decision could usefully be applied to this other problem.

6. Mr. Pearson told Sir Anthony that we had already worked out some technical arrangements with the United States in regard to emergency action in North America and that this might be looked at in regard to a more general application. Eden said that they would be very grateful if you could tell them something about this. In view of your familiarity with this aspect of the problem I shall do no more here than touch on the main points.

Bilateral Arrangements between the United States and Canada

7. The United Kingdom authorities are of course aware that the arrangements for "meetings of consultation" in Washington to exchange views on developments in the world situation which might necessitate the use of atomic weapons, made with them following Mr. Attlee's visit in December 1950, were made also with us. We would have preferred trilateral meetings, and we understand that the United Kingdom Ambassador was also instructed in 1951 to do his best to place these consultations on a tripartite basis. The United States Government, however, preferred to have two sets of bilateral consultations on the ground that trilateral meetings might be misunderstood by other governments, particularly the French.<sup>33</sup>

8. We told the United States at the time that if separate bilateral discussions were continued we would wish to complete the triangle by consultation with the United Kingdom, and no objection was raised. The United Kingdom Government authorized its Ambassador in Washington to discuss fully with our Ambassador his consultations with the United States Government on the subject of atomic warfare. The United States Government has been aware that except on matters of North American defence the United Kingdom and Canadian Ambassadors have followed the practice of comparing notes after each consultation, and the State Department has accepted this without question. It has always been understood, of course, that no information about these discussions should be given to any government other than the three governments concerned.

9. These "meetings of consultation" have provided a good informal channel through which we gain access to the thinking of United States political and military authorities at a high level, and we believe that we should continue to make use of them whenever the occasion demands. We have always assumed that they take place within the framework of the responsibilities assumed by the United States for the principal strategic air offensive of

Allied powers and the arrangements for tripartite collaboration in the field of atomic energy.

10. The other arrangements which we have with the United States concern the handling of requests for permission to make use of facilities in Canadian territory or to fly over Canadian territory in connection with the employment of atomic weapons. No public announcement has been made about these arrangements comparable to the statement which has been made several times that the use of the United States Air Force bases in the United Kingdom in an emergency "would be a matter for joint decision by Her Majesty's Government and the United States Government in the light of the circumstances prevailing at the time." They have, however, been worked out in considerable detail.

11. An Order-in-Council (P.C. 2307 of April 17, 1952) sets out in general terms the regulations governing flights of United States service aircraft over Canadian territory. Related to the Order-in-Council, but not forming a part of it and therefore not subject to the requirement that Orders-in-Council be tabled and published, are two schedules. These contain the procedures to be followed for clearing normal service flights (Secret) and flights of Strategic Air Command aircraft involving the movement of atomic weapons (Top Secret). Technical arrangements designed to ensure that an urgent request by the United States Government could be considered with a minimum of delay by the Canadian Ministers concerned have been worked out and tested. In making these arrangements our object has been to maintain the responsibility of the Government of Canada in connection with any operations which may be launched from or through Canadian territory, while avoiding administrative procedures which might impede the United States Air Force in the discharge of its responsibilities under collective defense plans. The procedures are known only to a restricted number of ministers and officials of the two governments directly concerned. You should of course make this clear in any discussion of them with Sir Norman Brook or other United Kingdom officials.

The Problem of Alerts in NATO

12. In 1951 the Supreme Allied Commander, Europe, produced an outline of alert measures as an annex to his emergency defence plan and sent it to the Standing Group with a request that it be presented to governments for early approval. Pending approval, SACEUR stated that he would consider its provisions valid within his command. The annex was included in his emergency defence plan for 1952 and again for 1953 without having been formally approved. A similar annex was included in the emergency defence plans of the Supreme Allied Commander, Atlantic.

13. In May 1953 the Standing Group produced a document [S.G. 129/4 (Final)] which purported to approve SACEUR's annex, with certain amendments, and set forth general principles regarding alerts and the measures to be taken to implement them. At the same time the Standing Group directed SACEUR, SACLANT, Channel Command and the Canada-United States Regional Planning Group to approach national authorities with a view to:

(a) obtaining their agreement to delegate authority in advance to approved commanders to implement appropriate measures of the Simple Alert in the event of such an alert being declared in an emergency, without prior political authority;

(b) coordinating arrangements for the immediate implementation of appropriate alert measures in the event of an alert being declared in accordance with approved NATO procedures.

SACLANT, Channel Command and the Canada-United States Regional Planning Group were also directed to revise their alert measures to conform to the principles set forth in S.G. 129/4 (Final), and submit them to the Standing Group for consideration.

14. The Standing Group sent their document to the Secretary-General "for the Council's consideration", with a request that procedures be established which would ensure prompt action by the permanent representatives should a recommendation be submitted by the Standing Group or a supreme commander that an alert be declared. The Council, however, proceeded to assume that its approval was being sought, and the Standing Group did not demur. After making certain amendments to the document, the Council, on July 1, 1953:

(a) approved S.G. 129/4 (Revised Final) as a basis for negotiations between supreme commanders and national authorities;

(b) noted that during the bilateral negotiations the supreme commanders would have to act in accordance with S.G. 129/4 (Revised Final) in the absence of any other instructions, but that certain members of the Council were not yet in a position officially to endorse this procedure;

(c) reserved the right to examine this document again should they consider this to be necessary after receiving a report by the Standing Group on the negotiations between supreme commanders and national authorities.;

S.G. 129/4 (Revised Final) prescribes three stages of alert:

(a) SIMPLE—preparatory military measures which will ensure the prompt implementation of the Reinforced Alert, without seriously compromising or disclosing the overall operational plan;

(b) REINFORCED—measures necessary to place NATO commands in the best possible position to meet an attack, to be initiated only if there are conclusive indications that the outbreak of hostilities is imminent;

(c) GENERAL—measures which will be necessary when actual hostilities have commenced.

15. The document recognizes that each government reserves to itself the authority to commit its nation to war. It also recognizes that if any appreciable period of time were to mark the transition from peace to war there would normally be sufficient time to get agreement from political authorities to authorize major commanders to implement the required preliminary measures. The Standing Group or the appropriate supreme commanders concerned would seek this political guidance from the permanent representatives to the Council through the Secretary-General. In a sudden and extreme emergency, however, where there was insufficient time to obtain political guidance through the Council, it was envisaged that:

(a) supreme commanders and their immediate subordinate commanders should be authorized to declare the SIMPLE Alert, without waiting for political authority, and to direct the implementation of the measures necessitated by this alert within the framework of agreements previously reached between the governments concerned and commanders;

(b) supreme commanders should be authorized, in consultation with the Standing Group and with the approval of the individual governments concerned, to declare the REINFORCED Alert;

(c) in the event of an overt act of armed aggression taking place anywhere in the NATO area, supreme commanders should be authorized to call upon commanders of national forces and upon national authorities to implement such of the GENERAL Alert measures as they deem necessary in the appropriate areas of their commands.

16. The Council expressed the hope in July 1953 that the bilateral negotiations would be concluded and the results reported within three months. In fact they have not yet been concluded. The Council was informed in March 1954 that SACEUR estimated that they would not be completed so far as his command was concerned before early 1955; SACLANT and the Channel Command could make little further progress until SACEUR's discussions reached a more advanced stage. The Canada-United States Regional Planning Group informed the Standing Group in September 1953 that an alert plan for the Canada-United States Region was unnecessary, in the absence of a supreme commander, since the necessary instructions would be issued on a national basis.

17. At present, therefore, the formal position is that political authority will be obtained through the Council if time permits; that in a sudden and extreme emergency the supreme commanders and their immediate subordinate commanders have authority to declare the Simple Alert on their own responsibility; that supreme commanders alone have the authority in such an emergency, in consultation with the Standing Group and with the approval of governments concerned, to declare the Reinforced Alert; and that supreme commanders also have the authority, in the event of an overt act of armed aggression, to call upon national forces and national authorities to implement such General Alert measures as they deem necessary in the appropriate areas of their commands. All these delegated powers, however, are limited by the agreements previously negotiated or to be negotiated between the governments concerned and the NATO commanders.

18. The Canadian representative concurred in the Council's decision of July 1, 1955. He made it clear to the Council, however, that while he could accept S.G. 129/4 (Revised Final) as a basis for negotiations between the supreme commanders and national authorities, the Canadian view was that final approval of the document should only be given after the bilateral negotiations had been brought to a successful conclusion.

19. SACEUR's and SACLANT's detailed proposals regarding alert measures have been under study in Ottawa for some time, but they have not yet been considered by Ministers and we are consequently not in a position to say when or to what extent they will be accepted. One difficulty, which you will readily appreciate, is that some of the alert measures proposed by the supreme commanders could be implemented only if the War Measures Act were invoked. While there is unlikely to be any serious dissent from the principle that procedures for moving to a state of war should be standardized, both nationally and within NATO, this and other difficulties of a practical nature remain to be solved.<sup>34</sup>

The Problem of "Indicator Intelligence"

20. There is a further and related question concerning "alerts" which has not yet been dealt with satisfactorily either in NATO, or between ourselves, the United States and United Kingdom authorities. It seems clear that however satisfactory a procedure may be worked out for dealing with "alerts" that procedure depends fundamentally on an assessment of the information which leads to any given "alert". We suspect that it is the problems surrounding this question which have led Sir Anthony Eden to be so emphatic about urging a tripartite agreement between London, Washington and Ottawa before going further.

21. The Chairman of the Ottawa Joint Intelligence Committee has been in communication with the Chairman of the London Joint Intelligence Committee in an effort to obtain United Kingdom views. We have not yet approached Washington on the problem. At least in part as a result of this preliminary correspondence, the London Joint Intelligence Committee discussed the question of "alerts" and its relation to intelligence at a meeting on December 23, 1954. Although we have not seen the papers on which the discussion was based, the following quotation from the Minutes may be of assistance to you in any discussions you have with Sir Norman Brook and other United Kingdom officials.

"Mr. Dean said that it was clear from the discussions which had taken place in Paris that it would be necessary at the earliest possible stage to examine the machinery whereby an agreed U.S./U.K./Canadian evaluation of urgent indicator intelligence could be reached and passed to the highest political levels in all three countries. The first step, however, was carefully to study the present system of handling alerts in the U.K. which was not by any means clear. This study was a necessary preliminary to any discussions with the Americans and Canadians. The urgent need for closer coordination was accentuated by the changes the Americans proposed to make in their Watch Committee system, which had been covered in a recent Secretary's minute.

"In discussion it was agreed that an examination of the U.K. system was required which would high-light any weaknesses or deficiencies and recommend measures to correct them."

22. The following quotations from the minutes of the first meeting in January are also relevant:

"The Committee had before them a minute by the Secretary referring for their consideration the decision of Director of Intelligence that the U.K. system of evaluating urgent indicator intelligence should be examined and that recommendations should be made for correcting any weaknesses or deficiencies in the system. The minute also suggested that they should defer consideration of the question of instructing Ambassadors and Commanders in Chief overseas regarding the transmission of warning of attack to NATO until after the above examination had been completed.

"After further discussion the following points were agreed:

(a) The principle of an agreed JIC view was confirmed. The present procedure was adequate to cope with an attack which broke out after a protracted period of mounting political tension. It was doubtful if the evaluation machinery would work rapidly enough if it was a question of obtaining a Ministerial decision within a matter of hours from receipt of the intelligence in London.

(b) 'Evaluation machinery' as at present understood would be quite unable to cope with a warning of attack of less than one hour. The question of obtaining a Ministerial decision as a result of such a warning was, anyway, entirely academic ....

(e) If we wished the Americans to allow us to maintain a working liaison with their Indications Centre, in order that we might inject words of caution into its counsels, we must be able to show we had a similar or at least equally efficient method of dealing with indicator intelligence. For this reason alone some formalized emergency arrangements were required.

(f) One of the most important decisions to be taken was at what steps a warning of attack should be expressed laterally to authorities outside the intelligence machine. The level at which this was done would depend on whether it could be emphatically ensured that no precipitate operational action would follow i.e. before authorization had been received from Ministers.

23. From a preliminary examination here of the problems involved, it seems clear that the United States Air Defence Command has been bringing aircraft (including those of the Canadian Air Defence Command) to various degrees of readiness without telling us precisely the information which has led them to take such action. It is, therefore, important that the Joint Intelligence Committee in Ottawa should have available to it both from London and Washington by the most rapid means possible all information of a kind which might lead to an "alert" so that an intelligence assessment of the information may be made here. If arrangements of this kind cannot be made we shall, of course, be at the mercy of the operational commands both in the United Kingdom and the United States.

24. By the same token one wonders on what basis NATO commands will call "alerts" under the current agreed procedures. Most of the intelligence which they receive now is in the form of contributions made by national intelligence organizations. So far as we know, such intelligence is evaluated before it goes to NATO commands but even so it seems clear that NATO commands will be inevitably at the mercy of the principal intelligence organizations of NATO, namely, the United States and the United Kingdom. There is additionally some danger that they may receive intelligence from the United Kingdom or the United States authorities in the field in Europe which will be passed to them laterally before the information has been properly evaluated in London and Washington.

25. In this connection we have been interested to learn from Mr. Wilgress that, according to Sir Christopher Steel, one of the suggestions under consideration in London was that the responsibility for coming to a decision as to the reality of an all-out attack should rest with the two Senior Intelligence Officers in Germany of the United Kingdom and the United States. When these two officers were satisfied of the reality of the threat, they would send a pre-arranged signal to their respective capitals whereupon the two Heads of State would come to the crucial decision. This suggestion is clearly at variance with the procedure discussed in the United Kingdom Joint Intelligence Committee and with our own thinking on the problem.

26. It is, of course, possible that the NATO commands themselves may receive some indication from their own sources of a situation which would lead to an "alert" but on the whole this seems unlikely.

27. This question is not one which can readily be discussed in NATO, but if agreement could be reached tripartitely between the intelligence organizations in Washington, London and Ottawa, this should go a long way to ensure that NATO commands receive properly evaluated intelligence at least from the national staffs of the two countries with the best developed intelligence services.

28. The Minister has seen and approved this letter.

TOP SECRET

POSSIBLE STAGES OF ACTION WHEN INDICATIONS OF MAJOR RUSSIAN AGGRESSION ARE RECEIVED IN GOOD TIME<sup>35</sup>Introduction

This paper deals only with the situation which would arise from a major Russian aggression against the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation (NATO) area including Turkey. Major aggression by the Communist bloc is possible in other areas and suitable procedures would be required to meet these cases but it would be convenient to consider them separately.

2. This paper sets out the stages which ought to be completed if time allowed. It is recognised that time may not be available for this and that a telescoped procedure will also have to be studied.

Part I

3. Information is received at the London Indicator Centre (which would be the present Joint Intelligence Committee (J.I.C.) organization suitably adapted) which could mean that the Soviet Union is making preparations for war.

4. The Indicator Centre finds out from the Indicator Centres in Washington and Ottawa whether the same or similar information has reached it. Thus "indicator" experts of the United Kingdom, United States and Canada are fully in touch with each other on the matter.

5. J.I.C. Action

(a) Routine Evaluation. The information is evaluated by the Directors of Intelligence on the J.I.C. in their weekly review which is submitted to the Chiefs of Staff and to Ministers.

(b) Urgent Evaluation. Special meetings are called and the report is passed to:

(i) Chiefs of Staff

(ii) Secretary of the Cabinet

(iii) Permanent Under-Secretary, Foreign Office

(iv) The Americans and Canadians, whose own estimate is requested. Exchanges of information with the Americans and Canadians will be carried out directly between the Indicator Centres (J.I.C. in the United Kingdom).

The procedure for summoning all officers and officials concerned at short notice at any time during the day or night is being reviewed and will be tested from time to time.

Note for File: This is a U.K. working paper and was handed to the Under-Secretary in London during the Commonwealth Prime Ministers' meeting. It was probably produced in Dec. 1954. J.M. T[ea]kles]

Aucun compte rendu d'un entretien anglo-canadien sur cette question pendant la réunion des premiers ministres n'a été trouvé, sauf le bref renvoi dans le document 241.

No record of any Anglo-Canadian discussion on this subject during the Prime Ministers' meeting was found except for the brief reference in Document 241.

6. Operational staffs of the Services are alerted.

7. The Chiefs of Staff report to the Prime Minister (as Chairman of the Defence Committee). The Minister of Defence, the Foreign Secretary and Service Ministers are informed as members of the Committee as are other Ministers concerned, e.g., the Commonwealth Secretary and the Home Secretary.

8. By direction of the Prime Minister, the Cabinet or the Defence Committee consider the report.

9. The Prime Minister or the Foreign Secretary sends a message to the United States President or Secretary of State and to the Canadian Prime Minister or Secretary of State for External Affairs, giving the United Kingdom assessment of the situation, asking for theirs and discussing possible action.

10. Meanwhile, the J.I.C. consider, after consulting their American and Canadian opposite numbers, how much of the intelligence received can be passed to our other Allies and in what form, without prejudicing security or our intelligence methods. We should wish to pass it particularly to the "old" Commonwealth Governments and also to NATO Governments, so that the latter may be in a position to authorise the calling of a Simple Alert and other appropriate measures as required. (A Simple Alert denotes bringing NATO forces to a state of combat readiness including bringing formations on the Continent up to strength and taking precautions against surprise attack).

11. Meanwhile, the Cabinet will be keeping the situation under constant review and will have in mind not only the likelihood of the outbreak of war but also all possible means of averting it, for instance by diplomatic exchanges with friendly Governments, by direct representations to the potential enemy and by action in the United Nations. At the same time the Cabinet will consider how widely United Kingdom authorities should be informed of the situation.

Part II

12. If the United Kingdom/United States/Canadian Governments come to the conclusion that war probably cannot be averted or that for other reasons proposals for action should be put to friendly Governments, the procedure would be as follows. The United Kingdom Government approach other Commonwealth Governments at the appropriate times. The United Kingdom and United States Governments, in agreement with Canada, approach the French Government giving them their estimate of the situation, proposing action and asking them to join in approaches to the other members of NATO. If the French agree, tripartite approaches are made accordingly through diplomatic channels in the capitals concerned. If the French disagree, or fail to make up their minds within a certain time, the United States and United Kingdom proceed nonetheless. All the NATO countries are asked to send instructions to their NATO representatives in Paris, and all exchanges in the various capitals are repeated to these representatives.

13. Great care will have to be taken over security of all types and especially over communications.

14. NATO Council meet and authorise alert measures. SACEUR will no doubt receive his instructions from the Council; other Commanders should receive theirs through the Standing Group. The Commanders issue the necessary orders.

15. If it eventually becomes clear that the outbreak of hostilities is imminent, NATO Governments will consider authorising the "Reinforced Alert" (maximum preparations to repel an attack).

17.[sic] The foregoing procedure applies to action taken with Commonwealth and NATO Governments. Appropriate action will be required in regard to the Middle East, South East Asia and the Far East.

NOTES

1. If the above procedure is to be effective, arrangements will have to be made to ensure that the physical communications, particularly those across the Atlantic, will operate with the utmost speed and efficiency at any moment. An examination should be made by experts to ensure that this is so.

2. The NATO systems of intelligence evaluation and Alerts should in due course be examined, and adjusted where necessary, so as to ensure that there is no conflict between them and procedure which may be adopted by the United States, United Kingdom and Canada as contemplated in this paper. If there is discussion of NATO systems in the NATO Council, the United Kingdom, United States and Canadian representatives should be instructed to try to avoid prejudicing any separate United Kingdom/United States/Canadian procedure.

Reference: Your telegram No. 124 of January 4.†

Following for Crean from Robertson, Begins: You will have received from Mr. Pearson and Mr. Léger copies of the United Kingdom Working paper about which Mr. Pearson and Sir Anthony Eden had some conversation last week. I have told Caccia and Dean that I thought the paper should be generally acceptable to us and that I expected to be able to confirm our Minister's comments in writing after he had had a chance to study its implications in Ottawa. In the meantime I also said I thought that though it was useful for us for our own domestic purposes to have this detailed breakdown of United Kingdom internal procedures, it might confuse the projected discussions with the Americans to begin with such an elaborate and itemized paper. The same criticism was probably applicable to the parts of the paper which spelt out in some particularity the procedures contemplated for communicating with other governments. Caccia and Dean agree that a revision of their paper in this sense should make it a more acceptable basis of discussion with the United States.

2. If the Minister would like to confirm or qualify these comments or add any other observations that have occurred to people in Ottawa it would be helpful if he could do so before the end of this week, because Eden is leaving for Bangkok on Saturday and has it in mind that he might open up the subject with Dulles while they are there together.

Ottawa, February 17, 1955

TOP SECRET. IMMEDIATE.

Reference: Your telegram No. 195 of February 14.

Following for Robertson from Léger, Begins: The Minister's comments on United Kingdom working paper are substantially on the lines set forth in your telegram. In particular, he feels it would be unwise to make any references to informing Commonwealth Governments. He also had some worry about whether the J.I.C. organization had sufficient people to undertake this sort of task. We have, however, had a word with the Chairman, Chiefs of Staff, and he is of the opinion that a few extra officers might be found to undertake this work, at least in so far as really important items of intelligence are concerned. Even under present circumstances, we could by giving such items priority, take part in the procedure envisaged by the paper.

2. At the official level we believe that the consequences of failing to take part in such a procedure might leave us in the position that the Government might have to take a decision without full knowledge upon which such a decision should be based. In addition, by failing to take part we might also be left in a worse position on the exchange of intelligence than we are at the present time.

3. The Chiefs of Staff will consider the paper on Friday but meanwhile General Foulkes has told us that his chief worry about the paper is whether or not Part II of it cuts across the already agreed system of NATO alerts.

4. We should like to have the opportunity of seeing the revised paper before it is put to the Americans. We should also like to have it approved by the Chiefs of Staff and by Cabinet Defence Committee. Although, therefore, you are free to say that we think a paper on these lines, taking into account Minister's comments, would probably be acceptable, we will not be able to accept it formally until the new draft has been approved in accordance with the procedure outlined above.

5. There is one additional point on which you might question the United Kingdom officials. As you know, the J.I.C. has been exchanging with the Americans and the British information which goes much beyond matters which directly affect Russian aggression against the NATO area. We are not very clear why the British wish to confine this paper to the NATO area on the one hand and to Russian aggression on the other. We are, as you know, equally interested in any information on possible communist aggression any where, including possible Chinese communist aggression. It occurs to us, however, that the United Kingdom may be anxious to limit this paper to the NATO area for tactical reasons with the Americans, bearing in mind United States sensitivity on Far Eastern questions. Some explanation would be useful.

6. Incidentally, there is no paragraph 16 in the document in our possession. Is this an error in numbering or has a paragraph been left out?

The first deals with the substantive questions you raised about the United Kingdom paper. The second sets forth present United Kingdom thinking as to how and when the general question could best be raised with the United States. They leave it to us to say whether we think our Ambassador or theirs should make the first approach to Mr. Dulles. In the circumstances, and having in mind the history of the paper, I expect you will feel that it would be more appropriate for the United Kingdom Ambassador in Washington to open up the subject.

London, February 28, 1955

TOP SECRET. IMMEDIATE.

Reference: My immediately preceding telegram No. 249 of February 28.

Following for Léger from Robertson, Begins: Following is text of first letter from Dean, referred to in paragraph 1, Begins:

"We have considered the telegram on "alerts" (No. 290 of February 17) which you handed to me the other day and we find ourselves in general agreement with the comments contained therein.

2. We agree that it would be wiser to remove all references to informing Commonwealth Governments, and this can be done by excising the relevant words in paragraphs 10, 12 and 17 of our paper without affecting the general sense. We would not, of course, regard this as limiting our right to consult and inform Commonwealth Governments. The Americans know that this is our practice, and we agree that there is no point in making specific mention of it in the present context.

3. In our J.I.C. we have similar problems of staffing and it may be that these will present difficulty when we come to elaborate a really fast procedure. But the problems should present themselves clearly when we start examining a high speed drill together and we are confident that we can overcome them, as no doubt your J.I.C. can.

4. We do not think that the procedure outlined in our paper is incompatible with the NATO system of alerts. The whole object of our present exercise is to elaborate a practical and speedy procedure which would work independently, but in support, of the NATO alert system. The NATO alert system is in any case to be overhauled and our representatives will no doubt be able to influence the discussions in such a way as to reduce any conflict with our own private procedure to the minimum.

5. I agree with you that the omission of any reference in the paper to the Middle East and Far East is sufficiently explained in the text. We intend to produce a parallel procedure for these areas in due course, but we feel that, as a matter of tactics, initially it is better to secure American agreement within the context of NATO out of which the present exercise first arose. If it is presented to the Americans as something springing directly, as it in fact did, from the last Ministerial meeting in Paris, it should be possible to restrict discussion to the NATO angle. Moreover if we can work out a good procedure for NATO with the complications introduced by the existence of SACEUR, etc., we would expect to be able to make satisfactory arrangements for other theatres, which are at least no more complicated." Ends.

London, February 28, 1955

TOP SECRET. IMMEDIATE.

Reference: My telegram No. 249 of February 28.

Following for Léger from Robertson, Begins: Following is text of second letter from Dean, referred to in paragraph 1, Begins:

"I have written to you today on the substance of the "alerts" question raised in Ottawa telegram No. 290 of February 17. We have also given thought to the best method of proceeding with this matter with the Americans after our two governments have reached agreement on the draft paper which we have been considering for the last few weeks. It may be more convenient if I set out our ideas about procedure in a separate letter.

2. It seems to us that it would probably be unwise for our two governments to make a joint approach to the Americans in Washington because we do not wish to give them the impression that you and we have reached definite agreements on this complicated problem before consulting them. Since our object is to reach eventual agreement among the three governments we think that, now we have both run over the ground together, the sooner tripartite discussions can begin the better.

3. Our suggestion therefore is that the United Kingdom and Canadian Ambassadors should make separate approaches in Washington to Mr. Foster Dulles. They could recall the discussions which took place in Paris after the NATO meeting in December and say that their governments think that the time has come to begin tripartite discussions of the problem, that Washington would be the best place in which to carry on these discussions and that as soon as the other two governments are ready talks could be opened on a tripartite basis.

4. The Ambassadors could also say that, as the problems involved are both political and military, it would probably be convenient if both political and military representatives should take part. So far as we are concerned we should certainly wish our Ambassador to keep in close touch with General Whiteley, the Head of the B.J.S.M. We do not know which Americans are likely to be concerned, but presumably both Mr. Allen Dulles and the Pentagon would have to be brought in at an early stage.

5. We also think that it might be useful to ask Makins when he sees Mr. Dulles to say that the United Kingdom had been giving some thought to the whole problem and had prepared a draft paper for discussion which could either be tabled when the tripartite discussions began or could be circulated in advance to the Canadians and the Americans if this were thought to be more convenient. We should of course have no objection to your Ambassador mentioning the draft paper, if your government wished, but it seems to us that perhaps it would be more convenient for Makins to make the first reference to it because the paper as at present drafted is written very much from the United Kingdom point of view.

6. We also think that either Makins or your Ambassador or both should mention to Mr. Dulles that the United Kingdom and Canadian Governments took advantage of Mr. Pearson's presence in London for the Commonwealth Conference to have a preliminary talk about some of the problems involved. This would we think help to get over the difficulty mentioned in paragraph 2 above.

7. Finally we think that the point should be made to the Americans that the ideas contained in the draft paper only covered the stages to be completed if time allowed and that it would be very desirable, if the Americans agreed, to work out an urgent or "telescoped" procedure among the three parties.

8. If your government agree with some such procedure as this, it remains to decide whether it would be better for Makins or your Ambassador to make the first approach to Mr. Dulles. We have an open mind on this question and are ready to fall in with whichever course your government prefers. In any case our two Ambassadors will have to keep closely in touch until tripartite discussions get under way.

9. There may be points about this proposed procedure which you would like to discuss with me. If so I am very ready to come over and see you at any time convenient to you. If, as I expect, you will wish to refer to Ottawa, it would be helpful if you could ask for a reply soon, as we think that we should try to begin tripartite talks in the near future." Ends.

ALERTS PROCEDURES

Following for Robertson from Léger, Begins: We are in general agreement with the comments made by Dean in his first letter. We should like to regard the first objective as a practical and speedy procedure preliminary to and in support of the NATO alert system, on the understanding that a parallel procedure for other areas of the world will be elaborated later.

2. We are, however, somewhat puzzled by his reference to an overhauling of the NATO system of alerts. We wonder if he has in mind the suggestion in the second note to the working paper that an examination be made in due course to ensure that there is no conflict between the NATO systems and the tripartite procedures. While we see no objection to such an examination on a tripartite basis in connection with the study of the present proposals, we would be inclined to question whether any useful purpose would be served by re-opening the question in the North Atlantic Council. As you know, the negotiations between governments and supreme commanders on the proposed NATO alert measures (instituted by the Council's decision of July 1, 1953 on document S.G. 129/4) have been progressing slowly, and several governments have already agreed to the measures which concern them. At the last meeting of the Military Committee it was announced that the United States Joint Chiefs of Staff had reached agreement and would be notifying the Standing Group forthwith. Our own Chiefs of Staff are considering the measures applicable to Canada and hope to make recommendations soon to Ministers. In these circumstances, and in view of the desirability of concluding the bilateral negotiations and thus completing the NATO alerts system as soon as possible, we should be interested to know what overhauling of the system is envisaged and whether the United Kingdom has any definite proposal in mind.

3. One point which occurs to us is that the United Kingdom working paper makes no explicit reference to the agreed NATO procedure (outlined in document S.G. 166/1) for passing evaluated indications of impending Soviet attack to the Standing Group, with copies to major NATO Commands and Standing Group national staffs, by the quickest means available. We wonder whether paragraph 10 of the working paper, which states that the J.I.C. will consider how much of the intelligence received can be passed to allies other than the United States and Canada, and in what form, might not be amended to take account of the NATO procedure. One suggestion, which has already been considered by the United Kingdom J.I.C. (in draft paper JIC/256/55 of January 26, sent to us directly), is that the J.I.C., if it agrees that the indications are positive, will decide (a) whether to recommend that the Chiefs of Staff inform the Standing Group, and (b) whether to inform the major NATO commands. If this were expanded to provide for passing evaluated indications to Standing Group national staffs (in effect, the French Ministry of Defence) at the same time as to major NATO commands, this would seem to be a sensible way of implementing the NATO procedure. Indeed, the passing of evaluated intelligence to the French in this way would seem to be a necessary preliminary to the procedure outlined in paragraph 12 of the working paper for an approach to the French Government by the United Kingdom and United States Governments, in agreement with Canada, regarding proposals for action.

4. Another point which we think should be considered is the channel to be used in approaching the other NATO countries with proposals for action. Paragraph 12 of the working paper suggests that, if the French agree, tripartite approaches should be made through diplomatic channels in the capitals concerned, keeping the NATO representative in Paris informed. We wonder whether the permanent representatives in Paris might not be a more appropriate channel, particularly since the Council is to authorize the alerts.

5. The problems of staffing and of rapid communication are under study here and we believe that satisfactory arrangements can be made.

6. As regards the procedural questions mentioned in Dean's second letter, we agree that it would be more appropriate for the United Kingdom Ambassador in Washington to make the first approach to Mr. Dulles, followed separately by the Canadian Ambassador. We agree also with the suggested line of approach. On the question of timing, while we agreed that it would be desirable to try to begin tripartite talks in the near future, we should like you to remind Dean of our desire to show the revised paper to the Ministers concerned before it is produced in Washington. This telegram was considered this morning by the Chiefs of Staff Committee, with the External Affairs representative and the Secretary to Cabinet present, and carries their concurrence. Ends.

ALERTS PROCEDURES

Following for Léger from Robertson, Begins: My immediate following telegram contains text of Dean's letter of March 24 dealing with the points raised in your telegram under reference. If as he assumes, we are now in substantial agreement on the basis for an approach to the Americans, he would appreciate confirmation that this is the case at the official level as soon as possible, so that the working paper may be submitted to ministers for approval here.

2. I gather that no revised working paper as such has yet been drawn up, pending agreement with us. However, Dean is sending us to-day an annotated version of the draft which was given to you in London, containing the various amendments or deletions which have been mentioned in our subsequent exchanges on this subject. This would in effect be the revised paper, and I shall send copies to you in tomorrow's bag. Meanwhile we shall collate the two versions and hope to be able to let you have the amendments by teletype later today.

3. I am sending copies of these telegrams to Mr. Wilgress by bag.

ALERTS PROCEDURES

Following for Léger from Robertson, Begins: Following is text of Dean's letter. Quote.

We have considered the telegram on 'alerts' (No. 411 of March 10) which Collins handed me the other day and are glad to see that your views and ours are very close. To take up your points in the order in which they are made in the telegram.

2. We agree that a parallel procedure for other areas of the world (i.e. outside NATO) should be elaborated later. We must also produce later on a telescoped procedure to deal with the surprise attack.

3. My references to the 'overhauling of the NATO system of alerts' was, as you suggest, an allusion to the second note in the working paper. We do not want to re-open the question in the North Atlantic Council, at any rate until you, we and the Americans have made more progress with the present exercise.

4. We agree that paragraph 10 of the working paper, about passing evaluated indications of impending Soviet attack to the NATO machinery, is somewhat laconic. We agree that this paragraph should be expanded to refer to the NATO procedure, and suggest the insertion of the following:

'... particularly to NATO governments (as determined in SG 166/1), so that the latter ...'

We will also expand our J.I.C. instructions to cover the point.

5. When we were clearing our own minds about the channel to be used in approaching other NATO countries with proposals for action we considered whether the Permanent Representatives in Paris would not provide the best link. We concluded that it would be better to go direct to governments, mainly because it is with them that decisions must lie and we could thereby cut out one stage and also because we thought that security, particularly of communications, would be much better than if everything was addressed to the Permanent Representatives. We still think this is right; but it is obviously a matter that could be covered in discussions with the Americans.

6. If you agree that we have now got the basis for an approach to the Americans we will submit our working paper to ministers for approval, and we will then be ready to instruct Makins to concert with your Ambassador in Washington on the lines suggested in my second letter of February 26 and accepted in paragraph 6 of Ottawa's telegram of March 10. We think it important to have our discussions with the Americans in good time before the next ministerial meeting of the North Atlantic Council. Unquote.

ALERTS PROCEDURES

Following for Léger from Robertson, Begins: The only changes in the present draft of the working paper are in paragraphs 10, 12 and 16, to eliminate references to Commonwealth Governments and to incorporate the amendment quoted in paragraph 4 of Dean's letter of March 24.

2. Text of these paragraphs are as follows: Quote:

Paragraph 10. Meanwhile, the JIC consider, after consulting their American and Canadian opposite numbers, how much of the intelligence received can be passed to our other Allies and in what form, without prejudicing security or our intelligence methods. We should wish to pass it particularly to NATO governments (as determined in SG 166/1) so that the latter may be in a position to authorize the calling of a simple alert and other appropriate measures as required. (A simple alert denotes bringing NATO forces to a state of combat readiness including bringing formations on the continent up to strength and taking precautions against surprise attack).

Paragraph 12. If the United Kingdom/United States/Canadian Governments come to the conclusion that war probably cannot be averted or that for other reasons proposals for action should be put to friendly governments, the procedure would be as follows. The United Kingdom and United States Governments, in agreement with Canada, approach the French Government giving them their estimate of the situation, proposing action and asking them to join in approaches to the other members of NATO. If the French agree, tripartite approaches are made accordingly through diplomatic channels in the capitals concerned. If the French disagree, or fail to make up their minds within a certain time, the United States and United Kingdom proceed nonetheless. All the NATO countries are asked to send instructions to their NATO representatives in Paris, and all exchanges in the various capitals are repeated to these representatives.

Paragraph 16. The foregoing procedure applies to action taken with NATO governments. Appropriate action will be required in regard to the Middle East, South East Asia and the Far East. Unquote.

3. I shall send the complete text by bag tomorrow, and am referring a copy, with this telegram to Wilgress.

ALERTS PROCEDURES

Ministers concerned have approved the revised United Kingdom working paper as a basis for discussion with the United States authorities. You may inform Dean that Heeney will be prepared to act in concert with Makins as previously suggested.

2. We should be glad to know what procedure the United Kingdom have in mind after Makins and Heeney have made their approaches. Do they envisage a meeting of senior civil and military representatives to discuss the principles? Or, if the principles should prove acceptable to the United States, would they think it sensible for representatives of the three intelligence committees to meet, presumably in Washington, to work out detailed procedures for the exchange of indications intelligence?

ALERTS PROCEDURES

I have had a preliminary conversation with Sir Roger Makins and Sir Robert Scott (now Chargé d'Affaires) brought me yesterday the revised United Kingdom paper: presumably the one referred to in your telegram under reference.

2. It now remains to make approaches to the State Department. From the telegrams attached to the Under-Secretary's letter of March 16,† I gather that the suggested procedure under which the United Kingdom Ambassador and myself should make separate approaches to the Secretary of State was to avoid appearance of previous "definite agreements". It seems to us that the appearance of two Ambassadors one after the other, each saying much the same thing, could hardly suggest anything but previous consultation and agreement. Furthermore, the paper in question is a United Kingdom paper although it meets with the approval of the Canadian Ministers.

3. I would, therefore, suggest as an alternative, if you agree, that the United Kingdom Chargé should make the approach. If the United States do not disagree with the general plan suggested, we could then have a preliminary tripartite conversation leading, if all went well, to a further tripartite meeting of experts.

4. I should be grateful to have your opinion on this suggestion.

ALERTS PROCEDURES

You should by now have received the Under-Secretary's letter of April 18† enclosing copies of the last exchanges with London on this subject, together with a copy of the U.K. working paper referred to in your telegram.

2. As you know, the paper was approved as a "working" paper by the Ministers concerned here, and we also agreed with the United Kingdom Government on the utility of separate approaches by the U.K. Ambassador and yourself.

3. Although I appreciate the points you have made, I remain of the opinion that you should make an approach after the U.K. representative has done so. I fear that, if we do not follow this procedure, there is some residual danger that we will not be in a position to take part in any discussion if the U.S. disagree with the idea of having tripartite talks. This would be most unsatisfactory, since I attach considerable importance to working out a satisfactory tripartite arrangement for dealing with alerts.

4. From the internal evidence in the working paper I think it will be clear to the State Department, in any event, that the U.K. have consulted us beforehand, and I do not think that any harm will be done if they do realize this.

5. In making your approach, I suggest that you inform Mr. Dulles that you are aware of the U.K. working paper and that the opportunity presented by the Commonwealth Conference had been used to have preliminary discussions on this topic between myself and representatives of the U.K. Government. You might go on to say that the Canadian Government considers it a matter of importance that we reach tripartite agreement on this matter, and that it seems to us, from what we know of the U.K. working paper, that it might serve as a point of departure for further discussion on a tripartite basis.

6. While an approach on these lines will show that we have had prior consultation with the United Kingdom (and I do not see any way of avoiding this in any event), I see no reason why Mr. Dulles need be left with the impression that we are committed to any definite agreement with the U.K., except our joint desire to conclude an arrangement satisfactory to all three governments. I should accordingly be glad if you would proceed with your approach on the above lines, after you have further consulted with the U.K. Chargé d'Affaires, and providing neither you nor he sees any other difficulties in following this procedure.

Washington, May 2, 1955

Dear Jules [Léger],

In your last letter on this subject of April 18 you authorized me to approach Mr. Dulles and gave me the recent communications with London and the United Kingdom working paper. We exchanged telegrams about the procedure (WA-640 of April 20 and EX-743 of April 22).

On April 29 I called on the Secretary of State and left with him an informal memorandum simply to remind him of the main points, these being taken from paragraph 5 of your EX-743. Livingston Merchant was with Mr. Dulles.

Mr. Dulles raised no objection in principle and it is now left that we shall have some further consultation with officers of the State Department after the question has been examined more fully by them. I indicated in talking to Mr. Dulles that we would like to go over the subject with the State Department before it was taken over by the intelligence machine.

Sir Robert Scott as Chargé d'Affaires had shortly before my visit seen the Secretary of State.

I shall let you know as soon as we have any further response from the State Department.

Yours sincerely,

Washington, October 25, 1955

Dear Jules [Léger],

Since I wrote to you on May 2, after I had seen Mr. Dulles, neither the British Embassy nor ourselves have been able to draw even a tentative answer from the State Department. While I was away in August, Glazebrook took an opportunity of asking Burke Elbrick (whom he found was the responsible officer in the State Department) when an answer might be expected. Elbrick confessed that the papers were still in the Department of Defense and he knew of no way of speeding up the procedure there. During the conversation it was agreed that the general principles should be agreed between the State Department and the Embassy (if agreement is ever possible), and that after that stage the details could be worked out between United States, United Kingdom, and Canadian service officers.

2. This conversation was on August 25 and not a sound has come from the State Department since. When General Foulkes was here he mentioned this subject to Admiral Radford and emphasized the necessity at least for some agreement on alerts between the United States and ourselves in relation to continental defence. I understand that one suggestion made at this conversation was that the Canadian and United States Chiefs of Air Staff should meet and look at this question together.

3. I expect that Foulkes may be speaking to you about this but, if not, you may want to have a word with him at some time. It may well be helpful for the two Air Force Chiefs to discuss some aspects of this question. However, having once put the subject before the Secretary of State you would not, I am sure, want it to be handled entirely as a military matter.

4. All that we have here are rumours and they are generally to the effect that the Pentagon does not like the tripartite scheme. I suspect that this is not unconnected with the usual conservative attitude of some military officers in relation to what they regard as sensitive intelligence. I would not be surprised if the alerts proposal has been moving in a leisurely way through the Pentagon collecting obstructive minutes from time to time.

5. Foulkes had some impression that the cold water apparently being dropped on the proposal might be connected with the fact that the National Indications Centre is under interdepartmental direction and not simply an agency of the Department of Defense. Crean will be able to explain its organization to you, if you are interested.

6. I shall take an opportunity of raising the alerts question to the State Department; but it may prove to be desirable to mention the question at the meeting of consultation, which is about the only forum in which we could discuss it with the Under-Secretary and the Chairman of the Chiefs of Staff.

Yours sincerely,

ALERTS PROCEDURES

At his Joint Staff briefing on October 21, General Foulkes referred to his conversations last week in Washington with Admiral Radford, and mentioned the subject of alerts procedures in particular. Radford apparently said something to the effect that the tripartite approach to the question contained in the United Kingdom working paper, on which we have been awaiting a reply from the State Department since last April, had been turned down by the Pentagon although this decision had not yet been communicated to the State Department. (This is in line with information concerning the attitude of the Pentagon which has reached this Department through Intelligence channels.) According to Radford the U.S. Joint Chiefs were reluctant to agree to consultation on a tripartite basis in view of the difficulties of obtaining co-ordination inside the United States Governmental machine, in particular between the Pentagon and the Central Intelligence Agency.

2. General Foulkes then asked Radford if the United States would be willing to work out Canada-U.S. alerts procedures in the continental defence context.<sup>36</sup> General Foulkes emphasized that decisions to declare alerts in Canada could only be taken at the highest level and that if the continental air defence system was to operate effectively it was essential that procedures should be worked out for full consultation leading up to the declaration of alerts in Canada and the United States. Radford agreed that this was desirable in the case of tactical, but not necessarily of strategic, warning. Radford gave no explanation as to how to distinguish between strategic and tactical information in this context.

3. While we should perhaps not read too much into these off-the-cuff remarks by General Foulkes, I suggest that we should keep them in mind in preparing for the next meeting of consultation. You will recall that one of the proposed agenda items is the relationship between the NATO alerts system and North American air defence. We have consistently taken the line that the tripartite approach to this matter is the best one; but regardless of how that stands at the time, I think it is most desirable to raise at the meeting of consultation the question of procedures for declaring alerts in North America. Indeed, it might be better tactics to change the agenda item to something like "Alerts procedures in relation to North American defence". It would then be possible to lead up to discussion of tripartite arrangements, or not, as appeared to be desirable.<sup>37</sup>

4. If we intend to go ahead with the discussion of alerts at the meeting of consultation, I would recommend that we inform the U.K. Foreign Office that we are doing so. In informing them we might say that we find it necessary to discuss alerts in the context of continental defence, and it is not intended to cut across in any way the joint approach already made in Washington on NATO alerts.<sup>38</sup>

5. I am disturbed by the distinction which Radford seems to have made between tactical and strategic warning. If he has in mind limiting the exchange of information to what comes off the radar system and the like (for which arrangements of course already exist), he is placing in jeopardy the 1951 agreement to institute the meetings of consultation, which in effect are intended to give us some strategic warning of the imminence of an atomic war. What is needed now, perhaps, is to re-assert the underlying purpose of the 1951 agreement and to consider whether existing arrangements are adequate to ensure that we fully exchange information upon which to base a judgment of the imminence of war. The possibility is now much greater than it was then, in the event of war, of U.S. atomic weapons being not only deployed but also employed over and in Canada. The Canadian Government is surely entitled to insist that any decision we might be asked to take authorizing the employment of U.S. atomic weapons over or in Canada should be based on the fullest possible exchange of information and consultation between the two governments. If you agree, I shall give further consideration to the manner in which this question might be approached at the meeting of consultation.<sup>39</sup>

6. As the next step, I propose drafting for your signature a letter to General Foulkes (with copies to Mr. Heeney and Mr. Bryce) asking him what he learned about the alerts from Admiral Radford, and requesting his comments on the ideas in paragraphs 3 - 5 above. I should be grateful to know if this meets with your approval.

7. This memorandum was prepared in consultation with Mr. Crean.

ALERTS PROCEDURES

On November 18 the Deputy Assistant Secretary for European Affairs invited the Minister to call and handed to him an Aide Mémoire, four copies of which are attached.

2. The United States reply to the United Kingdom and Canadian suggestions is more positive than rumour had indicated it would be. Mr. Elbrick clearly regarded it as, in general, an acceptance of the proposal. He did, however explain that the answer was the result of prolonged studies by a number of departments and agencies and that he himself did not pretend to be fully informed on the details. Because of this we were not able to obtain much elucidation of the points raised.

3. Our reading of the Aide Mémoire, and particularly of the "general comments", leads us to the following tentative impressions. Comment number 1 appears to be in such general terms as not to affect the procedure. Comments numbers 2 and 3 would also seem not to bear heavily on the effect of the proposal. You may be more doubtful as to comment number 4, the first sentence of which calls for an explanation that we were not able to obtain.

4. We can only guess at the intent of the conclusion on page 4 of the Aide Mémoire. Superficially, it appears to suggest that no change is required, though such an interpretation is hardly consistent with some of the phrases in this and in other paragraphs. We are puzzled as to the meaning of "the procedures for political consultation".

5. We might add that the British Minister received an identical communication and was struck by the same passages.

I agree [J. Léger]

6. I can only suggest that you will no doubt wish to study this Aide Mémoire and possibly instruct us to enquire further as to its meaning and implications.

7. Last August it was understood from the conversation between Mr. Elbrick and Mr. Glazebrook that once the principles were agreed the details of the proposed procedure could be examined by experts. In view, however, of the nature of the Aide Mémoire, and particularly the suggestion to explore procedures for political consultation, this earlier arrangement may not, at least until more is known, have any relevance.

[PIÈCE JOINTE/ENCLOSURE]

Aide-Mémoire

Washington, November 18, 1955

The interested agencies of the United States Government have considered the Memorandum dated April 29, 1955, left by the Canadian Ambassador on April 29, 1955 entitled: Alerts Procedures on Indications of Major Soviet Aggression. This Memorandum referred to a United Kingdom working paper on this subject and stated that the Canadian authorities, from what is known of it, felt that it might serve as a point of departure for further discussions on a tripartite basis. The United Kingdom Memorandum, Possible Stages of Action when Indications of Major Russian Aggression are Received in Good Time, proposes the establishment of a procedure in support of the NATO alert system under which the United States, the United Kingdom, and Canada would consult together on a practical and rapid basis if indications of major Soviet aggression are received.

Subject to certain general and specific comments, the interested United States agencies see no objection to the procedures outlined in the British Memorandum and, on the contrary, believe that they would supplement and strengthen the existing NATO alert system.

Our general comments are as follows:

(1) The procedures established should not in any way restrict the freedom of action of any of the three powers individually to take appropriate measures for their own defence or that of their treaty<sup>40</sup> partners in the event of warning of attack.

(2) The procedures outlined in the British paper should be regarded as exceptional<sup>41</sup> and as clearly supplementary to the existing NATO alerts procedures which will ordinarily continue to apply. The proposed United Kingdom procedure would apply only in cases where the intelligence received is of such a sensitive nature or source as to render imprudent or questionable the disclosure of the information to other NATO countries unless or until such disclosure is necessary to the security of the NATO area.

3. The procedures devised should assure that as much information as possible which bears on the likelihood of attack should be communicated as rapidly as possible to NATO military commanders.

4. With respect to Part I regarding procedures for the exchange of intelligence, it is believed that existing procedures are adequate.<sup>42</sup> Information relating to Soviet and satellite

? [G.G. Crean]

preparations for war is presently regularly exchanged through existing channels and will continue so to be exchanged. These channels are believed to be sufficiently secure, certain and expeditious.<sup>43</sup> They are, of course, under constant review to insure that they can operate with the utmost speed and efficiency. Whenever exchanged information which concerns indications of major Soviet or satellite aggression is considered by the United States Watch Committee, the Watch Committee's evaluation thereof will be passed expeditiously to the United Kingdom and Canada through existing channels.<sup>44</sup> Existing liaison channels provide adequate means for any discussion of the desirability of passing such information to allied governments.<sup>45</sup>

5. No decision should be taken at the present time about the possible adaptation of these procedures to other areas of the world.

Against this background, the following specific comments are offered on the British paper:

(a) With respect to the Introduction, it is suggested that the new procedures should cover the contingencies of indications of any (not merely "major") Soviet or satellite aggression against the NATO area.<sup>46</sup>

(b) It is suggested that paragraphs 10 and 12 should be amended to make it clear that the Standing Group and the major NATO commands, in addition to NATO Governments, should be informed in accordance with SG166/1.

(c) With respect to Part II, it is suggested that paragraph 12 should be revised to tie in more closely with NATO procedures. Specifically, if time permits, it would be desirable that the indications of attack and the estimate thereon should be raised with the French in the Standing Group in the first instance in an effort to reach agreement on a Standing Group recommendation to the North Atlantic Council. This action in the Standing Group could, of course, be supplemented by diplomatic action with the French. A collateral point bearing on this aspect of the problem is the question of which nation should approach the French. The British procedure suggests that this should be done by the United States and United Kingdom Governments, with Canadian agreement. It is suggested that this procedure should not be determined at this time as it may prove preferable in the event for only one government to make the approach.

In conclusion, the interested United States agencies are agreeable in principle to the general procedures suggested in the British paper, subject to the foregoing comments. Since present procedures for the exchange of intelligence appear satisfactory, reliance on these procedures would appear to meet the problem.<sup>47</sup> On the above basis, the Department of State would be happy to explore further with representatives of the Canadian and British Embassies the procedures for political consultation.

A similar communication in the above sense is being made to the British Embassy.

NATO MINISTERIAL MEETING

Our immediately following telegram contains the text of a report prepared by the delegation to the recent ministerial meeting. This report was seen in draft by Mr. Pearson before he left for London.

2. As you will see, this report is designed to review the highlights of the meeting and does not attempt to go over the same detailed ground as has already been covered in telegrams. We would suggest that these telegrams (to which reference is made in paragraph 1 and following paragraphs of the report) be attached as annexes to the report, along with the agenda and the final communiqué, and that the whole might then be given fairly wide distribution in Ottawa and to our NATO missions abroad.

3. In view of the comments on other Foreign Ministers however, you may wish to mark this report as "for Canadian Eyes Only".

NATO MINISTERIAL MEETING

The following is text of report referred to in our immediately preceding telegram:

Text Begins:

"Report on the ministerial meeting of the North Atlantic Council, May 1955. This was a meeting of NATO foreign ministers only and the agenda (which is attached as Annex

"A"† consisted entirely of political subjects. Detailed reports on the discussion concerning each of these subjects are contained in the following telegrams from our NATO delegation in Paris, which are also attached as annexes:

- Item II (a)—Telegram No. 595 of May 9th (Annex "B")
- Item II (b)—Telegram No. 600 of May 10th (Annex "C")
- Item II (c)—Telegram No. 605 of May 11th (Annex "D")
- Item II (d)(I)—Telegram No. 606 of May 11th (Annex "E")
- Item II (d)(II)—Telegram No. 604 of May 11th (Annex "F")
- Item III—Telegram No. 610 of May 11th (Annex "G")

2. There is no doubt that the political discussion at this ministerial meeting was the best the North Atlantic Council has ever had. The atmosphere was friendly and relaxed and points of view were for the most part expressed with admirable frankness. The most convincing proof of the success was that, although the main occasion for the ministerial meeting was the admission of the German Federal Republic to NATO, this event was in fact overshadowed by the political discussions.

3. The satisfactory nature of this political discussion may be attributed to a number of factors. In the first place, this ministerial meeting was held at a time when public interest in the possibility and substance of four-power talks was running high and when the "Big Three" had had an opportunity of exchanging preliminary views on the subject. The NATO discussion therefore fitted naturally and conveniently into the process of diplomatic preparation for such talks. In the second place, the agenda of the ministerial meeting was sufficiently detailed to cover all the subjects of the greatest concern to NATO countries, and three full days were set aside to allow the ministers to discuss these subjects at leisure. Moreover, the procedure, which was tried for the first time, of agreeing informally in advance that certain ministers should lead the discussion on certain agenda items, proved most useful in stimulating debate.

4. There was certainly no attempt to adopt any decisions on the agenda items, nor to reach any conclusions, except in the most general terms. Nor was there any real attempt at this meeting to bridge existing differences between the United States and other member countries on the Far East, for example, but for the first time, the various points of view on this and other contentious matters were candidly expressed around the table; for the first time there was a real "confrontation" of attitudes. For the first time ministers talked of developing "common lines of policy", and this may well be the beginning of a conscious effort by the NATO countries, not to adopt unified political policies, but to find the largest possible area of common ground in their approach to problems of common concern. Indeed, Mr. Spaak of Belgium spoke of the desirability of developing some form of "Atlantic Commonwealth", by which he was understood to mean a loosely bound association of nations united by a common devotion to democratic ideals and common international interests.

5. The leading figures in this political discussion were probably Mr. Dulles and Mr. Spaak. Mr. Dulles, not so much because of his own personality, but because he spoke with the authority of the member country which had the heaviest responsibilities and the most extensive commitments around the globe. Mr. Spaak, precisely because of his personality; because he expressed with eloquence, and often with humour, with tact and at the same time with disarming candour, the point of view of the majority of small NATO countries. He put his finger with great skill on the most important issues involved in each problem under discussion, and he expressed so ably the views we ourselves held that on several occasions Mr. Pearson found it unnecessary to intervene himself.

6. Chancellor Adenauer also occupied a position of considerable prestige and was listened to with great respect whenever he spoke. However, he seemed to keep himself purposely in the background after the opening ceremonies and intervened during the political discussions on only two occasions and very briefly. Once was in connection with the examination of Soviet policy (Annex "B", when he stressed the opposition of the German people to neutralism and their determination to continue their association with the West. The other time was with respect to the item on the implementation of the Paris agreements (Annex "G") when he was at pains to emphasize that the Western European Union should live a life of its own apart from NATO.

7. Mr. Macmillan, the new United Kingdom Foreign Secretary, was not very effective at this meeting, nor was his French colleague, Mr. Pinay. Mr. Macmillan limited his interventions to fairly general and innocuous re-statements of western policy which carefully hid any differences of approach or emphasis that there might be among the United Kingdom, the United States and France. Mr. Pinay gave the impression of one who had had no time to prepare for the meeting; his statements were brief and general in the extreme. Mr. Zorlu, the Deputy Prime Minister of Turkey, spoke often and with great assurance, and seemed to regard himself as the spokesman on middle East and South-East Asian matters. He reported on the Turko-Iraqi Pact (Annex "E" and also on the Bandung conference (Annex "F"), which he had himself attended, and he analyzed the conflict at that conference between the neutralist powers, led by India, and the anti-Communist powers, led by Turkey.

8. By far the best discussion at this meeting was on the question of four-power talks (Annex "C"). It was significant in this connection that the "big three" spoke more frankly than ever before of their intentions and that they expressly recognized the interest of the other NATO countries in this matter. It was also significant that there was broad agreement among all the NATO countries on the approach adopted by the "big three", except with respect to one point. Mr. Dulles appeared to be insisting that the liberation of the Soviet satellites should be included either explicitly or by implication in any agenda for four-power talks, while the other NATO countries felt that such a position might well prejudice the success of such talks from the outset.

9. There was also an interesting discussion on the question of the relationship between NATO and WEU (Annex "G"), in which almost unanimous agreement was expressed with the proposition that the North Atlantic Council should be the preeminent forum for political consultation on matters of common concern. The exception to this general view was expressed by Chancellor Adenauer, who, as noted above (para. 6), was anxious that the WEU Council should not be prevented from taking an active part in the discussion and solution of European problems. In contrast to Mr. Spaak, who said he was coming to regard the "European idea" more and more as being limited to certain fields, Dr. Adenauer expressed the hope that WEU would in time become something more than it is at present and stressed that it has tasks which cannot be undertaken by NATO. Although he did not say this in so many words, Dr. Adenauer certainly gave the impression that he saw the future of Western Europe, and particularly of the German Federal Republic, in terms of WEU and the "European idea" rather than in terms of NATO and the "Atlantic idea". It may be significant that France did not on this occasion emphasize the importance of WEU and indeed made a point of saying that WEU, with its restricted tasks, should not try to compete with but should rather reinforce NATO, with its infinitely greater tasks.

10. At the end of this discussion there was a curious incident whose significance is difficult to judge. Although the Italian Foreign Minister had made no mention of the matter, Mr. Dulles volunteered a statement on the Italian Peace Treaty which was subsequently endorsed by the United Kingdom, France and some others. This statement, to the effect that "various discriminatory aspects" of the treaty were considered to be "superfluous and inconsistent with the position of the new Italy", had been carefully worked out in advance by the "big three" to meet a possible Italian move to denounce the treaty. We had understood, however, that the statement would not be used unless the Italians themselves raised the question and it is difficult to see why Mr. Dulles considered it necessary to make it in the NATO Council at this time. A reference along the lines of Mr. Dulles' statement was included in the final communiqué.

11. On the debit side of the ledger must be mentioned the discussions on disarmament and on the Far East. The disarmament discussion (Annex "D") was particularly disappointing because, after Mr. Pearson had led off with a thought-provoking summary of the progress of negotiations to date in the United Nations Sub-Committee in London and their relationship to wider negotiations with the Soviet Union, none of the other ministers were prepared to deal substantively with any of the real issues involved.

12. The discussion on the Far East (Annex "F") was not disappointing in this way, but was discouraging in that it did not produce anything new, with one possible exception. Mr. Dulles described the discussion several times as "useful", but he obviously regarded it as useful only in giving him a further opportunity of impressing the other ministers with the United States point of view, particularly with respect to Formosa, and not in enabling him to hear and appreciate the points of view of others. What may possibly be a new development was the way in which Mr. Dulles referred to an attack against Quemoy and the Matus. He said the United States would not let these islands be taken "as part of an attack against Formosa and the Pescadores". He did not elaborate but this apparently careful wording may indicate some retreat from the previous United States position concerning the off-shore islands.

13. The text of the final communiqué is attached as Annex "H".<sup>48</sup>

14. With respect to the time and place of the next ministerial meeting, it was agreed that the matter should be left to the permanent representatives to decide, with the advice of their governments, in the light of future circumstances. The possibility has been left open of a meeting of defence ministers this summer to discuss SACEUR's effectiveness report and there will, in any case, be the regular annual meeting of foreign defence and finance ministers to complete the Annual Review toward the end of the year." Ends.

MORNING MEETING, PLENARY SESSION

Item I on the ministerial agenda, i.e. the progress report by the Secretary General, did not give rise to any comments (the Vice-Chairman announced that the French Ministry of Reconstruction has now issued the building permit for the NATO Headquarters) and the interventions were concerned exclusively with Item II (a) trends of Soviet policy.

2. Mr. Dulles opened the discussion by stating that he fully agreed with the main conclusions of the trends paper. He stressed the fact that significant changes had taken place in the USSR since last December. Internally, the forced resignation of Malenkov was the outstanding development. Malenkov's resignation seemed to reflect mainly changes of internal policies but it was perhaps closer to the truth to say that his downfall was brought about by a combination of both internal and external considerations. In any case, there is no doubt that the Soviet Government has now chosen a policy favouring the demands of heavy and war industry. The most significant change in external policy relates, of course, to the Soviet position regarding Austria. Although the negotiations have yet to be finalized, there seems to be a genuine desire on the part of the USSR to reach agreement.<sup>49</sup>

3. Otherwise, Mr. Dulles said, Soviet policy continues as before. There has been no indication, for instance, with regard to disarmament that the USSR wish to take any positive steps towards the establishment of effective control of armaments. Moreover, Mr. Molotov will visit Warsaw this week to conclude a formal alliance with its European satellites and establish a unified system of defence in Eastern Europe.<sup>50</sup> Mr. Dulles alluded to the question of the Berlin blockade but only said that what is happening in Berlin now is clearly a violation of the undertaking given by the USSR at the foreign ministers meeting in 1949 that they will not interfere with normal communications of Berlin with the west.

4. Mr. Dulles ended up his remarks by saying that basically, Soviet foreign policy has not changed and that we should therefore not relax our efforts. NATO had now under consideration the effectiveness report of SACEUR which points out to serious weaknesses and it was essential that we should not be distracted in our constant efforts to build up the strength of the alliance. The slight improvement in our relations with the USSR did not represent any real change in Soviet policy which had just been adapted to circumstances, but was the direct result of our firmness and an illustration of the fact that our own policies were wise. We should not be swayed into relaxation by superficial evidences of cooperation on the part of the USSR.

For a Canadian assessment of these developments, see Document 512.

For a discussion of the Warsaw Pact, see Document 545.

5. The Turkish Minister of State, Mr. Zorlu, developed the same theme and warned against the danger that the Soviet "peace offensives" might succeed in developing strong neutralist tendencies in Europe. Indeed Soviet tactics have already been too successful and in appraising the aims of Soviet policy we should always be conscious of the fact that they are directed towards world domination.

6. Chancellor Adenauer made a brief intervention and stressed the following points (a) prior to his coming to Paris, he had consulted with the leaders of political parties and he was in a position to say that Germany is wholeheartedly in favour of association with the west. It was absolutely misleading to say that Germany keeps an eye on the east while associating with the west. Germany's fate is now firmly linked with the western democracies (b) German public opinion has not been affected by Soviet attitude towards Austria. He could say that even in the eastern zone not more than 10 percent of the population favoured Germany's reunification at the price of neutralization (c) whatever policy may be adopted by the USSR it will always remain a dictatorship and consequently a threatening factor. We must therefore remain vigilant even after some relaxation in the east - west tension (d) we must not expect the proposed four-power conference to be short. All problems are interrelated and the four-power conference may have to be extended into a larger conference as the interests of other countries will be involved. It may take months and even years before we reach agreement over our differences.

7. Mr. Pinay made a very brief intervention to subscribe to the thesis that the policy of firmness and strength was paying good dividends and that our efforts in that direction should be sustained.

8. Finally Mr. Spaak agreed with previous speakers that there was no reason to diminish our efforts. But he said he sincerely hoped that the current expectations on the part of the public that the proposed conference with the USSR will settle our differences, will not bring about disillusionment. An international conference is only a means to an end and he hoped that the great powers had given careful thought to what they are prepared to say to the Russians or at least are clear as to minimum concessions that they are prepared to make. He did not hide his concern over current press reports which lead our public opinions to expect perhaps too much from the proposed conversations with the Soviets.

NATO COUNCIL DISCUSSION ON FOUR-POWER TALKS

The discussion on the afternoon of May 9 covered the general question of possible negotiations with the Soviet Union and more detailed questions relating to the Austrian Peace Treaty. Both these subjects were introduced by Pinay, speaking as a representative of the three powers and summarizing briefly their agreed views; in each case he stated that they would be grateful for comments or suggestions from the other NATO countries.

2. The summary record of this discussion (C-R(55)19) has appeared and will be available to you shortly so we shall not attempt to summarize the remarks of all speakers. On the question of four-powered talks, it was universally agreed that the prospects of possible negotiations with the Russians were somewhat more encouraging than at the time of the last four-powered conference. On the other hand, it was accepted by all that while Russian tactics may have become more flexible, there was no evidence whatever that Soviet aims had altered. The two factors which could be regarded as encouraging were the new flexibility of Soviet tactics and the increasing strength and solidarity of the western countries. Public opinion would not understand an unwillingness to meet with the Russians and seek genuine agreements on the major points of difference. It was therefore right and proper that the western powers should seek to negotiate, holding firm to the essential elements in their position but ready to exploit any opportunity for reaching agreement which would not compromise those essentials.

3. Only two statements call for special mention in this brief account. Beyen made the point that much of the west's recent political strength and solidarity depended upon a remarkable period of prosperity. He would not agree that this prosperity was the result only of the stimulus provided by rearmament, but undoubtedly the latter had contributed. While he did not fear a depression comparable in any way to that of the 1930's, he thought governments should keep in mind the risks for their political cohesion of a period of economic difficulty. Such a period might easily follow the establishment of a modus vivendi with the east which involved a significant readjustment of our economy to a reduction in armament efforts.

4. The other important statement was that of Dulles, who spoke last and agreed with most of what had been said previously. He thought that it was now a proper time to take the initiative in seeking negotiations, and he thought as well that it would be proper to press the Soviet Union for real solutions to some of the outstanding problems. The initiative now proposed, that of an invitation to the Russians to attend a four-power conference, could only be preliminary; for historical reasons this first step would have to be taken by the three powers, but conditions now were very different from those of wartime and it would not be right for those four major powers to agree among themselves upon steps which will vitally affect many other peoples. In shaping final solutions, all those countries affected — those about the Council table and others not represented — should have an opportunity at the proper time to present their views.

5. He therefore thought that the talks now proposed should be designed to define the problems most urgently in need of settlement and to seek out more effective methods of attacking them than had been developed so far. This first stage would be primarily procedural. Particular problems which he thought should be brought forward and examined were, of course, the unification of Germany, the atomic threat, and the reduction of armaments. Another problem which he thought it would be proper to discuss bluntly with the Russians was that of the oppression and repression of independence and of human rights in the satellite countries. The west should not allow it to be thought that any solution which might be reached on the Austrian and German questions implied a confirmation of the status quo in the enslaved countries of Eastern Europe. It could never be our thought to seek changes in those countries through violence, but he was convinced that the moral forces tending to a change in the organization of Eastern Europe were real and effective forces which sooner or later would determine events. He did not have in mind that we should seek to set up in Eastern European countries a sort of cordon sanitaire of states hostile to Russia; what it was right to press for was the establishment of freely elected governments having a proper degree of independence and, at the same time, friendly relations with their great neighbour. The example of Finland might serve as a guide.

6. Pinay outlined briefly the recent developments relating to the Austrian Treaty, and expressed the hope that the treaty might be signed this coming weekend. Spaak picked up Pinay's reference to Austrian neutrality and a possible four-power guarantee, asking how such a guarantee could be made effective when the powers concerned had not direct territorial access to Austria. In the discussion which followed, it became clear that the three powers were far from agreed on the need for, or the implications of, such a guarantee. It was made clear that there was no question of a guarantee of Austrian neutrality, since this would permit the USSR to interfere in Austrian internal affairs even in the absence of an external threat. It was not clear who had in fact brought up the question of a guarantee, as it appeared that this was not at present treated by the Russians as a precondition of the signature of the Treaty. The suggestion was that the Austrians had themselves requested a guarantee of their territorial integrity, but they had not discussed the point with the western ambassadors in Vienna in any clear-cut manner. In any case, if the three powers were to sign the Austrian Treaty in Vienna this coming weekend, it would be without commitments regarding either an Austrian declaration of neutrality or a four-power guarantee of territorial integrity. The Soviet Ambassador in Vienna had said that he was not authorized to discuss these questions, and they would have to be settled by the foreign ministers at the time of signature. The western powers had immediately stated that their foreign ministers could not, without an opportunity to study Russian views on this matter in advance, undertake to reach agreement in the course of a one or two-day meeting to conclude the Treaty. They would, however, be prepared to discuss the problem at the time of signature on the understanding that the Treaty itself would be signed without conditions and that agreement would be reached later on these other questions. Dulles made it clear that the three powers were aware of the difficulties and implications of accepting commitments linked in any way with Austrian neutrality and made it equally clear that they had not yet studied these problems in sufficient detail to have a clear policy in mind. They were proceeding on the assumption that the Treaty itself could be concluded without their having to take final decisions on these other matters.

