6. Khrushchev then brought up the alleged Carpenter statement again saying that he (who was described as "the Chief of the Air Staff in Canada") had said that the U.S.S.R. should be made to understand that they could be "utterly destroyed" and that the Soviet military set up was "20 years behind the times".<sup>49</sup> I reacted strongly to this by saying that Carpenter was not Chief of Air Staff but a subordinate officer and that if it was found that he had made such irresponsible statements he would no doubt be appropriately dealt with. I went on to say that what disturbed me more was that such an inaccurate and misleading report should have reached the Soviet leaders. In Canada it could be denied by responsible persons in our free press while in the U.S.S.R. it was accepted without question or any opportunity of correction.

7. Khrushchev said that the Soviet leaders were not concerned by the implied threat in the statement but by the suggestion that the Soviet Union's military establishment was out of date. This kind of talk might encourage aggressors.

8. I then turned the conversation to the Geneva conference and the German problem. Khrushchev said that the Soviet Government had no illusions about the prospects of the forthcoming foreign ministers' meeting at Geneva. He agreed with me however when I said that even if much did not come out of this meeting it was only the beginning of what I hoped would be a continuous search for solutions to problems at such meetings. The main stumbling block Khrushchev said would be Germany and the approach to the solution of this problem agreed between the three western powers. This was definitely not acceptable to the Soviet Union. They could not agree to having the NATO military organization of the west which Khrushchev said again was directed against the U.S.S.R. further strengthened by the addition of 17 million Germans from the Democratic Republic: "better have 2/3 of Germany against us than the whole of it. We cannot be so stupid as to agree to strengthening the organization which is directed against us".

9. This gave me the chance to say that I might be willing to agree that the Soviet Union was justified in its fear of Germany if NATO were not a purely defensive organization. I was about to explain why NATO should be so regarded when Khrushchev broke in with the remark "you should let us into NATO — we have been knocking at the door two years". I replied that if the world situation were such as to permit entry of the U.S.S.R. into NATO it would also presumably permit proper functioning of the United Nations in the security field; that NATO was resorted to by the western powers because the United Nations was not given a chance to do work intended for it. I suggested beginning with implementation of Article 43 of the charter. I also pointed out that if the Soviets were in NATO they would have to accept integrated defence system and unified command. If they were prepared to accept that why not make the United Nations security system work?

10. This seemed unfamiliar ground for Khrushchev who returned to the charge against NATO with the remark that the Soviets could afford to wait for the break up of NATO owing to over spending on armaments by inter allied disagreements. I countered this with the argument that without NATO the Soviets might be worse off with the United States 'going it alone' and Germany free wheeling in the center of Europe without the cautious and restraining influence of countries like the United Kingdom, Belgium, France and Canada.

11. I left Khrushchev in no doubt that while we consider NATO a purely defensive arrangement it is an essential element in our defence and foreign policy and would remain so until international confidence reached a point where United Nations itself could effectively guarantee international security.

12. I asked Khrushchev if he would clarify the Soviet attitude to the German problem. His reply could not have been more categorical: "so long as the Paris agreements exist and Germany remains in NATO we shall do everything possible to prevent the re-unification of Germany". I asked him whether he was aware that it was the intention that a United Germany as a sovereign state would not be forced into NATO but would be free to choose whether to be in NATO or remain neutral? Khrushchev answered that this was the first time he had heard of it. While I was replying that he ought to look into this possibility Khrushchev got some prompting from Bulganin and returned to the charge with the statement that the U.S.S.R. had suggested a general security system which would include the United States and Canada as well as the U.S.S.R. and European states.

13. Referring to the United Kingdom proposals put forward by Sir Anthony Eden at the "summit" meeting for a security guarantee Khrushchev said that so long as the Paris agreements and NATO remained in effect a guarantee by the western powers would be regarded as humiliating for the U.S.S.R. and unacceptable. In reply to my question — why they would not regard membership in NATO involving mutual guarantees as equally humiliating — Khrushchev said that Soviet membership in NATO would put them on a footing of complete equality with the other powers in the matter of security and they would not then have to depend upon the favours or goodwill of the four powers envisaged in the United Kingdom proposals. Getting quite excited at this point Khrushchev said that the U.S.S.R. would prefer to "exist by ourselves and impose co-existence on others". "After all" he said "we have to co-exist don't we or else fly away to Mars?"

14. Then more soberly Khrushchev (after prompting from Bulganin) said that the Soviet Union does not reject the Eden proposals completely. If they could be altered for instance to include not four other powers but say 8 or 10 they might be made acceptable. Khrushchev's idea for the composition of such a group which might undertake mutual guarantees included: the United States, France, the United Kingdom, both Germanys, the U.S.S.R., Poland, Czechoslovakia, Belgium, Denmark (and then added "even Canada").

15. If the obstacle to agreement to such an approach were the two Germanys perhaps it would be better to keep them both out of the mutual guarantee arrangement, he said, but at the same time restrict their armaments. They would be indirectly associated with the guarantee arrangement through their association respectively with NATO and the Warsaw pact. To my question whether it would not be better to let a united free Germany decide by free choice how best to provide for its security, Khrushchev abruptly said "we want either both Germanys in the European security system or else neither" — as to re-unification he said the U.S.S.R. could wait — "why the hurry?" he said.

16. Khrushchev said that the approach to European security which he had outlined could open the way to a solution. So long as the western powers insisted on trying to negotiate from positions of strength there could be no change of agreement. Russians he said do not like to negotiate with "a knife in their backs". To my rejoinder that the western powers sought only defensive strength adequate to deter aggression, Khrushchev bluntly said that the policy of the western powers was plainly designed "to impose solutions" on the U.S.S.R. which the U.S.S.R. would not tolerate. I rejected this view.

17. Getting again quite excited at this point, Khrushchev said that Russians knew better than any other people what war means (he mentioned that he had lost a son) — only the Germans had comparable experience. If NATO starts a war he said, the alliance would fall apart since most of its members would not be willing to fight. He returned to this theme of NATO falling apart a number of times either in the context of defence costs or because of unwillingness to fight. At one point he said that the war if it occurred would inevitably involve Germany and the allies might as well face up to the fact that the Germans will not fight having had enough of war.

18. I replied that no one wanted war in the nuclear age and the West would never be the first to start a war to which Khrushchev replied "we shall never fire the first shot but we shall be in at the finish". To my answer that under present circumstances any world war would be infinitely worse than the last Khrushchev agreed but added "this time Canada would not be geographically secure".

19. Since Khrushchev spoke somewhat disparagingly of the military experiences of the West both in the last war and in Korea, I had to take him up on both counts reminding him in particular that Canadians although not themselves invaded had gone in large numbers, thousands of miles, to fight in the common cause; and that as for Korea, our forces had joined others in support of a United Nations decision that aggression had been committed by North Korea and had stopped that aggression.

20. Khrushchev dismissed the current disarmament discussion in the United Nations as just a "talking shop" — if they were serious why had the other powers not replied to the Soviet proposals of May 10?<sup>50</sup> he said. I reminded him that we had reacted but the difference had been the introduction of political conditions by the Soviets relating to security.

See United States, Department of State, Documents on Disarmament 1945-1959, Volume 1, Washington: United States Government Printing Office, 1960, pp. 456-467.

21. In conclusion Khrushchev now in a more mellow mood said that what the world needs is "time and patience". "The Soviet Union" he said "could afford to be patient" — "our system is solid our economy developing". Western leaders however have to accord he said "civil rights to Communism" and not react to it "like a bull to a red rag". "If you don't like it" he said "you don't have to join it". In reply I said that it was not the boast that their loyalty is for their "socialist fatherland" rather than for their own but that was our own problem. Khrushchev agreed. When I pressed the matter of outside assistance to local Communist parties Khrushchev laughed it off with "what a dollar a day? We haven't the dollars for that". What they also wanted Khrushchev said was foreign trade with the West and business contacts; there could be peaceful competition between different systems. The talk ended with my thanking the Soviet leaders for this opportunity of talking frankly with them and telling them that it was our desire to have friendly working relations with them to which my visit, I hoped had contributed. Both Bulganin and Khrushchev hoped that this would not be the last such visit from Canada.

REPORT OF THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR EXTERNAL AFFAIRS
ON HIS VISIT TO THE SOVIET UNION AND THE FAR EAST

33. The Secretary of State for External Affairs recounted briefly the impressions he had gained on his recent visit to the Soviet Union and a number of Asian nations, and at the Colombo Plan meetings in Singapore.

As regards the Soviet Union, he felt the recent changes in tactics of the Russian leaders flowed not so much from a relaxation of tension abroad as from a relaxation of tension at home. It appeared that the Russian people were being given more freedom and, in this connection, it was just possible that a process had been started which would be difficult to interrupt or change. The Russian people were passionately sincere in their desire for peace. That, in itself, did not mean much unless the Soviet leaders converted this wish into policies for peace. Unfortunately, there was so far not much indication of peaceful policies.

The talks he had with the Russian leaders, particularly with Messrs. Khrushchev and Bulganin, were most interesting. Khrushchev seemed incapable of not saying what he actually believed and he seemed perfectly frank in his statements that the Russians did not want war. Mr. Pearson felt that Russian tactics and objectives had been altered because the Communist leaders had become convinced, mainly by their own experiments, that they could not afford a hydrogen bomb war. If this was the case, the only opportunity they had of advancing their cause was to stir up trouble in areas where they could achieve the best results. Khrushchev was confident that the Soviet Union would eventually win out in this game of patience between east and west because the American people did not have the stamina to make the continuing sacrifices required to win. They were particularly anxious to break up NATO and get the United States "out of Europe". Khrushchev was very frank on this latter point. He was not impressed by the argument that a Germany inside NATO was less of a menace than a Germany "free-wheeling" outside that alliance. The Russians regarded a Germany in NATO as an agent of the U.S. This they could not countenance, and they would do everything to detach Germany and other nations from the U.S. Khrushchev had adduced what the Russians regarded as authentic evidence that the U.S. was an aggressor nation. Mr. Pearson was not inclined to take this seriously but for the fact that the Soviet leaders were completely ignorant of what was happening outside their own country. For this reason, it was good, from our point of view, for them to travel to other nations, broaden their view-point and find out what was actually happening in other parts of the world.

The present Russian leaders were extremely proud of the progress their own country had made. The west would be making a mistake if it assumed that the present change of tactics resulted from weakness at home. It was true that there were certain difficulties in the Soviet Union but this did not account for the altered approach. Mr. Pearson felt Canada should still meet Russian overtures half way, and indicate a willingness to settle problems as they arose, but must not weaken the Canadian position in doing so.

At the Colombo plan meetings,<sup>51</sup> the Minister found a large measure of good-will towards Canada. He had been told before his departure that there was a tendency in India and Pakistan to underplay the assistance Canada had provided. This view was not well founded. Indian and Pakistani authorities appeared quite willing to give credit publicly to Canada for what help had been given. Both governments faced tremendous problems and it was still far from definite that they could establish viable states. Pakistan was split in two geographically. India had to contend with strong communal influences which made it exceedingly difficult to build a unified nation. When Nehru died there would be a very difficult time in India, and, if India disintegrated and became Communist, so would the rest of southeast Asia.

In Cairo, the Egyptian Premier admitted he had told the United Kingdom and the United States that, if they would not sell Egypt arms, Egypt would buy from Russia.<sup>52</sup> Colonel Nasser had also agreed that Egypt would have to recognize Israel. The Jews were in the area and could not be removed. However, certain conditions for recognition would have to be established and it was likely that Israel would have to make some concessions if tensions were to be eased and the threat of war removed. Mr. Eden's recent speech, with its offer of mediation, had been well received in Arab countries but not in Israel.<sup>53</sup> There was no doubt that this area was one of the most explosive in the world. Neither side wanted to start a war, but their armies were facing and shooting at each other. General Burns was now trying to get a neutral belt of land established between them.

34. During the discussion the following points emerged:

(a) The Soviet authorities were anxious to expand trade but only for political reasons. They would save money by buying wheat from Canada for use in their eastern provinces, and exporting grain from the Ukraine. It was not likely, however, that such exports would interfere seriously with Canadian markets.

(b) Pakistan needed 300,000 tons of wheat but could not afford to buy this from Canada in the face of gifts from the U.S. As regards trade with India, the Indian Minister of Finance had indicated that, on a big tender for generators, Canada would be given just as fair treatment as sterling area countries. If a Canadian bid was the lowest and other conditions were satisfactory, the necessary dollars would be made available.

(c) The Russian fishing fleet was one of the biggest in the world but their vessels were bought in other countries. Most purchases had been made in the United Kingdom but Russian officials now thought British ships too expensive and were looking elsewhere. If this were the case, it did not seem likely that any ships would be bought from Canada.

(d) Good progress had been made in Russia in some aspects of the steel industry. There was little doubt, for instance, that the Sverdolov plant was one of the most efficient and modern in the world.

(e) While much had been said about Russian ignorance of the western world, Canadian ignorance of Russia and its people was just as great. Industrial expansion in Russia had been incredible. The people were avid in their desire for education. There was more internal freedom. An effort was being made to rewrite Russian history in a more factual and honest manner. However, the young people, scientists in particular, all felt the United States was on the point of collapse. It would be useful if as many of them as possible could visit North America and see for themselves how prosperous and progressive the continent was.

TRADE AGREEMENT WITH THE USSR

During my visit to Moscow it is evident that the Soviet authorities will wish to discuss the possibility of a trade agreement providing for the exchange of most-favoured-nation treatment between Canada and the USSR. Canada has most-favoured-nation agreements with three Communist countries, China, Czechoslovakia and Poland.

At present Soviet exports to Canada are subject to our general tariff rates which in most cases are substantially higher than the most-favoured-nation rates. In the case of the USSR the tariff is of less commercial importance than in most countries since import decisions are taken by the Ministry of Foreign Trade. The Canadian tariff is less of an obstacle to Soviet exports to Canada than it would be if Soviet sales were in private hands; nevertheless most-favoured-nation treatment could be of some commercial value to the USSR.

Trade between the USSR and Canada is not very extensive at present. In 1954 our exports to the USSR amounted to $4,854,000, consisting of pulp, canned meat, barley and hides. Imports totalled $687,000, principally fur skins.

It is unlikely that the exchange of most-favoured-nation treatment would by itself bring about any significant increase in trade. As the natural resources of the two countries are similar rather than complementary, a large volume of trade is in any case improbable. There is probably some scope for expansion however. From time to time the USSR imports from other countries some non-strategic commodities which could be supplied by Canada, including wheat and coarse grains. Canada is a market for certain products which the USSR exports to other countries such as cotton and phosphates; the commodities the USSR normally exports are not such as would create difficulties for Canadian industry.

The principal Soviet motive may well be political — a desire to consolidate the relaxation of tension that followed the Geneva conference and to put its relations with Western countries on a more "normal" basis. The USSR is the only major country that does not receive most-favoured-nation treatment in Canada.

The mere exchange of most-favoured-nation tariff treatment would be a rather one-sided bargain unless it was accompanied by an undertaking by the USSR to purchase over a reasonable period significant quantities of certain important Canadian products, including wheat. (In 1938 Canada and the USSR reached agreement in principle on a trade agreement in which Canada would have granted most-favoured-nation treatment in return for a Soviet commitment to purchase from Canada goods valued at $5 million a year. The war interrupted these negotiations).<sup>54</sup> Politically the conclusion of such an agreement would not be undesirable; it could make some small contribution to the improvement of our relations.

I recommend that, if I am approached by Soviet Ministers on the question of a most-favoured-nation trade agreement, I should indicate that the Canadian Government would give favourable consideration to an agreement along the foregoing lines, provided that the USSR would undertake to purchase adequate quantities of important Canadian products, including wheat, over a long enough period.<sup>55</sup>

TRADE AGREEMENT WITH THE U.S.S.R.

17. The Secretary of State for External Affairs, referring to discussion at the meeting of September 16th, said there had been indications that the Soviet Union might be interested in a trade agreement with Canada and enquiries had been made as to whether this might be discussed during his visit to Moscow. New Zealand authorities were already discussing trade questions with the U.S.S.R. and it was possible that the United States might soon engage in trade talks with the Russians also.

In the circumstances, it might be advisable to give to the Soviet Embassy, informally, a specific proposal so that it could be considered before he reached Moscow. This could be related to the enquiries which had been received. If the Russians were anxious to see some tangible outcome from his visit, especially in the trade field, there might be some bargaining advantage in this action. A precise proposal now would ensure that discussions began on our terms and, if negotiations were not successful, failure could be attributed to the reluctance of the Soviet Union to discuss trade seriously. The proposal could either take the form of a detailed agreement covering all aspects of trade problems that might arise or, alternatively, it might consist of a brief memorandum of agreement, setting out a Soviet commitment to purchase a certain amount of wheat in Canada in exchange for a Canadian undertaking to extend to the U.S.S.R. the benefit of our m.f.n. tariff rates.

A detailed agreement would involve lengthy negotiations in which provision would have to be made for every kind of contingency. The results could either be unacceptable or not very meaningful as far as Canada was concerned. A simpler and shorter alternative would therefore appear to be preferable. In return for the U.S.S.R. agreeing to buy 500,000 tons of wheat for the next three years, Canada would extend m.f.n. rates of duty for this period. An agreement in this short form could, if the Russians wished, be concluded fairly quickly.

The Minister recommended that he be authorized to put forward, in advance of his trip, a proposal along the lines of the brief arrangement suggested, and that it be discussed in Moscow while he was there. If this proposal were unacceptable he might merely receive counter-suggestions for the consideration of the government later on. If it were felt desirable to seek a more detailed agreement from the outset, he felt he should discuss only the arrangements for subsequent negotiations and also be authorized to agree to any announcement at the end of his visit that conversations had been held with a view to negotiating, if possible, a trade agreement between the two governments.

18. During the discussion the following points emerged:

(a) There was no objection to informing the Soviet authorities informally, now, of the brief proposal concerning purchases of wheat in exchange for m.f.n. treatment. It might be possible to obtain some reaction to this suggestion before Mr. Pearson left for Moscow. However, no announcement should be made about it at the conclusion of the visit. It would be preferable not to make any kind of agreement, nor even initial a piece of paper while Mr. Pearson was in Moscow.

(b) The brief proposal did not appear to present any difficulties from the Canadian point of view. However, it might also include the same kind of arrangements that had been made with the Poles and the Czechs on valuation procedures.<sup>56</sup>

(c) It would be surprising if the U.S.S.R. were to agree to buy $35 million worth of wheat without much bargaining. It might suit their purposes, though, to accept such a proposal quite rapidly.

19. The Cabinet noted the report of the Secretary of State for External Affairs on a possible trade agreement with the U.S.S.R., and agreed:

(a) that the Department of External Affairs advise the Soviet Embassy in Ottawa, informally, that the government would be interested in a proposal involving the sale to Russia of 500,000 tons of wheat over a three-year period in exchange for the extension of m.f.n. treatment, along the lines suggested; the Minister to report on developments, if any; and,

(b) that further consideration would be given to the matter if it appeared likely that any type of agreement could be reached during the Minister's visit to Moscow.

TRADE NEGOTIATIONS WITH THE USSR

In accordance with Mr. Pearson's instructions following the Cabinet meeting on Wednesday and in accordance with the arrangements which you had made with the Soviet Ambassador, I saw Mr. Lobatchev, Commercial Counsellor at the Soviet Embassy, this morning. I spoke to him on the following lines:

"1. In connection with your informal inquiry the other day I am now in a position to say that during his visit to the Soviet Union Mr. Pearson would be prepared to discuss trade relations, and the possibility of some kind of trade agreement, if the Soviet authorities so desire.

2. I am not able to make a specific proposal but in the light of the discussions which have taken place I can indicate the general lines of Mr. Pearson's approach towards any such discussions.

3. Any reactions from the Soviet authorities before Mr. Pearson leaves for Moscow to this kind of approach would, of course, be helpful as it would assist us to determine whether there were likely to be substantial trade discussions and might also possibly affect somewhat the composition of Mr. Pearson's party.

4. If something is to be worked out, or even if any progress is to be made, during the short time Mr. Pearson is in Moscow it would be desirable to have at least some advance indication of each other's views.

5. If the Soviet authorities show a desire to have a trade agreement, Mr. Pearson will doubtless indicate that, for our part, we would wish:

(a) an undertaking on the part of the Soviet Government to purchase from Canada 500,000 tons of wheat annually for each of the next three crop years (including the present) at the prices, and on the terms, at which the Wheat Board is making sales to its major customers when the Soviet purchases take place, and

(b) an indication of the intention of the Soviet Government to provide opportunities for sales of other Canadian products to the USSR on a commercial basis.

6. We are not in a position to know what the USSR would wish to secure over a similar period in such a trade arrangement. We assume that it would be some form of most-favoured-nation treatment, involving access to our m.f.n. tariff rates. Mr. Lobatchev will appreciate that there are valuation, exchange rate and other problems in connection with imports into Canada from a state trading economy. He will be familiar with the arrangements which we have made with Czechoslovakia and Poland in connection with some of these problems.

7. We would be interested in knowing what the Soviet authorities might have in mind.

8. It is not possible at this stage to say whether any agreement would be a simple one or a fairly complex one.

9. It is also not possible to say whether something might be completed, or merely initiated, while Mr. Pearson is in Moscow."

2. From the questions which Mr. Lobatchev asked concerning my remarks it was clear that he had understood quite fully. He was not, of course, in a position to indicate whether our thinking was near to that of his people or likely to be acceptable to them. He undertook to report on our conversation and indicated that he would let us know as soon as he had any reactions or comments.

3. Mr. Lobatchev observed that we were no doubt familiar with the type of trade agreements which the USSR had made with various Western European countries which trade on a basis rather similar to ours. He noted that these agreements normally contain provisions covering the status in those countries of representatives of Soviet export and import organizations. He intimated that a provision on this subject would probably be suggested by the Soviet side in any negotiations on a trade agreement. He remarked that before he left Moscow, he had been told by Mr. Krotov of conversations which the latter had had with Mr. Norman Robertson in 1945 on the specific subject of USSR trade representatives in Canada. I said that I was not familiar with these earlier exchanges but that I would look them up. He could be sure that if trade talks did take place during Mr. Pearson's visit to Moscow, our Minister would be briefed for any discussions that might be necessary on this subject.

4. Mr. Lobatchev was interested in my passing remark concerning customs valuations and indicated that he would like to have a copy of our relevant laws and regulations to send back to Moscow for their information in order that they might take them into account in framing any proposal which they might make to us. I spoke at this point with Mr. Sim in National Revenue and he agreed to see Mr. Lobatchev and explain the position to him.

5. With reference to our suggestion that the Soviet authorities might give some indication of their intention to purchase various commodities other than wheat from Canada, Mr. Lobatchev asked whether we had any views on the Soviet products which were likely to find a market in Canada. I replied that I personally did not know what the prospects were. I recalled that in earlier conversations Mr. Lobatchev had spoken of the likelihood that Soviet sales in Canada could be increased considerably if they had the benefit of the most-favoured-nation tariff. It was difficult to forecast the potentialities without some indication of the kind of treatment which the USSR authorities would hope to secure and which we would be able to grant.

6. Mr. Lobatchev then enquired when we would expect discussions on details to take place if some agreement in principle were reached during Mr. Pearson's Moscow talks. He also asked whether we were to expect any such subsequent discussions to be held in Moscow or Ottawa. I merely noted that Mr. Pearson himself was not expected back in Ottawa until some time around mid-November. It might be possible to have certain discussions before Mr. Pearson's return (especially if a trade official had accompanied him to Moscow and had come back before him) but I thought it would probably be necessary to leave the scheduling of any such talks for discussion in Moscow while Mr. Pearson was there. Concerning the location I said that we had not considered this question. There were very few officials in Ottawa familiar with trade negotiations and it usually proved difficult for us to staff such negotiations away from Ottawa. There might, however, be other considerations which would make it preferable to have such talks in Moscow rather than here. I was sure that this was a matter which could be settled while Mr. Pearson was in Moscow if it appeared desirable to have further talks subsequently.<sup>57</sup>

SOVIET TRADE REPRESENTATIVES IN CANADA

1. In his conversation with Mr. Ritchie the other day, Mr. Lobatchev, the Commercial Counsellor of the Soviet Embassy, alluded to the possibility of appointing Soviet trade representatives in Canada in the event that a commercial agreement between Canada and the Soviet Union should be signed. While Mr. Lobatchev did not say so explicitly, it is fairly obvious that he had two things in mind — the status of trade representatives and their location.

2. The Russians have already indicated that they do not consider the granting of M.F.N. privileges any great bargain in return for their firm contract to buy specified quantities of wheat over a fixed period. Our reply is that M.F.N. treatment will open the Canadian market to them, and give them a real opportunity to increase sales in Canada and to increase dollar earnings. To this their logical rejoinder is that it would be very difficult for them to explore the Canadian market unless they could open commercial offices in major cities.

3. If a commercial agreement is concluded, we can expect to be under pretty strong pressure from the Russians to allow them to appoint a number of trade representatives. We can also expect that they will not be content to have these representatives attached as part of the Embassy staff in Ottawa, but will want to have some of them in at least one of the major cities — Montreal, Toronto, and possibly Winnipeg for grain purchases. They will point out with some validity that if they are to take seriously the increase of trade between Canada and the Soviet Union, they will have to have representatives in the major commercial centres. They will probably point to the example of certain other countries which have established trade offices in Toronto and Montreal, operating almost independently of the Embassies in Ottawa, very much in the manner of some of our trade offices abroad. They will say that it would be impossible to keep in touch with the commercial life of the country from Ottawa where commerce is less important. We know in our own minds that the opportunities for large-scale trade between the Soviet Union and Canada do not exist. The amount of trade which is likely to develop could be handled quite adequately by the Commercial Counsellor and his staff. But to say as much may be tantamount to throwing into question openly our and their good faith in negotiating a trade agreement. In any event, it is no real counter to their expected contention that they are determined to try to build up trade.

4. The objections to the establishment of Soviet commercial offices outside Ottawa are pretty obvious. It can be taken for granted that they will be used as centres for espionage and of subversive contact with Canadian Communists. They will also be used as propaganda centres, and for a certain amount of encouragement and missionary work in the over activities of the L[abour].P[rogressive].P[arty].<sup>58</sup> and Canadian-Soviet "cultural" societies and front organizations. Both the Canadian and the Australian Royal Commission reports on espionage emphasize the importance of consulates and commercial offices in espionage activities,<sup>59</sup> and we have no reason to believe that this pattern has changed. They will engage in trade work also in order to maintain the facade, but it would be naive to think that trade promotion would be the only role or would necessarily comprise the major part of their work.

5. If we accept, as we must, the premise that trade representatives will be engaged in subversive activities, we must also accept the obligation of supervising these activities as fully as possible and, of course, of frustrating them as much as possible. But we must realize that supervision will impose an additional and a great strain on the Special Branch of the RCMP in a field where that Force feels it is already extended to the limit, given its present budget and recruiting. The whole problem, affecting as it does other departments and agencies besides our own, will presumably have to be considered at some stage by Cabinet.

6. The status of trade representatives is a lesser though a related problem. If we were able to keep the commercial activities centred in and confined to the office of the Commercial Counsellor, then the trade representatives would form part of the Ambassador's staff, and the job of supervision would still be manageable. If commercial offices were to be established outside Ottawa, virtually the only way of coping with supervision would be to consider them branch offices of the Embassy and bring their staffs under the travel regulations.<sup>60</sup> To impose the travel regulations on offices outside Ottawa would be extremely difficult and even with travel regulations the extra supervision would impose a severe strain on the R.C.M.P. Without travel regulations, it would be difficult to see how the R.C.M.P. could exercise effective surveillance. As there are many complicated details, both supervisory and legal, to be worked out, I do not think we should make any firm commitments at this stage as to what we would and would not do on the question of status. If the Russians raise it, you may prefer to give a non-committal answer and say that you can have your officials look into it.

7. The Soviet object in pushing for a trade agreement with Canada at this time is probably more political than economic. They must know, as do we, that there is little prospect of large-scale trade between our two countries. The value to Canada of a trade agreement is primarily the sale of wheat. Additional sales of other products will probably not be very important. From the Soviet point of view, however, it suits them to enter into a trade agreement with us in order to further the impression of the establishment of more normal relations with non-Communist countries. They would also consider as a major advantage the establishment of trade representatives outside of Ottawa with the consequent opportunities for espionage. We have to balance off sales of wheat and our own desire for more normal relations against increased opportunities for Soviet espionage and Soviet propaganda in Canada.

8. We might insist on the principle of reciprocity in the opening of commercial offices, but we would not be on very firm practical ground. They would probably say that their commercial activity is centred in Moscow, which would be the logical place for us to have trade representatives; whereas ours is scattered and demands their posting of trade representatives in major centres. And of course we have no present intention of extending our operations in the Soviet Union beyond the Embassy in Moscow.

9. We would prefer not have the Soviet commercial offices outside of Ottawa for the same reasons that we do not want them to establish a consulate in Winnipeg or Toronto. This latter suggestion has been broached informally more than once and we have been able to turn it down fairly easily. It would be much more difficult to turn down a request for commercial offices if the commercial agreement goes through. Admittedly the Poles and the Czechs do have offices outside Ottawa (Winnipeg and Montreal respectively), but these have been established continuously since before the war; and in any event we do not consider Polish and Czech intelligence operations as dangerous as the Soviet counterpart.

10. I think, however, that we should resist strongly any proposal that permission to establish separate commercial offices form an integral part of the agreement. If the Russians should put it as bluntly as "no separate commercial offices, no wheat purchases," you will, I imagine, prefer to say that you are not prepared to give a decision in Moscow, and that you will wish to consult your Cabinet colleagues upon your return. It would be rather difficult at this stage, when our willingness to consider a commercial agreement has been indicated to the Russians, to have to refuse to negotiate further because of our objections to commercial offices outside Ottawa. But my suspicions as to Soviet motives would only be confirmed by a strong insistence on their part that they be permitted to open separate commercial offices. In any event, we should face the fact that the pressure to establish commercial offices will be great and that once established they will present serious problems for our counter-espionage forces and problems of propaganda which may become increasingly troublesome as the soft period continues.

Record of Canada-Soviet Union Trade Talks

[PREMIÈRE PARTIE/PART I]

[Moscow], October 7, 1955

Present for Canada

Hon. L.B. Pearson, Secretary of State for External Affairs
Mr. M.W. Sharp, Associate Deputy Minister of Trade and Commerce
Mr. J.B.C. Watkins, Canadian Ambassador in U.S.S.R.
Mr. G. Ignatieff.

Present for U.S.S.R.

Hon. I.G. Kabanov, Minister of Foreign Trade
Mr. S.A. Borisov, Deputy Minister of Foreign Trade
Mr. N.I. Cheklin, Chief of the Division of Trade with Western Countries, Ministry of Foreign Trade
Mr. A.I. Lobatchev, Commercial Counsellor
Mr. D.S. Chuvakhin, Soviet Ambassador in Canada.

Mr. Pearson opened the discussion. He said he welcomed the opportunity to visit the U.S.S.R. not only to have political discussions but also to raise certain matters of mutual interest to Canada and the Soviet Union relating to trade. Mr. Kabanov said that the Soviet Government considered the two questions, trade and political matters, as interrelated and progress in one would help progress in the other.

Mr. Pearson agreed that there could not be much progress in trade, unless there was mutual confidence. It had to be borne in mind that the two countries had different systems of trade, but he hoped that these differences would not prove too serious an obstacle to the development of trade. Mr. Kabanov said that with goodwill on both sides it was possible to develop trade; the Soviet Union had reciprocal trade agreements with such countries as France, the United Kingdom and the Argentine, all of whom had trading systems different from that of the Soviet Union.

Mr. Pearson said Canada, though large in area and small in population, produced a surplus of certain commodities available for export. We were, therefore, vitally concerned with trade and only New Zealand had a larger per capita of trade. Mr. Pearson went on to say that he had with him Mr. Mitchell Sharp, Associate Deputy Minister of Trade and Commerce, and that if preliminary talks indicated that it would be possible to establish a basis for an agreement, Mr. Sharp would be available to follow up the discussion in greater detail.

Mr. Kabanov said that if trade were to develop successfully between the Soviet Union and Canada, it would be necessary to have a trade agreement designed to foster trade. It was from this point of view that the Soviet Government was interested in discussing the question of a trade agreement with Canada. He said that the Soviet Union had trade with certain countries with whom they did not have trade agreements, but that agreements helped to organize trade better. He suggested that progress might be made by discussing particular commodities and quantities which might be available to trade.

Mr. Pearson suggested that he would not be long enough in Moscow to enter too much into the details of a possible trade agreement, but, if preliminary exchanges of view indicated the basis of a possible agreement, more detailed discussions might follow later. Mr. Kabanov agreed.

At the suggestion of Mr. Pearson, Mr. Sharp then outlined the types of trade agreements usually entered into by Canada. Mr. Sharp said that Canada had trade agreements with most of the countries of the world; the U.S.S.R. was one of the few important countries that was an exception. These agreements took the form of granting most-favoured-nation treatment on a reciprocal basis. This meant that goods entering Canada from a foreign country with which Canada had an agreement, would be on equal terms with those of any other country with whom Canada had an agreement. Canada does not enter into clearing agreements nor into agreements covering specific commodities. Mr. Kabanov said that it would be helpful to have a draft of standard Canadian trade agreements. He said that it was not essential to have a clearing agreement.

Mr. Pearson recalled that in 1939 there had been negotiations between Canada and Soviet officials on a trade agreement which, because of the war, had not come into effect. He suggested that this might indicate in very general terms the kind of agreement which would be satisfactory from a Canadian standpoint for the purpose of these exploratory talks.

Mr. Kabanov said that he was not familiar with these negotiations but would be glad to examine the record which was no doubt on his Ministry's files.

Mr. Pearson said that the essential element of the 1939 agreement was that Soviet goods were accorded m.f.n. treatment in Canada and that the Soviet Union agreed to make certain purchases in Canada over a period of three years.

Mr. Kabanov said that he presumed that such an agreement was on the basis of reciprocity. Mr. Pearson said: not quite, because trading conditions in the two countries were not equivalent; all trade in the Soviet Union was to and by the Government, whereas in Canada foreign traders had competitive access to the Canadian market. For this reason a trade agreement with the Soviet Union from the Canadian viewpoint would have to include an undertaking by the Soviet Union to make certain Government purchases for a period of years, since all trade in the Soviet Union was controlled by the Government.

Mr. Kabanov asked whether this agreement constituted a trade agreement in the strict sense, or was it just an exchange of letters covering an isolated deal.

Mr. Pearson offered to show Mr. Kabanov a copy of the 1939 draft text which he had with him and read out the more important paragraphs.

Mr. Kabanov asked whether the prices referred to in the 1939 agreement were on the basis of current gold prices. The Minister replied that it was on the basis of current world prices and that the Soviet Union would not be expected to pay more than other nations trading with Canada. As far as quantities were concerned, the Minister noticed that production in Canada had increased several times since 1939 and that the quantities in any trade agreement would presumably have to be proportionately greater. Mr. Kabanov then raised the question of the control over the export of strategic materials, asking whether Canada intended to restrict the export of certain commodities.

Mr. Pearson replied that he would not wish to mislead the Minister: that there were certain strategic commodities which were in short supply, as they were required for defence purposes not only for Canada but for its allies. This list, however, should not be regarded as permanently frozen. As world conditions improved, presumably the controls might be relaxed. Mr. Kabanov replied that the U.S.S.R. in its trading, did not draw a distinction between strategic and non-strategic materials, nor did it practise discrimination. He mentioned the export of manganese to support this claim. Mr. Pearson replied that there could be no question of negotiation between the Soviet Union and Canada alone on this matter of strategic exports under present circumstances. The availability of certain materials was dictated by the fact of their being in short supply. As world conditions improved, materials presently required for defence purposes might be released for international trade. Mr. Kabanov asked whether Canada was short of supplies of copper and wheat or nickel. He suggested that Canadian defence requirements seemed to be larger than those of the Soviet Union in certain strategic commodities.

The Minister recalled that Canada had had certain nickel deposits in Petsamo which are now being used to supply the U.S.S.R. with nickel. The Minister asked whether the U.S.S.R. had all the uranium they needed. Mr. Kabanov said the Soviet Union had all the strategic materials they wanted and were free to sell all that they wanted to sell. He said that the Soviet Union had all the uranium they needed, but if they needed any more they were quite prepared to buy it.

Turning to wheat, the Minister said that Canada produced certain special hard varieties of wheat and that the Soviet Union might find it advantageous to buy Canadian wheat, especially if it were shipped from the West Coast to the far Soviet regions.

Mr. Kabanov said that he was prepared to examine the question of the sale of wheat but wheat should not be the only article to enter into trade between Canada and the Soviet Union. Mr. Pearson said that wheat was an important strategic commodity since it made people strong. Mr. Kabanov countered the remark (following Mr. Pearson's train of thought) — "Why didn't Canada add nickel and copper to its list of goods available for export?"

Mr. Pearson then suggested that perhaps the most fruitful subject for discussion might be the kind of agreement which would be mutually beneficial to both countries. Mr. Kabanov said that he would examine the text of the 1939 draft trade agreement and then might be in a position to have more detailed discussions. He asked again whether it would not be possible to discuss particular commodities which Canada would be prepared to buy and sell, without reference perhaps at this stage to quantities, so that he could form a clear impression of what kind of goods would be involved if trade between Canada and the Soviet Union were to develop. Mr. Pearson said that Mr. Sharp would be available to discuss further details while he was away on a visit to Leningrad over the week-end. Mr. Kabanov emphasized that the Soviet Union would be prepared to trade only on equal terms and on the basis of reciprocity.

Mr. Pearson said that he realized fully that no trade agreement would be satisfactory unless it was on the basis of reciprocity, but that both sides would have to take into account the difference in trading methods which would inevitably give rise to certain problems in negotiating a trade agreement between Canada and the Soviet Union. Mr. Kabanov said that there was no point in discussing the systems of trade, which he recognized were different; it would be more profitable to discuss conditions of trade or the principles which should govern trade under the terms of a possible trade agreement.

Mr. Pearson mentioned that Canada had trade agreements with certain countries which carried on trade through State-controlled agencies, namely, Czechoslovakia and Poland. Mr. Sharp added that these trade agreements had been in effect before the changes of Government in those countries and that the trade agreements would have been different if negotiated subsequent to the changes of Government. Mr. Kabanov said he was not familiar with these agreements. Mr. Pearson suggested that he might wish to look into these agreements and bear them in mind. In conclusion, it was agreed that a further meeting would take place at 4:00 p.m. between Mr. Sharp and Mr. Kabanov. Mr. Kabanov said that it might be possible to have the text of an agreement ready for the Minister to sign on his return from Leningrad. The Minister replied that if Mr. Sharp and Mr. Kabanov were able to draw up an agreement over the week-end, that would be the quickest trade agreement that Canada had ever concluded. Mr. Kabanov said that for the Soviet part they were quite prepared to go ahead and sign if this were agreeable to Mr. Pearson. Mr. Pearson replied that he was quite prepared to do his best, but that he wanted it clearly understood that any document which emerged from the talks in Moscow would have to be referred to the Prime Minister and the Cabinet in Canada.

[PARTIE II/PART II]

[Moscow], October 7, 1955

Present for Canada

Mr. M.W. Sharp, Associate Deputy Minister of Trade and Commerce
Mr. G. Ignatieff.

Present for U.S.S.R.

Hon. I.G. Kabanov, Minister of Foreign Trade
Mr. S.A. Borisov, Deputy Minister of Foreign Trade
Mr. A.I. Lobatchev, Commercial Counsellor.

Mr. Kabanov said that he had read the text of the 1939 draft trade agreement but that, in his view, this document belonged to the past and could have little reference to the current negotiations. He recalled that Mr. Pearson had indicated that the terms of the 1939 draft trade agreement would not be entirely applicable to the current negotiations. He asked Mr. Sharp what the Canadian Government had to offer specifically.

Mr. Sharp said that what Canada had to offer was equal treatment to the U.S.S.R. as compared to other countries trading with Canada. Because of the differences in the trading systems and the nature of the Soviet economy, it was not possible to apply the principle of reciprocity quite literally. Most-favoured-nation treatment, therefore, did not constitute strict equality in the terms of trade between Canada and the Soviet Union, but it did offer the Soviet Union comparable treatment in relation to other foreign countries trading with Canada. On this basis, the question to be negotiated was what price might be appropriate for the U.S.S.R. to pay in return for this concession.

Mr. Kabanov replied by asking what concession was involved in the Canadian offer. He said, "We do not need concessions — we only want to sell and buy goods on the same conditions as we do with other countries we trade with, and we want to see Soviet vessels go to Canada and enjoy the same rights as the Canadian vessels going to Soviet ports. We do not want any concessions, nor do we want to grant concessions. All we want to do is trade on the basis of mutual advantage."

Mr. Sharp replied that Canada was prepared to grant to the U.S.S.R. exactly the same trading privileges as to other countries enjoying m.f.n. treatment. It was for the U.S.S.R. to decide what value to attach to this offer, which would represent a concession on the Canadian side.

Mr. Kabanov asked whether it was possible for Canada to trade with the U.S.S.R. on any basis other than that of most-favoured-nation treatment. Mr. Sharp replied that Canada had trade agreements with most countries and that what Canada was offering was the specific concession that Canada would trade with the U.S.S.R. on terms comparable to those accorded to other countries with which Canada had trade agreements. He added that Canada had special arrangements with the countries of the Commonwealth.

Mr. Kabanov said that the Soviet Union would not expect to be included in this preference and that he was quite aware of certain ties which Canada had with the Commonwealth, but added: "In principle, we are for free trade".

Mr. Sharp said that looking at the trade possibilities between Canada and the Soviet Union as a whole, it would seem to him to represent a fair price if in exchange for m.f.n. treatment with the Soviet Union, the Soviet Government would be prepared to purchase a certain quantity of wheat. He recalled that Mr. Ritchie had spoken to Mr. Lobatchev about this and that 500,000 tons a year had been mentioned. Mr. Kabanov said that this was only one item that might be covered in a trade agreement. If the agreement were to be limited to the sale of wheat, this would be "barter, not trade". He was thinking in terms of having the agreement cover a wide range of goods which might be bought in Canada or sold to Canada. He, for his part, was prepared to consider a wide range of commodities and to discuss quantities. As for wheat, he did not exclude the possibility of the purchase of wheat. For example, the Soviet Union might be willing to buy between 300 and 500 thousand tons of wheat in Canada in the first year for shipment to the Soviet far eastern provinces. He would be quite prepared to conclude a contract forthwith and instruct the Soviet trading organization to conclude arrangements, even before Mr. Sharp returned to Ottawa. But what he wanted to discuss with Mr. Sharp was not just one simple transaction, but the whole question of policy which was to govern reciprocal trade between the Soviet Union and Canada. He said that one transaction did not require a whole trade agreement.

Mr. Sharp said that Canada hoped that trade might be developed to include a number of commodities, but in concluding a trade agreement, the Canadian Government felt that in order to equalize mutual benefits, it was necessary to have an agreement for the State purchase of a specific quantity of wheat. Mr. Kabanov professed that he could not understand this approach. Mr. Sharp explained that while the Soviet Union was free to sell Soviet goods on a competitive basis on the Canadian market, they were, under the present circumstances, subject to taxes under the general tariff. What the Soviet Union was being offered was a reduction or removal of these taxes, so that the Soviet Union would be in a better competitive position to sell its goods on the Canadian market. Because of the State control of trade in the Soviet Union, the possibilities of Canadian sales depended on the willingness of the Soviet Government to make specific purchases. It was for this reason that the question of the wheat sale was being raised in order to establish a reasonable quid pro quo for the contemplated trade agreement.

Mr. Kabanov said that the Soviet Union does its trading at prevailing world market prices. If Canada proposed to mark up the price of Soviet goods on the Canadian market by adding certain taxes, that was its own business. To offer to reduce or to remove such taxes did not, in his view, constitute a concession since the Soviet Union did not tax commodities imported from abroad in this way. When Mr. Sharp tried to explain how the impact of the general Canadian tariff affected the competitive position of specific commodities such as caracul fur, Mr. Kabanov said that "We are not interested in the profits of the Canadian Government, nor how the Canadian Government makes profits from its foreign trade". Mr. Sharp replied that surely the Soviet Government was concerned with the discriminatory effect of the Canadian tariff and the offer was being made to remove this discrimination.

Mr. Kabanov said that he would like to express himself quite frankly. It was for the Canadian Government to decide whether to impose taxes on foreign trade or not, and it was for the Canadian Government to judge what benefits it derived from its tariffs. This was no concern of the Soviet Government. For their part, they did not apply such discrimination in their trade.

Mr. Sharp went on to explain the history of the Canadian tariff structure. Mr. Kabanov said that the Soviet Union was a new country which had changed its old and — what it regarded as — its bad laws. He said that he was not interested in the history of Canadian legislation on this matter and thought the Soviet laws were better. The Soviet legislation had no such discriminatory laws applying to trade and if Canada now proposed to reduce taxes on goods imported from the Soviet Union, they were only offering to bring their own legislation more into line with Soviet practice. He concluded his remarks with — “You want to do what the Soviet Government has been doing all along and then want the Soviet Government to pay for it”.

Mr. Sharp said that he was not suggesting that one Government or the other should change its system or its laws but was explaining the trading position in terms of Canadian legislation. He asked Mr. Kabanov to realize that because of the difference in trading systems, certain special problems arose in negotiating a trade agreement between the Soviet Union and Canada, which he had tried to explain.

Mr. Kabanov said that the offer of most-favoured-nation treatment did not extend to the sale of certain strategic items, which apparently were to be made available to the United States but not to the Soviet Union. Was it worthwhile discussing m.f.n. rights in view of that fact, he asked. Mr. Sharp said that Mr. Pearson had already explained that Canada would have to reserve its right to control the sale of certain strategic commodities, but that the situation was not frozen and as international conditions improved these controls might be relaxed.