DISARMAMENT

The disarmament discussion this morning was disappointingly brief. I began with a statement substantially the same as the draft prepared in the Department. To meet the French objection the report on the London meetings had been reduced in length and couched in more general terms. The American delegation was given the draft in advance and made no strong objection to it, although they indicated that they would have preferred no reference to disarmament as an item for the Four Power agenda. However, as Dulles had already mentioned this on Monday as a subject for discussion in the talks, I referred to his statement when I made this point.

2. The only speakers other than myself were Macmillan and Zorlu of Turkey. Macmillan supported what I said. He said that although the results of the London talks were disappointing on the surface, much useful work had been done which could prove valuable if a new impetus could be given. This impetus might come from a four Power meeting. We would not want to by-pass the United Nations, but we might be able in a Four Power meeting to induce the Russians to adopt a more co-operative attitude.

3. Zorlu said that disarmament should play an important part in Four Power talks. It was the subject on which the sincerity of the Russians could be tested.

4. The discussion on disarmament was completed before we heard from Johnson in London of Malik's new proposals.<sup>51</sup>

MIDDLE EAST

The Turkish representative took the lead in the discussion on the Middle East. He gave a frank and optimistic account of the development of defence pacts with Pakistan and Iraq, which contained, however, little new information. He expressed hope that the Egyptian attitude, which was based on misunderstanding, would change in time.

2. Dulles and Macmillan expressed favourable views on the treaties. The Greek and French representatives also expressed approval, but with cautionary remarks on the political effect in Arab countries. The former indicated readiness to participate in a Middle East security arrangement, but Pinay said it was best for the time being if France stayed out. He spoke also of North Africa, and asked that France's allies, even if they could not offer support, should refrain from supporting those hostile to France.

3. I intervened to offer appreciation of what the Turks had done, but expressed some concern over the effect on Israel. Without questioning in any way the value of the treaties, I thought we should recognize that they had increased Israel's sense of isolation, and had encouraged the Extremists in that country, with resulting and increased danger to peace.

FAR EAST

Dulles began the Far Eastern discussion with a not very impressive and rather petulant statement of the United States position in Asia in general, and the Chinese Islands in particular. He may have been showing the effects of the discussions on Vietnam with the Americans [French?], which have been very sticky. In some ways the most remarkable part of his statement was his introduction in which he compared Chinese Communism unfavorably with the Soviet version. Although he was clearly not intending to offer an apology for the Bolsheviks, he almost did so by arguing that the Chinese revolutionaries were more belligerent and had shown much more reliance on brutal force than had the Russians. These views should not, of course, be taken out of context, as Dulles may have been somewhat carried away by a desire to tell the Europeans that the peril was greater in Asia than here.

2. Dulles's review of the United States position on the islands was in familiar terms, but showed evidence of recent trends in a somewhat greater emphasis on the possibility of obtaining from both sides a renunciation of the use of force in the somewhat better atmosphere which now prevails. He then went on to plead with the Europeans to trust the United States policy in the Pacific. The United States was not two-faced, and if its policy was acceptable to them in Europe, they should realize that it was equally peaceful in the east. He implied that the European allies did not understand the realities and complexities of the Asian problem by repeating several times that one couldn't comprehend the Far East just by looking at a map. He added, with perhaps a trace of bitterness, that if any of them would like to accept some responsibility in the Far East, the United States would be glad to share theirs with them.

3. Zorlu of Turkey then reported on the Bandung Conference. There was little added that we have not already heard, but it was a candid and interesting account. He made a great deal of the resistance to the neutralists put up by Turkey and its friends and their success in defending the principle of defensive agreements. Nehru was the villain of his story, much more so than Chou En-Lai. He seemed almost himself to have become an admirer of at least Chou's personality and tactics. Nehru, he said, had tried to be the protector of the Chinese, but Chou had shown a desire to break out and establish direct contact with the Arab States, and even with SEATO countries. He didn't try to dominate, he was tactful, and used his undoubted charm with great effect.

4. Pinay made a short statement in which he emphasized the importance of working together with the Americans in Asia. Without offering very specific support to Dulles's policy in and about Formosa, he was clearly trying to offer general support in order to counteract the unhappy effect of American-French differences in Indo-China.

5. Outright support for Dulles came from the Turkish and Portuguese representatives. Then Spaak did a very able job in expressing, without any truculence, the different view that Europeans had of Quemoy, Matsu and Formosa. He did not think there was a democratic country in Europe which would ask the United States to turn over Formosa to the Communists, but they could not agree that Quemoy and Matsu should be defended. They also took a much less favourable view of Chiang Kai-shek than did the Americans. He concluded with some observations on the necessity for dealing with the Peking régime if there were to be any settlement of Far Eastern questions. This statement of difference was coupled with effective protestations of faith in United States intentions and belief in the need for Europe and the United States to move together even in Asia. As Spaak had made clear that he considered himself to be speaking not for Belgium but for Europe, no further interventions along these lines were necessary.

6. Dulles concluded on a more amiable note of appreciation for other views, but unfortunately repeated his reference to the unsatisfactory education provided by maps.

COUNCIL MEETING, MAY 10

Item III—Questions involved in the implementation of the Paris Agreements, including the relationship between NATO and Western European Union.

Spaak, in opening the discussion, stated that he was aware that several NATO countries had had misgivings at the time of the London Conference and the signing of the Paris Agreements regarding the practical relationship that would emerge between WEU and NATO. There had been fears of overlapping, duplication and of possible attempts by WEU to take over some of the tasks more appropriately performed by NATO. In his view, the very valuable and frank interchange which had taken place at the current ministerial meeting was a clear indication that priority should be given to the NATO forum. His reasons were as follows:

(a) The survey made at the meeting of the items on the agenda revealed that there could not be any defence of Western Europe without taking into account the situation in other parts of the world and, in any event, defence without the United States and Canada was inconceivable. All major international political questions should therefore be discussed in the NATO Council.

(b) The record of decisions already taken by the NATO Council was impressive. The Council had proved itself to be effective and had reached agreement on a number of fundamental and controversial issues. Although it might be illogical, it was noteworthy that a number of European countries, who appeared quite unable to reach agreement in a restricted European forum, were able to do so in the NATO Council.

(c) NATO had made much military progress, but a military alliance could never be durably sealed unless it was backed by common policies extended over the widest possible area. Every effort should be made to arrive at such policies.

(d) the whole concept of Europe was too limited. The discussions of the last two days had indicated the need for global thinking and Europe could not hope to escape the repercussions of events elsewhere.

(e) The large NATO powers naturally had a leading role to play in the formulation of policies and they provided the most important material defensive elements, but any actions of theirs tended automatically to involve their smaller partners. It was therefore only right that the latter should be kept fully informed of developments in areas which did not, perhaps, affect them immediately and directly, so that they would receive timely warnings of threats to peace. The NATO Council was the proper place for such discussion.

(f) Spaak did not envisage any special new authority to achieve the foregoing purposes, but he hoped that NATO might eventually grow into a sort of commonwealth. The NATO Council would be a commonwealth conference where the different countries, all adhering to the same broad community of ideas, would come together and speak in complete frankness. They would not have to feel bound individually to any specific common course of action, but each representative would endeavour in his own country to bring its policies more closely into line with what appeared to be in the interests of the community as a whole. The commonwealth conception might assist in promoting understanding and with the background of such an atmosphere it would be simpler to explain problems to national parliaments and to the public in member countries.

2. Pinay, Martino and Steel (in the absence of Macmillan) associated themselves with Spaak's remarks. Lange and Cunha, speaking as representatives of non-WEU countries, also stated that Spaak's appreciation had gone a long way to allay their earlier fears that WEU might have a detrimental effect on NATO and particularly on those NATO countries outside WEU. Adenauer caused a temporary flurry by saying that he thought WEU should have a life of its own and that he would like to raise the question of procedures for dealing with matters of international concern in the WEU Council. Beyen, in supporting Spaak, declared that, while he fully appreciated the value of WEU, he feared that the chancellor was trying to qualify the Belgian proposal. He would therefore be grateful for clarification. Adenauer appeared to satisfy Beyen and others by replying that he had been referring to certain fields such as the control of armaments and European economic co-operation which were specifically incorporated in the Paris Agreements. It was his hope that a closer working arrangement between WEU countries would eventually lead to a real European community and this goal should not be lost sight of. He did not disagree with Spaak. Pinay intervened to state that any competition between WEU and NATO would obviously be undesirable, but the latter covered a much larger area. Zorlu reminded the Council that Turkey had submitted a memorandum in January, 1955 (see CR(55)1 of January 13 and Turkish memorandum of January 15, the latter forwarded to you under transmittal slip 199 of January 21)† in which it had been stressed that the surest way to avoid conflict between WEU and NATO was to scrutinize very carefully the existing NATO structure before agreeing to the establishment of any new WEU organs. WEU should only create new agencies in cases where it could be established beyond doubt that there was nothing already in being in NATO for the purpose required.

3. Spaak, in summing up, confirmed that he had had in mind the main political and military questions when making his earlier remarks. He wished to make it clear that he had no desire to minimize the importance of WEU, which had its specific task. It had very great, if as yet unknown, potential in the economic and social fields. He had not intended to exclude major political discussions from WEU, but he wished to stress the need for the continuation of real detailed interchanges in the NATO Council and the centre of gravity should be there.

4. After Spaak's concluding remarks, we stated that we rejoiced at the spirit which had brought WEU into being. WEU would have its own life, but not one apart from NATO. The exchange of views in the Council had been most valuable and important. Spaak had stressed the need to work out a common policy amongst the NATO partners. This was an essential, if difficult, task. There would have to be frank and full discussion on all controversial matters. This could best be undertaken in the NATO Council which should be regarded as a body of very special importance.

FUTURE STATUS OF CANADIAN FORCES IN GERMANY

The purpose of this memorandum is to report to you on the present situation with regard to the proposed supplementary Status of Forces Agreement with the Federal Republic of Germany. This agreement will be negotiated between the NATO countries having forces in Germany and the Federal Republic. When it has been concluded, the supplementary agreement and the NATO Status of Forces Agreement<sup>32</sup> to which the Federal Republic is expected to accede, will replace the Bonn Conventions (Forces and Finance Conventions) which now govern the status of allied forces in Germany.<sup>33</sup>

Procedure

The recommendations of the Three Powers regarding the procedure for negotiating the agreement were discussed recently at a meeting in Paris between representatives of all NATO countries having forces in the Federal Republic. There was general agreement on all points save the Chairman. No chairman has yet been appointed. Certain countries, including ourselves and the U.K., are still in favour of a NATO chairman for these negotiations but the U.S. and France are opposed to this idea. Belgium, Denmark and The Netherlands have been named as possible countries which might provide a chairman. A paper based on the recommendations of the Three Powers as approved by the other NATO countries concerned has been given to German officials in Bonn for their comments.

Substance

At the present time a tripartite (U.K., U.S. and France) working group in Bonn is preparing a draft paper regarding the points which they would like to see covered by the Supplementary Status Agreement. When the Three Powers have reached agreement among themselves on this substance paper they will ask the other countries having forces in Germany to comment on it. When agreement is reached between all the allied countries with forces in Germany on what concession should be asked from the Germans this substance paper will be discussed with the Federal Republic.

According to the information we have been able to obtain from U.K. and U.S. sources it is apparent that from the beginning the U.K. and U.S. forces wanted to ask for considerable concessions from the Germans. However, the Foreign Office and the State Department have, to some extent, whittled down their demands to a point where they can be considered as politically feasible.

At a recent ad hoc meeting in the Department of National Defence, at which a representative of this Department was present, the services reviewed all the points of substance which it is expected will be contained in the tripartite paper, and have evaluated their importance with respect to Canadian forces. The views of the Department of National Defence will eventually be sent to this Department for comment and eventual incorporation into the instructions for the Canadian negotiating team.

On the whole we think that the Department of National Defence are being realistic about the concessions which should be asked from the Germans. It may be, however, that for political reasons this Department will be reluctant to support all of the concessions which our forces or those of other NATO countries would like to obtain from the Germans. In this event, presumably Ministers will have to decide whether it would be in Canada's interest to support other NATO countries, particularly the Three Powers, in demanding certain concessions from the Germans which may not strictly speaking be commensurate with the Federal Republic's new position as a member of NATO.

Over the next two or three weeks we shall be preparing the instructions for the Canadian negotiating team in consultation with the other departments concerned. When agreement has been reached at the official level we would propose to seek Cabinet approval of these instructions.

It is doubtful if the actual negotiations with the Germans will start before early July.<sup>54</sup>

FUTURE STATUS OF CANADIAN FORCES IN GERMANY

When I reported to you on this subject in my memorandum of May 12 (copy attached), you inquired: "Have we any right — or would it be wise to ask for concessions which we would not ourselves be willing to grant German forces in Canada?"

In my opinion, there is little doubt that we have a right to seek, in the forthcoming negotiations with the Federal Republic of Germany, such a treatment as is — within reason — necessary to ensure an adequate status for our forces in that country, irrespective of reciprocity. International agreements imposing obligations on only one of the contracting parties are, of course, not a novelty. They are known as unilateral bipartite treaties or unilateral multipartite treaties when they are concluded by two or several contracting parties respectively. (McNair, "Law of Treaties" (p.5) speaks of such bilateral treaties imposing obligations on one side only as being in the nature of "a unilateral treaty, e.g. a pure treaty of gratuitous cession of territory, a pure treaty undertaking to pay an indemnity for a wrong ...")<sup>55</sup> On the other hand, most of the Peace Treaties and all the War Graves Agreements concluded by Canada can be described as unilateral multipartite treaties, since they are concluded by several States though they usually impose obligations on one State only.

Therefore, whether in the final instance the future status of foreign forces in Germany eventually takes in part the form of a unilateral multipartite agreement between countries having forces stationed there on the one hand, and the Federal Republic on the other, or of unilateral bilateral agreements between Germany and each of these States (e.g. Canada), I am confident that the granting by Germany of "one-sided concessions" would not be unorthodox. In point of fact, however, the German Government has already recognized the necessity of concluding certain arrangements which will not be based on reciprocity with the countries now having forces in their territory: in Article 8, para. 1(b) of the Convention on Relations between the Three Powers and the Federal Republic of Germany, signed on May 26, 1952, as amended by the Protocol on the Termination of the Occupation Régime signed on October 23, 1954, it is provided that the Forces Convention:

"shall remain in force until the entry into force of new arrangements setting forth the rights and obligations of the forces of the Three Powers and other States having forces in the territory of the Federal Republic. The new arrangements will be based on the Agreement between the Parties of the North Atlantic Treaty regarding the Status of their Forces, signed at London on June 19, 1951, supplemented by such provisions as are necessary in view of the special conditions existing in regard to the forces stationed in the Federal Republic".<sup>56</sup>

These "special conditions" existing in the Federal Republic are obvious: large bodies of troops must be maintained there in combat readiness and must be in a position to act quickly and independently in the event of a threat of attack. There should be little doubt that the Germans will be prepared to admit that conditions in their country are "special" and to abide in principle by their obligation under Article 8, 1(b) of the Convention of Relations, in the course of the discussions on the Status of Forces.

While we seem to have a clear right to seek unilateral concessions from the Germans in the forthcoming negotiations, the question whether it is wise for the Canadian negotiators to request such concessions is a somewhat more delicate one. It is perhaps best assessed in para. 1 to 6 (inclusive) of Letter No. 380, dated April 29, 1955,† from the Canadian Embassy in Bonn (a copy of which is attached for your information). Indeed, I am given to understand that the interdepartmental group presently engaged in preparing instructions for the Canadian negotiating team is relying largely on this report to formulate its draft directives. The report shows, I think, that:

(a) we are undoubtedly bound, while respecting Germany's position as an equal partner in NATO, to request for our forces in the Federal Republic a status which will go beyond that which the "old" parties to the NAT have mutually agreed upon under the NATO Status of Forces Agreement (to which Germany is expected to adhere in any event);

(b) we could not afford to deprive ourselves of those requirements which the military authorities of the NAT countries view as essential to the security, operational efficiency and well-being of our forces in Germany;

(c) considering that the countries having forces in Germany have already implicitly agreed to seek jointly unilateral concessions from that country and that, among these countries, Canada's bargaining power will be obviously limited (compared to that of say the United Kingdom or the United States of America), it is necessary for us to approach the Germans as members of the "common front".

I would submit, therefore, that it is indeed appropriate for us to strive in the forthcoming negotiations for such concessions as are considered to constitute necessary requirements for our forces, irrespective of the status which we would theoretically be willing to extend to any German forces that might eventually be stationed in Canada.<sup>57</sup> At the same time, however, we must not lose sight of the fact that these concessions are not being extracted, so to speak, by old NATO allies negotiating from a position of pre-eminence

<sup>56</sup> Pour respecter l'article 4 de cet accord, le Royaume-Uni, la France, les États-Unis et la République fédérale d'Allemagne ont, le 23 octobre 1954, signé la Convention sur la présence de forces étrangères sur le territoire de la République fédérale d'Allemagne. Voir Documents on Germany under Occupation, 1945-1954, Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1955, pp. 616 à 627. Le 3 mai 1955, le Canada accédait à cette convention, aux termes de laquelle les trois puissances occidentales acceptaient de ne pas exercer leur droit de stationner des forces armées sur le territoire de la République fédérale sans le consentement de Bonn. Voir Canada, Recueil des traités, 1955, N° 7.

To fulfill Article 4 of this agreement, the United Kingdom, France, the United States and the Federal Republic of Germany signed the Convention on the Presence of Foreign Forces in the Federal Republic of Germany on October 23, 1954. See Documents on Germany under Occupation, 1945-1954, Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1955, pp. 616-627. On May 3, 1955, Canada acceded to this convention in which the three major Western powers agreed not to exercise their postwar rights to station armed forces in the Federal Republic without Bonn's consent. Reference; Telegram No. 181 of August 15, 1955† from Bonn.

CHAIRMANSHIP OF NEGOTIATIONS FOR A SUPPLEMENTARY STATUS OF FORCES AGREEMENT WITH THE GERMANS

You will note from the attached copy of telegram No. 181 from Bonn that the Germans have approached the Embassy to ask whether Canada would be willing to accept the permanent chairmanship of these negotiations. As it would appear from this telegram that the German Ambassador or the United Kingdom High Commissioner may raise this question with you, you may wish to have a résumé of its history.

2. The suggestion that Canada provide a chairman was first broached by British officials to our Embassy in Bonn; later the question was again raised twice with our Embassy in Washington by the State Department; finally Mr. Dulles asked the Minister to reconsider our decision when he visited Ottawa last winter.<sup>58</sup> On all these occasions we stated quite flatly that we were not prepared to assume the chairmanship.

3. Our reasons were partly political and partly administrative (i.e. lack of a suitable officer who could be spared for the job). The political reasons were originally set forth by Mr. Ritchie in his telegram No. 14 of January 19, 1955,† in the following terms:

"4. Spens was unable to say why the British have given way to the Americans on the question of the chairmanship. Whatever the reason, however, it would seem to me unfortunate if this last formal link between the forthcoming negotiations and NATO were lost. From the Canadian standpoint I can see no advantage to accepting the chairmanship of such a group, particularly as we might on occasion find ourselves having to act as "Allied spokesman". The very fact that we have so far kept clear of the stigma (in German eyes) of being "occupation" forces makes it the more desirable in terms of German-Canadian relations that we should not at this stage, get ourselves in the position of representing the ex-"occupation" powers in a series of difficult negotiations with the Germans which will touch upon many sensitive points and may well cause friction with the Germans. The interests of our forces here could hardly be served by a development of this kind and it seems to me that if a non-NATO chairman is necessary it would be better to select one from a country more closely associated with the occupation and whose forces here are smaller than ours, e.g. Belgium, Denmark. The special relationship which exists between our forces and the British and French forces in Germany is perhaps an additional reason why the chairmanship of such a group would present us with unusual difficulties. I have in mind particularly, of course, the degree to which the brigade has been integrated into the British Army of the Rhine."

4. When reconsidering the matter, at Mr. Dulles' request, we asked Mr. Ritchie to restate his views which he did in telegrams No. 53 of March 25† and No. 55 of March 28,† 1955, as follows:

"4. I think the German position has a bearing on the question of our acceptance of the chairmanship. As (group corrupt) told them of our preference for a NATO Chairman (paragraph 6 of my telegram No. 31 of February 15†) and if they persist in their own preference for a NATO Chairmanship, the position of a Canadian Chairman would be difficult. The situation would, of course, be different if the Chairman was a Canadian nominated by NATO. It would certainly seem essential that all parties to the negotiation should be in agreement on a Canadian as Chairman if we are to accept the job.

6. In addition, so far as our own acceptance is concerned, I should be reluctant to see Canada assuming rather central responsibility in negotiations which touch on extremely sensitive points as far as the Germans are concerned. It is easy to see from the point of view of the United States that it would be convenient to have Canada in the chair but having avoided the odium (in German eyes) of being an occupying power ourselves, it seems to me that we should not be put in this position.

7. With regard to the qualifications of the chairman, the consensus of opinion here which I share indicates that the chairman, while he need not have legal training, should be a senior and experienced person with a good grasp of the delicate and complicated political factors which will be involved in the negotiations. He should be a civilian (the three powers plan to be represented by civilians)."

"So far as Canadian chairmanship is concerned, it is becoming increasingly clear that the distinction would be between a Canadian chairman representing Canada in a non-NATO type negotiation and a Canadian individual nominated by NATO as NATO chairman. While our objections to the former still stand the latter would not be open to the same objections. I do not know if Dana Wilgress would be free to accept, but he would, of course, be the ideal chairman from every point of view if the plenary sessions of the negotiations take place under NATO auspices in Paris over which he could preside, to be followed by detailed work carried on by working groups in Bonn."

5. You will note that Mr. Ritchie indicated that his objections to a Canadian chairman would not apply with the same validity if the chairman were to be designated by NATO. According to paragraph 1(a) of telegram No. 180† from Bonn (copy attached) the Germans have suggested that it should not be necessary to have a chairman designated by NATO, but that it would be sufficient simply for the North Atlantic Council to take note of the chairman's name in their resolution regarding the negotiations. I do not know whether this formula proposed by the Germans would invalidate our political objections to the same extent as having the chairman actually designated by the North Atlantic Council, but it would seem that the distinction in this regard is becoming rather fine.

6. We now have a situation where the United States, the United Kingdom and the Federal Republic are very anxious that Canada should provide a permanent chairman for these negotiations. Presumably, the Dutch, the Belgians and the Danes would have no objection to a Canadian chairman. Only the French, as we have learned indirectly through the British and Americans, might be opposed to a Canadian chairman, on the grounds that we might be too "magnanimous" towards the Germans.

7. I might add that, in replying to Mr. Dulles' approach, the Minister intimated to the American Ambassador that the main reason we were not able to take on this job was that we did not have a suitable person available.<sup>59</sup>

CHAIRMANSHIP OF NEGOTIATIONS WITH THE GERMANS FOR A SUPPLEMENTARY NATO STATUS OF FORCES AGREEMENT

As I mentioned to you on the telephone a few days ago, the United Kingdom Deputy High Commissioner and the German Ambassador have each called on me to urge that we reconsider our earlier decision not to accept the chairmanship of these negotiations. Since then, the Danish Minister, on instructions from his Government, has also called on the Department to say that the Danish Government wished to associate itself with the German démarche and that they would be very happy if Canada could see its way to providing a chairman.

2. We have replied to these approaches, saying that we have been in touch with you and that you had agreed to review this matter on your return to Ottawa next week.

3. The present situation with regard to the chairmanship of these negotiations is outlined in the attached CRO telegram No. 1065. You will note that both the Dutch and the Danes have turned down the chairmanship and that none of the remaining alternatives to a Canadian chairman (i.e., a Belgian, a German or a rotating chairman) would appear to be acceptable to all of the other States concerned. Under these circumstances, if we refuse to accept the chairmanship, we shall in effect be refusing to help our friends out of a difficult situation.

4. The reasons why we decided to turn down the chairmanship are set forth in a memorandum dated August 17, prepared by the Legal Division, a copy of which is attached for your convenience. You will see that our reasons were both political and administrative. As regards the political objections, I have spoken to Mr. Ritchie, our Ambassador in Bonn, who thinks that, under the present circumstances, there would be no serious political consequences from the Canadian point of view if we were to accept the chairmanship. There remains, of course, the difficulty of finding a suitable person for the job, but this, I believe, is not an insurmountable problem.

5. Taking all things into consideration, I think that the Canadian Government might agree to provide the chairman for these negotiations on the following conditions:

(a) that the invitation to provide the chairman has the unanimous approval of all the states concerned;

I am absolutely opposed to having a Canadian chairman & it isn't feasible anyway. M. W[ershof]

(b) that the appointment of a Canadian chairman is endorsed by the North Atlantic Council; and

(c) that Canada is not required to provide the secretariat for the negotiations.

6. I might add that, if Canada is the unanimous choice of all the states concerned, there should be no difficulty about conditions (b) and (c), since it has already been agreed between representatives of the sending states and the Federal Republic in Bonn

(i) that the chairman would be designated (or noted) by the North Atlantic Council in the draft resolution regarding these negotiations which is to be put before the Council; and

(ii) that the Federal Republic will establish a secretariat under a German Secretary General, to which will be attached personnel made available by the other sending states.

There is no obligation under this arrangement for Canada to make personnel available to the secretariat, although it has been suggested by the Embassy in Bonn that, if we are to provide the chairman, we may also wish to provide a junior officer to assist him.

7. In view of the foregoing, I would recommend that we should notify the United Kingdom Deputy High Commissioner, the German Ambassador and the Danish Minister that Canada is prepared to provide the chairman of these negotiations under the conditions outlined in paragraph 5 above. I think it would also be appropriate, in view of Mr. Dulles' approach to you last winter, to instruct our Ambassador in Washington to notify the State Department of this decision. Do you agree?<sup>60</sup>

As the Federal Republic of Germany was anxious to start the negotiations as soon as possible, Mayrand's nomination was rejected in mid-September. He was replaced by a Belgian.

Chairman, Chiefs of Staff.<sup>61</sup> This report has been approved by the Chiefs of Staff and, subject to certain comments indicated in Appendices "C" and "D" to the report, by the civilian government departments concerned in Ottawa. You may, therefore, regard the views set forth in the report (and appendices), together with the general principles enunciated below, as constituting your brief for these negotiations. If there are any matters which are not clear to you or which are not covered in this brief, please let us know.

Procedure

2. It is our understanding that the general procedure for the negotiations will be that laid down in the Aide-Mémoire which was presented to the Germans on April 28, 1955 (your letter No. 393 of May 5, 1955†) as subsequently amended to take account of accepted German suggestions (your telegrams 160 of July 15† and 220 of September 27, 1955†).

Form

3. The question of the form of the Supplementary Agreement has not been definitely settled, but we understand that it may be contained in a number of bilateral instruments between the Federal Government and each of the sending states, these instruments being identical in content. In addition, each sending state may individually make certain additional arrangements on its own to cover items which are not appropriate for the Supplementary Agreement. These extra items would be covered in less formal ways, such as exchange of letters, administrative arrangements, agreed minutes or even verbal understandings.

4. We are leaving it to your discretion to decide, in concert with the delegations of the other sending states, which is the most appropriate form of agreement for the various items contained in the Three Power position papers. At the moment there are no items outside the position papers which the Canadian Forces wish to have discussed during the negotiations. Should the need for extra items become apparent during the course of the negotiations, we shall send you additional instructions regarding them.

Reciprocity

5. It may be that the Germans will raise the question of reciprocity during the negotiations. In this event, you should make it quite clear to them that we are not prepared to accept the principle of reciprocity. Since it is likely that the other sending states will be equally opposed to agreeing to extend reciprocal privileges at these negotiations, we hope that representatives of the sending states will be able to agree upon a common line in this regard before the negotiations commence. In our view, the language of Article 8, paragraph 1(b) of the Relations Convention as amended by the Protocol on the Termination of the Occupation Régime signed at Paris on October 23, 1954 makes it quite clear that the purpose of the Supplementary Status of Forces Agreement is to provide for the "special conditions" existing in the Federal Republic. There should be no question, therefore, of Canada agreeing to extend similar concessions to German Forces on Canadian territory. If the

This lengthy technical report is not printed. It comments on the 38 different U.K.-U.S.-French position papers on the various administrative needs of NATO forces in Germany. These range from simple questions concerning identification cards and drivers licences to more complex issues dealing with local procurement, civilian employees, currency and foreign exchange, taxation and accommodation.

Germans suggest that the sending states should agree in principle to extend the privileges in the Supplementary Agreement to German Forces (or, indeed, to all NATO Forces) who might some day be in their territory under conditions similar to those now obtaining in Germany, you should oppose this suggestion on the grounds that we would not wish to commit ourselves in advance on this matter. If the Germans persist in their argument and suggest that we should at least agree in principle to consider the question of reciprocity in circumstances similar to those in Germany, you should ask us for further instructions.

6. For your own information, our reasons for opposing any suggestion of reciprocity are twofold: in the first place we must bear in mind the possibility that concessions obtained for Canadian Forces in Germany might be used as a lever by the United States for seeking further concessions for United States Forces in Canada. In this connection, you will note that there are certain items in the Three Power position papers, particularly in connection with import duties and customs privileges, etc., which, because of the reciprocity aspect, it would not be appropriate for you to press for, although there are, of course, no objections to accepting these concessions for Canadian Forces if the Germans are willing to grant them unilaterally. Secondly, in view of the possibility that some day German airmen may come to Canada under the NATO Air Training Plan, we would not wish at these negotiations to be placed under any obligation to extend to these German airmen the same privileges as our forces would be enjoying in the Federal Republic under the Supplementary Agreement.

Summary

7. It seems obvious to us that the Three Power position papers represent an extreme position which is not likely to be acceptable to the Federal Republic. In fact, many of the concessions requested in these papers are not really essential to the efficient operation of Canadian Forces in Germany, and it is doubtful if they will all be granted by the Germans. In deciding the items on which you may yield to German objections, we think you should be guided by the attitude of the Three Powers who, in the final analysis, will be carrying the main burden of the negotiations. Should there be a difference in the attitudes of the Three Powers, we think that, as a general rule, it will be in Canada's interests to support the United Kingdom position rather than the United States, since the United Kingdom is faced with much the same problems as Canada in regard to the reciprocity aspect of these negotiations.

8. Your chief concern should be to see that the future status of Canadian Forces in the Federal Republic is equal to that of the forces of the other sending states, in particular the United Kingdom and the United States.

TRANSFER OF FRENCH FORCES TO NORTH AFRICA

The recent action of the French Government in withdrawing a French division from SACEUR for service in Algeria raises again the important issue of what obligations NATO countries assume when they assign, or earmark for assignment, to NATO certain military forces. For a long time these obligations remained vague and undefined, but during the past year efforts have been made to clarify them. The first of these efforts was during the negotiations preceding the London and Paris Agreements of last October. At that time it was feared that, if NATO countries were not specifically precluded from deploying forces they had assigned to SACEUR in Europe, except with the express permission of the NATO military authorities, a rearméd Germany might use her forces along the eastern frontier in a way prejudicial to peace. It was in everybody's mind that the Italian Government had previously, at the time of one of the Trieste crises, moved to the Yugoslav frontier two armoured divisions which were nominally under NATO command without consulting the NATO military authorities at all. It was not desired to repeat this experience with German forces.

2. After considerable discussion at the Nine-Power Conference, the following formula was finally adopted and incorporated in the NATO Council resolution of October 22 on SACEUR's revised terms of reference:

"The North Atlantic Council agrees, in the interest of most effective collective defence, that ... forces under the Supreme Allied Commander Europe and within the area of Allied Command Europe shall not be redeployed or used operationally within that area without the consent of the Supreme Allied Commander Europe, subject to political guidance furnished by the North Atlantic Council, when appropriate, through normal channels."<sup>62</sup>

3. In combination with the Council's decision that all forces of member nations stationed in the area of Allied Command Europe should (with certain exceptions) be placed under the authority of SACEUR and under the direction of the NATO military authorities, this formula ensures that no German forces (except limited forces for internal security) could be moved without the consent of SACEUR. It did not have this effect with respect to French forces, however, since forces intended for the defence of overseas territories were, in addition to forces for internal security, explicitly excluded from the rule that all forces should be placed under SACEUR's authority. Thus, in the case of France (and other NATO countries in Europe with overseas territories) the above-mentioned provisions of the Paris

Agreements placed a restriction only on the movement within the area of Allied Command Europe of forces which continued to be assigned to SACEUR. They could not prevent France, for example, withdrawing her own forces from SACEUR's command and placing them under national command, or retaining under national command forces which had been raised for assignment to SACEUR, or moving forces assigned to SACEUR from a location inside the area of Allied Command Europe to a location outside that area.

4. In this latter connection it should be noted that the area of Allied Command Europe, although not so far fully defined, was agreed during the London and Paris Conferences to exclude all French North Africa and Portugal.

5. The second of these efforts to clarify member countries' NATO obligations has been concerned with the separate question of the right to withdraw forces actually assigned to NATO, or to alter established force contributions to NATO, and with the procedures for doing so. During the past year there has been an increasing tendency on the part of certain member countries to make changes in their force contributions to NATO, both current and future, by unilateral decision and action and to present NATO with the accomplished fact. Last summer, for example, in the middle of the NATO Annual Review, which is designed of course to examine member countries' defence plans, the Belgian Government decided to reduce drastically the air forces she had previously undertaken to raise for NATO and refused to reconsider this decision. The Danish Government also reduced its defence estimates at about the same time without any prior consultation with NATO, but later agreed during the Annual Review to reconsider them. The latest French action is but another in a series of unilateral decisions by the French Government which have progressively reduced the size and effectiveness of the French commitment to SACEUR.

6. The obligations involved in these cases of force reduction are those undertaken when member countries adopt each year, at the end of the Annual Review process, firm force goals for the next year. The NATO forces are organized on the assumption that certain national components will be contributed and maintained by various member countries. These contributions are established in the force goals, which provide the Supreme Commanders with a statement of what they can count on in drawing up NATO defence plans. These contributions can be, and often are, modified in the course of the Annual Review each year. But the goals for the immediately following year, once they are adopted, are regarded as firm commitments until they are reviewed during the next Annual Review. It can therefore be justifiably argued that member countries have at least a moral obligation not to make marked changes to their contributions except through the Annual Review process, or in a manner which will provide for prior consultation with the NATO military authorities and the Council. Otherwise the whole basis of NATO defence planning would be jeopardized if national components could be withdrawn from the NATO forces, reduced or moved at will at any time by the countries concerned.

7. It was with such considerations in mind that the Standing Group, at the suggestion of the Secretary-General, formulated a procedure for NATO countries to follow in reporting alterations in their established force contributions to NATO. According to this procedure a member country would inform the North Atlantic Council, the Standing Group and the Allied Commander concerned, whenever it intended to reduce the number or strength of units assigned to or earmarked for NATO commands, to change the location of such units or to change their availability date. The North Atlantic Council, with the military advice of the Standing Group, would then consider whether any proposals or recommendations should be made to that country. This procedure has so far been approved by the Military Representatives Committee and has been submitted to the Council, which is scheduled to consider it shortly. As you know, this Department was consulted when the proposed proce-ture was before the Military Representatives Committee and on instructions from the Minister we expressed general agreement with it.

8. It is clear that the French Government's action in moving a division to Algeria, and in announcing this decision to the press before any consultation with NATO could be held, is not in accord with the procedure proposed by the Secretary-General which, although not finally adopted by the Council, had at least been approved by the Standing Group and the Military Representatives Committee, including presumably the French representatives on these bodies. Such action seems to be in conflict with the principle of collective partnership on which the present NATO military structure rests, and if this precedent is followed it may well necessitate reconsideration of the whole basis of national contributions.

9. The point at issue is not whether the French action was justified, in terms of the threat to the security of Algeria, a part of the NATO area, but whether the French Government should take upon itself alone to assess that threat in relation to the threat to other parts of the NATO area and to take measures affecting the security of the NATO area as a whole without adequate consultation with its allies. If the NATO forces in Europe were nothing more than a collection of national forces under national direction, the situation would be entirely different; but in creating an integrated force under SACEUR, and in financing in common the infrastructure facilities required by these forces and their unified headquarters, the NATO countries have implicitly accepted the principle of collective action and responsibility in defence matters. Unless this principle is respected the system of integrated forces will not work.

10. There seems to be little the Council can do in the present instance, except to withhold any approval, explicit or implied, of the French action. But consideration of the proposed Standing Group procedure referred to above would provide a good opportunity for members of the Council to emphasize the importance of the principle of consultation which it embodies and to sound a warning that this principle must be respected both in the spirit and in the letter if the strength of NATO is to be maintained.

11. The Permanent Representatives will be discussing the French action on June 22 and Mr. Wilgress has asked for our comments. If you agree I will prepare for your signature a telegram incorporating the views outlined in paragraphs 8, 9 and 10 above.

Reference: DL (1) Division's Memorandum to you of June 16.

TRANSFER OF FRENCH FORCES TO NORTH AFRICA

A copy of telegram No. 718 of June 6† from CANAC was referred to this Division and I notice that DL (1) Division is preparing for our Representative on the North Atlantic Council comments on the recent French action in transferring to Algeria a motorized infantry division which was committed to SACEUR. I understand that an appraisal of the strategic significance of this development is being prepared. Strategically, there may be much to be said for making secure NATO's southern ramparts and it is difficult not to sympathize with the French dilemma in North Africa but I do not see how we can do otherwise than look askance at unilateral action which, if accepted as a precedent, could lead to the dispersal in all directions of SACEUR's forces in central Europe.

2. Although the French action was bound to cause considerable consternation<sup>63</sup> in NATO circles, it should not have caused much surprise. There have been the following unmistakable indications of French policy in this matter:

(a) In 1954 when there was an urgent need for reinforcements to save the situation in Vietnam, forces amounting to two light divisions were withdrawn from the French contribution to NATO forces.

(b) When trouble developed in Tunisia in March, 1955, these two divisions were sent there instead of being returned to Europe, after an armistice had been concluded in Indo-China.

(c) France insisted on attaching to the European Defence Community Treaty a protocol which provided the right to withdraw troops from Europe when military necessity overseas required such action.

(d) The Ex-Gaullists who are strongly represented in the present French Government have consistently maintained that France must keep sovereign control of her armed forces.

3. Undoubtedly a claim can be made that France is protecting NATO interests in the Algerian Departments which are within the NATO area, but it should be remembered that in the previous instances of this kind, mentioned in sub-paragraphs (a) and (b) above, the forces were despatched beyond the NATO sphere. It is largely coincidence that Algeria happens to be within the NATO area and this is not a positive consideration.<sup>64</sup> When the movement of this division was announced, the Prime Minister of France said that the troops would be returned to Europe as soon as the situation in Algeria permitted but this does not alter the fact that in the interim period the forces in question are not available to SACEUR. There may also be some doubt about the extent of SACEUR's authority as it is defined in the Paris Agreements and elsewhere. However, none of these arguments detract from the fact that France is withdrawing one of the best divisions she had committed to SACEUR's command, that the French action is contrary to the whole concept of building up NATO's deterrent strength, and that it constitutes an unfortunate precedent.<sup>65</sup>

4. The French Government is in a very difficult and delicate position. Following up the initiative of M. Mendes-France, the Prime Minister, M. Faure, has courageously signed a series of Conventions granting a large measure of autonomy to Tunisia. These Conventions are scheduled to be debated next month in the French National Assembly. The right-wing parties, among them the Ex-Gaullists, have consistently opposed emancipation of the French colonies and these groups are represented in key posts in the Faure Cabinet. For example, both the Minister of National Defence, General Koenig and M. Gaston Paleski who is responsible for defence coordination, production and research, are Ex-Gaullists. Nevertheless, the Government is said to be optimistic about the prospects of obtaining Assembly approval of the Tunisian Conventions and it is conceivable that the Ex-Gaullists have agreed not to oppose this "fait accompli" if the Government will take stern measures

is that so? [Jules Léger]

to put down insurrection in Algeria and Morocco. At any rate the Faure Government, a right of center coalition, could not continue in office without the support of the majority of the Conservative deputies, many of whom represent vested interests in North Africa or the opposition of the "Presence Française" which is particularly strong in Algeria.

5. The seriousness of the situation in Algeria is undeniable but the wisdom of some of the French measures to meet this situation seems questionable. Harsh repressive measures in Algeria have driven moderate nationalists underground and the revolutionary influence of the Algerian Communist Party has probably increased. The state of emergency which was proclaimed in March, 1955, has not had the intended effect of localizing fellagha activities and nationalistic extremists who had been driven into the mountains on the Tunisian border are infiltrating the metropolitan areas, committing acts of terrorism and sabotage. Some French commentators have expressed fear that the pattern of Vietnam may be repeated and that the attempt to stamp out violence through the deployment of sufficient military force may precipitate open warfare.

6. What can the French Government do? If it does not take steps to stop terrorism in Algeria, Parliamentary approval of the Tunisian Conventions might be prejudiced and France would be subject to severe criticism if these accords were not ratified. On the other hand, the military force required for immediate and effective action can only be found from the NATO command and this, too, causes criticism. The crux of the matter is, of course, that France is no longer capable, militarily or economically, of playing the part of a big power simultaneously in Europe, Africa and Asia;<sup>66</sup> yet she is reluctant to give up a role which is the basis of internal morale and of France's future. Nevertheless, any action which weakens NATO and the fundamental concept of collective security which SACEUR's command represents is very disturbing.

7. The French Government has already taken unilateral action and both SACEUR and the Standing Group have accepted the situation with reluctance. In these circumstances, it is difficult to see how the Council can do more than express regret. If it did, the French might ask for NATO assistance in combating a threat to the Organization in an area within its competence. In the latter event NATO would have to consider the repercussions in Asia and the Middle East of intervention against the nationalistic aspirations of a dependent territory.<sup>67</sup> Some members of the Arab-Asian group will undoubtedly accuse NATO of intervention or connivance on the grounds that a division committed to SACEUR has been withdrawn to Algeria without objection from the Council. However, this does not justify a discussion of the question in the North Atlantic Council and if the Council were to consider an item of this kind, it would be difficult to refuse NATO consultation on Goa, Cyprus and other dependent or "colonial" territories. The fundamental fact is, of course, that Western defence is affected by these problems and will be weakened by them until a satisfactory solution to the aspirations of dependent territories is found.<sup>68</sup> From this point of view, a full-dress discussion of the problem in the NATO Council might eventually serve to moderate the policies of some member governments and demonstrate that NATO

NATO is no stronger than its component parts. Is it the role of other NATO partners to look on as spectators over the liquidation of French influence or should they help her retain it? This is a crucial problem which we should consider now. [Jules Léger] is not a "protector of colonialism" but a bulwark behind which orderly progress toward self-government can be achieved.

This, I think, should be out of the question. [Jules Léger]

8. However, this is not the time for such a discussion. Any evidence of weakness or dissension in NATO would be prejudicial to negotiations on international problems generally and the four-power and disarmament talks in particular. Consequently, although we can not but look askance at this subtraction from NATO's strength in Europe, any objection to it might have widespread and unfortunate repercussions.<sup>69</sup> I agree therefore with DL (1)'s conclusion that the Council should confine itself to withholding any approval of the French action, emphasizing the importance of consultation and the necessity of respecting this principle. In the circumstances perhaps, the less said the better but if our Representative speaks during the discussion I think his remarks should be tempered by a realization of the difficult position in which the French find themselves.<sup>70</sup>

ALTERATIONS IN ESTABLISHED NATIONAL FORCES CONTRIBUTIONS TO NATO

Towards the end of this month the NATO Council will consider a draft resolution on this important subject. The draft has been prepared by the NATO Secretariat, in informal consultation with delegations, on the basis of a U.S. delegation draft which was in turn based in part on a paper prepared by the Military Representatives Committee and approved by the Standing Group. Mr. Wilgress' telegram No. 1053 of September 2† (copy attached) contains the current working text.

2. As you know, the efforts to clarify the obligations assumed by NATO countries when they assign or earmark for assignment to NATO certain military forces had their origin in the fear that, if member states were not specifically precluded from deploying forces they had assigned to SACEUR in Europe, except with the express permission of the NATO military authorities, a rearmed Germany might use her forces along the eastern frontier in a way prejudicial to peace. The search for an effective solution to the problem was given added impetus by the increasing tendency during the past year on the part of certain member countries, notably France, to make changes in their force contributions to NATO, both current and future, by unilateral decision and action and to present NATO with the accomplished fact. Basically the issue is whether the principle of collective action and responsibility in defence matters, implicitly accepted by the creation of an integrated force under SACEUR and by the common financing of the infrastructure facilities required by the integrated force, is to be respected.

I agree. [Jules Léger]

I agree. J[ules] L[éger]

3. The draft resolution which is to be considered calls upon member governments to inform the Council and the appropriate NATO military authorities of important changes which they may feel compelled to make in their "current or prospective force contributions to NATO or in (their) defence programmes relating to NATO force goals", if possible in time for the Council's views to be fully considered by the government concerned before the execution of decisions on the matters in question. It also calls upon member governments to inform the NATO military authorities at once, and the Council at the first possible opportunity, if they should feel compelled to withdraw units from the area of NATO command to which the units are assigned or earmarked in order to meet an emergency elsewhere. (The French did in fact do this in the case of their recent withdrawals.)

4. The draft resolution is supplementary therefore, to the Council's resolution of last October on SACEUR's revised terms of reference, which reads in part as follows:

"The North Atlantic Council agrees, in the interest of most effective collective defence, that ... forces under the Supreme Allied Commander Europe and within the area of Allied Command Europe shall not be redeployed or used operationally within that area without the consent of the Supreme Allied Commander Europe, subject to political guidance furnished by the North Atlantic Council, when appropriate, through normal channels."

It stems directly from the resolution of last December on the 195[4] Annual Review and Related Problems, by which, among other things, the Council agreed "to study the conditions under which multilateral consideration can be given, throughout the year, to important changes in national contributions to NATO defence."

5. You may recall that last April I sent you a memorandum (attached for ease of reference) commenting in some detail on the Military Representatives Committee's paper. You then agreed to our informing National Defence that the principle of consultation with the Council on alterations in national force contributions to NATO was acceptable, and that the proposed procedure was satisfactory with one change designed to ensure that it would apply only to changes in firm force goals and not to changes in provisional or planning goals. You also agreed that it should be the responsibility of National Defence to submit this matter to Cabinet if it was considered necessary to do so.

6. Our suggested qualification was incorporated in the paper submitted by the NATO military authorities, but it received no support from other delegations to the Council. The United States, United Kingdom, French, Belgian and Netherlands representatives specifically opposed it on the ground that provisional and planning goals were taking added importance and that to restrict the resolution to current force contributions would reduce its usefulness. Accordingly, with the concurrence of National Defence, we informed Mr. Wilgress that if all other member states were willing to report changes in provisional and planning goals, as well as in current force contributions, we were prepared to do the same.

7. We also suggested to Mr. Wilgress that the resolution should make it clear that the Council and the NATO military authorities would be informed of contemplated important changes in force contributions and contemplated withdrawals of units before they were made and even before the government concerned had made a final decision on the matter. This was not acceptable to the French (with whom the British and Norwegians agreed) on the ground that it was difficult to say when a government's decision was "final". The formula inserted in the draft resolution to meet the majority view appears, however, to meet also the main point of our suggestion.

8. Some concern was expressed by the United States delegation that the words "defence programmes relating to NATO force goals" in paragraph 7 of the draft resolution might be taken to include reference to MDAP, which was unacceptable to the United States. The Chairman, however, held that this referred only to force contributions and thus would not apply to MDAP (or, presumably, to Canadian Mutual Aid). I think we should make it clear for the record that this is also our interpretation.

9. Subject to the understanding indicated in the preceding paragraph, I think that the draft resolution in its present form is acceptable. General Foulkes' office has informed us that there are "no military comments" on it. In the light of this comment from National Defence, if you agree that the draft resolution is now in acceptable form, you might wish to approve the attached draft telegram to Mr. Wilgress.<sup>71</sup>

FOUR POWER TALKS AND EUROPEAN SECURITY

In preparation for the Ministerial meetings of the NATO Council on July 16, we have reviewed the information available to us on the probable course of the "Summit" talks which are to commence in Geneva on July 18 and have attempted to formulate, for your consideration, what might be the Canadian attitude towards the talks and towards some of the principal proposals likely to be discussed.

2. In the process of trying to clear our own minds we have found that the different Divisions concerned (and we have not yet sought the views of other Departments) hold divergent points of view. We can therefore sympathize with the difficulties of the Western participants which may account for the paucity of information we have been able to extract from them on the substantive questions of Germany and European security.

OK L.B. P[earson]

Le Conseil de l'Atlantique Nord a adopté la résolution à sa réunion du 5 octobre 1955.
The North Atlantic Council adopted the resolution at its meeting on October 5, 1955.

3. The Western powers, including Canada, are it seems to me, in a dilemma. We wish to seize the opportunity, which our policies have largely created, to negotiate with the USSR to relax tensions and to reduce the threat of a nuclear war. This is stating the objectives of the negotiation in the Soviet cliché but there is some evidence that the Russians at last mean business. If they do not, there is no problem, apart from making this apparent to public opinion. But if they do they will ask a price for any concessions they may offer. Our dilemma is: are the Western Powers prepared to pay their price if they are prepared to pay ours?<sup>72</sup> Can we afford to pay? If not, can we afford to turn down their offer without making some counter proposal?

4. Since the end of April, the United Kingdom, United States, French and German Governments have been seeking the answers to these questions. The only official study we have seen is the report (copy attached) of the tripartite working group of officials which met in London before the last Ministerial meeting of the NATO Council last month.<sup>73</sup> Although the first third of that report deals with the form and timing of the Western invitation to the USSR, the remainder is still of interest. It analyzes in turn the various possible Soviet moves in Europe and outlines the attitude the Western Powers might adopt to each, including the broad lines of some possible Western initiatives and counter proposals, though these are not elaborated.

5. Although the London working group was not reconvened, tripartite preparations have continued, chiefly in Washington, where an informal working group was formed earlier this month. The official working group will reconvene in Paris on July 8 to review the findings of the Washington group and of tripartite groups of experts now meeting to examine particular aspects of the problem in the following places:

Bonn	- the Eden Plan
Paris	- European Security
New York	- Disarmament

We have as yet very little information about the work of the first two.

6. Since you left Ottawa, we have, however, received full reports† (attached) from Mr. Johnson and Mr. Heeney on the meetings of the three Foreign Ministers in New York on June 15-16. In the past few days, we have also had valuable reports† (attached) from our Missions in London, Bonn, and Paris on current thinking in their capitals, although you may have had more recent information from the Foreign Ministers themselves in San Francisco.

7. Added together, these reports begin to paint a coherent picture. The Western Powers foresee a long series of high level negotiations. After four to six days at Geneva in July to launch the talks "at the summit", to present general views on the causes of international tension and to explore tentatively any proposals advanced, the four Foreign Ministers will resume negotiations in September or October, after Chancellor Adenauer's visit to Moscow; depending on progress made this year, there might be another high level meeting some time next year.

8. The Russians, on the other hand, appear to be in more of a hurry, as their handling of the Austrian Treaty, the Belgrade visit and their invitation to Adenauer show. Yet they have made it quite plain publicly and privately that they are no more ready than are the

What is ours? [L.B. Pearson]

Western Powers to give something for nothing or to discuss the liquidation of their position in Eastern Europe.

9. At Yalta and Potsdam, the Powers were under compulsion to agree. They did what they thought it was necessary to do to maintain the unity to win the war. There is no such urgency today. On the other hand, the Russians, for their own reasons, seem in a mood to negotiate. With the Paris Agreements ratified,<sup>74</sup> the West is not only morally bound to make the attempt but for a variety of compelling reasons — political, military and economic — a serious effort should be made this year to make the shift from cold war to cold peace. Looking ahead, it seems to me unlikely that the West will be in a relatively better position to negotiate with the Russians in the foreseeable future. Therefore the Western Powers must do more than go through the motions. We must recognize and accept the opportunities and the risks which real negotiations entail.

10. It is becoming apparent that this attitude is shared more fully in London and Paris than in Bonn or Washington. No doubt we can all subscribe to the terms of the joint declaration, released after Chancellor Adenauer's visit to the President, that neither neutrality nor neutralization is a possible solution for Germany.<sup>75</sup> At San Francisco, Mr. Pinay added his "Amen". A neutral Germany free to rearm without controls or limitations could become a menace, while neutralization by outside powers is a solution no self-respecting German could stomach.

11. Moreover, although this point is not made from the roof-tops, a neutral or neutralized Germany would mean a Germany out of NATO which might in turn mean North American troops out of Europe. Although this would not necessarily follow, it would radically alter the political character and military dispositions of NATO.

12. On the cardinal points there is agreement among the three powers that: Western security arrangements must be preserved; the Paris Agreements are not negotiable; Germany cannot be neutralized; a balance between Soviet and Western strength in Europe must be preserved; the legitimate interests of all NATO and WEU countries must be respected.

13. It is, however, recognized in the capitals of Western Europe that, precisely, because the Paris Agreements are not negotiable, the German question is probably insoluble except in the context of some European or still wider security system. For years this has been the refrain of both Chancellor Adenauer and the Socialist opposition in Germany. The French have always linked the problem of Germany with disarmament; and in the Malik Plan presented to the Disarmament Sub-Committee in London early last month the USSR also linked the solution of the two questions so directly affecting their security.<sup>76</sup> In his private conversations in Paris and San Francisco, Mr. Molotov showed more interest in a European Security System and disarmament than in German reunification. As Lord Hood said in briefing old Commonwealth representatives in New York, the Russians cannot conceive of German reunification except in a setting of European security, and the West cannot conceive of European security without German reunification.

14. The Eden Plan with technical embellishments, will probably be the Western starting point at Geneva.<sup>77</sup> (A summary† is attached for easy reference). It makes no provision for a security system into which a united Germany could fit. This gap in the Western position led to criticisms at the time of the Berlin Conference and it is legitimate to expect the Western Powers to do something to fill it at Geneva. The difficulty is to agree on what could be done.

15. Of the possibilities discussed very tentatively by Lord Hood and by the tripartite working group, we are interested in the following elements:

(a) a Five Power Mutual Assistance Treaty in which the four powers and Germany would renounce the use of force for settling territorial claims, etc. and would pledge each other assistance in case of an attack by another signatory;

(b) a European Security Treaty which

(i) would provide for consultations in the event of an attack on any of the parties in Europe;

(ii) would limit and control all conventional armaments and armed forces in Europe, including non-European forces in Europe (Soviet, U.S., British and Canadian) but which would not include forces or arms in the USSR or in the United Kingdom or North America; and

(iii) would establish certain demilitarized zones (the Eastern Zone of Germany has been suggested by Mr. Van Zeeland).

16. A five power pact, as outlined in (a) above, could be invoked in the case of a German attack on the USSR, or vice versa, but only the consultative procedure of the general European Security Treaty would operate if Russia or Germany attacked Poland. Both pacts assume that frontiers are recognized, which they are not; and both might extend the commitments of the Western Powers in Europe and might prejudice NATO arrangements.<sup>78</sup>

17. At the same time, if the USSR is looking for some legitimate reassurance (in addition to the unilateral guarantees of the Paris Agreements) that German rearmament will not get out of control and will not be used for revanchist adventures eastwards, some such combination of a regional Locarno—cum—disarmament might be attainable without either breaking up NATO or leaving the West in a relatively weaker position militarily on the Continent.

18. For some time the Germans have contemplated a European Security System as the road to reunification. Chancellor Adenauer has spoken publicly of W.E.U. as the vehicle for this system — a W.E.U. extended to include the satellites (and perhaps the USSR), or in treaty relations with the Warsaw Pact countries. The tripartite working group came down against any NATO—EETO pact as perpetuating the division of Europe and confirming the Soviet grip on the Satellites.<sup>79</sup> Such objections are however on a different scale if it should ever prove possible to get a European disarmament scheme into effective operation.

19. The Western prerequisite to a European Security System should clearly be the reunification of Germany. The question of German neutrality we have already discussed in an earlier paper (of June 7)†, concluding that neutrality was an unacceptable solution and that a well thought out European security system offered a safer approach to the problem of German reunification.

20. On the Soviet side, a withdrawal of the bulk of foreign forces from Germany is at present a prerequisite for all-German elections. Indeed it is hard to see how the USSR

How[?] [L.B. Pearson]

could agree to any European Security System without at least a partial withdrawal of United States forces from Germany. There might however be room for manoeuvre here based on a slow and partial withdrawal over a period of time.

21. Another factor in our negotiating position is that, through the Eden Plan, the Western Powers have already offered a reunited Germany the opportunity to "opt out" of NATO. From the tripartite consultations it seems reasonably certain that the Western Powers will stand by their offer and run the risk (which is a real one) that the Socialists might win all-German elections and leave NATO or substantially reduce their military undertakings under the Paris Agreements. Because the risk is real, the Eden Plan must have some attractions for the Russians, even at the cost of the liquidation of communism as an effective force in East Germany. (By the same token, one of the first conclusions we reach in our own thinking is that NATO must be made as attractive a club as possible for the new German member. The directors of the Club must not hesitate to do all that they reasonably can to promote the chief interest of the Germans, the unification of their country. It must be made apparent to the Germans that the Atlantic Club is not just a militaristic substitute for the "European idea").

22. Although any Soviet demand for a reunified Germany to withdraw automatically from NATO will be rejected by the Western Powers without embarrassment, it might not be so easy to handle a Soviet offer to accept the Eden Plan provided most foreign forces were withdrawn before the elections (so the elections would not be influenced by their presence) and both East and West German Governments were to withdraw before the elections from EETO and NATO, reserving the right of an all-German Government to choose its alliances subsequently. We would expect such an offer to be rejected by the West; but it would be bound to have a strong appeal in Germany.

23. We are now working on a list of Canadian criteria which could be used in approaching the complex problems which will arise at Geneva and hope to have it ready for discussion at the meeting next Friday.<sup>80</sup>

FOUR POWER TALKS AND EUROPEAN SECURITY: CANADIAN CRITERIA

Following is departmental paper on Canadian Criteria. Text begins:

"In the forthcoming conference with the Soviet Union the four powers will discuss, among other subjects, the question of Germany and the associated problem of European Security which will affect the interests of a number of other countries not directly represented at the conference.

2. From the Western point of view the main aim is to reduce and eventually eliminate the danger of war without sacrificing our essential interests or principles; while at the same time strengthening and, if possible, extending the area of the free world by peaceful means. With the advent of thermo-nuclear weapons, everything possible should be done to prevent a war occurring by accident. This requires the lowering of tempers in both blocs and the elimination of the chief points of friction. It is axiomatic that we should not weaken our military or political strength and unity, relative to the Soviet side since experience has shown that this is a prerequisite for peaceful relations with the U.S.S.R. Nor should we accept a merely temporary easing of tension at the expense of creating a future danger greater than that now existing.

3. If we recognize that no lasting reduction of tension is possible so long as a large part of Europe is denied a genuinely free choice of government, then we must also recognize that the only way to achieve this is by trying to loosen or remove Russian control from as much of Europe as we can. A real reduction of tension in Europe, however, will be possible only when the German problem is solved as a result of a real shift in Soviet policy; and only by the less static situation which that would create is there much possibility of recovering any ground in Eastern Europe.

4. Since our position is now relatively strong and since the Russians now appear at long last to recognize the need to take steps to reduce the risk of nuclear war, any opportunity for a real reduction of international tension should be explored and Soviet intentions tested, keeping in mind the following criteria in judging the extent to which the proposals which might be brought forward will truly serve our main aim.

(a) We should maintain an effective regional system of collective security in the absence of an effective universal system.

This means that NATO should not be altered in character or weakened as long as we are unable to establish an effective system of universal collective security under the United Nations. NATO is not negotiable; the level, deployment or armament of NATO (including German) forces could be negotiated with the Soviet bloc if agreement could be reached on adequate safeguards and reciprocal concessions.

(b) We should maintain our deterrent capability until an effective international armament control system becomes feasible.

The greatest deterrent to aggression in Europe is the knowledge that it would bring about total war in which the aggressor could not hope to escape nuclear devastation. We can afford to dispense with this deterrent only when we have reached a point in our relations with the Soviet Union at which an international control system can be established which will reduce to an acceptable minimum the danger of aggressive use of arms. The establishment of a European security system would affect the deterrent capability adversely if it included provision for the withdrawal of United States bases from Europe.

(c) We should maintain the solidarity of North America and Western Europe, which is essential to our regional system of collective security.

One of the major aims of Soviet policy has for some time been to remove United States forces and bases from Europe. Yet the presence of United States forces and bases in Europe is a cornerstone of the NATO edifice and hence of Canada's security. If they were withdrawn or seriously reduced, it would not only weaken NATO militarily, politically and economically; it would also upset the existing political balance in Europe with serious consequences in relation to the growing importance and influence of Germany.

(d) We should seek the closest possible political, economic and military association of Germany with the West.

Our present policy, in accordance with the London and Paris agreements, is to achieve this by means of NATO and WEU, which are interdependent for this purpose. In particular, the closest co-operation between France and Germany is essential for the security of the West, and for this purpose the continued presence of United Kingdom forces on the continent has proved to be a prerequisite. German policy will, of course, become increasingly independent, especially after the establishment of direct diplomatic relations with the U.S.S.R., but every effort must be made to keep Germany fully within the Western alliance. With or without reunification, the entry of Germany on the world stage will radically alter the situation in a few years' time.

(e) We should be prepared to give the U.S.S.R. reasonable assurances that our security arrangements are defensive.

In order to reduce international tension and facilitate a settlement of the German problem, the Western powers might be prepared to consider a five-power mutual guarantee against aggression by any of the signatories, together perhaps with an all-European armament control system along the lines of WEU. However, any system of European security which was a replacement for and not a supplement to NATO would be gravely prejudicial to our interests.

(f) We should stand by the proposal to reunify Germany on the basis of free and effectively supervised elections with subsequent freedom of decision by an all-German government on international engagements.

It is important to ensure that this objective is not pursued in such a way as to detract from our primary aim with regard to Germany of the closest possible association with the West. Germany's membership in NATO, being a free German engagement, is not negotiable by the Western powers. While we must therefore exclude any idea of neutralizing Germany, it might be wise to seek agreement with the Soviet Union in advance providing for a continued balance of advantage as between the two sides, whether Germany remains in NATO or leaves it, on some such basis as the following:

(i) If an all-German government opts to remain in NATO, Germany's Eastern frontier would presumably be guaranteed under Article 5 of the North Atlantic Treaty, but in order to provide the U.S.S.R. with appropriate assurances regarding her security (in addition to those foreseen under criteria (a) and (e) above), a belt of territory along Germany's Eastern frontier might be demilitarized.

(ii) If an all-German government opts out of NATO, some form of effective collective control over German rearmament should be established and the gradual withdrawal of NATO forces from Germany should be balanced by the withdrawal of Soviet forces not only from East Germany but at least in part from the countries of Eastern Europe as well; such a control obviously could only be achieved in the wider framework of a European security system.

NATO MINISTERIAL MEETING, JULY 16TH

The Foreign Ministers met at ten o'clock this morning (July 16th). It was decided at the outset that the summary records would be graded COSMIC Top Secret and that one copy only will be made available to the delegations. The verbatim report will be kept at the Secretariat for consultation by delegations if necessary.

2. Mr. Dulles opened the discussion by recalling that two months ago, at the last ministerial meeting, he had announced the issuance of an invitation to the USSR for a meeting at the head of governments level. Since then, many developments have taken place of a favourable character. In the first place, the invitation was accepted by the Russians and, following this acceptance, intensive consultations were carried out by the three Western powers and also with Germany, and talks have also been held with Mr. Molotov regarding the preparation of the conference. He said that many public statements had been made by the heads of governments which, in a sense, constituted the beginning of the conference itself. At Vienna, preliminary conversations were held with Molotov and views were exchanged regarding the character of the meeting. There had also been the meeting in New York on the way to San Francisco between the Foreign Ministers of the three Western powers and Adenauer. At San Francisco there had been an opportunity to hold private talks with Molotov, sometimes on a tripartite basis and sometimes on a bilateral basis. All these talks amounted to what the Secretary of State described as the "pleadings of the case" and some clarification was achieved as to the issues that will be discussed at Geneva. It therefore could be said that the Western powers go to Geneva well prepared.

3. Mr. Dulles said that it was important in the beginning of his remarks to emphasize the nature of the Geneva conference as envisaged by the inviting powers. He said that two stages are contemplated. The first one, of course, is the meeting of the heads of governments which will be devoted to formulating the various issues involved. As time will be brief, however, it will not be possible to reach decisions on these issues and the most that could be accomplished was to reach agreement on the methods and procedure that would be subsequently followed. The second stage is really the more important because it will set the lines along which further studies will be made in the United Nations or elsewhere. The Secretary of State said that the real importance of the Geneva conference was that it may see the development of a new spirit which would be characterized by the predominance of confidence over fear and suspicion as has been the case in the past. He said that the few statements that had been made so far by the heads of states indicated that the Geneva spirit would be different at least at the first stage. His earnest hope was that the new spirit will also extend to the second stage of the conference.

4. Mr. Dulles said that the main topics which are expected to be touched upon in Geneva and which both sides seem to be anxious to discuss are:

Reunification of Germany. There was a genuine desire to put an end to the present situation which endangers the peace.

European security problems which the Secretary defined as follows: in what framework will the reunification of Germany take place? He said that on our side we cannot realistically expect the USSR to abandon Eastern Germany if such a move meant any advancement of the "forward strategy" of NATO. Therefore, some formula should be devised which would not increase the insecurity felt by the USSR. The Secretary said that, although we feel confident of the purely defensive character of our alliance, we must realize that other countries may not have the same confidence in our motives. He said that, from a purely technical point of view, Germany could opt to leave NATO but in fact the Russians realize that Western Germany will continue its alignment with the West. Our plans must be based on that assumption.

The Secretary then referred to the question of global disarmament. He said that the USSR, on May 10th, made some proposals which represent certain advances over their past position. Some doubts existed, however, regarding the sincerity of the Soviets when these proposals were made dependent on certain political settlements which enabled them to postpone the issues indefinitely. United States thinking had been that there could be no agreement on level of armaments until effective inspection and control had been worked out. No country could be expected to make its security dependent on a slightly more amenable mood on the part of a government. The Secretary asked the question — how long will the present détente mood of the Russians last? In the end, a successful control system of armament must be based on procedure that makes sure that control is carried out by both sides. This was particularly true with regard to the control of atomic weapons. Recent developments had shown the impossibility of even complete inspection detecting atomic stockpiles. Furthermore, it was doubtful whether the USA itself would now be able to accept all the procedures for complete inspection that would be required. This aspect of the question should therefore be re-examined. There was no denying also that any form of international control of armaments involves many difficult questions, such as the movement of aliens within national boundaries. Whatever proposal we put forward must be balanced by what we, ourselves, are willing to grant.

5. The Secretary then mentioned other topics which might be raised by the Western side and which the Russians might not be prepared to discuss. He mentioned first the question of the satellites, to say that no peace in Europe can be secure until these countries can resume their place as free nations and until the USSR frontier ceased to be projected far into Europe. He also mentioned the problem of international Communism. He said that any system which allows a country to inspire and finance subversive activities reduces the likelihood of establishing friendly relations between East and West. He also alluded to the problem of the Iron Curtain. Although communications had slightly improved between East and West lately, still there was no free interchange of knowledge between the two camps. If the Russian peoples were misled about the motives of the other part of the world, this surely was conducive to misunderstanding and increased the danger of war. The question of war prisoners and the violation of armistice undertakings by the USSR was another possible topic of discussion. Mr. Dulles thought, however, that this question could be dealt with informally, perhaps in the "buffet room".

6. From the Soviet side, Mr. Dulles thought that certain other topics might be raised. Mr. Molotov, at San Francisco, had mentioned to him that he would like to discuss the question of war propaganda against the USSR in the United States. Obviously this was a pure propaganda theme and if, indeed, it was raised, it would suggest doubts as to whether the Russians were making a serious approach to the conference. With regard to the Far East, Mr. Dulles said that he did not think that Far Eastern problems should appropriately be dealt with at Geneva. These problems should be discussed on an ad hoc basis and this is being done in a reasonably satisfactory way. The Russians might propose a six-power conference on Far Eastern problems, but Mr. Dulles indicated that he would not accept such a proposal. With regard to the question of trade between East and West, he said that these problems could adequately be discussed through existing machinery, including the United Nations. It may be possible for countries which are not members of the United Nations to participate in the work of certain United Nations specialized agencies in this respect. Mr. Dulles did not consider, however, that the question of strategic control was a trade problem but, rather, involved security considerations which should be linked with disarmament. Finally, Mr. Dulles mentioned that the USSR might propose that a declaration of principles in Communist terms be agreed upon in Geneva. This was a well-known technique but the West could not agree to any declaration which would have a purely Soviet trade mark upon it.

7. Mr. Dulles ended up his remarks by emphasizing that no new solutions will be proposed by the Western powers but that efforts will be concentrated in indicating the lines of study that the heads of states want to be followed by the Foreign Ministers in their subsequent discussions. No new formula had been agreed upon by the three powers and no commitments will be made at the summit meeting. This should reinforce the flexibility of approach in the second stage of the discussions.