Mr. Kabanov then suggested that the discussion might turn to the form of a possible agreement and what might be its content. Mr. Sharp recalled that Mr. Ritchie had given an outline of a possible trade agreement to Mr. Lobatchev in Ottawa. Canada could only enter into one kind of trade agreement, i.e. one which would give the Soviet Union access to its markets on comparably equal terms with other trading nations. Canada could not undertake to buy specific commodities except a very limited category of goods, since trading was not State controlled. Mr. Kabanov said he understood that the Soviet Government would not be selling to the Canadian Government, but to Canadian firms and that similarly Soviet trading companies would buy Canadian goods in the Canadian market.

Turning again to the question of what commodities would be covered by the trade agreement, Mr. Kabanov said that from the Soviet point of view the trade agreement would cover all goods which they were interested in buying and selling. When Mr. Sharp recalled again the restriction on the export of strategic commodities, Mr. Kabanov said that the Soviet Union was interested in trade on an equal footing but since it seemed impossible; “we can only live in hope”, he said, he said. Mr. Sharp said that he would share this hope particularly if international relations were to improve. Mr. Kabanov said that they had improved, but that this improvement had not been reflected in the relaxation of controls over trade in strategic commodities. He said that for his part, he did not indulge in sophistry. Some countries seemed so frightened that they were not willing to relax strategic controls. He preferred to believe in the future development of mutual good faith which would open the way to a better life for all nations. Mr. Sharp replied that he was sure Mr. Kabanov was just as familiar with the operations of strategic controls as he was. Mr. Kabanov replied that he was flattered by Mr. Sharp’s assessment of his knowledge and admitted that he tried to find out as much as he could about the operation of strategic controls and added:

— "We have done all we can to relax these restrictions and have introduced many proposals, but the strategic restrictions still remain because the West has been too frightened".

Mr. Sharp asked what Mr. Kabanov then proposed to discuss. For his part, he was prepared to discuss the principal contents of a possible trade agreement rather than specific items. For instance, on the Canadian side the offer might include the undertaking to give the U.S.S.R. the same position with regard to the Canadian tariff as it granted to other trading countries; on the Soviet side, Canada would expect a definite undertaking to purchase certain quantities of wheat.

Mr. Kabanov pointed out that the offer of m.f.n. treatment was rather an indefinite one and for an unspecified number of years, while the sale of wheat was specific and over a given period. He repeated that the Soviet Union would be prepared to buy between 300 to 500 thousand tons of wheat during the first year of the trade agreement, and that he would be prepared to have this transaction based on a verbal understanding or in writing as Mr. Sharp preferred. This would represent proof that as far as the Soviet Union was concerned trade between Canada and the Soviet Union had got under way.

Mr. Sharp asked Mr. Kabanov what he had in mind as to the possible content of the trade agreement. Mr. Kabanov replied that they wished to set out certain principles which, in the Soviet view, should govern trade between the two countries. These would include

- (a) Reciprocal extension of m.f.n. treatment concerning duties and taxes;
- (b) Reciprocal treatment in shipping and navigation;
- (c) A clause by which each Government would undertake to facilitate the development of foreign trade.

Mr. Sharp said that he wasn't quite clear as to what the reference to shipping might imply, but that the Canadian Government did not subsidize its merchant shipping, and because of the difficulty of competitive wage levels the number of Canadian merchant ships had been substantially reduced. Mr. Kabanov said that the Soviet Union might be willing to buy ships in Canada. The principles which he had set up were regarded from the Soviet side as the framework around which an agreement might be negotiated. He did not attach particular importance to exactly what form such an agreement might take. It might take the form of an exchange of letters or a formal agreement. Mr. Kabanov said that he was quite prepared to submit a draft which Mr. Sharp might have ready for Mr. Pearson on his return from Leningrad. Mr. Sharp said that it would be necessary to refer any draft back to Ottawa. Mr. Kabanov said that the important thing was to agree on principles. Once these were agreed on, it should be easy enough to work out the details. Mr. Sharp said he appreciated the desire for speed, but that the details of any agreement were just as important as any principles. He doubted whether it was possible to work out an agreement before Mr. Pearson and the rest of the party left the U.S.S.R. He said that he would not like to see an agreement in principle followed by a misunderstanding as to details. Mr. Sharp also added that he hoped that no announcement would be made until all details had been settled and an agreement signed. Mr. Kabanov concurred, and offered to make the draft of a proposed trade agreement available by noon the next day (Oct. 8th).

(Mr. Lobatchev called at the Canadian Embassy, Moscow, on Saturday, October 8th and gave Mr. Sharp the translation, as well as the Russian text, of a draft of the proposed trade agreement which was transmitted from the Embassy in Moscow to External Affairs, Ottawa (Telegram No. 206† on October 8th.)

[PARTIE III/PART III]

[Moscow], October 10, 1955

Present for Canada

Mr. M.W. Sharp, Associate Deputy Minister of Trade and Commerce
Mr. G. Ignatieff.

Present for U.S.S.R.

Hon. I.G. Kabanov, Minister of Foreign Trade
Mr. N.I. Cheklin, Chief of the Division of Trade with Western Countries, Ministry of Foreign Trade
Mr. K. Bahtope
Mr. A.I. Lobatchev, Commercial Counsellor.

Mr. Sharp, on opening the discussion, thanked Mr. Kabanov for the draft and said that it was a useful basis for further preliminary discussion. He had read it and telegraphed it to Ottawa. It was clear to the Canadian delegation that it would be necessary to give the draft detailed study and to offer counter-proposals. This would not be possible before leaving Moscow. Before returning to Ottawa, however, he would like to make certain preliminary comments having in mind that the negotiations would have to be resumed either in Ottawa, or if the Soviet Government preferred, in Moscow. Mr. Kabanov said that as far as he was concerned he was quite willing to have the negotiations resumed in Ottawa. Mr. Sharp said that from a Canadian standpoint, it would be preferable to have further talks in Ottawa, as the group of experts which would be concerned in the talks would be more readily available in Ottawa than in Moscow. Mr. Kabanov said that he would be happy to have the talks in Ottawa and that the agreement which would emerge would be equally valid in Ottawa as in Moscow.

Mr. Sharp said that there were a number of clauses in the Soviet draft which were not too clear to him. He would, therefore, prefer not to make detailed comment at this time. Paragraphs 4, 5 and 6 of the Soviet draft, in particular, would require clarification. The clause dealing with navigation was unusual from a Canadian standpoint, but not necessarily unacceptable for that reason. Mr. Sharp said that in any further negotiations there were certain standard clauses which the Canadian Government for its part would wish to include in a trade agreement. Thus, for instance, it would be necessary from a Canadian point of view to include a security clause which would give the Canadian Government authority to apply strategic controls. Mr. Sharp referred to the 1939 draft and pointed out that such a clause had been included in that draft. Mr. Kabanov said that such a clause did not have any practical consequence as far as the Soviet Union was concerned, as they did not intend buying munitions from Canada. If the Canadian Government thought it necessary to include such a clause, he would be prepared to discuss it. Mr. Sharp explained that such a clause had been included in all other trade agreements which Canada had negotiated under the terms of GATT. Thus, such a clause if included in an agreement with the Soviet Union would not be exceptional.

Mr. Sharp next referred to the inclusion of an understanding about dumping. He said that in the agreement which Canada had concluded recently with Japan, there was an exchange of letters preserving certain rights relating to the evaluation of goods to prevent any injuries to Canadian industries from cheap imports. Mr. Sharp explained that the danger of cheap exports from Japan constituted a general problem and that this problem need not necessarily arise between Canada and the Soviet Union, but the inclusion of such an understanding would help to make a possible trade agreement more acceptable to Canada.

Mr. Kabanov asked whether he understood correctly that the goods referred to were being sold at prices lower than world market prices. If so, the Soviet Union did not conduct trade on that basis and only sold at world market prices.

Mr. Sharp said that we would not want to have such a clause in the trade agreement itself, but that there should be a supplementary understanding by an exchange of letters. Mr. Kabanov said that it might be possible to stipulate in an exchange of letters that trade between the two countries would be carried on at world market prices both ways, and he would be willing to discuss such a possibility.

Thirdly, Mr. Sharp referred to the possible duration of the trade agreement. The Soviet draft had suggested a five year term. The normal term for trade agreements negotiated by Canada was one year, but such agreements were automatically renewed unless denounced. Mr. Sharp said that he did not know whether the Canadian Government would insist on a one year term, but that they were unlikely to accept a five year term. The question of the duration of the trade agreement would inevitably be tied to the duration of the wheat contract. Mr. Kabanov had mentioned a purchase of 300 to 500 thousand tons of wheat but nothing had been said about the possible duration of the contract or any further purchases. The Canadian Government in considering the possible duration of the trade agreement would have in mind the prospect of continuing sales of substantial quantities of wheat, say for a period of three years. It might be possible to work out a contract which would strike an average as to the quantities sold in any given year, but that the Canadian Government would like to have more assurance as to the duration of the contract.

Mr. Kabanov said the Soviet Government had no fixed views on the duration of the trade agreement. Their trade agreements normally were for five years, but he recognized that the prospects for trade depended upon a variety of political as well as economic conditions. As to the wheat sales, Mr. Kabanov said: "When we sign a trade agreement — assuming we sign in Ottawa — our government foreign trading organization will concurrently sign a contract for 1956 — we do not know exactly for what amount — I said between 300 and 500 thousand tons but let us say for 400 thousand tons. As to further purchases of wheat, I do not see any difficulties — I just said we need the purchases for our Far Eastern regions, such purchases will be useful in 1956-57-58, indeed, indefinitely. If you want to specify three years, I do not anticipate any difficulty. If you had been willing to sign the agreement in Moscow, we could have signed the contract here and now.

Mr. Kabanov then asked if there were any other matters Mr. Sharp wished to raise. Mr. Sharp said that there was one other matter which was not directly concerned with the trade agreement — that was the possibility of exploring the negotiation of an air transport agreement. Mr. Kabanov said that this was not within his responsibility, but came under the Ministry of Foreign Affairs. He suggested that this question might be raised with the Minister of Foreign Affairs during Mr. Sharp's visit to Moscow, or could be taken up when the Soviet delegation came to Ottawa.

Mr. Sharp also raised the question of the rouble exchange rate pointing out that this was of concern not only in trade, but also in tourism. Mr. Kabanov said that he did not see how this could give rise to difficulties in practise. In trade, the Soviet Union intended to pay dollars at prevailing world market prices. As for tourism, special rates were available to tourists providing a variety of alternative choices to fit different pocket-books.

Finally, referring to the next step in resuming the trade talks, Mr. Kabanov said that the Soviet delegation would be prepared to come to Ottawa at any time convenient to the Canadian authorities. Mr. Sharp said that he would notify the Soviet authorities as soon as the Canadian authorities were ready for the resumption of talks. Mr. Kabanov said that the Soviet delegation would be prepared to come at any time, at two or three weeks notice.

PROPOSED TRADE AGREEMENT WITH USSR

Attached is a copy of our Note No. E-40† which was given to the Soviet Commercial Counsellor, Mr. Lobatchev, on November 1. Attached to it is a draft Trade Agreement, ‡ together with two proposed exchanges of Notes † which might be signed at the same time as the Agreement. These were prepared in interdepartmental meetings, and in your absence Mr. Howe and Mr. Harris agreed that they might be submitted to the Soviet Embassy as a basis for further negotiations.

2. Since then Mr. Lobatchev has had two meetings with the Canadian officials concerned and has given them a number of comments on these proposals. I think you will be interested in some of his points:

(a) Shipping. Mr. Lobatchev has made it clear that the Soviet authorities attach some importance to their proposal that a most-favoured-nation navigation clause be included. This raises a number of difficulties for us. In the first place the National Harbours Board charges higher harbour dues for ships registered outside North America. This discrimination appears to be inconsistent with the provisions of a number of existing treaties governing navigation by which we are bound, but this hardly makes it any easier to accept an undertaking vis-à-vis the USSR which we would be violating right from the start. We are looking into this question of harbour dues to find out the purpose of the existing discrimination. It may be that it will be found possible to eliminate it. The other principal difficulty in this field is the undesirability of guaranteeing to Soviet ships access to the Great Lakes on a most-favoured-nation basis. If we found that we could offer them non-discrimination in ocean ports, it might be possible to draft an article which the USSR could accept in such a way as to avoid any commitment about the Great Lakes or the St. Lawrence Seaway above Montreal.

(b) Arbitration and Status of Juridical Persons. Mr. Lobatchev also commented on the omission in our draft of anything along the lines of the articles in the Soviet draft providing for arbitration in trade matters and setting out the status and rights of legal persons in either country. We explained that we did not necessarily rule these out but that we did not understand just what effect they would have. We are still studying these articles but our present belief is that, as some of these questions come under provincial jurisdiction, there would be constitutional difficulty about accepting them.

(c) Article III—Balance of Payments Escape Clause. Mr. Lobatchev did not like the clause which would permit us to discriminate against the USSR to safeguard the balance of payments. In reply we have pointed out to him that the GATT makes provisions for discrimination on this ground in certain circumstances and that we cannot offer the USSR treatment more favourable than that accorded to the members of GATT.

(d) Article IV—State Trading. Mr. Lobatchev found this article rather unusual and could see no need for it. We pointed out that it was based upon a similar article in the GATT. We also explained that while Article I bound Canada not to discriminate against the USSR in tariff matters, Article I did not represent much of a commitment on the part of the USSR. The proposed Article IV would give Canada the promise of most-favoured-nation treatment by the Soviet state trading agencies.

(e) Article V—Security Escape Clause. Mr. Lobatchev thought our suggested article was much too broad and was doubtful that the Soviet Government could accept it in this form.

(f) Article VII—Entry into Force, Termination, etc. Mr. Lobatchev thought it would be much better to have the Agreement renewed automatically each year after the initial three years, unless either party gave to the other notice of intention to terminate. We indicated that this question was related to the question of the Soviet undertaking to purchase wheat; it was doubtful whether the Canadian Government would be able to justify the continuation of the most-favoured-nation Trade Agreement with the USSR if Soviet wheat purchases came to an end after three years. At the same time the Soviet Government would hardly wish to undertake to buy wheat in such quantities for the indefinite future, and Canada itself might not wish such a commitment to be unlimited in time. It was true that under the Soviet proposal the Agreement could be terminated if either party gave notice but there were political difficulties about denouncing treaties. We suggested to Mr. Lobatchev that the Soviet authorities should consider very carefully which proposal would really be better from their own point of view.

(g) Finally, Mr. Lobatchev questioned the need for the proposed exchange of Notes on valuation for duty. He found these difficult to understand and thought them unnecessary. We pointed out that the first part of the draft Canadian Note was purely informative and was not therefore essential in the context of the Agreement itself. The second part, however, was an escape clause to protect Canadian producers against serious injury or threats of serious injury arising as a result of the Canadian obligations in this Agreement. There was an article in the GATT to meet similar situations and there would have to be some such provision in our Agreement with the USSR. We offered to consider putting such provisions into the Agreement itself, thus avoiding any need for this exchange of Notes.

3. We also omitted from our draft Agreement the articles suggested by the USSR on the exchange of experience and the promotion of trade. This was not necessarily meant to be a firm stand on our part but Mr. Lobatchev made no comment on the omission. Nor did he comment on the draft exchange of Notes embodying the Russian undertaking to purchase wheat.<sup>61</sup>

4. It is not clear yet whether a Soviet delegation will be sent to Ottawa or whether Mr. Lobatchev will be authorized to conduct the negotiations on behalf of the USSR. We have intimated that we can hardly agree to changes in the present draft in the course of our conversations with him unless he is empowered to negotiate on behalf of the USSR. We made it clear that we would be perfectly happy to negotiate with him but thought we should know whether or not he was in a position to negotiate.

THE WARSAW CONFERENCE — MAY 11 TO 14, 1955

The "Warsaw Conference of European countries on Safeguarding Peace and Security in Europe" was hardly what one enthusiastic Polish commentator called it, "a conference at the summit when decisions of the greatest importance, of world influence, are taken". There are, nevertheless, a number of points of considerable interest to the West in the actual proceedings and in the motives of the Soviet Government in holding the Conference.

2. Since the background of this meeting is well known, I shall not review the events leading up to it. The eight nations participating signed a Treaty of Friendship, Cooperation and Mutual Assistance to remain in force for 20 years.<sup>62</sup> This treaty is phrased in general terms of mutual guarantee against aggression under article 51 of the United Nations Charter. Under one of its articles a Joint Command is to be set up under Marshal Konev as Commander-in-Chief, with headquarters in Moscow. "Ministers of Defence or other military commanders" of the other participating states will be Deputy Commanders and a combined general staff will be located at headquarters. Under another article of the Treaty, a Political Consultative Committee will be set up for consultations "on all important international questions" and for "examination of questions arising in connection with the realisation of this Treaty."

3. Marshal Bulganin made an important speech<sup>63</sup> and was followed by the Heads of Governments of the other participating states and by the Communist Chinese Minister of Defence. Instead of referring to each speech in turn, I shall simply mention a few points of interest in the proceedings as a whole.

4. At the time of the Moscow Conference it seemed possible that, in addition to the eight member alliance, there might be a special grouping of Poland, Czechoslovakia and East Germany with its own responsibilities for bolstering security in Eastern Europe. Some moves were made towards "cooperation in all spheres" by delegations from the Parliaments of these three countries at a "Prague Conference" at the end of December but nothing further was said on the subject, so far as I know, until Premier Grotewohl of East Germany made further vague references to this special cooperation at the Warsaw Conference. Neither the Polish nor the Czechoslovak Premiers even mentioned such tripartite arrangements, however, at the Warsaw Conference and we are, therefore, almost as much in the dark on this subject as before.

5. Another possibility in the way of Iron Curtain defence pacts was suggested by some Western commentators after Mr. Molotov's long foreign policy speech before the Supreme Soviet on February 8, 1955.<sup>64</sup> Mr. Molotov seemed to hint that, if the West kept making aggressive moves both in Europe and Asia, it might be necessary to create an Eurasian defence pact including all the nations of the "peace camp" in both continents. This hint, in addition to the fact that the Soviet Foreign Minister twice referred to the Chinese People's Republic as a co-partner with the Soviet Union, suggested that the Communist answer to the interlocking series of pacts by which Communism was to be contained might be one organization or two linked organizations responsible for mutual defence both in Europe and in Asia. At the Warsaw conference, however, there was no indication that anything of this nature was in the offing. General Peng Teh-huai, a Vice Premier and the Minister of National Defence of the Chinese People's Republic, was present but was listed as an observer. He assured the delegates that "peace and security in Asia and in Europe are indivisible" but he did not suggest that an extension of the defence organization under consideration at the Conference was needed to confirm this fact. Article 4 of the Treaty signed on May 14 referred only to "armed attack in Europe on one or several of the States signatory to the Treaty" (my underlining) in binding these states to joint action. General Peng Teh-Huai did give "unreserved support and cooperation to all resolutions adopted by the Warsaw Conference" and pledged that "if peace in Europe is undermined, if the imperialist aggressors light the flames of war against the peaceful countries of Europe then our Government and the 600,000,000 heroic people of China will struggle against aggression jointly with the peoples and Governments of our fraternal countries until final victory". This returned very much the same kind of pledge which the Russians have been giving the Chinese on Formosa, one intended to have the maximum deterrent effect on the West short of automatic commitment to involvement in any war on the lengthy periphery of the Moscow-Peking Axis.

6. So far as China's status as a "co-partner" was concerned, General Peng Teh-huai discreetly avoided any over-ambitious claims to equal status by referring on four occasions to the "peace camp" as being headed by the Soviet Union. This was probably a wise move at such a gathering. Satellite Communists are accustomed to having their positions depend on the whims of Moscow but any underlining of the fact that the whims of Peking might have some very real effect on Communism in Central and Eastern Europe might not have been very welcome.

7. Although the Chinese representative took care to adjust his remarks to the needs of the conference on this point, it is interesting that, while Marshal Bulganin and the satellite leaders avoided any clear statement on the important question of whether civilisation as a whole or only capitalist civilisation might be annihilated in a general war, General Peng Teh-huai made the defiant, ideologically orthodox assertion that if war came, the peace camp "will undoubtedly deal the aggressors such fatal blows that the result will be the utter destruction of the imperialist camp and the complete collapse of the entire capitalist system".

<sup>64</sup> Voir/See V.M. Molotov, The International Situation and Soviet Foreign Policy, New York: New Century Publishing, 1955.

8. Another point about the proceedings of the Warsaw Conference which is worth noting concerns the warning issued at the Moscow Conference last year and in the December 9 note to the Western Powers that the forces of the Eastern bloc were not only going to be integrated but strengthened considerably.<sup>65</sup> At the Warsaw Conference this theme was not very important. From the speeches there, it would appear that it was the integration itself, such as it was, which was to increase the "effectiveness" of the forces rather than any general increase in the levels of forces and armaments. It is true, of course, that one or two of the satellites have followed the Soviet lead in increasing the defence allocations in their budgets. It is also true that the Political Consultative Committee which is to be set up under the Treaty is to consider the "realisation of this Treaty" which could presumably include the "measures to step up their armaments" referred to a few months ago. So far as any real threat to the West on this score was concerned, however, it was conspicuous by its absence.

9. Another interesting item of Eastern bloc business which, as usual, was left not completely clarified was the question of the permanence of the Oder-Neisse line as Poland's Western frontier. The Polish Premier, Mr. Cyrankiewicz, referred to this frontier in quite emphatic terms four times during his speech. He ended these references by making it clear that he regarded the new treaty as embodying a guarantee of Poland's present frontier:

"the treaty will mean that the Polish frontier on the Odra and Nysa ... will be guarded not only by the Polish people and its armed forces but also by the powerful Soviet Union and the countries of the peace camp ... this treaty will mean that on the other side of the Polish frontier on the Odra and Nysa the peaceful forces of the German nation will stand ready, together and in equal measure with us, to defend peace against German militarism."

10. Mr. Cyrankiewicz's colleague from the "other side" of the Oder-Neisse line, who spoke immediately afterwards, did not rush in with any comradely assurances on this point; he did not even mention this question of the frontier. Mr. Cyrankiewicz's colleague from the other direction, Premier Bulganin, did not find time in his long discourse on world affairs to mention the question either.

11. The points I have mentioned above have not received much attention in any press comment we have seen. Each one of them indicates how the Soviet Government has left obscure certain important questions about Eastern bloc reactions to West German rearmament. In addition, there are a number of other points about the Conference which underline this aspect of Soviet policy. These points have been emphasized in press accounts which you may have seen and I shall simply note them briefly.

12. The Treaty is "open" to all states which wish to join, regardless of ideology. It is clear from one of the Articles, however, that a nation could not combine membership in NATO with membership in this organization. The emphasis in the Conference and in subsequent Communist propaganda has been on the invitation extended to all European states (and the USA) to join in a general European security system. If any general pact is agreed upon, the Warsaw pact can be dissolved immediately. There was no real indication in the proceedings of the Conference that the Soviet Government might now aim chiefly to put pressure on uncommitted states such as Finland to join the more limited pact signed at Warsaw.

13. According to the official statement about the Joint Command, "the question of the participation of the German Democratic Republic in measures connected with the armed forces of the Joint Command will be examined later". The fact that both with respect to participation in the Joint Command and with respect to the Treaty as a whole, East Germany was in a special position was made clear by Premier Grotewohl. He said that the Treaty signed at Warsaw "leaves the German Democratic Republic complete freedom to negotiate on peaceful reunification". In addition, these arrangements enabled the East German authorities to say, as they did a week or so afterwards, with a considerable show of virtue, that the question of participation in a Joint Command could not very well be discussed now since they did not have an army. In avoiding any immediate decision on military participation, however, the Soviet and East German Governments were not simply leaving room for manoeuvre on German reunification. They were making a virtue of necessity, because it seems clear that the type of Army required would be produced only by conscription. This would not only be extremely unpopular among the people, but would create a very serious security problem for the Russians. Conscription on any large scale would have serious effects on the economy by drawing men away from industry at a time when this could completely upset the precarious economy of East Germany. Any immediate move in this direction, therefore, would probably increase still further the sullen resentment of the people in East Germany against the régime at a time when the success of Soviet policy in Germany depends so much on Communism's maintaining a relatively friendly, "business-like" front towards the West in general and towards Germans in particular.

14. The actual integration of forces achieved through the new agreements is pretty loose. Marshal Konev commands through Defence Ministers or military leaders in the satellites and the "disposition of the Joint Armed Forces on the territories of the countries concerned" remains to be discussed.

15. The general tone of the speeches at the Conference was not very belligerent. All the usual charges about Western policies were made, but Marshal Bulganin built his speech around the "peace plan" which had just a day before been presented to the Disarmament Sub-Committee in London.<sup>66</sup> The satellite leaders took their cue from this. Premier Cyrankiewicz said that "we believe that common sense will triumph in international relations". The assembled élite of the Communist world made it clear, with their usual bland arrogance, that, if common sense did prevail, it would be owing to their efforts entirely, but they did not generate any very convincing indignation about capitalist attempts to evade the great tide of common sense flowing in from the East.

16. With reference to this last point, we have just received a letter† from our Chargé d'Affaires in Warsaw with some of his first impressions on the Conference. Mr. Delisle reports that, at a reception given for all foreign diplomats during the Conference, the Iron Curtain leaders obviously tried to make Western representatives feel at ease in spite of the political background against which the reception was held. While many Iron Curtain officials stood off to the sides, Soviet leaders drank toasts with Westerners.

17. If everything was rather tentative, if so many questions were left unanswered, if Soviet and satellite leaders failed to maintain the belligerent, threatening tone with which this project of an Eastern pact was inaugurated a few months ago, why did the Soviet Government decide to have any conference at all at this time? I think that there were a number of good reasons from the Soviet standpoint for doing this.

See United States, Department of State, Documents on Disarmament 1945-1959, Volume I, Washington: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1960, pp. 456-467.

18. In the first place, it is a useful corrective to any over-optimism on our part about new directions in Soviet policy to recall that millions of people either under Communist control or deluded by Communist propaganda have been persuaded that the Western "provocation" contained in plans for German rearmament has created a genuine threat to Soviet security and has necessitated Soviet counter measures. Communist speeches, broadcasts and articles drive at this point day after day. The Warsaw Conference had as one of its chief purposes the underlining of Soviet concern over plans to rearm the German Federal Republic. The Soviet Government could not have failed to meet ratification of the Paris Agreements in this way without seriously undermining one of its major drives in foreign policy.

19. The second major reason for the Conference was, I think, the desire of the Soviet Government to tidy up a number of awkward points about how exactly security arrangements necessitated by German rearmament or the withdrawal from Austria were to be made and how they were to be represented to the people in the satellites and the rest of the world. The Treaty and the Joint Command now provide the rudimentary elements of a useful political and military structure, which can be developed if needed to cover a number of projects.

20. The third major reason for the Conference was probably the desire of the Soviet Government to revive talks of a European security scheme such as that presented to the Berlin Conference by Mr. Molotov. The new Treaty is "open"; it could be dissolved if a more comprehensive pact was agreed upon; it underlines Soviet interest in "regional pacts". In this sense, it may be a negotiable element in a drive to get the United States out of Europe in return for some combination of a general European pact and a German settlement.

21. Even if the results of the Conference were cut and dried before it started, the Soviet Government did take particular care to make the sessions appear important. Unlike the Moscow Conference, where Molotov and other Soviet leaders made only occasional appearances, the Warsaw Conference witnessed the presence for four days of a high level Soviet delegation and heard an important speech by the Soviet Premier. The fact that Warsaw was chosen and that only a couple of weeks before Khrushchev had been there celebrating the Tenth Anniversary of the Soviet-Polish Treaty and giving some advance information about the Eastern bloc conference, indicated how carefully the Soviet Government was deferring to satellite susceptibilities.

22. One cannot therefore dismiss the Warsaw Conference and its resulting agreements as a mere facade, a transparent manoeuvre to score a few propaganda points. These agreements may, in the sense I have mentioned above, be "negotiable" in a general European settlement. But the very obscurity of the implications of many of the provisions means that the Soviet Government could, if no real bargain is struck with the West, use the agreements as the basis for a series of moves towards a more highly integrated military bloc in which more Soviet soldiers than ever are stationed across the centre of Europe and in which satellite and Soviet forces are redeployed, on a new basis without regard to frontiers, to meet the new NATO strategy based on all kinds of atomic weapons. After all, 1956 is supposed to mark the beginning of new integrated economic plans for the Soviet Union and its satellites. In recent months the satellite in which the post-Stalin "new course" was carried farthest, Hungary, has experienced an abrupt reversal to more orthodox policies, perhaps in anticipation of some of the problems created by a Soviet withdrawal from Austria. As Moscow pursues a more liberal line in one area it will probably try to limit the anticipated consequences of this elsewhere by tightening control. The June 1953 riots in East Germany must have made the necessity for such measures abundantly clear.

23. It is important to keep this point in mind because the speeches at the Warsaw Conference do not indicate in any way any Soviet intention to offer an "across the board" retreat from existing positions. There were, of course, many references to particular concessions. Almost all the speeches referred to the Austrian settlement as providing a useful precedent. Premier Grotewohl said that it "shows that there is a realistic way to solve the German problem." Roumania, Bulgaria, Hungary and Albania made friendly references to Yugoslavia and stated that they were all ready for normalization of relations with that nation and with Greece and Turkey. But judging from the Conference speeches we could only assume that the Austrian settlement, the new disarmament proposals, the approach to Yugoslavia and the interest in Four Power talks were intended, at least in the first round, to halt West German rearmament, without any real concession on Germany.

24. After indicating that the Western proposal for a Four Power Conference would be carefully studied, Premier Bulganin referred to the main issues to be solved as "agreement on the prohibition of atomic weapons, the reduction of armaments and armed forces and the removal of the threat of a new war." He then went on to explain the Soviet plan which had been tabled the day before in London. So far as Germany was concerned, Premier Bulganin had, earlier in his speech, placed emphasis on actions by the Germans themselves:

"In the implementation of these tasks the decisive part should be played, in the first place, by the patriotic forces of the German people themselves, who are striving to prevent the remilitarization of Western Germany. An important contribution to the unification of Germany and to the maintenance of peace in Europe could be provided by a rapprochement between Eastern and Western Germany, a relaxation of tension in their relations. There can be no doubt but that concerned action by the two parts of Germany for the creation of a united, free and democratic Germany is not only necessary but is also quite feasible."

25. Premier Grotewohl made the same point about the necessity "that the Germans should reach an understanding among themselves on all the problems obstructing a settlement." He made his point quite bluntly. "There will not always be an Adenauer, but there will always be a Germany." While the Russians try to get implementation of the Paris Agreements defeated by the Germans themselves without, for the time being, abandoning their East German satellite, there will undoubtedly be threats combined with soft words. The Joint Command in Moscow will probably provide the threats.

26. One commentator, Joseph Harsch, of the Christian Science Monitor in writing about the Warsaw Conference, speculated that "with the exception of Poland, Moscow is presumed to be willing and in fact offering to allow the satellites to take on the characteristics of a twilight zone between East and West in place of their present characteristics of captured, conquered and ruled provinces."<sup>67</sup> Since Mr. Harsch wrote this, Moscow has reacted sharply against any suggestion of "interference with the satellite states". Even before it did so, however, there seemed to be very little evidence that the Soviet Government was thinking of anything like a "twilight zone". The Treaty signed at Warsaw might be negotiable but Communist control of the satellites was not. A diminution of Soviet control through Communist governments in the satellites would mean the beginning of a steady deterioration in the security of the Soviet Union as conceived by Soviet leaders. The Soviet Government was not prepared to accept less security. It wanted the same amount of security but at lower prices and in somewhat different forms.

27. On the basis of the Warsaw Pact, the only aspect of the Soviet position in the satellites (except in the case of East Germany) which is likely to be negotiable in the next few years is the degree of direct military involvement of the Soviet Union in the satellites through the stationing of large forces and the manning of bases. If it can get a comparable withdrawal by the West, it will, in withdrawing its armies to its own frontiers, have retained relatively the same amount of security but at reduced prices in terms of an arms race and tensions likely to lead to war. A Western demand for the freeing of a satellite from Communist control, however, would be regarded by Moscow as an aggressive act comparable to any attempt which it might now make itself to give direct support to a Communist coup such as the Prague one of 1948.

28. There are two fundamental reasons for this attitude on the part of the Soviet Union. Those leaders who may still think in terms of Communism triumphant around the world will have a hard enough job to reconcile themselves to the containment of Communism in the West. The prospect of expansion in the East will hardly compensate for this fact adequately when it seems that such expansion is more likely to increase the empire of Peking than that of Moscow. If pressure is brought to bear for a retreat of Communism in Europe from its position in the satellites (except perhaps to gain a much greater prize in Germany), these leaders may become desperate at the prospect of the tide of revolution in Europe receding on all fronts and decide that the existence of Communism in the West depends on violent measures and a forward policy.

29. The saner Soviet leaders, the ones who may now be most instrumental in seeking a détente, may be able to see that Soviet interests might better have been served if, after the last war, they had been content with a sphere of influence in Eastern Europe and with guarantees of Soviet security not involving the forced conversion of these states to Communism. They probably do not relish what they must know about the hatred directed both at Communism and at the Russians as a result of this conversion. They are, however, caught in a dilemma which has existed as long as there have been empires. The problem was stated most succinctly by Pericles in a speech to the Athenians about their imperial commitments during a particularly trying period of the Peloponnesian War. "For what you hold is, to speak somewhat plainly, a tyranny; to take it perhaps was wrong, but to let it go is unsafe."

CONSULTATIONS CONCERNING ARMS SHIPMENTS TO THE NEAR EAST

As you are aware, it is our custom to consult the U.K. and the U.S. in connection with proposed significant arms shipments to Israel or the Arab States. We do not actually seek their approval, but we ask if they would be prepared to release the shipments in question if the requests were directed to them. To assist all concerned in assessing the importance of any proposed shipment a system has grown up whereby, in addition to consultation on individual cases of importance as they arise, we exchange with the U.K. and the U.S. on a bilateral basis every two months lists of arms items exported to each of the countries in question. In addition we receive from time to time the intelligence estimates of the U.S. and the U.K. of the arms levels of those various countries.

2. This informal system operates in parallel with a more formal and highly secret agency, the Near East Arms Co-ordinating Committee, on which the U.S., the U.K. and France are represented. We learned of this body some two years ago from the State Department, and were told at that time that the U.S. would welcome our association with N.E.A.C.C. but that perhaps the U.K. and certainly France would oppose our membership. At that time the committee met every two weeks in Washington to exchange information concerning arms levels in and arms shipments to the Near East countries, and to discuss the desirability of proposed releases of arms orders by the member governments. Apparently membership involves certain obligations of security concerning information put before the committee, and a commitment either to consult in the committee or to obtain its approval (our information does not make clear which) prior to the release of any significant shipment.

3. Recently, in connection with an enquiry relating to a particular request from Israel, we have been given a memorandum from the C.R.O. outlining current U.K. views on the control of arms shipments to Near East countries. The memorandum (of which the text is given in the attached Telegram No. 1655† from Canada House) suggests that we "might see some advantage in a closer direct association with the arrangements in Washington for the control of arms supply to the Middle East". The three foreign ministers at Geneva agreed to have the U.K. and French ambassadors review these arrangements with the State Department "to formulate procedures to maintain consultation about arms deliveries to Israel and the Arab States bordering on it. They are to consider what function ... the N.E.A.C.C. can usefully perform as part of these procedures, and to take into account the desirability of including in any such co-ordination shipments to the area by other friendly governments. The U.K. ambassador in Washington is being asked to keep the Canadian ambassador advised of the development of these plans".

4. When we first learned of the existence of N.E.A.C.C. two years ago we concluded that it was probably not to our advantage to seek membership. I am inclined to the view that this judgment is probably still valid, but I should outline for your consideration what I believe to be the factors bearing on our decision.

(a) Factors favouring our membership:

(1) It would probably make for more systematic consultation with the major powers most directly concerned, and thus perhaps give us a more complete picture on which to base our judgment in individual cases. It should be added that the present informal arrangement seems to work reasonably well, and the potential gain is probably not too great.

(2) In cases where one of the three great powers wishes to release a shipment which the others oppose, our membership would add one more restraining voice. While our influence would not in general be great, we would at least be recognized as having no direct political or strategic axe of our own to grind. Thus our participation should tend, at least to some extent, to reinforce the common declared objective of preventing a Middle East arms race against the somewhat disingenuous activities of great powers having special interests in the area.

(b) Factors discouraging our membership:

1. The practical problem of meeting the commitments involved, both in terms of representation and of the provision of independent intelligence estimates, would be a real one.

(2) There would be a considerable risk of implying special commitments with regard to the Middle East area. If in the future there should be real trouble in the area, the three present members of N.E.A.C.C. might press us to join them in some sort of intervention. Such pressure would be much more difficult to resist if we were members of any formal body specifically concerned with the area.

This consideration would of course depend greatly upon whether or not other powers (such as perhaps Belgium) should also become associated with the three powers.<sup>1</sup> We would not, I assume, wish to participate unless we were fully welcomed by all concerned, and in this connection we should keep in mind the report that two years ago the French were opposed to our joining.

3. Membership might undesirably restrict our freedom of action. This does not appear a very strong point, however, since the present N.E.A.C.C. system does not (to say the least) appear to bind its members too rigidly and we are in any case unlikely to wish to get far out of line with the U.K. and U.S. whether or not we are under any formal restriction. We are already bound to some extent, moreover, by the fact that many of our arms items concerned are of U.S. or U.K. origin or design.

This is important [R. Macdonnell]

5. Because of the close balance of arguments on the question I do not wish to recommend a decision either way at the moment. If you agree, I would propose to send this memorandum to the Embassy in Washington with a request to maintain contact with the U.K. ambassador on the progress achieved in the current talks. I believe we should ask in particular for information concerning any plan to associate other countries with the arrangements worked out among themselves by the three present members of N.E.A.C.C.<sup>2</sup>

6. These comments may be of use in discussion with Sir Gilbert Laithwaite, who sent the C.R.O. note to Canada House and who is expected to arrive in Ottawa on December 6 for the meeting of the U.K.-Canada Continuing Committee.

7. I am sending copies of this memorandum to European and Defence Liaison (2) Divisions, since they may wish to comment. As the time before Laithwaite's arrival is limited, I have not attempted to incorporate their views before sending this to you.

POSSIBLE CANADIAN MEMBERSHIP IN NEACC

There was a recent Reuters despatch from Washington to the effect that Canada had, together with Italy, accepted membership in the Near East Arms Coordinating Committee. I thought you might want a brief account of this matter in case there should be a question in the House.

No formal invitation has so far been received. In a note sent to our High Commissioner on November 26, 1955, however, the U.K. authorities reviewed their own policies on the export of arms to Israel and Egypt and concluded with the following paragraph:

"It has occurred to us that Canada might see some advantage in a closer direct association with the arrangements in Washington for the control of arms supply to the Middle East, though naturally that would be entirely a matter for the Canadian Government on which it would not be proper for us to express any view. The position at the date of writing is, however, that as a result of discussions between the United States, French and United Kingdom Foreign Ministers at Geneva, these arrangements are to be reviewed. The French and British Ambassadors in Washington, working with a representative of the State Department, are to formulate procedures to maintain consultation about arms deliveries to Israel and the Arab states bordering on it. They are to consider what functions the existing body, the Near East Arms Coordinating Committee, can usefully perform as part of these procedures, and to take into account the desirability of including in any such coordination shipments to the area by other friendly government. The United Kingdom Ambassador in Washington is being asked to keep the Canadian Ambassador advised of the development of these plans."

Yes R. M[acdonnell] 2/12/55

Subsequently the United Kingdom informed us that no further increase in the membership is proposed beyond the three original members, Italy and Canada if we decide to join. They have said they are in no way trying to press us to join and would be quite prepared to continue the present system of bilateral consultation if we consider it satisfactory. The French have said that they would of course be glad if we chose to join but that it would be for the United Kingdom or the United States rather than the French to issue the invitation. We do not seem to have been given any direct expression of U.S. views, but it would appear from the conversations which have taken place that the United States has no special preference as to whether or not we decide to join.

In the absence of any specific invitation we have not formally examined this question either in the Department or in consultation with other Departments. There have, however, been various informal exchanges which suggest that most of the officials in Ottawa who are aware of this matter would advise against Canada's becoming a member, especially if other significant arms suppliers (e.g. Belgium) were not brought in. Canada House and the Embassy in Washington were inclined to look more favourably on the prospect of joining, but neither made a firm recommendation to this effect. Incidentally, the earlier French sales of aircraft and the recent U.K.-Belgian tank incident have not provided very impressive evidence of the effectiveness of this coordinating machinery.

SALE AND EXPORT OF JET AIRCRAFT TO EGYPT

As I reported in my memorandum of June [23],† the Supply Department of the Egyptian Air Force is interested in obtaining from Canadair a quotation on 20 Canadian Orenda Sabres and/or 20 Super Sabres, and in addition they wish to place firm orders for 15 Harvard T6G reconditioned aircraft. In accordance with our usual practice, we have consulted the United Kingdom authorities informally about this order. I now enclose for your information a letter dated June 30 from the Commonwealth Relations Office to our High Commission in London, indicating that there are no objections to the export of the 15 Harvards, but that the United Kingdom Government would be grateful if we could discourage Canadair from submitting quotations on the Sabre jet aircraft.

If you approve, I propose to ask the Department of Trade and Commerce to inform the Canadair Company that they may go ahead and, if possible, develop firm orders for the 15 Harvard trainer aircraft.<sup>3</sup>

SALE OF SWEEP-WING JET AIRCRAFT TO EGYPT

You will remember that the Egyptian Air Force was enquiring last June about the possibility of obtaining Canadian Sabre aircraft. At that time the United Kingdom Government indicated that they would be worried if any swept-wing jets of this or of a similar type came into the possession of any Arab state or Israel. The United Kingdom authorities pointed out that their own Middle East Air Force was not yet equipped with such up-to-date aircraft and they would certainly refuse to supply Egypt with comparable United Kingdom fighters.

The Joint Intelligence Bureau expressed the opinion that the export of this type of aircraft to Egypt would have a serious effect on the balance of power in the area and recommended that quotations should not be submitted to the Egyptian Government on the Sabres.

On August 5 the State Department told our Embassy that the United States position on the export of jet aircraft of this kind to Egypt had been somewhat modified for these reasons:

- (a) France had sold to Israel over United States and United Kingdom objections six Mystères with an option on nine more;
- (b) As a result of this French sale the United Kingdom, according to the State Department, was reconsidering the advisability of equipping its Middle East bases with aircraft of comparable quality; and
- (c) The Egyptian Government had had attractive offers of military equipment from the USSR on easy terms of payment.

In view of this the United States would offer no objection if Canada accepted an Egyptian order for five jet or super-jet aircraft (preferably not the latter).

We then asked Canada House to point out to the United Kingdom authorities that if Israel was to receive Mystères it appeared to us that the United Kingdom's earlier objections to the sale of comparable aircraft to Egypt might lose much of their validity.

OK [L.B. Pearson]

July 14: Phoned [illisible/illegible] of Trade and Commerce. He will wait for letter [signature illisible/signature illegible]

The C.R.O. replied, however, that the attitude adopted by the French over their strong objections had not resulted in any change in United Kingdom policy with regard to the export of swept-wing jet aircraft to the Middle East. The United Kingdom had tried to stop these French exports and would continue to do all they could to prevent or limit as much as possible the export of swept-wing aircraft to Middle East countries. (The C.R.O. confirmed that France was selling Mystères to Israel; they understood a firm order for fifteen had been accepted with an option on fifteen more).

Meanwhile Mr. Davis of Canadair has been in Cairo where he has been asked by the Egyptian Air Force to make an offer on forty Sabres Mk. VI. The Egyptians said that they had offers of similar aircraft from the United Kingdom, the United States and France, and quoted prices at which they claimed they had been offered Mystères Mk. IV B and Hawker Hunters. Recently too there was a report in a United States aviation magazine that Egypt was negotiating for Hawker Hunters from the United Kingdom. We asked Canada House to make enquiries about this report, and they were told by the C.R.O. that there was no truth whatever in the story. The United Kingdom did have under consideration (before the latest Gaza flare-up) the sale of some Meteors and Vampires to Israel and/or the Arab states. These are not swept-wing aircraft. I think we can take it for granted that the Egyptian statement that they had had offers of swept-wing jet aircraft from the United Kingdom is not true, but their claim that they had been offered Mystères by France is more credible in view of the French sales to Israel.

Canadair has now asked for permission to quote on forty Sabres Mk. VI, on the understanding that permission to quote would pretty well imply that export approval would follow for any shipments undertaken in the near future.

If we refuse Canadair permission to sell any Sabres to Egypt at the present time, we cannot rule out the danger that the business may be taken by France or the Soviet Union. Nevertheless, I suggest that the present would be a highly inappropriate time for such a sale in view of:

(a) The recent series of serious border clashes in the Gaza strip, including fighting between jet aircraft; and

(b) The initiative taken by Mr. Dulles to try to bring about a settlement in the area.

In view of the uneasy situation in the area, you may consider that for the present no substantial shipments to the Middle East of any major items of military equipment should be approved.

I suggest, however, that Canadair might be told that if we or they get any reliable evidence that other countries are allowing the sale of significant quantities of swept-wing jet aircraft to Egypt, the situation will then be reviewed.<sup>4</sup>

EXPORT OF ARMS TO EGYPT

Attached is a copy of a most disturbing telegram† from Washington on the deal between Egypt and the USSR. The sale includes 37 jet bombers and 163 MIG's 15. The first 100 jet aircraft would be delivered by the USSR in December 1955. The deferred payment by Egypt would consist mostly of cotton.

It is clear from this that the State Department's Intelligence has been very poor, worse indeed than that of the New York Times.

The United States had been discussing with the Egyptians for a long time the supply of equipment (on favourable terms) which would have included mostly small arms and equipment of a defensive nature, as well as a small number of tanks and heavy units; no jet aircraft were included. A copy of telegram No. 1647 of September 27† on these negotiations is also attached. You will observe that when it was written the Office of Munitions Control thought only small quantities of "fringe area equipment" were involved in the Russian negotiations.

One of our main concerns is that we should not be under-cut in possible sales of jet aircraft to this area by Western competitors. I suggest, however, that this information does not give us any reason to allow Canadair at this stage to make quotations to the Egyptians on the assumption that export permits would be granted. There is no evidence that the United States or the United Kingdom have any intention of doing so.