8. Mr. Dulles was followed by the French Foreign Minister. Mr. Pinay emphasized at the outset of his remarks the desire of the French Government to keep its NATO allies informed of the discussions in accordance with the spirit and the letter of the North Atlantic Alliance. He then characterized the Geneva conference as a conference which did not aim at reaching firm decisions on the various issues that will be discussed; it will, rather, set the basis on which the work of the Foreign Ministers could be carried on at a later stage. He said that the Russian position regarding Germany is well known; it seeks the reunification of Germany at the price of neutrality. The French position, on the other hand, was described by Mr. Pinay as follows: "L'Allemagne doit être réunie dans la sécurité de tous et la sienne propre." Security for all meant the maintenance of our present defence system. The security of Germany meant that Germany could choose freely her international associations. France is also concerned with the security of the Eastern European states but not to the extent that this would mean the dismantlement of Western security arrangements.

9. Mr. Macmillan restricted his remarks to the practical problems of continued political consultation between NATO allies. He said that, as a result of the Geneva conference, there should be a Foreign Ministers' meeting some time in the fall. The question was — how should the three Western powers act on behalf of their allies in planning the subsequent steps? He said that alternative methods could be worked out. One would be for all fifteen Foreign Ministers to sit at the table, but this procedure would probably prove to be impractical. Not only would it be impossible to get on to details, but the Soviets might also ask that their allies be brought in to the conference table. He hoped, therefore, that the three big powers would be allowed to speak for and act as the trustees of the other NATO countries in close consultation with them.

10. He then elaborated on the methods of consultation that he thought could be followed, both before and during the Foreign Ministers' meeting. Before the Ministerial meeting the big three could keep NATO fully informed of the plans they intend to table at the meeting. This would be done through the Permanent Council and possibly a Ministerial meeting of the Council could be held before the Foreign Ministers' meeting. During the conference (and Mr. Macmillan made it clear that he was seeking the considered views of his colleagues on this point) various methods of consultation could be envisaged. For instance, each government could send an observer to the Foreign Ministers' meeting or, alternatively, the machinery of the Permanent Council could be used.

11. During the course of my intervention I made some remarks about Mr. Macmillan's proposals and particularly the 'mandate concept' as applied to NATO political consultation.

12. The Italian Minister's intervention may be summarized briefly. With regard to collective security and disarmament, he said that these two questions were intimately linked. No real security scheme could be worked out without disarmament and, therefore, a system of effective control. The same principles which inspire the control of armaments within WEU could, perhaps, be applied to the broader European context and create a favourable climate for a détente. It should be made clear, however, that the return of Russian troops within the USSR would not be sufficient in itself to warrant the withdrawal of United States and United Kingdom forces from the Continent. On the question of Germany, Mr. Martino said only that the Italian Government earnestly hopes that Germany will be reunified on the basis of free elections.

13. Mr. Martino made some remarks regarding the admission of new members to the United Nations. The question of universality was rejected by his government and each application should be treated on its own merits. His government hopes that an end would be put to the unjust discrimination exercised against Italy in this respect. He hoped that the Western powers would keep in mind the views of his government on this question, as well as on the question of the return of Italian prisoners of war still held in the USSR.

14. Mr. Martino expressed some doubts about the views stated by Mr. Macmillan regarding the trustees' concept. His government would not be prepared to accept decisions, in the discussion of which it had not participated. He said also that his government could not be expected to agree that the disarmament negotiations, which were of such overriding importance, should be dealt with exclusively within the United Nations as long as Italy was not a member of the organization and, therefore, was deprived of the opportunity of making her views known.

15. The German Foreign Minister prefaced his intervention by remarks about the present psychological climate in Germany. Since May 9th, Germany has become a member of NATO and her new status has had a beneficial effect on public opinion. Germans now look forward to their new association with the community of the free Western nations as a means to enhance their security, to complete their economic reconstructions, and to implement their long-sought aim of reunification. In this connection, his government was greatly encouraged by the support his government was receiving from the west to achieve reunification.

16. As the Germans understood it, however, reunification must be achieved on the basis of free elections agreed upon multilaterally and not through bilateral negotiations between Germany and the USSR. His government will never agree to the recognition of two separate Germanys even on a provisional basis. Moreover, whatever new system of security is devised, it should not effect the present security arrangements of the West, i.e. NATO, nor should it afford any recognition of the present territorial arrangements. Referring to Malik's disarmament proposals, Mr. Von Brentano said that the German Government would not agree to any arrangement that would result in the withdrawal of United States forces from Germany. In conclusion, the German Foreign Minister stated that supplementary security guarantees will have to be worked out to allay the fears of the Russians, but that the Geneva conference could, at the most, deal with the broad issues involved, leaving details to be discussed at a later stage.

17. The intervention of the Norwegian Foreign Minister was devoted to labour the point (in connection with Mr. Macmillan's remarks) that we should make maximum use of the machinery already provided for by the Permanent Council for political consultation, both prior and during the October Foreign Ministers' conference.

18. Mr. Spaak, as usual, made a lucid and effective exposé of his views. He concurred in the remarks made by Mr. Lange and hailed NATO as a new 'diplomatic strategy' which had a tremendous significance for the West. He then reviewed the three main topics mentioned by Mr. Dulles, which will probably come up for discussion at Geneva.

19. With regard to the reunification of Germany, some firm principles should be observed. It should be made abundantly clear that the Western powers are determined to achieve the reunification of Germany, but not at any price. The price we are not disposed to pay is that Germany should be deprived of her opportunity to cast her destiny alongside that of the Western democracies.

20. On European security, Mr. Spaak remarked that our thinking has progressed considerably since Locarno. At that time it was fashionable to sign treaties whose value was limited because they did not provide any machinery to maintain the peace. NATO, on the other hand, is a treaty with 'teeth' in it and predicated on a firm military basis. The Russians, however, do not seem to realize the distinction between old-fashioned types of guarantees and the NATO Alliance. It was up to us to make them realize that we cannot accept any system of guarantee that would mean the abandonment of our essential NATO commitments. He thought that a form of security arrangements that could possibly allay the Russian fear might be some kind of a security pact between NATO and EETO. This would amount only to putting into writing the defensive aspect of the NATO Alliance.

21. Finally, with regard to global disarmament proposals, Mr. Spaak said that the West has to be careful not to leave the initiative to the Russians in making what appeared to be plausible peaceful proposals and that at Geneva it should be made clear to the Russians that political settlements should follow logically agreement on a disarmament scheme, and not the other way around.

22. Finally, Mr. Spaak said that he saw a contradiction in the views expressed by Mr. Dulles about the principle of non-intervention in internal affairs (in connection with international Communism) and the Secretary of State's desire to raise the question of the satellites. He warned also against adopting too rigid an attitude against agreeing to a declaration of broad principles which the Russians might propose.

23. Mr. Zorlu, the Vice-Prime Minister of Turkey, and Mr. Beyen and Dr. Cunha also made brief interventions but did not add any new elements to the debate. We are reporting separately on the Minister's intervention.

NATO COUNCIL — MINISTERIAL MEETING

Following from the Minister, Begins: As you will see from my preceding telegram, the amount of information actually passed on to the Council by Messrs. Dulles, Macmillan and Pinay added nothing to what we had already received through the permanent representatives. I think that this probably to a large extent represents the Western situation on the eve of the talks; but I thought it perhaps worth while to point this out to the Big Three and to put straight the reasons why we thought there was a valid reason for calling the NATO Council. I thought it also necessary to correct the impression given by Macmillan that the Big Three had some kind of a mandate from the other twelve to speak at Geneva for the Council as a whole.

2. I expressed my appreciation for the consultation which had previously taken place through the permanent council and expressed the hope that some of the ideas presented by my colleagues at today's meetings might be of use subsequently at Geneva and later. Pointing out that all the information presented by the Big Three ministers had already been given to the Council, I asked the question why we were assembled in Paris, and underlined that the reason was certainly not to give a mandate to three of the members to act jointly on behalf of the rest. We would not like to establish a doctrine that any Committee of the Fifteen could act for NATO, particularly when it was clear that even the policies of the "Committee" had not been fully worked out. I reminded them that we all had our responsibilities to parliament, as the Italian Foreign Minister had mentioned, and there was a danger, if the Macmillan suggestion became doctrine, that it would play into the hands of the Russians. Furthermore, I did not think that the Big Three would really want the task of speaking for any but themselves.

3. I then went on to say that I thought the raison d'être of the meeting was to emphasize the interdependence of the NATO countries as regards the Geneva questions, and to give our support and approval to the views and the spirit in which the Big Three approached these problems. It was going to be a long drawn-out process of negotiation, and I heartily agreed with what Dulles had said about creating at the beginning the right atmosphere for attempting later to tackle the various questions with the Russians.

4. I suggested, however, that it may be that the Russians from the very beginning would present concrete and detailed proposals to take from us the initiative, and I was glad, therefore, to hear from Pinay that their attitude at Geneva would be one of carefulness and imagination.

5. If the Russians should present concrete proposals, I suggested that they should be judged in the light of certain criteria. The first was the necessity of maintaining an effective system of collective security. We should not negotiate NATO itself, though the level, use and deployment of NATO forces might be negotiable. Second, we should not accept any proposal which would effect our present deterrent strength, which could only be reduced as tensions eased, problems were solved and agreements made. Third, we should do nothing which would affect the close association of Germany with the west, provided that that was the Germans wanted, and I gathered from Brentano that that was the desire and determination of the German Government. Fourth, we should do nothing which would have a bad effect on the movement towards limitation of armaments, which must be one of our security aims. In this connection I gave full approval to Dulles' statement that we must re-examine some of our original assumptions regarding disarmament, assumptions which were no longer valid in the light of developments in nuclear weapons. While there could be no effective disarmament scheme of the kind we had been considering for years without a real inspection system, this now seemed to be practically impossible for nuclear weapons already stockpiled; many aspects of our inspection proposals would no longer be acceptable even by our side, as Dulles himself had made clear.

6. I then took up the statement of the Italian Foreign Minister concerning the exclusion of many countries from any role in disarmament talks, and said that we must look again at the machinery for disarmament which was obviously inadequate so long as some important countries are excluded from the United Nations. I thought that as a result of the talks in San Francisco there might be a greater likelihood of permitting the entry of some of these countries into the United Nations. If, however, the basis for disarmament talks should be modified as a result of the Geneva Conference, then I thought a good deal might be said for giving thought to the establishment of a specialized agency for disarmament on security which might be set up under the United Nations but which would be open to any country to join, as is now the case with most specialized agencies. I threw this out merely as an idea without going into any detail.

7. I think my intervention was well received though it clearly startled Macmillan and Dulles at the beginning. Macmillan saw me afterwards, however, and I think quite understands that it would be unfortunate from their point of view, as well as that of the other members of NATO, if the idea of a "mandate" were to become generally accepted. The complaint of Martino about exclusion from the disarmament negotiations was a clear opening to mention my idea concerning a United Nations specialized agency for disarmament. It may start a new trend of thought in a number of foreign offices, particularly of the smaller countries. Ends.

THE GENEVA CONFERENCE<sup>82</sup>

I attach herewith two studies prepared in the Department on the subject of "German Reunification and European Security", and "Disarmament". It seemed best to treat these two questions separately since that appears to have been the decision of the Big Four at Geneva. These two papers attempt only to analyse the proposals made on these subjects.

2. We are working on a study of the wider implications of the Geneva Conference, but I would prefer to delay presenting it to you for your consideration until further assessments of the Conference, its impact on our relations with the U.S.S.R., and its probable effect on the NATO alliance, can be received and thoroughly studied. I hope this may be ready by the end of next week.

THE GENEVA CONFERENCE AND DISARMAMENT

As expected, disarmament was one of the main topics of discussion at Geneva. In their opening statements, two heads of government, Messrs. Faure and Bulganin, devoted a good deal of attention to this subject which was also dealt with the President Eisenhower, while Mr. Eden considered its European aspect. The agenda agreed to on the second day included disarmament as the third of four items, the first two being German reunification and European security and the fourth the improving of East-West relations. The summit discussions on the fourth day were thus devoted to disarmament and the final Directives issued by the heads of Government to their foreign ministers also dealt with the subject.

The Eisenhower Proposals

2. The most spectacular development was President Eisenhower's suggestions (1) that the United States and the U.S.S.R. should "give each other a complete blueprint of our military establishments, from beginning to end, from one end of our countries to the other"; and (2) that each country provide unlimited facilities for aerial photography of its territory by the other country — "We to provide you the facilities within our country, ample facilities for aerial reconnaissance, where you can make all the pictures you choose and take them to your country to study, you to provide exactly the same facilities for us and we to make these examinations".

3. There is nothing fundamentally new in these proposals. Provision for aerial surveys of national territories under certain conditions was made in the United Nations plan for the control of atomic energy which was vetoed by the U.S.S.R. in 1948. Similarly, the disclosure of full information on armed forces and armaments (both atomic and non-atomic) as a necessary preliminary to disarmament was the subject of proposals submitted by the United States in the Disarmament Commission in 1952 which were consistently rejected by the Soviet Union. There is no doubt that both features are implicitly included in the Western perennial proposal for unlimited inspection "anywhere at any time" which has proved the main stumbling block in East-West disarmament negotiations. The novelty of the President's proposals resided in the fact that they were presented in a dramatic fashion in a new psychological context brought about by recent technological developments.

4. In presenting his proposals, the President was elaborating on the suggestion contained in his opening statement that future discussion on the vital issue of inspection might be oriented towards the establishment of "an alarm system". This was in line with recent indications given by the Americans that total inspection, Western style, might not be a practicable proposition from the United States point of view at this juncture. The new approach is also prompted by the consideration that the most thorough system of inspection which might provide for adequate control of future atomic and non-atomic activities from the time of its establishment could not ensure the complete elimination of stockpiles of nuclear weapons. The President confirmed this development specifically in his July 21 speech when he said, "We have not as yet been able to discover any scientific or other inspection method which would make certain of the elimination of nuclear weapons. So far as we are aware no other nation has made such a discovery. Our study of this problem is continuing."

5. One great advantage of the President's proposals is that they may provide new ground for further discussion by the United Nations of the most important aspect of the disarmament problem. There is no indication that the Russians may be able to accept this new approach. They refrained from making any direct comment during the conference on the President's suggestions which Bulganin described as "frank declarations" having "great significance for the examination of this point in the future". The offhand reaction of many observers is that the U.S.S.R. would have little to gain and a good deal to lose from the implementation of the proposals since, as Senator George put it, the United States "are living in a fish bowl from the military standpoint". Perhaps the greatest merit of the President's proposal was to offset to a large extent the propaganda advantage which the Russians had gained by the submission of their latest disarmament plan originally put forward in the Disarmament Sub-Committee last May and pushed again into the spotlight at San Francisco. If this was the main aim of the Stassen-Radford-Rockefeller team, which apparently rushed to Geneva to assist Mr. Eisenhower in this particular exercise, the President's gesture may be regarded as a master stroke.

6. Although President Eisenhower reiterated in his inaugural speech the suggestion which he originally put forward in 1953 that part of the savings resulting from the reduction of armaments should be earmarked for an international development fund, he did not elaborate on this in his disarmament speech. This idea was developed at some length by Mr. Faure both in his opening statement and during the disarmament discussions.

The Faure Plan

7. Mr. Faure proceeded on the premise that agreement on control and on sanction for violation of disarmament provisions can hardly take place within the framework of a convention dealing exclusively with the "traditional and negative aspects" of disarmament. It is necessary to consider the problem in its "positive" aspect and more specifically to connect the disarmament programme with the disposal of all the savings resulting from disarmament measures through the establishment of an international economic organization which would carry out a world-wide programme of assistance to under-developed countries. Disarmament control would thus become a global control of a financial and budgetary nature which would be easier "inasmuch as the budget is a single document". The essential point according to Mr. Faure is that there would be automatic sanction since a participant guilty of a violation "would be penalized by a sum equal to the amount of the dissimulation and the infraction".

8. The Faure plan bears, it seems, the characteristic mark of French idealism and while in some respects it develops a familiar idea, it will have to be examined very closely. On first examination it is debatable whether the basic assumption of the plan, i.e., that all money saved should be assigned to the international agency, will be generally acceptable. There would be no reduction, under the French scheme, in the burden carried by the people in the most prosperous countries. It is hard to visualize how the participating countries' budgets could be left as they are, should there be a substantial reduction of tension.

9. The question of earmarking savings resulting from disarmament for international development was discussed in recent years by the General Assembly. Canada, together with the majority of industrial countries, then indicated that it could be prepared to devote only "a portion" of the savings achieved through disarmament for development purposes. Unless industrial countries come around to the view that the totality of savings should be deposited in the international fund, the implementation of Mr. Faure's plan for mathematical control would need to take place in such a way as to ensure that the portions of savings not committed to the development fund are not ultimately diverted in one way or another to military purposes. Assuming universal acceptance of the plan to earmark all savings to the development fund, the French scheme would raise the problem of establishing a budgetary and financial control which would be effective. President Eisenhower's remark in his disarmament statement that "we have not as yet been able to discover any accounting or other inspection method of being certain of the true budgetary facts of total expenditures for armament" was obviously directed to Mr. Faure's proposal. Even assuming that effective financial control is possible, the French plan would still raise a number of problems from a security point of view. A country like the U.S.S.R. might be prepared to accept considerable burdens over a period of years to manufacture clandestinely hydrogen bombs towards world supremacy. It is clear that the French proposal could not be implemented unless satisfactory arrangements could be made as regards inspection and control.

10. As it stands one sure disadvantage of the French plan is that it will likely raise unnecessary expectations on the part of underdeveloped countries and will make it more difficult for the industrial countries to resist pressure to take decisions on a number of problems which they consider premature. Whatever its merits, the Faure plan has contributed substantially to offset the impression which might otherwise have been left in the first part of the conference that the Russians were attaching more importance to the problem of disarmament than the Western powers. While, as intimated above, the plan should not be summarily discarded it can hardly be regarded as a realistic proposal in terms of furthering the progress made in the Disarmament Sub-Committee.

Eden Plan for European Disarmament

11. In addition to new proposals by the United States and France on disarmament in general, the West formally introduced in Geneva the idea of regional disarmament as a first step towards general disarmament. This suggestion was made by the United Kingdom and may be regarded for all practical purposes as an extension of the Eden plan for a German settlement. Mr. Eden's proposals for European disarmament appear to be based on the assumption that the German problem can hardly be solved without some agreement on the limitation of armaments at the German, if not the Central European level. The Eden plan suggests an agreement on "the total of forces and armaments on each side in Germany and the countries neighbouring Germany". The implementation of this agreement would require "a system of reciprocal control to supervise the arrangements effectively."

12. The Prime Minister underlined that these suggestions were intended to make a practical experiment in the operative control of armaments in Europe "which might, as it were, extend outward from the centre to the periphery." He suggested that the operation might begin "on either side of the line which now divides East and West in Europe" and called for immediate agreement on joint inspection teams appointed by East-West military commanders. This suggestion seems in line with the Soviet proposal of May 10 for a Four-Power joint control of forces in the two Germanies.

13. The German Government apparently holds the view that the European problem can only be solved in the context of global disarmament and that in any event armaments control and inspection should not begin before the unification of Germany. Whatever the answer to the question whether disarmament can be separated in whole or in part from other outstanding issues, the United Kingdom suggestions for the regional limitation (if not reduction) of armaments and armed forces and also inspection should be regarded as a sensible move at this juncture in line with the policy of seeking all possible avenues of agreement.

Soviet Proposals

14. In contrast to the Western powers, the Soviet Union added little to its proposals of May 10 last submitted in the Disarmament Sub-Committee. Bulganin's opening statement may be regarded in the main as an amplification of the first part of these proposals concerning political questions with the emphasis being laid on European security. The Soviet Prime Minister thus reiterated his government's suggestions for the withdrawal of foreign troops, the settlement of Far Eastern issues and the normalization of trade relations. In this case the withdrawal of foreign troops was related not only to Germany but to "the territories of European States."

15. Most of the proposals on disarmament proper contained in the Soviet plan of May 10th were reiterated in Geneva either in Bulganin's opening statement or in the disarmament paper which he tabled on July 21. These proposals relate to the levels originally suggested by France and the United Kingdom for the armed forces of the United States, the U.S.S.R., China (1 million to 1.5 million each) France and the United Kingdom (650,000 each), the pledge not to use nuclear weapons except in defence against aggression subject to Security Council approval, the timing for the complete prohibition of nuclear weapons (after completion of 75% of agreed reductions on conventional armaments and armed forces), the discontinuation of nuclear tests and the freeze of present levels of armed forces, this time limited to "armed forces stationed on foreign territories." (The United States government has not yet accepted the Anglo-French proposals on the levels of the Big Five armed forces and on the time-table for the complete prohibition of nuclear weapons. Neither the United States nor the United Kingdom has yet committed itself on the question of discontinuing nuclear tests).

16. The novel features in the Russian programme put forward in Geneva are three-fold. In the first place, Bulganin announced that the Soviet Union had decided to demobilize the military contingents to be withdrawn from Austria and he suggested that the other occupying powers should equally reduce their armed strength in an amount corresponding to the number of their forces in that country. In the second place, the Russian disarmament plan suggests that pending the conclusion of the disarmament convention, the Big Four should "undertake not to be the first in the use of atomic weapons against any nation and call upon all the states to join in this declaration." This proposal involves a number of military and political factors which will have to be carefully weighed by the West bearing in mind the possible use of smaller atomic weapons in a limited war as recently suggested by the United States in connection with the Formosa crisis.

17. The third addition to the Russian programme is the proposal that armed forces of countries other than the Big Five should be limited to 150,000 to 200,000 men. This proposal may be related to the Soviet suggestion on May 10 that armed forces in Germany should be withdrawn and that "strictly limited contingents of local police forces" be formed in both parts of Germany. At present, the NATO limit set for West German armed forces is 500,000 and the present number of armed forces in East Germany is believed to be approximately 100,000. When agreeing to co-sponsor the above-mentioned proposal for the limitation of Anglo-French forces to 650,000 men each, the French explained privately that their implementation of this measure would only be possible if Germany had no more forces on the European continent than France, which in practice would mean a German ceiling of 300,000 men.

Conclusions

18. In general and bearing in mind the admittedly limited purpose of the Geneva Conference, the Four-Power discussions on disarmament may be regarded as a satisfactory exercise. The West has put forward new proposals which may conceivably lead to further progress in disarmament negotiations although in the case of the Eden proposals further exchanges may take place more fruitfully in Geneva than in the United Nations. The United States has adopted a more positive attitude than that to which we have been accustomed in recent years. Their more flexible and realistic approach on the question of inspection which has been the main stumbling block in East-West negotiations was reflected in President Eisenhower's disarmament statement. Although they made no new concessions, the Russians on their side have not retreated from the advances towards the Western position which they made in their proposals of May 10. The Soviet disarmament plan tabled at the Conference was stripped of the unacceptable proposals on sensitive political issues contained in their previous paper. In addition, the Russians have agreed to make a contribution to the proposed international atomic energy agency "as soon as an agreement on setting up the agency has been reached". Finally, there was unanimous agreement on the continuation of the Disarmament Sub-Committee discussions on August 29 in New York.

19. On the other hand, there has been no narrowing of the gap between the Western and Soviet positions. The Russians have not clarified their position on the question of control and inspection nor did they react to President Eisenhower's suggestion of a new approach to this problem. What is more immediately important, the Western Powers may not have succeeded in "unwrapping the package" of May 10, i.e., isolate its disarmament proposals. In spite of what is said in the preceding paragraph about the new Russian disarmament proposals, there were indications during the drafting of the directives to the Foreign Ministers that the Russians intend to keep these proposals in a political context and the final wording of the directives which is apparently the result of a compromise may still enable the Soviet Union to prevent fruitful discussions in the United Nations sub-committee.

20. From a propaganda point of view, President Eisenhower undoubtedly stole the show with his proposals of July 21 and, in general, the sum total of Western plans will have offset to a marked degree the gains derived by the Russians from their proposals of May 10. The Russians, however, may have scored a point on the subject of the prohibition of nuclear weapons at which they have hammered both in their opening speech and in the disarmament discussions. In the light of reports available, the Western powers seem to have just about ignored the subject and their public statements leave the impression that they have definitely abandoned the idea of eliminating nuclear weapons. Behind the scenes the United States succeeded in preventing any reference to this aspect in the final directives.

THE GENEVA CONFERENCE: GERMAN REUNIFICATION AND EUROPEAN SECURITY

As had been expected by all the participants, the Geneva Conference produced a definition and confrontation of the main positions, but produced little or no progress towards concrete solutions of the main problems the Conference faced: German reunification, European security, disarmament. Important proposals on all three subjects were, however, put forward. In this paper we propose to examine those relating to German reunification and European security.

2. In their opening statements, all four Heads of Government agreed that these two related questions lay at the heart of their problem. But whereas Western leaders insisted that German reunification must have priority, Premier Bulganin gave first place to the development of a European security system. It was not until the final day of the conference that agreement was reached, in referring the question to the Foreign Ministers, on the basis of "the close link between the reunification of Germany and the problem of European security and the fact that the successful settlement of each of these problems would serve the interests of consolidating peace". After this preamble, the substantive part of the directive instructs the Foreign Ministers to deal first with "a security pact for Europe or for a part of Europe" and relegates German reunification to an acknowledgement of Four Power responsibility for "the settlement of the German question and the reunification of Germany by means of free elections ... in conformity with the national interests of the German people and the interests of European security".

3. At the beginning of the conference, the Western Powers sought to protect the position of the German Federal Government, that European security should not be discussed until agreement had been reached on German reunification. This was really an untenable position from the beginning and the final position adopted can be defended on the grounds that the directive was given on the clear understanding that the two questions of European security and German reunification were to be regarded as interdependent. There is, therefore, no intention on the part of the West to agree to perpetuate the division of Germany by including both Germanys in a European security system. At the same time it is clear that the Soviet authorities have no intention of agreeing to a European security system which would sanctify the reunification of Germany within NATO.

4. Apart from private conversations with members of the Soviet delegation of which we know very little, proposals were made by both sides in an attempt to find a way around the central road block of the conference. From the Western side a number of proposals and suggestions were put forward to convince the Soviet leaders that, if they agreed to German reunification, they need have nothing to fear from a reunified Germany in NATO. To this end Sir Anthony Eden made the following suggestions:

(a) A Mutual Security Pact of the Locarno type between the Big Four and a United Germany (which he later said might be extended to include other European countries as signatories);

(b) A scaling down "of the forces and armaments of each side in Germany and the countries neighbouring Germany", with reciprocal supervision in which a unified Germany would participate with the Big Four;

(c) A demilitarized zone between East and West in Central Europe.

5. Premier Faure made the further suggestion that the Western Powers should offer the Soviet Union the same safeguards vis-à-vis Germany as the Western Powers had already undertaken among themselves under the Paris Agreements. He went on to propose that a united Germany be included in a European security organization open to all European states and held out the prospect "that in the future these two systems of security (NATO and EETO) could be fused into one." This organization, he observed, would be "particularly useful in case ... Germany does not remain in the Western European Union".

6. President Eisenhower spoke in general terms of the need to "take account of the legitimate security interests of all concerned", including the Soviet Union, and directed attention to the safeguards contained in the Paris Agreements, adding that the United States was "quite ready to consider further reciprocal safeguards which are reasonable and practical and compatible with the security of all concerned". However, he did not commit himself to more specific proposals, though he of course agreed to the definition of the problem in the final directive to Foreign Ministers.

7. The initial Soviet reaction to the proposals of Sir Anthony Eden and Premier Faure was disappointing. Although promising their proposals close attention, Premier Bulganin made it clear on the second day of the conference that the Soviet Union had no need of a system of mutual guarantees; in fact he implied that it was almost insulting to a strong power to be offered such guarantees. However, he showed much more interest in Sir Anthony Eden's proposals when they discussed them in private and at the end of the conference he produced a proposal for an East-West treaty which is not far removed, on the face of it, from the combined suggestions which Sir Anthony Eden and Premier Faure had made in their opening statements. Premier Bulganin's proposal of July 21 (submitted under the heading of European Security) suggests that the Four Powers sponsor a European Non-Aggression Pact to be concluded between the states party to NATO and the states party to the Warsaw Treaty. This pact would be based on two principles:

- (a) An undertaking "not to use armed force against one another" without prejudice to "the right of states to individual or collective self-defence";
- (b) An undertaking to consult in case of differences or disputes which might present a threat to peace in Europe.

The proposed treaty would be temporary, pending the establishment of a collective security system for Europe.

8. This stopgap Soviet proposal for European security should presumably be interpreted as supplementing the first phase of the two-stage programme proposed by Premier Bulganin in his opening statement. The first phase he defined as a stand-still agreement not to increase the number of foreign forces in Europe under either European or EETO arrangements. In the second stage outlined by Premier Bulganin the states party to both NATO and EETO would simultaneously terminate their respective treaty arrangements and establish a European collective security system. The draft European collective security treaty proposed by Premier Bulganin at Geneva to implement the second phase of his programme does not differ in any important respect from the text tabled by Mr. Molotov at Berlin in February 1954.<sup>83</sup>

9. Although the second phase of the Soviet programme remained as unacceptable to the Western delegations as it had been at Berlin, Premier Faure and to a lesser extent Sir Anthony Eden, expressed some cautious interest in the Soviet first phase, involving an East-West non-aggression pact and an undertaking not to increase the level of foreign forces in Europe under either NATO or EETO. Had there been the slightest indication of a change in the Soviet position as regards German reunification, there might have been greater difficulty in maintaining a unified Western front on the question of the organization of European security. As it was, however, there was no problem, for the U.S.S.R. not only called for the "complete termination" of NATO in the second phase but in the first phase would have perpetuated both the division of Germany and the régimes of Eastern Europe.

10. When the four Foreign Ministers reassemble in Geneva in October, Chancellor Adenauer will probably have been to Moscow (though he is now thinking of sending Foreign Minister von Brentano in his place if all the Russians want to discuss establishing diplomatic relations). We may then have a better idea of whether the U.S.S.R. is prepared to move on German reunification. Although this seems improbable at the present time, nevertheless the framework for a negotiated agreement combining German reunification and European security has been set up at Geneva whenever it proves possible to utilize it. As Sir Anthony Eden seemed to be hinting in the closing session of the conference when he pressed the Russians to agree to discuss the two issues "simultaneously", it might not be impossible to combine the safeguards suggested by him with a "freeze" of all foreign forces in Europe and mutual guarantees between the two blocs, provided that steps to reunify Germany through free elections were fitted into the timetable for implementing a European security agreement.

11. On one central point, however, Sir Anthony Eden's proposals are not quite clear. He seems in fact to be suggesting that, at least as an interim measure, Germany should for military purposes remain divided even after it had been politically reunified under an all-German Government. I do not see how else to interpret the second proposal of his opening statement when he said "we would be ready to discuss and try to reach agreement as to the total of forces and armaments of each side in Germany and the countries neighbouring Germany" with reciprocal supervision in which a unified Germany would participate with the Big Four. This inference is also strengthened by Sir Anthony Eden's further suggestion of a demilitarized zone or of reciprocal inspection privileges within a specified area on either side of the East-West line.

12. Before the Foreign Ministers resume their work at Geneva, a great deal will obviously have to be done among the Western powers to achieve better co-ordination of their proposals than was evident at the summit conference. M. Faure seems to have been as much shocked by the United Kingdom's proposal of a demilitarized zone combined with Locarno-type guarantees as were President Eisenhower and Sir Anthony Eden by the French Premier's suggestion of budgetary controls as a solution to the problem of disarmament inspection. However, if the Western delegations had confined themselves to suggestions on which they could all have agreed in advance, there would now be much less material for continuing negotiations.

GENEVA IN RETROSPECT

When we sent you, on July 28, our review of the main substantive proposals discussed at Geneva, I mentioned that we were working on a study of the wider implications of the Conference. Now that the principal participants and the correspondents have had their say, I thought we should try to prepare our own assessment, although we still know little more than the press about what went on behind the scenes.

General

2. On the whole, I see no reason to disagree with the consensus that the Conference was genuinely a success. At the NATO Council meeting on July 26, the spokesman of the three Western delegations substantially confirmed the optimistic verdict which their chiefs had previously given to the public. The Western delegations had gone to Geneva with limited objectives which were more than attained: the main issues were identified in a business-like way with a minimum of discussion of extraneous subjects, and the Foreign Ministers given an agreed directive which would permit negotiations to continue in October within prescribed limits. Although the French delegation's enthusiasm waned during the last two days of the Conference because of the difficulties with Mr. Molotov in reaching agreement on a directive to the Foreign Ministers, all three Western Delegations believed that the Conference had induced for the time being a very sizeable and important thaw in the Cold War, at least in Europe.

3. While the Conference was in session, there was hardly a discordant note in the flood of cordiality, but since it ended and there has been time to sift the "friendliness" of the Summit for any nuggets of agreement or even rapprochement, a slight devaluation of the Conference has occurred, both in the press and in official circles on both sides of the Atlantic. In the longer view, I think this devaluation was warranted, but it should not be overdone.

4. All four powers at Geneva had an interest in taking an optimistic view of the Conference. The Russians had been proposing "Summit" talks for years, and the Western Powers had promised to negotiate for German reunification after the ratification of the Paris Agreements. The momentum of past proposals carried the Four to Geneva but, as was confirmed in the event, none of them had prepared specific new proposals until the Conference was upon them. In the circumstances, the Conference achieved all that it could possibly have achieved — a frank definition of the issues to be discussed by Foreign Ministers in October — with the extra dividend of a real break-through in personal contacts and greater understanding among the leaders on both sides, and especially between President Eisenhower and the Russians. As a result, there is hope for a general "unfreezing" of diplomacy though there has as yet been little change in the positions of either side.

5. Perhaps the chief reason for regarding Geneva as a success in relaxing some of the tensions between East and West in Europe is that the leaders on both sides appear to have convinced one another that German re-armament will not be allowed to lead to war. It may even amount to a mutual recognition that war — because it would be nuclear war — can no longer be regarded as an instrument of policy. When Mr. Khrushchev says that both sides came away from Geneva convinced that neither wants war, he may imply that, in terms of policy, Churchill's "saturation point" has already been reached before it might be warranted by the physical facts.

6. Even a few months ago none of the Western leaders could feel quite certain in their own minds that the re-armament of Germany within NATO might not be taken so seriously by the Soviet leaders that they would, within the next few years, decide to gamble on a preventive war to forestall German military strength being joined with that of the United States and NATO. In a period of mounting international tension, it was not inconceivable that Soviet leaders (or their successors in an internal shift of power) might decide to press the advantage they would have from a surprise attack in the mistaken belief that if they did not strike first they would be struck.

7. This is, I think, a debatable theory, but I think the Geneva Conference has done a lot to set at rest any lingering worries we might have had on this score. For at no time did the Soviet delegation revive in any way the threats which their Government had been dispensing while EDC and the Paris Agreements were being negotiated, that dire consequences would follow Western attempts to re-arm the Germans. The Soviet line, as presented at Geneva — and I think we can take it at its face value — is that the re-armament of the Federal Republic in NATO is the main obstacle to German reunification. By implication the U.S.S.R. will take no more drastic action than perpetuating the present division of Germany. By so doing the U.S.S.R. will at least prevent the Eastern Zone from being joined with the rest of Germany in the Western military alliance.

8. From the point of view of the Soviet delegation, there is every indication that their leaders have returned to Moscow disabused of the notion that the Western powers — and in particular the United States — are attempting to build up forces in Europe in order to reunify Germany by force in preparation for an assault on the Soviet Union.

9. If this is the chief significance of Mr. Macmillan's flippant summation of the Conference on his return ("there ain't gonna be any war"), Mr. Dulles' airport comment on his return home also sums up another aspect of the Conference. When congratulated on his good work at Geneva, Mr. Dulles is reported to have remarked with considerable satisfaction "Well, we didn't give anything away". The same might be said with much more emphasis about the Soviet delegation.

Soviet Policy

10. Any worries the Western Powers may have had before the Conference as to what they would say if the Soviet Delegation made startling new proposals proved groundless. On the main questions at issue the Soviet Premier did not budge. He merely restated their position; but shorn of the usual propaganda trimmings, his "nyets" had a pleasantly unfamiliar ring of sincerity.

11. Both from the Conference record and from the behaviour of the Soviet leaders, the conclusion is almost unavoidable that the Russians are more afraid of German intentions in the future than of American power in the present.<sup>84</sup> If they are beginning to put more trust in the peaceful intentions of American leadership, they are by no means so sure of long-term German aims and latent ambitions.

12. For this reason we may expect the U.S.S.R. to take its time in promoting German reunification. The first step will be to establish direct relations between the U.S.S.R. and the German Federal Republic. The second step, which they will also try to get Chancellor Adenauer to take next month, will be for the East and West Germans to recognize each other. At least until Chancellor Adenauer has taken that step, it would be unrealistic to hope for the U.S.S.R. to agree to any European Security proposals that posed reunification as a pre-condition. Even simultaneous measures for step-by-step progress towards both a European security system and German reunification will probably be treated with reserve by the Russians.

13. If these assumptions are correct, the only Western proposals the Russians will be interested in following up at Geneva in October will be those aspects of the United Kingdom and French plans for European Security which could be implemented before German reunification, i.e. mutual East-West guarantees, and reciprocal inspection privileges within a specified belt on either side of the East-West line in Central Europe. The Russians would quite clearly prefer the status quo to German reunification within NATO.

14. It would be logical for the Russians to let the German situation develop very slowly.<sup>85</sup> While Dr. Adenauer has been proceeding on the assumption that time is in favour of the Germans, the Russians obviously think the opposite. There seems therefore no reason to alter our pre-Geneva estimate that the Russians would prefer to establish direct contact with the Germans in order to increase the flexibility of their position, and then gradually let the movement towards unification on Soviet terms develop inside Germany.

15. If we assume that the main Soviet aim at Geneva was to re-establish direct diplomatic contact between the two power blocs to reduce international tension, to restore the Council of Four as the main forum for dealing with European problems, and to put their relations with the United States on a more normal diplomatic basis, then they have completely succeeded. We have already in previous memoranda examined the motivations behind the changes in Soviet tactics, and it is not necessary to go into them again here, since I think they are still valid.<sup>86</sup> More specifically the Russians might have argued more or less as follows:

(a) In the first place, it is probable that the post-Stalin leaders of the U.S.S.R. are well aware of the high price they had to pay for Stalin's gratuitous barbarities and have therefore decided to try to repair as much of the damage as they can, without at the same time giving up anything of importance which Stalin won for the U.S.S.R.

(b) The better international atmosphere generated by Geneva must lead the Russians to hope for a period of détente and relative reduction in the risk of war so that they can concentrate on consolidating their economic and political position at home and in the satellites. If this should prove of reasonable duration they might be able eventually to taper off on re-armament and to restore the cut in the consumer's goods programme and therefore solve or postpone the social problem which the lack of progress in raising the standard of living has brought to a head.

(c) A détente might also be expected to slow down Western re-armament and reduce defence expenditures to the point of creating the depression in capitalist states which Soviet economists have been hopefully predicting since 1946.

(d) The Russians have always preferred to do business on a big power basis. They have now to all practical purposes restored the Big Four Council of Ministers, and have even made a start on restoring the straight United States—U.S.S.R. super-power relationship.

(e) Finally they have prepared the ground for a more subtle and (for the West) dangerous threat to Western Europe, one which Stalin fortunately did not use in the post-war years. Memories are short, and the Russians may well be able over a few years, if they are skillful, to convince the West that the U.S.S.R. is genuinely peace-loving, constitutes no threat to the outside world, and that internally it is not so different from the West. I do not suggest that the Russians have in mind a policy of softening up the West in order later to make a military attack, but simply that the policy of softening up could, in Soviet eyes, lead to a slackening of vigilance against both the external and internal threat, and therefore ipso facto lead to conditions in Europe more favourable to the pursuit of Soviet aims by non-military means.<sup>87</sup>

Western Policy

15. As for the Western side, it too seemed content to rest, for the time being, upon the status quo, maintained in an atmosphere of greater confidence than could have seemed possible even a few months ago. In fact the only delegations evidently prepared to discuss the terms of a possible détente were the United Kingdom and French delegations. Both the United States and Soviet delegations had clearly decided in advance to restrict what they were to say, in formal session at least, to a restatement in more amicable language of the issues for subsequent negotiation by Foreign Ministers, rather than to come to grips with them at the Summit. Both the United States and Soviet delegations made a number of specific proposals, but apart from President Eisenhower's dramatic offer to exchange military blueprints with reciprocal aerial inspection, the only important new ground broken at the Conference was by Sir Anthony Eden and M. Faure, whose proposals we analyzed in our earlier memorandum.

16. Despite the misgivings of the United States Delegation, the United Kingdom and French proposals seem to offer the most hope for future negotiations on Germany and European security. In his statement to Parliament in London on July 27, Sir Anthony Eden left the door open to "joint inspection and limitation" of forces in Central Europe before reunification.<sup>88</sup> At the same time he made it clear that his proposed Locarno guarantees (of Five Powers or more) would not guarantee frontiers but "would be solely concerned with resisting acts of aggression". (How such a Treaty could be drafted so as not, in effect, to guarantee frontiers is obscure).

The Germans

17. Although Sir Anthony Eden's attempts to get the Russians to play "step by step" on both European security and German reunification simultaneously may be somewhat risky, particularly from Chancellor Adenauer's point of view, it cannot be considered as wholly safe for the West to stand still. The Germans are already swinging with alarming speed from supreme over-confidence towards a mood of despair over reunification which could only favour the Socialists and an equivocal policy towards the West and NATO.

18. Certainly Chancellor Adenauer and his supporters can take no comfort from the present Soviet position which relegates German reunification — as the Russians used to say about Western proposals to prohibit atomic weapons — "to the Greek Kalends", and makes future progress dependent on "the participation of the Germans themselves". For this reason the German press has given a pretty glum appreciation of Geneva and Chancellor Adenauer may have to reconsider his premise that Soviet economic weaknesses and worries about China's industrialization and growth were forcing Soviet leaders to come to terms with the West as soon as possible. Geneva tended to confirm our own appreciation that on whatever level the negotiations were to be pursued, the Soviet Government would continue to be a hard bargainer and that it would be wishful to set too much store by her "feet of clay".

Conclusions

19. The Western Powers entered the Geneva discussions with certain disadvantages, even though it was they who proposed the conference. Geneva was born as a political necessity for the British and French, and, in spite of the deliberations of tripartite working groups, no really unified Western aims were worked out in advance. We can presume, however, that one of the aims was to restore our relations with the U.S.S.R. to the plane of normal diplomacy, and to reach a tacit agreement that our differences would not be settled by force. The process of negotiation, which we have always said was the aim of the policy of strength, has begun, and begun in the proper atmosphere.

20. In this first round of negotiations, nothing was given away by either side. When the Foreign Ministers meet in October their problem will be once again, as at the Berlin Conference eighteen months ago, to reconcile conflicting priorities for European security and

German reunification. Yet behind their formal position, the Soviet delegation at the Summit, as at Berlin, seemed to prefer to acquiesce in Western Germany's re-armament within NATO rather than expose the satellites to the shock of throwing Communism over-board in Eastern Germany. Even the idea of "an Austrian solution" for Germany, although it was raised by the Soviet delegation, was not pursued with any conviction.

21. Neither the satellites nor Asian questions were seriously discussed at Geneva. The time was probably not ripe to go beyond statements for the record. Yet any long term improvement in relations between East and West which may occur as a result of the Geneva Conference is bound to undermine the morale of anti-Communist elements in Eastern Europe.

22. The post-Geneva prospects for Western Europe are also not without danger. The fear of direct Soviet aggression against Western Europe has been the mainspring of the NATO build-up of Western strength without which the Geneva Conference could hardly have been held. To the extent that public opinion in Western Europe ceases to fear a direct Soviet attack, the momentum of NATO as a military alliance is bound to slacken and there may be greater opportunities for "openings to the left" in such countries as Italy and France. The Italian Ambassador in Ottawa has already drawn our attention to this possibility. With this prospect, it becomes more important than ever to bring to life the non-military aspects of NATO and to make them mean something for public opinion in Western Europe.

23. If the Russians are prepared to wait, and to play their cards skillfully, they might create a situation in Western Europe (and perhaps even in the United States) where public opinion demanded the withdrawal of United States and Canadian forces. The Russians may have decided that they could not force the United States out of Europe, but they might be able to accomplish this eventually through a policy of conciliation.

24. It also means that the whole policy of the nuclear deterrent on which Western strategy is based may have ushered in a new kind of stalemate in diplomacy. For if no issue is big enough to fight for in this nuclear age, the balance is heavily weighted in favour of the status quo. True, a certain liberation of diplomacy may result from the removal of the more immediate and menacing fears of surprise annihilation on both sides. But if there is a tacit acceptance on both sides that no issue is worth codestruction, coexistence will be crystallized.

25. We have, however, been considering East-West relations in the light of Geneva where Asian problems were not dealt with except in passing, and where Asia was not represented. Indeed it seems altogether likely that the apprehensions of a new war which seem to have induced the friendlier atmosphere of Geneva spring at least in part from the situation in Asia rather than Europe. Though Premier Bulganin and President Eisenhower may now put more confidence in each other's peaceful intentions, the danger of war is far from having been eliminated.

26. At the same time I think we can assume that President Eisenhower's performance at Geneva has done a great deal not only to convince the Russians but also the rest of the world, including anti-American or neutralist sentiment in Western Europe, that the aim of the Western Alliance is peace with security. That in itself will be worth a great deal to the unity of the free world, though neither side has given ground and though Geneva may have made it easier in some ways for the Soviet leaders to pursue their aims by other than military means. If so, the West should not be slow in taking up the new form of the old challenge, which, if properly handled by the democracies, is more likely to be to our advantage than the sterile and dangerous hostility of the two military blocs.

NATO CONSULTATION PRIOR TO GENEVA CONFERENCE

The Council met in restricted session this morning to hear a report from the Three Powers on the New York Foreign Ministers' meeting.

2. A memorandum was distributed to the permanent representatives with the request that it be returned after the Council meeting. The United States and French representatives explained that this procedure was necessary in order to ensure the strictest secrecy. In my immediately following telegram, I shall, therefore, send a summary which, under the circumstances had to be prepared very quickly, of the Three Powers' memorandum.

3. During the short discussion which took place, both Dutch and Belgian representatives raised the question of membership to the proposed security pact. The Dutch representative wished to have reassurances to the effect that no decision had yet been reached on Western European membership. He was mainly concerned with press reports which seemed to take for granted that the parties to the proposed security pact would be all NATO countries on the Western side and the Soviet Union and her European satellites on the other. Both Parodi and Perkins said that the question of membership was a highly delicate one and that no firm decision had been taken by the Three Powers. It was obvious that no decision could be reached on this point without consultation with the interested countries. The Norwegian representative interjected that any decision to participate in the proposed security pact would, of course, have wide military implications and he felt that consultations would be essential. The Dutch representative wished to stress his own understanding that not only had the Three Powers not yet reached any firm decision as to membership, but that no decision had been taken regarding the suggestions that might be put forward by the Western Powers in Geneva on this point. Mr. Parodi said that his personal understanding was that no such suggestions would be put forward in Geneva without the matter having been thoroughly discussed between the interested countries.

4. The Belgian representative asked whether the proposed agenda for the Geneva meeting was absolutely firm. He had read press reports, for instance, that Molotov had expressed his intention to introduce new items, which were not covered by the directives received by the Foreign Ministers in Geneva. Mr. Perkins was not in a position to elaborate on this point although he said that it is conceivable that once the agreed-upon agenda had been covered, there might be an opportunity for the Soviets to raise additional points if they so desire.

5. The German representative was asked by his Norwegian colleague whether he had any comments to make on the paper presented by the Three Powers. Mr. Blankenhorn, in reply, said that he had received very scant information from New York on the results of the Foreign Ministers' talks and that he was not prepared, at this stage, to add to what was contained in the Three Powers paper. He explained, however, the meaning of the word "reunification" as applied to Germany. He said that the word "reunification" as used in the memorandum of the Three Powers, relates to the reunification of East and West Germany but leaves entirely open the question of the German territories that have been annexed either by Poland or by Soviet Russia.

6. The question of the procedure of consultation during the Foreign Ministers' Conference in Geneva was briefly mentioned and it was agreed that there should be periodical reports to the North Atlantic Council during the Conference on the occasion of the weekly meeting of the Council, plus whatever special meetings that might have to be called according to developments.

7. It was agreed that a press release on today's consultation in Council would be issued. The text of this press release reads as follows: "The North Atlantic Council met today. They were informed of the results of meetings, in preparation for the Geneva Conference, held in New York between the Foreign Ministers of France, the United Kingdom and the United States on 27th September and between these three ministers and the Foreign Minister of the German Federal Republic on 28th September. Consultations between the Three Powers concerned and their NATO partners will continue."

8. The Council will meet again on Wednesday, October 5th, at which time the Permanent Representatives will have the opportunity of making additional observations on the paper submitted by the Three Powers.<sup>89</sup>

NATO CONSULTATION PRIOR TO GENEVA CONFERENCE

Following is summary of the Three Powers' memorandum discussed today in Council:

1. The Three Foreign Ministers met in New York on September 27th. On September 28th they also conferred with the German Foreign Minister in order to discuss preparations for the Foreign Ministers' Conference in Geneva on October 27th.

2. The Foreign Ministers agreed that their tactics in Geneva should be as set out in their last report to the North Atlantic Council (see paragraph 2 of our telegram No. 1139 of September 26†).

3. They agreed that they should keep in the forefront the question of the reunification of Germany. Efforts should be made to bring the U.S.S.R.'s acceptance of the revised Eden Plan which, among other things, provides for free elections and the freedom of Germany to choose her alliances. They expressed the sincere wish of the Western Powers to take measures to develop new security arrangements in order to meet legitimate Russian preoccupations. These proposals, however, should not be presented in the form of a detailed treaty draft in legal terms but, rather, in the form of a memorandum setting out the broad principles and the scope of their offer in a way that would be comprehensible for both sides.

4. Western security proposals should not depart from the following principles:

(a) NATO should remain the irreplaceable foundation of Western security.

(b) Agreement with the East will not be applicable to possible conflicts within the Atlantic community nor does it imply obligations to Western Powers in the event of conflicts arising between members of the Eastern Bloc.

(c) The nature of the commitments assumed will not be stronger than those of NATO and WEU. They should, however, be sufficiently substantial so as to appear as offers of real guarantees to the USSR.

5. Western security proposals comprise both political assurances and military safeguards.

(A) Political Assurances

(i) Solemn undertaking to refrain from using force and to settle disputes by peaceful means and to withhold assistance from an aggressor. These undertakings reaffirm the obligations accepted in the U.N. Charter, the London and Paris agreements.

(ii) Provision for Consultation. The Three Foreign Ministers recognize that some provision for consultation with Eastern powers was not without danger for the West, as the Soviets may try to use consultation to undermine NATO or to act as a substitute for NATO consultation. Nevertheless, the Foreign Ministers agreed that some appropriate provisions for consultation to implement the treaty will be required.

(iii) Some provision for appropriate action in the event of an attack in Europe by one of the Western Powers against one of the Eastern parties, or vice versa. Framed in this way, these obligations fall within the principles stated in paragraph 4 above.

(B) Military Safeguards. Within a zone (to be determined) comprising areas of comparable size and importance on both sides of the line of demarcation between reunified Germany and the Eastern European countries, a system for the limitation and control of armed forces and armaments would be instituted within this zone.

(a) Levels for armed forces would be specified so as to establish a military balance. These levels would not be raised without prior notice to and consultation with the other parties.

(b) Limitation of armaments would take the form of limitation of stocks, as it does in WEU, and the types of armaments subject to limitation would not go beyond the WEU list.

(c) Special measures might be considered for the disposition of forces and installations in the parts of the zone lying closest to the point of contact between East and West.

(d) Inspection and control would be carried out in order to verify that the limitations were being observed and to provide warning against any preparation of a surprise attack.

These military provisions raise technical questions on which military advice is needed. Availing itself of the Council's ruling of August 30th, the Three Foreign Ministers intend to request the NATO military authorities to give them their views. In doing so, they will state the political assumption that the new arrangements should not impair the relative security posture of NATO vis-à-vis the Communist Bloc.

6. The Foreign Ministers had a preliminary discussion on membership. The desirability of keeping the scope of the pact directly related to the situation existing as the result of the reunification of Germany, was emphasized. Military arrangements would not be confined to dealing with that problem. In view of the limited scope of this aspect the Three Powers believe that there should be a full exchange of views in the North Atlantic Council on membership before a final decision is taken.

7. The Foreign Ministers agreed that the Tripartite Working Group will reconvene in Paris on October 10th.

8. The Foreign Ministers considered arrangements for consultation with their NATO partners during the Geneva meeting, and expressed the hope that the views of the other governments on this matter will be made available to the Working Group in Paris.

9. There was a meeting on September 27th of the Foreign Ministers of France, U.K., U.S.A., U.S.S.R. They considered procedural arrangements and agreed that the duration of the Conference would be about three weeks.

NATO CONSULTATION ON EUROPEAN SECURITY

I am afraid there is little we can usefully suggest that could be of assistance to you for the Council meeting on October 5. The Western statement, as outlined in your reports, appears to us generally satisfactory but obviously requires some filling in to make it a clear cut proposal which could serve as a basis of discussion and negotiation.

2. Perhaps the Expert Working Group which is to meet again in Paris shortly will be able to spell out the exact relationship in time between the Western programme for German reunification and the stages of a European security treaty. These two components, which in our view should be agreed as a package, would have to be implemented according to an agreed timetable which, so far as we know, has yet to be worked out.

3. We continue to support the premise of the Eden proposals, that Germany when united must be free to choose her future alliances; this is in any case no more than a statement of political fact, since no prior agreement could effectively bind a united German government. At the same time, of course, we attach the greatest importance to the continuation and strengthening of Germany's association with the West through NATO.

4. You may also support the observations of your Dutch, Belgian and Norwegian colleagues regarding the question of membership in the proposed security pact.

5. As regards the procedure for consultation during the Foreign Ministers Conference, periodic reports during the Conference on the occasion of the weekly Council meeting or at special meetings if required, would be satisfactory to us.

6. We hope to send you our further comments shortly. When will the Council next discuss this subject?

EUROPEAN SECURITY ARRANGEMENTS — CANADIAN PARTICIPATION

1. Until we get more definite information we shall have to remain non-committal on subject of Canadian participation although this should not be taken as lack of interest. The attainment of the reunification of Germany by means of a satisfactory European Security Treaty is naturally a most desirable objective; it is not clear to us at this stage that Canadian participation in such a treaty would make this objective more attainable nor do we see precisely how Canadian security commitments would be affected.

2. Canadian participation would seem to be easily acceptable only in the event that a European Security Treaty would be underwritten by all NATO Powers. If Western participation were confined (as in the U.S. draft) to the W.E.U. Powers plus the U.S. and Canada, we can foresee quite serious difficulties from certain NATO quarters being left outside the new club. There would also be a certain air of unreality in having Canada guarantee a German settlement when a country like Norway did not. The question therefore seems to be whether a European Security Treaty underwritten by all NATO Powers would be more likely to prove generally acceptable both to Moscow and the West than one in which only European Powers (probably the W.E.U. Group) and the U.S. would participate.

3. The three Powers have agreed in principle that their European security arrangements would not extend their existing commitments under NATO and W.E.U. While this is no doubt true in terms of practicable probabilities, the signatories of a European Security Treaty would presumably undertake "to act in accordance with their constitutional procedures" in the event of, say, a united Germany attacking Poland to recover its lost territories. The same safeguards would of course apply equally to all on either side and this example is given merely by way of illustration. At this stage we are unable to discover whether or not additional commitments would be undertaken were Canada to sign such a treaty; we will be in better position to consider this when we know more about the nature of the guarantees which could range all the way from a "no force" undertaking reaffirming U.N. Charter language to something like NATO's Article Five.

4. In practical terms there is no doubt that because of our NATO obligations Canadian forces would be involved if the forces of our principal Western Allies were involved in any kind of conflict with Soviet forces in Europe. Because of our geographical position between the U.S. and the U.S.S.R. we would also be involved on another front, the importance of which is increasing very rapidly. It is therefore in the Canadian interest to assist in the achievement of a lasting détente in Europe consistent with our own security. Although at present the Western and Soviet versions of a European Security Treaty are far apart, it would be in the interests of Canada if an agreement could be reached whereby Germany would be unified. Given certain conditions, tension in Europe would thereby be substantially lessened and we could expect a partial pulling back or thinning out of forces on both sides. This might in due course facilitate a redeployment of Canadian forces so as to give a better protection to our northern frontier.

5. If present proposals reach the stage of serious negotiations Canadian position will largely be conditioned on whether or not all NATO members are to participate in a European Security Treaty. If W.E.U. rather than NATO is to form the Western nucleus (with of course the United States) this might strengthen the W.E.U. inner circle. Whether NATO as such would gain or lose by such a concentration of power and interests in W.E.U. is impossible to say at this time. On the other hand all NATO countries might not necessarily wish to participate in such a treaty even if invited to do so by the Western Powers.

6. If it became clear that no additional commitments were really involved, and if it looked as if the chances of securing Soviet agreement were better on the basis of a European Security Treaty underwritten by all NATO members, it seems that the Canadian Government would be unlikely to refuse to participate if all NATO members were also willing to do so. Until the matter has been considered by the Government, however, we must be careful to avoid giving the impression to others that we are either favourably or unfavourably disposed towards Canadian participation. Like all NATO members we are interested and concerned not only for European security but also for the future of NATO.

7. I would appreciate your comments on these reflexions. You will also wish to bear them in mind when discussing the Security Treaty with your colleagues in the Foreign Offices of the countries to which you are accredited, without giving the impression, however, that they should be taken as firm Canadian policy.<sup>90</sup>

EUROPEAN SECURITY ARRANGEMENTS

At the Council meeting on October 13 you may base your questions and comments on our telegram under reference.

2. I doubt whether detailed comments on the substance of the problem would be very useful at this stage, even if we were clearer that we are as to the principles on which the Western Powers will base themselves at the Foreign Ministers meeting. Largely for reasons of presentation, we would prefer to see the Western proposals put forward in one package, comprising both the principles and the timetable for implementing by stages parallel agreements on German reunification and European security.

3. We are glad to note that the Three Powers are in agreement that a united German government must be free to determine its own alliances. Apart from the fact that the USSR would never agree to united Germany's inclusion in NATO as a pre-condition, it would not be consistent with either the sovereignty of a German government yet to be formed or with the position adopted by the Western Powers at the Summit meeting and previously at Berlin. Germany should be free to choose because we desire both reunification and the closest possible association of a united Germany with the West. Any other terms would be suspect in Germany and would tend to weaken her western ties.

4. In present circumstances, with the USSR so firmly committed to the support of the East German régime and its social and economic patterns, it is clearly necessary for the Western Powers to try to formulate preconditions for a European Security Treaty that will appear to world opinion to be reasonable, while making sure that they do not thereby prejudice their own security.

Documents 206, 207, 209 and 210 are the most important briefing papers sent to Wilgress who attended the ministerial meeting in Pearson's absence. Wilgress was also sent a paper on German Reunification (not located) and summary reports of Pearson's discussions in the Soviet Union. For documentation on the Minister's visit to Moscow, see Chapter 5.

5. It seems improbable that the Russians are at this time seriously interested in a Germany unified on the basis of genuinely free elections and with freedom to choose its alliances, neutrality is likely to be the minimum Soviet condition, whenever they decide the time is ripe for serious negotiations. Meanwhile, the West must nevertheless continue to insist upon the unreasonableness and inacceptability of the Soviet demand that NATO be scrapped — that we abandon real security for paper promises and non-aggression pacts. Any European security arrangements must, therefore, be supplementary to NATO.

NATO CONSULTATION ON EUROPEAN SECURITY

The Tripartite Working Group met in private session with the Council yesterday.

2. The French expert, Mr. Jean Duridan, speaking for his U.S. and U.K. colleagues, Mr. Beam and Lord Hood, said that they did not have a further written report to submit to Council and that their main purpose was to listen to whatever comments the permanent representatives might wish to make on the views expressed in the Three Powers' memorandum already made available to Council (our telegram No. 1152 of September 30th).

3. The Belgian representative, who told me that he had kept in close touch with Mr. Spaak, was the first to speak. He made some preliminary remarks about the fact that he hoped the Three Powers would be in a position to submit a more detailed memorandum outlining the proposals that will be put forward in Geneva. The experts agreed that they will try to do so next week. Mr. De Staercke also wanted to make sure that what was understood by the Eden revised plan was still the plan the main features of which were outlined by the Expert Working Group in Council on July 12th (see our telegram No. 890 of July 12th). † The reply to this question was in the affirmative.

4. Mr. De Staercke went on to discuss the substance of the Western proposals. He said that one of the weaknesses of these proposals is that they seem to be predicated entirely on the assumption that Germany will elect to remain in NATO. He said that his government felt very strongly that from a tactical point of view, and also from the point of view of presentation to public opinion, we should take pains to indicate that Germany is absolutely free to make her own choice about her future alliances. Otherwise, we can only prejudice our chances of the Soviets accepting our proposals. It was important, also, to indicate that we were not committed forever to all the modalities of the Eden Plan.

5. Mr. De Staercke then discussed the juridical form that might be taken by the proposed security pact. His authorities were not convinced that the pact should be concluded between NATO and the Warsaw powers considered as legal entities. From a juridical point of view, it was difficult to see what is meant by NATO and the Warsaw Pact signatories as groups. It would seem wiser to have the pact arrived at on a multi-lateral basis. He also foresaw some difficulties in identifying the exact nature of the conflicts that might arise between members of the Eastern Bloc as well as conflicts that might develop within the Atlantic community. This will require careful consideration. It had been stated that the nature of the commitments to be assumed under the proposed security pact would not be stronger than those of NATO and W.E.U. His authorities thought that there is some danger in equating obligations under NATO and W.E.U. Under NATO, when an emergency situation arises there is an obligation for consultation; under W.E.U. automatic assistance is provided in case of aggression. It is, therefore, important to decide whether the proposed security pact should adopt the NATO or the W.E.U. pattern. With regard to the question of membership, Mr. De Staercke said that his government would be opposed to participation only by W.E.U. powers. They would favour participation by all NATO countries including, of course, the United States and Canada as, otherwise, the pact becomes meaningless. With regard to provisions for consultation, his authorities thought that this would necessarily entail the setting up of some permanent structure for consultation. What would be the nature of this structure? If some control functions are to be performed, what would be the authorities entrusted with controlling responsibilities? These questions and many others will have to be answered before the views of his government could be obtained.

6. Finally, Mr. De Staercke discussed the possible attitude of the Soviets in Geneva. On the face of it, it seemed obvious that the position adopted by the Western Powers and the proposals they will put forward in Geneva are incompatible with what we know of the Russian approach to the problem of Germany. Under these circumstances, it is difficult to see how the Conference could be expected to last three weeks. There seems to be little room for negotiations and once the Western and Soviet theses have been confronted, the Conference will break off unless, of course, there are other proposals that the Western Powers intend to put forward if the Soviets refuse to accept the Western proposals. His government would wish to know what they are. There may also be a danger that, in refusing to discuss the Western proposals, the Soviets will find themselves at a tactical advantage in having manoeuvred us into accepting the first stage of the Bulganin Plan on an all-European collective security system. Mr. De Staercke ended up his remarks by saying that it is vital for the West to present its proposal in a constructive and realistic manner if we wish to impress world public opinion with the sincerity of our approach.

7. The French expert explained that the reason why the alternative of Germany's opting for NATO receives so much emphasis in the Western proposals is due to the fact that if the Western Powers are to assume certain security obligations, they could, of course, only envisage doing so in the case where Germany elected to remain in NATO. It was certainly not our intention to give the Soviets the impression that Germany was not free to choose her own alliances and this is why it was decided not to confront the Soviets with a text of a proposed European security treaty, but, rather, with a memorandum setting forth the general principles that may form a basis for discussion. The project envisages three main phases. If the Soviets agree to the reunification of Germany, we will discuss the possibility of giving them some security guarantees. If free elections are carried out in Germany, certain additional guarantees of a political nature will be forthcoming. Finally, if Germany elects to remain within NATO, the military provisions of the treaty will come into force.

8. Mr. Duridan agreed with Mr. De Staercke that the Eden revised plan was not sacrosanct and did not constitute a permanent and definitive offer to the Soviets. With regard to the juridical form that the treaty might take, the Working Group was very much aware that a pact concluded between NATO and the Warsaw Powers would tend to consolidate the Eastern Bloc. The best formula would probably be a multi-lateral treaty. On the Western side, the participants would be the NATO countries which consider themselves more directly concerned and which would be prepared to accept commitments with the agreement of their NATO partners. With regard to possible conflicts that might arise between members of the two groups, Mr. Duridan said that their main concern had been to avoid giving any pretext for the Eastern Bloc to intervene in matters that are of a NATO concern. On the question of provision for consultation, Mr. Duridan said that the Working Group was abiding by the principle that no machinery of consultation should be set up which would eventually enable the Soviets to bypass NATO. He admitted, however, that more thought will have to be given to this problem. On membership, Mr. Duridan simply said that if the United States and Canada were not members to the treaty, its significance would be lost.

9. The U.S. expert, Mr. Beam, said that they were fully aware that the Soviets will want to retain the status quo, arguing that the problem of reunification of Germany should be worked out by the two Germanies themselves and that we should go ahead and discuss a general security pact while this matter was being settled. This should not deter us, however, from taking the position that there is no real basis for European security until the problem of the reunification of Germany had been solved.

10. Lord Hood spoke briefly but his remarks were perhaps more revealing of the Western position than those of previous speakers. He admitted frankly that in trying to evolve proposals on European security we have little hope of attracting the USSR into accepting them. What we are trying to do really is to persuade public opinion that we have made genuine offers to bring the USSR to agree to the reunification of Germany. Therefore, the Western Powers do not want to go into too much detail at this stage regarding European security plans. Such plans, we know, can be worked out if the Russians show any inclination to accept our proposals. This exercise is mainly directed at public opinion and if the Russians do not accept our proposals, we would have demonstrated that they failed to do so by reason of their political ambitions and their desire to extend communism in Europe.

11. The Italian representative expressed his government's concern about the effect that the proposed security pact would have on NATO. They fear that it would weaken NATO. He also endorsed the view that we should make it clear to the Russians that we are giving Germany a free choice regarding her future alliances. With regard to membership in the proposed treaty, he said that his authorities hoped that they will comprise the WEU powers plus the United States and Canada plus any other NATO members wishing to take part.

12. The Dutch representative showed some concern over the fact that so many problems were still unsolved just two weeks before the Conference is scheduled to start. He agreed with the views expressed by his Belgian colleague regarding Germany's freedom of choice and the juridical form that the treaty might take. Commenting on Lord Hood's remarks that the Geneva Conference was really, as far as the West was concerned, an exercise to influence public opinion, Mr. Van Starckenborgh asked whether we were sure that our respective public opinions would agree that the West was making realistic proposals to the Soviets. After all, we must realize that we are asking a great deal from the Soviets — free elections in Germany; the end of the East German régime; the integration of a reunified Germany within NATO — and what are we prepared to give in return? The political guarantees that we are offering can mean very little and the military safeguards that we are proposing by no means weaken our military position. It is, therefore, doubtful that the public will gain the impression that the West is making a serious attempt to reach a settlement with the USSR.

13. Mr. Duridan admitted that the Western Powers had set its target quite high, e.g. trying to influence the Russians into accepting the reunification of Germany. If this objective can be achieved, it will mean the end of the favoured position that Russia enjoys in Europe at the moment. He was not prepared to say that we offered little in return. In fact the mutual assistance clause of the proposed treaty is revolutionary. It would be the first time that a large number of Western Powers agree to guarantee the security of the USSR and Eastern European countries.

14. Sir Christopher Steel interjected that disarmament proposals might also be put forward which could prove attractive to the Russians.

15. I asked whether the members of the Working Group were in a position to give us an indication of the progress that had been achieved regarding Western thinking on disarmament. Disarmament is, of course, one of the items mentioned in the directive to the Foreign Ministers and, presumably, will play an important role in the negotiations. Lord Hood replied that this subject was dealt with by another working group and that they were not in a position to inform the Council on this point. He said that the proposals on disarmament and those relating to European security will very likely be brought together at the ministerial meeting in Paris.

16. The Norwegian representative developed the same theme as his Dutch colleague, e.g. that we were asking a great deal from the Russians and offering very little in return. He said that although perhaps we should not, under the proposed security pact, weaken our defence posture, we should at least not try to improve it.

17. The German representative returned to the question of disarmament and said that this matter was of extreme importance for the success of the Conference. He was afraid that we would achieve little progress in our talks regarding security arrangements if we are not prepared to discuss disarmament with the Soviets. He felt that the price for the reunification of Germany probably lies more in that direction than in the direction of the conclusion of security arrangements.