With respect to Israel, Canadair might argue that, now that Egypt will have an overwhelming superiority in jet aircraft, balance should be restored by substantial sales to Israel, and Canada might get a good deal of the business by stepping in quickly. Such a reaction on our part, acting unilaterally, would be highly dangerous. It seems to me that there will be a very strong case for the Western Powers concerned revising their attitude towards sales of arms to Israel, but that it is more desirable than ever before that the Western Powers should adopt a common approach to this question and that we should maintain very close consultation with the United States and United Kingdom in view of these Russian sales.

I suggest that we should ask our Missions in London and Washington to seek definite assurances that neither country intends to allow the sale of jet aircraft to Egypt and to ascertain the intentions of the United Kingdom and United States with regard to sales to Israel.<sup>5</sup>

THE EGYPTIAN-CZECHOSLOVAKIAN ARMS DEAL

Of serious concern to the Western Powers has been the recent announcement by Colonel Nasser that Egypt has concluded a deal for the acquisition of arms from communist supplies. This disturbing news overshadows every aspect of Israeli-Arab relations and has, of course, wider implications for the international situation as a whole.

The transaction is with Czechoslovakia but shipments will evidently be made from Odessa. It seems likely that a large part of the material will be of Soviet manufacture. Latest United Kingdom information is that the deal includes jet aircraft, tanks, guns and light naval craft. Specific amounts have not been confirmed but it is indicated that they are substantial. Figures of 200 aircraft, comprising 165 Mig 15s and 35 medium jet bombers, and 100 tanks, have been mentioned by various sources. It is probable that a certain number of communist technicians will go to Egypt as part of the arrangement. First shipments under the transaction are expected by the end of this month or early in November. Payment by Egypt will be on a deferred basis and largely in cotton and rice.

It is too early to judge now whether this presages a calculated Soviet policy of more active interference in Middle Eastern affairs, which would have a harmful effect on the efforts to bring about an understanding between the USSR and the West. There have, however, also been reports that the Soviet Union has been offering arms to Syria and Saudi Arabia. The major Western Powers have made representations to Egypt and the Soviet Union, drawing attention to the dangers of upsetting the military balance between Israel and the Arab states and precipitating an arms race between them. If the deal goes through, it will become necessary for the Western Powers to reappraise their policies with regard to the shipment of arms to the Middle East. The question of the type of aircraft to be maintained on bases in the Middle East would also have to be reviewed, since the United Kingdom bases are not at present equipped with swept-wing jets.

Colonel Nasser has vigorously, both in public and private, defended Egypt's right to obtain arms from any available source. He has pointed to his failure to secure an adequate

Mr. Ritchie: Could we discuss on Monday or Tuesday? J. L[éger] supply of arms from the United States or the United Kingdom, while he alleges that the West has been arming Israel. The opinion of Western observers in Egypt is that Colonel Nasser was under strong pressure from the Army to obtain arms without regard to political risks. Military leaders had been smarting from a sense of inferiority to Israeli forces since the Gaza incident of last February.<sup>6</sup>

United States and United Kingdom reactions to the Egyptian-Czech arms transactions appear to be similar. Despite their representations to Colonel Nasser about the dangers of getting the Soviet Union involved in Middle Eastern affairs and of engendering a compensatory purchasing of arms by Israel, they do not believe that they can stop the deal. They consider it might be possible, however, to induce Colonel Nasser to limit it in scope and effect, or even quietly to cut down its magnitude. There seems to be a possibility that the Egyptians may have been taken aback somewhat at the strength of the Western reaction to the transaction with Czechoslovakia. Furthermore there are indications that Colonel Nasser himself may be having some second thoughts about the matter and may be realizing the danger of becoming too deeply involved with communist countries. It has even been suggested by the Foreign Office in London that the arms deal may so have enhanced Colonel Nasser's prestige, both in Egypt and in other Arab states, that he may feel strong enough to adopt a somewhat more accommodating attitude towards the West.

Neither the United Kingdom nor the United States believe that a proper counter to the deal would be to make immediate substantial increases of arms shipments to Israel. They are inclined rather to consider more stringent supervision of arms supplies to Egypt and to wait to see what Colonel Nasser will do in view of the strong representations made to him. However, the United Kingdom Government is contemplating "taking certain steps which, though not directed specifically against him (Nasser) or against Egypt, will indicate that we are going ahead with our Middle Eastern policies and supporting our friends. In other words, we shall seek to show that it pays to refrain from having dealings with the Soviet Union."

You will recall that when you were in London Sir Anthony Eden showed you the text of a draft letter which he wished to send to Bulganin and which he suggested you might be willing to support in your conversations in Moscow. The draft letter, after drawing attention to the serious effect of an arms race and a spread of conflict in the Middle East, suggested that the USSR should join the USA, France and the United Kingdom in exchanging information about the despatch of supplies to either Israel or Egypt. We understand that the letter was not sent to Bulganin in this form because of the United States objections to formally associating the USSR in this way in the tripartite consultations about the Middle East.

You might wish, in your conversations with Colonel Nasser,<sup>7</sup> to express the hope that nothing will be done to worsen the situation in the Middle East and to precipitate an arms race between Egypt and Israel, which would certainly be very dangerous to peace in the area. Israeli leaders have not unnaturally reacted to the announcement of the Egyptian-Czech transaction by proclaiming the necessity to obtain adequate additional arms themselves and by asking for a Western guarantee of their borders irrespective of any general settlement of the Arab-Israel dispute. These are points which Mr. Comay made in the letter which he left with you before your departure for Moscow. There is the additional factor that, if Israel considered itself compelled to increase its level of armament, this would not be at all welcome to other Arab countries such as Jordan and Syria. (The United Kingdom believes that Egypt made the deal with Czechoslovakia without consulting any of its Arab League partners. There seems to have been general Arab approval, however, of Colonel Nasser's demonstration of his independence from the West in this matter.) Incidentally, Colonel Nasser, in his public address on September 27 during which he announced the arms deal, mentioned Canada, together with the United States, the United Kingdom, France, Belgium and Italy as the sources from which "the enemy" Israel was obtaining its military supplies.

EXPORT OF ARMS TO ISRAEL

The Canadian Commercial Corporation recently informed us that the Government of Israel has asked for a quotation on 800 .30 calibre machine guns and mounts. A couple of days ago we were approached by officials of the Israeli Embassy who explained that when they received a quotation from the Canadian Commercial Corporation on 300 machine guns last August they decided that the price was so advantageous to them that it would be cheaper to get all the guns they claim they need from us rather than to manufacture them in Israel or obtain them from other sources. It was explained to them that the Canadian Government might have some difficulty in agreeing to the sale of a large quantity of machine guns, but that it would be helpful to know what the intentions of the Israeli authorities were respecting these guns. Specifically, the question was raised whether these units, or some of them, were intended for replacement purposes or whether they would be net additions to Israeli stocks. The answer given was not altogether clear-cut. At one point it was suggested that all 800 guns were needed to replace unserviceable weapons. We couldn't help raising our eyebrows a trifle skeptically about the notion that the Israelis should happen to have just 800 machine guns that don't work. At that point the Israeli representatives went off on a different tack and said that what they really have is a deficiency in their planned establishment amounting to 800 guns which they intend to make up. The upshot of this very informal discussion was that the Israeli representatives said a letter would probably be sent from Mr. Comay to Mr. Pearson bringing this case to his attention and explaining it (?) to him.

2. In the meantime, we have not consulted anyone about this order, as we were waiting to hear the Israeli explanation about the requirement of these weapons. Now that we have had it, and have incidentally been told that the Israelis have 10,000 machine guns (for what that is worth), I should be grateful for your views on whether we should now consult the United States and United Kingdom authorities about this order. You may wish to wait until the Minister receives a letter from Mr. Comay and then seek his views on how widely we should consult the above-mentioned Governments at this time. I would hesitate to seek their views before knowing whether you or the Minister think this should be done.<sup>8</sup>

SALE OF MACHINE GUNS TO ISRAEL

The Israeli Ambassador wrote to you on January 13 seeking your approval of a sale of 800 Browning .30 calibre machine guns. A copy of his letter† is attached for ready reference. You will have noted the implication in the second paragraph that if the guns are not supplied by us, they will either be procured elsewhere or else manufactured in Israel.

We have consulted the United Kingdom and United States authorities informally, as well as the Department of National Defence. We have learned that:

(a) If the order for machine guns were placed in the United Kingdom, it would be refused on the grounds that they are offensive weapons, unlike the fourteen 3.7" anti-aircraft guns the Israelis want. A copy of telegram No. 192 of February 11† is attached.

(b) The United States might allow the sale of, say, 200 or 250 machine guns, while making it clear that they regard the Israelis to be still "on trial", and that additional supplies would depend on their good behaviour. Their thinking may have been influenced by Mr. Ben Gurion's return to the Cabinet as Minister of Defence. A copy of WA-295 of February 18† is attached.

(c) The Department of National Defence, considering the order to be in excess of Israel's legitimate requirements (they now have 20,000 machine guns), recommends that no more than 200 be shipped to Israel over a twelve-month period. A copy of their letter of February 22† is attached.

You will recall that in my memorandum† yesterday I recommended the approval of the Israeli orders for:

- $224,000 worth of tank tracks
- 14 3.7" AA guns plus 3600 rounds
- 60 20mm guns for fighter aircraft.

The essential difference between those orders and the one for machine guns is that they are either intended for replacement purposes or for defensive needs (assuming fighter aircraft have for their primary function the defence of Israel against hostile bombers). Last year Cabinet turned down an order for 10,000 Bren machine guns, partly because Israel did not need any more (they hold more than the Arabs do altogether) and partly because these are ideally suited to offensive operations on a small scale. By the same token, I consider that the present order should be curtailed as proposed by the Department of National Defence, in order to be consistent with the Cabinet's policy of allowing sales of weapons to sensitive areas of local unrest only when they are required for legitimate defensive purposes.<sup>9</sup>

May I have your instructions on whether to prepare a recommendation to Cabinet in this sense?<sup>10</sup>

EXPORT OF ARMS TO ISRAEL

With reference to our telephone conversation yesterday on the subject of a possible censure by the Security Council of Israel's part in the recent Gaza incident, this will confirm that none of the items of military equipment we approved for export last week have actually begun to move out of Canada.

2. The Department of Trade and Commerce was asked this morning to look out for the relevant export permit applications from the Canadian Commercial Corporation for the 3.7", 20mm and .30" calibre weapons. As of this morning, those applications had not reached the Department of Trade and Commerce. The latter undertook to delay processing them for a few days, and not to issue the permits without specific telephone authorization by us. They were also enjoined not to say anything to the Corporation or to anyone else about this matter.

3. We explained that if the Security Council should decide to impose an arms embargo on Israel, we would not wish to be embarrassed by having military equipment already in the pipe line en route to Israel. We promised to let the Department of Trade and Commerce know as soon as a decision is taken in this Department either to let the shipments go forward, or to recommend that the approval previously granted should be withdrawn. I may add, in this connexion, that the amounts and categories approved were based on a very cautious appraisal of the situation obtaining in the Near East, where incidents such as the recent one in the Gaza strip are to be expected from time to time. For this reason I doubt whether anything less than an embargo resolution directed against Israel would justify a reversal of the earlier decision to supply the small quantities of arms approved for export last week.<sup>11</sup>

Ottawa, July 22, 1955

EXPORT OF ARMS TO ISRAEL — BROWNING MACHINE GUNS, CALIBRE .30

The Israel Embassy in Ottawa has been pressing for a reply to their request for an additional 600 Browning machine guns, .30 calibre. Earlier the Cabinet agreed to supply 200 guns at a rate of 20 a month beginning in June, 1955. For administrative reasons the rate of delivery was changed to 60 guns every quarter, which would mean that the last shipment (actually of 20 guns) would be made in March, 1956.

2. A concurrent request for spare parts is still being examined by the appropriate Canadian authorities and cannot be made the subject of a recommendation at this time. It is, however, linked to the problem of supplying guns and the decision on the present matter may well affect the subsequent recommendation on the parts, especially if it should appear that by supplying them we would be substantially increasing the effective strength of the Israel Army.

3. In pressing for the additional 600 guns, the Israelis are apparently prepared to accept delivery in regular shipments over a long period, although not necessarily at the present numerical rate. They wish to have firm commitment for the entire 800 guns so that they can complete plans for standardizing the medium machine gun used in the Israel Army, make appropriate changes in their arrangements for the supply of small arms ammunition (which is manufactured, we are told, largely in Israel) and reduce to a minimum the calibres of ammunition used in Israel armed forces. These aims are inherently reasonable.

4. In support of their request for additional .30 guns the Israelis have affirmed that:

(a) If Canada agrees to supply them, Israel will not have to look elsewhere and will in fact not do so.

(b) If Canada cannot agree to supply them, Israel can obtain the guns elsewhere, although at a greatly increased cost. This price factor, plus the fact that the Canadian guns will be new and supplied at a regular rate, has made it preferable, from the Israel point of view, for the purchase to be made here.

(c) There is no political obstacle because, although a regular supply of these guns would increase the administrative (and tactical) efficiency of the Israel Army they would have no decisive strategic value (as would tanks or jet aircraft) which would change the balance of military strength in the Middle East.

(d) Moreover, there is now less likelihood of a renewal of general hostilities in Palestine and in recent days a chance that the Egyptian-Israeli frontier situation will be stabilized, as has been the case along the Israeli-Jordan border. The Israelis maintain that the increased stability can be attributed to the clear superiority of Israeli forces over their Arab opponents.

5. Our own assessment of the situation is also influenced by the following:

(a) The Joint Intelligence Bureau believe that the supply to Israel of 200 Browning machine guns within a 12-month period would "meet their requirements and not seriously disturb the stability of the Middle East". 200 guns, however, would be the maximum annual requirement and the Joint Intelligence Bureau have suggested that Israel is probably obtaining the same kind of guns elsewhere. This possibility first led them to recommend against any extension of the Canadian commitment to Israel. Subsequently, however, they agreed that a further commitment to supply 200 machine guns in the year following March 1956 would not disturb the balance of military strength in the Middle East. They believe the rate of delivery should be maintained at 60 guns every quarter.

(b) The United Kingdom officials have said that if the same request were made of them they would be inclined to refuse it because they fear that the Israelis intend to use the Brownings to arm some demilitarized Sherman tanks which Israel possesses. The United Kingdom would no doubt prefer that we not supply the guns at the present time. However, the appropriate authorities in London will be reviewing the United Kingdom policy shortly and it is the impression in Canada House that an attitude more favourable to the present Israeli request might result.

(c) United States officials have declined to comment on Israel's request to us until a further review of the United States position has been completed. It seems that they might be in a position to comment about the beginning of the week of July 25.

(d) The present Israeli request involves us in a long-term commitment to supply arms to Israel. It is clearly not possible to forecast the trend of events in the Middle East beyond a few weeks, much less in the next few years. The current developments are not too discouraging, even though the fundamental obstacles to settlement remain formidable and dangerous. We could accept a long-term commitment with the full understanding that any gross deterioration of the situation in the Middle East would lead to an embargo on the shipments of all arms to the area or to any offending party, an embargo which would be imposed regardless of commitment. This happened when the United Kingdom imposed its embargo on Egypt after the Suez Canal dispute became acute.

Assessment

6. We are faced with the following alternatives:

(a) Refusing the Israeli request on the grounds that the situation in the Middle East is too risky to warrant any long-term commitment and that in toto this request for guns goes beyond Israel's ordinary requirements for defence.

(b) Accepting the request without reservation, with the knowledge that the United Kingdom and possibly the United States would be opposed to the shipment.

(c) Agreeing to supply the whole 800 guns but at a rate not exceeding 200 a year, delivered in shipments of 60 every quarter. This would mean a four-year commitment.

(d) Agreeing, as the Joint Intelligence Bureau has suggested, to supply an additional 200 guns in the year beginning March 1956 at the rate of 60 every quarter.

7. (c) and (d) seem to be the real alternatives. It appears from what the Israelis have said recently that they might expect to receive the guns in increased numbers every quarter if the whole request were to be met. Their interpretation of "the same rate" seems to be a percentage basis, namely 10%. If we agree to supply 800 guns, they might expect to receive 80 a month or 240 every quarter; if 400 in all were involved, they would expect 40 a month or 120 every quarter. These rates of delivery would be greatly in excess of the recommendation of the Joint Intelligence Bureau and the previous assessments we have had from the United Kingdom and the United States. It would seem desirable, therefore, to resist the pressure for any increase in the rate of delivery.

Recommendation

8. On balance I recommend that we agree to supply the additional 600 guns requested at a rate of 200 a year delivered in shipments of 60 every quarter. We should make clear to the Israel authorities, however, that we have entered into this long-term commitment in the belief that the situation in the Middle East is showing signs of improvement; that if the situation should deteriorate drastically we would be required to reconsider the commitment and possibly to impose some form of embargo, depending upon the action taken by other supplying countries.

EXPORT OF ARMS TO ISRAEL — BROWNING MACHINE GUNS, CALIBRE .30

I understand the memorandum to the Cabinet dated July 22, 1955, which was not dealt with at the last Cabinet meeting is on the agenda again for Thursday morning's Cabinet.

While examining the concurrent request for spare parts, the Joint Intelligence Bureau have given further consideration to the whole question of supplying 600 Browning machine guns to Israel. They have reiterated that their opinion, which is summarized in paragraph 5(a) of the memorandum to the Cabinet, is that the sale of a maximum of 200 of these weapons within a twelve-month period would not be unduly dangerous to the stability of the Middle East. They have also reviewed the request for spare parts and see no objection to the granting of this request. With the spare parts which accompanied the original sale of 200 plus the more recent request for spare parts, they consider that the Israeli Forces will be in a position to maintain the original 200 guns in working order under normal training conditions for approximately one year.

They then say, however, that in considering the Israeli request for the remaining 600, they think it would be most unwise to permit the sale of any more of these guns, even though deliveries would not commence until the original 200 had been shipped. They point out that deliveries of the first 200 will not be completed until March 1956, and that presumably these 200 guns will still be in working order until approximately March 1957. In view of the difficulties of foreseeing the state of affairs in the Middle East at that time, they consider that a commitment at this stage would be unwarranted.

In the light of this JIB opinion, you may wish to consider whether alternative 6(d) in the memorandum to the Cabinet would not be preferable to the recommendation you had adopted in paragraph 8 of the memorandum. Should you choose to recommend alternative 6(d), there would not be time to circulate a revised memorandum to the Cabinet, but I have prepared extra copies of this memorandum to you which you could circulate in Cabinet if you wished.

EXPORT OF ARMS TO ISRAEL

The Cabinet last week [July 28] approved the sale of an additional 600 Browning machine guns to the Government of Israel over a three-year period beginning after March 1956. At the same time the Cabinet agreed that it should be made clear to the Israel authorities that we have entered into this long-term commitment in the belief that the situation in the Middle East is showing signs of improvement, and that if the situation should deteriorate drastically, we would be required to reconsider the commitment and possibly to impose some form of embargo depending upon the action taken by other supplying countries. In Mr. Comay's absence I suggest that, if you agree, I might ask Mr. Yafeh, the Chargé d'Affaires, to come in so that I might explain the circumstances to him and hand him an aide-mémoire.†<sup>12</sup>

2. Since we asked the United Kingdom and United States authorities for their views on this proposed sale, I suggest that our Missions concerned should let them know about the Government's decision. Accordingly, I attach suggested telegrams‡ to London and Washington.

ARMS FOR ISRAEL

I thought you might wish to have a note on the present position in preparation for your forthcoming talks with Mr. Sharett.<sup>13</sup>

2. So far we have had no increase in requests for clearance of arms shipments to Israel as a result of the Czecho-Egyptian arms deal.<sup>14</sup> The volume of outstanding items (which are outlined briefly below) is perhaps a little above average, but they are routine requests which can be settled one way or another without the need for major policy decisions. Thus there should not be any problem during Mr. Sharett's visit unless he presents you with a substantial list of new requests such as that recently given to the U.S. Government.

General Policy Considerations

3. Should such a list be brought forward, I would suggest that you do no more than agree to study it. It would undoubtedly be covered by a brief purporting to demonstrate that the items listed are required only for legitimate defensive purposes and are merely designed to help restore the balance which may be said to have been overthrown by the Czecho-Egyptian deal. Even to admit that these objectives are acceptable is risky, since they run counter to the general Western position that an arms race in the Middle East is undesirable per se, and to the position which you took in your conversation with Prime Minister Nasser.

4. We are still awaiting word (expected any day now) of a decision in Washington on the line the U.S. will take on the list it has been given. Indications are that releases will be limited in general to defensive weapons, with the possibility that some items of mixed offensive-defensive capability (e.g., a few F-86's) may be included. The U.K. is being very cautious at present, partly for special political reasons arising from its relations with the Arab states and partly from fear that Western backing of Israeli counteraction against the Czecho-Egyptian deal may drive some Arab states wholly into the arms of the USSR. The French, despite the misgivings of the U.K. and the U.S., are briskly selling a number of items to both sides — no doubt from a mixture of political and commercial motives. On the whole the U.S. seems to be trying conscientiously to adhere to the declared objective of not contributing to a Middle East arms race, in spite of what must be fairly heavy internal and external pressure. I believe that our wisest course would be to go no further than the U.S. decides to go.

5. A special problem might arise if we should be asked to release modern jet aircraft (e.g., Sabres) to Israel. As you are aware, the aircraft industry would probably be delighted to find a new outlet; the deal could be defended, moreover, on the ground that it would merely balance the shipment of MIG's from Czechoslovakia to Egypt. Yet the precedent would be a dangerous one, and should I think not be considered at least unless the U.S. decides to release such aircraft.

6. I am not aware of other possible items where we would be exposed to serious pressure from Canadian suppliers to meet a possible Israeli request.

Current Cases

7. In my memoranda of November 16 and 18 I reviewed a total of eight items of current interest. I now append a table setting out the present status of these various requests.

8. You will observe that only five of the eight items are of concern to this Department, at least for the present. We are awaiting your decision on the release of the fifty 40 mm. A/A guns. While you may decide that the seventy 6-pounder A/T guns should also be released, I would advise that action be deferred at least until we learn more of United States policy. On the 3.7 A/A guns and ammunition no action is required at present, but we may expect a request for an export permit in the near future. With regard to the Browning machine guns, I suggest that we should not alter the present arrangement, unless the Israelis take the matter up again more formally in which case it would probably be possible to give way.

3. 3.7 A/A guns	12)	Quotations requested from CCC for November 22; they have presumably been given. No action is required of us until there is an application for an export permit, which we would probably be disposed to grant on the ground that the order is small and for a purely defensive item. J.I.B. views have not yet been obtained, however.
4. 3.7 ammunition	)
5. .30 Browning		A substantial order is being machine gunfilled at the rate of 60 guns per three months. Mr. Comay recently asked if the rate of delivery could be increased or perhaps the entire balance of the order released. The request was made orally, and no action has been taken so far.

EXPORT OF ARMS TO ISRAEL

There is set out below a summary of the present status of the various outstanding requests to which Mr. Sharett referred and on which you undertook to try to give him some satisfaction. I thought you might wish to have this in preparation for your meeting on Friday with Mr. Comay, although I understand you do not intend on that occasion to go further than express the hope that we will be able to give him answers before long on the outstanding items.

1-40 mm. A/A guns

The Israelis requested fifty of these guns. After your discussion with Mr. Sharett I informed Mr. Comay that we had no objection to the release of these guns in the present circumstances, fortunately adding the qualification that we were not aware of the supply situation. We have now learned<sup>15</sup> that there is a supply of these guns on hand, but that they are all required at present by our own forces. The staff are conducting a study to determine whether they should be retained in service or replaced by a somewhat more modern weapon of the same general type to fill the gap until really modern ("the Buck Rogers variety") anti-aircraft weapons come into service. This study will not be completed until about mid-February. If it is decided to retain these guns in service there would be none available for an indefinite period, while some might become available during 1956 if the decision is to replace them with the newer model of the same type of weapon.

Why only now? [L.B. Pearson]

II—3.7 A/A guns

The Israelis have requested twelve of these guns and a supply of ammunition. As in the case of the 40 mm. guns, Mr. Comay has been informed that we would be prepared to release the guns if they are available. We have now learned that there are none of these guns available, the total stock having been offered to NATO countries as mutual aid and allocated by the Standing Group.<sup>16</sup> The Israelis are no doubt annoyed, since they are aware that a supply of these guns was available only a few months ago. I do not know whether the Israelis already possess some of these guns and would therefore follow up the request for the ammunition even if they cannot get the twelve guns.

III—6-pdr. A/T guns

The Israelis have requested seventy of these guns, and I am informed that a supply of 160 is available. Both the U.K. and U.S. authorities have expressed misgivings, however, and we have been informed that the latter "would be reluctant to make a commitment of this nature (seventy 6-pdr. A/T guns) at present. While the quantity requested is not exceedingly high it is considered sizeable." The guns, moreover, have a mixed offensive-defensive capacity and are thus in a different category from the purely defensive A/A guns.

Despite these considerations there would probably be no insuperable difficulty about releasing some of these guns if you consider it desirable. It is interesting that they are regarded by our service authorities as completely obsolete. The supply is still available, incidentally, because no NATO country has considered them worth picking up as mutual aid. On the other hand, what is obsolete in the NATO context may not be unimportant in the Middle East, and the United States reservations may be fairly well founded.

IV—.30 calibre Browning machine guns

The current order, in process of delivery, is for 200 guns to be shipped in batches of 60 every three months. Deliveries were made in June, September, and at the beginning of this month, so there are now only 20 guns outstanding. The Israelis originally wanted to order a total of 800 guns, but the figure of 200 and the arrangement for spread delivery were decided on the basis of a J.I.B. recommendation. The Israelis no doubt consider that their request for the additional 600 guns is still under consideration, and probably it is these and not the 20 outstanding from the current order which they have had in mind recently in pressing for acceleration of delivery or outright release of the balance. While you were prepared after your talk with Mr. Sharett to release the balance of the order, I did not take up this point in any letter to Mr. Comay since we were not sure how this decision should be applied when there were both a small current and a large proposed order involved.

The Director of the J.I.B. has told us that concern to preserve a balance of strength between the Israelis and Arabs was behind their recommendation last spring that only 200 guns be released and the delivery spread over the year. He feels that the judgment on these weapons is now primarily a political one, in view of prospective increases in Arab strength. There would thus appear to be no real objection on technical grounds to releasing some or even all of the additional 600 guns requested by the Israelis. On the other hand, to increase the rate of delivery (if you should decide to approve a further release) might imply acceptance of the argument that the West should increase arms deliveries to Israel in response to the Czecho-Egyptian deal. This would be an important political decision which as far as we know has not at least as yet been taken by any Western country.

ARMS FOR ISRAEL

The Minister received the Ambassador for Israel this morning and had almost an hour's discussion with him concerning the situation in the Middle East, about which I am reporting in a separate memorandum.† During the course of the discussion Mr. Comay inquired as to the status of the Israeli request for arms from Canada.

2. Mr. Pearson replied that, as the Ambassador already knew, the 40 m.m. A/A guns and the 3.7 A/A guns were no longer available. He apologized for this and said that our Department simply approved or disapproved requests on political grounds and were not necessarily aware of the supply situation. He said that if these guns did become available again that they would be supplied to the Government of Israel. He suggested that Mr. Comay keep in touch with the Canadian Commercial Corporation.

3. Passing on to the anti-tank guns and the Browning machine guns, Mr. Pearson said that he thought that we had better wait until the Security Council had passed judgment on the Syrian complaint against Israel. He expected this would be some time in the New Year. It might prove embarrassing at the present moment for the Canadian Government to approve the shipment of arms to Israel when a rather serious charge against it was under discussion in the United Nations.

4. Mr. Comay said that he understood and would get in touch with us again in the New Year. He expected that there would be a mildly condemnatory resolution passed by the Security Council but he did not believe anything more serious than that would happen. He said he thought the U.S.S.R. would be reluctant to sponsor the Syrian resolution since this would put the Soviet Union firmly in the Arab camp and draw the line too sharply. He did not think any other member of the Security Council would take up the Syrian charge. Mr. Pearson agreed.

5. With regard to the machine guns, Mr. Pearson only mentioned the speeding up of delivery, so that this misunderstanding may still exist in Mr. Comay's mind. I would suggest that we now firmly dispel this, and that a firm recommendation should be made to the Minister concerning the remaining 600 machine guns. My personal opinion is that, having failed to fulfill the promise to Mr. Sharett with regard to the A/A guns, we ought to make an effort to provide the machine guns. If we do approve, then I think this decision should be communicated in due course to Mr. Comay, provided the Security Council does not produce a severe condemnation of Israel.<sup>17</sup>

Ottawa, January 14, 1955

RELATIONS BETWEEN EGYPT AND ISRAEL

On December 24, 1954 the Ambassador of Israel in Ottawa approached the Department about two matters which he said were aggravating the already uneasy relations between Egypt and Israel. The points he made may be summarized as follows:

(a) The Bat Galim Case. The Israelis are not interested in winning a debating point; they consider that the debate was won when the Security Council passed its resolution of September, 1951 calling upon the Egyptian authorities to terminate the restrictions on shipping in the Suez Canal bound for ports in Israel. Nor will the Israelis be content with the release of the ship at the southern end of the Canal, nor its cargo (or compensation for it) and crew, all of which the Egyptians have now promised. The Israelis want a practical solution which will result in the removal of interference by the Egyptians which has done much to cripple the economy of Israel. Mr. Yafeh had made these points clear when he, as Chargé d'Affaires of the Israeli Embassy, asked the Department on December 7 to instruct Canadian representatives to use their influence on members of the Security Council in order to promote Israel's case.

(b) The "Spy" Trials in Egypt. The Israelis charge that the thirteen persons of Jewish origin, who have undergone trial before a military court in Cairo, have been bullied into confessing crimes which they did not commit. The Prime Minister of Israel recently announced that the trial had evoked a storm of indignation in Israel and all over the Jewish world and he had called upon "all those who uphold peace, stability and human relations between nations to prevent this dangerous miscarriage of justice". In making this request specific as regards the Canadian Government, Mr. Comay said that the death sentence in these "spy" cases would have serious repercussions in the Middle East and that the United States had undertaken to make representations to the Egyptian authorities.

2. Following this démarche we asked our missions in London and Washington to consult with the appropriate authorities to determine whether the Israelis had made a similar approach and, if so, what action had been taken or contemplated by the United Kingdom and United States. In due course we were informed that separate, oral and unofficial approaches to the Egyptian authorities had been made by the United Kingdom and the United States representatives in Cairo, who had urged that restraint be exercised in the conduct of the trial and had emphasized the repercussions which might result if the death sentence were to be imposed. The United Kingdom Chargé d'Affaires had reported his opinion that his representations had been sympathetically received and, in view of the reasonable manner in which the trial was being conducted, the Foreign Office seemed hopeful that the sentence would not be unduly harsh. The United Kingdom information suggested that "the accused were engaged in mild espionage and sabotage". The information supplied by the United States authorities tended to confirm the foregoing but they believed that the Egyptian court might be obliged to impose the death penalty because of the execution of members of the Muslim Brotherhood as "enemies of Egypt". The State Department seemed uneasy about the consequences of such action by the court.

3. In the meantime we had reviewed the factors which we believed should govern our reply to Mr. Comay's démarche. It seemed to us to be related to Mr. Sharet's foreign policy statement in the Knesset on November 19, 1954. Referring to Arab-Israeli relations, he had singled out Egypt for criticism, mentioning the refusal to allow Israeli ships to pass unmolested through the Suez Canal, the continued sabotage and bloodshed along the Gaza Strip, and the "show trial" of a group of Jews in Egypt who had been falsely accused of plotting in favour of Israel. He had described these developments as evidence of a lack of international responsibility and moderation on the part of the Egyptian Government and added (no doubt for home consumption) that the Nasser régime should realize that Israel's restraint in the face of this persistent provocation was due solely to its wish to test the ability and willingness of the Egyptian authorities to curb aggression and restore order.

4. Mr. Sharet's statement seemed to spark a new Israeli drive for diplomatic support. The drive appears to have at least three aims: to win recognition for Israel's profession of peaceful intent, to compel Egypt to lift the Suez blockade and to discredit the Government of Egypt in the eyes of the world. This policy reflects, we believe, (a) the disappointment which Israelis suffered because the Anglo-Egyptian Agreement on the Suez Canal offered no guarantees to Israel concerning its security or its right to make peaceful use of the Canal;<sup>18</sup> (b) Israel's apprehension about the recent trend in United States policy toward arming the Arabs against communism; (c) Israel's sense of isolation in a hostile environment; and (d) the frustration and hardship in Israel resulting from the economic boycott and blockade imposed by the Arab states.

5. The link between these underlying factors and some of the particular events is often obscured by the criss-cross of argument and propaganda from both sides. The link is there nonetheless. As regards the Bat Galim case and the spy trials, the Egyptians have tried to justify their refusal to terminate the restrictions on Israeli shipping by arguing that Israel has aggressive intentions: The Bat Galim's crew of ten was depicted clumsily as a murderous crew which fired upon helpless Arab fishermen in Egyptian waters. The Egyptians have also argued that Israeli shipping, if allowed to pass through the Canal, would clandestinely carry Israeli spies and saboteurs into Egyptian territory. The present trials at Cairo are represented as evidence of Israeli designs in that direction. For their part the Israelis wish to show that they want peace, that it is the Arabs who maintain the warlike measures. Thus, as in the recent statements before the General Assembly, each side tries to blacken the reputation of the other.

6. There are domestic reasons why the Egyptian authorities might maintain, at least for the time being, their hostility toward Israel. Nasser has successfully negotiated for the withdrawal of the foreign troops; he has stamped on the internal enemies in the Muslim Brotherhood. He has from time to time also blamed the Zionists and communists for Egypt's troubles. He has held sway over the Egyptian public by posing as the vanquisher of all evil. One of the greatest evils, built largely by propaganda, is the usurper state of

Israel. To root out all vestiges of that evil is a popular aim and one which helps the Egyptians forget the shame of the Palestine War of 1948. Undoubtedly these considerations influence the Nasser régime which to date has barely scratched the real problems of Egypt, in the economic and social field. Because the Nasser régime is perhaps the last chance for stability in Egypt, it should not be condemned too strongly for resorting to those tactics in order to survive.

7. The Israel Government too has domestic problems. It is under strong pressure to take positive action to end the stalemate in relations with the Arabs, the frustration of the elaborate Zionist dreams, the hardship of day-to-day living with a distorted economy. Violence along the borders with Egypt, the seizure of an Israeli ship and crew, the trial of Jews in Egypt serve as fire in the hands of the militant nationalists. Mr. Sharett, who has shown commendable moderation, is hard pressed and looks for outside support so that he will have an answer for the extremists pressing for retaliatory action. The death penalty, imposed on Jews by an Egyptian military court, might ignite a spark too hot to handle. Mr. Comay tried to promote this impression but he may well have overstated the possible effects of a harsh sentence by the Egyptian court in order to win our support.

8. In addition to the foregoing considerations we had to bear in mind our own interest in developing friendly relations with all the countries in the Middle East. Whereas for a variety of reasons we can be reasonably assured that our relations with Israel are on a sound footing, we have less reason to be complacent about Canada's relations with the Arab states. There are high barriers of race, language and religion to be overcome and a deep-rooted suspicion and distrust which the Arabs have for all Westerners. Our missions in the Arab states will therefore have no easy time winning friends for Canada and task would be made all the more difficult, if the Canadian Government were to play too active a part in Arab-Israeli disputes, especially in promoting the cause of Israel. In particular, we believe that the future of our diplomatic mission in Egypt should not be jeopardized so soon after its establishment by pressing too vigorously Israeli contentions which may not be as well founded as spokesmen for Israel might make them appear. To illustrate from the present démarche, while we are reasonably satisfied that Israel has the legal right on its side in the Bat Galim affair, we conceive that Israeli agents may be operating, however ineffectively, in Egypt.

9. In the light of these factors it was decided:

(a) As regards the Bat Galim that we should continue to consult informally with the United Kingdom, the United States and perhaps France on the steps which might be taken to bring about a termination of Egyptian restrictions on Israeli shipping in the Suez Canal. If we should see some opportunity for Canada to make a useful intervention, we might consider whether the Canadian Government should do so.

(b) As regards the "spy" trials in Egypt that we should take no action beyond consulting with the United Kingdom and United States authorities. It seemed most unlikely that an approach by our newly established mission would add anything to the influence already exerted by United Kingdom and United States representatives in Cairo. Such an approach might, indeed, provoke resentment because the Western powers were "ganging up" on Egypt.

10. Accordingly on January 11 Mr. Comay was informed orally along the following lines:

(a) Although the Department has looked with sympathy on Israel's claims to unmolested passage for its shipping in the Suez Canal, because Canada is not a member of the Security Council, the Canadian authorities are reluctant to intervene in the Bat Galim dispute while that body has the matter under consideration. We are, however, following the proceedings closely.

(b) As regards the trial in Egypt, Canadian authorities view with concern the prospect of increased tension in the relations between Israel and Egypt, a result which the imposing of the death sentence might produce. The Department has, however, no special knowledge of the matter and does not consider itself competent to take sides. It is doubtful, moreover, whether the new Canadian Ambassador in Cairo, who has so recently presented his credentials, would be able to influence the Egyptian authorities to any extent in a matter as important as the "spy" trial. The Department had instructed the Ambassador to send a full report on the matter.

Mr. Comay made no comment but we believe he was not surprised by the answer he had received.

11. Except for the preceding paragraph, this despatch is largely for your own information on Departmental thinking about the two problems which have arisen in Israeli-Egyptian relations. If you are approached on these subjects you should be guided by the policy decisions stated in paragraph 9 and by the summary of what was said to Mr. Comay on January 11. We shall be glad to have your comments on these matters.

ARAB-ISRAELI RELATIONS: THE GAZA INCIDENT

General Burns will arrive in Ottawa on the evening of March 24 and before leaving for Palestine on March 27 he hopes to see you. We had prepared this interim report on the Gaza incident in the expectation that you might have an opportunity to discuss it with Gen. Burns. The assessment (particularly para 9.) is based in part on General Burns' report to the Security Council and on some informal suggestions he made to Mr. David Johnson about the situation in Palestine. We had asked Mr. Johnson to sound out General Burns on some of the broader implications of the Gaza incident. His views were contained in telegram No. 192 of March 18† from New York which is attached.

2. On March 17 General Burns submitted his report to the Security Council on the Gaza incident of February 28. The facts gave full support to the resolution of March 6 of the Mixed Armistice Commission which condemned Israel for the "prearranged and planned attack." General Burns did not place any particular emphasis on this condemnation and devoted much of his report to setting forth the "state of affairs on the demarcation line" along the Gaza Strip in the several months preceding the incident. In his opinion "it is most important to assess the causes contributory to this very grave incident with a view to persuading the Parties to modify their attitudes and so prevent still further deterioration of the situation."

3. Annexed to the report was a complete list of the complaints lodged by both sides during the period November 1954-February 1955. Referring to some of these General Burns said that the number of casualties reflected the "comparative tranquillity" along the armistice lines prior to the Gaza incident. He found, however, that "the recurrence at more or less frequent intervals of shooting incidents along the demarcation lines, the much more frequent cases of crossing of the line by infiltrators and their activities in Israel helped to maintain a state of greater or lesser tension, which was increased by the emotion created in Israel by the Bat Galim case (in December) and, in January, by the trial in Cairo of Jews charged with espionage and the condemnation to death of two of the defendants." As for the immediate cause of the Gaza incident, General Burns had heard allegations by Israeli spokesmen about espionage and sabotage in Israel which they said were being conducted by the Egyptian military authorities in the Gaza Strip. Several incidents between February 23 and 25 were connected by Israel Army officers with previous activities of the Egyptian intelligence service during the past year. According to General Burns, "the Gaza incident could appear in this context as retaliation for the spying, sabotage and murders for which the Egyptian military intelligence service was said to be responsible." He explained that the United Nations Truce Supervision Organization had not made formal representations about these Egyptian activities because the Israelis had lodged only two formal complaints about them and had adduced no supporting evidence.

Attitude of Egypt

4. In the course of its investigations UNTSO had been told by the Egyptians that the infiltrations and other acts of which the Israelis complained were largely inspired by political elements in Egypt inimical to the Nasser Government. The Egyptians complained too of armed Israeli reconnaissances deep into the Gaza Strip. At the Security Council on March 17 the Egyptian representative did not discuss these matters, although he reserved the right to deal later with matters raised in General Burns' report. Mr. Loufti concentrated on the condemnation of Israel for the "violent and premeditated ... act of war" which he called "the latest of the already long series of systematic acts of aggression conducted by Israel against the Arabs." He charged that Israel was trying to confuse the issue by introducing extraneous allegations about the general situation in the Middle East, tactics which he implied followed a familiar pattern based on the Israel belief that peace could be imposed by force. He referred to the restraint exercised by the Egyptian leaders in the face of severe provocation and public indignation in Egypt.

Attitude of Israel

5. On March 17 the Israeli representative at the Security Council asked to postpone his statement because many of the observations which he proposed to make related to the matters "authoritatively described in the report submitted by the Chief of Staff." On March 23 he called upon the Council to condemn Egyptian "incursions, murders, demolitions and sabotage" which he said had been officially described as "a main cause of the present tension." Reports from the Canadian Ambassador in Tel Aviv, who had an interview with the Prime Minister of Israel shortly before the incident and who had discussed it with some of his colleagues, leave no doubt that the Gaza attack was carefully planned and fully approved by the Israel Government. In addition to the causes mentioned by General Burns (para. 2 above), the Israeli authorities have been under growing public pressure because of (a) the continuing frustration and economic hardship arising out of the unresolved dispute with the Arabs; (b) the widespread and demoralizing sense of isolation which the recently signed Turkish-Iraqi Pact served to emphasize acutely; (c) the influence of the vocal and closely-knit extremists who have always thrived in times of militant action; (d) the state of siege which has prevailed in Israel since its inception; (e) and the forthcoming election which requires the ruling Mapai party to strengthen its position. These pressures have been operating in varying degrees during the past year. Almost all of them work against the policy of restraint which Mr. Sharett has tried to follow. In Mr. MacDermot's view Mr. Sharett may have been unable to withstand those pressures, which have greatly added to his heavy burden as Prime Minister and Foreign Minister. The return of Mr. Ben Gurion to the Cabinet not only bears out that assessment but suggests that a revision of policy in the direction of more toughness in relations with the Arabs may ensue.

Attitude of the Great Powers

6. In their statements at the Security Council the representatives of all the Great Powers deplored in varying degrees the Israeli attacks on Gaza. Mr. Sobolev, of course, spread the blame for the tension in the Middle East to include those states who followed a policy of forming military blocs. Immediately after the incident, when the prima facie evidence was against Israel, the United Kingdom and United States representatives in Tel Aviv expressed concern to the Israeli authorities. The United States, we understand, has temporarily suspended its consideration of Israeli requests for arms although some minor shipments already approved are being processed. The United Kingdom has formally told Israel that the previously approved shipment of Centurion tanks will be suspended for the time being. We gather that if the Gaza incident is interpreted by those powers as a change of Israeli policy in the direction of more toughness, there is likely to be a strong reaction in both London and Washington which will be reflected in future policy on arms shipments to Israel. The United States and United Kingdom apparently favoured a strong condemnation of Israel by the Security Council but their attitude has been tempered by that of France, which tends to favour a broader examination of the circumstances leading to the Gaza incident.

Action by the Security Council

7. In these circumstances it seems likely that the Security Council will endorse the UNTSO condemnation of Israel but without recommending punitive measures and will try to avoid a recurrence of such incidents by urging the parties to cooperate with UNTSO in improving the truce supervisory machinery. Appendix VIII of General Burns' report recommends "Arrangements for the Purpose of Preventing Incidents in the Gaza Area." These include the issuance by the Governments of strict orders to the responsible local authorities to suppress illegal crossing of the demarcation line, the employment of only well-trained and disciplined regular military or police personnel in the border zone, the coordination of the efforts on both sides to prevent infiltration, and the rapid consideration by both parties of complaints about infiltration, in close cooperation with the Mixed Armistice Commission. In the body of his report General Burns referred to measures which he had already recommended to the two parties, including border patrols along the sensitive sections of the demarcation line, barbed wire obstacles in specified areas and the negotiation of a local commanders' agreement. He added that his negotiations on these measures were still in process. General Burns believes that if an agreement were effected along the lines of his suggestions and if the parties cooperated fully, infiltration could be reduced "to an occasional nuisance" and one of the most serious causes of tension would thereby be considerably reduced.

Assessment

8. Any assessment at this stage is interim but the following conclusions seem soundly based:

(a) The Israelis are pleased and the Egyptians and other Arabs disappointed with General Burns' report which has called attention to the wider implications of the Gaza incident. However, the present indications are that Israel will not be as pleased with the results of the debate in the Security Council because, although the condemnation may be relatively light, the action to be recommended will not deal with the underlying causes of tension — the continuance of the cold war in the Middle East — the refugee problem, the hate campaign in the opposing camps. Thus another "test case", this time put forward by Israel by very drastic means, will have failed to obtain concrete results.

(b) There is unlikely to be retaliation in force by Egypt, either alone or in combination with other Arab states. In toning down the publicity about the Gaza incident, and in making no drastic military moves in the area, the Nasser Government has demonstrated its desire not to be stampeded into a renewal of hostilities with Israel. The Israelis have developed military strength which is capable, for the time being at least, of dealing with any attack the Arab states could mount. Both sides know this.

(c) If the Security Council should endorse General Burns' suggestions for improving the truce machinery and if the parties heed the calls to co-operate, there can be real improvement in the situation along the Gaza Strip, just as there has been improvement along the demarcation line between Israel and Jordan as the result of close cooperation between UNTSO and the authorities on both sides. Minor incidents will no doubt continue in all areas, since no system of supervision can cope with all the infiltration, especially that in the more remote areas. The danger-spot for new clashes on a large scale appears now to be the Israel-Syrian border. Incidents there have increased in recent weeks; the Syrians resented the Israeli action in forcing a Syrian civilian aircraft to land in Israel; and the Israelis have been calling for the release of four soldiers now held for trial in Syria on charges of espionage — charges which evidence collected by UNTSO tends to support.