18. I then spoke along the lines of your telegram No. S-660 of October 11th and asked for clarification on two points which, to us, appear to be vital, e.g. what is envisaged precisely regarding participation in the proposed security arrangements, and the exact nature of the guarantees that the signatories would be asked to subscribe to. Lord Hood, with regard to the nature of the guarantees to be assumed by the signatories, said that he could add little to what was mentioned in the Three Powers' memorandum. First of all, there were the political obligations consisting of an undertaking to refrain from using force, to withhold assistance from an aggressor, to accept consultation in certain circumstances, and to agree to mutual assistance in case of attack in Europe by one of the Western powers against one of the Eastern parties, or vice versa. As far as military undertakings were concerned, the principles under which they might operate had already been outlined in the Three Powers' memorandum. With regard to the question of membership, he said that the Three Powers had a completely open mind. All the NATO members could agree to subscribe to the pact. From a purely practical point of view, however, it might not be necessary to include all the NATO countries but only those which, by reason of their geographical proximity or because they have forces in the area, are obviously directly concerned. In reply to my question as to whether the participants would be asked to assume responsibilities comparable to those under NATO, Lord Hood said that this was very difficult to answer but added "probably not". He did not envisage any degree of automaticity regarding mutual assistance, but then this matter largely depended on what the vital members would be prepared to accept. With regard to provisions for consultation, this presented an obvious danger for the West. All that the Western Powers were prepared to agree to at this stage was the principle of consultation. The details of whatever machinery might have to be set up still have to be worked out. He also made the point that the peace treaty with Germany did not enter the picture at all at this stage.

19. The Greek representative spoke without instructions but said that he was certain to express the views of his government in saying that the proposed treaty should be opened to all NATO members and that the principle of automatic assistance should not be accepted.

20. It was finally decided that the Council will meet in private session again on Wednesday, October 19th, in the afternoon, to resume this exchange of views.<sup>91</sup>

FOUR-POWER MEETING: EAST-WEST CONTACTS

In our telegrams Nos. 1057† and 1058† of October 12, we expressed some initial ideas on the subject of East-West contacts. In this message, we shall elaborate on some of the reasoning behind our earlier remarks, as concerns both the advantages and disadvantages of closer contacts during the détente.

2. We believe that there is the possibility of long term advantage to the West in encouraging closer contact between the Soviet leaders and people and the Western world. We would hope that providing we seize the initiative (which we have not yet done), increased contacts might help to remove a possible misconception that the West intends to attack the Soviet Union and, more important, contribute to the hoped-for mellowing and the settling into a conservative mold of the Soviet régime.

3. We also stand to gain from an intelligence point of view from increased contacts, for Soviet knowledge of the West greatly exceeds our knowledge of the Soviet Union. This conclusion is only valid, however, if the Russians genuinely grant greater freedom of movement and easier access to their information, and if our visitors are in some measure selected and briefed.

4. We must not forget, however, as the Chairman suggested in the meeting on October 19 (your telegram No. 1199 of October 19†) that there has been no change in the basic Soviet objectives and therefore no justification for relaxation. Nor is there any evidence whatever to suggest that the Soviet Government, since Geneva, has in any respect reduced its subversive activities through Communist parties and by espionage abroad. If anything, the reverse is true. The worst thing that could happen to us politically would be the creation by closer contacts of a new generation of fellow-travellers and "respectable" Communist parties, which in turn by their influence and undercover activity might reduce western public support for NATO to a dangerous degree and generally make our peoples more inclined to believe, without genuine evidence to the contrary, that the Soviet has fundamentally changed its aims and methods.

The record of this meeting is not printed.

5. We must therefore expect the Soviets to exploit closer contacts for their own purposes. Only if we develop a policy toward East-West contacts which can be controlled by individual Western countries, rather than by the Soviet, can we have much hope of achieving the long term advantages outlined in para. 2. It will be a difficult policy to pursue but nevertheless worth trying. The principal difficulty in pursuing such a policy will arise from the dilemma in which governments and the press will find themselves sooner or later. Exchanges of visits will undoubtedly be accompanied by friendly statements and a glossing over of differences. These will create in the public mind the belief that the Soviet Government is once again reasonable and friendly and, therefore, the Communist parties must also be reasonable and respectable. How to keep the public informed that the party remains subversive, while uttering warm, flattering phrases about increased contacts is a problem in public relations, but a very real one.

6. Quite apart from the political risks outlined in paras. 4 and 5 above, there is also the security risk in its technical sense. In some measure this will arise from sheer weight of numbers if visitors become numerous and from the enhanced opportunities for the Russians to follow up and exploit the additional contacts. However, these risks can be kept within bounds if domestic security services are sufficiently large and efficient.

7. In spite of these very real dangers, we think that on balance the advantages from closer contacts can outweigh the disadvantages, providing our policies are carefully supervised. To leave the initiative in Soviet hands is to invite trouble. We must face the fact that, if the Russians maintain the initiative in arranging exchanges of visits and information, they will do so in a way which is (a) least likely to encourage in their own people discontent with the régime and the present way of life in the Soviet Union; (b) most likely to enhance their knowledge of Western techniques without giving away the secrets of Soviet knowledge; and (c) most likely to encourage that interpretation of Soviet policy referred to in para 5 which we still have no reason to believe. We must seize the initiative and encourage exchanges which have the reverse effect. One way of ensuring this is to proceed cautiously, insisting upon reciprocal treatment and keeping exchanges in at least rough balance.

8. This leads to a discussion of the precise types of exchanges we should encourage. In a subsequent telegram I shall discuss this subject with particular reference to the U.K. paper which was forwarded to you under cover of London letter No. 1726 of October 13.†

9. If you make a statement on East-West contacts at the ministerial meeting, you should emphasize that our views on the subject are by no means fixed. We are working out our policy, but we shall of course want to await Mr. Pearson's return from his trip to Moscow before presenting an agreed Canadian opinion. In any case in your remarks, I think you should emphasize that it will be nigh impossible to cut off East-West contacts if the Russians want to develop them. Therefore it is in our interests to try to channel and control the exchanges. The cautionary remarks made above are simply intended to keep us aware of the dangers in order to prevent them becoming serious.

FOREIGN MINISTERS' COUNCIL MEETING
OCTOBER 25 — DISARMAMENT BRIEF

In accordance with the Geneva Directive, the disarmament sub-committee reconvened in New York and held eighteen meetings between August 29 and October 7 last. You will have received the reports of our delegation on these meetings.<sup>92</sup> The Big Four reintroduced in the sub-committee the proposals which they had submitted in Geneva i.e. the Eisenhower proposals for exchange of military blueprints and aerial surveys, the United Kingdom proposals for an inspection zone in Central Europe, the French proposals for the control of military budgets and the Bulganin disarmament proposals of July 21st. In addition, the French tabled working papers on the structure and powers of the international disarmament organization. The British also tabled a paper on the rights of inspection of the international control organ.

2. The United States had apparently set its mind on having the sub-committee endorse the Eisenhower Plan with a view to obtaining General Assembly approval during its current session. The explanation given was that since there was no adequate means at the present time of ensuring that stockpiles of nuclear weapons would be eliminated, the sub-committee should provisionally discard previous proposals aiming at the total elimination of nuclear weapons and concentrate instead on the Eisenhower proposals on which agreement might easily be reached within a relatively short time. The beneficial effect on future negotiations would be far-reaching and the progress thus made would contribute greatly to the diminution of the international tension.

3. While agreeing that the Eisenhower proposals for a warning system were a field which might most usefully be examined, the other Western members, including Canada, privately did not agree with the manner in which the Americans presented their case. They pointed out that the United States' decision to relegate earlier Western proposals to a "reserve and inactive status" could only play into the hands of the Russians. The Soviet Union could not help underlining the United States implied abandonment of total prohibition of nuclear weapons and even reduction of armaments in general. Moreover, the Soviet Union would be in an ideal position to lay stress on the fact that the United States had not accepted the Anglo-French proposals on the level of armed forces and on the time-table for the prohibition of nuclear weapons which were embodied in the Soviet proposals of May 10.

4. In spite of the United States insistence, the sub-committee did not take any decision on the Eisenhower proposals. Stassen failed in his repeated attempts to secure Russian agreement in principle to the proposals and partly as a result of this, the Western Powers did not commit themselves in the sub-committee. As expected, the Soviet representative pointed to divergence of views within Western ranks on the Anglo-French proposals and on the long-range goal of prohibiting nuclear weapons.

5. The British did not table any paper on the Eden Plan for a system of joint inspection in a small area on either side of the present dividing line in Europe, which they considered as more suitable for discussion in Geneva. The United States reiterated in private their fear that the Russians and public opinion might regard the British plan as some indication of the acceptance of a divided Germany. The United Kingdom delegation reassured the United States on this point and refrained from referring specifically in its statement in the sub-committee to Germany or to the dividing line in Europe, and mentioned instead the possibility that the plan could in principle be tried out anywhere where ground forces confront one another. Mr. Nutting stressed that the plan was not intended to effect any change in the present political situation in Europe and certainly no change in the major political objective of his government in Europe, namely the reunification of Germany as a country and of Europe as a continent. He said that the scheme would not necessarily enforce any limitation of forces but that there could perhaps be an agreed limit for equipment and armaments. The Canadian, French and the United States delegation welcomed the plan without committing themselves. Each of them underlined Nutting's statement that the British scheme did not involve any modification in the objective of a unified Germany, the Soviet delegate said that his government regarded the plan as important and deserving of careful attention.

6. Though we had some private reservations, the Canadian delegate welcomed the Faure Plan for budgetary control of military expenditures as an ingenious and useful addition to the fund of disarmament proposals. He indicated our great interest in economic assistance to underdeveloped areas and our hope that if a disarmament plan could be agreed upon it would be possible to make more assistance available to these areas, as well as to proceed further with various domestic programmes. He expressed some reservations about the possibility of a disarmament scheme which relied solely on budgetary controls. The United Kingdom and the United States delegates spoke along the same lines. The Russian delegate commented that the French plan was interesting and deserved considerable study which it was receiving from the Soviet authorities.

7. There was no detailed discussion during the sub-committee meetings of the French and United Kingdom papers concerning the structure and powers of the international control organ.

8. Canada welcomed the Eisenhower proposals during the sub-committee discussions and during his visit in Moscow the Minister confirmed our support of these proposals as part of a general disarmament programme.

9. You will recall that last May we took the initiative in suggesting that disarmament be discussed in the Council. In his statement on this subject the Minister suggested that disarmament might usefully be considered by the four Heads of States in Geneva, which they did. In view of this it would be fitting if you referred at Tuesday's meeting to the Ministers initiative in May.

10. Although the recent meetings of the sub-committee did not produce tangible results in the form of agreed texts, they may be regarded as having paved the way for a more detailed examination of the various proposals which have been put forward with a view to setting up a "warning system" which we have long believed should be the gateway to a general disarmament programme. One would hope that further discussions of these proposals might result in the adoption of a limited though comprehensive disarmament scheme embodying such elements of these proposals as may be agreed upon. This is not to suggest that these proposals should be implemented as such immediately in their present form and in isolation from any other disarmament arrangements. These proposals however provide a reasonable nucleus around which initial agreement could be developed thus breaking the deadlock in the lengthy disarmament negotiations.

11. It is our earnest hope that the negotiations begun last July at the Summit will be successfully continued by the Foreign Ministers. It may well be that agreement on a comprehensive disarmament programme will have to await a greater degree of mutual trust between major Powers and that this, in turn, will require some measure of progress on outstanding security issues. On the other hand there is little doubt that if some headway were made on the establishment of a warning system as a first step, this would in itself contribute substantially to a reduction of international tension and by the same token facilitate the settlement of other problems. Any progress in future negotiations will of course be dependent upon a more forthcoming attitude on the part of the USSR on the question of control. The Soviet proposals for the posting of observers are considered inadequate even for the limited purpose of setting up a warning system and the Russians have refused to budge on this vital issue during the sub-committee talks in spite of repeated questioning by West. In any event, without prejudice to the maintenance of deterrent strength, the West cannot abandon its reports to bring into being a balanced and effective system of disarmament.

12. Your statement on disarmament should follow the lines indicated in the two preceding paragraphs.

NATO MINISTERIAL MEETING, OCTOBER 25TH

The Foreign Ministers met yesterday under the Chairmanship of Dr. Gudmunsson. The three main briefings on security arrangements, disarmament and East-West contacts, were given respectively by Mr. Dulles, Mr. Macmillan and Mr. Pinay.

2. Mr. Dulles opened his remarks by saying that the negotiations with the Soviets had been conceived as falling into two distinct phases. First, the Heads of Governments Conference, the prime purpose of which was to develop a new psychological climate between East and West. The second phase, about to start, is designed to test the "Geneva spirit" and see whether progress can be achieved at the working level.

3. Last July it became apparent that the Soviet and Western positions regarding the problem of the reunification of Germany were far apart. The Soviets saw no urgency in trying to bring about the reunification of Germany. They wished to give priority to the formation of an all-European Security Treaty on the conclusion of which NATO, W.E.U. and the Warsaw organization would be liquidated. It is notable that in the Soviet proposals there was no suggestion that the reunification of Germany would be effected even after the completion of a general European Security Treaty. On the other hand, the Western position was that no genuine European security could be had unless Germany were reunified. At the same time, the Western Powers, in order to meet any legitimate concern for security on the part of the Soviets, declared themselves prepared to consider some security arrangements which would allay Soviet fears.

4. The difference of approach between East and West became acute in Geneva and there was, therefore, great difficulty in bringing about agreement on a directive regarding the question of the reunification of Germany and the establishment of security arrangements. The most that the Soviets would agree to was to recognize that the two problems were linked. Mr. Dulles said that he foresaw that the Soviet position in the forthcoming conference would be the same as that they took in July. As a matter of fact, the Secretary of State would not be surprised if the Soviets would cancel out the small concession they made at the "Summit" meeting.

5. In any case, the Western Powers intend to push along the lines they took at the Heads of Governments Conference and proposed to put forward a paper with two components: the Eden Plan establishing the procedure for the reunification of Germany, and an outline of a proposed security treaty between East and West. Of course, the Western Powers will insist that the two proposals are inter-connected. As far as the Eden Plan is concerned, its main features are well known, they remain substantially the same as those originally proposed in Berlin. The plan provides inter alia, that an all-German Government has the right to elect its alliances.

6. The Secretary of State then made a few comments on the provisions of the proposed Security Treaty (for an outline of the terms of the treaty, see our telegram No. 1226 of today's date).<sup>93</sup> With regard to the preamble, Mr. Dulles said that the formula used is purposely vague. The Western Powers thought that the parties to the proposed treaty should necessarily be the Four Powers plus Germany, plus any state whose territory is directly involved in the security arrangement, for example, Poland and Czechoslovakia on the eastern side and certain states which may, under certain contingencies, have a direct interest on the western side. Mr. Dulles said, also, that we may have to take into account the Soviet views with regard to participation.

7. Paragraphs 1 and 2 were along U.N. charter lines. Mr. Dulles made the point, however, with regard to paragraph 2, that this clause might eventually come into force before the process of the reunification of Germany had been completed.

8. With regard to paragraph 3, Mr. Dulles said that no attempt had been made to determine precisely the size of the treaty area. It would probably embrace the greater part of Germany, Poland and Czechoslovakia. This is a question on which the views of our military advisers will have to be obtained and it was premature to hold any rigid views before the negotiations.

9. With regard to paragraph 8, Mr. Dulles emphasized that if Germany elects to remain outside NATO, the obligation envisaged in this paragraph would not arise. He said, also, that the U.S. Government considers that it has made a far-reaching concession in guaranteeing the [group corrupt] against aggression by a NATO member. He could conceive a political situation in the United States where such a concession would not be offered. If the Soviets were wise, therefore, they should seize upon this opportunity with alacrity.

10. With regard to paragraph 9, Mr. Dulles said that certain provisions of the proposed Security Treaty will come into effect when Germany is reunified. Other provisions of the treaty, namely, those mentioned in paragraphs 1, 2, 6 and 8 might come into effect before the reunification of Germany is actually completed.

11. Mr. Dulles concluded his remarks by saying that he could see good reasons why the U.S.S.R. would not accept the Western proposals on the reunification of Germany. It would seem that the Soviets are not really interested in security, but that their real concern is with the future of the G.D.R. Not only do they want to retain their grip on East Germany, but they probably realize that if they were to abandon the Pankov régime, this will send shivers down the spines of all the Communist régimes in Eastern Europe. In this respect, it is significant that after the Geneva Conference, the Soviet Delegates spent three days in East Germany trying to reassure the G.D.R. régime that its liquidation was not contemplated. Mr. Dulles finally said that the German Federal Republic, although it was one of the most interested parties, does not want to sit at the table in Geneva if this meant that G.D.R. would also be there. The Federal Republic, however, would be prepared to deal with the G.D.R. on specific provisions of the security arrangements if this is warranted.

12. Mr. Macmillan made a rather brief statement on the question of disarmament. He said that it was not the purpose of the Three Powers in Geneva to assume disarmament responsibilities and substitute themselves for the United Nations sub-committee. Their purpose would, rather, be to try to inject new ideas and suggestions such as had been done last July. If possible, they will try to give new impetus to disarmament negotiations, but they did not have in mind reaching any substantive agreement. He said that the Western Powers were still involved in the vital question of devising effective controls. The problem there was to keep up with scientific developments. A year ago it was thought that effective control could be devised by controlling fissionable material, but this has now proved to be unrealistic. It may be that some effective control of the means of delivery of nuclear weapons could be devised but that again was an open question. With regard to conventional weapons, there was perhaps a real possibility of real advance. Control of conventional weapons was easier to devise, although the methods of inspection presented a difficult problem.

13. The most hopeful avenue to explore was, perhaps, that of building confidence between East and West. In this respect, Eisenhower's proposals were valuable. The Soviets have agreed to study them but so far, have refused to commit themselves.

14. Mr. Macmillan, in conclusion, said that the Western Powers will strive to obtain agreement on a declaration of principles by the Four Powers on disarmament. He did not, however, give any details as to its contents.

15. Mr. Pinay spoke about the development of East-West contacts. He recognized at the outset that the Western attitude on this question cannot be negative. He said that we had much to gain from the free interchange of ideas, persons and information between East and West. The common civilization shared by Eastern and Western countries offers a natural bridge between the two worlds. Our hope was that, through a freer interchange, we could influence thinking behind the iron curtain.

16. On the other hand, we should be alive to the dangers of such a policy. We could expect the Communists to utilize the new spirit to further the aims of their propaganda and help the development of Communism. The West could come forward with precise proposals such as the establishment of air lines between the important centres of the U.S.S.R. and the Western capitals. The question of opening trade between East and West could also be explored, although with great cautiousness. There could be no question, for instance, of abolishing Western controls of strategic materials, although we could give the Soviets to understand that major concessions in other fields might bring about some rewarding results. He concluded his remarks by saying that although there was a certain pessimism as to the possibility of reaching agreement with the Soviets on the major political issues, it was reasonable to expect, with regard to the question of East-West contacts, that the Soviets would be more amenable. It was up to us to test Soviet sincerity by adopting a positive and constructive attitude on this question.

17. In our immediately following telegram, we shall try to summarize the discussions that took place in these three main topics.

NATO FOREIGN MINISTERS' MEETING — OCTOBER 25/55

In our immediately preceding telegram, we outlined the statements made by the Three Powers on German reunification and European security, disarmament and East-West contacts. We now propose to report the general discussions on these three main subjects which followed.

I. GERMAN RE-UNIFICATION AND EUROPEAN SECURITY

(a) General

2. Two points emerged early in the general discussion: firstly, there appeared to be general approval of the continuation of the Three Power dual approach to the questions of German re-unification and a security treaty; and secondly, the Conference expressing general agreement with the paper prepared by the Standing Group in answer to the request of the working group. We have already sent you the contents of this paper. The conference merely commented that the width and location of any controlled zone and of any area of radar overlap required further study.

3. There was, however, considerable discussion concerning the future status of a re-unified Germany. While the Eden plan for re-unifying Germany appeared acceptable, discussion centered around the best phasing of the articles of the Three Power security proposals in order to emphasize to the Soviet Union that a re-unified Germany would be free to choose her own international obligations but that, should a re-unified Germany elect to remain outside NATO, the security of both sides would have to be guaranteed by some other arrangement, excluding German neutrality.

4. Mr. Spaak suggested that the proposals should be stated in such a way as to underline the danger to both sides of a unified neutral Germany. It would be the freedom of re-unified Germany to manoeuvre rather than her re-unification itself that would be dangerous. Continuing in this vein, Mr. Spaak suggested that the present proposals are not a security treaty at all but are really a security guarantee supplementary to the proposals to reunify Germany and therefore might be presented at Geneva as such rather than as a rather blunt quid pro quo for the Soviet agreement to the admission of a re-unified Germany to NATO. He suggested that the progressive phases of the security proposals could be adjusted to permit this approach.

5. Mr. Wilgress then expressed the Canadian position along the lines suggested by you, and informed the conference of Mr. Khrushchev's discussion with Mr. Pearson, in which the former had expressed the wish to join NATO or to replace it, and had in fact stated that there should either be "both Germanies or neither" in any security treaty.<sup>94</sup> Mr. Wilgress mentioned Mr. Khrushchev's apparent interest in a security guarantee signed by a number of States, but pointed out that Mr. Khrushchev had included smaller powers on a one-for-one basis, i.e. Denmark, Belgium, Czechoslovakia and Poland. Mr. Wilgress suggested that the Three Powers should confine themselves at this stage to general principles and might emphasize the proposed free choice by a re-unified Germany of its international obligations.

6. On the whole, the Conference expressed agreement with Mr. Spaak's analysis of the proposals as being a supplementary guarantee rather than a security treaty. While agreeing with the Three Power analysis of Soviet intentions, the majority of the NATO Foreign Ministers considered it necessary to convince public opinion of the sincerity of our wish to negotiate. Moreover, most nations present appeared to consider it essential that aggression by a re-unified Germany be provided against from the point of view of the West as well as the East.

7. In summarizing the discussion, Mr. Dulles noted that the Conference appeared in general agreement with the Three Power contention that the re-unification of Germany continues to be an essential concomitant of a European Security Treaty. Moreover, he noted that while there was a difference of opinion on the width of a possible "buffer" zone, most ministers appeared to support the general recommendations of the Standing Group concerning a controlled zone supplemented by some system of radar overlap. With respect to the proposals on European security, Mr. Dulles thanked the Conference for their helpful suggestions, and suggested that the Three Powers need not necessarily entitle their proposals "European Security Treaty". He also suggested that the time-phasing of the various articles of the Big Three proposals on security could be re-drafted in order to permit further discussion. Moreover, he agreed with Mr. Spaak that the Soviet Union should not be permitted to think that Germany could be neutralized, nor should a re-unified Germany be allowed to think that she would be free of all international safeguards against renewed aggression by her should she decide not to join NATO.

(b) Membership

8. Mr. Dulles' remarks, reported in my telegram under reference (paragraph 6), brought an immediate intervention on the part of Mr. Spaak. He said that he viewed with considerable alarm the fact that the Western Powers were contemplating leaving out from the proposed European Security Pact certain NATO countries. This, in his view, would prove to be a fatal blow to the concept of NATO solidarity, particularly at this time when NATO is going through a delicate phase of its evolution. Spaak was strongly supported by Zorlu, who felt it would be wrong to let the Soviets have something to say about who, on the Western side, should or should not be a member of the proposed treaty. The Greek Foreign Minister not only thought that all NATO countries should underwrite the treaty, but that we should not exclude the possibility that Yugoslavia might become a member. He said that the security area should extend from the Baltic Sea to the Black Sea and include Hungary, Roumania and Bulgaria. The Portuguese Representative also favoured participation by all NATO countries. The Dutch, Norwegian and Danish Representatives took much the same line as we did, that the question of membership was slightly academic at this stage when the exact nature of the treaty and the geographical configuration of the security area were not yet fully known. They were satisfied if the principal Powers did not rule out a priori the possibility that all NATO countries may wish to underwrite the treaty. We made the additional point that an equation of NATO with the Warsaw Treaty Organization should be resisted. The Italian Foreign Minister, for his part, thought it important to maintain NATO solidarity and that all NATO countries should underwrite the proposed treaty even if this meant that all satellite countries were to become party to the treaty.

9. Mr. Dulles, in reply, said that the proposed treaty had a limited objective, e.g. providing the U.S.S.R. with guarantee against the possibility of attack by Germany. This objective could be achieved by security guarantees given by the Three Powers and Germany. In his view, it was not, strictly speaking, essential that the treaty should be underwritten by all NATO countries. If this were the case, it might lead to complications as the Soviets would probably insist that all the Warsaw Powers should also subscribe. He did not agree with the view that a limited participation would necessarily disrupt the Alliance. W.E.U., for example, left out some NATO members and this arrangement was considered acceptable. He also made the point that the United States was willing to pay a limited price for the reunification of Germany, but he was not sure that Congress would be receptive to the suggestion that all satellite countries should also be given guarantees under the proposed treaty. It was also a fact that in negotiating the treaty, the views of the other principal party had to be taken into account. He did not know at this stage what the Soviet attitude would be.

10. In conclusion, the Secretary of State said that this difficult question has been purposely left open. The Western Powers had done nothing to include or exclude the NATO countries from the proposed treaty as the matter, of course, was one for further consultation. Some NATO members, he knew, were not favourable to accession, while others favoured it. Obviously the matter will have to be discussed at a later stage in the light of developments in Geneva. Certainly the Western Powers could not go to Geneva prepared to commit any country except their own. Finally, he said that the word "agreed" in the preamble of the outline of terms of the proposed security treaty (see our telegram No. 1226 of to-day's date†) might appropriately be replaced by the word "determined". In any case, in the light of the discussion that had taken place, he assumed that the Western Powers would have greater latitude on the question of participation.

11. Mr. Macmillan made the point that in fact the proposed security treaty is ill-named. What it does is not to give any additional security to the West but it only gives supplementary guarantees against aggression to the U.S.S.R. Therefore, membership in the proposed treaty means no real advantage to the NATO countries, but merely additional burdens. If all NATO countries were prepared to assume these additional burdens, certainly the Western Powers would welcome such a development. But at least this could be said, that it was to our advantage that the participation on the Eastern side should not be too large and, perhaps, not go further than Czechoslovakia and Poland.

II. DISARMAMENT

12. Mr. Macmillan's briefing on the question of disarmament was couched in such general terms that it provoked little discussion. The Italian Foreign Minister insisted on the importance of global disarmament to supplement the European security system envisaged in the Western proposals. He took this opportunity to develop again his thesis that it should be possible for non-United Nations members to participate in the work of the U.N. sub-committee on disarmament, thereby recognizing the wider international implications of this problem. The accession of Italy to the sub-committee would not, of course, prejudice Italy's position regarding the question of her admission to the United Nations. On this point Mr. Martino said that the admission to the United Nations of any neutral state before the admission of Italy would be viewed with great concern by his Government. Mr. von Brentano said that in the Western proposals, the questions of German re-unification, security, and disarmament were indissolubly linked. In accordance with your instructions, we made a fairly lengthy statement on disarmament which was well received. Mr. Dulles, in particular, showed great interest in our suggestions.

III. EAST-WEST CONTACTS

13. On the question of East-West contacts, there was, on the whole, considerable unanimity of views. Our own statement perhaps dwelt slightly more than Mr. Pinay's statement on the risks involved in developing contacts with the East, but Mr. Bech, who devoted his remarks to this subject, took much the same line as we did. The Italian Foreign Minister, in line with previous proposals made by Italy in the Council, argued in favour of continued consultation between NATO members on their proposed initiatives in this field, as the policy followed by one NATO member inevitably has repercussions on public opinion of other NATO countries. He put the Western Powers on guard against creating false illusions about the détente in [?] up the importance of possible Soviet concessions in the field covered by Directive III. The Danish Foreign Minister showed special interest in the proposals regarding East-West trade. He said that the time had perhaps come for the West, in its own interests, to reconsider its position regarding commodity controls.

14. In conclusion, we can say that the conference was a marked success in our opinion, and in that of all to whom we spoke. Most of the latter contrasted the lively exchange of ideas on this occasion to the rather hurried and barren exchange of prepared statements which occurred in NATO prior to the "Summit" conference. The complaints expressed in the Council's private session with the working group on October 29 concerning the lack of consultation between the Three Powers and their NATO partners were not expressed in any marked degree on October 25 and indeed would have been inappropriate to the very useful discussion which took place. Even Mr. Spaak, who was expected to be very critical on this point, contented himself with a relatively mild reference to difficulty of forming an opinion on the Three Power memorandum in so short a time.

GENEVA BALANCE SHEET

After three weeks of jockeying for position, the Geneva Conference of Foreign Ministers was unable to record a single point of agreement, except the decision to report "to their respective Heads of Government and to recommend that the future course of the discussions of the Foreign Ministers should be settled through diplomatic channels". Although Mr. Molotov cheerfully bid Mr. Dulles "Au revoir — until we meet again," it is clear from his subsequent statements that Mr. Dulles does not expect a resumption of Four Power talks for some time — perhaps not before the United States election.

2. Not only was there no decision as to when to meet again, no serious attempt was made even to arrive at a common statement of the areas of agreement and disagreement, although Mr. Molotov submitted a draft communiqué with this objective. In contrast to the Summit Conference, the Western Foreign Ministers appeared determined not to camouflage disagreement on major questions of substance with agreement on generalities or secondary matters. Their decision, largely on the initiative of Mr. Dulles, to set no time and place for a future meeting underscored their failure to translate the Summit directive into concrete agreements in any field.

3. Although by all accounts the Communist press, during and since the Conference, have tended to play down the failure of the Foreign Ministers, most of the non-Communist press, going beyond the lead given by the spokesman of Western delegations at Geneva, interpreted the Conference as not merely devaluating but virtually killing off the "spirit of Geneva". Some voices, Mr. Walter Lippmann's among them, have resisted this trend, pointing out that the real spirit of Geneva — the tacit acceptance on both sides of the necessity of avoiding a nuclear war — has not been damaged. A relaxation of tension was the obvious concomitant of an acceptance of the picture of "the two scorpions in a bottle each capable of stinging the other to death", as Dr. Oppenheimer put it. For the most part, however, the negative results of the Conference have been highlighted in order to dispel the totally unreal expectation after the Summit Conference that the "thaw" would suddenly make all the old issues soluble on Western terms — an illusion more likely to relax Western will than international tension.

4. It is important for the West to retain a proper perspective. Our position vis-à-vis the USSR is certainly no worse than it was last Spring. Austria and Porkkala, at any rate, have been liberated, and a process of more friendly relations started which is quite a new departure for the USSR. But if the Summit Conference meant that a deliberate recourse to war to solve the differences between the two blocs was ruled out, it did not mean a relaxation of our efforts, or those of the USSR to advance by other means what each side considered its national interests, and these other means include diplomacy. Since neither side is in a position to exercise threats or issue ultimata, this means at some stage further negotiation.

5. In any event, one illusion fairly common in the United States and Germany has been shattered by Geneva. The USSR does not need a relaxation of tension enough to pay a big price for it. This, you will recall, was our major difference of opinion with the State Department in assessing the Summit Conference.<sup>95</sup> Indeed it is now more obvious than it was after the Summit Conference that the USSR has calculated that by creating the general impression of détente between east and west the unity and determination of the Western powers would be more quickly and vitally affected than the internal lines of the Soviet alliance, which do not depend on widespread support. For this reason the United States Government evidently concluded that there was something to be said for denying the Soviet Union the benefits of a détente unless they were prepared to pay for it in terms of concrete agreements on major subjects. The danger of this policy is, of course, that if agreement cannot be reached on major subjects the two principal protagonists will give up the attempt to negotiate on anything. And in these circumstances they might not sufficiently remember their human situation as two estranged families forced by circumstances of the nuclear age to live under one roof.

6. It will take many months before an objective evaluation of the results of the two Geneva Conferences can be made. They will have their effect on the forthcoming elections not only in France but in the United States and still more directly in Germany. Much will depend on how the Conferences are evaluated by Western peoples and governments and by the Soviet Government. But the most important area of action directly affected by the Geneva Conference will undoubtedly be Germany.

7. In the attached papers on Germany and European Security, Disarmament and East-West contacts, we have attempted to draw out some of the implications of the Geneva Conference of Foreign Ministers. You may find these papers of some value in considering what you wish to say in the Ministerial meeting of the NATO Council in Paris next month, under the item reviewing the current international situation.

THE GENEVA CONFERENCE OF FOREIGN MINISTERS AGENDA ITEM I: EUROPEAN SECURITY AND GERMANY

First and foremost, both Geneva Conferences, and particularly the Conference of Foreign Ministers, were about Germany. (A departmental memorandum of November 14th analysing the Foreign Ministers' discussions on European Security and Germany is attached). In the failure of the Foreign Ministers Conference many observers have seen the beginnings of a major international crisis over the future of Germany. The Western Foreign Ministers successfully exposed the Soviet position as a refusal as much for political as for strategic reasons to permit the Germans to have a free choice either of their future alliances or (at least as far as East Germany is concerned) of their social and economic systems. In this sense the Western Foreign Ministers may be said to have won the debating battle at Geneva; but it is arguable that in the long run they may have lost more than they gained in Germany for the following reasons:

(a) The Western Powers and Chancellor Adenauer's Government sold the Paris Agreements to the German people as the basis that the way towards the reunification of Germany was the creation of a position of strength in which the Federal Republic formed a part of the Western Alliance. Having achieved that position — at least relatively, whether we look ahead or behind — the West has been unable to induce the Soviet Union to budge on reunification even in exchange for security offers which, although far from precise, were unprecedented in terms of United States peacetime policy.

(b) The USSR alone has it in its power to agree to the reunification of the Federal Republic and the Democratic Republic, and to satisfy German aspirations for the "lost territories" east of the Oder-Neisse.

(c) German business interests having approached the limits of their Western markets for industrial production, are open to the idea of expanding new interests in Eastern Germany, Eastern Europe, the USSR and China. The Soviet Union holds the key to this trade.

(d) The East Germans have now been set up with all the trappings of authority to renew pressure upon West Berlin at any time.

(e) The Germans — and the Russians — realize that free all-German elections, if held today, would sweep away the Communist régime of Eastern Germany and all its "social and economic achievements", which Mr. Molotov fought so hard to preserve. But they are not so sure what would happen in a few years time when the "achievements" of the Communist régime, their hold on the minds of youth, and their industrial and agrarian policies, would be extremely difficult to undo. German opinion is therefore becoming more insistent upon the urgency of reunification before both Germanys become in fact, as well as in politics, separate states.

(f) Reunification on Soviet terms would bring release from the obligations of the Paris Agreements which would not be unwelcome to a large section of German opinion, if we are to judge by their very half-hearted and lethargic reactions to military measures and to the call for volunteers. In recent weeks the Chancellor has reopened his efforts to get rearmament under way. It is doubtful, however, that the impact of the Geneva Conference has made opinion in the Federal Republic more willing to accept the necessity for rearmament; for this is plainly not the road to reunification.

2. When, a month after Germany's accession to NATO, the USSR invited Chancellor Adenauer to come to Moscow, his entourage did not conceal their sense of triumph. They changed their tune when they came back from Moscow; for the walls had not fallen when the Chancellor had blown his trumpet. With the establishment of diplomatic relations early in the New Year, the attractions of the Soviet Lorelei will be all the more apparent to German public opinion because of the failure of the Foreign Ministers Conference, even though thinking opinion will appreciate where the blame rests. It is no doubt on this hypothesis that the Soviet Union felt free to express their position in such blunt terms at Geneva. While the Germans themselves were freely discussing, in the light of the Chancellor's serious illness, who might succeed him, the Russians felt they could afford to wait. For, in Germany at any rate, time could scarcely worsen their position.

3. With the reopening of the "wire to Moscow" and with the apparent dead end on German reunification reached by the Foreign Ministers at Geneva, the Government of the Federal Republic now faces a period of acute and probably increasing difficulty. Judging by the immediate impact of Geneva on the West German press, it would be a mistake to exaggerate the seriousness of the problem. There are disagreements as to whether the Government should talk to the Soviets about possible neutrality terms (as the SPD advocate), or to the East Germans about trade (as the FDP suggest), or to neither (as the Chancellor intends). But in the short run German opinion credits the Western Ministers with doing the best they could in the face of impossible Soviet demands. German opinion is thoroughly anti-communist and alive to the dangers of buying reunification on terms which would leave the whole of Germany wide open to penetration by a trained communist minority from the eastern zone. In the long run, however, it is difficult to see how Germany's alignment with the West is to be preserved and cemented when the USSR controls so many of the levers capable of applying pressure to German public opinion. If Chancellor Adenauer felt himself unable to refuse a Soviet Ambassador in Bonn in exchange for some 9,000 German prisoners, how long will it be possible for his successor to maintain the Western connection with some 18,000,000 Germans in the balance on the other side?

4. If this picture of the situation in Germany is even approximately correct, it is high time that Western policy towards Germany be re-examined in the light of Soviet policy. It may be that there are no possible alternatives for Western (and German) policy. We do not know the answer. But we can see no reason for Western complacency in the belief that at Geneva the Soviet was successfully "exposed". Indeed, it is difficult on the basis of the Geneva record to criticize the Western Foreign Ministers — and the Germans — for the basic position they adopted on Germany and European Security. All NATO countries were agreed on the necessity for avoiding any action on European Security before Germany had been reunified and had acceded to NATO. All acknowledged that the artificial and wishful content of the "German spirit" after the Summit meeting must not be allowed to damage Western cohesion and determination.

5. In this outlook Chancellor Adenauer found himself in complete agreement with Mr. Dulles. As we understand it, it was in deference to the German and United States points of view that the French and United Kingdom Governments agreed to retreat slightly from the Eden proposals advanced at the Summit by:

(a) Withdrawing the proposal for creating on either side of the East-West line in Germany, before reunification, a zone of reciprocal inspection (though his proposal stands before the U.N. Disarmament Sub-Committee);

(b) Moving any eventual zone of inspection and limitation of forces eastwards to the area on either side of the East German-Polish boundary which would become the eastern boundary of a united Germany;

(c) Resisting also any suggestion from the Western side of a possible "fallback" position (discussed in the Foreign Office) whereby all-German elections might be prepared by some kind of Council representing both German Governments (instead of merely technical German experts assisting the Four Powers).

6. Despite these somewhat marginal issues on which the United Kingdom and French Governments might have been prepared to go somewhat further than the United States and German Governments towards opening up the negotiating position of the West on German reunification, there was, so far as we know, no disposition whatever, among any of the Four Powers chiefly concerned to reconsider Germany's defence obligations under the Paris Agreements. It was never suggested — even for the purpose of having it turned down by the Soviet delegations — that the West might agree to the neutrality of a reunified Germany, which could be rearmed only within limits set by the Four Powers. In his closing statement at Geneva, Mr. Dulles did say that the Conference had shown him that the USSR was not prepared to agree to German reunification through free elections even if the Federal Republic abandoned its membership in NATO and the Western European Union. However, this is the closest that any of the Western Foreign Ministers came to calling Mr. Molotov's bluff — if it was a bluff — by offering to consider some kind of neutralization for a unified Germany if it elected to remain outside of their alliance. Had the Western Ministers made the offer, Mr. Molotov's purely political objection to any "mechanical merger" detrimental to the Communist system in Eastern Germany would have stood out like the sorry farce it is.

7. As it was, during the first phase of the Foreign Ministers Conference, the Western Ministers were quite widely criticized in the Western press for taking a position on Germany and European Security which, it was said, the Soviet Union would not and could not accept. Thus the Manchester Guardian wrote that the Western security proposals

"were supposed to reassure Russia against the chance of attack by a rearmed Germany, yet they contained only an empty promise to take appropriate action and to seek help through the United Nations in the event of aggression. They jettisoned Sir Anthony Eden's former proposal for a demilitarized zone in Europe; instead, the Russians were asked in effect to leave Eastern Germany and much of Poland while our troops were to stay where they are".

8. Mr. Molotov's calculated misrepresentation of the Western European security proposals would have had less effect on Western opinion if the Western proposals had been presented (as suggested in the Canadian interim paper† last July) in the terms of the three alternatives open to the Germans, instead of elaborating only on the guarantees offered if Germany as a whole joined NATO. In his conversations with the Minister in the Crimea, Mr. Khrushchev was also able to pretend that Western proposals offered Germany no choice, but amounted to a demand for reunified Germany's inclusion in NATO.

9. Be that as it may, by the end of the Conference even the German Socialists were forced to admit that there was much more flexibility and objective reasonableness in the Western proposals than in anything that Mr. Molotov had been prepared to offer. Indeed, the Soviet position had hardened to such an extent that there was clearly little point in tinkering with the details of Western Security proposals or even with the details of the Eden Plan, when such a gulf separated the positions of the two sides, and when Mr. Molotov's aloof attitude even outside the Conference room convinced participants he was not interested in reaching any kind of agreement.

10. Although Mr. Molotov did not subscribe to every detail of the East German statement of prerequisites to all-German elections and the objectives for a reunified German state, he did table the East German declaration as a conference document demanding that the East and West Germans should themselves reach agreement before free elections were held as to how East Germany's nationalized industries and banks, and her agrarian reforms, should be preserved after reunification. The whole tenor of East German statements in recent weeks has been much more aggressive and self-confident. They have been making demands upon the West Germans instead of wooing them. And they seemed, in their demands, to have been pushing the Soviet Delegation into taking a somewhat more rigid position that it has adopted in the past when individual preconditions regarding the preservation of East Germany "achievements" have not figured prominently.

11. For some time to come we can assume the competitive co-existence of two Germanys. During the past ten months the Soviet Union has shown a remarkable capacity for reversing itself on important matters of foreign policy. We can probably assume that when they judge the time to be right, the Soviet Union might be willing to settle for the reunification of Germany through some kind of free elections provided that:

- (a) There is Four Power agreement on a European Security Treaty;
- (b) Germany is neutralized;
- (c) German armament and armed forces are limited and controlled;

(d) Non-German forces are withdrawn;

(e) The social and economic "achievements" of the Eastern Zone are safeguarded.

12. From the point of view of NATO, these terms are probably not negotiable. But since they may in the long run appeal to a very large number of Germans, once the hand of Chancellor Adenauer is no longer at the helm, the Western Powers and in particular the NATO Powers will have to examine these terms and consider what attitude they must adopt towards them, when the time comes. If they must be rejected in order to preserve a NATO forward strategy, other than military means should, in our opinion, be sought without delay to cement the Federal Republic more firmly into the Western alliance. The new brand of competitive co-existence implies that the West must be prepared to compete in political and economic as well as in military terms; and no where will the lines be drawn more sharply — or more critically — than in Germany.

13. Chancellor Adenauer and some of his leading advisers think the answer may be found in the much more active development of Western European Union, or of "little Europe" (without the United Kingdom) composed of the six countries willing to move towards a federal structure in terms of economic and foreign policy as well as defence. Given once again some positive aspiration to work for, the German people may, their leaders think, find solace in German leadership of a Western continental federation to counter-balance their disappointment and frustrated sense of nationalism over the failure of the Western Powers to secure the reunification of their country. This is a familiar thesis which we have analysed in previous papers and it is logical to find German leaders turning once again in the direction of a Federal solution such as had been the ultimate objective of the unsuccessful movement for a European Defence Community.

14. What is new is to find not only the CDU but the Socialist opposition in Germany advocating federal solutions based on the tacit assumption that reunification is probably not attainable. The SPD leader, Herr Ollenhauer, recently decided to support Monsieur Jean Monnet's Political Action Committee for a United States of Europe. Nor is the new sense of urgency to "relaunch Europe" confined to Germans. Mr. Spaak's dynamism has for the past six months been directed toward the implementation of the Messina Resolution of last June. As Chairman of the Messina Steering Committee, he will shortly be reporting to his colleagues the detailed recommendations of his technical committee studying such questions as the establishment of a common market for Western Europe and of common facilities for atomic research and development. Within the past week the Italian Ambassador in Ottawa has once again impressed upon us his Government's great interest in moving towards federal institutions for the Messina countries, within the framework of the necessarily looser Atlantic Alliance.

15. If imaginative and far reaching solutions along supranational lines should once again come within the realm of practical politics in Western Europe, it is of the greatest importance that they should be freely discussed and jointly evaluated in the NATO Council. The failure of EDC showed the difficulty of approaching such questions primarily from the military point of view — particularly when the United States, which so strongly advocated this solution, was not itself prepared to take part in the proposed structure. The appeal of the "European" idea is still very much alive — and not only in Western and Central Europe, but we may safely assume, in Eastern Europe as well. At the same time, in the light of our experience with EDC, it would certainly be unrealistic to assume that whatever French Government emerges from the next election, anything more than the first small steps towards closer integration of the Western continental members of the Atlantic Alliance will be possible in the foreseeable future. But that possibility has been created — as was the situation that made possible the birth of NATO — by the political consequences of Soviet policy in Europe.

16. At the NATO Ministerial Council next month, we may expect some discussion — how “full and frank” it will be I do not know — of these questions which are of such direct concern to Herr von Brentano, Mr. Spaak and Mr. Martino. Although the Germans at past Councils have tended to tell their NATO colleagues what they thought would please and reassure, the future of the German policy of the NATO alliance must rest primarily upon the Germans themselves. It will be interesting to hear what they have to say, both in public and in private, as to the alternative lines of policy that are politically possible for them.

17. If the German Government decides to push the economic and political integration of the Messina Six, it will be for the other members of the alliance to consider where the balance of advantage lies, for NATO collectively and for each member individually. In each member's judgement there will be elements of political and economic policy which may be difficult to reconcile.

18. The political starting point for such a discussion, it seems to us, is the situation now facing Germany, and what German leaders have to say about it.

CONFIDENTIAL

[Ottawa], November 23, 1955

THE GENEVA CONFERENCE
AGENDA ITEM II: DISARMAMENT

When viewed against the background of the talks at the summit, the disarmament discussions of the Foreign Ministers may be generally regarded as an anticlimax. Last summer a fair amount of attention was devoted to disarmament in opening statements, and within the short time available, each of the Western Powers submitted significant proposals among which the Eisenhower plan did so much to develop the concept of a warning system which is now at the forefront of disarmament negotiations. This time none of the Western Powers submitted new proposals and the only contribution made by the Soviet Union took the form of a suggestion embodied in their draft declaration of disarmament that the Four Powers should renounce the use of force.

2. The lack of initiative on the part of the Western Powers was due to the fact that they are now re-examining their disarmament policies. For this reason, they sought to avoid as far as possible being drawn into discussions of substance which would lay bare their divergencies and place them in a vulnerable position. In one respect, however, they were able to move a step forward when Dulles announced that the United States would be prepared “to negotiate both with other sovereign states involved and with the Soviet Union, for the appropriate extension on a reciprocal, equitable basis of the Eisenhower proposal and the Bulganin control posts to overseas bases and to the forces of other countries”. Stassen had persistently refused to budge on the question of extending the Eisenhower plan to cover bases abroad during the Sub-committee discussions. The modification of the United States position on this point is an encouraging development. The re-affirmation of the United States' acceptance of the Bulganin proposals announced in President Eisenhower's reply to Bulganin and the extension of their application to bases abroad should, indeed, be welcomed.

3. The United States' advances did not bring about any fundamental change in the Soviet position on the Eisenhower plan. Molotov followed closely the line taken in Bulganin's letter to President Eisenhower, his main argument against Soviet acceptance being that the President's plan would not help to reduce armaments and would not diminish the danger of an atomic war. Molotov was careful, however, not to reject the plan which he said "could be treated in a different manner if the measures it provides for were viewed in an indissoluble connection" with a general disarmament programme including the prohibition of nuclear weapons. However, the Soviet statement represented a slight advance from their previous position on the question of aerial photography. Molotov indicated that the Soviet Union would be prepared to regard this proposal favourably as one form of control "at the concluding stage of the implementation of measures for the reduction of armaments and the prohibition of atomic weapons".

4. On other aspects of disarmament, the Soviet position was fundamentally the same as that taken in the Sub-committee and in Bulganin's letter. With one exception, the Soviet proposals submitted to the Conference were identical to those tabled on July 21st. They call for the discontinuance of nuclear tests, provide that the use of nuclear weapons in defence against aggression should be authorized by the Security Council and include a solemn pledge by the Four Powers that they should not be the first to use nuclear weapons. At least three times during the Conference Molotov argued in favour of a moral and political condemnation of the use of atomic weapons comparable to the 1925 Protocol outlawing gas warfare. It should be noted also that Molotov expressed interest in the Eden plan for a zone of inspection on either side of the line now dividing the East and the West in which a limitation of armaments might come into force. This plan, which was repeated in less specific terms in the Disarmament Sub-committee, has now been apparently abandoned by the British who did not table it at this Conference.

5. The Soviet proposals of November 10 differed from those of last summer in that they suggested as the next step in disarmament negotiations the examination of the various proposals aiming at the establishment of a warning system i.e. the Eisenhower plan, the Bulganin proposals for control posts, the French proposal for budgetary controls and the Eden plan. The original declaration on disarmament drawn up by the Western Powers ended with a similar recommendation. Developments in the Sub-committee have pointed to the desirability of negotiations being pursued along these lines and, from the point of view of disarmament, it is regrettable that an earnest effort has not apparently been made by the West to come to an agreed decision of the Conference on this subject, particularly since there were many similarities between the Soviet and Western drafts. As it stands now, the final Western draft, which was published but not tabled, suggested that "the Ministers will transmit the records of the Geneva discussions to their representatives on the Sub-committee". The draft tabled by the Soviet did not mention the Sub-committee and suggested that "the Four Powers together with other states concerned, exert their efforts to work out an acceptable system of disarmament".

6. Although the Ministers' discussions did not produce positive results in the form of agreed decisions, the Conference should not be regarded as a step backward in the search for East-West agreement on disarmament. The Soviet Union maintained its more flexible attitude in this matter which became apparent more than a year ago, while the United States made significant concessions on the subject of the Eisenhower-Bulganin proposals. Most of all, although their meeting of minds on this subject was not formalized, both sides seem agreed that the next immediate step in East-West negotiations should consist in the consideration of the proposals put forward by each of the Big Four aiming at the establishment of a warning system which might provide the gateway to a general programme and which would, in any case, greatly help in bringing about the climate of mutual trust required for agreement on this programme. As indicated once again during the Conference, such agreement is unlikely to be reached before substantial progress is achieved on the problems of Germany and European security.

GENEVA MEETING OF FOREIGN MINISTERS AGENDA ITEM III: EAST-WEST CONTACTS

1. Item III of the Foreign Ministers' Conference devoted to East-West contacts was based on the following directive of the four heads of government meeting in Geneva in July:
"The Foreign Ministers should, by means of experts, study measures including those possible in organizations and agencies of the United Nations which could,
  - (a) bring about a progressive elimination of barriers which interfere with free communications and peaceful trade between peoples and,
  - (b) bring about such free contacts and exchanges as are to the mutual advantage of the countries and peoples concerned."
2. At the first meeting devoted to Item III it became almost immediately apparent that there was a very marked difference of approach between the Soviet and Western delegations. Mr. Molotov concentrated on alleged discrimination in trade and navigation and on the desirability of more exchanges in the scientific and technical fields. He implied strongly that the abolition of discriminatory measures in trade was a pre-condition for progress under Item III. As he and his delegation developed their arguments, it became apparent that by most favoured nation treatment they meant primarily the abolition of Western strategic controls. When they spoke of the "unhindered passage of merchant ships through canals and straits of international importance" their concern was mainly with interference with merchant vessels in the China Seas — though the general principle might be applied to Soviet ships in the Great Lakes. And when they spoke of the exchanges of technical and scientific knowledge their chief interest was in international conferences of specialists rather than less formal and more personal contact. Mr. Pinay, Mr. Dulles and Mr. Macmillan emphasized the prior importance of freedom for exchanges of ideas and persons. Specifically, they spoke of the opening of information centers; exchanges of books, periodicals, newspapers and films; greater freedom for foreign press correspondents; censorship and jamming; the rouble exchange rate and its effect on exchange of persons; and direct international air links with Moscow.
3. The committee of experts on East-West contacts was divided into a working group on trade and a working group on other contacts. In the experts' committee and in the working groups the same difference of approach was apparent. Attached to this memorandum are the texts of the Western proposals and the U.S.S.R. proposals on Item III (telegram No. 1268 of November 7 from NATO Delegation, Paris†).<sup>6</sup> A cursory comparison would suggest a large measure of common ground. But when it came to detailed discussions of these two sets of proposals the Russian delegates either avoided the points on which they are sensitive to criticism by saying that they were the internal affairs of the Soviet Union; or else stated that they should be the subject of bilateral discussions between countries.

4. In the final sessions, when the reports of the experts came back to the Foreign Ministers Mr. Molotov became quite blunt. Rejecting the bulk of the suggestions on exchange of ideas as interfering with the internal affairs of the Soviet Union. Mr. Molotov said that his country would not grant freedom for warmongering ideas or for subversive activities. On no account would he agree to the opening of information centers in the Soviet Union (this despite the fact that the Soviet member of the experts committee had called this a matter for bilateral negotiation) as he would not agree to this form of "Western espionage." Mr. Dulles pointed out that all proposals on East-West contacts involved the internal jurisdiction of the Four Powers but that the Western powers were nevertheless ready to discuss the subject. Out of 17 items in the Western proposals the Soviet Union had in effect rejected 12 and would only discuss the others bilaterally. The Soviet delegation had picked only those points which served their interests, such as group visits to acquire technical information. In conclusion, Mr. Macmillan said that the fundamental difference was that the West wanted the free movement of ideas and people and the Soviet Union wanted to limit and control both. With a final dig at Mr. Molotov, Mr. Dulles said that he had thought that the foundations of socialism in the Soviet Union were firm enough not to be toppled by a few adverse ideas.

5. In effect, the Russians rejected out of hand the Western statements on censorship; jamming; the rouble rate; information centers; direct air links; restrictions on foreign journalists; exchange and unimpeded public sale of books, periodicals, and newspapers; and exchange of broadcasts. They said that bilateral negotiations should be applied to the restrictions on diplomatic missions; exchange of films; official Western periodicals to be published in Russian in Moscow; and exchange of students. They maintained that the situation was satisfactory for the exchange of government publications; and for cultural and sporting exchanges. In fact, even on those points where the Western and Soviet proposals overlapped (exchanges of films and exhibitions; exchanges of persons in the professional, cultural and technical fields) the Soviet delegation refused to discuss the various Soviet practices which constitute obstacles to the exchange in question. The difficulty was not that there were not, on paper, points in common, but that the difference in approach was such as to make even the apparently common points mean different things to the two sides.

6. The tactics adopted by Mr. Molotov and his delegation with respect to East-West contacts suggest strongly that the Soviet Union did not want to move any further in this direction at the present time. From their point of view our strategic controls are a good stick with which to beat us, but they must have known that we were not prepared to negotiate on them. As Mr. Dulles said, the controls are the result, not the cause, of lack of confidence. By setting as a pre-condition for further progress the abolition of strategic controls the Russians were in effect rejecting any further progress.

7. It is important to try to estimate the reasons for this Soviet retreat from the suggestions on East-West contacts made at the July meeting of Heads of Government, since Molotov could, if he had wished, probably have confused the issue by making concessions on some of the parts of Item III. It may be that the Soviet leaders became alarmed and perhaps even surprised, at the speed, enthusiasm and detail with which the Western Powers had taken up the matter of East-West contacts. What the Soviet Union really wanted was a few more scientific and technical conferences which had high propaganda value; the opportunity for delegations of Soviet specialists to pick up scientific and technical know-how in the West; and a modest opening of the Soviet Union to distinguished visitors and to groups of tourists who could be kept pretty well under control. They were certainly not prepared to allow an influx of Western ideas and Western visitors which would seriously undermine their control of the information on the West available to the mass of the Soviet population.

8. It is perhaps an arguable proposition that, had the West been willing to make some concessions on strategic controls, the Soviet Union might have been willing to make some concessions on East-West contacts. The Soviet Union may have anticipated an adamant refusal to discuss strategic controls, or it may have thought that there was some room for negotiation. All the evidence suggests that, for a variety of reasons — economic, political and espionage — the Russians are anxious to promote trade with the West, and they might have been willing to open up the Soviet Union to Western ideas and persons, more than they have to date, in return for concessions on strategic controls. It is another question whether the West should have made concessions on strategic controls had it been offered Soviet concessions on the free flow of persons and ideas.

9. This leads directly to a discussion of Western tactics in putting forward at Geneva a series of proposals which constituted a full-scale attack upon the isolation of the Soviet mind, while retaining trade controls intact. The Western leaders must have known that the Soviet Union was not prepared to take East-West contacts to this logical conclusion. There are three possible explanations. The first is that the extreme Western position was presented for bargaining purposes, and that the Western powers would have been prepared to reach a compromise on it. The second is that the proposals were put forward in a form known to be unacceptable to the Russians with the hope and expectation that they would be rejected and therefore facilitate a return to the pre-Geneva I position.

10. The third explanation is that, even though the Western powers knew that the Soviet Union could not accept the whole series of proposals which was put forward by the West, it was probably well for Western and world opinion to make a clear and a strong statement as to what East-West contacts really implied. If the Soviet Union rejected the proposals, most of which people in the non-Soviet world would consider legitimate contacts, then responsibility for lack of progress could be clearly assigned. This kind of point scoring may sound rather niggling but it is important not only for the sake of those people in the West who were perhaps slightly bemused by the "Spirit of Geneva", the exploitation of which was profiting the USSR more than the West, but even more so for those in the uncommitted countries who watch closely for examples of good and bad faith on the part of the Soviet Union and the Western powers. In any event, it was better to state differences frankly than to gloss over them and give the outward appearance of agreement in principle.

11. It looks as if the Russians hoped at Geneva to present an agreed report on a few innocuous principles of East-West contacts and to avoid coming to grips with with any details on the subject. They are not prepared to allow a free exchange of persons and ideas but only a very limited exchange in fields where it is of direct advantage to the U.S.S.R. It seems likely, however, that the U.S.S.R. will not permit the set-back at Geneva to interfere with its policy of trying to maintain the appearances of more normal relations with non-Soviet countries, and will continue to give the appearances of greater liberality in this field, precisely to overcome the effects of the foreign ministers' conference.

12. If the Soviet Union is not interested in anything but a small number of exchanges in limited fields, that at least is an improvement over the Stalinist period. Even a limited contact between the Soviet people and the people of the West could, in certain circumstances, have some long-term beneficial influence on the Soviet view of the Western world, provided the Western powers are able to seize some initiative in developing East-West contacts. As for those fields in which the Soviet Union is prepared to exchange ideas and information it is up to the West not only to insist on strict reciprocity but also to take concrete steps so that the advantage does not lie solely with the Soviet Union. It is also necessary that the West seize the initiative in proposing exchanges so that it will not be, as it were, on the defensive at all times — as is the case now.

13. Geneva did not accomplish, as we knew or should have known it would not accomplish, a comprehensive agreement on East-West contacts. It did show us what fields of contact cannot even be considered for the time being and it would therefore seem sensible to avoid the obviously touchy questions such as radio jamming and information centers in Moscow. Nevertheless, we should not limit ourselves to exploring only those fields which the Soviets have indicated by implication are satisfactory to them. We should attempt to arrange visits to the U.S.S.R. by people working in fields of primary interest to us, even though some of these may prove to be unacceptable to the U.S.S.R. In spite of the limited success we may have, we should make it clear that contact between East and West is still, because of Soviet policy, a very limited sort of contact.

AFTER GENEVA

1. In a separate paper ("Geneva Balance Sheet" — memorandum of November 29) we have attempted to sum up what seemed to be the main conclusions to be drawn from the Geneva Conference of Foreign Ministers under the three headings which formed their agenda — European Security and Germany, Disarmament, East-West Contacts. In this paper I should like to make some more general, though still tentative, observations on some of the developments which may follow the Conference, and which may also be discussed at the forthcoming Ministerial Meeting of the NATO Council.

2. In the first place it seems probable that there will be no more Four Power Talks for sometime. Yet both sides have declared — and I believe sincerely — that, in spite of the Geneva deadlock, negotiations are not at an end. In his speech to the Indian Parliament on November 21, Mr. Khrushchev attributed the failure of the Conference to its "extremely complicated tasks" and to the fact that "the spirit of Geneva causes indigestion to certain persons".<sup>97</sup> He added, however, that he thought international problems would be settled if the Great Powers continued along the road outlined at the Summit Conference. Although Mr. Macmillan and Mr. Pinay were more explicit, Mr. Dulles has also implied, in his public report on his return to the United States, that negotiations are not at an end.<sup>98</sup>

3. If negotiations are to continue without benefit of Four Power Conferences, they will presumably be conducted through normal diplomatic channels and through such bilateral visits as that of Premier Bulganin and Mr. Khrushchev to London next Spring. Despite criticisms of the visit — and the Indian tour is not a good augury — reports from London indicate that the United Kingdom government is now attaching a good deal more importance to the Soviet leaders' visit because of the breakdown in the Four Power talks. This may partly account for Prime Minister Eden's interest in arranging a visit to President Eisenhower during the winter.

4. Indeed, bilateral diplomacy, if that is to be the new pattern among the Great Powers, will have many advantages despite the greater opportunities afforded to the Soviet leaders for dealing directly with the Germans and for exploiting Western differences by talking to Western leaders one at a time. However, the advantages of much greater privacy which such talks will afford will be a welcome change from the high pressure publicity of the Geneva Conferences where it was apparently impossible for anyone to put forward an idea without being publicly stuck with it. For this reason the Four Power Conferences were bound to degenerate into justifications of opposed positions as soon as the debate descended from the generalities of the Summit to the market place of detailed negotiations. There diplomacy very soon became frozen, as at the United Nations, and for the same reasons.

5. Apart from the hazards of Western disunity which in the circumstances should not be exaggerated, the main obstacles under which bilateral diplomacy will have to operate are the following:

(a) Soviet goodwill tours between capitals may be played up in Eastern Europe and in Western countries with strong Communist parties as "making the Communists more respectable", to their obvious advantage.

(b) Since the United States is unlikely to engage in bilateral diplomacy of this kind, at least until after next year's elections, the opportunities afforded by more private talks with Soviet leaders are unlikely to be productive because it is the United States which must decide on the concessions necessary to force the Soviet leaders to make real concessions; any greater flexibility shown by United Kingdom and French statesmen is more likely to be regarded by Soviet leaders simply as weakness.

(c) As pointed out in our previous paper, Germany is particularly vulnerable to bilateral negotiations despite Chancellor Adenauer's present determination not to be drawn into them either by the U.S.S.R. or by their East German puppets.

6. Nevertheless, on balance it seems to us that if a minimum of confidence is to be maintained between the Great Powers in order to consolidate the determination of both sides not to risk nuclear war, it will be necessary for those western countries which feel in a position to do so, to agree to exchange visits with Soviet leaders and to keep open the door for real negotiations at such time as both sides are more ready for them. At the Four Power talks it became clear that for the West it was probably disadvantageous to conclude much publicized minor agreements while major issues such as German reunification could not be resolved. But in bilateral diplomacy it should prove much easier to reach agreement on relatively minor points without the risk of nourishing dangerous illusions in Western public opinion and facing a relaxation, as the London Times has said, not of international tensions but of Western will.

7. This is a serious dilemma both for the Western Powers and presumably for the Soviet Union which may also have had problems within its alliance because of the summer "thaw". For if the major problem is avoiding nuclear war and maintaining Western security is the reduction of tension through the gradual settlement of conflicting national interests and the growth of confidence between East and West, it would be tragic if even the minor agreements that now may be possible were continually to be spurned for fear of encouraging wishful thinking. For years Western leaders have been advocating a "step by step" approach to East-West negotiations; and if bilateral diplomacy, either through visits or by means of conventional diplomatic intercourse, makes it possible to take the smaller steps first, it would be wrong to block it. At the same time there is no present evidence that the U.S.S.R. genuinely desires to negotiate seriously on political questions, even minor ones.

8. So much for the methods of post Geneva diplomacy. As to the fields of negotiation, it seems probably the Soviet Union may now wish to let purely European questions simmer for some months. They have said repeatedly in recent weeks that the time is not ripe for a solution to the German question. There is nothing in the evidence of the Geneva Conference to indicate that by tinkering with Western security proposals they might safely be adjusted enough to induce the U.S.S.R. to agree to permit the Germans to choose unification within NATO.

9. As for disarmament, much will depend on the conclusions to be reached by the United States National Security Council and by the President in their current review of United States disarmament policies. During this ten month soul searching, the Western position on disarmament has been uncertain, equivocal and, from a propaganda point of view, deplorable. The failure of the Foreign Ministers at Geneva to agree on Germany and European Security gave the Western Foreign Ministers a much needed excuse to gloss over the disarmament item on which they felt themselves to be on thin ice. Negotiations will in any case continue in the Disarmament Sub-Committee of the United Nations so that there is no special need here, either for resumption of Four Powers Talks or for some other means of continuing to probe the possibilities of agreement, dim though they seem to be.

10. The development of East-West contacts offers us perhaps the most fruitful field for practical bilateral negotiations not only among the Big Four but between the Soviet Union and other Western countries. The U.S.S.R. clearly desire, chiefly for political reasons, to develop their trade with Western countries. It may also be possible to work out a pattern of reciprocal exchanges of visits and ideas in a way which will on the whole foster Western interests and lower some portions of the Iron Curtain. It was in this field that minor agreements might have been reached in Geneva, not merely on general objectives (as was perhaps possible on disarmament) but on detailed practical proposals. The opportunity for consolidating such agreements on a selective basis while the U.S.S.R. is still in a mood to offer them should not be missed. This means, however, that further contacts should be developed in a way which will clearly advance Western — and not just Russian interests.

11. Bilateral diplomacy will also permit some Western statesmen to discuss such subjects as the Middle East and the Far East which were "untouchable" at Geneva in a Four Power context. If these are to be the areas of greatest Soviet activity in coming months, there may also be openings for adjustments of interest acceptable to both sides in terms of the power politics the Soviet leaders now seem determined to play.

12. It seems likely that on both sides the next few months may be a period of cautious re-assessment of the "new" relations between the two blocs. On the Soviet side there must certainly be some questioning of the adequacy of the new tactics and uncertainty about the distance that should be travelled in the direction of a détente. The solidarity of the West must have surprised the Russians at Geneva. But incipient intra-western quarrels must also give them hope that even in a relatively static period the divisive tendencies in the Western alliance might take firmer shape.

13. On our side, what is primarily required is a tightening of the political alliance in order to prevent too great a slackening of the military effort. With this must come a more realistic appraisal of the best ways to meet the Soviet tactics of this interim period. If the Russians decide simply to be reasonably pleasant, but unco-operative, in Europe, it may be as difficult to maintain the picture of an immediate Soviet threat as it was in the full "thaw" at the Summit Conference. And finally, there is the necessity to decide whether our German policies are good enough to withstand the strain of political and nationalist pressure in the coming years.

IMPLICATIONS OF M.C. 48

Background

You will recall that, when M.C. 48 was submitted by the Military Committee to the NATO Ministerial Meeting last December, we expressed concern that member governments should be asked to take a decision of this importance at such short notice and without adequate consideration of the serious implications of the Military Committee's recommendations.<sup>99</sup> Various means for allowing further study by governments were discussed in this Department, and between this Department and the Department of National Defence. This Division in particular suggested that the Council should not at that time approve the Military Committee's conclusions, but should agree that further military studies could proceed for the time being on the assumption that nuclear weapons would be used, provided this did not pre-judge the final decision by governments. We pointed out that this report was only the first in a series of studies whose purpose was to re-assess the previously accepted bases of NATO defence planning, and that the decision to use nuclear weapons from the outset in the case of hostilities was a conclusion that should flow from, rather than precede, this re-assessment.

2. In opposition to this thesis, and in favour of approving M.C. 48, it was argued:

(a) that the Council was not being asked to approve the actual use of nuclear weapons, but only to authorize the military authorities to plan and make preparations on the assumption that such weapons would be used;

(b) that nuclear weapons could in any case be used by the United States, at the direction of the President, regardless of any NATO decision;

(c) that SACEUR was unable to defend Western Europe successfully with the conventional forces in existence and planned; that governments would have either to increase their contributions of conventional forces (which they were plainly unwilling to do) or to permit SACEUR to arm his forces with nuclear weapons; and

(d) that it was impractical for SACEUR to prepare plans on the basis of alternative strategies, conventional and nuclear, and to shift from one to the other.

Decision on M.C. 48

3. In actual fact, the Ministerial meeting did approve M.C. 48 in the following terms (Document CF(54)50, paragraph 42):

"The Council approved the Military Committee's report (M.C. 48 Final) as a basis for defence planning and preparations by the NATO military authorities, noting that this approval did not involve the delegation of the responsibility of governments for putting plans into action in the event of hostilities."