(d) The pressures within Israel will continue to be exerted on the Government once the exhilaration of the "Gaza victory" has worn off. The brakes applied by Mr. Sharett are likely to be less effective as Mr. Ben Gurion becomes more firmly established in the Cabinet. The recurrence of acts of toughness may follow, although the adverse reaction of the Western Powers to the Gaza affair may produce hesitation in Israel.

(e) A recurrence of violence on that scale will solve nothing — not even the immediate problem of infiltration. The possibility of negotiated peace between Israel and the Arab states will be pushed farther afield. The Arab leaders, some of whom had begun to talk privately of accepting the fact of Israel, will be less disposed than ever to recognize that fact publicly. Arab revenge will be plotted and performed. In these circumstances the Israel authorities may be inclined to bigger and better acts of violence, especially if they should see the Arabs growing disproportionately stronger as a result of military and economic aid from the West.

9. This pessimism in the foregoing conclusions reflects the setback, which the Gaza incident has given, to the development in recent months toward a more favourable atmosphere for peace in the Middle East. This situation has by no means been reversed, particularly if the Gaza affair is a momentary flash of defiance and annoyance rather than a new trend toward toughness, on the part of Israel. The following measures might help to recover the ground lost through the Gaza incident:

(a) In addition to the Security Council's condemnation of Israel and its recommendations for improvement in the truce machinery, the Western powers should try to persuade Israelis, whenever the opportunity arises and preferably without too much irritation to them, that the need for restraint in the face of Arab provocations, especially the infiltration, is great. Israel should be urged to abandon its periodic reprisal raids, which reduce rather than increase the possibility of a negotiated peace.

(b) Israel and the Arab countries should be encouraged as much as possible to cooperate with UNTSO.

(c) Steps should be taken to counteract Israel's sense of isolation. Concurrently with the progress toward a system of collective security in the Middle East, which for the time being cannot include Israel, some form of guarantee should be given to Israel that its integrity and independence will be maintained. Of necessity, this attitude should be reflected in the approval of supplies of arms to the Middle East, although it seems inevitable (and perhaps desirable) that the Arab states will receive a proportionately larger share.

(d) Somehow a start must be made to remove the underlying causes of tension between Israel and the Arab states. The greatest obstacle is the refugee question which plays a very important part in the domestic politics of most of the Arab states. Before any positive step can be taken the Arabs must accept two facts: that Israel has come to stay and that, except for a very few, most of the refugees will be resettled in Arab lands. Even at the risk of antagonizing the Arab leaders, no opportunity should be lost to persuade them to move in that direction.

10. In the two preceding paragraphs we may have stretched somewhat the implications of the Gaza incident. A final assessment cannot be made until after the decision of the Security Council. However, I thought it might be useful to let you have this interim report on the incident. While at this time I am not recommending any specific action, I think the time may have come for us to reappraise our own attitude toward Arab-Israeli relations, in particular to determine (a) whether we should try to persuade one side or the other, or both, in accordance with the tentative conclusions in this memorandum, or such others as we may reach as a result of the reappraisal; and (b) whether any modification of our attitude toward the shipment of arms to the Middle East is desirable.

ARAB-ISRAEL RELATIONS: MR. DULLES' SPEECH IN NEW YORK

The Dulles Proposals

Attached is the text of the speech on the Middle East which Mr. Dulles delivered before the Council on Foreign Relations in New York on August 26.<sup>19</sup>

2. The Secretary of State, speaking specifically with the authority of President Eisenhower, suggested broad outlines for a general settlement of the Arab-Israeli dispute and indicated what the United States was prepared to do in order to contribute to such a settlement. The main points he made were:

<sup>19</sup> Voir/See United States, Department of State, Bulletin, Volume XXXIII, No. 845, September 5, 1955, pp. 378-380.

(a) Refugees: An international loan would be made to Israel to enable the payment of compensation; aid would be forthcoming for water development projects to facilitate resettlement and repatriation where feasible.

(b) Security: If other related problems could be solved, the United States would be disposed to join formal treaty arrangements to guarantee Israeli-Arab borders; he hoped that other countries would join in the guarantee and that it would be sponsored by the United Nations.

(c) Boundaries: Permanent borders must be negotiated and some adjustments would be necessary.

(d) Related Problems: These, such as economic questions and the status of Jerusalem, should be soluble if agreement were reached on the main issues.

3. The United Kingdom immediately gave public support to Mr. Dulles' proposals (text of United Kingdom Government's statement of August 27 attached).<sup>20</sup> The Australian and New Zealand Ministers for External Affairs and the Prime Minister of Ceylon also made statements of general endorsement. The French Government issued a communiqué on August 28 expressing close interest in Mr. Dulles' suggestions.

4. We were given prior notice of the speech of a few days by Earncliffe and of a few hours by the United States Embassy. Both the United States and United Kingdom Governments have expressed to us the hope that the Canadian Government will also be able to support the statement. Pertinent extracts from the aide-mémoires† from Earncliffe and the United States Embassy read as follows:

"The United Kingdom Government hopes that the Canadian Government will also be prepared to give Mr. Dulles' statement their public support." (Earncliffe)

"It is hoped that the Canadian Government will feel able to indicate to the parties in question that they should work towards a solution and that it believes the proposals made by the United States point the way to an eventual settlement." (United States Embassy)

United States and United Kingdom Views

5. Our Embassy in Washington reported that Mr. Dulles had for some time been considering the idea of making public proposals which might provide a fresh basis for progress towards an Arab-Israeli settlement. Timing became a matter of urgency when insistent Israeli requests for security guarantees were accompanied by mounting domestic pressure from Jewish groups in the United States. The United States Government is opposed to giving separate guarantees to Israel. It is hoped that the Dulles statement might contribute constructively to a settlement of Arab-Israeli disputes and at the same time lift the issue in the United States above the level of party politics. The State Department suggests that it might be possible for the Arab Governments to accept less than their public demands for implementation of the United Nations resolutions, if they could point to the pressure of world opinion. The United States Minister described the Dulles speech to us as a first step in letting it be known that the United States considered that a settlement between Israel and the Arabs must be made.

6. The United Kingdom Government realized that the initial reaction to the statement in the Middle East was likely to be unfavourable. It hopes, however, that the parties will eventually be brought to discuss with the United States and the United Kingdom the possibility of a settlement.

Departmental View

7. Our preliminary view, within the Department, was that the Dulles outline might indicate the shape of an eventual settlement. It should not, in the main, be objectionable to the Israelis, while the Egyptian Foreign Minister, in his conversations with you last July,<sup>21</sup> suggested that, in his opinion, there might be a possibility of a settlement of the Arab-Israeli problem somewhat along these lines.

8. We were concerned, however, that the Arab Governments, if publicly confronted with peace proposals of this character by the West, especially at this time, with the resumption of serious armed clashes between Israel and Egypt, would feel compelled to adopt firmer positions against them than they might be disposed to do in private conversations. Dr. Fawzi, you will recall, made this point in his discussions with you. It was repeated to us recently by Mr. Yafeh, the Israeli Chargé d'Affaires, who, discussing the Dulles proposals, expressed the personal opinion that they should be acceptable in principle to Israel but they should not have been made publicly, since they would be bound to draw immediate press attacks in the Middle East, which would make their consideration by governments more difficult. We also feared that the Dulles speech would be attacked by the Arabs as espousing too much of the Israeli position, particularly since, in the section dealing with border adjustments, no mention is made of Arab right of access to the Negev to link Jordan and Egypt, which can be assumed to be a sine qua non for the Arabs.

9. The Dulles proposals contain nothing essentially new but they draw together suggestions which have been made at various times in the past by the United States and United Kingdom spokesmen. Moreover, they serve to express emphatically the concern of the West over the continuance of conditions of war in the Middle East. What they purport to do, in effect, is to get the Arabs to negotiate on the basis of the existence of the Israeli state — which is the crux of the problem.

Arab-Israel Reactions

10. All Arab countries and Israel were informed in advance of the substance of the Dulles speech and were asked to give careful consideration to the proposals contained in it.

11. Immediate official reactions in Egypt, Lebanon, Syria and Jordan were non-committal. However, the Iraqi Prime Minister told the United Kingdom Representative confidentially that the Dulles statement was a helpful contribution. The State Department was somewhat encouraged that the Egyptian Government indicated willingness to consider them seriously and with moderation. The United States Ambassador in Cairo, however, told our Chargé d'Affaires that Colonel Nasser, on receiving a copy of the statement, seemed "disappointed and it was obvious that he was expecting something more specific and favourable". The United Kingdom Ambassador reported Dr. Fawzi as being not unsympathetic. Mr. Trevelyan does not expect an early or very favourable response from Egypt but foresees the possibility that Egypt may eventually be prepared to explore the proposals, depending on the Israeli reaction. The State Department does not intend to press the matter unduly.

12. The Egyptian news services are reported by our Embassy in Cairo to have taken a firm and increasingly critical stand against the proposals as reflecting too much the Israeli point of view. Public reaction in Lebanon has been cool but not fanatically hostile and responsible papers have urged that the proposals should not be rejected without careful consideration. The Lebanese and Syrian press have now virtually ceased comment pending official leads and the tone of the Jordan press has been moderate, probably at official request. Our Chargé d'Affaires in Beirut has expressed the opinion that the apparent deliberate imprecision of Mr. Dulles' statement seems to have had the beneficial effect of obliging the Arabs to commit themselves prematurely on specific points of controversy.

13. We understand that the Pakistan Minister to Syria, Jordan and Lebanon has privately urged the Syrian Government to study Mr. Dulles' statement carefully and to submit counter-proposals, if necessary, rather than reject the plan. He may speak similarly to the Governments of Lebanon and Jordan. The former Prime Minister of Syria, who recently resigned, told the United States Ambassador that he personally thought that Mr. Dulles' reference to repatriation of refugees represented a considerable step forward. He expressed the personal opinion that moderate Arab leaders should remember that it is dangerous to believe that time is on the Arab side in the dispute with Israel. He thought that the frontier between Israel and Syria would be relatively easy to adjust and that, if Jordan and Israel should negotiate a separate frontier agreement, other Arab states would probably not object. The Deputy Foreign Minister of Lebanon informed the United Kingdom Embassy that the Lebanese Cabinet's initial reaction to Mr. Dulles' statement was favourable. He regretted the hasty, unofficial condemnation which was published in the Syrian press.

14. The Canadian Chargé d'Affaires in Tel Aviv reports that Israeli officials are not likely to comment publicly on the Dulles statement until the new government is formed. He states that the preliminary reaction at the Foreign Ministry was to regard the pronouncement as an improvement on any which had previously come from the West. They entertain misgivings, however, over the following aspects:

- (a) The establishment of permanent frontiers and settlement of the refugee problem as a condition for a Western security guarantee;
- (b) The mention of border changes, which would possibly involve the Negev;
- (c) Payment of compensation to Arab refugees without consideration of Israeli counter claims and without definite assurance that the money would be used for permanent resettlement of the refugees outside Israel;
- (d) The reference to the possible repatriation of some refugees.

It is probable that Israel will eventually seek clarification from the United States on these and other points.

15. The Israeli press, with the exception of extremist organs, has guardedly recognized the statement as an effort to promote peace, which warrants careful consideration. It has also reflected misgivings, however, about the points mentioned above and has tended to be critical of the fact that the proposals were made publicly. Several newspapers have interpreted Mr. Dulles' passing reference to the Jerusalem question as an indication of a possible future revision of the United Nations resolution on Jerusalem.

16. The State Department are satisfied with the initial responses to Mr. Dulles' speech.

Canadian Attitude

17. The Canadian Press generally gave cautious approval to the speech, while recognizing the great difficulties in the way of solving the Arab-Israeli dispute. The Dulles proposals were regarded as a serious and earnest effort to bring about peace in the Middle East.

18. If you wish Canadian support to be given to the United States proposals, you may prefer that this should be done privately. This method would have greater impact, since a considerable time will have elapsed since the United States and United Kingdom statements. It might also be advisable in view of the not too favourable press reactions in the Middle East. There are, moreover, to be taken into account, when considering a public statement, the implications of the proposed international loan to Israel and the border guarantees. While private support would appear to be the most effective method of exercising influence, and of avoiding trouble, this should not preclude a public statement, if at a press conference on your projected voyage, a question were asked. Notes† in the form of a question and answer have been prepared for you and are annexed to this memorandum.<sup>22</sup>

ISRAEL-EGYPT RELATIONS

In his conversation with Mr. Sharett in Washington, Mr. Dulles put strongly to him the United States view that Israel would have to make some territorial concession as the Israeli price for a settlement. He said that, if Israel agreed in principle, the United States would at a later stage attempt to enlist as much support as possible in favour of negotiations, and he thought from recent reports that the chances of the Arab leaders agreeing were good. He has told Mr. Sharett he hopes to see him again on December 6th after his visit to Canada, in order to receive his answer. You will note from the attached telegram† that Mr. Dulles seems to have gone farther even than Sir Anthony Eden in his suggestions for a solution.

2. My tentative thinking is that the time has come to try to convince the Israelis of the following:

- (a) The Western powers cannot force the Arabs to make peace at Israeli terms, thereby running the risk of driving them into the Soviet camp;
- (b) War is no solution. Even if the Israelis were able decisively to defeat the Arabs, the latter would probably not make peace and would bide their time until they were strong enough for revenge;
- (c) Israel's only hope is to try to negotiate a settlement, even if it involves some territorial concession, although no-one would expect Israel's territory to be "truncated." Israel's only chance of surviving is by making itself into an indispensable part of the economy of the Middle East;
- (d) The so-called "abstract" concession of the Arabs — the recognition of Israel — in fact carries with it very great practical advantages for Israel;
- (e) The West will not permit Israel to be exterminated as the result of an aggressive war, but would not countenance an Israeli preventive war;

Pearson indicated Canadian support for Dulles' proposals in his discussion with Nasser. See Document 568.

(f) The economic suffocation of Israel is likely to result if peace is not made. Israel cannot continue indefinitely to depend on outside economic help.

3. Mr. Dulles has not asked for our support, but I wonder if you think it might be worthwhile to mention some of the above points to Mr. Sharet, provided, of course, you agreed with this analysis. Even if they were put in a most general way they might help to convince him that we share in the United Kingdom and United States views that both sides must make concessions in order to achieve the only possible solution — a negotiated peace.<sup>23</sup>

[Ottawa], July 1, 1955

In the two conferences I have had with the Egyptian Foreign Minister during his visit to Ottawa, he brought up one or two political questions on which I should report.

1. On the general situation he agrees that there has been some easing of tension lately, but that we should be cautious. Egypt recognizes the communist imperialist threat and is strongly anti-communist, but is unable to take part in collective defence arrangements against communist aggression because of the Palestine situation and Middle East difficulties generally. In this regard, however, the recent settlement of the Suez question with the British represented a great step forward and removed one important source of division between Egypt and her Western friends.<sup>24</sup>

2. Dr. Fawzi deplored the Turkish-Iraqi Pact as cutting across and interfering with wider and, he thought, more important Arab collective security arrangements.<sup>25</sup> It would have been far better, in his opinion, for delay in peripheral security arrangements in that part of the world until these more far-reaching plans could have matured. However, he recognized that they were now confronted with a fait accompli and, therefore, the Egyptian Government should do what it could to correct the situation. By this I gather he meant bring Iraq back into the Arab field and eventually possibly Turkey, though he felt that any security agreement with Turkey at this time was impossible. Dr. Fawzi, while regretful of these developments, expressed no bitterness or resentment, and spoke more in sorrow than in anger at what he considered to be, from the Egyptian and, indeed, from a broader point of view, an unfortunate and premature development.

3. Palestine. We had a long and frank talk about Palestine. He takes a very serious view of the situation and feels that if something is not done to improve it there is a real danger of war. The Arab states have 45 millions of people who are getting stronger economically and politically, and they are, without exception, adamant in their refusal to recognize the State of Israel in its present form and under present conditions.

I told Dr. Fawzi that I had in the past taken a view about Palestine which I realized had not made me very popular with Arab States. I felt, and still feel, that some form of Jewish state was essential. However, the past should not be allowed to confuse and determine the future, and the question, therefore, now was what could be done to remove the danger of war in that area. I asked him if he would give me his own views on this question. He said that he would answer my question in two ways, one formally and the other frankly. The first answer is the kind he would have to give in public, namely that there could be no peace until Israel accepted the United Nations resolutions. He realized, however, that this was not a feasible or practical proposition, and that no settlement could be reached on that basis, so he came to his second answer to my question, which, if he were taxed publicly with it, he would deny and disavow.

Two things had to be done before there could be any prospect of a negotiated settlement with Israel. First, the claims of the Palestine refugees to full compensation for material damage would have to be admitted and met. They also had a legitimate claim to non-material damage through having been evicted from their homes and their fatherland, but this, he realized, could not be met. The most satisfactory course would be to have the State of Israel pay full compensation, but if this could not be done then the United Nations should accept some part of the obligation. It would be a small price to pay for peace. Second, there would have to be a territorial adjustment in the south by which, I gather, Dr. Fawzi meant that Transjordan or Saudi Arabia would have to be given some part of the Negeb to link up with Egypt. He admitted that this would be difficult for Israel to accept, but he felt that it would surely not be too great a price to pay for peace and security. Israel in the long run would be a far better and stronger state without this territory, but without also the implacable hostility of her neighbours which, in the long run, would weaken and destroy her.

I told Dr. Fawzi that I thought that his approach was wise and moderate. He would recognize, of course, that concessions of this kind would be difficult for the Israeli Government to make and might result in extremists taking over if they were attempted. Dr. Fawzi felt that this was true, and yet with the proper kind of leadership the Israeli people might be brought around. I then asked him what would be the chances of public opinion in Egypt and the other Arab states accepting this solution, which fell short of their public demands. He thought it could be done and the fact that extremists on both sides would be angered might make it easier.

He hoped that we would do anything that we could here to advance the cause of a settlement in Palestine, and he did not seem to think that our past attitude on this problem disqualified us in any way from exercising the right kind of influence. He said that Canadian views always commanded respect because of their sincerity and objectivity!

Dr. Fawzi expressed admiration for the work that General Burns was doing in Palestine. He said that he had won a deserved reputation for impartiality and honesty.

Dr. Fawzi hinted that it would be a good thing if I could speak to Dulles and Macmillan along the above lines and impress on them that a solution for the difficulties in Palestine must soon be found or there would be serious trouble.

4. We also talked about trade problems during which Dr. Fawzi expressed the hope that we might make progress in this field to the advantage of both countries. He realized that the possibilities of a big trade were not great, but he thought that there could be improvement. He also hoped that Canadian capital might find it worth while to invest in Egyptian development projects, possibly in joint schemes with Egyptians.

He was particularly anxious that we should co-operate in the development of atomic energy for civilian purposes. His visit to Chalk River had obviously made a great impression on him and he hoped that we would be able to make some of our knowledge in this field available to Egyptian scientists. He said that he had mentioned to Mr. Howe the possibility of sending two Egyptians to Chalk River for the above purpose. He was not thinking of a Canadian gift of a reactor to Egypt, so much as of the possibility that Canada might co-operate with and assist the Egyptian Government in the latter's plans to build one.

The Egyptian Foreign Minister was loud and obviously genuine in his praise of the friendly reception he had received in Ottawa. In his turn he has made a very good impression on all with whom he came into contact. He is a moderate, wise and honest person and if his views prevailed in Arab policies, we would have far more ground for optimism over developments in that part of the world than is at present warranted.

EGYPTIAN-CANADIAN RELATIONS
(GENERAL, COMMERCIAL, EXPORT OF ARMS, IMMIGRATION)

General

A Canadian Government Trade Commissioner has been serving in Egypt since 1930. An Egyptian Consul-General was appointed in Ottawa in 1950 and the Consulate-General was raised to the rank of Embassy in August 1954. Mr. H.M. El-Hakeem, who had been Consul-General, became Chargé d'Affaires. The first Egyptian Ambassador to Canada,

Mr. El-Husseini El-Khatib, presented his credentials on May 3, 1955. Mr. Kirkwood, as first Canadian Ambassador to Egypt, presented his credentials to Colonel Nasser in Cairo on December 27, 1954. Concurrently with his appointment as Ambassador of Canada in Egypt Mr. Kirkwood is Minister to Lebanon but his main residence is in Cairo.

You will recall that during the political uncertainty consequent upon the abdication of King Farouk and the Anglo-Egyptian dispute over the Suez Canal base, the Canadian Trade Commissioner, Mr. J.M. Boyer, lost his life in riots which occurred in Cairo on January 26, 1952.<sup>26</sup> The riots were primarily anti-British but they also demonstrated the lack of control of the Nahas Pasha Government. Due compensation was paid to the Canadian Government by the Egyptian Government in December 1954, after more stable conditions had been brought about by the signing of the Anglo-Egyptian agreement on the Suez Canal Base (1953) [sic] and the assumption of power in Egypt by the Council for the Revolutionary Command under the then Premier General Naguib.

Canadian relations with Egypt have never been intimate, and have been complicated since the war by Canadian support in the United Nations of the establishment of the state of Israel. While Canada is, therefore, generally considered to be pro-Israeli, no particular rancour appears to have been directed against us. Apart from this factor, Canada is considered by the Egyptians to be a country with no special axe to grind in the Near East and with a past free of colonial stains.

The only other form in which the Egyptians might believe Canada was following a policy inimicable to them is in North Africa. You will recall that Canada, with all the other NATO countries, was informed by the Egyptians that NATO was supporting the repression of the Arabs in French North Africa. This was not, however, followed up, and is hardly likely to be raised during your visit.

Commercial Relations

Trade between Canada and Egypt is regulated by an Exchange of Notes of December 3, 1952, constituting an Agreement for the exchange of most-favoured-nation treatment.<sup>27</sup>

Canada enjoys a substantial balance of trade with Egypt. Major exports to Egypt have included wheat and wheat flour, automobiles and accessories (including tires), asbestos, newsprint, pharmaceutical products, and aluminum in primary form. Main imports have been raw cotton, paddy rice, and onions and other vegetables. Figures for the years 1950-54, inclusive, and for the first six months of 1954 and 1955 are as follows:

Year	Exports to Egypt	Imports from Egypt
1950	$ 3,716,105	$ 659,029
1951	2,465,518	711,365
1952	19,362,991	461,581
1953	11,688,156	4,202,667
1954	1,200,751	440,290
First 6 months 1954	685,127	278,992
First 6 months 1955	721,577	239,208

It will be noted that in 1952 and 1953 Canada exported an abnormally large value of goods to Egypt. This was largely due to the sale of wheat. Egypt has been traditionally a purchaser of Australian type of wheat. However, in 1953 Canada sold 13 million bushels as the result of tenders. Egypt will be calling tenders for wheat in the near future, but Canada is not hopeful of selling in that market for the following reasons:

- (1) Iron Curtain countries have offered to exchange wheat for cotton and rice;
- (2) Egypt may obtain wheat from the United States through its disposal programme;
- (3) Australia and France are quoting extremely low prices.

The unusually large value of imports to Canada during 1953 was almost completely due to a large purchase of Egyptian cotton. The price of Egyptian cotton more recently has been out of line with other sources of supply. However, during September 1955 the Egyptian Government revamped its exchange control system and removed the seven percent export tax on cotton. This may stimulate additional imports into Canada.