4. The meaning of the phrase "as a basis for defence planning" is to be found in the following conclusions extracted from the report:

(a) "It is militarily essential that NATO forces should be able to use atomic and thermonuclear weapons in their defence and that NATO military authorities should be authorized to plan and make preparations on the assumption that atomic and thermonuclear weapons will be used in defence from the outset";

(b) "Should war occur, the best defence against atomic attack lies in the ability of the Allied nations to reduce the threat at the source by immediate and intensive counter-attack"; and

(c) "Priority must be given to the provision of forces in being capable of effectively contributing to success in the initial phases" and "which will have an integrated atomic capability."

5. The meaning of the phrase "as a basis for ... preparations" is clear from the following "minimum measures" outlined in M.C. 48 as being necessary to increase the deterrent and defensive value of NATO forces:

(a) the provision of "an integrated atomic capability" (i.e., the ability to integrate the delivery of atomic weapons with the delivery of present type weapons);

(b) the provision of a fully effective alert system;

(c) steps to give forces the maximum possible warning of attack;

(d) the allocation of high priority to "forces in being"; and

(e) dispersal and redeployment measures to enable NATO forces to survive atomic attack.

Interpretations of this Decision

6. During the discussion of M.C. 48 the following ministers offered their interpretations of the qualification contained in the last part of the Council's decision:

(a) Mr. Dulles described in the following terms the responsibility that should be reserved to governments: "It is important that the responsibility should be vested in those who are able to judge from their own position that the attack is of a nature to call for certain types of defence, and who will be able to prevent minor outbreaks, which might be judged grave by those immediately involved, from becoming an unnecessary cause for a war of vast dimensions, where that was not the purpose and will of the enemy and where the situation might be dealt with by limited rather than all-out defence."

(b) Mr. Temple (France) said he understood the Council resolution left to the political authorities the decision whether or not atomic weapons were to be used in case of need.

(c) Mr. Martino (Italy) said he considered the Council's decision could not prejudice in any way the right which member governments retained of taking the political decisions necessary for the effective implementation of the military plans.

(d) Mr. Pearson said he did not want the impression to be created that "any hostile move of any kind would be met by the use of such (i.e., thermonuclear) weapons."

7. General Gruenther also put on record, in a briefing given to the Permanent Council just before the Ministerial meeting, his understanding of what approval of M.C. 48 would mean. His comments were summarized in the Council record as follows:

"It is unquestionably a political decision to decide whether or not there is an act of war, and there is no thought in our headquarters that there should be a military decision — and certainly not one that our headquarters should make. But it having been decided that there was an act of war, and that it was an all-out act of war, and not simply a local war, he felt it was not feasible to go to this or that strategy."

8. It was thus the clear intention of all concerned that unqualified approval for the use of nuclear weapons by NATO forces should not be given in advance and regardless of the nature of the threat posed. But the Council did not attempt to define with any precision either the nature of the circumstances in which their use would be justified, or the procedure to be followed in authorizing such use. Consequently it is possible to interpret the effect of the Council's decision in two alternative ways:

either (a) once member governments have decided that there is an all-out aggression, they will decide on belligerent action and that decision in itself will be sufficient authority for the military to use nuclear weapons as and when the situation requires; or (b) having decided on belligerent action, member countries will still be free to decide when, or where, nuclear weapons are appropriate to meet the aggression.

9. In practice, the distinction between these two approaches is likely to be more apparent than real. In both cases the crucial point is the matter of judgment as to where the line should be drawn between limited aggression and all-out aggression. Whether the decision on this point is described as a decision on "belligerent action" or a decision on "the use of nuclear weapons" becomes academic once the NATO forces have been so organized that the only large-scale defence they can put up is a nuclear defence. In other words, the very approval which the Council has given to the NATO military authorities to plan and make preparations on the basis of M.C. 48 (see paragraphs 5 and 6 above) will condition any eventual decision regarding the use of these weapons. The scale of border incident with which SACEUR will be able to deal with conventional means will inevitably be restricted, and a decision to put up resistance on a large scale will necessarily mean a decision to fight with nuclear weapons. Whether this result is good or bad is a matter for argument, but it seems to flow inexorably from the Council's approval of M.C. 48. It does, however, underline the advisability of working out an effective "alerts" procedure. Consideration might also be given in this connection to the possibility of defining the "general alert" more precisely in relation to the use of nuclear weapons.

10. It should be noted that no distinction was drawn either in M.C. 48 or in the Ministerial meeting that approved it, between the "tactical" and the "strategic" use of nuclear weapons. It is true that all the forces at present under SACEUR's command are likely to use atomic bombs only in a tactical way, with the possible exception of the 14th USAF Bomber Group in the United Kingdom. However, this latter force could, as far as is known, be used to bomb communications centres deep in Eastern Europe, and in any case there is no reason why elements of the U.S. Strategic Air Command could not be put under SACEUR in wartime.

Role of the United States

11. This leads to what is perhaps the most important aspect of this whole question. The decision on M.C. 48 deals only with the NATO forces and can itself have no effect on the forces remaining under national command. In other words, although NATO member governments have reserved to themselves the right of collective decision with respect to the implementation of NATO nuclear defence plans and preparations, the right of the United States to commit the Strategic Air Command to battle as part of any NATO defensive action is subject to no collective review or control. It is therefore quite possible to envisage a situation in which the NATO forces in Europe would be fighting a strictly limited defensive action, pending a decision by the Council with respect to the magnitude of the threat, while the U.S. President, having come to the conclusion that this was a case of all-out aggression, would have ordered the Strategic Air Force to bomb the Soviet Union. It would clearly be desirable to try to establish some procedure of consultation in this regard, perhaps initially among the United States, United Kingdom and ourselves, as Mr. Wilgress has suggested, covering the strategic use of nuclear weapons.

NATO Infrastructure

12. The practical implications of this nuclear defence concept for NATO defence plans and preparations are already to be seen in the modifications that SACEUR has proposed in the NATO airfields programme. Since dispersal and concealment are essential means of defence under conditions of nuclear warfare, projects to provide a "fully operational airfield for each atomic delivery squadron and each of their direct support reconnaissance squadron" will be included in the programmes recommended to SHAPE by subordinate commands for the 1956 programme (Seventh Slice), or in proposal for conversion of existing airfields. SACEUR, in his tentative guidance, recommended that airfields for these squadrons should have the following additional facilities:

"(1) capability for local widespread dispersal of individual airplanes in the vicinity of each airfield to maximum extent practicable;

(2) maximum practicable combination of physical protection, camouflage and concealment for individual aircraft, equipment, supplies and personnel;

(3) minimum of one alternate means of take-off accessible from dispersal areas to preclude elimination of unit from operations through damage to regular runway. These means can be airstrips, highways, fields from which rocket-assisted take-offs can be achieved, etc."

13. SACEUR has proposed that these airfields might be provided by the assignment and modification of suitably located alternative and redeployment airfields, already programmed as part of common infrastructure, by the development of available and suitable national airfields to squadron standards, and only last through the construction of airfields at wholly new sites, if necessary.

14. We will not have an indication of the exact number of wholly new airfields that will be necessary for the support of these squadrons, nor of the total number which will be required for all types of squadrons under the new dispersal policy until this policy has been approved and subordinate commanders have made their recommendations on how it can be carried out. SHAPE's new approach policy has yet to be considered by the Standing Group although we understand that Standing Group approval is expected in the near future.

15. SACEUR bases his proposals on the approval by the Council of M.C. 48, in which it was stated that in the event of war the primary tasks of the NATO forces would be not only to survive the enemy's initial attacks, but also to retaliate immediately with atomic weapons. It would be necessary for NATO to take measures, among other things, to "ensure to the maximum extent possible the security of their vitally important strategic air forces and atomic striking forces in Europe. The most important measures to be taken are the establishment of a satisfactory alert system, the improvement of intelligence and communications, the initiative of adequate active and passive air defence measures, and the dispersion of vital atomic delivery forces." It would also be necessary to "ensure that in the event of aggression NATO forces would be able to initiate immediate defensive and retaliatory operations including the use of atomic weapons."

16. At a meeting on May 18, 1955, of the Military Representatives' Committee with the North Atlantic Council, General Truesdell, Deputy U.S. member of the MRC, reported on the conversion of NATO tactical airfield infrastructure to "atomic posture." General Truesdell stated that, in view of the fact that M.C. 48 had been approved for planning purposes, General Gruenther was "certainly doing his job in coming to the Standing Group with a recommendation of how he planned to get around the fact that one atomic bomb could knock out a whole group."

17. The Standing Group has pointed out that any change in the air defensive posture, after it receives approval from the military viewpoint, will also require searching examination by the Council. The Standing Group considers that it must be ensured that the best use is made of the limited remaining infrastructure funds and that the internal financial effects on host countries of disturbance of current national income by any interruption of infrastructure must be considered. The Standing Group also realizes that any change in policy which will require the acquisition of additional land will have serious political effects.

18. The Standing Group has urged SACEUR to expedite the completion of his redeployment studies in order that a full operational analysis of the whole problem may be made.

Conclusions

19. By its decision on M.C. 48, the NATO Council approved in principle the reorganization of the NATO forces necessary to enable them to fight with nuclear weapons in defence against all-out aggression. At the same time SACEUR was authorized to draw up the detailed plans and to recommend the physical preparations required for this purpose. These plans and preparations will, of course, have to be approved in the normal way by the appropriate NATO bodies and preparations requiring additional expenditures or the movement of troops will require approval by member governments. In other words, the policy has been approved but its detailed implementation will still be subject to the normal control and supervision of the NATO Council and its subordinate bodies.

20. The NATO Council reserved to itself the power to decide whether a given threat was such that SACEUR's defence plans should be put into action (i.e., whether or not a given attack was part of an all-out aggression). However, the Council did not define the relationship between this decision and the decision concerning a "general alert" under the NATO alerts procedures, and this relationship could usefully be clarified.

21. Regardless of such a NATO decision, however, the United States is free to take independent action with the Strategic Air Command which could in fact pre-determine the course of events. Perhaps the most fruitful avenue of approach to this problem is the proce-ture of consultation on intelligence "indications" which is at present being worked out between the United States, the United Kingdom and ourselves.<sup>100</sup>

OCTOBER MEETING OF NATO DEFENCE MINISTERS

Telegram No. 1115 of September 21† from our NATO Delegation in Paris (copy attached) gives an outline of the proposed programme for the NATO Defence Ministers' Conference in Paris which commences on October 10. The public announcement of this meeting calls it "a preliminary conference between Defence Ministers in preparation for the regular Ministerial session of the NATO Council towards the end of the year." The meeting is purposely represented as having a routine character in order to avoid giving the public the impression that there is some connection between it and the Geneva Conference at the end of October.

2. The meetings will start with a briefing by SACEUR followed by briefings from each of the Commands about their respective problems. This briefing will include statements on North American Defence problems including a brief by the U.S. Commander-in-Chief Continental Air Defence. The Canadian Chiefs of Staff have approved the outline of the Commander-in-Chief's proposed statement on condition that it includes the following statement:

"The rôles of the Canada-United States air defence effort, one of which is that of providing early warning and protection for the retaliatory forces of NATO nations, considered to be major deterrents to war."

3. General Gruenther will report on the steps which are being taken within his Command in accordance with MC-48, "to secure an integrated atomic capability for instantaneous use". Under "survival measures" he will discuss the atomic posture for his air forces, and will deal especially with a number of measures to be taken in the immediate future aimed at a further dispersal of Air Force units to enable them to survive atomic attack.

4. A study prepared on this subject will be examined by Standing Group in due course and it is expected that Canada will be asked for its comments before its recommendations are finally approved. Meanwhile some of the infrastructure plans are being altered where immediate action is necessary to halt the construction of lengthy runways which are no longer considered desirable under the dispersal programme.

The Minister — for information J. L[éger]

5. There will thus be plenty of opportunity for the NATO Military authorities and the Defence Ministers to discuss MC-48 and its implications for the future in NATO Defence Planning although, of course, no decisions will be taken or agreements reached at the October Conference.

6. It occurred to me that you may wish to have a word beforehand with Mr. Campney personally about your misgivings concerning the interpretation and implications of the Council's action last December in approving MC-48 "as a basis for defence planning and preparations by the NATO Military authorities". You will recall that I sent you a Departmental memorandum (attached) on this subject last July.<sup>101</sup>

7. It appears to us that SACEUR is not exceeding the authority invested in him by the Council in making plans and preparations attuned to the new atomic strategy. However, the main question which needs clarification is whether it is understood by the NATO Commanders that the approval of MC-48 still reserves to governments the right to decide whether SACEUR's defence plans are to be put into effect including the decision of whether atomic weapons are to be used depending on whether the nature and extent of the threat is deemed to warrant general war as against a limited threat which could be localized.

CONFERENCE OF DEFENCE MINISTERS WITH NATO MILITARY AUTHORITIES — OCTOBER 10-12

In our telegram under reference we outlined the proposed programme. Copies of the summary records are being forwarded to you. However, in the meantime, you may wish to have our general impressions of the meeting. It was emphasized at the outset that the conference was to be devoted to briefings given by the various area commanders, with particular reference to the military implications of recent Soviet "peaceful" gestures in the field of international affairs. The conference was not intended to replace in any way the regular December meeting nor was it to be publicized as a significant pre-Geneva gesture. This was, in fact, the way in which the conference developed. There were few questions asked by the Ministers on the individual briefs presented.

2. At the end of the briefings and before the general discussion periods, the Standing Group summarized their position, and emphasized that, in contrast to the international political atmosphere of "smiles and garden parties", the Soviet bloc is increasing its military potential at a marked pace while the military strength of NATO is at best static if not retrogressing in both quality and quantity. He pointed out that NATO estimates of Russian knowledge in the field of atomic weapons, and in the field of production capabilities, including aircraft, have proven wrong. Document MC. 48 remains the basic planning document of the NATO Military authorities, but the Standing Group warned the conference that, should NATO military strength decrease any further, either actually or relatively, they will be unable to plan on a forward strategy, which as you know, includes the closing of the Baltic exit. (Incidentally, the importance of the latter was repeatedly stressed by each of the officers presenting briefs). Moreover, General Whitely stated that, while the outcome of the first or total nuclear stage of the war will probably be decisive in its effects, conventional forces will still be necessary. Ministers were therefore asked to resist pressures for the decrease of defence spending.

3. The Standing Group then summarized their most pressing problems as follows:

(1) The need for a co-ordinated Air Defence Command System. While NATO Military authorities recognize the concern of national governments on this point, they consider that there is really no alternative to some co-ordinated system. They suggested that initially four commands might be set up, suitably linked with each other, and delineated so as to recognize existing command problems in the NATO area (i.e. commands would be: Northern, United Kingdom, Central and South-Mediterranean).

(2) The early warning system in Europe is inadequate and has top priority.

(3) Deficiencies in naval equipment and spare parts are particularly obvious at this time.

(4) Logistic support facilities must be developed further. Moreover, the Standing Group pointed out that some nations have not maintained stock piles previously agreed to in Document C-M(53)47 (final) as being essential to bridging the inevitable gap between the onset of war and the functioning of these facilities.

4. General Collins then indicated that Document M.C. 48/1 will shortly be in the hands of national military authorities as a supplement to M.C. 48. The new document deals with problems of stage two of the type of warfare envisaged, and deals with naval problems, survival and dispersal, and logistic support.

5. From our point of view, the brief given by the Canada-United States regional planning group was effective as an educational exercise in problems of North American defence, although General Partridge tended to gloss over some of the difficulties and he did not emphasize enough the NATO character of North American defence. This latter was later brought out by General Gruenther and again by Mr. Campney when he spoke during the general discussion. General Partridge explained the early warning system and the interlocking of air defence commands in sufficient detail to present a clear picture to those members of the conference who were not versed in this subject and also to impress European NATO members with the necessity of achieving co-ordination of air defence on a comparable scale. It is interesting to note that General Gruenther gave strong support to General Partridge's emphasis on the importance of North American defence, and more specifically, the early warning system, as an integral part of the overall NATO defence. You may also be interested in the following quotation from a Soviet source used by General Partridge during his presentation: Text begins:

"War to the hilt between communism and capitalism is inevitable. To-day, of course, we are not strong enough to attack. Our time will come in twenty or thirty years. To win we shall need the element of surprise. The people will have to be put to sleep, so we shall begin by launching the most spectacular peace movement on record. There will be electrifying overtures and unheard of concessions. The capitalist countries, stupid and decadent, will rejoice to co-operate in their own destruction. They will leap at another chance to be friends. As soon as their guard is down, we shall smash them with our clenched fists." Text ends.

This is a statement made by Dimitry Manuilski, before the Lenin School of Political Warfare in 1931. Manuilski was later Foreign Minister of the Ukraine and as such participated in the United Nations General Assembly during its first four sessions.

6. General Gruenther's presentation was made with vigour and enthusiasm. He emphasized the positive aspects of the NATO position as well as the negative. This was perhaps a fortunate contrast to the discouraging note sounded by the other commanders, apart from General Partridge, whose method of presentation did not encourage discussion and who were too pessimistic. General Gruenther affirmed his belief that if war broke out, NATO would win, but he emphasized that this referred only to the present condition of NATO and could not apply if the present apparent decrease in its relative strength continued or if its unity was further threatened.

7. Lastly, the general ignorance and even apathy towards NATO which exists in countries of the alliance was mentioned several times during the course of the conference. I have mentioned it myself recently in the Council, and General Gruenther devoted some time to this aspect of NATO's problems. He quoted a public opinion survey made recently in NATO countries to bear out his point, and emphasized that NATO does at the moment have a significant element of security, and that governments of member countries should try to do more to increase the confidence of their peoples in our bargaining power vis-à-vis the Soviet bloc.

8. We shall be sending you later a telegram summarising the discussion which took place in restricted session following the presentation of the military briefs.

CONFERENCE OF DEFENCE MINISTERS WITH NATO MILITARY AUTHORITIES

After the presentation of the military briefs, the Defence Ministers met in restricted session to discuss the points brought out by the military authorities. This discussion was commenced late in the afternoon of October 11, and continued the next morning.

2. The Defence Minister of the Netherlands led off with a well-thought out prepared statement. He referred to the probably new structure of divisions and common air defence. He stressed that additional financial burdens were likely to be placed on nations, and proposed a comprehensive view of force requirements with a view to the setting out by the military authorities of priorities. The Chairman of the Standing Group intervened with a brief statement stating that they had always regarded the determination of priorities as a national responsibility. What he really meant was that the Standing Group had refrained from indicating negative priorities unless specifically requested by the national authorities concerned.

3. Mr. Selwyn Lloyd of the United Kingdom made an effective speech indicating that in his view the top priority was the deterrent, and he included in this the early warning system both in North America and Europe. The second priority was the shield constituted by the NATO forces, and here the need was to stress quality rather than quantity. In his view there was now less need to spend money on forces not likely to be engaged in the initial phase.

4. The Italian Defence Minister followed, and took up the point raised by the Netherlands Minister. He thought the military authorities should give a more precise indication of requirements and of the priorities of these requirements. The Belgian Defence Minister raised the question of conventional forces, and asked what revisions were necessary. General Billotte, the new French Defence Minister, in his intervention dealt mainly with the importance to NATO of the re-establishment of orders in North Africa. Mr. Campney followed, and his remarks were designed to indicate the importance to NATO as a whole of the air defence of North America.

5. When the meeting resumed on October 12, the Norwegian Defence Minister referred to the proposal made by the Netherlands Minister on the previous day, and gave it his support. Lord Ismay asked the Standing Group if they could give an indication of the military attitude towards the widely-held current view that conventional forces could be considerably reduced. The Chairman of the Standing Group stated that they would submit a written report on the subject as soon as possible.

6. Lord Ismay then referred to the prevailing ignorance about NATO to which General Gruenther had called attention, and asked Defence Ministers to make a special effort to acquaint their troops with the aims and objects of NATO. General Collins and Mr. Campney outlined what is being done in this connection by the United States and Canada.

7. The Portuguese Defence Minister made some comments on their particular position with regard to air defence. Lord Ismay commented that he had recently received a memorandum from the Portuguese Government on this subject which would be discussed by the Permanent Council at an early opportunity. The Turkish Permanent Representative, in the absence of the Defence Minister, stressed the gravity of the situation in the Middle East. Mr. Wilson delivered a rather discursive speech dealing with some of the points brought out in the discussion. In particular, he stressed the continuing need for conventional forces. On the subject of priorities, he said a balance would have to be reached between the cost of replacement and maintenance of equipment and the maintenance of existing forces.

8. After brief interventions by the German Under-Secretary and the Danish Permanent Representative, the conference took up the question of priorities which had been raised at the outset by the Netherlands Defence Minister and supported by a number of the other Defence Ministers. General Collins, on behalf of the Standing Group, gave an indication as to the present method of revising force goals through the annual review. He stated he did not believe there was any quick or early solution to the point made by the Netherlands Minister. It would not be possible to give list of priorities which would be applicable at the same time to, say Denmark and Turkey. He believed that the annual review process remained the most effective way of working out the priority problem. When, however, there were genuine divergencies in the recommendations made by two commanders, the Standing Group could be appealed to for advice. This reply did not satisfy the Italian Defence Minister who proposed a comprehensive review of force goals and priorities. General Valluy, the French member of the Standing Group, outlined the working methods of the Standing Group and gave as an example the current studies as to how a major unit should be composed. Before it could be known whether a review of force goals would be necessary, a conclusion would have to be reached as to what type of unit would be best adapted to future conditions. This would take some time since the military authorities have to complete the arduous but essential experiments now in progress.

9. Lord Ismay summed up by stating that apparently there had been a misunderstanding. In his opinion the Lisbon force goals had been replaced by the force goals established by each annual review. He thought the proposal as to whether there should be a comprehensive review of force goals and priorities might be referred to the Council in permanent session for further study. He then succeeded in securing from the Standing Group their agreement that if military recommendations, based on urgent requirement, involved expenditure additional to that which could be provided, the military authorities would suggest cuts in other fields to offset this additional expenditure. The conference agreed with the proposal of Lord Ismay and invited the Permanent Council to consider the matter further. This was obviously a means of disposing of an awkward question since it is unlikely more than the present system is warranted, although the discussion may have served the useful purpose of bringing to the attention of the military authorities the need for suggesting directions in which economies in defence expenditures may be undertaken in order to deal with additional commitments of an urgent character.<sup>102</sup>

ECONOMIC COLLABORATION IN NATO — ARTICLE 2

We have recently been giving renewed consideration to the possibility of making some moves toward the implementation of Article 2 in the field of economic collaboration. In the past, studies on implementation in the Department have centred on the question of whether NATO might take over a measure of international responsibility for certain subjects and it was discovered that, almost without exception, they were better handled in other organizations, where machinery had been set up to deal with them and where the membership was more appropriate. While we have always been in agreement with this view, it leaves open one very pertinent question.

2. The second sentence of Article 2, as Mr. Robertson pointed out in his letter of February 11, 1954, is a positive statement of international policy requiring member countries to "seek to eliminate conflict in their international policies and ... encourage economic collaboration between any or all of them". It is apparent that this statement of policy cannot be invoked in other organizations. Unless it is exactly invoked in NATO it can only remain a faint call on the conscience of member countries which has and may be expected to continue to dwindle in strength as the years pass.

3. What we are now considering is the possibility of providing for discussion on the broad politico-economic aspects of economic collaboration in the NATO Council — preferably at ministerial level. The procedure for the discussion of political issues is a good precedent although economic issues raise separate and more complicated problems.

4. The best method to initiate thought and discussion of economic collaboration raises a series of problems. One avenue of approach might be through the Annual Review process. This general question could be the subject of a special study to be conducted initially by the international staff and reviewed by a special Working Group or the Annual Review Committee itself if necessary. It could then be mentioned, along with other issues, in the general chapter of this year's Annual Review Report. This method may present an opportunity for NATO to take official cognizance of the economic provisions of Article 2. Without setting up any special machinery to examine these questions, a review of the situation could be prepared for the information of ministers when they were considering the Annual Review at the December meeting of the Council. This would afford the opportunity for any minister, who so desired, to raise a question pertaining to economic collaboration.

5. We are not unmindful of the difficulties connected with the preparation of the Review on Economic Collaboration, but in our view a review which could serve as a basis for discussion could be drawn up. We do not have in mind any particular aspect of the question of economic collaboration which we would wish to raise at the Council meeting next December. That would depend on the circumstances prevailing at the time. We feel, however, that the matter should be approached cautiously. For example, the ministerial discussions might not, at this stage, result in any positive recommendations to individual countries. They would serve to keep the Article 2 provisions alive and as a minimum we might wish to say that the special study had served a useful purpose and that we would hope that it would be continued in the future as a regular part of the Annual Review process.

6. While we might not have anything to say next December, a number of countries could have points to raise. We would then begin to have a useful discussion in NATO of the broader aspects of the economic policies of member countries particularly with regard to political considerations and objectives. This should serve to supplement, and thus give clear direction to, what is being done in other international organizations and should not in any way conflict with the work of these other bodies.

7. My immediately following telegram gives the draft text of a memorandum which the Canadian Delegation might submit to the Annual Review Committee proposing a special study on economic collaboration. We would request your authority to sound out, first of all, a number of other delegations and then, if they do not offer too much opposition to the whole idea, to submit the memorandum officially. We should like to have your instructions without undue delay as it would be necessary to submit the memorandum before March 24, when the preparatory work for the first stage of the Annual Review process should be nearing completion.

ECONOMIC COLLABORATION IN NATO — ARTICLE 2

Following is text of draft memorandum on the subject of special study on economic collaboration referred to in my immediately preceding telegram.

Text Begins:

Article 2 of the North Atlantic Treaty envisages broadly two fields of cooperation between NATO countries. One of these is cooperation in regard to information policies, cultural and social relations, which is the field now being covered by the NATO Committee on Information and Cultural Relations. The other is that of economic collaboration, for which Article 2 provides that:

"The parties will contribute toward the further development of peaceful and friendly international relations ... by promoting conditions of stability and well being. They will seek to eliminate conflict in their international economic policies and will encourage economic collaboration between any or all of them".

2. Neither the Council nor any of its Committees has ever examined the situation with respect to the carrying out of the above provisions. The reason given is that economic cooperation is the prerogative of other bodies, having a membership wider than NATO but with which most of the NATO countries are associated. The most important of these other bodies is the Organization for European Economic Cooperation (OEEC), of which Canada and the United States are associate members and all of the other NATO countries are full members. Other international organizations that come into question in this connection are the International Monetary Fund (IMF), the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development, the Economic Commission for Europe (ECE), and the Contracting Parties to the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade. (GATT).

3. It is the view of the Canadian Delegation that NATO can no longer afford to leave entirely to these other international organizations the carrying out of the economic provisions of Article 2 of the treaty, of which they are not able to take official cognizance by reason of the fact that their memberships are wider than NATO. The Canadian Delegation would not propose that any special machinery be set up to examine these questions, but simply that a review of the situation be prepared for the information of ministers when they are considering the annual review at the December meeting of the Council. This would then afford an opportunity for a minister, if he so wished, to raise any question pertaining to economic collaboration under the provisions of Article 2 of the treaty.

4. The review of the situation referred to in the preceding paragraph could take the form of a special study in connection with the annual review process. Either on the basis of replies to a questionnaire or on the basis of speeches and other declarations delivered at OEEC, IMF, the Bank, ECE and GATT, the International Staff could prepare brief summaries of the economic policies of each of the NATO countries. This could be followed by a résumé pointing out apparent conflicts in economic policies between the different NATO countries and the openings for economic collaboration between any or all of them. The special study would be an objective and factual document and would be discussed in and approved by the Annual Review Committee before presentation to Council.

5. The Canadian Delegation presents this proposal for the consideration of the Annual Review Committee. Text ends.

ARTICLE 2 OF THE NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY:
ECONOMIC COLLABORATION

In his telegrams numbers 216 and 217 of February 23 Mr. Wilgress put forward proposals for periodic discussion in the North Atlantic Council, preferably at the ministerial level, on the broad politico-economic aspects of economic collaboration. After serious consideration in this Department and after consultation with the Departments of Finance and Trade and Commerce, we informed Mr. Wilgress in our telegram number 299 of March 23† that we could not agree that he should submit his proposal to the Council at this time. We also promised to let him have a fuller explanation by despatch.

2. I think it would be desirable for this amplification of our position to come from you. I therefore attach for your signature, if you approve, a despatch outlining the main considerations on which our conclusion was based and attaching copies of letters from the other two departments containing their views.

3. The considerations outlined in paragraphs 2 to 5 of this despatch are the same as those which led us to decide against endorsing Mr. Wilgress's proposal in referring it to the other departments for comments. You will recall that I showed you at the time the departmental memorandum in which these were discussed.<sup>103</sup>

ARTICLE 2 OF THE NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY:
ECONOMIC COLLABORATION

I am sorry that we were not able to endorse your proposal for implementing Article 2 in the field of economic collaboration at this time. I realize that we in Ottawa appear to turn down initiatives such as this more often than not and that it might be disheartening to those like yourself who are convinced that NATO must be more than a military alliance, and must show that it is, if it is to endure. I myself am, of course, of this conviction. The general objective which you had in mind appealed to us and we gave it very serious consideration, with particular emphasis on your suggestion that provision should be made for periodic discussion in the North Atlantic Council, preferably at the ministerial level, on the broad politico-economic aspects of economic collaboration. We regarded your specific suggestion for doing this through the Annual Review process as only one possible method and not essential to your main proposal. The more we looked at it, however, the more we saw the practical difficulties which it involved and we were finally forced to conclude reluctantly that they were insuperable, for the time being at least.

2. In the first place, if Canada put forward such a suggestion, we should be under some obligation to take a lead in the discussions in the Permanent Council and especially in Ministerial meetings. However, we saw little or no chance that the other ministers<sup>105</sup> most directly concerned would feel able to take a personal interest in such discussions and it was even doubtful whether they would normally be able to attend future Ministerial meetings.

3. In the second place, we found it difficult to see how any survey of economic policies and problems prepared for such discussions could avoid dealing with the fundamental difference of approach between Canada and to a lesser extent the United States, on the one hand, and the European member countries, on the other, with respect to the economic and commercial policy that should govern relations within Western Europe and between that area and North America. We felt that further discussion on this matter in NATO would be likely to give rise to the same recrimination, ill-feeling and embarrassment that it has already done in the OEEC and GATT, and to harden further the positions previously adopted.

4. Moreover, although discussion of this problem in NATO might enable us to put it into the context of broader political and strategic considerations, it is unlikely that such considerations would be allowed by the European member countries to influence in any appreciable way their existing economic policies. Indeed, some of us felt that to introduce this controversial issue into NATO might conceivably affect adversely the already existing political and military cooperation between member countries.

5. There might be special economic problems which from time to time could usefully be discussed in the North Atlantic Council in order to relate them to the political and strategic aspects of the alliance, but we considered that this could be done on an ad hoc basis under existing procedures without making special provision for it as you suggested.

6. In the process of our consideration of your proposal we consulted the Departments of Finance and Trade and Commerce. I attach copies of the letters† outlining their views.

ARTICLE 2 OF THE NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY

I do not like the attached draft despatch to our NATO representative in Paris, which turns down his suggestion that the Permanent Council should examine the Article in its economic co-operation aspects as part of the Annual Review procedure. I think that our attitude is too negative in this matter, and I am sorry that telegram No. 299 of March 24 was sent.

I would like to discuss the matter with you and those concerned in the Department before leaving for Paris. Meanwhile, possibly we could let Mr. Wilgress know that notwithstanding our earlier telegram, the matter is being reconsidered.

ARTICLE II OF THE NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY

Attached is the memorandum which Mr. Ritchie has prepared for you on the feasibility of dealing with general economic questions on a NATO basis.

I have neither the time nor the knowledge to comment on the substance of the matter, but I must say that if the only role of Article II is to serve "as a guide for individual Member countries and as a basis for representations to particular countries if we feel that their economic policies are damaging the interests of other NATO countries", we might as well admit that its usefulness is practically nil. It would be interesting to know of a NATO country which has paid serious attention to this Article when formulating its economic policy.

If Article II means nothing else than this, I submit we should in all frankness call the whole operation off and cease to express high hopes about the implementation of this Article when we know that nothing will come of it.

There may, however, be specific fields of international economic activities where this Article could still play a useful role; it seems most improbable that such fields can ever be exploited if no opportunity is afforded NATO members even to discuss.<sup>106</sup>

ARTICLE II OF THE NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY

In connection with your suggestion that we should find out the extent to which NATO bodies may have already come to a conclusion regarding the feasibility of dealing with general economic questions on a NATO basis, we have now reviewed the various documents relating to the work of the Atlantic Community Committee in 1951 and 1952.<sup>107</sup>

As you will probably recall, section B of the Report by the Working Group of officials examined a great variety of economic matters which might be considered by NATO and concluded generally that it would "be most undesirable to try to discuss in the NATO forum all the important and complex subjects now under discussion or likely to be discussed in these other bodies. An attempt to do so would not only involve duplication of effort on the part of the NATO countries themselves, but might also be resented by the other bodies and more particularly by members of these bodies who are not also members of NATO. The NATO countries should clearly tread very warily in these fields." (Page 13 of Document AC/10-D/1 of October 30, 1951).

The Working Group did not go so far as to say that NATO should do nothing in these fields even though it raised doubts about whether NATO was sufficiently broad an organization for dealing effectively with most of the subjects involved. The Working Group held out the hope that the NATO Council Deputies might be able to have some useful discussions and remarked that "from time to time and under rather special circumstances, it might be possible to undertake a review within NATO ... of a certain field of international economic activities". The Working Group gave a good deal of emphasis to the usefulness of all NATO countries resolving "individually that their actions and attitudes in ... other bodies will never be in conflict with the terms and purposes of the North Atlantic Treaty".

The Ministerial Committee on the North Atlantic Community in its interim report of November 6, 1951, noted that "the importance of maintaining relations with free countries outside the North Atlantic area, and an appreciation that most international economic problems involve countries outside, were considerations that ran through the discussions of the Committee in the economic and financial field". (Page 10 of Document C8-D/6).

In its extensive report submitted to the Lisbon session of the Council, the Committee indicated that it was "conscious of the fact that questions of economic co-operation are already being examined by numerous international agencies, many of them with wider membership than NATO; and that duplication and unnecessary over-lapping should be avoided. The Committee is also conscious of the difficulty and even the danger of attempting to liberalise trading policies and practices within a group, the members of which have important trading relations with other countries and, in some cases, have already developed special and constructive arrangements with countries outside this group". (Page 3 of Document C9-D/8).

These excerpts may not contain quite as definite conclusions regarding the suitability of NATO as a forum for economic discussions as you would wish. Nevertheless, it would seem doubtful that any new exploration of this matter which might be undertaken at this time would produce a more satisfactory result.

I would only add that I think we should not underrate<sup>108</sup> the importance of Article II as a guide for individual Member countries and as a basis for representations to particular countries if we feel that their economic policies are damaging the interests of other NATO countries. A review of the exchanges which we, ourselves, have had with the U.S. Government concerning commercial policies or practices which we found objectionable gives some impression of the usefulness of that Article and of the general spirit which it embodies. For instance, in the memorandum which the Prime Minister presented to President Eisenhower in May of 1953, part of our argument was developed along the following lines:

"Through NATO the nations of the Atlantic Community have provided effective machinery of co-operation and are building a strong shield against aggression. Through the development of common institutions, such as those for the coal and steel industries and for defence, the countries of Western Europe are achieving increasing unity and strength. These accomplishments express the determination of the free peoples to maintain their security. In these efforts Canada has taken its part.

The question we must ask ourselves is — do these great accomplishments respecting our political unity and security rest on an adequate foundation? There is increasing evidence that they are being endangered by the crucial inadequacy of policies affecting international economic relations.”<sup>109</sup>

In subsequent exchanges regarding particular commodities, although we did not specifically invoke Article II, we repeatedly used arguments which were undoubtedly reinforced by the existence of this Article. Moreover, as you will recall, the terms of reference of the Joint U.S.-Canadian Committee on Trade and Economic Affairs stressed the role of that Committee in considering “matters affecting the harmonious economic relations between the two countries”.<sup>110</sup> This language represented an adaptation of the language of Article II relating to the “avoidance of conflict” in international economic policies. The activities of this Committee — to the extent that it is found to have a practical role to play — might properly be regarded as implementing the provisions of Article II which envisages such arrangements between “all or some” of the North Atlantic countries.

As you suggested, I am returning to you the draft despatch to Mr. Wilgress which I believe you intend to discuss with him while you are in Paris.

Paris, June 22, 1955

Dear Mr. Pearson,

ARTICLE 2 OF THE NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY:
ECONOMIC COLLABORATION

When you were in Paris during the first part of May for the meeting of the North Atlantic Council, you spoke to me about the above subject and asked me to consider carefully the memoranda which had been prepared in the Department and to let you have my views as to a possible alternative approach. The subject was again mentioned when I saw you at the Chanteclerc Hotel in Ste. Adèle-en-Haut on May 22nd.

I have carefully noted the main considerations which led the officials in Ottawa to recommend that you should not endorse the proposal set forth in my telegrams Nos. 216 and 217 of February 23rd. These are given in paragraph 3 of the memorandum of March 4th to the Under-Secretary from Defence Liaison (1) Division,<sup>111</sup> a copy of which you let me see when you were in Paris.

If I may say so, I think the officials in Ottawa have misunderstood my motive in putting forward the proposal. This is not to be wondered at because, as I see it, the tangible advantages to be gained from a discussion in NATO of the broad politico-economic aspects of economic collaboration are the political advantages; the less tangible and elusive ones are the economic advantages. The principal advantage would be to keep the second sentence of Article 2 alive as a positive instrument of international policy. Properly handled, this would help to engender gradually a sense of the North Atlantic Community which we are so desirous of fostering, as the sense of the European Community has been engendered among the members of OEEC by the discussions which have been taking place in that body. A subsidiary advantage would be that by keeping alive the second sentence of Article 2 as a positive instrument of international policy, useful resort might be taken of it on some later occasion.

In paragraph 3(a) of the departmental memorandum referred to above it is stated that if Canada put forward such a suggestion we would be under some obligation to take a lead in the NATO discussions, yet there is little or no expectation that either Mr. Harris or Mr. Howe would be prepared to interest themselves in such discussions or even to attend future ministerial meetings. Without being in any way disrespectful towards either Mr. Harris or Mr. Howe, my view is that you would be the most effective Minister to take the lead in such a discussion on account of your close identification with the idea of the North Atlantic Community. Without presuming to indicate the line you should take, I can see how you could make a very effective intervention by describing in general terms the realities behind the North Atlantic Community, such as the fact that the relations between the NATO countries constitute a very large proportion of world trade and that the policies of these countries have a decisive effect not only on trade between themselves but also on world trade generally (the so-called "nuclear approach"). You could then go on to elaborate how the well-being of the Community and the solidarity and strength of the Alliance can be fostered if the various NATO countries are able to collaborate closely in economic matters and avoid conflict in their international economic policies. It would probably not be wise for you to stress any particular area of conflict but to leave that for the other members of the Council. In other words, your leadership could be to place the consideration of the second sentence of Article 2 on the broad and high plane of politico-economic considerations, of which other countries could take advantage if they felt there was any specific area of conflict to which they wished to draw attention.

Paragraph 3(b) of the departmental memorandum argues that politico-economic discussions in NATO might give rise to "recrimination, ill-feeling and embarrassment". I do not agree that this would necessarily be the case. Much would depend on what was discussed and how it was handled. It is unlikely that the simple insertion of an Article 2 catalyst could alter entrenched positions and it would of course be unwise to stretch the Atlantic Community to the breaking point. If this was not done, however, there would appear to be no logical reason why a broad discussion of economic problems in the context of Article 2 might not build up an attachment for the Community principle. This could only be done, however, if difficult issues were approached carefully and tactfully. In the first instance, discussion might well centre on the positive achievements of our collaboration in different forums.

This four-part paragraph is reproduced as paragraphs 2 through 5 in the attachment to Document 221.

As regards paragraph 3(c) of the departmental memorandum, I agree, as already mentioned, that it is unlikely that a discussion of the major differences in economic policies in the context of broader political considerations would, in present circumstances, influence member countries in any direct way. There could be no question of carrying on economic negotiations in the NATO forum and this concept was certainly not intended in my telegrams Nos. 216 and 217. On the other hand, this opportunity for discussing Article 2 problems might serve as a useful means of modifying regional tendencies in Europe and as a means of promoting more effective collaboration in the world-wide economic organizations.

In the light of the above, I have considered what might be the best alternative approach to that set forth in our telegrams Nos. 216 and 217. I made a mistake in proposing that this approach should be connected with the Annual Review process. I derived the idea from the so-called "peeling off" of special subjects as a part of the Annual Review process, but I realize now that in Ottawa the Annual Review still carries connotations of "burden-sharing". For this reason it is unfortunate that I connected the approach to the second sentence of Article 2 with the Annual Review process. This was realized in the Defence Liaison (1) Division because in their memorandum to the Economic Division of February 24th† they expressed their doubts as to whether the best agency to use is the Annual Review Committee. They pointed out quite correctly, however, that this was not necessarily an essential part of my proposal.

In the light of the views expressed in the departmental memoranda, I have thought over the position and have decided that what is essential in my proposal is that the second sentence of Article 2 should be made a subject for discussion at the December Ministerial Meeting of the Council. This can be done simply by proposing that such an item should be included in the agenda for that meeting. Accordingly, I have prepared a draft of a memorandum which the Canadian Delegation might submit to the Permanent Council. I have done this simply to provide a basis for your further consideration of the question and to indicate to you the new type of approach which I believe might be feasible. I am attaching four copies of the draft memorandum.

An important and difficult question of procedure will be involved in the preparation of the ministerial discussion. You will notice that the draft memorandum (paragraph 6) leaves the procedure undecided and states that we have an "open mind" on it. However, we will no doubt wish to give this matter very careful consideration. It would, I feel, be helpful to Ministers to have a background paper, prepared by the Secretariat, outlining what is being done now in O.E.E.C. and other organizations in the way of economic collaboration among member countries. The paper could go on to give a factual summary of some of the possible areas of conflict in the international economic policies of NATO countries, but this might be too delicate a subject for the Secretariat to handle. Whether or not such a paper could be examined by an ad hoc working group before presentation to the ministerial meeting is also open for consideration. I feel, however, that the question of preparation is one on which we should, in fact, have an open mind at this stage and one on which all Delegations should have an opportunity to comment before we take a firm line. My main point is that I do not feel that the decision on whether we should submit our general proposal contained in the memorandum need be held up over the question of procedure.

I am sorry to have had to go into this matter at such great length but I felt it was necessary because it is so difficult to convey the basic thought which led me to put forward the original proposal.

Yours sincerely,
L.D. WILGRESS

ECONOMIC COLLABORATION AMONG NATO COUNTRIES

The Canadian Delegation wishes to propose that an item entitled "Review of Economic Collaboration among NATO Countries" should be included in the agenda for the Ministerial Meeting of the Council to be held next December, when final action will be taken on the 1955 Annual Review.

2. It is the view of the Canadian Delegation that, just as an opportunity is provided at the ministerial meeting for an exchange of views on the current international situation, an opportunity should also be provided for a discussion of the subject of economic collaboration and avoidance of conflict in economic policies within the context of Article 2 of the North Atlantic Treaty.

3. This Article envisages several fields of co-operation between NATO countries. One of these is co-operation in regard to information policies and cultural relations, which is the field at present covered by the NATO Committee on Information and Cultural Relations. A Working Group on Labour Mobility has been considering the more specifically NATO aspects of questions relating to the movement of persons to supplement what is being done in other international organizations such as the International Labour Organization and the Inter-Governmental Committee for European Migration. It has been agreed that questions of social co-operation can best be dealt with by setting up ad hoc working groups to consider specific questions as they arise. Little or no attention, however, has been paid by the Council or by any of its standing committee to the second sentence of Article 2 of the Treaty, which provides that the Parties "will seek to eliminate conflict in their international economic policies and will encourage economic collaboration between any or all of them".

4. The reason usually given for this lack of attention to the field of economic co-operation has been that it is the prerogative of other bodies, which have a membership wider than NATO but with which most of the NATO countries are associated. The most important of these other bodies is the Organization of European Economic Co-Operation (O.E.E.C.), of which Canada and the United States are associate members and all of the other NATO countries are full members. Indeed, it was partly by reason of the provisions of Article 2 of the North Atlantic Treaty that Canada was made an associate member of this Organization in 1950. Other international organizations that come into question are the International Monetary Fund (I.M.F.), the Contracting Parties to the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade (G.A.T.T.), the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development, and the Economic Commission for Europe (E.C.E.).

5. It is the view of the Canadian Delegation that, while these other organizations are the proper forum for the detailed examination of questions of economic co-operation, an opportunity should be afforded from time to time for the discussion of these questions in the NATO forum, because it is only in NATO that official cognizance can be taken of the economic provisions of Article 2 of the North Atlantic Treaty. It is for this reason that it is proposed that the December Ministerial Meeting of the Council should include the item referred to in paragraph 1 of this memorandum.

6. If the Council approves of the inclusion of such an item in the agenda for the Ministerial Meeting in December, the procedure for its preparation will also have to be considered. The Canadian Delegation has an open mind on this question, but possibly a factual summary might be prepared of what is being done now in O.E.E.C. and other organizations in the way of economic collaboration among NATO countries.

7. The Canadian Delegation presents this proposal for the consideration of the Council.

CONFIDENTIAL

Paris, June 28, 1955

Dear Mr. Pearson,

ECONOMIC COLLABORATION UNDER ARTICLE 2:
ROLE OF NATO PARLIAMENTARIANS

In my letter of June 22 I set out suggestions relating to the question of economic collaboration under Article 2 of the North Atlantic Treaty, in which the key element would be in the inclusion of an item on this subject on the agenda of the Ministerial meeting next December. I have had some additional thoughts on this question, inspired partly by current preoccupations with the Conference of NATO Parliamentarians which will take place in the Palais de Chaillot from July 18 to 23. In this letter I shall outline these additional ideas for your consideration, although I should state at the outset that they relate to a course of action which clearly may have disadvantages as well as advantages and which may on analysis prove undesirable.

There are three preliminary considerations in my mind. The first is that governments are unlikely to be willing to make any serious move in the direction of implementing the economic provisions of Article 2, regardless of any discussion which might take place at the December meeting, unless public support for such a move was more coherent, better informed and more practical than I believe to be the case at present. The second consideration is that there is some evidence of support in certain European countries for an effort to make such a move, and if it is left to those countries to take the initiative, the project is likely to be regarded in many quarters as an attempt to institute a NATO "give-away" programme. Finally, there is the general question of the future role to be played by the parliamentary groups which are gathering together in Paris for the first time in July.

On the first of these preliminary considerations, that relating to public support for a closer collaboration of NATO governments in matter of economic policy, I fear that a Ministerial discussion next December without prior preparation extending beyond purely official quarters might not take root. While it is true that in many NATO parliaments there would be a considerable measure of support for such a development, the support under present conditions would probably be idealistic, and based on general considerations that could be readily demolished by hard-headed opponents of the free and easy extension of national commitments in economic and related fields. If the support for such a move is limited largely to what I might call an idealist fringe, the majority of Ministers are unlikely to consider it desirable.

This faction would be strengthened if public initiatives in favour of such a move should be taken by governments only of countries most likely to profit materially. There would no doubt be ready support for such a plan from the Governments of Italy, Greece, Turkey, France and perhaps Portugal, and this very list in itself would probably prejudice opinion against the project in countries such as Canada, the United States, the United Kingdom, and possibly the Benelux countries. In this connection I have been very interested to read excerpts from a speech which Mr. Spaak delivered on March 23. I have seen no account of the complete speech, but I attach the page from the NATO Newsletter in which a digest is given. It would appear that Mr. Spaak is thinking seriously in terms of a new initiative relating to Article 2, and that he foresees an important role for NATO parliamentarians in this connection. You will notice particularly the following passage: "That is why I have come to ask myself if the conferring of some official character to these NATO parliamentarians who would be kept advised in the most concrete manner possible is a decision which should be rejected out of hand. I believe that it is a means of alerting public opinion". This speech of Mr. Spaak suggests to me in the first place that he would be prepared to consider sympathetically the suggestion I shall make below, and in the second place that he is preparing to take some initiative in this general direction on his own account.

Mr. Spaak's remarks bring me to the third of my preliminary considerations — the role of NATO parliamentarians. Governments have naturally been very cautious about according any official character or connection to the forthcoming meeting of parliamentarians. Nevertheless, it seems clear that some sort of continuing body will emerge, we would hope, in the relatively innocuous form of a federation of NATO parliamentary associations of the individual countries. Already the Canadian Group are planning to propose, at the forthcoming meeting, that there should be a discussion of "non-military co-operation". I am convinced that the majority of parliamentarians attending a gathering such as the one in July will be in favour of expanding Article 2 activities and will seek to establish some kind of continuing function in this field. In my opinion, however, if the parliamentarians are to discuss, as they intend to do, the non-military aspects of the Alliance, they will inevitably be led to concentrate their efforts on problems relating to economic co-operation under Article 2. The reason for this is that of the three main fields of co-operation envisaged by Article 2, e.g. information and cultural, social, and economic, the latter is the only one which the parliamentarians could study with reasonable hope of making a useful contribution. Information problems form the subject of continued studies in our Committee on Information and Cultural Relations and apart from the practicability and soundness of the ideas that may be put forward, the only real limitation is the amount of money which the governments are willing to spend on this type of activity. In the social field, I frankly do not see that NATO could do more than it does at present as social legislation and practices on the two sides of the ocean are too different to make real NATO co-operation in this field a practical goal. It is, therefore, to the field of economic co-operation between any or all of the NATO countries that the parliamentarians, in my estimation, are most likely to direct their attention.

On the basis of the considerations which I have outlined, it occurs to me that governments, or the Canadian Government in particular, might consider proposing that the "NATO Inter-parliamentary Association", or whatever continuing body may emerge, should look seriously into the question of the possible implementation of the economic provisions of Article 2. Such a proposal would, of course, imply that governments would be prepared to provide detailed and competent advice and information.

The more positive advantages of following that course can be summarized as follows:

(a) As I have said, it seems inevitable that NATO parliamentarians, following their first general conference in July, will continue to discuss economic co-operation within NATO, as indeed they are almost certain to do at the meeting itself. Such a discussion without active assistance from governments would probably be loose and unrealistic; but this in itself would scarcely ensure that specific recommendations or resolutions would not emerge. It is, therefore, in the interest of the various governments to ensure as far as possible that whatever conclusions may be agreed among the parliamentarians should be realistic and based on well-informed discussion.

(b) The assignment of such a task to a NATO parliamentary group would no doubt be immensely satisfying to the organizers of the Group, and would certainly encourage parliamentary support for NATO policies and activities in general. In particular, it would tend to build up parliamentary and, therefore, public support for whatever steps it may in fact prove possible to take toward an increase of economic collaboration among NATO countries.

(c) Governmental responsibility would not be directly engaged, and it would be very difficult for those NATO governments or ministers who oppose a direct governmental initiative in the matter to raise objections to its examination by a properly representative group of NATO parliamentarians.

(d) If it is true that a general study of the problem, and a study of which the results can be broadly publicized, is a prerequisite to actual governmental action, then it would appear that a NATO inter-parliamentary association would be ideal for the purpose. Their semi-official position and their considerable prestige in the public eye would make it easier for governments both to recognize the study itself and to provide possible confidential or semi-confidential information which would be necessary if the study is to serve a practical purpose.

I have outlined what I consider the principal arguments in favour of this suggestion. I recognize, of course, that it involves certain risks. One of these is that despite the discreet guidance which governmental recognition would permit governments to exercise in the course of the study, the conclusions reached by the parliamentarians might nevertheless be academic or irresponsible. I believe, however, that this particular risk of irresponsible conclusions concerning the subject of economic collaboration must be faced, whether or not governments lend assistance, and governmental assistance can only serve to reduce such a risk. A further hazard, one which I regard as purely academic, is that the parliamentarians might reach a negative conclusion on the subject. I think there is little or no prospect of this because I have the impression that the parliamentarians who participate in activities of this sort are likely in the great majority to be internationally-minded and to err on the side of too little rather than too much caution. Furthermore, if it should in fact appear that the parliamentarians did not consider increased economic collaboration to be desirable, then there is little or no hope that governments acting on their own initiative could develop and have accepted any useful programme to this end. If parliamentary support for such a programme cannot be obtained, it will surely be of advantage to governments to learn the fact before they have in any way committed themselves. As I say, however, I think the risk of such a development is very slight.

What I have said above relates to a study of economic collaboration to be carried out by a NATO inter-parliamentary association. I would foresee such a development as a preparatory step leading ultimately, if all went well, to governmental action. Thus, I do not regard the suggestion in any way as an alternative to the proposal in my letter of June 22 for a discussion of this subject at a NATO Ministerial meeting, but rather as a complementary step. Indeed, it would no doubt be far easier to suggest to NATO Ministers that a useful discussion of this matter could be held next December if in the meantime there were to develop an active parliamentary interest in the question in their various countries.

I should be grateful for your preliminary views on this suggestion. I shall, no doubt, have the opportunity of discussing the matter further with you when you are in Paris for the Ministerial meeting on [July] 16.

Yours sincerely,
L.D. WILGRESS

ECONOMIC COLLABORATION UNDER ARTICLE 2
OF THE NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY

I enclose copies of Mr. Wilgress's letters of June 22 and June 28 on questions relating to Article 2. I thought you might wish to take copies of the two letters with you since you will no doubt have an opportunity to discuss Mr. Wilgress's suggestions with him.

2. These were briefly:

(a) that an item on the subject of economic collaboration under Article 2 be included in the agenda for the December Ministerial meeting;

(b) that you take the lead in the discussion of the item;

(c) that the NATO inter-parliamentary association or whatever continuing body may emerge from the forthcoming meeting of parliamentarians should "look seriously into the question of the possible implementation of the economic provisions of Article 2", with detailed advice and information from governments.

3. Mr. Wilgress regards the first and third suggestions as complementary in the sense that the proposed study by a NATO inter-parliamentary association would be a preparatory step leading ultimately to governmental action. The two suggestions do not, however, seem to be necessarily interdependent.

4. On the basis of the political factors there is undoubtedly a good deal of merit in Mr. Wilgress's suggestion that a determined effort should now be made to develop Article 2. You will recall that Mr. Charles Ritchie recently emphasized the importance of this in relation to Germany. From an economic point of view, objections were raised to Mr. Wilgress's first proposal, in its original form, by the Departments of Finance and Trade and Commerce. He has now clarified his proposal, however, and I would hope that in something like its present form it might prove acceptable to the other interested departments. It has occurred to us that one possible modification might be to table for this item simply the Annual Report of the O.E.E.C., perhaps with a brief explanatory note by the NATO Secretariat. On your return, if you agree, we might consider how best to present the proposal to the other departments concerned.

5. At that time too you might wish to indicate whether, if the first proposal were adopted, you would be prepared to introduce the discussion on this item in the Council.

6. As regards Mr. Wilgress's third proposal, while I think he is quite correct in thinking that the parliamentarians will continue to discuss economic co-operation in NATO, with or without governmental sanction and assistance, I am not altogether clear as to the method he has in mind. The sort of inter-parliamentary association envisaged in the resolution of the Canadian parliamentarians, for example, would be so loosely organized and would meet so infrequently that it is not easy to visualize it making a serious collective "study" of such a subject. In any case it is difficult to reach any firm conclusions on this suggestion until we see what develops in the meetings of parliamentarians to take place next week. You may recall that Mr. Wilgress himself will be speaking to the parliamentarians on co-operation in the cultural, informational and related fields. Lord Ismay intends to make some reference in his introductory briefing to political consultation and emergency planning activities. Perhaps from the discussions some proposals will emerge which could be subsequently developed.

CONFIDENTIAL

[Ottawa], September 26, 1955

My dear Colleague,

ARTICLE 2 OF THE NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY

As you know, for some time now I have been considering what action might be taken to develop the non-military aspects of NATO. It is my view that this matter is of particular importance at the present time when the tactics of the Soviet Government are reducing the sense of military threat and thereby tending to weaken the incentives for the continuation of NATO as a military alliance. To help meet this very real danger I believe the NATO Ministerial Council should have an item on its agenda which would provide an opportunity for individual Ministers to comment informally, as they might see fit, on the adequacy of current economic policies and international arrangements. The aim would not be to arrive at any agreed conclusions, to set up new economic machinery or to detract from the functions of existing organizations. It would be to invoke explicitly in the NATO Council the positive statement of international policy contained in Article 2 which requires member countries to "seek to eliminate conflict in their international economic policies and ... encourage economic collaboration between any or all of them."

In making this suggestion I am, of course, well aware of the reservations which we all have had in the past regarding the propriety or wisdom of regarding NATO as an instrument for action in the field of economic and commercial policy. Perhaps, therefore, it would be appropriate for me to emphasize at the outset of this letter my agreement that a regional approach to any general economic question is undesirable and my conviction that NATO is not, at least at the present time, an appropriate organization for taking action in the economic or commercial policy field. What I have in mind, however, is discussion by Governments on their respective policies and not an attempt to reach a common or a "NATO approach". The very fact that the membership of NATO does not provide a suitable basis for an economic organization (especially since it contains such divergent economic views and interests as evidenced by recent OEEC discussions) would seem to make it extremely unlikely that any one would try to convert NATO into a regional economic arrangement. It would, therefore, seem possible to use NATO as an instrument for reinforcing our broader multilateral approach to economic problems — an approach which is most in keeping with the objectives of Article 2 since it is most likely to avoid conflicts in economic policies among the European and North American members — without any real risks that someone would divert the discussion in the direction of regionalism.

Not only does there seem to be no likelihood that the initiation of economic discussions in NATO would encourage the formation of an unworkable regional economic arrangement for the NATO area but such discussions might well have a restraining influence on tendencies towards uneconomic regionalism in Europe. Some of the Europeans who are quite vocal in supporting the establishment of a discriminatory régime for Europe (for all the European members of the OEEC or for the six members of the ECSC) might find it less appropriate to express such views in a NATO Ministerial meeting where U.S. and Canadian Ministers would be present as full participants and where the conflict of such proposals with the objectives of NATO would be readily apparent. If, of course, there were proposals of a regional character which served some overriding political purpose in which NATO as a whole had a substantial interest (for example, if they were essential to the solution of the numerous problems presented by the position of Germany in Europe), it would be well for such proposals to be aired in the NATO forum and to be examined critically there where their impact on other countries could be carefully weighed.

It seems to me quite conceivable that the type of NATO discussion which I envisage might, in the light of the common defence and political interests of the different members of NATO, encourage some of the less responsible members to reconsider their present attitudes towards import restrictions and towards certain regional projects which they may now have in mind. As noted above, we, in turn, might conceivably be asked to condone regional arrangements in some special cases but we should not find such suggestions embarrassing since, in the NATO context, we could not reasonably be expected to give our blessing to any such arrangements unless they clearly served the objectives of NATO — which could hardly be true of any arrangement to which we could legitimately object.

The suggestion which I am making has already been discussed with officials of your Department. If this matter is to be raised in the NATO Council, it would seem to be most important that we should simultaneously circulate an explanatory memorandum which would make our intentions clear and avoid possible impressions that Canada was contemplating substantial activity in the general economic field by NATO itself. Attached is a draft memorandum which might be suitable for this purpose. If our proposal is acceptable to other NATO countries, we would expect that some discussions on economic subjects might take place at the next Ministerial meeting of the Council which is to be held in Paris in December.

I should be grateful if you would let me know as soon as possible whether you are in agreement with the course proposed. Subject to your comment, I shall instruct Mr. Wilgress to place our proposal before the NATO Council as soon as possible. If it is accepted, it will, of course, be necessary for us to prepare ourselves for the discussion of general economic matters which might then be expected to take place at the December meeting of the NATO Ministerial Council.

Yours sincerely,

L.B. PEARSON

P.S. I think the course which I have suggested in this letter would still be appropriate despite the way the discussions proceeded in our Joint Committee today. In fact, the attitude of U.S. Ministers, as evidenced by their statements this morning, might make it all the more desirable that these matters be aired occasionally in the NATO forum.<sup>112</sup>

ECONOMIC DISCUSSIONS AT NATO COUNCIL MEETINGS

The Canadian Delegation wishes to propose that an item entitled: "Article 2: Economic Collaboration and Avoidance of Conflict in Economic Policies" should be included in the agenda for the Ministerial meeting of the Council to be held next December. The Canadian Delegation would suggest that in the light of any discussion on this subject at the December meeting it might be found desirable to include a similar item as a regular feature on the agenda for subsequent Ministerial meetings of the NATO Council.

2. It is the view of the Canadian Delegation that, just as an opportunity is provided at Ministerial meetings for an exchange of views on the current international situation, provision should also be made for a discussion on economic collaboration and avoidance of conflict in international economic policies within the context of Article 2 of the Treaty.

3. This Article envisages several fields of co-operation between NATO countries. One of these is co-operation in regard to information policies and cultural relations, which is the field at present covered by the NATO Committee on Information and Cultural Relations. A Working Group on Labour Mobility has been considering the more specifically NATO aspects of questions relating to the movement of persons to supplement what is being done in other international organizations such as the International Labour Organization and the Inter-Governmental Committee for European Migration. It has been agreed that questions of social co-operation can best be dealt with by setting up ad hoc working groups to consider specific questions as they arise. Little or no attention, however, has been paid by the Council or by any of its standing committees to the second sentence of Article 2 of the Treaty, which provides that the Parties "will seek to eliminate conflict in their international economic policies and will encourage economic collaboration between any or all of them."

4. This absence of emphasis on economic questions within NATO is probably not surprising and should not necessarily be interpreted as reflecting a lack of regard for this portion of Article 2. Many of these matters have been receiving attention in other bodies and member countries have doubtless had the objectives of this Article in mind when participating in the work of those bodies and when framing their own policies on international economic subjects.

5. In this connection, the Canadian Delegation is, of course, familiar with the activities in this field of the Organization for European Economic Cooperation (OEEC), and recognizes the relationship between these activities and the principles set out in Article 2. Indeed, it was partly by reason of the provisions of that Article of the North Atlantic Treaty that Canada was made an associate member of the OEEC in 1950. The Canadian Delegation also realizes that many of the subjects which might be regarded as coming within this provision of the Treaty can best be dealt with on a basis broader than that provided by NATO: for instance, through the International Monetary Fund, the Contracting Parties of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development, and various U.N. bodies.

6. In suggesting this new item for the agenda of the Ministerial Council Meeting, the Canadian Delegation is not envisaging any new international economic machinery and is not wishing to detract in any way from the functions of these existing organizations. It would be hoped that a general discussion of this item periodically within NATO would increase the effectiveness of these organizations in serving the purposes set forth in Article 2. The object of the Canadian Delegation in proposing the inclusion of this item in the agenda for the forthcoming meeting and probably for subsequent annual meetings of the Ministerial Council is a very simple one. It is merely to provide an occasion for individual ministers to comment as they might see fit on the adequacy of current economic policies and international arrangements, to fulfil the purposes of Article 2 in the situation existing at that time or anticipated in the period ahead. It would not seem prudent for the Council to assume that such policies and arrangements will necessarily be appropriate in situations which may change considerably from time to time unless attention is directed to these matters occasionally and ministers are provided with an opportunity to express any judgments which they may have reached.

7. The Canadian Delegation would not expect that much preparation by the Organization as a whole would be required for the discussion of this item (although the Secretariat might prepare a factual summary of what is being done now in OEEC and other organizations involving economic collaboration among all or none of the NATO countries). The content of the discussion might be left to the discretion of particular Ministers at the time of the meeting. Neither would the Delegation anticipate that the Ministerial Council would aim to arrive at any definite conclusions as a result of its consideration of this item. The discussion might, in fact, be most fruitful if it was to be regarded as an informal exchange of views designed to let the various Ministers know what others may be thinking about these subjects.

8. It follows from this approach to the topic that it would be undesirable to set any precise limits to the scope of the item. Some Ministers might wish to comment on economic prospects generally and their relevance to the future of NATO. Other Ministers might want to review current international trade and financial policies and the functions of existing organizations. Still others might be inclined to discuss economic relations between NATO countries and those in the Soviet group. Several Ministers might think it desirable to examine what NATO countries individually are doing to assist the economic development of these countries whose economies are relatively undeveloped. Numerous other aspects of the general subject might be proposed by one Minister or another.

9. The Canadian Delegation presents this proposal for the consideration of the Council.

ARTICLE 2 OF THE NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY

Following for the Minister.

The Ministers of Trade and Commerce and Finance have now replied to your letter of September 26 dealing with your proposal that Mr. Wilgress should introduce a resolution calling for a discussion of international economic problems at the December Ministerial Meeting of the Council.

2. In his reply Mr. Howe shares your concern over lack of new initiatives in the general field of International Economic Relations and states that "if you should find ... that there is any real chance of producing new and positive initiatives out of discussions in NATO I would be most enthusiastic about the effort being made". Mr. Howe goes on to express some doubt, however, that NATO discussions would be effective "in altering the policies of any of the major trading countries or in persuading them to produce new and constructive initiatives". He suggests that if U.S. Minister said the same things in Paris as they said here "the effect upon various European countries might be quite unfortunate indeed". He concludes his letter in the following terms "you may consider these dangers of sufficient weight to render it preferable to defer the approach you are considering until a more auspicious time. I am quite happy, however, to leave the tactical decision in your hands as to whether you should take this new initiative at NATO. If it appears that the American response would be positive and constructive, I would see no great danger of harm being done and quite possibly a great deal of good".

3. Mr. Harris is also prepared to accept your judgment. But he suggests that U.S. Secretaries in Paris in December might be even more outspoken and less ready to be influenced by the views of others than they were here. And with the U.S. and the U.K. marking time, representatives of other countries might feel more rather than less disposed towards restrictions and regionalism. Mr. Harris also points out that if we put the item on the agenda we will be expected to lead the discussion and it might be "very difficult at this juncture either to attack or to support the U.S. representatives".

4. If we are to propose "economic" discussions in December our Delegation should be instructed to move forward as soon as possible. You may consider that, despite the rather lukewarm support which Mr. Howe and Mr. Harris have given, little could be lost and a great deal might be gained from attempting the positive approach you have suggested. If our proposal is made (and accepted) I would hope that the Americans would themselves realize (although we may have to remind them in advance) the need to highlight in Paris the more attractive features of their International Economic and Commercial Policy. Please let me know whether you wish any action to be taken prior to your return to Ottawa.

ARTICLE 2 OF THE NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY

In three recent messages† from Paris (copies of which are attached), Mr. Wilgress has indicated that,

(a) Lord Ismay is planning that there should be before Ministers at the December meeting a memorandum on Article 2 activities, stressing political consultation, and

(b) the Italian Delegation has proposed an agenda item on "The Implementation of Article 2".<sup>113</sup> Just what the Italians have in mind is not at all clear: Mr. Wilgress has suggested that they wish to emphasize "burden sharing".

2. In order to provide Mr. Wilgress with instructions, I have prepared for your consideration the attached self-explanatory telegram. If our position is accepted, there would be an opportunity for Canadian Ministers to make general statements outlining in rather broad terms our own position, particularly with respect to the possible pitfalls of a European regionalist approach to international economic problems and the desirability of ensuring that any regional arrangements are consistent with the broader interests of all NATO countries.<sup>114</sup>

ACTIVITIES UNDER ARTICLE 2 OF THE NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY

While we remain persuaded of the political importance of having some discussion at the Ministerial Council meeting in December on the implications of Article 2, we had been coming in recent weeks to the view that it might be impracticable and possibly undesirable to encourage a substantial discussion at the forthcoming meeting regarding the economic aspects of Article 2. It appeared that any discussion which might take place at that time would probably be rather unbalanced and might have the effect of giving aid and comfort to those who were favouring economic policies inimical to NATO. In the light of our exchanges with the United States it seemed evident that their representatives at the December meeting could scarcely be counted on to take a constructive line. The United Kingdom, obsessed with its own economic difficulties, would presumably not be as vigorous as one might have hoped in advocating the broader approach. The Belgians, preoccupied with their current difficulties in the GATT, would probably be pretty negative in their attitude. Only the European regionalists would be likely to have anything very concrete to offer. The occasion did not therefore seem very auspicious for a balanced examination of international economic policies. Moreover, in view of the facts brought to light in this year's annual review, and the recent Defence Minister's meeting,<sup>115</sup> and since the Foreign Ministers conference at Geneva, there is less reason to expect any tendency to accept a weakening of the Alliance. Finally, as the agenda for the December meeting took shape it became apparent that Ministers would have a very full meeting and it would be difficult to find an opportunity for anything like a thorough discussion of the economic aspects of Article 2.

2. While we had more or less concluded that a substantive discussion might not take place at this time, we still felt that there would be merit in giving some attention to this subject at a meeting which was likely to be dominated otherwise by military considerations. In any event we felt that Ministers should consider at the December meeting whether it would be appropriate and useful at subsequent meetings to provide an opportunity for an exchange of views on the economic situation and on international economic relations.

3. We are not certain whether the item proposed by the Italians would be suitable for the kind of preliminary discussion which we now have in mind. If they are intending to promote ideas under this heading which we could not support it would obviously not be desirable for us to become associated with their proposed item. On the assumption that this item will open up a general discussion on Article 2, we would think that our approach might be accommodated under the Italian item, although the title might be altered somewhat to make it sufficiently broad. In that case you may wish to circulate to your colleagues on the Permanent Council a paper along the lines of our earlier revision<sup>116</sup> on your memorandum concerning "economic discussions of NATO Council meetings" with the following additional changes:

(a) Revise paragraph 1 to read:

"The Canadian Delegation welcomes the inclusion of a general item regarding Article 2 in the provisional agenda for the forthcoming ministerial meeting of the Council. One of the aspects of this article to which the Canadian Delegation would hope Ministers might give some attention is the provision having to do with economic relations. It would scarcely be practicable at the December meeting to undertake a very thorough discussion of this subject. This ministerial meeting might wish, however, to consider whether it would be desirable to envisage a substantial discussion on the economic situation and on international economic relations as a regular feature of future ministerial council meetings."

(b) You will be aware that in paragraph 5 the words "was made" are to be replaced by "became" and in paragraph 7 the words in brackets are to be deleted.

(c) The first sentence of paragraph 6 should read: "In suggesting periodic discussions on the current international economic situation at ministerial council meetings, the Canadian Delegation ...". The third sentence should read: "The object of the Canadian Delegation is a very simple one."

(d) The following sentence might be added at the conclusion of paragraph 8: "It might be thought practicable and desirable, even as early as the meeting of the Council this December, to invite one of the European Ministers concerned to report on recent developments resulting from the Messina Conference. Such a report would presumably be intended for the information of the individual members of the Council."

4. As you will see, we would think it appropriate to give some encouragement to the idea of a report from Mr. Spaak. If, in fact, he makes such a report on the various Messina integration projects, we would expect that our Ministers would wish to mention some of the possible dangers involved in a limited regional approach and to express the hope that those participating in this exercise would have continuously in mind the importance, for themselves and for NATO, of broader economic relationships.<sup>117</sup>

5. Incidentally, we do not believe that the Italian initiative should occasion a discussion in the Permanent Council on the interpretation of Article 2. We have ourselves regarded this article as a general non-military article and not one solely related to economic questions. We would be inclined to consider that the general political consultations which have been taking place have in fact been under the auspices of that article rather than Article 4, since the latter seems to us to relate to consultations of a much more specific nature. We doubt that for present purposes, however, it is really necessary to attempt to define the scope of Article 2 too precisely. We do agree with you that it would be stretching Article 2 very considerably to bring in burden-sharing and that the appropriate article under which to discuss this subject (insofar as any article in appropriate) is Article 3.

ACTIVITIES UNDER ARTICLE 2 OF THE NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY

After careful consideration we have forwarded our memorandum on economic discussions at NATO Council meetings to Lord Ismay with a request that it be circulated for the information of members of the Permanent Council but not as a document to be put before Ministers. Since the last meeting of the Permanent Council prior to the ministerial meeting takes place on Wednesday, December 7, we felt this would not provide sufficient notice for a discussion on the memorandum to take place prior to the ministerial meeting. In these circumstances we thought it best to delete para 9. I shall, however, take the opportunity provided by the private meeting of the Council to explain our reasons for circulating the memorandum.

2. In addition to the amendments to the memorandum contained in your telegram under reference and in consideration of the views contained in para 5 of your telegram, we have included an additional amendment relating to political consultation at the beginning of para. 3. It now reads as follows:

"This article envisages several fields of co-operation between NATO countries. One of the most encouraging developments that has taken place, in fields other than military, has been the recent marked development of the habit and practice of regular political consultations amongst the members of the Alliance. A committee of the organization is covering co-operation in regard to information policies and cultural relations. A Working Group on labour mobility has been considering the more specifically NATO aspects of questions relating to the movement of persons to supplement what is being done in other international organizations such as the International Labour Organization and the Inter-Governmental Committee for European migration ..."<sup>118</sup>

NATO ANNUAL REVIEW, 1955

A meeting of the Panel on the Economic Aspects of Defence Questions was held here last Tuesday, November 15,<sup>119</sup> to consider the various Annual Review problems on which you had requested instructions and to give some preliminary consideration to what briefing should be prepared for the Ministers prior to the December meeting. As a result, it was decided that four brief background papers would be compiled for further consideration by the Panel in about ten day's time with a view to submitting them to the Cabinet Defence Committee for study by those Ministers concerned with the 1955 NATO Annual Review.

2. This Department had already prepared the attached paper on the "Current Military Situation of the Atlantic Alliance" based largely on the reports of the October Defence Ministers' Conference.<sup>120</sup> The Panel asked us to assume responsibility for doing the first of the four papers agreed upon and it was considered that the attached paper, possibly with some revisions, might serve the purpose. In essence, it is to be a general position paper on the present condition of NATO. I should be grateful if you would examine the attachment carefully and wire your comments and suggested revisions as soon as possible and, in any event, to reach us by next Wednesday at the latest. I would draw your particular attention to the last paragraph in which we had endeavoured to arrive at some general conclusions. We would value greatly your views on these and any others which you think might usefully be added to a paper of this nature which is primarily intended to focus the attention of our Ministers on the NATO picture with which they will be confronted at the December meeting.

3. The other three papers to be prepared are on the following subjects:

(1) Reassessment and Priorities (by National Defence);<sup>121</sup>

CURRENT MILITARY SITUATION OF THE ATLANTIC ALLIANCE

A disturbing picture of the present military situation of the Atlantic alliance is emerging from the annual stock-taking now in progress. It is already evident that when Ministers meet in December to decide on force goals and to deal with the recommendations in the Annual Review, they will be confronted with the necessity for difficult decisions, some of which may have far-reaching strategic and political consequences.

2. It is not the political intentions of the Soviet Government which are causing most concern to the NATO civil and military staffs. Provided that an adequate deterrent in land, sea and air forces is maintained, and provided that there is tangible evidence of determination in NATO to use such forces should the need arise, the NATO staffs believe that the Soviet leaders will wish to avoid war in the foreseeable future.

3. The balance of capabilities, however, is tilting against the Atlantic community as the milder tactics of the Soviet leaders, and the growing public feeling that no nation will deliberately run the terrible risks of all-out nuclear warfare, produce a relaxation of effort on the part of the NATO countries. Already this has gone so far that the military threat in the estimation of the NATO commanders, is greater than ever before. Unless checked, the imbalance will necessitate a fundamental change in NATO strategy.

4. No evidence whatsoever of any slackening of Soviet effort in the development of her military capabilities is known to the NATO staffs. On the contrary, the indications are that Soviet forces are being persistently and appreciably strengthened. In ground forces their numerical strength (which has always been superior to that of the West) is being maintained, and more important, their equipment and weapons have been brought up to date, particularly through reorganization of their tank and mechanized divisions. Soviet naval strength has been improved by modernizing existing ships and by increasing the number of cruisers, destroyers and particularly submarines. These ships and submarines are not in reserve, like so many of the Allied units, but fully manned and ready for war. Every Soviet warship and submarine, and every maritime aircraft, is fitted to lay mines, and the Russians have the capability of arming their torpedoes with atomic warheads. Soviet air power has

For the final text of this paper, see Document 157.

made tremendous strides and, most significantly, a long range air force has been developed which is capable of bringing every NATO country, in North America as well as in Europe, simultaneously under direct nuclear attack. The NATO military authorities believe that the Soviet Union is years ahead of previous estimates in aircraft design and production, as well as in the atomic field. In the light of these previous underestimates they think that it would be foolhardy to assume any lag in the Soviet development of guided missiles.

5. The NATO forces, on the other hand, are considered to be increasingly deficient in both quantity and quality to meet this threat. Under present national programmes the overall force levels planned for 1956 will not be met even by the end of 1958. The German contribution, which it had been hoped would be available in 1957, will be delayed at least two years. Thus two of the major assumptions on which present NATO military planning for Europe is based are not being realized. In quality there has been only a little improvement in this theatre since a year ago, when SACEUR estimated that over 1/3 of the army M-day units and well over 1/2 of the air force units were not fully effective for combat. The withdrawal of regular French divisions for service in North Africa<sup>124</sup> and the dispute between Greece and Turkey have been further weakening factors. Most serious of all the European problems, however, in the view of the NATO staffs, is the absence of any effective system of air defence, and in particular of any overall early warning system. Air defence in Europe has remained a national responsibility. The NATO military authorities are strongly of the opinion that it is essentially an international problem; indeed, SACEUR has emphasized that in his view the air defence system of NATO must be considered as a global problem, with the North American and European systems complementing each other. The reason he gave for this opinion was that an attack on one of the two systems could be used to give warning to the other. Underlying the concept, of course, is the conviction of the military authorities that the air defence of NATO must rest on its capacity for immediate retaliation.

6. The situation in Allied Command Atlantic, as reported by SACLANT, is no less disturbing than the situation in Allied Command Europe. The Soviet Navy has now more submarines than all other nations combined, and nearly as many as the total number of D-day NATO ocean escorts. The protection for a 50 to 80 ship convoy could be no more than 0 to 3 escorts, a most discouraging prospect when seen in terms of long-endurance submarines equipped with long-range torpedoes having atomic warheads. There are ever-increasing shortages even in anti-submarine aircraft which now provide a large part of the available protection force. In discussing his plans for dealing with the immediate threat at sea, SACLANT attached particular importance to the vital requirement for blocking the Baltic exits immediately and completely, to prevent egress of Soviet naval forces.

7. One principal strategic conclusion is drawn by the NATO commanders from this picture of a growing imbalance of strength. It is that if the present shortages, both quantitative and qualitative, are not corrected, it will be necessary to abandon the forward strategy (involving defence of the Ruhr and blocking of the Baltic exits) and to adopt instead a rearward strategy. SACEUR told the Defence Ministers that he was convinced this would be disastrous from a military as well as from a political point of view. To emphasize his concern, General Gruenther said that if there were any relaxation of effort on the part of NATO, or any weakening in the unity of NATO countries, it would certainly not be true to say that then the Soviet forces could surely be defeated if they were to attack.

8. The inter-relationship of the military problems of the alliance has been repeatedly emphasized by the NATO commanders. SACLANC put the case succinctly to the Defence Ministers when he said that it was impossible to assess the relative importance of the defence of Europe, the defence of the Atlantic, and the defence of North America, because the successful achievement of each was indispensable to the others.

9. The general recommendation which seems likely to emerge from the Annual Review is that a reappraisal and readjustment of the total defence effort of the Atlantic alliance is urgently necessary, for the following reasons:

(a) presently planned forces are inadequate to provide effectively for the defence of the NATO area in the light of constantly increasing Soviet capabilities;

(b) present national programmes do not provide fully even for the long-term maintenance of the forces now planned;

(c) large increases in defence expenditure would be required to overcome existing, critical deficiencies and also to implement the integrated atomic strategy, which is of cardinal importance;

(d) in the present international climate, such large increases in defence expenditure are unlikely;

(e) priorities must, therefore, be established to ensure that what is most important under the concept of atomic war is provided, if necessary at the expense of other elements.

10. It seems to be the consensus of opinion that the procedure adopted last year, by which the NATO military authorities would advise on priorities when requested to do so by member countries, has proved inadequate and unsatisfactory. The Standing Group is accordingly now working on a study of machinery for producing priorities for nations. They expect to present their recommendations to Ministers at the December meeting. A suggestion made by some countries, that a working group be set up immediately in Paris, where it could be given full political as well as military guidance, was not generally acceptable.

11. The implications of creating an effective system for the international "production" of national defence priorities are obviously of the highest importance. An extension of the principle of common responsibility is involved which was certainly not contemplated when nations agreed to integrate certain of their forces. It is, however, arguable that the situation revealed by the current appraisal makes such an extension a vital requirement of Western security. Until the implications have been more carefully studied, and until Ministers have had an opportunity to consider such specific proposals as may emerge at the December meeting, any firm expression of Canadian opinion would be premature. Two considerations of a general nature may, however, be suggested: (a) a continuation or extension of the recent tendency of NATO countries to take unilateral decisions without full regard for the overriding importance of maintaining the collective deterrent would imperil what has been attained so far; (b) so far as Canada is concerned, the evident interest of our European partners in maintaining the flow of North American aid to the defence of Europe, no less than our joint interest with the United States in the defence of North America, make it imperative that we coordinate even more closely than in the past with the United States our policies and attitudes on the defence problems of the Atlantic Community.

TOP SECRET

PREPARATION FOR THE FORTHCOMING MINISTERIAL MEETING

In our view, the basic issue facing the forthcoming ministerial meeting is that described in the first recommendation of the International Staff to the General Chapter in this year's Annual Review Report (Document C-M(55)101), where reference is made to the need for the Council to "consider in the light of the above conclusions how the defence effort of the alliance and of each country can best be adjusted to achieve the basic objectives of MC 48, within the resources likely to be available;". This basic problem is also described in paras 23 and 24 of the General chapter itself, and as you know, has been the subject of discussion recently in the Permanent Council under the general heading of follow-up to the October Defence Ministers' Meeting.

2. In view of the foregoing, we hope that a paper will be prepared in Ottawa which would be of assistance to the appropriate Ministers in assessing:

(a) The Canadian interests and responsibilities in respect of the current situation (in which the build-up at required effectiveness has not been adequately achieved) against the background of Canada's undertaking and commitments in respect of this build-up.

(b) The relative Canadian interests and responsibilities in Europe and North America in respect of the requirements which will evolve from the concepts of the MC.48 series.<sup>125</sup>

3. The basic problem referred to in para 1 is likely to be interpreted by European members of the alliance as referring primarily, if not exclusively, to the defence of Western Europe. Regarding the defence of Western Europe by Western European countries, there are shortfalls in the build-up to which these countries have committed themselves, over and above the new requirements which evolve from the concept of M.C.48. In spite of the improved economic situation in Europe, the European countries feel that they cannot be expected to increase, or even perhaps to maintain, the present level of outlays on defence. There is a developing momentum behind the thesis that the resources required to rectify the short-falls and to meet the implication of M.C.48, must be met by European countries to the extent possible by the release and reallocation of resources now being utilized on low military priorities (this to be done through a process of reorganization and readjustment of force goals), and that the means required to eliminate material deficiencies must come from North America. If the required resources are not forthcoming from these two sources, it means that European countries must face up to the prospect of either altering their present decision concerning levels of defence expenditures or of SACEUR altering present NATO military plans including the forward strategy with the political ramifications this would involve.

4. Preliminary NATO military thinking, as expressed in the draft comments of the Military Representatives Committee on the 1953 Annual Review Report, indicates that on the part of the NATO military authorities there might not be much, if any, pressure for North American assistance, beyond that already planned, to bring present forces to the level of strength and effectiveness on which NATO military planning for the defence of Western Europe has been based. The draft comments state that "with little or no increase in current levels of defence expenditure, it is conceivable, through appropriate adjustments for NATO defence forces to attain the equivalent fighting value envisaged by the 1956 planning goals in the 1953 Annual Review". It would appear, however, that "appropriate adjustments" leave no room for adjustments which might arise from a re-assessment, for instance by Canada, of the relative priority of Western Europe and North American defence, which might affect Canadian allocation of Forces committed in the 1953 Annual Review.

5. On the longer term considerations, affecting for instance air defence and the implementation of the M.C.48 series, the draft military comments state that the attainment of such objectives "will require additional expenditure which cannot wholly be offset by adjustments in present programmes". In these circumstances it may be somewhat precarious if the Ministers, in deciding whether or not there should be a re-assessment and if so in (drawing up) guidance on the procedures for implementing it, rely wholly on the European view that additional European financial effort need not or should not be made because the necessary resources will be forthcoming through adjustments or from North America.

6. We fully appreciate that an assessment of the kind suggested in para 2 above is not easy to make, nor can it be developed quickly. We feel, however, that at the coming ministerial meeting the Canadian Ministers may be confronted with assuring that Canadian interests in these problems are not overlooked or prejudiced by hasty decisions which might otherwise be made as a result of the growing pressure of present European thinking. With this in mind we hope that these comments might be useful.

PREPARATIONS FOR THE MINISTERIAL MEETING

The question of a NATO reassessment and priorities was discussed at some length in the Panel on the Economic Aspects of Defence Questions and a Panel memorandum has been prepared recommending that Ministers recognize the need for, but not necessarily take the lead in advocating, a general reassessment of NATO'S defence programme in the light of the current circumstances, with a view to determining how best the common defence might be achieved under the agreed strategic concepts (MC. 48 series). (Copies of the Panel minutes† and of the memorandum are being forwarded to you.) The Panel also agreed:

(1) that a burden-sharing exercise along the lines of that made by the "Three Wise Men" in 1952 was not desirable;

(2) that individual requests by countries for advice from NATO military authorities would not be productive in meeting the situation;

(3) that "positive" NATO plans, such as the one for a co-ordinated air defence system of Europe, would have the effect of bringing some of the issues into clearer focus and facilitating the task of member countries in deciding what portion of their national programmes might be eliminated.

2. We referred your telegram No. 1368 to National Defence emphasizing that, in our view, the best course for Canadian Ministers to adopt might be to say that the desirability of an overall reappraisal is recognized but that the results of such a reappraisal, so far as they related to Europe, would of course have to be studied by the Canadian Government in relation to the urgent and growing demands of North American air defence. The aim would be, as you have expressed it, to ensure that Canadian interests in these problems are not overlooked or prejudiced.

3. In its reply National Defence has expressed its apprehension about an overall NATO review extending to North America. Accordingly, in its opinion, any NATO reappraisal should be limited in scope, possibly to the central command in Europe in order to provide the necessary facilities as first priority for European air defence. At a later stage, Canada could consider offering assistance in the form of additional equipment for air defence. (We are sending you copies of our letter to General Foulkes† and of his reply.†)

4. In the circumstances, the Panel paper on this subject will constitute the brief for Ministers. It is not as broad in scope as the one you suggested and, as we pointed out to National Defence, there is a need for such a broader type of assessment. It would be the logical outcome of the proposed interdepartmental study of national security policy which, in our opinion, should be given a high priority and which will take time to complete.<sup>126</sup>

PRIORITIES WITHIN NATO

1. The question of priorities arose again at the Defence Ministers' meeting in October of this year. This question is not unfamiliar and is quite similar to the problems now facing the Canadian Government, but it is aggravated in the European countries by the uncertainty of further mutual aid from North America.

2. It will be remembered that, when NATO was formed in April of 1949, a strenuous effort was made to provide as rapidly as possible the largest attainable force in Western Europe to prevent any further Soviet intimidation of the pattern used in Czechoslovakia. The Military Committee laid down certain force goals for NATO, which were in the order of 47 front-line divisions increasing to 83 divisions by D plus 90, with a total number of 5913 aircraft. These forces were to be equipped in the main with 2nd World War equipment still remaining in Europe and with war stocks which were available in North America, supplemented by further production, mainly from North America.

3. At the NATO meeting held in Ottawa in September of 1951, there was a general expression of opinion in the Council that the military sights had been set too high and that many countries were having difficulty in meeting even the maintenance charges for these forces.<sup>127</sup> It was therefore agreed that the force goals should be more closely related to the economic capability of the member nations and to the amount of mutual and economic aid being received by the countries concerned. The acceptance of this position led to the setting up of the Temporary Council Committee (the "Three Wise Men"—Harriman, Plowden and Monnet). This group, with military and economic experts, made an exhaustive study of the military and economic position of the member nations and produced a very voluminous but in many cases inaccurate survey of the military and economic potential of the member nations.

4. This report was presented to the Council at the meeting in Lisbon in February of 1952.<sup>128</sup> The report was not adopted as such but a resolution, including agreed force goals, was accepted by the Council. These new force goals were alleged to be within the economic capabilities of the member nations, and were in the following order of magnitude:

Total number of divisions—63 front-line—157 by D plus 90.

Total number of aircraft—9984.

This included forces for Greece and Turkey.

5. The resolution also recommended that an Annual Review should be conducted to assess the progress made in reaching the Lisbon goal and to adjust the force goals from year to year as was found necessary. It is significant to note that the only countries which have reached their Lisbon goals are Canada and the United States. The processes of the Annual Review since the Lisbon meeting have clearly demonstrated that there is a considerable slippage in both quantity and quality of the forces being raised in NATO. Appendix

"A"† shows the relative positions of the member countries in reaching their force goals. All the NATO countries including Canada are now being required to meet out of their defence budget the following elements of expenditure:

- (a) maintenance such as pay of personnel, transport, POL and works maintenance and attrition wastage;
- (b) the replacement of ammunition expended on operations and training; and
- (c) the re-equipping of their forces with more modern equipment to meet the requirements laid down in M.C. 48 and M.C. 48/1 for taking part in a war in which thermonuclear weapons will be used.

6. One of the major difficulties facing all the defence departments in NATO is that the closer nations get to their force goals the larger become their fixed charges, such as increased pay and allowances, maintenance, overhaul, repair, attrition and wastage; and therefore there is, and will continue to be, less money available for providing modern equipment for their forces. It should be remembered that the bulk of initial equipment was provided from mutual aid sources. This problem has been further aggravated by the fact that in almost every item of equipment the costs have increased two and three times over the original cost; for example:

- the cost of the F86 plus one year's spares is $352,000. - 1952
- the cost of the CF100 plus one year's spares is $912,000. - 1954
- the estimated cost of the CF105 plus one year's spares is $2.6 million. - 1960

Therefore it is quite apparent that the difficulties facing all NATO countries is how to meet this question of modernizing their forces and still maintain the present level of defence expenditures.

7. In the light of the development of the M.C. 48 concept, a radical change in the organization and deployment of NATO forces will be inevitable, and the division of defence expenditure between the maintenance of forces at their present size and their re-equipping with modern weapons will be of critical importance. It may be found that in certain fields the balance of advantage lies in maintaining smaller forces and spending more on weapons with which they are equipped; furthermore that, as these modern weapons will have a greater destructive power, perhaps the Supreme Commanders could get along with somewhat smaller forces. The difficulty arises as to how decisions can be reached on what reduction can be made to make way for increased expenditures on modern equipment. The Supreme Allied Commanders consider that they now have insufficient forces to carry out their allotted tasks and therefore are very loath to recommend any reduction in conventional forces and conventional weapons in order to allow the creation of new types of forces, such as air defence forces, modern all-weather aircraft and guided missiles.

8. In commenting on the Annual Review, the Standing Group made this statement regarding adjustments of existing forces: "Recognizing that the Alliance has not yet attained either the level or effectiveness of forces visualized in M.C. 48, and recognizing that the full achievement of the forward strategy is thereby delayed, the Military Committee nevertheless is of the opinion that, with little or no increase in current levels of defence expenditure, it is conceivable, through appropriate adjustments, for NATO defence forces to attain the equivalent fighting value envisaged by the 1956 planning goals in the 1953 Annual Review. However, the Military Committee recognizes that the attainment of an efficient air defence and early warning system in NATO, as well as the other measures recommended in the M.C. 48 series, will require additional expenditures which cannot wholly be offset by adjustments in present programs."

9. It would therefore appear that the Standing Group have not accepted the opinions expressed at the Defence Ministers' meeting that additional defence expenditures will not be forthcoming and that they must expect either these deficiencies to be met from mutual aid or by convincing member countries to increase their defence expenditures. It was suggested in the Permanent Council that a working group of military and political experts should be set up to work out a system of priorities which could be followed by member countries in re-organizing their forces on the basis of no increase in military expenditures. One of the difficulties in setting up such a joint group is that of securing independent military advice. This military advice should come from the Standing Group but it should be appreciated that the Standing Group do not give any military advice which is not previously cleared by their governments; therefore the military advice tendered by the Standing Group also contains the political advice of the three countries and quite often this type of advice is tempered by certain national political viewpoints. Furthermore, the Standing Group has already expressed a view on this question of an immediate review of priorities as expressed in their comments on the Annual Review:

"Should it become apparent to the NATO military authorities that the resources made available are insufficient to implement progressively those measures essential for the forward strategy, it would be incumbent on the military authorities to advise the Council that a reconsideration of that strategy should be undertaken. Until such time as the various military studies develop the overall requirements and indicate what adjustments are necessary both on a collective basis and in national programs, the Military Committee cannot determine the degree to which these measures will be implemented. Nevertheless, the Military Committee is of the opinion that the forward strategy is valid. In any case, the Military Committee is of the firm opinion that a sound military strategy for the successful and sustained defence of the NATO area requiring materially less effort than that now envisaged cannot be devised. In view of the above considerations, the Military Committee is of the opinion that any overall review in the near future could produce only inconclusive results."

Therefore it would appear very difficult for any such ad hoc committee as suggested by the Permanent Council to reach any conclusions on the basis of using the Standing Group.

10. It now appears that we have reached another impasse in NATO where the advice tendered by the military authorities would appear to be inconsistent with the economic policies of the member governments. In such a position a political decision is required on what military risks the Alliance is prepared to take to satisfy the budgetary requirements of the member nations, and it is considered appropriate that these risks should be taken by the governments with full knowledge of the military implications. If this premise is accepted, the following approach might be considered by the Council.

11. The Council should lay down certain general priorities and nations would be asked to consult with the appropriate military authorities in re-organizing their forces to take into consideration these general priorities laid down by the Council. The types of general priority which are considered are as follows:

M.C. 48/1 lays down the following:

- "In the face of the threat of such a war, the primary aim of NATO must more than ever before be to prevent war."
- "Priority must be given to the provision of forces in being capable of effectively contributing to success in the initial phase."

These two statements in themselves provide a considerable lead to establishing priorities. If it is accepted that the primary aim of NATO is to prevent war, then we should give first priority to those forces which create the deterrent; and therefore it would seem logical that the atomic striking forces and the means of defending them would be considered first priority. That would include early warning systems and air defence forces required to ensure the availability of the US-UK strategical air force and SACEUR's atomic striking force.

The second part of this quotation would give an indication of what perhaps would be the second and third priorities; namely, the forces required in the initial phase, which would be forces available from D-Day to D plus 30. These must be forces immediately ready and available in peacetime. It is felt that if this kind of an approach is made on the political level it would then appear logical for each nation to re-assess its own forces and, with the assistance of the Supreme Commanders or the Standing Group, make recommendations as to what forces they would be prepared to drop in order to create forces of high priority within the financial limits of the member nation.

12. The arrangement of priorities on this kind of basis has already been implemented in Canada. The Minister of National Defence issued a direction to the Chiefs of Staff on 9 March, 1955, to the effect that:

"At the Council meeting in December, 1954, M.C. 48 (Final) was approved and represents Canadian Government policy. This policy provides that:

'priority must be given to the provision of forces in being capable of effectively contributing to success in the initial phase. Other forces are required to contribute to subsequent operations, but in view of the importance of the initial phase and taking into account the limited resources which it is anticipated will be available, the build-up of these forces must be given a lower priority.'

Budgetary considerations and the plans of other countries in relation to the build-up of the forces described as having lower priority will make it difficult for Canada to proceed with the implementation of plans for forces other than those capable of effectively contributing to success in the initial phase.

"The Chiefs of Staff should, in formulating proposals for the raising and equipment of forces, have the considerations outlined above clearly in mind."

13. Studies are being made to determine by functions the costs of the various Canadian NATO commitments; for example, the cost of maintaining naval aviation training and the militia of Canada, and the cost of the maintenance and rotation of a brigade overseas and the Air Division in Europe. It is now obvious that further consideration should be given to the military value of maintaining one brigade in Europe, especially after the German contribution has been completed, about 1958. The rotation of this brigade and its dependents costs between two and three million dollars every second year for transportation and this expenditure does not in any way increase the military position of NATO. It is hoped that from this series of studies we may be in a better position to make recommendations as to what adjustments should be made to keep our forces in line with the concept outlined in M.C. 48 and M.C. 48/1 and make the greatest possible contribution to the defence of the whole of the NATO area.

14. At its 39th meeting held on 25 November, 1955, the Panel on Economic Aspects of Defence Questions noted the conflict between budgetary limitations of individual countries in the NATO alliance, on the one hand, and proposals for providing the most effective modern defence, on the other, and:

(a) agreed to recommend that Ministers recognize the need for, but not necessarily take the lead in advocating, a general reassessment of NATO's defence programme in the light of the current circumstances, with a view to determining how best the common defence might be achieved under the agreed strategic concepts (M.C. 48 series);-

(b) agreed that a burden-sharing exercise along the lines of that made by the "Three Wise Men" in 1952 was not desirable; also that individual requests by countries for advice from NATO military authorities would not be productive in meeting the situation;

(c) noted that suggestions as to procedure for a general reassessment or a reassessment of individual nations or groups of nations were under consideration in NATO; and

(d) agreed that "positive" NATO plans, such as the one for a co-ordinated air defence system of Europe, would have the effect of bringing some of the issues into clearer focus and facilitating the task of member countries in deciding what portion of their national programmes might be eliminated.<sup>129</sup>

DECEMBER MINISTERIAL COUNCIL MEETING

The full session of the Council opened at 11:00 a.m. this morning, and took note without any discussion of the progress report of the Secretary General. The rest of the morning session was devoted to the consideration of Item II on the agenda "Review of the International Situation".

2. Mr. Dulles made a fairly lengthy analysis of the development of Soviet policy during the year. He recalled that a year ago the Council met under the menace of the Soviet threat of the cancellation of the U.S.S.R. treaties with France and the U.K., and many of the members of the Council were wondering what would happen if we went ahead with the ratification of the London and Paris agreements.<sup>130</sup> At that time, he had said that these threats were typical of the Soviet reaction to any forward move to consolidate Western strength. His prophecy that the change would bring about a greater spirit of accommodation on the part of the Soviets proved to be correct. After Germany had joined NATO, there was a rapid change in Soviet policy which hitherto had been one primarily of direct action with menaces of war, e.g. the Czechoslovakian Coup, Korea, the Blockade of Berlin. Instead we witnessed the signature of the Austrian Treaty, the Pilgrimage to Belgrade, the Summit Conference at Geneva.

These recommendations were approved by Cabinet on December 7, 1955. For its discussion, see Document 155.

3. Of the Summit Conference, Dulles said that [it] produce[d] gains for the West as well as for the East. The Western Powers were able to demonstrate the sincerity of their desire for peace. President Eisenhower's proposal could only come from a man who had no aggressive intentions. The Soviet Union, on the other hand, gained from the meeting a respectability which it had not enjoyed theretofore. The position of the Soviet Union at the Conference, however, was ambiguous and the speech made by Bulganin after the final communiqué destroyed whatever hopes of reaching agreement may have been entertained.

4. In any event, the Foreign Ministers' Conference dissipated any such ambiguity. We learned the unreliability of Soviet agreements. At the Summit Conference, the Soviets had agreed that Germany should be reunified by means of free elections. This specific commitment was repudiated by Molotov who bluntly argued that the so-called "single-list" was the only proper basis for elections in Germany. In order to meet any legitimate desire for security on the part of the Soviets, the West put forward flexible and resourceful security proposals. We were entirely successful in driving out the Soviet Union from the position where it could oppose the reunification of Germany on security grounds. It became clear that the Soviets feared that free elections in East Germany would jeopardize the social gains achieved there by the Pankow régime.

5. It may be asked why the Soviets took such a rigid position. Mr. Dulles said that if, for instance, the Soviets had put in their proposal about the creation of an all-German Council, a clause to the effect that this body was not only meant to be a negotiating body between East and West Germany but that it would also consider the possibility of reunification, such a proposal might have proved to be embarrassing. (Mr. Dulles' remarks on this point are interesting in the light of Mr. Spaak's suggestion reported in Brussels' telegram No. 168 of December 9†).

6. With regard to the question of East-West contacts, the Soviets adopted a similar rigid position, and turned down the seventeen concrete proposals put to them.

7. On disarmament, they rejected President Eisenhower's proposals for exchange of blue-prints and aerial inspection, on the ground that such aerial inspection would only be useful in the last stage of disarmament controls.

8. Mr. Dulles then speculated on the reasons why the Soviets took the position they did. Probably out of strength because of their increasing industrial power and military potential. Probably out of fear for the artificial structure of the satellite countries. Probably also, out of a recrudescence of Stalinism as we have every reason to believe that Stalinism is still a very potent force within the Soviet Union.

9. Mr. Dulles said that since Geneva Conference No. 2, the Soviets had made further significant moves particularly in the Middle East and Asia. They certainly realize that the [oil?] resources of the Middle East are vital to Western Europe and NATO. They try in these areas to develop emotionalism, hatred and historical rivalries.

10. In conclusion, the Secretary of State said there seems to be no desire on the part of the Soviet Union to resume the direct action policies with menaces of limited conflicts which are characteristic of the first ten years of the post-war period. Finally, the present phase which is marked by the opening of the new cold war front in the Middle East, Near East and South Asia, poses a threat the seriousness of which cannot be minimized, but which, in his opinion, is not as great as the dangers we have had to face in the past and have successfully met.

11. We shall not attempt to summarize in as much detail the remarks made by M. Pinay as for the most part he took up the themes already developed by Mr. Dulles. At the end of his speech, however, M. Pinay broke some new ground. He said that the defence efforts of the West should not be limited to the military field but also extended to the economic field. He expressed the fear that the West had made some serious mistakes from the psychological point of view. It had put itself in a position where it was being out-paced by the Soviet Union regarding assistance to under-developed countries. He knew, of course, that the U.S. had already done a great deal in that direction and there existed the ambitious Point IV programme of the U.N.<sup>131</sup> but the question was whether NATO had a role to perform in this connection and whether it could reach agreement on a large scale programme of its own to bolster the present efforts of the U.N. From the public opinion point of view, there was much to gain in pursuing this policy. If the Soviets accepted such a programme, this would put an end to their present disruptive tactics. If they refused, their real aims would be exposed.

12. The most noteworthy remarks made by the German Foreign Minister related to the question of the security of Berlin and the economic role of NATO.

13. With regard to Berlin, von Brentano said that obviously Soviet diplomacy is becoming increasingly active. Because it is recognized that the security of the Berlin zone is essential to the security of Europe, permanent consultation is being carried out between West Germany, the United States, the United Kingdom and France. In his opinion, the time has come, however, where this process of consultation should be broadened to include all members of NATO.

14. Mr. von Brentano gave his full support to the views previously expressed by M. Pinay on the necessity of counteracting the current offensive in the economic and social fields initiated by the Soviets. The only valid answer to communism was a determined effort to eradicate poverty and misery wherever it could be found. Whether this effort should be made by NATO itself or elsewhere was relatively unimportant and he had an open mind on the subject.

15. M. Martino, for his part, thought that the answer to the Soviet threat was a dynamic policy of European integration designed to raise the standard of living of the European nations. European integration without military integration as envisaged originally under E.D.C.P.M. plans could not be represented by the Soviets as a threat to their security. We also had to contend with Soviet penetration in Asia and Africa through offers of economic and technical assistance. The NATO countries will have to pay increasing attention to the problems faced by under-developed territories.

16. The Turkish Representative (Ambassador Nuri-Birgi), basing his remarks on the report "Comparison of Economic Trends in NATO and Soviet Countries" also took up the theme of NATO's responsibilities regarding economic aid to under-developed countries. Such a policy is the only valid answer to the Soviet offensive in this field.

17. Nuri-Birgi then reported briefly on the last Bagdad Council meeting. A Permanent Secretariat has been established and a military and economic committee created. It has also been decided to establish a special body to combat subversive activities in the Middle East. Nuri-Birgi underlined the novelty of the decision to establish an economic committee. This

18. The Portuguese Foreign Minister ended up this phase of the discussion by developing the thought that NATO will have to extend its activities to the economic field and recognize the interdependence between Europe, Asia and Africa.

19. During the afternoon session, Item III of the Agenda was considered, but as the discussion took more technical lines, we shall report separately at a later date. You may be interested to know that at one stage of the discussions, Mr. Dulles referred to the recent admission of two NATO members, Italy and Portugal to the United Nations, expressing satisfaction over this development. Mr. Pearson happily summarized the general feeling by saying that he rejoiced over the fact that two of his NATO colleagues had now become colleagues in the U.N., expressing the hope that they will soon be followed by Germany.

NATO MINISTERIAL MEETING — REVIEW OF INTERNATIONAL SITUATION

The Council met in restricted session on Friday morning, December 16, to continue the discussions of the current international situation. The meeting was held in the smaller council room, and attendance was restricted to two at the table plus two in the seats behind for each delegation. Mr. Pearson and Mr. Harris attended for Canada, and were accompanied by Mr. Charles Ritchie and the Canadian Permanent Representative.<sup>132</sup> The discussion proved to be the best informal exchange of views that has ever taken place. It lasted for three hours, and was characterized by frankness, which augurs well for the future of political consultation within NATO.

2. Before the meeting, Mr. Macmillan had suggested to Mr. Pearson that he might lead off. Mr. Pearson commenced by referring to his visit to the Soviet Union which had served to confirm the conclusions and judgments he had previously reached.<sup>133</sup> He felt sure that the Russians were as anxious as we are that there should be no global war. They do not wish to provoke or participate in a war of total destruction. Furthermore, they believe that they can achieve their objectives without resort to war. Industrialization, agricultural problems and aid to China and under-developed countries, places demands on their economy which render relaxation of tension desirable. On the other hand, their basic policy and objectives have not changed. It is evident that they will continue to follow a zigzag policy towards the West — smiles alternating with threats. They probably need threats for domestic purposes in order to justify the sacrifices necessary to build up and maintain their armed forces. Their fundamental objective is to weaken and destroy NATO. They do not believe that they need war to destroy NATO because they think that in time NATO will wither away owing to the refusal of our peoples to accept the sacrifices involved.

3. Mr. Pearson then went on to express the view that the Soviet Union will exploit every opportunity to weaken the influence of NATO countries in all parts of the world. They made it clear to him, and this has been confirmed by the Foreign Ministers' meeting at Geneva, that on no account will they agree to the reunification of Germany except on their own terms. These terms are to bring a united and communist Germany into the Soviet camp. It is desirable that we should make this position clear to the public opinion of our countries.

4. He then pointed out that the problem of German reunification was primarily but not solely a question for the Germans to solve. He asked the question as to how long the German people — steady and firm though they are — will be prepared to stand the present position. He expressed the hope that the Federal Republic, with its freedom and prosperity, would prove a magnetic force for all Germans. In the meantime, the policy of non-recognition of East Germany does present problems. Nevertheless, the advantages of our present policy would appear to outweigh the disadvantages.

5. Mr. Pearson concluded by making an appeal for the development of political consultation, pointing out that the Permanent Council was a good agency for this purpose. He expressed the hope that the use of the Council may afford the opportunity for an imaginative and constructive approach to international problems as they arise.

6. Mr. Spaak of Belgium followed Mr. Pearson, and approved what had been said the previous day and by Mr. Pearson on the general situation. Our task, he said, is to build up our policy, and to make it clear to our peoples. For this reason, the communiqué to be issued at the conclusion of the meeting was particularly important since this was the first meeting of the Council since the Foreign Ministers' meeting at Geneva. He wanted to thank the Three Powers for the positions they had taken in Geneva and the ability and force with which they had presented the Western case. He then made his principal point which was that we must not fall into any trap prepared for us by the Soviet Union. While particular importance must be attached to the Middle East and Asian problems, this does not mean that the European problems have yet been solved. We cannot persuade our peoples that the failure of Geneva represents a solution to the German problem. We must look to the Germans themselves to help us with their advice. Finally, he referred to our weakness in the propaganda struggle in that our public opinion has not been convinced that the Soviet attitude at Geneva was solely negative. We should endeavour to put this right in the communiqué.

7. Mr. Theotokis of Greece agreed with Mr. Pearson that the Soviet Union wants to avoid global war because it would mean mutual destruction. He then went on to say that the West is in an inferior position so far as the propaganda struggle is concerned. We should make an attempt to organize our propaganda on a world-wide basis. While agreeing that the communiqué was important, he felt that the NATO countries should be able to anticipate Russian propaganda by taking the offensive themselves.

8. Dr. Cunha of Portugal followed with a long and discursive speech. He did not think it was necessary to say much more about the German problem even though in some countries doubts had been expressed about Geneva. It would, however, be important to know what the Germans themselves feel on this point. As a means of leading up to Goa, he first dealt with Africa, which he characterized as one of the weak spots of Western defence. Communist agents were active there, and all of the areas were inter-dependent. Hence, the problem was important not only for France. We have witnessed Communist penetration into Egypt and Libya, and even into the Portuguese parts of Africa. Their slogan was "Africa for the Africans". Dr. Cunha pointed out, however, that we cannot set peoples free who are not yet ripe for freedom. The NATO area was too restricted. On his recent visit to Norfolk, SACLANT had pointed out that he could not deal with the problems of the South Atlantic because they were outside the NATO area. Dr. Cunha then went on to deal with Asia, and referred to the communiqué which had been issued following his visit to Washington. This had been necessary to counteract the dangerous statements made by Indians and Burmese. After the British, the Portuguese know best Indian psychology. The more the Indians obtain, the more they want. Therefore, we must take a firm position vis-à-vis Asia. The Portuguese were not taking an intransigent position, and were prepared to consult with the Indians on problems arising out of the common border, provided always that the Indians recognized Portuguese sovereignty.

9. Dr. Cunha then stated that he felt it his duty to raise a delicate problem, which presented for some countries political difficulties. He was referring to the problem of Spain. There could be no dispute on military grounds regarding the case for Spanish adherence to NATO, either by becoming a full member or by some form of association which would link Spain with the Western defence system. Up to now, the West had not properly understood Spanish psychology, and by isolating Spain, we have strengthened and consolidated the present régime. After referring to Spanish pride, he went on to say that time was not playing in our favour, since the Spaniards were becoming less interested in joining NATO. If we waited too long, we might lose the benefit of their association.

10. Dr. Cunha concluded by referring to the propaganda theme which had been introduced by Mr. Spaak. He felt we had a duty to promote the interests of our own peoples in NATO. The youth of our countries do not realize the paramount importance of such an organization. For this reason, we should utilize sports and other types of activities which appeal to youth and help develop among them a better appreciation of what the organization stands for.

11. Mr. von Brentano of Germany then intervened with a very earnest and impressive speech. He spoke slowly and deliberately, and was under some difficulty in expressing in French the ideas he wished to convey; he commenced by supporting fully what Mr. Pearson had said about the Soviet Union. He then referred to the difficulty of speaking about his own country. He realized that by emphasizing their own problems, they could give rise to annoyance in other countries. However, the answer to the German problem might also help provide answers to the other problems with which we are concerned. There was no division in Germany on the fundamental objectives of German policy although there were differences about the means by which this policy should be pursued. The Bundestag has unanimously approved the objectives of German policy. Ollenhauer had agreed that no reunification was possible except in freedom, and that no negotiations with the Soviet Government were possible. The present division of Germany means that millions of his countrymen continue to live under a Bolshevik régime. This is repulsive to all Germans, and therefore the task for us all is to convince all Germans that our present policy is the only possible one. He therefore agreed that the communiqué to be issued at the end of this conference would be of paramount importance.

12. Mr. von Brentano continued, explaining their attitude towards Soviet bloc countries and particularly towards the D.D.R. While border traffic, postal services, etc. were functioning with the D.D.R., they were determined that there should be no official negotiations with the East Germans because this would be the first step towards recognition of East Germany by the outside world. He hoped NATO would reaffirm the London declaration recognizing the Federal Republic as the only government in a position to speak for the Germans. For reasons of trade, some countries have already commenced negotiations with the East Germans. However, it was absolutely necessary for the other NATO partners to support the Federal Republic in their stand. We must demonstrate the solidarity of the free world. Germans on both sides of the Iron Curtain must be made aware that only co-operation with the free world will guarantee reunification in freedom. The more our solidarity is demonstrated, the stronger we will be, not only on the military but also on the political and ideological planes. He concluded by stating that he did not think for one instant that there will be any doubts on the part of the German people, provided they continue to be assured of the support and solidarity of the Western world such as was demonstrated so well at Geneva.

13. Mr. Lange of Norway followed by stating that there could be no doubt as to the conditions that were put to the Soviets at Geneva, but in the minds of many people in the West, the point has become blurred. The impression has grown up in some circles in Norway that one condition was that Germany should remain in the Western camp. It was encouraging to hear of the unity and firmness of German opinion, but if we can reinforce this stand, we should do so. He referred to the Messina initiative, and said it would be unfortunate if European unity were to be disrupted through a tendency towards proceeding in small groups. While agreeing with Mr. Spaak that we must not be led astray and forget Europe, he endorsed what Mr. Pinay had said on the previous day when the latter drew attention to Soviet actions in relation to the under-developed countries. We must meet this challenge, but he felt that action should be through the United Nations where we could approach the under-developed countries on the basis of equality. There was a tendency by these countries to present NATO in the United Nations as an organization designed to protect imperialist interests. If this tendency develops, it would bring about a rift in our relations with these countries.

14. Mr. Lange then made a very frank statement about Spain. He wanted to issue a word of warning. We could not take any step which would be more detrimental to public support for NATO in some countries than by agreeing to the admission of Spain. Quoting from Article II about the strengthening of our free institutions, he said opinion in Norway would not agree that the institutions in Spain are free.

15. We then had a long discourse from Mr. Beyen of the Netherlands, who commenced by stating that we must be grateful for the clear indication Geneva has given us of Russian policy. More and more, NATO is becoming concerned with events outside the NATO area. We need not only strength but also patience. He saw dangers if we were to enter into too direct competition with our adversary in the propaganda battle. We were at a disadvantage in that it was more difficult to convey the truth, which was not so impressive as the simple lie. He agreed, however, that this year the communiqué was probably more important than it had ever been. Commenting upon what Mr. von Brentano had said, he agreed that one of the greatest mistakes we could make would be recognition of the D.D.R. in any form. He then went on to defend the Messina initiative admitting there was a problem of reconciling the danger to looser co-operation in a large group that comes from closer co-operation in a small group. He felt that this problem could be dealt with as it had been in other cases. He felt that we must encourage co-operation in smaller groups whenever this was possible. He then went on to assure the other Foreign Ministers in the name of his government that the basic principle of the Messina initiative was that the countries concerned were willing to do something in a smaller group that would prove to be impossible in a larger one. This, however, was subject to the proviso that such co-operation should not conflict with co-operation in the larger circle. He advised the other Foreign Ministers to re-read what had been agreed at Messina, and he felt that then many of their fears would disappear. Mr. Beyen concluded by asking the countries chiefly concerned to provide us with information about the problems of the Middle East, and the situation in Berlin.

16. Mr. Bech of Luxembourg read a prepared speech in which he stated that Geneva had disclosed that the basic Soviet aims were the expansion of Communism. The threat to the Middle East requires some form of counter-attack, but the only effective deterrent was strength. However, the real battle in such areas is an ideological one, and must be on the spiritual level. The Atlantic alliance should be more and more the basis from which we can counter Soviet propaganda.

17. Mr. Martino, the Foreign Minister of Italy, opened by stating that we were handicapped because of the very coherence of our attitude. We cannot change our policy overnight as the Russians do. Italian opinion had clearly understood what had transpired in Geneva. Therefore, there was no misapprehension in his country among the non-Communist parties. The Soviet aims had become clear when Molotov had advocated the "single list".

18. Getting back to the propaganda theme, Mr. Martino said that the Russians kept on repeating the same things even after we had exposed them as false. He illustrated this by mentioning the Carpenter incident.<sup>134</sup> He said that after Mr. Pearson had told them that Carpenter was not the Chief of the Canadian Air Staff, they had repeated this to another foreign visitor to Moscow a few weeks after Mr. Pearson had left. He added that we cannot indulge in such practices because we can only say what in our conscience we believe to be the truth.

19. Mr. Martino then came to the defence of Messina, stating that the commitments entered into by the six countries will have to stand. He discounted the danger pointed out by Mr. Lange by referring to the fact that the door is left open to other countries to join. The six countries may prove to be the nucleus, capable of expansion, of a United Europe. Mr. Spaak has still to complete the work which he is conducting with so much ability and vigour. Economic integration should be regarded as the first step towards the political unification of Europe. It is action of this kind that appeals to the imagination of youth. Their aim is the unity of Europe — not the division of Europe.

20. Mr. Macmillan, for the United Kingdom, commenced by referring to the October meeting of the Council prior to the Foreign Ministers' meeting in Geneva. The Three Powers had regarded themselves as trustees for all of the NATO countries. They had presented a strong common front in Geneva, and had received help from the close co-operation extended by the German representatives. He could not conceal his disappointment at the outcome of the Geneva meeting, and this disappointment must be still greater in Germany. He wished to pay a tribute to the strength and solidarity of the German people. At Geneva, <sup>134</sup> Pendant la visite de Pearson en Union soviétique, le vice-premier ministre Lazar Kaganovich lui a montré un article de TASS en date du 4 octobre dans lequel on rapporte les propos suivants du Chef des opérations aériennes de l'Aviation royale du Canada (ARC), commodore de l'air Fred S. Carpenter : « our position is to make the Russians know we can knock hell out of them. ». Voir Globe and Mail, October 11, 1955.

During Pearson's visit to the Soviet Union, he was confronted by Deputy Prime Minister Lazar Kaganovich with a TASS report (October 4) quoting the RCAF Chief of Air Operations, Air Commodore Fred S. Carpenter, as saying that "our position is to make the Russians know we can knock hell out of them." See Globe and Mail, October 11, 1955.

they had put forward a plan for security as the basis for negotiation. It had been misrepresented that the Three Powers were demanding the inclusion of a United Germany in NATO. The free choice, which was to be left to the German people, had perhaps not sufficiently been brought out. However, as the conference proceeded, it became quite clear that Soviet objections to the re-unification of Germany were not on military or security grounds but solely on political grounds. They were not prepared to forego control of East Germany. He had been surprised at the frank disclosure by Mr. Molotov of Russian aims. This was a point which was necessary to ram home to our peoples.

21. He felt that the Russians were not disturbed by the power of NATO but rather by the existence of an organization in which the old and new worlds are joined. This organization provided the main basis for political stability in Europe, and hence was a natural object of Soviet attack.

22. Coming back to the Geneva conference, Mr. Macmillan stated that the Russians tore up the directive about free elections which had been agreed to in July. Mr. Molotov went out of his way to praise elections by means of a single list. By doing so, he indicated clearly that the Russians refuse to surrender ground gained for the Communist ideology. This affects not only East Germany, since ground lost there would be bound to have an effect on the satellites. Hence, it was not for security reasons that they fear the re-unification of Germany but for the more fundamental reasons derived from their basic aims.

23. He then went on to deal with the recent developments in Asia and the Far East. There had been a lull in the Far East, but this was probably because other areas offered more promising grounds for the exploitation of differences. The Czech arms deal may prove to have not been so clever, as it has caused a certain shock to the countries concerned, and for this reason, may facilitate a solution of the Israel problem.<sup>135</sup> It is obvious that the Russians are exploiting all situations that can give rise to difficulty. Kashmir is another example. Another illustration was the caricature of what the West had done for the East. The Indians know better what the West has done for them. Nevertheless, such propaganda can be dangerous. How it can be countered, poses a difficult problem. The formation of the Bagdad Pact has been a constructive step, not only strategically but from the political point of view.<sup>136</sup> It is essential that we deal with under-developed countries on the basis of equality, and the Bagdad Pact is of this character. The Russians are saying that the West only wants to dominate, but this can be refuted by partnerships, such as the Colombo Plan and the Bagdad Pact. He felt that this was the best possible answer to Soviet propaganda. Another was to make every effort to remove the causes of disruption wherever they may arise. He agreed with Mr. Spaak, however, that we must never for a moment forget about Europe. This brought him back to Germany, which he described as a loyal partner. We must support in whatever way we can the German Government, and support the will to resist of the German people. He referred to the London Declaration, and re-affirmed this is a basis of British policy. The Soviet Union will do everything possible to force recognition of the D.D.R., but we must remain firm on the question of principle. He concluded by agreeing on the importance of the communiqué, which was to be issued following the meeting.

24. Mr. Hansen, the Prime Minister and Foreign Minister of Denmark, made a short intervention to report on the invitation which he had received to visit Moscow. This invitation followed similar invitations to the Heads of the Swedish and Norwegian Governments. He proposed to make the visit in March next, and a report will be made to the Permanent Council following the visit. Mr. Hansen then supported what Mr. Lange had said about Spain, and concluded by referring to the importance of propaganda about NATO among youth.

25. Mr. Pinay, for France, referred to the suggestions which had been made for counter-propaganda. He considered that it was indispensable that we create the right psychological climate. He therefore made a formal proposal for the creation of a committee within NATO to deal with counter-propaganda against Communist propaganda.

26. Mr. Birgi of Turkey supported the proposal for common action in the field of counter-propaganda, and approved the suggestion that a committee be established for this purpose.

27. Dr. von Hallstein, the German Secretary of State, then spoke on behalf of Mr. von Brentano, and outlined the situation concerning Berlin. The status of Berlin depends upon the Potsdam Treaty, and this had not been changed by the granting of sovereignty to the D.D.R. Following the blockade of Berlin, an agreement had been concluded in 1949 by the Four Powers covering goods-traffic between the Federal Republic and Berlin. At the end of September, the Soviet Union had concluded an agreement with the D.D.R., giving the latter full jurisdiction over their relations with other countries, including the Federal Republic. They were also granted jurisdiction over lines of communication and patrol of the borders. On December 15, the Soviet Government had answered the recent Western protest by referring to this agreement with the D.D.R. This should be regarded as another of the steps to force recognition of the D.D.R. The Federal Republic has resisted all efforts of the D.D.R. to get into touch with officials of the Federal Republic. The policy of the Federal Republic was to avoid any contacts that could be construed as official. They have established a consultative group with the Three Powers, which will consider each situation as it arises. What is important is that one has to see all these moves by the Soviet Union as part of a political strategy leading eventually to recognition of the D.D.R.

28. Von Hallstein had made the statement about Berlin in response to the request of Mr. Beyen of the Netherlands. Since it was then well past one o'clock, the meeting adjourned, and the prevailing opinion among Foreign Ministers after the meeting was that the discussion had been most useful. It had demonstrated once more the value of political consultation within NATO.

29. As a result of the Council's discussion on the communiqué, it was agreed that Mr. von Brentano and Mr. Spaak would recast themselves the text of the draft communiqué prepared by the Working Group. The German and Belgian Foreign Ministers did not, therefore, attend the afternoon plenary session of the Council when the agenda item on Article 2 was discussed. (We shall be reporting separately on this phase of the Council's discussions). In spite of certain misgivings on the part of the French over the Brentano-Spaak version of the communiqué which in their view placed too much emphasis on the German problems, the final text, which by now had much more political punch to it, was approved after a number of drafting changes, at 9:15 p.m. last night.<sup>137</sup>

NATO MINISTERIAL COUNCIL — IMPLEMENTATION OF ARTICLE 2

The discussion on the implementation of Article 2 which took place in the afternoon of December 16 was introduced by Mr. Martino whose government had proposed this item on the agenda. He and most of the speakers who followed him referred to the three aspects of co-operation under Article 2: (i) consultation and co-ordination in the field of foreign policy; (ii) social questions, including propaganda and the exchange of information and (iii) economic co-operation. Little that was new emerged on the first two aspects, although several ministers stressed the importance of increased efforts in the psychological and propaganda fields.

2. The discussion on economic co-operation may be considered from two aspects, (i) the principle of holding discussions in NATO on economic subjects and (ii) problems of substance. On the question of principle all ministers who made statements were in favour of holding periodic reviews on economic questions. It was significant, however, that Messrs Dulles, Macmillan, and Pinay were among the ministers who did not intervene. We heard prior to the meeting that the United States and United Kingdom, while not wishing to prevent discussions on economic questions, nevertheless were not yet convinced of the usefulness of holding such discussions in NATO. We heard also that Mr. Beyen had pressed M. Spaak to make a statement on the Common Market but he had not been willing to do so. Mr. Humphrey had also been asked to make a statement on the positive aspects of U.S. co-operation, but in the end, he also refrained.

3. The substance of this first NATO discussion on economic questions was relatively meagre although some useful statements were made. The two main points mentioned were the development of economically weak areas and the Common European Market. However, since the ministers of the larger countries were not prepared to intervene, even these subjects were not by any means fully discussed.

4. The outcome of the debate nevertheless established the principle of considering economic questions within the organization. Ministers adopted the following resolution:

(1) Recognizing that recent developments in the international situation make it necessary to have closer co-operation between members of the alliance, as envisaged in Article 2 of the Treaty;

(2) Taking note of the statements made to this effect at the present Ministerial Meeting;

(3) Decides to instruct the Permanent Council to examine and implement all measures conducive to this end;

(4) Took note of the statements made in the course of discussion and invited the Council in Permanent Session to consider further the proposals made.

5. On Monday we shall send you a summary of the statements made by individual ministers including the statement made by Mr. Pearson.

NATO MINISTERIAL MEETING; ITEM III (A), NATO DEFENCE PLANNING,
THE 1955 ANNUAL REVIEW

We give below the text of the statement delivered by Mr. Campney under the above-mentioned agenda item. This statement is contained in verbatim record C-VR(55)59 and has incorrectly been attributed to Mr. Pearson. We are taking steps to have this changed and are also drawing attention to a small error in this record in respect of the name of the existing Canadian aircraft carrier. Document C-VR(55)59 also contains the remarks made by Mr. Wilson concerning defence planning and the development of the United States Mutual Defence Assistance Program.

Text of Mr. Campney's statement:

Begins: Quote:

"Mr. Chairman, in dealing briefly with recommendations in the Annual Review, both in respect of the General Chapter and in respect of the Country Chapter on Canada, I should like first to refer to the recommendations contained in both chapters with respect to the desirability of continuing mutual aid. I can assure you that the Canadian Government will, as always, examine these recommendations with care. Since its inception in 1951/52, Canada has continued year by year to make substantial contributions to NATO associates. By the end of our current financial year which is the 31st March next, the total of these contributions over the period will be of the value of approximately one and one third billions of dollars. Of this amount, over 400 million dollars represents equipment from Canadian stocks, including the complete equipment for four divisions of infantry.

"On the other hand, approximately 300 millions of dollars worth of equipment and material were allocated to NATO countries from new Canadian production, nearly 200 million of which constituted aircraft and aeroplane engines and spare parts. Nearly 300 millions was expended by Canada on NATO aircrew training during that period. We are continuing mutual aid on a slightly reduced scale during the coming year. I should mention in that connection that practically all our mutual aid this coming year will be from new Canadian production of modern equipment. We will also be continuing NATO aircrew training at its present level.

"I might mention also that, along with our neighbours the United States, we are making very substantial expenditures on new projects designed to provide warning and added air defence in North America as a deterrent to any attack on that area.

"In regard to the specific recommendations of the Annual Review as regards Canada, I would like to make a few comments. The first recommendation for Canada to provide two aircraft carriers in order that one should be constantly available cannot be fully accepted by our government. We will, however, do all in our power to ensure the least possible delay in the period during which the new aircraft carrier the Bonaventure is being commissioned and the old one, the Magnificent is being decommissioned.

"It will be recalled that at the meeting of the Council a year ago I stated that we were intensively reviewing the problem of time-phasing of escort vessels. I am happy to be able to say that as a result of these studies, we now plan by December 1956 to increase the D-Day availability of destroyer and ocean escort from 15 to 29.

"The recommendation from the international staff that the Canadian government should, in connection with mutual aid, give special attention to high-performance modern aircraft has been and will continue to receive the urgent consideration of the Canadian Government. Thank you." Unquote. Ends.

NATO MINISTERIAL COUNCIL MEETING — IMPLEMENTATION OF ARTICLE II

In our telegram under reference, we sent you our general impressions of the discussion of this item. The following is a brief summary of main points made by ministers who intervened. You will have the summary record and verbatims for closer examination.

2. Sr. Martino (Italy) opened the discussion. He said that the alliance must foresee a long period of "competitive co-existence" in which rivalry between the West and the Soviet bloc would be transferred from the purely military field to non-military fields. He noted that, in the political field, co-operation within the alliance had made significant progress. On the question of psychological co-operation, the alliance's objectives had been too modest. NATO should seek to release itself from its position of psychological inferiority which stemmed from the fact that the other side had taken the initiative in this field. The organization needed new directives and means for action.

3. Sr. Martino's statement (was?) principally directed to the need for economic co-operation within NATO. He thought the time had come for this problem to be boldly reconsidered. The alliance should investigate what it had of co-ordinating its technical, financial, and manpower resources in order to assist under-developed countries which lay between the Western and Soviet worlds. He made two specific proposals: (1) the countries concerned should endeavour to reach agreement on a common European market as quickly as possible; (2) there should be collective action to develop the economically weak countries in the alliance.

4. He concluded by expressing the view that it would be desirable for member countries to use NATO to lay down the principles which should guide them all, both when acting individually and as members of other organizations.

5. Mr. Beyen (Netherlands) pointed out that although Article II contained principles for the guidance of member countries, it did not prescribe in which way the principles should be carried out. Economic co-operation between NATO member countries in other organizations should be regarded as an implementation of Article II. He referred at length to the work of OEEC in this connection, which he described as "of terrific and inestimable value". It was the direct concern of NATO that OEEC should continue in existence. NATO should publicize the fact that, in OEEC, the economic side of the work of co-operation between NATO countries was very largely implemented. He thought ways should be found of strengthening the links between the OEEC and NATO Councils. The political overtones of the economic and financial work done in O.E.E.C. had been overlooked to some extent. This was a gap which could be filled by NATO. The remainder of Mr. Beyen's statement, apart from a reference to propaganda, was devoted to a lengthy dissertation on the development of under-developed countries with reference to the work done in other organizations. He emphasized that development was not merely a matter of money, but depended on education, organization, and planning. He thought the effects of Russian gifts would not, for a long time to come, endanger the efforts of the Western world. The only advantage enjoyed by the Soviet Union in this field was its complete lack of respect for the social structures it was pretending to assist. Should NATO enter this field, care should be taken that receiving countries should participate as equal members.

6. Mr. Beyen thought NATO should not try to do any practical work on the development of under-developed countries, and he referred again to the connection with OEEC. The Permanent Council should be asked to consider the organizational aspects of this question and to provide a basis for discussions in ministerial meetings.

7. Mr. Hansen (Denmark) proposed that the Information Committee should be asked to consider and make proposals for holding a NATO Youth Rally in the summer of 1957. Costs would be met by common financing.

8. Mr. Theotokis (Greece) supported Mr. Martino's remarks concerning the interpretation of Article II. He agreed that NATO countries should adopt a co-ordinated position within other international organizations by means of prior consultation.

9. The Greek Government felt that the reappearance of Soviet influence in the economic field in the Middle East might be offset if NATO countries could combine to work together for the development of under-developed countries. Simultaneously, something should be done to assist certain under-developed regions in Europe, particularly in the South. Before trying to promote economic integration of Europe, means should be found for remedying the under-development of certain countries. In addition to aid, he thought that the North and North Western European countries might copy the recent Russian initiatives for the purchase of Egyptian cotton and Burmese rice. Purchase of the surplus products of Southern Europe without close reference to commercial considerations would have important favourable political repercussions. In an oblique reference to the Common Market, he said that the Greek Government wished to see such a project widely adopted in Europe.

10. Mr. Lange (Norway) intervened to support Mr. Beyen's view that the economic aspects of Article II were being largely implemented in other organizations. He thought this point should be stressed publicly but should not prevent periodic reviews in the North Atlantic Council of the whole field of economic and cultural relations. He also supported strongly the Danish proposal for a NATO Youth Rally.

11. Mr. Nuri Birgi (Turkey) supported at some length Mr. Martino's reference to the psychological aspect of co-operation within NATO. He agreed that propagandist efforts of NATO should be entrusted to a body of highly qualified personnel for all NATO countries. Mr. Nuri Birgi also agreed with Mr. Martino's proposals concerning economic co-operation and the question of aid to under-developed countries.

12. Mr. Pearson: We are forwarding in to-day's bag a copy of the notes† from which Mr. Pearson made this statement. Mr. Pearson referred in turn to the three aspects of Article II co-operation: consultation on foreign policy, social questions including propaganda, and finally, economic co-operation. With regard to political consultation, he thought real and encouraging progress had been made in the Permanent Council but that greater use might be made of its conclusions in the formulation of national foreign policies. Discussions in the Permanent Council could never take the place of ministerial consultation. He thought Foreign Ministers should allot more time to political consultation at Council meetings, and that more time should be allotted to the preparation of the ministerial communiqués which were important psychological instruments.

13. Mr. Pearson then referred to the memorandum on economic co-operation circulated by the Canadian Delegation,<sup>138</sup> and reviewed its substance, i.e., that provision should be made for discussions in NATO on economic collaboration and avoidance of conflict in international economic policies within the context of Article II. The intention was not the establishment of new international economic machinery but to provide an opportunity for an exchange of views on the adequacy of current economic policies and international arrangements to fulfill the purposes of Article II.

14. Mr. Pearson then made reference to the Common Market initiative, emphasizing the Canadian Government's sympathy with the political objectives of uniting European countries but expressing concern lest the creation of a Common Market among six European countries should create off-setting effects which would serve to divide rather than unite the various areas of the alliance. He stressed the importance of strengthening economic unity and stability in the free world as a whole. Mr. Pearson did not express a view on the development of under-developed countries other than to agree that Permanent Council might study this question.

15. Mr. Cunha (Portugal) reaffirmed his country's opinion that the time had come for the Atlantic community to extend its sphere of activity by a full implementation of Article II. He agreed that there should be greater impetus in the information and propaganda fields, and supported the Netherlands' proposal that a special body should be set up to deal with this problem. He agreed that more attention should be paid to NATO youth, and suggested that sport might be used as a means of influencing young people. Mr. Cunha agreed with Mr. Theotokis' view on the need for NATO countries to concert their policy in other international organizations.

16. Mr. Cunha referred briefly to the proposals for creating a Common Market between six European countries. While this idea might be theoretically sound, it nevertheless created serious problems for countries which were prevented for various reasons from participating immediately in the Common Market. The immediate creation of such a market would be tantamount to dividing Europe. He therefore thought it would be wise to study the Common Market proposal within the broader European framework of the O.E.E.C. An opportunity would be provided by the OEEC Ministerial Council meeting which was to take place in February. The OEEC could examine the difficulties which a Common Market would raise in the various countries, as well as any ways which might exist for overcoming them. Following Mr. Cunha's intervention, a short discussion took place in connection with the drafting of a resolution, the text of which was sent to you in our telegram under reference.

NATO MINISTERIAL MEETING — 1955

The annual Ministerial meeting of the North Atlantic Council afforded an opportunity for the fifteen member governments to exchange views and reach agreement on three basic questions:

- (a) the military problems of the alliance;
- (b) the international situation in the light of the Geneva Conference;
- (c) the future development of the Atlantic community.

The Military Problems

2. The defence preparations of the alliance are designed to provide a major deterrent to aggression, to enable NATO forces to defeat aggression should it occur, and to provide a high measure of confidence and security during the cold war. In 1954 the Council approved a basic strategic concept which recognized the primary importance of atomic and thermo-nuclear weapons in any major war in the foreseeable future and the consequent necessity of giving priority to the provision of "forces in being" capable of operating effectively in the initial phase of such a war.

3. The main problem which faced the Council in 1955 was a lag in putting the agreed strategy into effect, despite a continued build-up of Soviet military capabilities. This lag was the result of the delay in obtaining a German contribution, the slow development of "forces in being", the obsolescence of much of the equipment of the European NATO partners, and the redeployment of some of these forces (e.g. to North Africa). It was essential, therefore, to decide how to adjust the defence efforts of the alliance to achieve the most effective pattern of forces within the resources likely to be available (and it was unrealistic to expect these resources to increase), which is a problem fundamentally of priorities.

4. At its Ministerial meetings on December 15 and 16, 1955, the Council reaffirmed the basic strategic objectives of the alliance. It agreed both on the minimum measures that are necessary to adapt NATO military forces for a possible future war and on the general order of magnitude of these forces. Principles to govern the development of defence planning, both collectively and nationally, were adopted; and as a first step it was decided that specific defence problems of general significance would be discussed separately, on a collective basis, beginning early in 1956. Thus there will be a re-appraisal of NATO defence problems, but it will be limited to specific questions and will not take the form (desired by some) of a comprehensive re-examination of everything that NATO is doing.

5. In future, when the NATO military authorities are asked by governments to give advice on the most effective pattern of national forces, they will have the authority to recommend changes even in the force goals approved by the Council, should they consider this to be necessary in order to ensure that what is most important is provided. It was agreed, however, that the Council would be given an opportunity to consider any significant alterations in national defence programmes based on such advice before the plans were put into effect.

6. The Council recognized that the emphasis on having the most modern weapons required that all NATO governments be given the maximum amount of information on new developments, and in this connection it received assurances from the United States and the United Kingdom that information on a number of new types of weapons would be made available.

7. One specific problem to which the Council devoted some attention was the urgent need for an effective air defence and warning system in Western Europe. It decided that the Supreme Allied Commander Europe would be responsible for co-ordinating the air defence of NATO European countries. The main outlines of the system to be developed by SACEUR were also approved.

8. In general it may be said that the Council at this meeting showed an encouraging degree of unanimity and resolution on the principal military problems facing the alliance. How far the specific decisions taken at the meeting will be effective in implementing the basic NATO strategy will not be apparent for several months, but at least it was evident that on the nature of the problems, and on the nature of the measures required to deal with them, there was no substantial difference of opinion.

The International Situation

9. In the political field the Council had a useful discussion on Soviet trends and intentions and the continuing Soviet threat in non-military fields. Since the Geneva Conference of Foreign Ministers had ended only a few weeks earlier, and since this was the first annual meeting at which German representatives were present, it was natural that the German problem should be given major attention. Soviet activities in the Middle East and Asia were discussed by several ministers. Some consideration was also given to the long-term problems raised by the fact that the rate of economic growth in the Soviet bloc is more rapid than in the NATO countries.

10. Although there were of course differences of emphasis, it was apparent that all members of the Council were in substantial agreement both in their assessments of Soviet policy and on the broad outlines of recent Western policy towards the Soviet Union. There was a general awareness that the Soviet leaders were exploiting in their current diplomatic offensive all situations that could give rise to difficulties for the members of NATO with the object of breaking up the unity of the alliance. There was an evident conviction that greater unity is the only possible answer to these tactics.

11. On the German problem (which was discussed in restricted session) the unanimity was particularly striking. The Council reaffirmed that the objective of the North Atlantic powers is the reunification of Germany in freedom, which is an essential condition of a just and lasting peace. It reaffirmed also the Western position that the Federal German Government is the only government entitled to speak for Germany in international affairs. The security and welfare of Berlin were recognized by the Council as "essential elements of the peace of the free world". Finally, it urged the importance of further consultation within NATO on the German question. The importance attached by the Council to public understanding of the Western position on Germany was emphasized by the prominence accorded to it in the communiqué.

12. Several ministers expressed forcefully the view that more concerted and active Western policies were needed in relation to the underdeveloped areas of the world, especially in view of the use made by the Soviet Government of economic aid in their diplomatic offensive.

The Future Development of the Atlantic Community

13. The December Ministerial meeting marked a step in the direction of the development of NATO as something more than a purely military alliance. The exchange of views on the current international situation was considered to be the best to date and there is now no doubt that the Council is coming to be regarded as an important forum where members hear each other's views and where possible try to achieve a political alignment on outstanding issues. This is not to say that a common policy will necessarily emerge or that the point has yet been reached where the United States, the United Kingdom and France regard consultation in the Council as an essential prerequisite to the formulation of their own policies on important political questions of concern to all of us. (Mr. Dulles did not speak at the restricted session.) Nevertheless there is a steady and satisfactory growth in that direction.

14. Another important development was the discussion in the Council of economic matters. Although participation was limited — the Big Three did not speak — the views expressed, even though preliminary, were important because they established the precedent for further discussions of this nature at future Ministerial meetings. It is too early to say whether the United States, the United Kingdom and France will have overcome their initial reluctance to participate in them. If they do, the Council may come to play a useful role in helping to fulfil one of the purposes of Article 2 — the elimination of conflict in economic policies and the encouragement of economic collaboration between any or all of the members. No Minister suggested that the Council should establish new economic machinery, but a variety of opinions was expressed on the extent to which the Council should attempt to reach agreement on common economic policies.

15. Various suggestions were made about increasing NATO's activities in the social, information, and propaganda fields. The Danish proposal that there should be a NATO Youth Rally was sympathetically received and Mr. Pinay formally proposed that NATO become more active in the field of psychological warfare by creating a committee of experts to deal with counter-propaganda against Communist propaganda. There was insufficient time to consider fully the implications of these and other proposals, but the Permanent Council has been given the broad directive of examining and implementing all measures which will bring about closer cooperation between members of the alliance, as envisaged in Article 2.

Conclusions

16. This meeting emphasized the growing importance of the political aspects of NATO. Although important decisions were taken on military matters, most of the preparatory work had been done beforehand. Ministers were therefore able to devote most of their time to consultation on non-military subjects. The discussions reflected in part the concern of the Ministers over the new initiatives of the Soviet Government in diplomacy and economic assistance. The final Communiqué, which for the first time was mainly drafted by the Foreign Ministers themselves, especially by Dr. von Brentano and M. Spaak, was deliberately designed to draw public attention to their unanimity on the Germany problem. The meeting demonstrated that member Governments attach as much importance to maintaining the unity of the alliance as to its military strength.

COMMONWEALTH PRIME MINISTERS' CONFERENCE
LONDON, JANUARY-FEBRUARY, 1955

Saturday, January 29, 1955

We arrived at 2.20 p.m., London time, after a very good flight. Gander, however, was in the midst of a howling winter blizzard, and it was good to get out of there. There was quite a crowd to see us off, with the usual press, TV, photographers, etc.

I dined on the plane with the Prime Minister and his daughter, Madame Samson, who was making her first flight. She seemed in better spirits about it than the P.M., who is tired and rather low in mood, and not looking forward much to the London meetings.

My own participation in the conference was so sudden that it is hard to realize that I am here. It was only on Thursday that Norman Robertson phoned from London to the effect that Eden was anxious that I should come across if at all possible; especially in view of recent developments over Formosa which he wished to discuss with me. The P.M. was, I think pleased to have me go along, but a little worried as to the interpretation which might be given to my last-minute inclusion in the delegation. I wrote him a short statement to give to the House on Thursday afternoon which attempted to explain the matter in unexciting terms, and which was pretty well received.<sup>1</sup>

We have on our delegation Jules Léger, Ross Martin and Jim Cross of the Prime Minister's office; and Don Cornett from External Affairs.

There was quite a crowd to receive the P.M. at London Airport, including Lord Swinton and Norman Robertson. However, we got through the ceremonial part without too much delay and were in the "dear old Dorchester" by tea time.

I dined that evening with Norman Robertson and Mitchell Sharp, who had come over from Geneva, where the GATT delegation are very worried by what they considered to be the completely negative approach to GATT matters we are taking in Ottawa. We talked about this for some time and I think I cheered Sharp up by telling him about my conversation on Friday with C.D. Howe and Walter Harris, as a result of which they will be given more leeway, especially in their negotiations with the Americans.<sup>2</sup>

Sunday, January 30, 1955

I motored through the country this morning to have lunch with Eden at the Foreign Secretary's new country place, Dorney Wood, which was recently given to the nation by Courtauld-Thomson. It is a rambling structure filled with the most amusing collection of Victorian furniture, bric-à-brac and odds and ends — much of it junk, but some of it very beautiful.

The Prime Minister of New Zealand, Mr. Holland, (who told me to call him Syd!), was also there, and Dennis Allen, the Far Eastern expert at the Foreign Office.

We spent a couple of hours discussing Formosa, about which Eden is very worried. Our views seem to be along the same line; to do what we can to hold the Americans back from rash support for Chiang Kai-shek, but, at the same time, to appreciate the Administration's political difficulties. Holland, who had just come from Washington, is not so worried and seems satisfied with U.S. policy. I am afraid he was talking in Washington only to the "good people".

This evening I discussed GATT matters further with Mitchell Sharp who had had dinner with the P.M. and was going back to Geneva in the morning in a much happier frame of mind. He is quite right in his view that we should not sulk in the corner at Geneva, merely because we have been unable to get our own way with the Americans in the matter of the 'waiver'.

I also discussed with the Prime Minister tonight his Guildhall speeches about which he is very worried. If he were in good condition he would take this sort of thing in his stride, but his fatigue and rather low spirits make him unduly apprehensive about public speeches of this kind in London; from a French-Canadian. We will have to cheer him up, and as a first step, I have undertaken, with Norman Robertson, to write him a new speech. He doesn't like the Ottawa drafts.

Monday, January 31, 1955

The Commonwealth Conference opened this afternoon at No. 10, with the inevitable preliminary formalities, photographs, etc. After that we moved to the historic old Cabinet room and got down to business at once. Sir Winston spoke two or three times during the afternoon on the international situation, and he was in really magnificent form — vigorous, imaginative, impressive, and picturesque. He also has the same old mischievous glint in his eye. Because he is deaf, his whispers become shouts, and it was amusing to hear him interrupt speakers by addressing observations to Sir Norman Brook (who is the Secretary of the meetings) some of which the rest of us were certainly not meant to hear.

It is fascinating cross section of the world which is represented at this conference, with about as many views as there are governments, but everybody very sincerely anxious to benefit from the viewpoints of the others and to find the highest common denominator of agreement. That, after all, is the value of the Commonwealth association. One could hardly imagine personalities and policies so different than those of, say, Nehru and Sir Godfrey

Huggins from Rhodesia, and yet there seems to be a "family approach" to problems which is encouraging, almost unique.

Nehru, for instance, discussed the state of the world today in purely Indian neutralist terms, very friendly but very detached, while Holland kept referring to the "British Empire", and even, on one occasion, to "our England"! The South African representative, a 6'5" Cabinet Minister named Swart, made a good impression in his obvious desire to impress on the others that he was glad to be there and to show that the new Government in South Africa is not composed of isolationist ogres.

Nehru gave us a rather dramatic picture of his visit to Peking and his interpretation of recent Chinese developments in which he emphasized again that the Chinese revolution is more economic, nationalist and socialist than Communist; far more Chinese than Cominform. In his mild manner he criticized the rest of us for the basic unreality of our attitude toward China in refusing to recognize facts. Incidentally, Mohammed Ali took almost the opposite viewpoint, and was just as free with such expressions as "defence of the free world" as Menzies or Holland. Our own Prime Minister's intervention was short but effective. He commands great respect here.

Toward the end of the meeting Sir Winston made a really eloquent and moving defence of the United States against the unfair criticism which is often levelled at it. I wonder what kind of an impression this made on Nehru. He also paid a glowing tribute to his Foreign Secretary, which was echoed by other people around the table. Eden's star is very much in the ascendancy at the moment. He is no longer the heir apparent, he is the heir.

After the meeting there was the usual Lancaster House reception given by the Swintons, at which one fleetingly met everybody and got exhausted in the process.

Dined alone at the hotel and spent some time afterwards with the P.M. discussing Far Eastern matters and, more particularly, those damned Guildhall speeches.

Tuesday, February 1, 1955

The Prime Ministers' Conference resumed this morning at 11.00 — my own conference having begun at 9.30 when I saw the Canadian journalists who are here. Yesterday it was agreed at Downing Street that, as is customary, we would issue a daily communiqué which told nothing and that would be all. As is customary also, each delegation is seeing its own press and tells more. However, the Downing Street conferences really are secret, with very little press pressure, so I confine my talks with our own journalists to background, fill-ins and colour!

Eden this morning gave an impressive analysis of recent European developments leading up to the Paris agreements, during which he was good enough to say I had played some part in all this. He was clear, comprehensive and even dramatic; at his best — with Sir Winston, puffing at one of those out-size cigars he is always pressing us to smoke, quite pleased with the performance of his protégé.

Again we went round the table, with our P.M. beginning. He made a most useful statement on Canada's support of the Paris agreements.<sup>3</sup>

The "old man" (W.S.C[hurchill]) was very impressive on Germany; recognizing the element of risk but asserting that it was the part of statesmanship "to forgive and forget,

This refers to the agreements negotiated in 1954 on the restoration of German sovereignty. See Volume 20, Chapter 3, Part 4.

and if you can't forgive, forget". "Fear from the past must not determine the pattern of the future", etc.

Only Menzies introduced a controversial note when he expressed regret that the U.K. had not consulted them before giving the 44-year pledge. Eden pleaded no time (which was true).

Nehru wondered whether 12 German divisions were worth the increased tension that rearming Germany would cause, and he was given the usual reply.

The Foreign Secretary then gave a lucid and, on the whole, optimistic review of developments in the Near and Middle East, stressing that there could be no assurance of stability in that area, however, until economic conditions had improved and the Israel-Arab feud had been healed.

Nehru didn't like the proposed Turkey-Iraq Treaty, and Mohammed Ali did!<sup>4</sup>

In the afternoon the Defence people took over at 10 Downing Street and the "old man" was in his element, with pungent comments as the Chairman of the U.K. Chiefs of Staff, Admiral McGregor, a salty old sea dog, unfolded the general defence picture, dwelling particularly on the magnitude of U.K. commitments. Then we all replied — except the Asians — by emphasizing the magnitude of our own defence efforts. Our P.M. took advantage of the occasion to explain what we and the Americans had to do in the Arctic re continental defence; now for the first time a vital necessity in the general strategy.

Harold Macmillan spoke well for the U.K. He knows his subject and is more at home explaining it than Alexander ever was.

Tonight an experience that, for me, put the conference temporarily in the shade. The Royal Box at Covent Garden, with dinner before, during and after the Ballet in a cozy little room behind the Box. That was good, but even better was the fact that it was Margot Fonteyn in Giselle — wonderful dancing. She joined us after the show for the coffee, but Winthrop Aldrich kept interfering with my efforts to become better acquainted with Margot: silly old man!

Our hosts tonight were the Waverleys. Others, the Aldrich's, the Heads (Secretary for War) and the Kirkpatricks.

Lunched today with the Butterworths (U.S. Embassy). I want to keep him informed of what is going on at 10 Downing Street. I think the Americans should know, especially, of our Far Eastern discussions — and particularly when their viewpoint on issues is being put forward. We must make sure that they do not think that the Commonwealth is "ganging up" on them. There certainly is no basis for any such view, though we are all pretty uneasy about Formosa — or rather about the obstacles in the way of the President carrying out what we hope is his policy regarding "disengagement" from the off-shore islands.

This was our P.M.'s birthday and appropriate references were made to it by Sir Winston this morning. As for Mr. St. Laurent, he gives the impression that he is trying to forget it!

Wednesday, February 2, 1955

This morning the "old gentleman" had his chance to discuss the world and the H-Bomb, and he made the most of it.

I happen to sit right across the table from him and it is a fascinating pastime to watch him; his cherubic "baby" face, at times gleeful, at times petulant, at times impish and at times sombre and dramatic, but never in repose. He also fiddles around with his hearing aid, his pencil, his inevitable cigar, like a curious and eager small boy. He seems to keep up a prodding interest in whatever Norman Brook, who sits beside him, is doing; or he busies himself with ordering the window to be opened, or something else to be done. He often peers at me over his glasses as if he is wondering what I may be up to. Everything he does is dramatized and is full of life.

<sup>4</sup> Pour une évaluation canadienne de ce traité, voir le document 570.
For a Canadian assessment of this treaty, see Document 570.

He really let himself go on the H-Bomb — the shattering implications of which, on our society, he has fully grasped. His sweeping imagination and range of mind has sensed that this discovery has made all the old concepts of strategy and defence as out of date as the spear or the Macedonian phalanx. He is horrified and comforted at the same time; by the immensity of the bomb, and by its value as a deterrent against Russia. He finds solace in the fact that the Moscow men are cold blooded realists who know what power means and don't wish to be destroyed. So he thinks the bomb may mean the destruction of war, not of humanity. As he puts it in concluding his statement, "It was an ironic fact that we had reached a stage where safety might well be the child of terror and life the twin of annihilation". He loved rolling out these words.

Nehru was not comforted by the prospect. He had his own words, "of hovering indefinitely on the brink of terror". He wanted to know what we were going to do about it. Nobody seemed to know except to keep armed, keep trying to disarm and hope that the Russians would eventually — "you can't trust 'em now", said Menzies and Holland — become reasonable and stop fearing us or making us fear them.

Our P.M. remained silent, even when, later, Salisbury gave a statement on atomic development for peaceful purposes in the U.K., which rather suggested no one else in the Commonwealth had made any progress in this field.

One important statement did emerge from the morning meeting — the U.K. have decided to make the H-Bomb. They think that their own process, which they have worked out without any help from the United States, is probably better and cheaper than that of the Americans. Churchill was pleased about this, because the refusal of the United States to live up to their war-time pledge of atomic co-operation obviously still rankles.

I had a few in for cocktails this evening — Bruce, Patsy Greene, Molly Pattison and Mary, Admiral Bromley, Frederic Hudd and Peggy.

Afterwards, I adorned myself for the dinner at Buckingham Palace, but only in my second-best studs as I had loaned my best to the P.M. who had forgotten his. It was a very gala evening, with a lot of pomp and ceremony, gold plate, etc. I was between Lady Dorothy Macmillan and Lady Jowett, and had quite a long talk afterwards with The Queen — very lovely, but with a hostess's worry that people "weren't mixing up"; — also chatted with the Duke of Edinburgh. Churchill there, right to the end, in his Garter knee breeches, but it was all too much for Mr. Atlee, who fainted after dinner. Everybody much worried, but he soon came to and insisted on remaining until The Queen left.

Sir Winston sprang a shock on the P.M., and others, tonight. He wants us to agree to recommend that the Duke of Edinburgh should be given the title, "Prince of the Commonwealth". This is a silly idea and the P.M. gave it no encouragement. Norman R[obertson], Swinton, and Michael Adeane went into a huddle about it in a Palace corner. We must stop this proposal, which no one really wants but the "old man". However, he is lobbying hard and ruthlessly for it. He even buttonholed me on leaving tonight and said that I must help by persuading "my boss" to agree to his proposal.

Lunched today at the Edens. Afterwards I told Anthony and Harold Caccia about our idea for a neutral zone in the Formosa Straits, if neutralization of the island itself becomes impossible.<sup>5</sup> They expressed great interest and I sent Caccia some details later.

Thursday, February 3, 1955

This morning was devoted to economic matters at the Conference and Rab Butler had his innings (which reminds me that Menzies is very gloomy over — not Formosa — but the Australian defeat in the Test Match). He gave us quite a lecture, in rather a school-masterish manner, about the state of the nation's and the Commonwealth's finances. By "us", however, he made it quite clear that he meant the "sterling area". The P.M. and I felt like interlopers. We could not very enthusiastically join in the cry "save dollars", "cut down dollar purchases". But the P.M. made a good statement on GATT difficulties and our problems of trade with the United States.

Sir Winston was very puckish about the whole subject. Described Rab's speech as "optimism, wrapped in caution", admitted to heretical views himself about finance, coming out for a commodity currency which would be "the servant not the master of man". He confessed, however, that he was glad that he would not be asked to convert his heresies into policies. He described South Africa as having no economic problem because all they had to do was go out with a shovel and dig up gold or uranium!

Lunched with Michael Adeane and Tommy Lascelles. The former gave me more background on the "Prince of the Commonwealth" proposal, which seems to have been conjured up by Menzies and W.S.C[hurchill]. The Palace is neutral about the idea but, strangely enough, Nehru doesn't seem to mind. Tommy, who is very wise about these things, is all against it.

No meeting this afternoon, so worked in the hotel, and discussed, unsatisfactorily, plans with Krishna Menon on how to settle the Formosan problem. Third time I have seen him!

Took another shot at the P.M.'s Guildhall speeches over which he is still agonizing. I never have seen him so worried about any other public occasion. This one has got on his nerves and he keeps chopping and changing at his drafts which, of course, get progressively worse.

Tonight, dinner at 10 Downing Street, followed by a reception there — very glittering, with the "old man" in great form. I sat between Herbert Morrison's Lancashire bride, who talks exactly like Gracie Fields, and Attlee, who doesn't talk much at all. He seemed none the worse for his mishap last night, but is aging almost as quickly as their P.M. A good little man.

These receptions are really very exhausting, especially when you have to be on your Commonwealth best behaviour.

Had some words with Eden and Nehru and suggested a private meeting between them and our P.M. for the kind of frank exchange on Formosa which we aren't having at the full meetings. Krishna and I have cooked this up, but I told him that I wouldn't pursue it unless Nehru was keen about it. Apparently Nehru is.

Friday, February 4, 1955

This morning's meeting began with Pakistan's announcement that she was going to become a Republic, but would like to stay in the Commonwealth. Mohammed Ali cut the monarchical tie very gallantly, by swearing continued devotion to the Crown and the Commonwealth. He even said that this step would have no effect on Pakistan's feeling of Loyalty, affection, etc., and then, incongruously, added "allegiance".

The "old man" was deeply moved and all his feelings were stirred by this, to him, very unhappy development. He was presiding over one more stage, he probably thought, in the "dissolution of the Empire". It was very hard for him, but he rose to the occasion and said all the right things about freedom of choice, and how happy he was that the New Republic would stay in. All the others echoed this, though Holland was a little blunt in his expressions of regret. Nehru tried to get a bit technical on the constitutional position, and Mohammed Ali pulled him up very sharply. The veneer of good feeling between those two countries is pretty thin.

It was ironical to hear Mr. Swart give approval to Pakistan becoming a Republic in the Commonwealth. I wonder if and when his government will be asking for it. Also he didn't much like the word "unity" in our communiqué on this matter, but yielded gracefully when told the expression used was exactly the same as that agreed to by Mr. Malan at the P.M.'s meeting when India was accepted as a Republic.<sup>6</sup>

Later in the morning we got back to Formosa and the Chinese blunt rejection of the invitation to go to New York. Much gloom — but all felt that it would be wise to say as little as possible and "play it easy". There was obviously no point in the Security Council going on discussing the matter, and there was also no point, and some danger, in this Conference making resounding pronouncements on the subject and offering the United States a lot of advice.

I spoke for the first time this morning. The P.M.s are supposed to do the talking, but in answer to a direct appeal from Eden, I gave my own views, which are summarily recorded in the minutes as follows:

"Mr. Pearson said that if the question were simply dropped in the Security Council, it would be a clear demonstration that the Security Council was powerless to take any effective action which was not approved by the Peking Government. The terms of the Chinese reply suggested that this might be exactly what the Peking Government had wished to demonstrate. On the other hand, if we proceeded with a resolution, it was likely to be vetoed in the Security Council, and this would inflame United States public opinion. The United States Administration might then feel themselves compelled to take some further action, in the Security Council or elsewhere, which it might be difficult for the rest of the free world to support; and if we did not support the United States, it would be seen that the Western Powers were divided, which would be a victory for Peking. We should therefore try to avoid taking any action until we saw how public opinion in the United States was developing."

The above gives a very inadequate impression of the sensation caused by my brilliant remarks!

Lunched today with Rab Butler, who gave me some advice as to how to get on with Dulles! He is a strange person — a mixture of hard-boiled arrogance, and a childish ingenuousness. He also has great confidence in his ability and in his star. He spoke of his wife, who died in tragic circumstances only a month or so ago, as if she were not present because she had gone shopping.

Went to see Madame Pandit this afternoon — a courtesy call which certainly turned out to be only that.

Tonight a very nice dinner at the Robertsons; my partner the intelligent and very nice Lady Reading. I've been lucky at these dinners, with Lady Macmillan at Buckingham Palace, and the new Mrs. Herbert Morrison at No. 10.

After dinner we went to an enormous reception at Guildhall from which I escaped as soon as possible. I'm running out of social energy and dress shirts.

A very interesting meeting at Eden's office this morning, ostensibly to talk about Indochina, but really to exchange views — à trois — about Formosa. Nehru was flanked by Krishna (who kept whispering in his ear), Madame Pandit who kept looking disapprovingly at Krishna, and Pillai who kept looking inscrutable.<sup>7</sup>

I put forward a suggestion that, pending the appointment of a small U.N. Good Offices Committee to consider the problem, or even before considering one, we should try to get a reassurance from Washington that they are going to get Chiang's people out of all the islands; and a reassurance, via India, from Peking that they will not interfere with any of these operations. In short, the policy should be "peaceful disengagement". If we can get these assurances, then we should let each side know, privately, of the other's policy. Eden and Nehru seemed impressed by this and the British will draft the necessary message to Washington. They did so and Caccia brought it around this afternoon, when N.A.R[obertson], Léger and I suggested some changes.

Eden also read us this morning Molotov's proposal for a conference.<sup>8</sup> The Americans will never be able to accept it in its present form, but Eden thinks the Russians are serious in their desire to avoid trouble over Formosa and will try to influence the Chinese accordingly. I wonder.

Nehru was quite bitter about American policy, and resented, as an Asian, their bullying and threatening tactics. He obviously doesn't feel the same resentment when Chou bullies and blusters, because Chou is not so much a Communist as an Asian!

Blessed relief this afternoon. Saw 'Arsenal' play football from the directors' box. Very cosy.

Dined with the P.M. quietly in the hotel, when we discussed his Monday speeches (again), certain Canadian political developments, etc. Afterwards did a couple of new pages for the speech.

The news from Formosa is not good, and I have had to cancel my flight to Paris tomorrow, as there will be too much to do here and people to see. Phoned the children accordingly and I feel very sorry for myself.<sup>9</sup>

The Butterworths and the Bruces both wanted me to lunch in the country. It was a lovely day. I hated not to go, but there were too many telegrams to study and other things to do. Incidentally, I had also been invited to Chequers where Sir Winston was entertaining the Prime Ministers, but I had to pass this up too.

During the afternoon Krishna Menon came to see me with Norman Robertson. He said that the Indian Government had already sent a message to Peking on the basis of yesterday morning's talks, advising them strongly not to interfere with any evacuation operations off the China coast. He felt that the main thing now was to keep the Security Council from meeting while we proceeded to work out some form of Good Offices Committee which might hold the line until conditions became suitable for a conference under the aegis of the United Nations. He certainly has in mind Canada and India being on the Good Offices Committee, but we gave him no encouragement on that score, even if one should ever be set up.

Krishna was much more constructive and moderate in his approach than he usually is, and was even prepared to listen, without exploding, to our defence of the policy of the American Government and the attitude of the American people.

After he left Walton Butterworth and Andy Foster of the American Embassy called to show me some messages which had come from Washington which they thought would be reassuring. I said that the thing that worried us most at the Commonwealth meeting was the possibility that the United States Government, in order to get the Nationalist Chinese out of the Tachens might have committed themselves to the defence of Quemoy and the Matsus. Butterworth produced a message from Washington which was designed to remove our fears on this score, and which stated that no such undertaking had, in fact, been given by Washington to Chiang Kai-shek.

For a change, had a "home" meal at the Bruce's which was very welcome.

Monday, February 7, 1955

At 10.45 I was led around an exhibition of Canadian paintings by Messrs. Armstrong and Hudd. It was a mixed bag, some good and some bad, and shown under the auspices of the Agent General for Ontario.

At 12.00, in borrowed formal finery, I went to Guildhall where the P.M. got the Freedom of the City in a ceremony which is almost as historical and impressive as the coronation. It is redolent of the Middle Ages, but done magnificently, as all ceremonies over here are. The P.M. was magnificent also, not only in his bearing, which is always fine on these occasions, but in his words which as it happened, and after so much 'blood, sweat, and tears', turned out to be just right for the occasion. He acknowledged gracefully the Freedom, which was conveyed to him in what the Chamberlain called "a little box" which might serve as "a little memento of the occasion of his visit to London". The little box and the little memento turned out to be a most beautiful gold casket.

Afterwards lunch at the Mansion House, also with much pomp and ceremony, at which the P.M. had to speak again. This also, in spite of forebodings, went over very well, but as I told Norman Robertson afterwards, the P.M. could read the London telephone directory and make it sound sincere and moving.

The conference reconvened at 3.30, when Eden gave us a review of weekend developments, and indicated (as we had agreed Saturday) that he had sent a message to Makins to see Dulles at once and get some reassurance, if possible, that the United States was not going to intervene on behalf of Chiang Kai-shek in the off-coast islands if the Communist attacked. Makins apparently does not think much of this idea of a further approach. We then discussed the undesirability of the Security Council meeting this week, at which I put in a few words. Menzies spoke quite vigorously to the effect that it would be monstrous if the off-shore islands became a casus belli, but that it would be equally unwise not to support the Americans in the defence of Formosa.

Then the "old man", who is getting progressively more tired as the conference goes on, made a long and, as I thought, very unimpressive statement in defence of Chiang Kai-shek as an "ally whom, in honour, the United States could not abandon".

Finally, we considered the draft of the communiqué and here Sir Winston returned to his best form. He loves drafting and it was amusing to watch him play with words. It was not so amusing to hear Jooste say that the South Africans could not agree to the concluding paragraph where there was too much mention of non-discrimination and personal liberty. This made the "old man" very annoyed, but the South Africans managed to get the "offending" words omitted. Otherwise, we would have had no agreed communiqué at all.

I rushed away from the meeting to attend a small party I was giving for some British editors and diplomatic correspondents, and then rushed away from that to attend a dinner in the House of Commons given by the Tweedsmuirs for Holland. This is a husband and wife parliamentary team, John being a member of the House of Lords, and his wife being a Member of the House of Commons for Aberdeen. There was much good talk, but not many words in support of American policy in the Far East.

I took advantage of this occasion to have a few private words with Harold Macmillan, who was one of the guests. Just before the meeting had adjourned in the afternoon, Sir Winston read to us a personal letter which he was proposing to send to his old friend "Tke" — this time about Formosa. We became more and more alarmed as he went on. He was going to give the President some advice. He should adopt the following policy:

- (1) Force the Chinese Nationalists to withdraw from the coastal islands;
- (2) Tell the Peking Régime that any interference with this operation would mean war, with all weapons used;
- (3) Assure him that the British would be behind him in this eventuality;
- (4) Join the United States in a defence guarantee for Formosa.

This was a pretty startling thesis, especially when Eden was about to send a despatch to Washington advising the government to adopt a different course.

The Prime Ministers were glumly silent about it this afternoon, and tonight I told Macmillan that I thought it a great mistake for any such letter to be sent. He told me not to worry, that the "old man" was just trying it out on the P.M.s and as a result of their lack of enthusiasm the letter would never go. I wonder.

After dinner, dealt with a large mail from Ottawa and then, midnight, discussed the revised communiqué with Norman [Robertson] and Jules [Léger]. They had been at the drafting committee meeting.

Tuesday, February 8, 1955

Last day of the conference and I am beginning to feel as tired as Sir Winston now looks. The "old man" should not have tried to take in the Mansion House ceremonies yesterday. It was very sporting of him.

This morning, responding to Menzies' criticism yesterday that we were spending too much time on Formosa and not enough on Japan, Southeast Asia and other Far Eastern problems (what about Europe?), Eden gave a review of U.K. long-term policy in the Far East; what were the intentions of Peking, how would Japan move, etc.

Menzies spoke well and wisely about Japan, after which Nehru made his longest intervention, devoted to long-term developments in Asia. He argued the folly of maintaining an attitude of hostility to a dynamic revolutionary situation such as we have in China, because this merely benefits the revolutionaries. Menzies and Eden made the obvious rejoinder. How can you become friendly with a régime which, by its words and deeds, refuses you the opportunity?

Nehru at one point quoted with approval some words used by Dulles in New Delhi a few years ago. "The system of government which pays most dividends in economic betterment and human happiness to the people will win". The existing governments in Formosa, Indochina and Thailand, were reactionary and corrupt and as totalitarian as communism, and not likely to pay such dividends.

He admitted, however, that co-operation and co-existence with communist governments required the maintenance of a good supply of dry powder!

Sir Winston wound up by describing the situation in the Far East as a deadlock. But, he added, we should not forget that "we sit here under the shield of the United States, and we will not quarrel with her over Far Eastern developments, though we will advise and try to influence her."

Eden looked almost as uncomfortable as Nehru, or more so. Nehru conceals his reactions better.

This morning also we took a look at the revised communiqué, now reduced to a few paragraphs with most of the vigorous words removed. Winston played around with it for a bit but didn't get as much fun out of it as yesterday.

In the midst of our discussion a note was sent in to Eden, who passed it on to Churchill, of Malenkov's "resignation". Very dramatic, and the "old man" made the most of it, with a few pungent comments. He was vastly intrigued at the reason given for Malenkov's fall — "failure in agriculture" — and hoped that they would find a better excuse here if they ever wanted to fire him! I intervened to say that failure in agriculture certainly meant that he would soon be ploughed under. But Sir Winston felt that "he would be sent to Siberia or, more probably, to Beria!"<sup>10</sup>

Before we adjourned this morning Eden read us Makins' account of his interview with Dulles; very disturbing because Dulles indicated that if Quemoy were attacked, the United States, if requested, would come to the help of the Chiang troops. This is dangerous and frightened us all.

In the afternoon — our last session — Holland read us a message from Munro, whose talk with Dulles confirmed our earlier fears from the interview with Makins.

Eden then read a very stiff telegram he proposed to send to Washington stating quite frankly that the Americans could not count on any support from the United Kingdom if they intervened to help Chiang on these islands. We all supported this point of view, except Winston, who thought the language too strong and the policy of declared separation too risky. He was tired, depressed and spent a good deal of time playing around with Eden's draft while the rest of us sat and said nothing, until Menzies intervened very effectively, from a written brief, analyzing the dangers of the American position.

On Malenkov's fall, see Document 526.

We were obviously getting nowhere — the Chairman was very tired — so I suggested to our Prime Minister that he wind up the proceedings by saying a few kind words about Sir Winston. This he did very gracefully and Churchill (deeply moved because he must have known this was the last time he would preside over a Commonwealth meeting) said a few words in reply, and then we just drifted away. It seemed a rather sad, unsatisfactory and somewhat untidy ending to our conference.

Eden wanted to see me afterwards about the Washington situation and I told him that the line he proposed to take — and from which I hoped he would not be diverted — was the one that we too would follow.

He also wanted to talk about another very ticklish matter we had been privately examining, "alerts" and "early warning" arrangements with the United States.

Met the Press with the Prime Minister afterwards at the hotel, then dinner with N.A.R[obertson] when we talked of Canada House problems. At 9.30 we went out to the airport. Soon — after the usual ceremonial farewells — we were on our way, winging across the northern skies to home.<sup>11</sup>

COMMONWEALTH PRIME MINISTERS' MEETING: SECOND PLENARY SESSION

Far East

1. Yesterday's meeting continued the discussion on Formosa straits. Sir Anthony Eden said that a message had been drafted to the British Ambassador in Washington indicating the desire of the British Government to find a basis on which they could work closely with the United States in the Far East and on which American policies would command the support of public opinion throughout the free world.<sup>12</sup> While British public opinion recognized the reasons against handing the inhabitants of Formosa over to Communist rule, and the special juridical status of Formosa and the Pescadores, there was doubt about United States intentions in respect of the coastal islands and the use of Formosa as a base for operations against the mainland. It would be valuable if the United States Government could state publicly that they proposed to encourage the Nationalists to evacuate all the coastal islands and to prevent the use of Formosa and the Pescadores as a base for hostile activities. The message concluded by asking whether, if this were impossible, there was anything the United Kingdom or New Zealand Government could do to this end. Sir Winston Churchill added that he thought it inexpedient for the United States to base their case on strategic arguments and that the outcome of a major war would be determined by nuclear weapons, to which the occupation of Formosa was irrelevant.

2. Mr. Nehru, while not agreeing entirely on the juridical status of Formosa, thought an indication of United Kingdom views would be useful at this juncture. Both Mr. Menzies and Mr. Holland questioned the suggestion that it was inexpedient to use strategic arguments, since from their point of view it had considerable validity in the context of defence in the Far East and South East Asia, and Formosa was of strategic importance to both Australia and New Zealand.

Europe

3. Sir Anthony Eden reviewed the developments leading up to the abandonment of EDC and the present attempt to associate the Federal German Republic with the West through the Paris Agreements. He recognized that the ultimate aim of the Germans was to achieve reunification, but suggested that if Western European Union became a reality Eastern Germany might be increasingly drawn to the West, and the Russians might be ready to negotiate. He did not think that the Russian opposition to W.E.U. was due so much to fear of a revived German army as to the feeling that a successful W.E.U. would stand in the way of their long-term aim, the collapse of Capitalism.

4. With the exception of Mr. Nehru and Sir John Kotelawala (who did not speak) other Prime Ministers supported the general policy outlined by Sir Anthony Eden. Mr. St. Laurent pointed out that Canada had twice in his generation been involved in world wars originating in Europe and, in the absence of sufficient insurance under the United Nations against this risk, had taken an initiative toward the establishment of the North Atlantic Community. For similar reasons Canada had supported the concept of EDC, and had later been glad to follow the leadership of the United Kingdom in seeking a practical alternative. Now, in Western European Union, there was an opportunity for France and Germany to forget their historic rivalries. Western European Union and NATO did not cut across the ties between Commonwealth countries, but on the contrary strengthened that relationship, and anything which would reduce tension in Europe would benefit not only Europe, but the whole world.

5. Mr. Nehru suggested that a German contribution of 12 divisions would be of little military value in a nuclear war, and that while there might be psychological advantages in integrating Western Germany with the West, there were also psychological disadvantages such as the danger of mounting tension because of increased Russian fears. He therefore asked whether this might not be too high a price to pay for a small military gain. Sir Anthony Eden said that the main advantage of Western Germany's participation in NATO was that it would align her with the free world. If Western Germany became Communist, or if it remained independent and was ready to sell its support to the highest bidder, it would become once more a serious menace to the peace of Europe. In answer to Mr. Nehru's question about the military value of German rearmament, Sir Winston Churchill said that nuclear power alone would not suffice to provide an adequate deterrent in Europe. Some front had to be held to avoid infiltration by Communist forces, and to provide a warning of attack. From a military point of view the German contribution was a subsidiary, but still substantial, factor in the common defence. It was, however, so small in relation to the forces available to the Russians that it clearly could not constitute anything like a military threat to Russia.

Middle East

6. Sir Anthony Eden introduced this subject by pointing out that the complex situation in the Middle East was fundamentally an economic problem, in which a major factor was the revenue which some of the countries derived from oil, and that the main political problem was the conflict between Israel and the Arab states. Until some progress was made towards a solution of this conflict, there could be no real stability in the area. Detailed proposals were now being worked out with the United States in an effort to bring about a rapprochement, but the situation was extremely delicate and these consultations must be treated as particularly secret.

7. With reference to the intention of Turkey and Iraq to enter into an alliance, Mr. Nehru said he doubted whether small-scale military pacts, which tended to cause disruptive feelings among the countries in the area, served any useful purpose. On this point, Mr. M<sup>o</sup>hammed Ali said that according to his information feeling in the Arab League was almost equally divided on the Turkish-Iraq Pact. He had himself told the Prime Minister of Iraq that Pakistan was perfectly agreeable to Iraq starting negotiations with a view to subsequent agreement with Pakistan, though he had suggested that Egypt would be against such a proposal. He thought the Egyptian Government were jealous about agreements with other Arab states and the West because they realized that such agreements diminished Egypt's bargaining power. He agreed that stability in the Middle East depended on an improvement in Arab-Israel relations, and suggested that a possible basis for a general settlement might be for Israel to surrender some territory for the re-settlement of Arab refugees. Arab countries had, however, a great fear of expansion by Israel and no agreement would be possible unless it were guaranteed by the United States and Western Europe.

MEETING OF COMMONWEALTH PRIME MINISTERS: SIXTH PLENARY SESSION

Far East

The second of the two sessions yesterday morning resumed discussion of Formosa. Sir Anthony Eden said that the answer from the Peking Government made it clear that they were not prepared to come to the Security Council on any basis likely to be acceptable to the majority of members, and showed a considerably different attitude from the less extreme line taken by the Russians. The reaction of the United States would not be good, and the Chinese reply would weaken the position of those in the United States whose policy was to evacuate Chinese Nationalist forces from the coastal islands, and would strengthen the position of those who were working to bring matters to a head. It is now necessary to consider our objective. It was perhaps too much to hope that a general settlement could be reached through such methods as an Assembly resolution or a special conference, and it would therefore be preferable to concentrate on trying to secure the establishment of a neutral sheet of water between the mainland and Formosa. This could not be achieved by agreement except at a meeting at which the Peking Government was represented. There was, however, the possibility of a third course: to obtain an American assurance of withdrawal from all the coastal islands, coupled with an undertaking by the Peking Government that they would not interfere with the operation.

2. Sir Anthony Eden was apprehensive about proceeding with a resolution in the Security Council, where a Soviet veto would only demonstrate the division of opinion and bring China and Russia closer together.<sup>13</sup> Moreover, the Americans might well then ask the United Kingdom Government what they proposed to do to support them, which would be extremely embarrassing since public opinion would not favour giving even moral support to defence of the coastal islands, still less support of a material kind. The only other course might be further private discussions with the Russians.

3. Mr. Holland said that he thought there would be great value in a period of delay, to give time for consideration. Under present circumstances the draft New Zealand resolution would almost certainly be vetoed, which would lead to further difficulty.

4. Mr. Pearson said that if the question were simply dropped it would be a clear demonstration that the Security Council was powerless to take any effective action not approved by Peking. The terms of the Chinese reply suggested that this might be exactly what the Peking Government wished to demonstrate. On the other hand, if we proceeded with a resolution, the probable Soviet veto would inflame United States public opinion. The United States administration might then feel themselves compelled to take further action in the Security Council or elsewhere, which it might be difficult for the rest of the free world to support. It would thus be seen that the Western Powers were divided, which would be a victory for Peking. We should therefore try to avoid taking any action until we saw how public opinion in the United States was developing.

5. Mr. Nehru agreed that it would be desirable to wait over the week-end. It was clear that if progress was to be made the Peking Government had to be brought into consultation. Any decision by the Security Council in their absence would be regarded by the Chinese as an order which they would not be prepared to carry out, since they could reasonably say that they did not recognize the UN.

6. Mr. Menzies also counselled delay. Action likely to follow a resolution in the Security Council might well exacerbate the Americans, forcing them to take a position from which it would be difficult to retreat. The best line might be for the Commonwealth to have private talks with the United States to see whether they could be persuaded to undertake the evacuation of Nationalist forces from the coastal islands.

If it were clear to Peking that the United States was taking constructive action of this sort, Peking might be prepared not to interfere with the evacuation.

7. Sir Winston Churchill said that it was essential always to appreciate how this situation was regarded by the Americans. Never before had such a great nation been threatened with war by so weak a power. We must be careful not to give any opportunity to those Americans who saw advantage in bringing matters to a head now to say that their allies were of no use and that the United States must therefore act alone. It was by no means certain that the Russians would want to give the Chinese active support, since they would thus throw away all chances of surprise in the use of their own atomic weapons. It was contrary to Russian interest to commit themselves to support of Peking at this stage: knowing this, the Americans might well feel that they could safely take action against China alone. On the other hand, if the President could succeed in determining a sound policy based on a position of strength he could declare publicly that, since there was no purpose in negotiating with Peking, the United States Government had decided upon action which, with their overwhelming power, they would take. This action would be to ensure the safe evacuation of all forces from the coastal islands, and could be carried out in three months or less. If Peking should interfere, the United States would take such military measures as were necessary. It might well be that President Eisenhower would feel himself capable of valiant and daring action of this kind for peace, and it would be wrong to do anything at this moment which might make it more difficult for him to bring that about.

8. Sir Anthony Eden then informed the meeting that he proposed to send a telegram to the United Kingdom Ambassador in Washington saying that the Commonwealth Prime Ministers had been anxiously watching developments in China and were of the opinion that it would be wise to avoid any precipitate action in order to give time for reflection. The telegram might also say that the Prime Ministers have been much impressed by the calm and restrained way in which President Eisenhower was handling the situation.

9. The situation in Formosa Straits will probably be considered Monday afternoon. Ends.

MEETING OF COMMONWEALTH PRIME MINISTERS: SEVENTH PLENARY SESSION

Far East

Sir Anthony Eden reported on Molotov's proposal of February 4th regarding the convening of a special conference, and commented that it was unlikely such a conference would be acceptable to the Americans since it would not include the Chinese Nationalists and would take the matter out of the United Nations. The United States Government had been informed that, in the view of the United Kingdom Government, no good results would come from further discussion of this issue in the Security Council, but that later on a conference might usefully be held, if possible under the United Nations. The essential preliminary was to bring the fighting to an end and for this purpose it was necessary to know what the United States wished eventually to achieve. While the United Kingdom would not regard the Soviet proposal in its present form as acceptable, the door should not be closed on the possibility of a conference, even if it were not held under the United Nations.

2. The United Kingdom Ambassador in Washington thought the United States would not be prepared to define their objectives even confidentially. While most of the administration probably realized that the Nationalists must eventually withdraw from the coastal islands, they would not admit this in public, and Mr. Dulles was likely to reply that he could not further clarify the United States position until the evacuation of the Tachens had been completed. Reluctance to offer further clarification would be due primarily to a desire to avoid making a major concession to Peking and lowering the morale of Nationalist China. The Ambassador therefore doubted whether it would be wise to press for further public statements and suggested that this might not be essential before approaches were made to Peking.

3. Sir Anthony Eden said there was also a report that Chou En-Lai had sent a telegram to Hammarskjold suggesting direct discussions with the United States might be possible.

4. Mr. Nehru said the Indian Ambassador at Peking had reported that the Peking Government broadly agreed with the Soviet proposal, but would also be ready to discuss the situation with the Secretary-General and with the United States, as the party principally concerned. They were not prepared to accept any proposal inferring recognition of the two Chinas. Mr. Menzies said that while uncertainty about the United States position was embarrassing, their policy was understandable and the best course seemed to be to allow time for passions to cool. Meanwhile, the evacuation of most of the coastal islands would probably have been completed. It would be monstrous if these off-shore islands became a casus belli. As regards Formosa and the Pescadores, on the other hand, while the juridical position was uncertain, they were strategically important and a surrender would lead to Communist infiltration into Formosa and the Philippines. It might be possible to secure a neutralized sheet of water between the off-shore islands and Formosa, but this depended on the real aims of Peking. If Peking wanted to destroy a substantial part of the Nationalist forces, the evacuation of the coastal islands might well be the occasion for hostilities. The Commonwealth included countries particularly well placed to sound and to influence China and the United States, and perhaps bring them to the point at which they could hold direct talks.

5. Mr. Holland agreed that there was little point in proceeding with a debate in the Security Council, although it might be necessary to consider the reply from Peking.

6. Mr. Pearson suggested that steps should be taken to prevent the President of the Security Council from calling an early meeting. However, any member could call a meeting, and in this case the best course would be to handle it as a procedural discussion, avoiding discussion of either resolution. There was always a possibility that if a meeting took place the United States might wish to go ahead with a cease fire resolution, even though Peking were not represented, and this might lead to difficulties.

7. Sir Anthony Eden said that it would be very difficult to get a resolution through the assembly which would command general support, and the immediate objective should be to discourage the Security Council from meeting. There was general agreement with this view.

8. Sir Winston Churchill concluded the discussion by saying that military dangers of evacuating Quemoy were great and might tempt the Communists to harass the dwindling garrison. The United States might therefore be justified in warning Peking that any interference would be punished. But there was an essential difference between Formosa and the coastal islands, which were more in the nature of bridgeheads for an invasion of China. It was understandable that their occupation by the Nationalists angered Peking, and it would not be unreasonable for Peking to seek assurances that, if they agreed to peaceful evacuation, the Nationalists would not be allowed to use Formosa as an invasion base. The United States were naturally concerned to avoid lowering Nationalist morale; but even if plans for a return to China were dropped, these men would have an assurance of sanctuary for their lifetime. In twenty years it would be easier to settle the ultimate status of Formosa.

9. At Mr. Menzies' suggestion it was agreed that there should be further discussion of policy towards China, Japan and South East Asia at another meeting Tuesday morning, when Sir Anthony Eden would state the general policy of the United Kingdom Government.

Final Communiqué

MEETING OF COMMONWEALTH PRIME MINISTERS: EIGHTH PLENARY SESSION

Far East (Formosa)

Sir Anthony Eden reported the latest information regarding the attitude of the United States (CRO telegram Y.75 of February 8) and said that he remained opposed to discussion of the New Zealand resolution in the Security Council. The United States Government had given no indication of their attitude towards the Soviet suggestion for a special conference and an uncomfortable position would develop if weeks were allowed to pass without clarification of their policy. As the Soviet proposal would soon become public the United Kingdom Government would be pressed to state their reaction. They would try to keep the diplomatic channel open by pointing out to Moscow that certain alterations, such as Nationalist Chinese representation, would have to be made if the proposal were to lead to any useful result.

COMMONWEALTH PRIME MINISTERS' MEETING—1955

Attached for your information is a departmental memorandum commenting on the Conference of Commonwealth Prime Ministers held in London from January 31-February 8. Appendices B, C, and D† contain a summary of certain of the plenary sessions, and of two of the selective meetings on defence. The appendices do not include discussion of Formosa which occupied just under half of the time spent in plenary session but reference to this question will be found in the body of the memorandum.

2. I would draw your attention to the fact that the appendices noted above, — B, C, and D are highly classified and are marked for Canadian Eyes Only. Particular care should be taken to ensure that the account of these highly confidential discussions does not become known to unauthorized persons and thus endanger the frankness which is so characteristic and important a feature of Commonwealth meetings.

COMMONWEALTH PRIME MINISTERS' MEETING — 1955

The Commonwealth Conference of 1955 was mainly concerned with international affairs. The talks took place in the shadow of the crisis over the Formosa Straits and in part this contributed to the emphasis placed on Far Eastern problems. The coincidence of the meetings with the Formosan crisis resulted in one of the successes of the Conference.

Of the nine plenary sessions, three were devoted exclusively to Formosa; this subject was also discussed at some length at three of the remaining six meetings. In addition there were private consultations outside the plenary sessions. Discussion of Formosa was extremely frank and it was immensely valuable to the Prime Ministers of western governments to get the point of view of important leaders from Asia on this vital Asian problem. Although no joint pronouncement on Formosa issued from the conference, the very fact that leaders of a number of important nations, assembled at a time of mounting tension, could discuss dispassionately the issues involved with full knowledge of the gravity of the situation helped to dispel tension and to create an atmosphere of calm and moderation in which a political settlement could be sought by negotiation.

The Indians played an important part in the discussions and their attitude was most helpful. Mr. Nehru made it clear that he did not share the view of many of those present as to a long term solution; nevertheless he was ready and anxious to do what he could to decrease the tension accompanying the evacuation of the Tachen Islands and to create an atmosphere of calm in which a way might be found by negotiation for some accommodation on the question of the coastal islands. His interventions during the course of the meetings in both Moscow and Peking were useful in this regard.

It seems clear that Mr. Krishna Menon was the most important adviser that Mr. Nehru had at the Conference. At the Downing Street meetings, he was continually whispering to and receiving whispers from Mr. Nehru while Madame Pandit and Mr. Pillai remained inscrutable. At private meetings, Mr. Menon again was the prompter with Mr. Nehru while the other two remained silent. Mr. Menon established contact with Mr. Pearson shortly after the latter arrived in London and maintained contact with him during the course of the meetings. He was friendly and not unreasonable in his approach to the Far Eastern matters under discussion; he seemed obviously happier in the atmosphere of London than that of New York.

Mr. Menon was particularly concerned with two matters, (1) to work out some form of international intervention in the Formosa conflict, and (2) to arrange a private discussion between Mr. St. Laurent, Sir Anthony Eden, Mr. Nehru, Mr. Pearson and himself on Far Eastern issues. In respect of (1) he agreed that a formal conference in the present circumstances would be premature and unproductive. He thought, however, that some form of Good Offices Committee might be set up under United Nations auspices which would act as a diplomatic channel between Washington, London and Peking with a view to preparing the way for a conference which sooner or later had to be held. When it became apparent that nothing along these lines was going to be agreed on in London or even suggested to the Americans, he did not seem unduly disturbed. There is no doubt, however, that he feels that some kind of Geneva Conference will have to be arranged and that some sort of diplomatic preparation must precede such a conference. It is probable that he will continue to press this view on Mr. Nehru.

Apart from the specific issue of Formosa, considerable importance was given to Pacific problems in world affairs. The keynote was struck by Mr. Nehru in his opening statement at the first session when he spoke of Indo-China, of China and the problems flowing from the successful revolution which had brought the communist leaders to power, and the strong ferment of opinion in Asia taking sometimes the political form of nationalism and sometimes the aspect of an urge for economic betterment. One of the most successful features of the conference was its function as a meeting ground for the leaders of the Asian countries and the free nations of the west. In this sense it made possible not only the exchange of views around the conference table but provided opportunities for informal private discussions in restricted groups which is essential to that meeting of minds so necessary if the Commonwealth is to fulfill its role as a bridge between East and West.

The meetings were dominated by two outstanding personalities. Sir Winston Churchill was a chairman unequalled in experience and in the range and grasp of his imagination in fields which are of particular interest to him.

Mr. Nehru, as spokesman for the resurgent nations of Asia, gave voice to the point of view of those countries which have recently attained full independence or continue to live their revolution. He made the point repeatedly that nationalism was the basis of the changes taking place in Asia and suggested that greater attention should be paid to the views and aspirations of the peoples of that continent.

The conference was notable for the fact that it was the first within living memory in which there was no discussion of the constitutional aspects of the Commonwealth or problems of Commonwealth organization. Proposals for greater centralization, the creation of machinery for formal consultation, and suggestions that Commonwealth policy be coordinated and concerted through a permanent secretariat, which have exercised Commonwealth leaders at previous meetings, played no part in the proceedings. The one exception was Pakistan's request to be accepted as a continuing member of the Commonwealth after becoming a republic. In broaching this matter Mr. Mohammed Ali emphasized that there was no desire to weaken the link with the Commonwealth and said that the people of Pakistan would retain their loyalty, admiration and devotion to Her Majesty even though it flowed through an elected President rather than an appointed Governor-General. There was ready agreement that it was for Pakistan to decide what form of constitution she should have though the decision that a nation of eighty million people should cease to owe allegiance to the Queen was not taken without a sense of the drama involved and a feeling of emotion. Sir Winston Churchill, whose life and work has been so largely devoted to the service of his Sovereign, met the occasion with dignity though not without sorrow and some reluctance. The declaration regarding this constitutional change which will enable Pakistan to establish a relationship with the Crown and with other members of the Commonwealth similar to that of India is attached as an appendix.

Another aspect of the conference which augurs well for the future of this "unique association" was the ready acceptance of the right of groups of members to discuss questions of mutual concern privately. The selective meetings on defence about which all members were told beforehand were taken as a normal part of the functioning of the Commonwealth and caused no difficulty. This also applied to a number of ad hoc meetings on questions of concern to two or more members which were held during the period of the conference.

The arrangements for the meetings were admirable and all delegations are indebted to the United Kingdom for the trouble to which it had gone to ensure the comfort and convenience of visiting delegations. Incoming parties on arrival at hotels where they were to stay found offices organized for them complete with desks, filing cabinets and telephone switchboards. While in London, in keeping with the tradition of close and informal consultation, Prime Ministers had access to information available to the United Kingdom Ministers and were able to follow developments throughout the world without interruption. The arrangements for recording the conference proceedings were handled with commendable efficiency by Sir Norman Brook and his Cabinet Office staff.

One tentative conclusion to be drawn from the recent meetings is that the Commonwealth as now composed is to a very considerable extent dependent on the importance the Indians attach to it. During the course of his statement at this first meeting about the basic factors underlying the situation in the Far East, Mr. Nehru remarked that the fact that the Communist Chinese Government was not a member of the United Nations was the cause of many difficulties. But he went on to say that the Chinese were realists and that their lack of a seat in the United Nations would become of less importance to them as it became clear that other countries would be compelled to come to them whenever it was necessary to obtain their views. These opinions he reiterated later. It is not too difficult to read into this a warning as to his assessment of the shape of affairs and the balance of power in Asia. It is not clear what conclusion should be drawn but one conclusion which I think is justified is that the centre of gravity of the Commonwealth of 1955 is already some distance east of London.

The question of the admission of new members and the problems associated therewith was not formally raised at the meetings. However, constitutional progress in the Gold Coast and developments in other United Kingdom dependencies make it clear that this will be an important problem to be faced, possibly by the next Prime Ministers' Conference.

A paper summarizing the gist of the discussions at the meetings exclusive of the question of Formosa is attached. The paper contains a brief paragraph about the restricted meeting on Indo-China held on the morning of Saturday, February 5, attended by the United Kingdom, India and Canada.<sup>14</sup> Also attached and classified Top Secret are separate memoranda summarizing discussion at the meetings on defence policy generally, and Middle East Defence, the only two of the selective meetings on defence about which we have information. Canada was represented only at the first of the defence meetings which dealt with Defence Policy generally. The summaries of both the political and defence meetings are of course highly classified and their contents should not be disclosed to unauthorized persons.

For record purposes, copies of the final communiqués are also attached. Mr. St. Laurent's statement in the House of Commons following his return from London will be available to you in the Hansard for Monday, February 14, 1955, pages 1109 to 1112.<sup>15</sup> Additional information of a general nature about the meetings is contained in an article which will appear in the March issue of External Affairs.<sup>16</sup>

MEETING OF COMMONWEALTH PRIME MINISTERS — 1955

The gist of the discussions of the Commonwealth Prime Ministers from January 31-February 8, 1955 exclusive of the question of the Formosa Straits is contained in the following sections. The subject matter is arranged to conform with the plenary meetings held during the conference. Indochina was not discussed at a plenary meeting; the section on Indochina gives an account of the restricted discussion of this problem by the United Kingdom, India and Canada on February 5.

Meeting 1, January 31

The main subject was the situation in the Far East. In his opening remarks Mr. Nehru spoke briefly about Indochina paying a tribute to the role of Sir Anthony Eden in bringing about the Geneva agreements and warning that progress towards lasting peace in Indochina could only be continued if the agreements were faithfully carried out.

Mr. Nehru then spoke of the intention of the Peking Government maintaining that apart from Formosa the Chinese had no expansionist aims and were primarily concerned with the development of their own resources and the improvement of their economic position. He pointed out that China was bound to feel resentment at any threat of dictation and made it clear that, in his view, any approach to the Chinese based on threats would not only be unsuccessful but might have a result contrary to that intended. The fact that Peking was not represented in the United Nations is the cause of many difficulties; but the Chinese Communists are realists and the lack of a seat in the United Nations would become of less importance to them as it became clear that other countries would be compelled to come to Peking whenever it was necessary to ascertain Chinese views.

In commenting on Mr. Nehru's remarks, Sir Anthony Eden pointed out there were nevertheless real dangers that a conflict could easily arise in the Far East as China was a revolutionary power going through an expansive and confident phase. Sir Winston Churchill spoke vigorously on the position and record of the United States which was the only power that had achieved world supremacy without wishing to use it for purposes of domination or aggrandisement and which had shown itself ready to use its power for the benefit of mankind. He was certain that President Eisenhower was determined to have peace and had the stature and moral courage to make a concession from strength.

Meeting 2, February 1, 1955

The first part of the second meeting continued discussion of the Far East.

Later, discussion turned to Europe and Sir Anthony Eden reviewed developments leading up to the abandonment of EDC and the present attempt to associate the Federal German Republic with the West through the Paris agreements. Although recognizing that the ultimate aim of the Germans was to achieve re-unification, he suggested that if Western European Union became a reality, Eastern Germany might be increasingly drawn to the West and the Russians placed in a position where they might be ready to negotiate. In Sir Anthony Eden's view, Russian opposition to WEU was due not so much to fear of a revived German army as to the feeling that a successful WEU would stand in the way of their long-term aim, the collapse of capitalism.

Mr. St. Laurent pointed out that Canada had twice in his generation been involved in wars originating in Europe and in the absence of sufficient insurance under the United Nations against this risk, had taken the initiative towards the establishment of the North Atlantic Community. For similar reasons Canada had supported the concept of EDC and had later been glad to follow the leadership of the United Kingdom when seeking a practical alternative. Western European Union provided an opportunity for France and Germany to forget their historic rivalries. This new association together with NATO did not cut across the ties between the Commonwealth countries but should, on the contrary, be viewed as strengthening that relationship; anything which contributed to reducing tension in Europe would benefit not only Europe but the whole world.

Mr. Nehru suggested that a German contribution of 12 Divisions would be of little military value in a nuclear war and that while there might be psychological advantages in integrating West Germany with the West, such a policy also had psychological disadvantages; for one thing it might increase tension by heightening Russian's fears. He questioned whether the price was worth the small military gain. Sir Anthony Eden said that the main advantage of West Germany's participation in NATO was that it would align her with the free world. A West Germany which was independent and was ready to sell its support to the highest bidder or which went Communist would become a serious menace to the peace of Europe. Sir Winston Churchill said that nuclear power alone would not suffice to provide an adequate deterrent in Europe. It was necessary for some front to be held to avoid infiltration and to provide a warning of attack. From a military point of view, the German contribution was a subsidiary but a substantial factor in the common defence. In relation to the forces available to the Russians it was so small that it could clearly not be regarded as a military threat.

The meeting then considered the Middle East. Sir Anthony Eden remarked that the complex situation there was fundamentally an economic problem in which an important factor was the revenue which some of the countries in this area derived from oil. In Iran, there was good hope that the settlement of the oil dispute and the agreement for a consortium would work well. The main political problem was the conflict between Israel and the Arab states. Until some progress was made towards the solution of this conflict there could be no real stability in the region. Mr. Eden mentioned proposals now being discussed with the United States in an effort to bring about a rapprochement in this delicate situation. Much ground work remained to be done and the fact that these consultations were being held must for the moment be treated as particularly secret.

Mr. Nehru commented that he doubted the usefulness of small scale military pacts such as the intended alliance between Turkey and Iraq which tended to cause disruptive feelings. Mr. Mohammed Ali pointed out that feeling in the Arab League was almost equally divided on the question of the Turkish-Iraq pact. Pakistan was agreeable to Iraq starting negotiations with Turkey with a view to Pakistan's being associated in some way at a later stage. Mr. Mohammed Ali ascribed Egypt's opposition to agreements between Arab states and Western Powers to jealousy since they diminished Egypt's bargaining power.

A propos the conflict between Israel and the Arab states, Mr. Mohammed Ali supported the Foreign Secretary's efforts to improve relations and suggested that a surrender by Israel of some territory for the re-settlement and rehabilitation of Arab refugees might provide a possible basis for a general settlement. In his view no stable settlement could be achieved unless it were guaranteed by the United States and Western Europe since the Arab states were keenly apprehensive of Israel's expansionist tendencies.

Meeting 3, February 3, 1955

The third meeting dealt with thermo-nuclear problems. Sir Winston Churchill opened with an impressive and moving statement on the implications of thermo-nuclear warfare and the philosophy of the deterrent. He pointed out that the only sane defence policy for Britain in the next few years is to make what contribution it can to the deterrent represented by the United States superiority in nuclear power. Sir Winston said he was sure that the United States would be restrained by their strong moral and spiritual convictions from initiating a nuclear war. A less improbable peril was that the USSR, fearing a nuclear attack before she had caught up with the United States and created deterrents of her own, might attempt to bridge the gulf by a surprise attack. It was essential, therefore, that American superiority in nuclear weapons be so organized as to make it clear that a surprise attack would bring immediate retaliation on a far larger scale.

The Prime Minister of the United Kingdom remarked that the essential facts about the power of thermo-nuclear weapons should be known to all the world and described the estimated effects of a thermo-nuclear bomb pointing out that a very few explosions of this magnitude would suffice to disrupt the power of any nation to continue a war. Sir Winston drew comfort from the fact that continents as well as islands are vulnerable and that modern weapons could be effective against nations whose populations were widely dispersed over large land areas. The increased vulnerability of the Soviet Union had therefore increased the power of the deterrent. After pointing out that the present American superiority made it unlikely that Russia would embark on major aggression during the next three or four years, Sir Winston remarked that we might shortly reach a state of "saturation" where though one power was stronger than the other, even the weaker was capable of inflicting quasi-mortal injury. It did not follow that the risk of war would then be greater; it was arguable that it would then be less, for both sides would realize that the results of global war would be mutual annihilation. Although the danger of surprise attack would remain, the power of retaliation could not be wholly extinguished as long as the West's strategic bases are widely distributed. This would more than outweigh the advantages previously associated with "interior lines". In concluding Sir Winston Churchill said that the advent of thermo-nuclear weapons might bring a message not of despair but of hope since the broad effect was to place Soviet Russia on a near equality of vulnerability with the United Kingdom and Western Europe. We had reached a stage where safety might well be the child of terror and life the twin brother of annihilation.

Mr. Nehru said that Sir Winston Churchill had impressively described the horrors of thermo-nuclear weapons but had not suggested any positive means of preventing them from coming about. The Prime Minister of India suggested that the value of hydrogen bombs as a deterrent should be weighed against the terrible consequences of their use to people all over the world. The difference between the two sides was not now very great and to this extent saturation might be said to have been reached already. He recognized that no great country could run the risk of leaving itself powerless and in the event of a major war would use all weapons available. The conclusions he drew from this were:

(a) that we should seek to ban the use of thermo-nuclear weapons including experimental explosions, and

(b) we should seek to ban the occasion for their use in war by trying to outlaw war altogether.

He pointed out that as nuclear weapons became relatively easier and cheaper to make, smaller countries might come to possess them and that we would live in constant apprehension that some irresponsible country would be in a position to set fire to the world. He thought that world opinion should be mobilized against the possibility of war and the use of nuclear weapons.

There was some discussion, the general consensus of the other Prime Ministers being that there was little possibility of effectively mobilizing world opinion on both sides of the iron curtain against war. Mr. Menzies said that but for the development of nuclear weapons, the free world would have been hopelessly outmatched by the Communist powers whose intentions were aggressive and whose pretended desire for peaceful co-existence with their neighbours was a sham. Mr. St. Laurent asked what views the United Kingdom Government had on the possibility of securing the limitation on armaments. Lord Salisbury said that many people now felt that the need for international agreement on disarmament had increased. In his view, disarmament itself was not a remedy; armaments were a symptom of tension not a cause. Until the basic distrust could be removed, no nation would be ready to disarm. He thought it was useful to continue discussing disarmament and to attempt to reach agreement on general principles and said that it was possible that the existence of the hydrogen bomb might make the Russians more amenable in the forthcoming talks in the disarmament sub-committee.

Lord Salisbury commented briefly on recent developments in international cooperation for promoting the civil use of atomic energy saying that while hopes should not be set too high, recent developments flowing from President Eisenhower's initiative were in the right direction and should be encouraged. He then gave an account of developments in the United Kingdom in the peaceful uses of atomic energy. There was little discussion on this; Mr. Nehru commented on the importance of additional sources of power to the under-developed countries and observed that India was having some success in developing reactors for peaceful purposes.

Meeting 4, February 3, 1955

The discussion of economic affairs covered mainly recent economic developments in and prospects for the sterling area countries. Mr. Butler opened by reviewing the satisfactory economic progress in the United Kingdom in 1954. Whereas the United Kingdom had had a deficit of £400 million in the balance of payments in 1951, returns for the first half of 1954 indicated a surplus of £175 million. This result when considered in relation to repayment of debts to EPU, the IMF and North America was evidence of how the United Kingdom's position has been strengthened. There were some minor adverse trends which had now to be faced and which called for some readjustments; i.e., a slight worsening of the terms of trade, increasing competition in overseas markets, the initial cost in foreign exchange of the recent oil settlements and the prospect of increased defence expenditure in Germany. Although these factors made it necessary to keep careful watch on the situation, he saw no cause for alarm.

Turning to the sterling area as a whole Mr. Butler examined the improved record of the balance of payments since 1951-52 and remarked that it would have been unrealistic to expect this trend to continue indefinitely on this scale. Imports appeared to be expanding more than exports, a somewhat disturbing trend and one which they were watching. It was clearly necessary that all governments should maintain their vigilance to ensure that internal policies were adjusted as necessary to meet the changing circumstances; he suggested it would be valuable for the sterling area to examine afresh how overseas earnings could be still further increased.

There was some discussion of the impact of developments in the United States on the sterling area. Mr. Butler noted that United States Ministers had said that the supply of dollars to the outside world should be well maintained in 1955 and accordingly it did not seem likely that a dollar problem would arise in the immediate future. Mr. Butler pointed out that an expansion of imports by the United States might not be an unmixed blessing; an increase of imports of manufactured goods was beneficial both to the United Kingdom and to the sterling area as a whole but on the other hand increased United States imports of raw materials tended to help the rest of the sterling area at the expense of the United Kingdom terms of trade. The best hope lay in a steady and moderate expansion of United States activity and imports.

Mr. Butler emphasized the conditions which in his view must precede convertibility and remarked that there had been steady progress in a gradual approach to freer trade and payments. He touched briefly on the review of GATT mentioning that it was a complex question and suggested that some of the difficulties might be discussed separately by the Commonwealth countries concerned. He concluded by enumerating briefly the United Kingdom contributions to overseas development.

Mr. St. Laurent said that difficulties ahead were small compared with those which had already been weathered and expressed confidence that they would be overcome. One anxiety about the future arose from the impression the United States had given at Geneva that they were moving away from multilateral trade by seeking a waiver for their agricultural protection. This waiver might have harmful effects in a number of Commonwealth countries and might weaken the confidence of the world in United States' intentions. Although Canada would oppose this waiver, it should not be looked upon as a reversal of United States policy. Mr. St. Laurent remarked that the waiver might make it possible for the United States Government to make a further move towards liberalization and thought it could reasonably be hoped that it could not be used in such a way as to obstruct the general progress of the policy of freer trade and payments. Other Prime Ministers expressed concern that the United States might now be less anxious to support multilateralism and might tend to regard convertibility as the business of the sterling area alone. There was some concern that the substantial interest of the United States in the convertibility of sterling had not been made sufficiently clear to the administration. It was suggested that in the long run the United States could not remain satisfied with the two-currency world. Mention was made of the importance of sound internal economic policies as a basis for the approach to convertibility. The general consensus was that in the over all view, things were going reasonably well.

Mr. Nehru gave an optimistic survey of India's prospects expressing satisfaction at the progress made in the first five year plan, noting that the balance of payments had improved, and that while a strict import policy was still maintained, restrictions on capital goods and industrial raw materials had been reduced. Mr. Nehru mentioned gratefully the economic aid received from the United States and from Norway, the assistance under the Colombo Plan and mentioned loans received from the International Bank and the IMF.

Mr. Swart commented in an optimistic way on South Africa's position, saying that it was hoped to remove all import controls by the end of 1955.

For Pakistan, Mr. Mohammed Ali reviewed the difficulties experienced as result of the fall in world prices of jute and cotton and natural disasters which required Pakistan to import large quantities of food grains. The food situation had now been brought under control. Although the priority given to imports of heavy machinery and industrial raw materials had increased the cost of living, this had been accepted as necessary in the long-term interests of the country. Pakistan was showing a consistent surplus in trade with the dollar world but was running a deficit with the sterling area. Arrangements which might be made to meet this deficit would be helpful as would further industrial investment. Looking to the future, Pakistan supported the move towards liberalization and convertibility.

Meeting 5, February 5, 1955

The first half of the fifth meeting dealt with Pakistan's position in the Commonwealth. Mr. Mohammed Ali emphasized that there was no desire in Pakistan to weaken the link with the Commonwealth; there was, however, a desire on the part of his people for a republican form of government. The satisfaction of this desire would strengthen the determination of Pakistan to cooperate with the Commonwealth and align herself with the West.

Sir Winston Churchill expressed his sorrow at Pakistan's wish to abandon her allegiance to the Crown. Although no one would question her right to decide her own form of government, he had hoped that a solution on the lines of a "crowned republic" might have met the wishes of the people.

Mr. St. Laurent said that while he could not but regret that Pakistan would become a republic, he was happy that the need to change the form of Pakistan's link with the Crown did not mean a change in her sentiment for it. Each member of the Commonwealth must itself determine its relationship with the Crown. Mr. St. Laurent thought that all would welcome Pakistan's continued membership in the Commonwealth even though she adopted a republican form of constitution.

Mr. Nehru also welcomed the continued association of Pakistan with the Commonwealth and Sir John Kotelawala added that he hoped difficulties would not be created by the form of constitution to be adopted by Pakistan. Mr. Menzies pointed out that the question of principle had been settled by India and thought that a decision should be reached at the present meeting. In this he was supported by Mr. Holland. Mr. Swart said that in the view of the South African Government each member of the Commonwealth was free to decide for itself the form of its own constitution. South Africa was ready to agree that Pakistan should continue as a full Commonwealth member after becoming a republic.

The Prime Ministers approved the terms of a declaration which was released to the press [Appendix A].<sup>17</sup>

Meeting 6, February 8, 1955

After some discussion of the problem of the Formosa Straits, the meeting turned to long term policy in the Far East. Sir Anthony Eden said that no solution could be found for Far Eastern problems which did not take account of China and the United Kingdom had therefore decided at an early stage to recognize Peking. The United Kingdom Government also realized that Peking would some day have to be represented in the United Nations. Although it could be argued that the sooner this happened the better, for the moment there were great practical obstacles.

There was difficulty in assessing the true intentions of the Peking Government. The Chinese might be expected to have a great interest in ensuring a period of peace in which to build up their economy. In relation to this, their behaviour in Korea, Indochina and now the Formosa Straits was difficult to explain. The sequence of events inevitably led one to ask what the next step would be. There was also the problem of the overseas Chinese as in Malaya.

The United Kingdom Government had given anxious study to the problem of bringing Japan back into the community of nations. It was unrealistic to believe that the United Kingdom or indeed the Commonwealth as a whole could ever replace China as a market for Japanese trade. The United Kingdom took the view that trade between Japan and China, excluding strategic materials, should be encouraged.

In South East Asia, United Kingdom policy was to help the countries concerned to the greatest possible extent without interfering with their internal affairs. His experience at Geneva had convinced him that, in the absence of a settlement, the whole of Indochina would have fallen into Communist hands. He had pointed out to the Communist Premier of China the advantages to be gained by the establishment of neutral independent states in that area which could be a guarantee against infiltration by either side.

Mr. Menzies pointed out that the world was being kept in a perpetual state of undulant fever by the Communists and suggested that the peoples of the democratic countries might not be prepared to carry indefinitely the burden of unnecessary expenditures on defence. In his view, propaganda must be strengthened to emphasize that the threat to peace came exclusively from the Communist powers. He felt that more should be done to emphasize that the Manila Treaty and similar arrangements were purely defensive in nature. On Japan, he referred to the understandable bitterness in Australia towards the Japanese; nevertheless the Government took the view that policy should not be based on past hatreds and that Japan should be brought back into the community of nations. Australia was therefore prepared to increase purchases from Japan and he thought that there was no harm in the Japanese trading with China. If unable to expand their export trade, the Japanese might again become a menace to the peace.

Mr. Nehru analyzed the position of China and its relationship to other countries in Asia. The success of the revolution in China was not due simply to its Communist nature. In his view it was the product of a revolutionary ferment fundamentally nationalist in character, achieved with very little help from Russia. All Chinese including those who lived abroad and were anti-Communist were proud of the emergence of China as a world power. He argued that history might have been different if greater efforts had been made to come to terms with the USSR after the Bolshevik revolution; it would be a great tragedy if this mistake was repeated in China. Continued hostility could only assist the Communist cause.

Mr. Nehru said that any Chinese Government would be anxious to obtain Formosa, not only to recover former territory but also because it was presently occupied by hostile forces. Historically, attacks on China had begun with the occupation of Formosa followed by an attack on Korea, the occupation of Manchuria and finally invasion. It was his personal view that if Peking could be assured that Formosa would not be used as a base for attack, the Chinese would probably not risk war. Mr. Nehru questioned whether Chinese Nationalist morale was based on firm foundations. He pointed out how difficult it was to bolster morale from the outside. Similar situations existed elsewhere in South East Asia and there was real danger that the Communists would take advantage of this in countries where unpopular régimes were dependent on outside support. In India, Pakistan, Ceylon and Burma the situation is very different. Communism could not compete with progressive nationalist governments so long as economic progress was maintained. He thought there was little real possibility that China or Russia would intervene in India's internal affairs. In his view India was able to look after herself now and in ten years' time would be even better able to do so. Although Burma was not so strong, China had refrained from interfering in Burma when it had had good excuse to do so. He thought the Chinese wished to strengthen their own country and not to embark upon adventures elsewhere. He doubted if the Chinese would ever deliberately start war, for among other reasons, they were conscious that aggressor countries had usually been defeated in the end.

Mr. Nehru did not doubt that the Manila Treaty was regarded by its members as a purely defensive arrangement. From the Chinese point of view, however, it might look very different. He doubted whether the treaty served any useful military purpose; — it was not clear how the defensive potentialities of a small number of relatively weak countries in South East Asia could be increased under it — and the Treaty had the disadvantage of being irritating to the other side. He was happy to recall that Mr. Dulles had once said to him that war did not settle problems and that it would be the political system that would pay dividends in economic betterment and human happiness, which would in the long run prevail. Mr. Nehru remarked that he had thought this a very wise saying, and he still thought so.

Sir Winston Churchill wound up the discussion by describing the situation of the Far East as nearly deadlocked. To his mind the important facts were these:

- (a) the Communists were advancing all over the world;
- (b) opinion in the United States seemed at present to be in a condition in which a spark might lead to an explosion;
- (c) Russia was not likely to intervene;
- (d) the United Kingdom had no intention of endangering its firm friendship with the United States.

Indochina

Indochina was not discussed at a plenary meeting. Advantage was taken of the presence in London of Prime Ministers and senior advisors of two of the members of the international supervisory commissions to discuss certain matters at a restricted meeting on February 5 attended by the United Kingdom, India and Canada. Mr. St. Laurent and Mr. Pearson raised certain questions regarding the work of the Vietnam armistice commission, indicating Canadian concern over the obstacles in the way of the free movement from the North to the South and over the responsibilities of the Commission powers in respect of the forthcoming elections. The Canadian Ministers tried to make it clear that we did not wish the commissions to be used as a cloak for elections which were not completely free. It was important to give this matter consideration but the initial responsibility in working out arrangements rested, of course, with the two parties in Vietnam.

Canadian Ministers also brought up the difficulties in the Northern provinces of Laos and mentioned the desirability of India becoming more and more influential in Cambodia. The discussion was in general terms. Owing to other business, there was little opportunity to pursue the questions further during the course of the meetings.

DEFENCE COMMITMENTS IN NATO, EUROPE, AFRICA AND ANZAM

The theme of the meeting was the strategic implications of the development of thermo-nuclear weapons.

The United Kingdom's conclusions on the likelihood of the outbreak of war, as circulated in memorandum form, are that while the Soviet Union is unlikely to provoke war deliberately at least in the near future, it is possible that war might break out through accident and/or miscalculation. Although there are risks, among them the chance that an aggressor might push provocation too far in the belief that the injured country might hesitate to resort to arms, it is believed that subject to certain conditions the Commonwealth, the United States and the countries of Europe acting together can avoid war.

To satisfy these conditions the countries of the Western alliance have to maintain their unity, build up their strength and keep a steady nerve. They have to persuade a potential aggressor that they have a sanction of overwhelming power and the will to use it. The deterrent consists of three elements:

(1) the possession of thermo-nuclear weapons and the means to deliver them. The United Kingdom has decided to produce thermo-nuclear as well as atomic bombs and the aircraft to deliver them are about to come into service;

(2) the provision of conventional forces (in Europe, under NATO) to prevent the over-running of the continent by Soviet armies;

(3) the moral factor — the determination of the free peoples to defend themselves. It must be made clear that these three elements were present and will be maintained.

Assuming that world war is prevented, a second objective is to win the cold war. This aim can only be achieved by undertaking burdensome obligations which will involve heavy financial and other demands over a protracted period.

Following this general introduction there was a review of the United Kingdom's existing military commitments, during which mention was made of the use of land forces in Europe to contribute to the nuclear deterrent, the importance of the maintenance of sea communications and the distribution of strength as between the RAF, RN and Army.

Great strategic importance is placed on the Middle East as a focal point of Commonwealth communications. It is important to deny to the Soviet fleet the exits from the Black Sea to the Mediterranean and to guard the oil reserves of the Middle East. Further, this area is vital to the defence of Africa.

In the Far East the spread of Communism has to be blocked and the resources of this area have to be retained for the free world. Beyond these areas, the United Kingdom has deployed forces for the defence of the colonies.

This wide dispersal of forces emphasizes the United Kingdom's need for assistance from other Commonwealth countries in the form of a contribution to the strategic reserve or in the provision of reinforcing formations. In particular the United Kingdom is anxious to see established the Commonwealth Far East strategic reserve which had been agreed at the Melbourne Conference.

Local wars, if not contained by immediate counteraction, might lead to world war with general use of nuclear weapons and widespread destruction of sources of production. Stockpiles of weapons are therefore required in the various theatres and commanders would have to depend upon the resources at their disposal. Success in the cold war depends upon the known ability of the free world to meet any threat, anywhere, at any time.

Following this review each of the Prime Ministers present — Mr. St. Laurent, Mr. Menzies, Mr. Holland, Sir Godfrey Huggins — together with Mr. Swart and the Secretary of State for the Colonies reviewed the defence contributions and potentials of other Commonwealth territories. Each of the speakers mentioned with appreciation the extent of the United Kingdom's defence commitments. Referring to the development of thermo-nuclear weapons Mr. St. Laurent drew the conclusion that there is a vital need to develop a warning system on the American continent in order to protect the industries that were essential to the collective strength of the free world. In taking part in this development, Canada was in fact contributing to the deterrent. In view of its population and the stage of development of Canadian resources, it was obvious that there was a limit to what Canada could contribute.

Mr. Menzies noted the advantage that would be gained from letting the American people know the extent of the United Kingdom's defence commitments and dispelling the current idea that the United Kingdom were not carrying out their proper obligations. Insofar as the Australian Government were concerned, the shortage of manpower and equipment would make it impossible for stockpiles to be built up; the danger of inflation was also a contributing factor. The proposals of the Melbourne Conference, when considered in this light, show the need for firm consultation with the United States on the logistical problem. He noted that Australia's contribution to defence could be counted at a total of £400,000,000 annually, fifty per cent of which was an indirect contribution arising from the capital cost of the immigration programme.

Mr. Holland spoke of New Zealand's determination to play her part both in production of food and in the acceptance of a military commitment in Malaya (transferred from the Middle East). He added that of course New Zealand faced the same difficulties as Australia with regard to manpower, equipment, and the maintenance of economic balance. In conclusion, he asked to be told if it was thought that New Zealand could do more than she was doing.

On behalf of South Africa, Mr. Swart stated that his country's output of uranium would be at the disposal of the Western powers in war. South Africa regarded Africa as their special sphere of defence and stood by her commitments in the Middle East. However, because she had become a special target for communism she also had to see to her own protection against subversion in order to insure that the production of precious and other minerals would not be brought to a standstill. South Africa had shown that she was prepared to do her part in world affairs but her first duty was to defend Africa.

After Sir Godfrey Huggins had made a reasoned request for the provision of more and better equipment from the United Kingdom, the Colonial Secretary referred to the strain imposed on the United Kingdom by the need to defend the colonial territories. The United Kingdom were taking steps to strengthen security services in the colonies and it was planned to build up the contribution that the colonies make to the armed forces of the Commonwealth. In Malaya immediate assistance was needed from Australia in the form of special air service squadrons.

In summing up, Sir Winston Churchill commented that it must be recognized that the measures which could be taken for the defence of the free world can not match all possible risks. If war should come, he was convinced that it would be launched with nuclear weapons although the attack would no doubt be accompanied by the movement of Russian forces westwards into Europe. It is conceivable that the attack would be unheralded, but the retaliatory power of the free world is a very powerful deterrent and the Russians must already be aware that they would suffer an overwhelming counter-stroke within a few hours. He reminded the meeting that the forces comprising the deterrent must be capable of breaching the enemy's defences.

Despite the risk that war might be started by some desperate act, he was confident that if the deterrent strength of the free world is kept fully effective we can look ahead to an interval of security. However, within a few years, the superiority of the United States in nuclear weapons might be depreciated by the production by the Russians of sufficient nuclear weapons to inflict mortal injury on North America.

The United Kingdom has developed the atomic bomb and is now proceeding with the production of its own type of hydrogen bomb. The hydrogen bomb carries with it consequences beyond its immediate power of destruction. Accuracy of aim has lost much of its significance and the bomb could be delivered, therefore, from beyond the range of gun defences and in conditions which presented great difficulties for interception by fighter defences. The terrific blast of this new weapon would devastate a wide area and poison tracts of many hundred square miles causing damage beyond all present thought to people, animals and pastures. All nations would be drawn closer into a common category of hazard thereby adding to the deterrent forces on which salvation depends. There were good grounds for hope that the advent of the new weapon was more likely to destroy war than mankind; this would not be so if we neglected to maintain our deterrent power.

It is essential for the Commonwealth to play its part in company with the United States. Our policy must be planned in closest harmony and friendship with the United States. There can be no question of standing apart.

CANADIAN PARTICIPATION IN THE COLOMBO PLAN

In order that preparations may proceed for the September - October meeting of the Colombo Plan Consultative Committee in Singapore and in order to assist our officials in planning programmes of assistance to the Asian countries for the period ahead, it would be desirable for the Canadian Government to determine at an early date:

- (a) its attitude towards continuation of the Colombo Plan after June 30, 1957, the end of the present planning period;
- (b) its intentions with respect to a contribution in the fiscal year 1956-57; and
- (c) the composition of the Canadian Delegation to the Singapore meeting.<sup>18</sup>

A. Continuation of the Plan Beyond 1957

When the Colombo Plan for cooperative economic development in South and Southeast Asia was started in late 1950, it was arbitrarily related to a planning period of six years ending June 30, 1957. As the various countries, for the purpose of their own programming, will need to know at least a year in advance what the prospects are for the future, the members of the Consultative Committee will be expected to indicate at the forthcoming meeting whether they are agreeable to the continuation of the Plan and, if so, for what length of time.

There would appear to be very good reasons why Canada should support continued cooperation through the Colombo Plan. The Plan, loosely organized as it has been, has proven to be a useful instrument for encouraging considerable progress in the development programmes of the Asian countries and has assisted in creating a wholesome relationship among the countries of South and Southeast Asia and between them and the other member countries (including Japan as well as countries of the West). The Plan could scarcely be brought to an end in 1957 without serious economic consequences for the Asian countries concerned and substantial political damage to those countries and to our relations with them.

For material on the Singapore meeting, see the following section.

The Colombo Plan has gone very well so far. It has facilitated consultation among the Asian countries concerned on the problems encountered in developing their economies and has resulted in a certain amount of assistance from one country to another within South and Southeast Asia. The countries in the region have undoubtedly been encouraged to undertake development programmes on a scale more nearly adequate to the requirements of the situation than would have happened if this means of cooperation had not been available. Expenditures by these countries on their own development have been steadily increasing (27% higher in 1953-54 than in 1952-53 and 31% higher in 1954-55 than in the preceding year). Although some 80% of the costs involved have been met by those countries themselves, external aid has had an important (and, in many cases, a decisive) role to play in connection with particular projects. The response of other countries to these needs has almost certainly been greater and the outside assistance has been put to better use than would have been the case if the Colombo Plan arrangements had not existed.

The activities carried out under the Colombo Plan over the past few years have received widespread support from the people of both the Asian countries and the countries of the West. In addition to the evidence of active interest in Canada, the fact that in the presentation of its latest aid programme to Congress the U.S. Administration saw fit to emphasize the role of the Colombo Plan is illustrative of the regard in which the Plan has come to be held in the Western countries.

The habit of cooperation with the West which has been developed and strengthened by the experience which the Asian countries have had through the Colombo Plan has probably influenced the attitudes of those governments in such widely separate fields as recent international discussions on broad economic and commercial questions and the important Bandung Conference of African and Asian powers and has probably also been reflected in the national policies of the different countries individually. In particular, the Asian members would appear to have been less inclined to adopt a narrow or regional approach to these matters than they might have been if they had not been associated with other countries of Asia and the West in the Colombo Plan.

The need for cooperation through the Colombo Plan can hardly be expected to disappear by the middle of 1957. The development programmes of the Asian countries will still be under way. For example, India will be in the second year of its new five-year plan and Ceylon will only be half way through its second six-year investment programme. All of the countries in the area will be endeavouring to raise their living standards moderately or at least to prevent serious declines. There is considerable evidence that, in the light of the progress of the past few years, this objective is attainable, within a democratic social and political framework. There are strong indications that in the last two or three years the area of South and Southeast Asia as a whole — perhaps with the exception of Indonesia — has moved off "dead center" and has achieved a sustained increase in income in excess of population growth. The advances made since 1951, (together with the consideration that a relatively low level of investment "pays off" well in terms of additional output under Asian conditions, and that in many of the Asian countries monetary stability has been maintained throughout the postwar period) have led recent studies to the conclusion that in the next few years an even more satisfactory rate of growth of output and income can be expected.

If the programmes of the Asian countries are to be carried out with reasonable efficiency and without imposing a politically intolerable burden on the limited resources available to their people, those governments will need the cooperation of other countries in the region and such outside help as can be mobilized through the Colombo Plan. In this connection, it will be appreciated that by mid-1957 comparisons will undoubtedly be made, even more sharply than at present, between the rate of progress in those countries and in the underdeveloped countries within the Sino-Soviet bloc.

It might also be noted, that if the Colombo Plan were to be terminated in 1957, the pressure for aid would not necessarily be reduced as a result but might in fact be increased since the underdeveloped countries in Asia might behave much less responsibly if these matters could no longer be examined with the moderation and restraint which have characterized Colombo Plan discussions. It would appear quite likely that any indication of an intention to wind up the Colombo Plan in the near future would intensify the pressure for precipitate action on proposals for various kinds of international development funds which might be considerably less satisfactory from a Canadian point of view.

Although other countries have not yet had an occasion to indicate formally their views on the continuation of the Plan, it would seem reasonable to assume that most, and probably all, of the members will support a prolongation of its life.

Recommendations

In the light of our experience so far and of the situation which can be anticipated in 1957, I would recommend that:

(a) the Canadian representatives at the Singapore meeting should favour the continuation of the Colombo Plan beyond 1957;

(b) the Canadian representatives should suggest that the next planning period might coincide more or less with the completion of some of the major development plans, say the middle of 1961 or thereabouts; and

(c) in order to give substance to our position, the Canadian representatives should be authorized to indicate that, subject to a review of the situation from year to year and to the voting of funds by Parliament, the Canadian Government would expect to continue to make appropriate contributions throughout this period.

B. Canadian Contribution for 1956-57

It is appreciated that there are difficulties in determining at this stage the size of the contribution which Canada should make next year especially as we cannot know at this time exactly what our own financial position will be in 1956-57. Nevertheless, it is desirable that a decision be reached now in order that the advance preparations for next year's programme can be started and in order to provide guidance for the Canadian Delegation to the Singapore meeting.

Undoubtedly, many people in Canada, as in the Asian countries, have rather high expectations regarding the amount of assistance which might be provided in the new international atmosphere which they detect. It might be questioned, however, whether now is the time to make a really substantial increase. It might be sufficient and prudent to consider rather an increase which though significant in size would be clearly within our capabilities and well justified by the evident needs of the Asian members of the Plan.

From a recent review of Canada's Colombo Plan operations, it is apparent that there would be almost no scope for undertaking new projects next year if the total of that contribution were to be left at the present figure of $26.4 million. This is the case even if expenditures on projects already under way or contemplated in the current year's programme are assumed to be spread over the full length of time required for their execution and are not charged entirely against the funds so far appropriated.

In the case of India, acceptance of either the fertilizer project or one of the three hydroelectric projects proposed earlier this year would absorb virtually all of the funds available to India out of this year's vote and from a vote of the same size next year.

The situation with respect to Pakistan is even tighter. With certain increases in costs of projects now under way (referred to in a separate memorandum submitted to Cabinet today regarding Warsak)<sup>19</sup> and with allowance for only those other projects which Cabinet has already approved and on which we have given undertakings to the Pakistan Government, all of the funds available to Pakistan from votes of the present size would be used up not only for the current year and for the next year but also for the year following.

In short, additional projects which have been put forward by India and Pakistan and which Canada appears to be particularly well placed to carry out (including one thermal power station in Pakistan which could be supplied almost immediately) would have to be turned down or at least seriously delayed if the amounts available for allocation to those countries are not increased next year. Furthermore, no new suggestions from either country could be entertained until after the next year or two.

With respect to Ceylon, while no significant expansion in Canadian aid would seem called for, it would be desirable to avoid going below the minimum-sized annual programme which has been accepted in each of the past four years.

In the case of the other countries in the Plan, to which Canada has not so far provided much aid, a modest beginning is being made this year with the limited funds available, but it would not be possible to start next year on the more significant projects which have been under consideration unless a somewhat larger total vote is secured. Among the possible projects in these mainly non-Commonwealth countries are such things as instructors and equipment for technical training institutions in Indonesia and elsewhere; assistance with fish processing facilities in Cambodia; contributions to the improvement of internal land or air transport in Laos, Indonesia and possibly other countries; the undertaking of aerial or resources surveys which have been requested by Indonesia and Malaya; the provision of several Canadian cobalt-beam therapy units to medical institutions in the area; and the possible supply of small scale electric power generating stations to support village industries in a number of these countries.

The requirement for funds to provide technical assistance to supplement our capital aid is greater than the amount available for such purposes this year. The need for technicians and training facilities will undoubtedly be higher next year.

In brief, if we are to go ahead with the atomic reactor; if even one or two small projects in India and Pakistan and a limited number of small-sized projects in the non-Commonwealth countries are to be contemplated for next year; and if the present modest scale of the Ceylonese programme is maintained more money than was provided this year will be required.

The intentions of the other members of the Colombo Plan are not yet definitely known. The United States will be allotting about $700 million to economic assistance to the Asian members of the Colombo Plan in the year ending July 1, 1956 (apart from any surplus commodities which may be provided to those countries under the Agricultural Trade and Development Act and apart also from direct military support). It is understood that Australia and New Zealand intend to announce at the Singapore meeting some increases in their contributions. The plans of the United Kingdom are believed to be under review in the light of the deterioration which is taking place in their balance-of-payments position. A large part of the United Kingdom's contribution in the past has consisted of accelerated releases of sterling balances resulting mainly from the heavy expenditures made by the United Kingdom in that part of the world on behalf of the allied war effort. These releases, and the increase in their rate which the United Kingdom accepted when the Colombo Plan started, impose of course as great a sacrifice of current income as would be involved if assistance were being provided on a grant basis. It is not clear whether in the present situation the United Kingdom will find itself able to increase its contribution.

In all these circumstances I think it is appropriate to increase Canada's Colombo Plan vote next year by ten million dollars which would include any amount which may have to be spent within that year in connection with the atomic reactor project. Such a moderate increase would seem well within the capacity of a country which has experienced an almost continuous rise in income since the original figure for the Canadian contribution was selected.<sup>20</sup> It would also seem to be particularly appropriate in view of the decline in total foreign aid provided by Canada as a result of the reduction of over $100 million which was made in the Mutual Aid Programme this year and the further reduction which seems likely next year. In this connection, it might be noted that U.S. foreign aid as a whole has not been allowed to fall significantly in the present year and their contribution to the economic development of the Asian countries in the Colombo Plan in the current year will be more than twenty times the figure suggested for Canada's contribution next year. An increase of this order in Canadian Colombo Plan assistance would seem a reasonable response to the increased efforts which the Asian members of the Plan have been making over the past several years to develop their economies.

This increase in next year's contribution would not be of such proportions as to give the impression that Canada is planning to indulge in lavish aid programmes in the new international situation which is foreseen by many people here and abroad but would be large enough to help significantly in keeping up the momentum of development activities in the Asian countries. With any real or apparent relaxation in international tensions, it is probably even more important than before that improvements in living conditions and in the prospects for the future should be achieved by those Asian countries which are associated with the Colombo Plan. A contribution of the kind proposed, including the constructive project which is to be undertaken in the atomic energy field, would be a token of Canada's genuine interest in the welfare and progress of those countries. This tangible evidence of sympathy and concern for them in the present situation could have substantial political and economic consequences far in excess of the amount of money involved.

Recommendations

For the reasons indicated above, I would recommend that:

- (a) Parliament be asked to approve a Canadian contribution under the Colombo Plan in 1956-57 amounting to $36.4 million including any expenditures required in that year in connection with the reactor project; and
- (b) the Canadian representatives at the Singapore meeting be authorized to indicate that, subject to the appropriation of funds by Parliament, Canada will make a contribution of this amount.

C. Canadian Delegation to the Singapore Meeting

In the light of the importance of this meeting and of the interests of the various Departments in the matters to be discussed there, I would recommend that the Canadian Delegation should consist of:

The Honourable L.B. Pearson,
Secretary of State for External Affairs;
Mr. J.F. Parkinson,
Department of Finance;
Mr. A.E. Ritchie,
Department of External Affairs;
Mr. J.H. English,
Department of Trade and Commerce;
Mr. R. Crépault,
Department of External Affairs;
Mr. J.G. Hadwen,
Department of External Affairs;
Mr. D.S. Armstrong,
Trade Commissioner in Singapore.<sup>21</sup>

L.B. PEARSON

<sup>21</sup> Le 21 septembre 1955, le Cabinet a approuvé la composition de la délégation canadienne, mais a autorisé le représentant canadien à ne déclarer que ce qui suit :

"(i) that Canada favoured continuation of the plan beyond 1957 to approximately the middle of 1961;
(ii) that, subject to a review of the situation from year to year and to voting of funds by Parliament, the government expected to make contributions throughout this period;
(iii) that the contribution for 1956-57 would probably be greater than that provided for the present fiscal year."

On September 21, 1955, Cabinet approved the composition of the Canadian delegation but authorized the Canadian representative to state only:

"(i) that Canada favoured continuation of the plan beyond 1957 to approximately the middle of 1961;
(ii) that, subject to a review of the situation from year to year and to voting of funds by Parliament, the government expected to make contributions throughout this period;
(iii) that the contribution for 1956-57 would probably be greater than that provided for the present fiscal year."

Consultative Committee Meeting*

CONFIDENTIAL

[Ottawa, n.d.]

FUTURE OF THE COLOMBO PLAN AND THE SIZE AND SCOPE OF CANADIAN PARTICIPATION

The first planning phase of the Colombo Plan terminates on June 30, 1957. It is expected generally by all countries that the Plan will be continued beyond this date. The United Kingdom Delegation has already indicated that they will support its continuation, preferably on an indefinite basis.

2. Cabinet has agreed that the Canadian Delegation should favour the continuation of the Colombo Plan beyond 1957<sup>22</sup> and that the Canadian representatives should suggest that the next planning period might coincide, more or less, with the completion of some of the major development plans in the area. A suggested date is mid-1961. While the Canadian Delegation would have no objection to the continuation being of an indefinite nature if a majority of other participating countries favour this, there would appear to be some merit, particularly from the point of view of the Asian countries, to establishing another planning phase which might perhaps be carried forward to the date suggested above. This date, incidentally, coincides with the end of the second five-year plan of India. To give substance to the Canadian position, the Canadian Delegation has been authorized to indicate that, subject to a review of the situation from year to year and to the voting of funds by Parliament, the Canadian Government would expect to make appropriate contributions throughout this period. It seems highly desirable that the Canadian Delegation be in a position to make it quite clear at this year's meeting of the Consultative Committee that the Canadian Government will continue to support the economic development programmes of the countries of South and Southeast Asia in a period which will be a critical one in the planning of most of these countries.

3. With respect to next year's contribution, the Canadian Delegation is not in a position to announce the exact amount of funds which the Canadian Government will ask Parliament to approve for the fiscal year 1956-57. However, it has been agreed that, without mentioning any figures, the Conference might be informed that in addition to the existing annual programme which has been running at $26.4 million, the Canadian Government hopes next year to increase its contribution. The additional funds which Parliament will be asked to approve will cover, over a period of two or three years, the atomic reactor to be built in India, the increased costs of the Warsak project in Pakistan and possibly also provide for certain modest projects in countries now participating in the Plan and which have not been assisted by us (aid to non-Commonwealth countries is discussed further in Section II of this Brief).

4. It should be understood, of course, that as in the case of our programmes for India, Pakistan and Ceylon, worthwhile projects would have to be agreed upon.

5. While it is useful to inform the Singapore Conference of the various factors which have prompted the Canadian Government to seek an increase for next year's vote, it would not seem advisable to tie this increase too tightly to specific items at this time. It would not be advisable, therefore, to give any indication of the amount which Canada anticipates would be available for these various new undertakings. The amount which is finally voted for 1956-57 will, in part, have to be kept flexible to meet the needs of the programme as next year progresses.

6. Attached as Appendix "A"† are suggested notes for possible inclusion in the speech which will be made to the meeting of Ministers by [Pearson] the leader of the Canadian Delegation.

AID TO NON-COMMONWEALTH COUNTRIES

It has been agreed that Canada's Colombo Plan aid to the non-Commonwealth countries in the area (e.g. Burma, Thailand, Viet-Nam, Laos and Cambodia, Indonesia and possibly Malaya) should be extended and that it should be possible to make immediate investigations of a number of projects which would allow for the expenditure of Colombo Plan funds in this and succeeding years. In fact, certain projects have already been investigated during the current year and part of the additional $1 million vote in 1955-56 has been used for this purpose. On the basis of these investigations and others in the future, it is expected that a number of worthwhile projects will be produced. Since most of these countries are considerably lacking in administrative and technical skills, it is clear that any modest projects for capital assistance would have to be closely related to our technical assistance programmes. It might be necessary for Canada to take more initiative to help these countries sort out their requests and determine in what ways Canada might best help them. It may also be necessary to send more Canadian experts out to investigate possible capital assistance projects than has been required for projects in India, Pakistan and Ceylon. Since the non-Commonwealth countries have received so little assistance from Canada we should avoid, if possible, long administrative delays in determining whether a project will be assisted. A survey of the technical assistance required by these countries which Canada has undertaken, was carried out earlier this year when Mr. Bartlett, Chief of the Technical Co-operation Service, visited most of these countries and reported on some possibility. It is obvious however, that more intensive investigations will be required before it will be possible to determine exactly which projects seem suitable for Canadian assistance.

2. It is suggested that the following offers of assistance might be explored with recipient countries during the Singapore Conference.

(a) Burma has expressed a great interest in securing a cobalt beam therapy unit and arrangements are being made for one of these to be made available to Burma. A suggested outline of the proposal which might be offered to Burma is attached to this Brief as Appendix "B".†

(b) Arrangements are under way to send a technical mission to Indonesia to investigate the possibility of assisting in staffing and equipping an engineering institute in that country. This mission would also investigate the needs of Indonesia with respect to an aerial survey and a geographical survey. This proposal could be discussed in detail with the Indonesian delegation and while we are not in a position to indicate the exact date when this team would visit Indonesia we are hopeful that it would be in the immediate future.

(c) The delegation might be prepared to discuss aid possibilities with the delegations from the Indo-China States. These countries have received very little aid from Canada; but it was suggested at last year's Colombo Plan Conference in Ottawa by Canadian Ministers that we were well-placed to send French-speaking experts to these countries under the technical assistance programme and to provide training in our French-speaking universities for students from this area. The delegation might discuss particularly with the Cambodian delegation the desirability of sending a French-speaking fisheries expert to Cambodia. The latter country have asked Canada to supply some fish drying equipment. While it is possible that we could undertake this project next year, it may be that there are other parts of the fishing industry which also require urgent help. We are hopeful that a fisheries expert could be made available to visit Cambodia and possibly the other Indo-Chinese States if so requested in the immediate future.

(d) The delegation may wish to take the opportunity of the visit to Singapore of the three Truce Commission Supervisors to discuss the needs of the Indo-Chinese States for economic assistance. We understand from Mr. David Owen that the United National Technical Assistance Board is anxious to undertake programmes in Indo-China. Mr. Owen has indicated that they would welcome consultation with Canadian officials. He has suggested that the UNTAB representative, Sir Alexander McFarquar, who will be in Singapore should be given an opportunity to discuss possibilities for economic assistance with our Truce Commissioners. The Canadian delegation might undertake to co-ordinate such discussions.

(e) The delegation should be prepared to discuss the technical assistance requirements of all non-Commonwealth countries as it is hoped that we will be able to expand our technical assistance programmes in a variety of ways to these countries next year.

ADMISSION OF NEW MEMBERS

Afghanistan

Canada does not at present see that the membership of Afghanistan in the Colombo Plan is possible or desirable particularly because of the open opposition to Afghanistan membership from some of the South and Southeast Asian countries, Pakistan in particular. Afghanistan is a little outside the immediate Colombo Plan area and would, if admitted to the Colombo Plan, tend to bring with its membership a number of difficult problems, for example, the difficult problems concerning Indian and Pakistan relations, U.S.S.R. and U.S.A. relations, which might do more harm than good. In addition, the Government of Afghanistan has been notoriously corrupt and inefficient. Should this Government change, however, for the better, it is possible that our objections to the provision of economic aid might be reduced. The background for a Canadian decision on Afghanistan membership is:

(a) The Colombo Plan was not the most suitable instrument with which to offset Russian influence in Afghanistan.

(b) It would be unwise to bring the disputes between Pakistan and Afghanistan within the context of the Colombo Plan.

(c) We lacked representation in Afghanistan and consequently accurate information about the country.

- (d) The fields in which Canada could provide assistance were limited.
- (e) The administration of Afghanistan was so disorganized that it could not be relied upon to participate effectively in any scheme of assistance.
- (f) Pakistan objected strenuously and the United Kingdom and Australia were averse to the admission of Afghanistan to the Colombo Plan.
- (g) The offer of economic aid would allow Afghanistan to play off one side against the other and would likely result in increased Russian economic and political pressure.
- (h) It was very doubtful if any assistance which could be provided would substantially affect Afghanistan's position in her relations with Russia and the West.
- (i) It was unrealistic to think that Afghanistan would drop agitation for Pakhtoonistan [sic] in return for economic help from the United States and the Commonwealth.<sup>23</sup>

France

2. Canada is well disposed towards a French application for membership in the Colombo Plan but we have conditioned our response to French proposals on the reaction of the Asian members of the Colombo Plan. In general, it is the Canadian conclusion that only if these Asian governments were prepared to accept and to welcome France as a member of the Colombo Plan would we be able to support her candidature. It is considered that should France be admitted there would be applications from other European countries with similar interests in South and Southeast Asia, particularly the Netherlands. Indonesia would almost certainly object to admission of the Netherlands and, therefore, it seems that the prospects of success for French candidature are not too good. It is not thought that there would be any other proposals for memberships brought before the Singapore meetings of the Colombo Plan.

FUTURE OF THE BUREAU FOR TECHNICAL CO-OPERATION AND POSSIBLE ESTABLISHMENT OF A COLOMBO PLAN SECRETARIAT

In general the Canadian authorities feel that the Bureau for Technical Co-operation has served a modestly useful purpose and that if we were to start a Colombo Plan organization again we would be prepared to support the creation of some similar body. The Bureau has assisted in avoiding duplication of technical assistance requests, has served as a channel through which applications could be directed by countries in Asia to the donor countries which did not have representation in each other's respective capitals. It has also helped in standardization of conditions for exports going to the area and has provided valuable material for discussions on general policy. However, it is recognized that the Bureau has had a very limited sphere of operations and that there would undoubtedly be ways of increasing its effectiveness under fresh direction as part of a Colombo Plan Secretariat, for example.

2. The Canadian authorities are not particularly dissatisfied with Dr. Curtin's performance as Director of the Bureau and we would not want to support any move to have him ousted summarily. On the other hand, it is recognized that he might not be the most suitable person to head an expanded Colombo Plan administration and that under a reorganization of the existing administration it might be found possible to replace Dr. Curtin with someone who would be able to deal more effectively with the operations of the Bureau for Technical Co-operation.

3. Mr. Casey's proposals for the creation of a Colombo Plan Secretariat by absorbing the Bureau and the Information Unit and creating an Economic Aid Section have been viewed with favour in Ottawa, subject to the proviso that they must be acceptable to the Asian members. In addition, it is the Canadian thought that any expansion of the Colombo Plan Secretariat should be modest and that the Economic Aid section would be expected to concentrate on the provision of information about economic aid rather than on any co-ordination of economic aid projects. The Colombo Plan Secretariat could also do a good deal of work in preparation for the annual meeting and could keep records of capital assistance projects under way. However, it is considered that such an Economic Aid Branch should not undertake to do overall analysis of Colombo Plan progress and objectives and that this task should be left for the annual reports.

4. In all discussions of the future form of the Colombo Plan organization and of the future development of the Plan itself, it is the Canadian view that the existing bilateral and informal nature of the Colombo Plan operation should be retained and that it would not be desirable to create any type of administration which would interfere with the direct contact between donor and receiving governments, which has been so fruitful up to the present.

5. In considering proposals such as that of Mr. Casey, it would not be appropriate for the Canadian Delegation to take a position in advance of that taken by other major Colombo Plan delegations, nor would Canada be prepared to initiate any ambitious programmes. Above all, however, the Canadian Delegation should make certain that any concrete proposals coming before the Conference have substantial Asian support.

6. The Colombo Plan Information Unit has only just begun to function and has, in Canadian eyes, made a very useful start. It would seem unnecessary to disorganize the existing organization which has been set up and Canada would favour a continuation of the Information Unit's operations on the present basis.

7. It has been suggested that Canada might consider supplying a Canadian to fill one of the important roles in a revised Secretariat. If Canada is asked to do so, the delegation could accept the proposal and suggest that it might be possible for a suitable Canadian to be found. Our ability to provide a candidate will depend in large measure on the type of Secretariat which the Conference finally decided to establish.

8. There will undoubtedly be numerous questions concerning the financing of a Secretariat, the salary level of the Director and so on. There will probably be discussions also concerning the location of the Secretariat. On the latter point, Colombo would seem to have a good claim (facilities and some personnel already there, small and fairly conveniently situated country, and place of origin of the Plan). On financial aspects, the delegation will be expected to exercise its own judgment and not to accept any definite commitments until there has been an opportunity to consider them in Ottawa.

TECHNICAL ASSISTANCE

Canada has circulated to the member governments some comments on problems related to the Technical Assistance Programme, which propose:

- (a) That the priority lists be prepared annually by recipient countries.
- (b) That firm written undertakings be given that trainees would return to employment for which their Colombo Plan experience would assist them.
- (c) That nomination procedures and forms be improved to allow for these two suggestions.

Furthermore, Canada feels that more requests for assistance in the development of training institutions in the area itself could be sympathetically considered in line with the often repeated recommendations of the Colombo Plan Consultative Committee and Council that training programmes in the area should be encouraged in preference to the sending of trainees abroad. There were also included some suggestions for more effective use of Canadian experts (provision of understudies, making available adequate facilities for working or teaching, prompt payment of allowance, etc.)

2. Attached as Appendix "C"† is a copy of the paper dealing with our views on technical assistance which has been circulated to other member governments.

DISCUSSIONS WITH THE BURMA DELEGATION DURING THE COLOMBO PLAN MEETINGS

Attached (Appendix 1)† are copies of the correspondence between Mr. Pearson and the Leader of the Burmese Delegation, concerning the cobalt beam therapy unit. The Burmese were happy with this offer and proposed to send a formal reply through appropriate channels from Rangoon.

During our discussions with the Burmese, we asked for and were given an assurance that acceptance of the cobalt beam therapy unit would not prejudice further Canadian aid to other projects. There are three Burmese doctors now in the United States studying on Smith-Mundt scholarships. It was suggested that these three doctors or their leader might come to Ottawa to discuss further details concerning installation of the cobalt beam therapy unit. At the time of their visit, it was also proposed that they would spend some time with National Health and Welfare and Atomic Energy of Canada, Ltd., and possibly with some of the medical educational authorities so that on return to Burma they would have a better idea of training facilities available in our country and of the type of experts we might or might not be able to send to Burma in this field.

The Burmese were also told with regard to the cobalt beam therapy unit that if, at the time of the installation of this unit in Rangoon, it seemed necessary to send a Canadian expert out for a period to supervise the work, this could be considered. The Burmese were told also that it would take at least eighteen months to manufacture and set up the cobalt unit and that arrangements would be made for a training programme to coincide with the despatch of the unit from Canada.

As far as new projects were concerned, the Canadian Delegation suggested that Canada was prepared to undertake some modest and useful capital assistance programmes in Burma subject to the availability of funds. One of the major difficulties was that in Canada there were very few experts qualified to discuss detailed programmes of economic aid for Burma and, for that matter, very few Burmese who understood much of availabilities in our country. The Burmese emphasized the economic difficulties into which they had fallen as a result of the deterioration in their balance of payments position and stated that they were now able to undertake only some 50 per cent of the projects originally planned for implementation in their development programme.

They did not seem to press the request for assistance on the aerial survey very far. Possibly some of Palmer's views on the feasibility of Canada's providing much assistance to Burma in this field are known to them; however, there remains a possibility of Canada's providing some equipment in this field. Palmer has apparently recommended that Canada consider supplying a relatively small amount of equipment for use on aerial survey work.

On several of the Burmese requests, the Canadian Delegation indicated a lack of interest or inability to provide the facilities demanded; for example, we were doubtful of our ability to provide much assistance in the exploration of lignite coal deposits and did not react enthusiastically to the Burmese project for the construction of a fertilizer factory in Rangoon. Similarly, their request for assistance in the exploration for uranium was not taken up. As far as the further requests for medical experts were concerned, we suggested that these should best be discussed with Dr. Clark after his arrival.

However, three projects which the Delegation did agree to put forward as suitable for further investigation in Ottawa emerged from these talks. The first is an application for assistance in providing equipment for a technical high school. As nearly as can be determined, the Burmese have also asked for help on this project and are receiving it from the Ford Foundation, Australia and the United Kingdom. The Burmese would be interested in Canadian experts for assignment to the staff of the high school as well as in Canadian equipment for installation in some of the laboratories. Attached is a copy of the A-4 Form submitted by the Burmese through the Council for Technical Co-operation (Appendix 2).†

The second project discussed with the Burmese was a request for diesel locomotives. The Burmese prepared this request after noting Canadian assistance with this type of equipment to Ceylon. Attached is a copy of their preliminary submission in this connection (Appendix 3).† Apparently, the Burmese Purchasing Mission, which made a tour of Europe and North America in 1953-54, had made plans for the purchase of diesel equipment but these have now had to be abandoned because of foreign exchange difficulties. As will be noted by Mr. Daniel's covering letter to Mr. Ritchie,† the Burmese would like to have a preliminary Canadian reaction to this request before placing the matter formally before us. If our preliminary reaction could be at all favorable, it would presumably include a request for more detailed specifications upon which some conclusion could be reached in Ottawa. It might be useful to consider sending out a Canadian diesel engineer in the near future to assist the Burmese in preparing this programme.

The third possibility for Canadian assistance relates to Burmese requirements created by the necessity of expanding their present electrical system. Attached is a submission giving details of the equipment (chiefly transmission line equipment) which is apparently needed to make the best use of generators already ordered (Appendix 4).† As the Burmese

Minister described it to Mr. Pearson unless they receive assistance from someone in establishing a distribution network, some of the large diesel units which they have purchased cannot be brought into effective operation. The same action is required by the Canadian authorities on this project as on the previous one. It may be necessary to send out two experts on brief survey missions, one in the field of diesel railway electrification and the other in the field of transmission line engineering.

During the meetings, the Burmese on a number of occasions commented that they had a great many outstanding requests for technical assistance which had not been answered through the Bureau for Technical Co-operation. It was explained to them, particularly at the Technical Assistance Group meetings, that some of their requests have not been sufficiently well prepared to enable donor countries to take rapid action. Possibly the preparation in a very tentative way of the diesel engine and electrification requests for us is a sign that the Burmese are giving more thought to the manner in which their requests are put forward. Like the Cambodians, the Burmese seemed somewhat irritated at the slowness with which Colombo Plan aid was developing. To judge from Palmer's experience, it may be very difficult for us to undertake much in the way of a Colombo Plan programme in Burma without a great deal more time being given to the area by a Canadian representative, possibly the one who will be stationed shortly in Singapore.

Also attached is part of a memorandum arising from discussions which the Delegation had with Mr. P.E. Palmer (Appendix 5).†

DISCUSSIONS WITH THE CAMBODIAN DELEGATION DURING THE COLOMBO PLAN MEETINGS

We had several discussions with the Cambodian Delegation, particularly with Phlek-Phoeun and Clement Pann, both of whom had, of course, attended previous Colombo Plan meetings.

At the beginning of the meetings, Phlek-Phoeun told us that he felt that he had wasted at least a year on the Colombo Plan. His country had received little or nothing under its auspices. He was prepared, however, to exempt Canada from his rigorous expression of disappointment because we had provided some experts and training facilities and because the two veterinary vans had arrived just before he left to come to Singapore. Phlek-Phoeun was particularly bitter about the failure of the United Kingdom to do anything constructive. Apparently, Alex Simon during the meetings in Ottawa made a number of promises on which no action was taken. Subsequently, the United Kingdom Scientific Advisor, Mr. Mills, who was stationed in Karachi, made a visit to Cambodia and made a number of further recommendations — none of which have been implemented. Phlek-Phoeun's comments were that every U.K. official seemed to contradict every other official with the result that nothing is done.

These comments of the Cambodians on the United Kingdom programme for their country assumed greater significance after a conversation with Sir Alexander MacFarquhar, who as the UNTAB representative has made several trips to Cambodia. Sir Alexander remarked that he thought that the Colombo Plan donor countries would do well to make an especially sympathetic effort to do something in Cambodia because he had sensed some irritation on the part of the Cambodian authorities at the slowness with which practical assistance from the Western countries was being made available.

The Cambodians were informed of our decision to send out an expert as a response to their request for assistance in the form of fish drying equipment. They understood the difficulties of supplying equipment of this kind from Canada without an on-the-spot investigation and welcomed the proposed Canadian expert's tour. They hoped, however, that he would be qualified in other aspects of the fisheries industry. They were not thinking of someone to advise on fishing but wanted someone to help with advice on processing and marketing. It was agreed that the Canadian expert, when he came, would have fairly general terms of reference and would be asked to make suggestions to the Canadian authorities concerning the possibility of Canadian economic aid and technical assistance to Cambodia in this field.

In addition to the possibility of Canadian activity in fisheries, there was also consideration of the possibility of Canadian aid in the generation of electrical energy. The Cambodians agreed to prepare some material on their present facilities in this field and on their requirements for which they had not already placed orders. Cambodia has needs, so it appears, not only in Phnom-Penh but in the fourteen provinces. Their existing equipment is very limited. After receipt of the information to be supplied by the Cambodians, the Canadian Delegation agreed that consideration would be given to sending an expert in the generation of electrical energy to Cambodia to do a survey of possible Canadian assistance.

During our discussion with the Laos Delegation, we were also informed of a medical centre for the training of hospital personnel which exists, or is being established, in Phnom-Penh. This was thought to be another possibility for Canadian assistance, especially since it appears to have some regional training functions.

The major part of our time with the Cambodians was, however, spent in discussing their difficulties in arranging for much participation of their country in the technical assistance programmes. They described their difficulties — which they considered almost insuperable at the present time — in providing housing, transportation and the administrative and technical personnel which were required to make the best use of an expert's services. The Cambodians sketched their difficulties in providing flats at government expense for foreign experts when their own housing needs were so urgent. A building had been put up for the United Nations and United States technicians at United States expense. The Canadian Delegation described our problems in providing funds for similar buildings to house Canadian experts and suggested that the Cambodians might wish to consider approaching the United States for further funds of this kind.

The Canadian Delegation indicated a possibility that we might be able to be more forthcoming in the provision of suitable transport for Canadian experts. Some arrangement by which the United States provided housing and Canadians provided transport for foreign experts might be worked out. Canada could not, however, contemplate the provision of transportation for all foreign experts but only for such Canadians as there might be and perhaps a few others. Perhaps even more important than the provision of four-wheel drive vehicles or other suitable carriers might be the provision of repair facilities, since at the present time these are desperately limited.

On the difficulties which arise in providing administrative and technical personnel, reference was made to the efforts of Mr. Boudreault's and Mr. Grenier's secretaries, to train local personnel. It seemed clear that if Canadian experts go to Cambodia and if they are required to conduct much correspondence with the local authorities or with Ottawa, some provision for secretarial assistance might have to be made. Even more disturbing, however, was the likelihood that there would be very few understudies or counterparts available to assist the Canadian expert and to carry on after he left.

On the subject of trainees, the Cambodians indicated their difficulties in providing people of the appropriate standard of education to take advantage of Canadian and other offers of technical assistance. The Canadian Delegation suggested that, if asked, we might be willing to consider taking trainees at the high school level for fairly basic education in Canada in preparation for university work. We indicated in general terms some of the fields in which training was available.

Phlek-Phoeun asked for and was given clarification of the content of Canada's economic aid programme to his country. It was not possible for us to provide what he called "financial aid". The only way in which direct assistance could be given to Cambodia's balance of payments' difficulties was through the provision of some commodity or consumer goods which could be sold to create counterpart funds for use on agreed development projects. Mr. Ritchie recalled a meeting at Ottawa with Phlek-Phoeun which had come to the conclusion that there was no commodity at present available from Canada which Cambodia normally imports and which could be used to create counterpart funds. After some discussion, it was agreed that there was little to be gained from pursuing this particular avenue of assistance further.

Concerning what Phlek-Phoeun called "economic aid", the Canadian Delegation said that it was now possible to consider some form of capital assistance to Cambodia but that at the present time the volume of such aid would not be large. When pressed for a specific figure which Phlek-Phoeun could use on return to his country, we refused to comply and noted that in 1955-56, we had only $1 million for the three Indochinese States as well as for the other non-Commonwealth countries of the area. As a result, aid to Cambodia would have to be in the tens or possibly the hundreds of thousands. The volume of Canadian aid would, however, depend on the quality and the quantity of projects brought forward for detailed consideration. We emphasized the necessity for providing as much information as possible in support of requests for technical or capital assistance.

DISCUSSIONS WITH THE INDONESIA DELEGATION DURING THE COLOMBO PLAN MEETINGS

Our first contact with Indonesia's problems arose from our discussions with Mr. Palmer. Attached is a copy of our memorandum (Appendix 1)† which was done following discussions with him and which reports his generally favorable views on the possibility of Canadian assistance in carrying out aerial photographic work in Indonesia. Copies of Mr. Palmer's letter to Dr. Djuanda of September 30th (Appendix 2)† and to Mr. Mills of September 26th (Appendix 3),† which have already been received in Ottawa, are attached for ease of reference. Palmer gave us a copy of a map which the Indonesian Photographic Survey Department had produced and which, he said, was as good as any maps produced elsewhere in the world. This map is also attached (Appendix 4)† and is perhaps a partial explanation of Palmer's enthusiasm.

Subsequently, we had a Delegation meeting with Dr. Djuanda and Achmad Ali, during which we discussed in more general terms our aid programme with Indonesia. We were given copies of a document, dated October 11th, entitled, "Summary Review of the Mineral Resource Development Programme for 1956-1960". Two copies are attached (Appendix 5).† It is our impression that the Indonesians presented this memorandum to most of the donor country delegations at Singapore. Certainly, it has been placed before the ICA, and one expert has already been promised from Japan. One major point on which we were never really satisfied was the relationship of this Indonesian submission to the Canadian programme already underway in Indonesia for which we are already providing two geologists and possibly a third.

The Indonesians do not contemplate an overall survey of mineral resources for which one donor country would be responsible, but are seeking assistance from abroad for the programme of mineral resources survey which they propose to undertake and organize themselves. The experts who would be supplied under this scheme would be assigned to particular operational posts but might also be expected (as one of the Canadian experts is already doing) to undertake teaching courses. There appears to be considerable possibility of confusion in the organization of this mineral resources survey, particularly as experts are going to be supplied from three or four donor countries and agencies. Dr. Djuanda expressed great satisfaction with the Canadian geologists now on the scene.

There was no discussion with the Indonesian Delegation of possible Canadian assistance to the aerial survey since it was agreed that the next step was up to Ottawa, where action could presumably be taken on the basis of the reports already made available.

The Indonesians welcomed our proposal to send out a team to Indonesia to look into the possibilities of aid to technical training institutions. They referred in this connection to a report by a United States survey team which had been completed recently on the general subject of technical education in Indonesia. Achmad Ali agreed to make a copy of this report available to Mr. Heasman's office for use by the Canadian expert when he came.

The Indonesians are also anxious to obtain the services of Dr. Keyfitz and perhaps another Canadian to help them in the preparation of their census. They wanted to know what the chances were of getting Dr. Keyfitz's services under the Colombo Plan for a further period, perhaps for as much as three more years.

We had some discussion with the Indonesians concerning their undergraduate students' training plan. Ottawa had agreed to accept ten students for such training this year. We were subsequently informed that the Australians were flying (during the period of the Conference itself) 140 Indonesian students who would begin undergraduate training in Australia this fall. So far as the Canadian programme was concerned, the Indonesians promised to be careful in selecting suitable candidates and to ensure that they would be satisfactorily employed on their return.

The Indonesians seemed appreciative of Canadian assistance. There was not very much that the Delegation could do during the meetings in view of the existing close liaison between Dr. Djuanda and his officers and the Canadian Embassy in Djakarta.

[4<sup>e</sup> PARTIE/PART 4]

DISCUSSIONS WITH THE LAOS DELEGATION DURING THE COLOMBO PLAN MEETINGS

At the beginning of the meeting, Mr. Ritchie explained the general frame of reference within which Canadian economic aid programmes with Laos would be worked out, indicating that so far as capital aid was concerned the Laos authorities could not expect more than a fairly limited amount of assistance. He spoke in terms of tens of thousands rather than of hundreds and indicated that the primary emphasis, at the beginning in any case, would have to be on technical assistance.

Concerning technical assistance, the Deputy Prime Minister of Laos had apparently no conception of the type of education that was available in Canada in French. We explained to him in some detail the types of courses given at the French-speaking Canadian universities and tried to interest him in the possibility of sending some candidates from his country. However, he emphasized several times over that Laos had very few people that it could send to training courses abroad. Our general impression was that the Laotians preferred that anybody who could be spared from the country should study in France. In any case there were so few experienced officials that hardly anybody from the public services could be spared.

With regard to experts, the Laos authorities stressed their housing, transportation, and counterpart problems. Our general impression was that for these reasons (and possibly also for the additional reason that the United States and United Kingdom programmes are providing a number of experts), few requests in this field would be received by Canada.

The Laotians were, however, anxious to get some form of capital assistance from us. It was our impression that they would welcome any agreed form of Canadian aid. The Canadian Delegation indicated its desire to provide some economic aid since Laos is the only country in the Colombo Plan to whom we have so far not given assistance. Altogether six possible fields of aid were discussed.

The first priority, according to the Laotians would be for a mining and prospecting survey of their country. They believe there are uranium and various non-ferrous metals to be discovered. The local inhabitants have themselves been working some deposits of precious metals, and it is believed there are also iron deposits close to the surface. The Laos authorities said that they had some maps and that some very preliminary studies had been done during French days. One of the difficulties that emerged from the discussion was that of transportation, there being very few roads in Laos. What is more, the geological survey work would have to be done in very difficult terrain. It was thought that this could only be accomplished properly by helicopter or on foot. The Laotians emphasized that the work would be carried out in the settled and tranquil districts. The Canadian Delegation agreed that this form of aid from Canada might be considered in Ottawa, and after further investigation, someone might be sent out to discover if it would be practical for Canada to offer assistance.

In the field of hydro-electric energy, the Laotians mentioned the Mekong River project and remarked that they had some other projects for the development of electrical energy on which they wanted help. Concerning the Mekong project, it is understood that ECAFE already have a survey team preparing a study. This is a fairly limited study involving ECAFE experts in Laos, Cambodia and Thailand. They will be preparing through the ECAFE headquarters a general economic report on the project. Sir Alexander MacFarquhar of the United Nations told us that he had asked for, and received, authority from UNTAB headquarters under a special regional emergency fund available to spend upwards of $150,000 on a more detailed engineering study of the project. He was now negotiating with ECAFE to see how this could be arranged. It was believed it would have to be done under ECAFE leadership. After our talk with the Laotians, we spoke to both MacFarquhar and Lokanathan and indicated that, if asked, we were sure the Technical Co-operation Service would be willing to try and find Canadian French-speaking personnel to work on this project. However, as far as the Laotians themselves were concerned, we told them that Canadian aid would not be on a scale sufficient to undertake a project of the size of the Mekong Dam and that our attention would have to be concentrated on a part of a project of this magnitude or on a smaller project.

The Laotians then indicated some of their difficulties in producing electrical energy at all and referred to the very limited facilities which now existed, even in Vientiane, for generating electrical energy. They would be most interested in any assistance we could give in the form of diesel generating equipment, and the possibility was left open that we might send someone to look into this field in Laos, particularly if someone were going to Cambodia in the same field.

The Laotians also asked for our help in providing hospital equipment and we pointed out to them some of the problems we faced because of the fact that most hospital equipment used in Canada is manufactured in the United States.

The Laotians then expressed their wish to receive aid in the form of agricultural machinery and tractors. They had land available for cultivation but suffered from a shortage of labour. Australia is already providing some assistance in this field and has supplied ten tractors. The size of tractor which they had in mind was 85 to 105 horsepower. Mr. English thought that the possibility of Canadian assistance perhaps in maintenance as well as in the provision of tractors should be carefully studied and that there very well might be Canadian firms that would be anxious to co-operate in sending someone out to Laos to do an on-the-spot study. One of the major forms which our assistance could take would be in the provision of repair facilities since, apparently, there is no adequate centre of this kind anywhere in Laos.

Another field in which the Laotians would be grateful for our help is what they call "sanitary education". WHO and UNICEF are already active in this general area but do not have much money for expenditure on equipment. It was left very much in the air as to whether Canada could become involved in this field and Mr. Ritchie subsequently thought that we might contact WHO for a general report.

Finally, as we were leaving, the Laotians raised the possibility of help from Canada in the form of sawmilling equipment, but this was not thought to be a very likely possibility by the Canadian Delegation.

In general, the problems involved in providing any economic aid at all to Laos are staggering. It is very difficult to know where to begin, and the Canadian Delegation concluded that only by detailed, on-the-spot investigation in practical subjects could anything in the nature of a country programme be worked out.

During the meeting, we drew the Laos Party's attention to our offer of film strips, films and projection equipment for audio-visual and adult education purposes, but discussion of our offer was left over until the Delegation's return to Vientiane.

DISCUSSIONS WITH THE MALAYA DELEGATION DURING THE COLOMBO PLAN MEETINGS

During the meetings, the Malayan authorities put considerable pressure on us in connection with the aerial survey. One senior official came down from Kuala Lumpur especially to press us to offer some assistance in this field. Attached is a copy of a report on the Aeromagnetic survey for Malaya which was prepared by an UNTAB expert, George Shaw

(Appendix 1).† Apparently, the Canadian authorities had not yet had an opportunity to study this report.

There is no point in this memorandum of recovering the ground that has already been dealt with so fully by Mr. Bartlett and by others who have looked into this project. As to its necessity, the Canadian Delegation during the meetings did not ask for any further background information. However, on a number of occasions the opportunity was taken of discussing our problems in dealing with a request for an expenditure of this magnitude in Malaya. The Malayan authorities were informed unequivocally that: only if the United Kingdom had been approached and was unable to undertake the work, and only if the Malayan authorities themselves were unable to do the work commercially, and only if Canada had sufficient funds available after the needs of the non-colonial territories in the area had been met, could favorable detailed consideration be given to the project in Ottawa.

The Malaysians seemed to understand our position and in preparation for meetings with us had obtained authority to say that Malaya would be able to meet a part of the costs of this survey out of its own resources. What the Malaysians said to us, therefore, was that they would be glad to know what part of the total cost of the project Canada would be prepared to undertake. The Delegation undertook to look into the possibility of Canada undertaking only a part of the total cost or some specific section of this survey which could be regarded as an autonomous project. The Malaysians appeared to be willing to make a contribution even in the form of Canadian dollars if we agreed to undertake the project as a whole.

The Malaysians' point was that their country might shortly become independent and that the Malayan people would be grateful for assistance from other Commonwealth countries given prior to their independence. What the Colonial officers were afraid of was that, with the increase in the use of synthetic rubber and the gradual diminishing of tin resources, the country might be faced with severe economic difficulties after independence unless a survey of natural resources showed further possibilities for economic development. In their anxiety to ensure that Malaya after obtaining its independence remains within the Commonwealth, the Colonial administration is anxious to ensure that the advantages of Commonwealth membership should be plainly obvious. The Malayan administration is anxious for a decision on the project to be reached one way or another in the immediate future and expressed some concern that there had been such a long delay (they said over a year) between the request being made to Canada and our giving a definite answer. The Canadian Delegation did not accept the implied Malayan criticism but agreed to stress the urgency of the situation to Ottawa and to suggest that a preliminary view one way or the other be made known to the Malayan authorities as soon as possible.

During the meetings we fairly forcefully drew the attention of the Malayan authorities to the difficulties there had been in the past concerning the employment of Canadians in the Malayan Colonial service. It was our view (which it is believed the Malaysians now appreciate) that Canadians should not be required to fill in for Colonial civil servants away on a holiday or posted elsewhere. We also stressed the difficulties which were discussed in detail in the Technical Assistance Group: of students of this area returning after courses from abroad to find that their qualifications were not as highly regarded as similar United Kingdom qualifications from traditional sources. On both of these points, the Malaysians now are at least fully informed and may conceivably bear our problems in mind in working out future projects and technical assistance programmes.

Ottawa will have already received material concerning the discussions which we had with Mr. Le Mare, the Director of Fisheries in Malaya. As a result of these discussions, a telegram was sent to Colombo suggesting that Lantz and Macdonald meet with Le Mare on his way home on leave. Lantz and Macdonald were to report to Ottawa on two questions: (1) the suitability of Le Mare's projects for Canadian aid, and (2) the desirability of Lantz and Macdonald visiting Singapore to discuss the matter on the spot. Copies of this correspondence from our files are attached (Appendix 2).†

Attached is a copy of a memorandum which was prepared on the Singapore Polytechnic (Appendix 3).† After our discussions with Davies of the Singapore Government, this project was left pending a further submission to us by the Singapore Government. In general, we did not indicate any particular enthusiasm for this project and referred to the financial and political problems sketched above in relation to the aerial survey. The Singapore authorities are also approaching the ICA, the Australians, and the United Kingdom for help on the Polytechnic. The Polytechnic may very well turn into a regional project in which case Canada might be better able to assist it, provided funds were available and provided we manufactured the equipment required for any particular laboratory. Davies suggested and we agreed that, if Canadian aid were offered, it would best be provided in the shape of equipment for a self-contained laboratory unit. The Singapore authorities were not able, however, to press very far at the present time with their request, and all they wanted was an indication of the likelihood of Canadian aid. Not until the Principal of the Polytechnic had been appointed (as was expected in two months' time) and the heads of departments nominated would they be able to make firm and detailed requests. The question of Canadian aid to this project was left very much up in the air.

Attached also is a memorandum from Mr. Armstrong concerning three specific Malayan applications which the Delegation did not discuss in detail (Appendix 4).† Presumably these can best be dealt with further through Mr. Armstrong's office after due consideration in Ottawa.

In connection with the various Malayan submissions, a number of documents are attached describing Mr. Bartlett's discussions with the Malayan authorities; these give a great deal of information about the Malayan requests (Appendix 5).† Another report attached gives information on the technical assistance which the Malayan Government has requested from other Colombo Plan countries (Appendix 6).†

It was to be expected that the Malaysians would take advantage of the Conference being held in Singapore to press their requests. In response to our comments concerning the relationship of these requests to the requirements of the non-Commonwealth countries in the area, the Malayan answer was that just because one of the countries in South-East Asia had got its head and shoulders out of the mud while other countries were still up to their neck in economic difficulties, this was no reason for refusing to help the man who was half-way out to get all the way out.

DISCUSSIONS WITH THE VIET-NAM DELEGATION DURING THE COLOMBO PLAN MEETINGS

Early in the meetings, the Canadian Delegation took the opportunity of making sure that the Vietnamese understood our position relative to the provision of aid to their country under the Colombo Plan. The Delegation believes that the Vietnamese are sympathetic to our position and understand our problems in providing experts and capital assistance.

When we had a full Delegation meeting with the Vietnamese, we suggested that only through the provision of language teachers could we get very much involved in the expert programmes. Sir Alexander MacFarquhar was considerably disappointed when our position was explained to him, and he tried to suggest once or twice that Canada was being unduly sensitive in refraining from sending experts to South Viet-Nam. The Vietnamese themselves didn't seem to be very much concerned.

During the meetings, the Delegation also brought the Vietnamese Delegation and the World Bank representative together as a result of the former's request for help in determining where assistance could be obtained in preparing overall national economic plans. Mr. de Wilde subsequently told us that Viet-Nam might in the near future join the International Bank.

Our main emphasis during the Delegation meeting with the Vietnamese was on training programmes. The Vietnamese accepted our views on the desirability of relating fellowship and scholarship programmes in some way to development programmes. They also were prepared to obtain undertakings from trainees going abroad to return to Viet-Nam. What is more, the Government would consider itself under an obligation to employ trainees in appropriate fields when they returned. The Vietnamese wondered whether, in the light of our comments about annual reviews, we would be prepared to take trainees at other times. We indicated that the Canadian request for an annual review and for co-ordinated submissions on technical assistance did not, of course prohibit requests being put forward at other times.

The Vietnamese pointed out the severe difficulties they faced in finding candidates for fellowships and scholarships from amongst the civil service cadres. Many civil servants could not be spared from their work for the time involved. Similarly, graduates of the high schools who were available for advanced university work were very few in number and many of these were now going to France. (We may eventually run into the same problem in Indochina, which we have run into in the British territories, of Canadian degrees not being regarded as highly as those from the metropolitan area concerned.)

The Vietnamese asked us if we could consider taking students who only recently completed their high school training. The Canadian authorities agreed to consider this possibility for limited numbers of applicants.

We took the occasion also to remind the Vietnamese of the numerous outstanding offers from Canada to which they had not replied with specific nomination requests. Our offer of film strips, films and photographic equipment was also re-emphasized during the meeting.