Export of Arms

A limited supply of aircraft engines, spares and other parts have been exported from Canada to Egypt. We recently sold to Egypt a number of Harvard training aircraft. A month ago, however, we requested Canadair to refrain from responding to Egyptian requests for quotations on Sabre jet aircraft, partly because of the serious clashes at the Gaza Strip and partly because the supply of a considerable number of swept-wing jets might well have upset the balance of arms strength in the area. Even the RAF bases in the Middle East were not equipped with swept-wing aircraft. France, however, has undertaken to supply Israel with some Mystère jet aircraft.

Canadian policies respecting the sale of arms to Middle Eastern countries may have to be reviewed when more is known about the United States and United Kingdom reactions to the Egyptian deal with Czechoslovakia.<sup>28</sup> Attached is an appendix† listing the main items sold by Canada to Egypt and Israel during the past two years.

Immigration

As a rule, largely because of a lack of facilities for the security screening of persons wishing to immigrate into Canada from Egypt (a reason not disclosed to applicants nor presumably to the Egyptian authorities), no encouragement is given to such immigration. Exceptions to this general rule are made in the case of persons for whom security screening is not required (for example, British subjects) and those for whom security screening is usually waived (for example, wives of residents in Canada). These regulations greatly restrict the number of possible immigrants from among Egyptians proper, although they are not for immigration purposes classed as Asians. Applicants are usually told that no facilities exist for their immigration into Canada.

Recently the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees (UNRWA), which has its headquarters in Beirut, informally approached our Legation there with a view to ascertaining confidentially whether Canada would be prepared to accept a limited number (about 500) of selected Arab refugees as immigrants. Canada has already contributed about $4 million for Palestine relief.<sup>29</sup> The refugees earmarked for Canada would be chosen on a highly selective basis. It is understood that the United States has decided to support the programme. UNRWA's proposal has been referred to the Department of Citizenship and Immigration for their consideration.

Cairo, November 11, 1955

CONVERSATION WITH COLONEL GAMAL ABDEL NASSER,
 PRIME MINISTER OF EGYPT, CAIRO, NOVEMBER 10, 1955, 7.00 P.M.

I spent an hour with Colonel Nasser last night (7.00-8.00), having previously discussed international matters, especially North Africa and Israel, with the Foreign Minister for twenty minutes. Nothing very significant developed in the talk with Mahmoud Fawzi, who was as friendly and courteous as ever. He said how very glad he was that I was in Cairo, gave me a personality sketch of his Prime Minister (a plain, blunt, but very sincere and honest soldier-patriot), and underlined the seriousness of the deterioration of relations between Israel and the Arab States, in the face, as he put it, of the aggressive military attitude and strength of the former. He thought, however, that the very seriousness of the situation might assist in finding a solution, if the United States and the United Kingdom showed understanding and wisdom, and if Israel did not force all-out war.

I found Colonel Nasser quite as impressive and attractive a personality as I had been told he was. He is certainly plain and blunt in words, but friendly and modest in manner. He gives an impression of sincerity and strength, without any trace of arrogance or self-assertion. He said, of course, that he was a man of peace, "as every decent soldier is", and that his great ambition was to work for Egypt's social progress and economic development. But national security came first and, therefore, because of Israel's aggressive attitude, he had had to divert resources, meant for peaceful development, to defence. If he had not done so, public opinion would have forced him to. I merely said that it was a tragedy for Egypt, as it would have been for any country, that this was felt to be necessary.

The Prime Minister then went into the history, in detail, of the recent controversial arms transactions. He said that it was necessitated by the aggressive attitude and the boasted military superiority of Israel, with all the resources of Zionism, especially United States Zionism, behind it.

He had warned Washington and London that he could not remain passive in these circumstances, that he would prefer to get arms from them, but that if this were not possible, he would secure them from behind the "iron curtain". He claimed that the United Kingdom and, particularly, the United States (who always put the interests of Israel ahead of the Arab States, because of Jewish power and wealth and influence there), thought that he was "bluffing". Their surprise and violent reaction when the transaction was announced, therefore, was more because their "bluff" was called than because they had not had any knowledge of such a possibility.

I ventured to give Colonel Nasser my own view that the United States and United Kingdom were far less prejudiced in favour of Israel than he thought, and that I was sure that they tried to follow an impartial policy in these matters. We knew from our own experience in Canada that Israeli requests for arms which would add to their present level of offensive strength were turned down in the three capitals, in spite of great pressure exercised on their behalf. That pressure would now be much greater and more difficult to resist. But where would an arms race get us? Egypt felt herself threatened and weak — therefore she strengthened her armaments for security. No one could object to that in principle, but the result was that Israel would then feel insecure (especially because of the refusal of the Arab States to recognize her existence) and in her turn would get more arms. Then Egypt had to catch up again. Where would it all end?

Colonel Nasser agreed that it was a very unfortunate and even dangerous development, but what could Egypt do?

This gave me an opportunity to ask whether the Arab States would recognize the existence of a State of Israel on any terms. He said that they would. I said that then it becomes a problem of political negotiation to agree on terms. Such agreement would give them far more security than communist arms. I then asked him what were their basic conditions for recognition.

He said the United Nations partition resolutions of 1947.<sup>30</sup> I reminded him that the Arab States had already gone to war against these and that, in any case, it was quite unrealistic to go back to them now. After a word or two with Fawzi, the Prime Minister said that the U.N. Resolutions of 1948 (the Bernadotte proposals?) were what he had in mind.<sup>31</sup>

I asked him about the Dulles proposals of August which, I said, my government thought wise and sensible and would support as the basis for a solution.<sup>32</sup> He said that they were too general, but he agreed that the points mentioned by Dulles were the ones that had to be settled. First of all, boundaries, where there would have to be important changes, and secondly, refugees. Nasser insisted that the Arab refugees would not agree to be settled in any place except Palestine. They had tried unsuccessfully to persuade some to settle in Egypt. He also stated that Arabs were still fleeing from Israel because of the unjust and discriminatory treatment they received there. When I expressed some scepticism about this, he insisted that Arabs in Israel were "second-class" citizens only.

I asked the Prime Minister about the possibilities of practical co-operation between Israel and the Arab States, particularly in such a project as the Johnston Irrigation Scheme.<sup>33</sup> Colonel Nasser said that this was a good project and would benefit the Arab States, but that no Arab would believe, in the present circumstances of fear and hatred, that it was not designed to favour Israel. He felt that the Johnston proposals could not be implemented until the political situation was better.

Colonel Nasser more than once mentioned Israel's aggressive military actions, breaches of the truce, etc., and claimed that Egyptian forces had shown great patience and discipline. He said that he was having increased difficulty in holding back the army in the face of these provocations.

I told Colonel Nasser that while there were extremists in Israel, as in all countries, there were also moderate men there doing their best to avoid extreme courses and working for a fair and agreed settlement. I thought that Mr. Sharett was one of these, and Colonel Nasser agreed. He blamed Mr. Ben Gurion, however, for much of Israel's new aggressiveness and for trying to force a solution on the basis of recognition of the present boundaries.

Colonel Nasser was interested in my trip to Russia and this gave me a chance not only to mention Russia's power and expansive strength, but the danger of encouraging her in the old Russian designs against the Mediterranean and the Middle East. These designs, which were historic, could mean no good for Egypt, especially when Russian imperialism could use international communism to stir up trouble and further its ends. I said that I thought that these designs were very much in Moscow's minds when they offered military and diplomatic assistance to Egypt and the other Arab States; that "he who supped with the devil", etc.

Colonel Nasser said that these considerations were very much in his mind, but he thought that they could avoid the dangers I had mentioned. In any event, what was the alternative? I repeated, "An agreed political solution", and I assured him that every nation which desired peace would be glad to assist in bringing it about.

I confess that my talk did not give me any reason for undue optimism as to the possibility of such a solution being found in the immediate future.

CONVERSATION WITH THE FOREIGN MINISTER OF ISRAEL

1. Mr. Sharett called today and I had a conversation lasting almost an hour and a half with him during which time we thoroughly reviewed the problems of the Middle East. He presented his case forcibly and clearly but with not even the slightest indication of a readiness to compromise on any of the major issues at dispute with the Arab States.

2. I started out by explaining the reasons why I was unable to go to Israel on my way back from the Far East which he seemed thoroughly to understand, and reiterated his invitation to visit Israel if another occasion should present itself. He said he was grateful for the invitation to come to Canada and particularly for our courtesy in making an aircraft available.

3. Mr. Sharett then asked me if there was anything I could tell him about the conversations I had had with the Egyptian Prime Minister in Cairo.<sup>34</sup> I gave him a fairly detailed account, telling him of the good and indeed charming impression which Nasser made on one. I said that Dr. Fawzi had spoken well of Mr. Sharett, with whom he is an old acquaintance. (Fawzi was before the war Egyptian Consul General in Jerusalem). But when it came to the political discussions Nasser advanced the usual intractable Egyptian case — that is, territorial concessions on the basis of the 1947 resolution and the repatriation of refugees. When I pointed out to him that this was clearly out of the domain of the possible, he said he meant the 1948 Bernadotte proposals. I then told him that unless they are prepared to recognize the existence of the State of Israel the only logical alternative seemed to be war, and Nasser answered that he would not launch an aggressive war. He had told me that one of the reasons why the refugees were hesitant about the repatriation to Israel was because of the bad treatment those Arabs who remained there received, to the extent that many of them were still escaping.

4. Mr. Sharett was obviously nettled by the reference to the situation of the Arabs in Israel and hastened to assure me that materially the position of the Arabs was better now than during the Mandate. He said that they had their own schools and mosques paid for by the government, that illiteracy had almost been stamped out and that there were 8 Arabs in the Knesset where the Arabic language was permitted and indeed simultaneous translations were arranged. He added that proportionately they paid lower taxes than the Jewish members of the Community but said that he realized that nevertheless their position psychologically was unhappy because they were a minority in a land to which they had no loyalty. From this he went on to point out how impossible it would be for Israel to take back a large number of refugees and, apart from the security problem, there was simply no place where they could be resettled. He said however that Israel was ready to pay compensation for their lands and to help in their resettlement in the Arab countries as part of a general settlement.

5. Mr. Sharett then turned to the question of Prime Minister Nasser and his attitude. He said that Nasser talked in a reasonable way to Western statesmen but that he and his government and the Arab press were constantly ranting against Israel and stirring up opinion for the obliteration of the new state. He said he thought that Nasser would like to see Israel cease to exist and I agreed that was probably his ultimate desideratum, but I thought this was simply the highest bargaining point, and that he would be prepared to negotiate. When Nasser talked of territorial concessions what he meant in fact was the Negev, and that also seemed to be what Sir Anthony Eden had in mind when he made his Mansion House speech.<sup>35</sup> Israel could not understand why we should entertain any consideration for the Arab desire to link up Egypt and Jordan through the Negev. The two countries were not joined geographically during the British Mandate and there was no particular reason why there should be geographical continuity. There were no lines of transportation through the Negev and even if there were they were hardly likely to be used. One could just as well claim that Israel interrupted the geographical contiguity between Egypt and the Lebanon. The Negev therefore is of no real use to Egypt.

6. It is however of desperate importance for Israel. In it there may well be important mineral deposits, oil and other resources badly needed by the small state. But most of all it contains the Red Sea port of Elath which the Israelis hope to develop in order to build up their commerce with Southeast Asia. It is not only a great deal quicker to ship from Israel via Elath but they also in this way hope to avoid paying tolls in the Suez Canal, not to mention the Egyptian blockade. In addition it seemed to the Israelis absurd that anyone should think of detaching the Negev from them when this was the only part of Israel which was firmly given to them in the 1947 resolution. Incidentally, he added, were we sure what the Jordanian reaction would be if Galilee were to be taken from Jordan and turned over to Israel as would be the case if the Bernadotte proposals were implemented.

7. Mr. Sharett then returned to Sir Anthony Eden's proposals and said that, as I knew, they had not been well received in Israel. The reason was, first, because it implied that big territorial concessions would have to be made by Israel, and because he put himself forward as a mediator, though this was a minor point. The Israelis knew that the Foreign Office was by tradition pro-Arab and they suspected that this proposal was made in order to retain some British prestige among the Arabs. The Americans, he said, were much more understanding of the position of Israel.

8. I then asked Mr. Sharett what would be the concessions which Israel would be prepared to make in order to get an overall settlement. He said they would be prepared to consider territorial adjustments — that is, the correction of injustices in the frontier —, the payment of compensation for refugees and an increase in the repatriation of divided families, and the grant of transit rights to the Arabs — to Jordan for free access to the port of Haifa, and to Egypt and Lebanon, the passage of trains and aircraft through Israeli territory, though they would want reciprocity.

9. I asked him if it was not possible for Israel to consider giving some satisfaction to the Egyptians about the Negev even if it only took the form of free transit rights, which might be maintained by an international force. He at once poured scorn on this proposal saying, what kind of a corridor? a tunnel? or a viaduct? This he added, might be put forward as a Canadian proposal! I argued a little bit with him on this point but found him so completely unbending that I decided there was no point in pursuing this, particularly as Mr. Dulles had already pushed him pretty hard when he was in Washington.<sup>36</sup>

10. Mr. Sharett then turned to the question of the Czech-Egyptian arms deal.<sup>37</sup> He said that this had completely altered the situation, that Egypt, which already had had a clear superiority over Israel in arms, would now have an overwhelming superiority and in the most up to date equipment. It was imperative that Israel get the means to defend itself. He did not mean that they want to have an absolutely equal number of tanks and aeroplanes but that they must be able to match the Egyptians in the modernity of their weapons. He said that so long as the proclaimed Egyptian aim was to drive the Israelis into the sea, they could not possibly consider their country secure unless they received adequate arms, and this was a question he had raised with Mr. Dulles. He then went on to refer to the fact that Canada, though not a major supplier of arms for Israel, nevertheless had sold them an important quantity of matériel, and he hoped we would be able to approve the requests which had been outstanding with us for some little time. He referred particularly to the stepping-up in the delivery period of the Browning machine guns and the authorization for the purchase of anti-aircraft guns and anti-tank guns. I told him that we would look into this immediately and thought we should be able to give him some satisfaction.<sup>38</sup> He did not ask for any additional weapons but he has laid the arguments before us in the event that they do wish to ask us later for more modern matériel.

11. Mr. Sharett said he was sorry he had not been able to talk to me before I saw Nasser, because he would have asked me to tell the Egyptian Prime Minister that if he did not stop the infiltrations and raids into Israel, they would have to react strongly and there might be serious trouble. I said that, in fact, Nasser had told me almost exactly the same thing. He had said: "Tell your Israeli friends that if they don't stop making provocative raids on Egyptian territory, we will have to take strong measures." I asked him if a wider neutral zone would not help, and he answered in the negative. The real menace was the Egyptian "commando" who stuck deep into Israeli territory, operating often from Syrian or Lebanese bases. He also said that many of their new settlements were near the border and could not be sacrificed.

12. As regards his estimate of the relative position of the two countries in arms, I said Nasser had told me just the opposite — that his country was weak and felt itself menaced by Israel's superiority. Mr. Sharett's answer implied that the Egyptians were trying to mislead us.

13. We then got on to a discussion of Russian affairs and intentions during which I gave him some of my impressions from the trip to the U.S.S.R. Mr. Sharett said that he agreed entirely with my impression that the Soviet leaders did not wish to launch an aggressive war, but at least in part because of their psychological makeup and their isolation from the outside world, they might react in unforeseen ways to Western actions. He was skeptical of Nasser's assurance that he was able to handle the Russians if they attempted to infiltrate into Egypt and I told him that this intrusion of the U.S.S.R. into the Middle East was also one of the disturbing recent developments. It was clearly part of the traditional Russian drive to get into that part of the world, and was only partly Communist in origin.

14. We parted with his sincere thanks for all Canada had done for the State of Israel, with particularly warm remarks about your sympathetic attitude and the role of General Burns in attempting to maintain the Armistice.

TURCO-IRAQI PACT<sup>39</sup>

The arrival of your despatch under reference coincided with a request from the United States Embassy here that we express ourselves in the NATO Council in favour of the Turco-Iraqi Pact. The United States Government expects that the Pact will shortly be presented formally to the Council at which time the United States will welcome it warmly and express the hope that other Middle East states will either join the Pact or otherwise direct their policies toward its aims.

2. The United Kingdom representative on the Council should also welcome the Pact. The United Kingdom apparently participated in the drafting of the agreement and is expected to accede to it; at the same time the United Kingdom will conclude a supplementary agreement with Iraq concerning the air bases at Habbaniya and Shaiba.

3. Thus far little has been heard from France on the subject of the Pact. The French probably resent that their interests in Syria and Lebanon have not qualified them for a greater share in the informal consultations which have accompanied the negotiation of the Pact. It will be interesting to see how the French representative reacts when the Pact is presented to the NATO Council.

4. We believe that the Turco-Iraqi Pact is a modest beginning in what may be a tortuous development toward a system of collective security in the Middle East and that the Turks should be given credits for the initiative they have taken. Consistent with the attitude we adopted last July toward the Balkan Treaty, we regard the Turco-Iraqi Pact as advantageous to NATO but since the area concerned is even farther removed from our main defence interests than the Balkans we would wish our words of welcome to be reserved in tone and to leave no doubt about our continuing understanding that none of these treaties or pacts in any way involves an automatic extension of our obligations under the North Atlantic Treaty.

5. At the same time it would be a mistake to read too much into the Pact as it stands or to ignore its potentially disruptive effects. Until the defence organization begins to take shape, by the accession of further states to the Pact and the conclusion of specific military agreements, it is hardly likely to produce stability in the area. The signing of the Pact has already driven Egypt and some of its followers further away from the path of cooperation with the West, to some extent reversing the trend which the conclusion of the Anglo-Egyptian Agreement on the Suez Canal Base began.<sup>40</sup> In time, however, the breach between Iraq and Egypt may be bridged and the latter be better disposed to work for the aims of the Pact.

6. Perhaps even more important has been the increased sense of isolation which the Pact and particularly the annexed exchange of letters have produced in Israel. The Israelis have stressed their belief that the Pact will serve to harden Arab resistance to negotiating a peace in Palestine, because psychologically the Arabs will now be encouraged to believe that the West will support them against Israel. The Israelis also have expressed fear that Turkey will support the Arabs in their attempt to secure the implementation of United Nations resolutions which Israel regards as obsolete and impracticable. The resulting anxiety and frustration in Israel are likely to produce pressures upon the Government to take independent action to solve its difficulties. The Gaza incident is perhaps a sample of that kind of action.<sup>41</sup>

7. We are not sure that Turkey can provide the kind of leadership which the situation in the Arab world demands, even if she can rely on the support of Iraq and Pakistan. The likelihood of further Arab accessions to the Pact appears remote at the moment. On the other hand, Iran will probably join either the Turco-Iraqi Pact or the Turco-Pakistan Pact,<sup>42</sup> once its Government succeeds in stabilizing the domestic situation.

8. Perhaps most important for Canada is the fact that the Middle East lies outside our real defence interests and the commitments we would be willing to accept. However much we might welcome on general security grounds a widening of the defence associations of the free world, we should not like to encourage others to believe that our attitude toward these developments implied a willingness to extend Canada's own commitments. The opposite is true and our statements on the subject should leave no doubt about it.

9. In the circumstances which this telegram summarizes we should be prepared to offer words of welcome to the Turco-Iraqi Pact when it is formally submitted to the Council. We propose to tell the United States authorities that we shall do so. You may associate yourself with the remarks of other representatives who see the Pact as adding strength to the defences of the free world and who wish to acknowledge Turkey's contribution to this aim. If you think it appropriate you might accord some recognition to the difficulties which still have to be overcome before collective security can be effectively organized in the area, particularly in view of Arab-Israeli relations. You should include a tactful reference to our understanding that the Pact does not involve automatic extensions of our obligations under the North Atlantic Treaty.

10. We hope that this telegram will provide you with sufficient material to deal with this matter when it is raised in Council or during informal conversations among the NATO delegations. If further information is required please let us know.<sup>43</sup>

FREEDOM OF MOVEMENT<sup>1</sup>

The purpose of this message is to give you our preliminary thoughts on this question and to suggest a plan of action for solving what is a most unsatisfactory situation. I should like to receive from you as soon as possible your views on the action which we might take here.

A. Review of Evidence

2. Examination of the reports of the mobile teams which conducted investigations with respect to freedom of movement in several provinces indicates that the Commission would be on firm ground in recommending to the Democratic Republic authorities that the whole permit procedure be made more effective. The general picture to be obtained from the

For the complete text of the ceasefire agreement for Vietnam that the ICSC was to supervise, see United Kingdom, Parliamentary Papers, Cmd. 9239, Further Documents relating to the discussion of Indo-China at the Geneva Conference June 16-July 21, 1954, London: Her Majesty's Stationery Office, 1954, pp. 27-40.

conclusions of the various teams is that the procedure is cumbersome and ineffective insofar as it should facilitate the movement of people wishing to go south, that more permit offices are required, and that would-be evacuees, due to fear of reprisals, are reluctant to approach their communal authorities from whom they must obtain the initial letter of recommendation. Moreover, a letter from the Democratic Republic about the permit procedure suggests that there are some political texts in the granting of a permit. The reports from the teams also indicate that some permit offices at least may not be properly equipped to issue any large number of permits, that the administrative procedures are in some respects incomplete, and that there has been some apparent obstruction in their enquiries and some evidence that people wishing to see teams about going to the south are hindered from doing so. However, on the basis of our first examination of these reports I fear there might not be sufficient grounds for establishing conclusively at least in the Commission, that there has been a definite violation of the agreement by the Democratic Republic of Viet Nam on the permit procedure itself. This, however, is only part of the problem. There is practically no evidence that aid of any kind has been provided as the Democratic Republic authorities are required to do under the agreement and this, coupled with a procedure which implies a practical refusal to allow freedom of movement, creates a very strong presumption of non-compliance on their part. While the proof may not be fully convincing to the Poles and perhaps to the Indians in the Commission, before Western opinion and possibly the rest of South East Asia, the evidence which could be adduced would, in my opinion, probably carry general conviction. As it is possible that we may later have to refer the matter to the Geneva powers this, I think, is a significant point to bear in mind when examining the evidence available.

3. As you know, the Commission has also received through petitions a fund of detailed allegations against the Democratic Republic of Viet Nam about police and military obstruction to freedom of movement and to freedom of access to fixed and mobile teams. To some extent these petitions are offset by the larger volume of petitions which complain about the spreading false rumours and other forms of intimidation to force people to go to the south. These latter petitions are, of course, of great importance to the Polish Delegation, and they appear to have had some influence on the Indian Delegation. It is clear, however, that these latter petitions are in the nature of counter-claims and should not be allowed to confuse the main issue which must be dealt with first, e.g. whether or not people have been allowed to move. Why they wish to move, is another problem which we will have to insist, must be dealt with separately. I believe it might be possible for us to get Indian support on this point.

B. Recommendation

4. The reports from the teams, together with certain other relevant material, have been referred to the Freedoms Committee for a study of the general question of freedom of movement in North Viet Nam. It is expected that the committee may report soon after the middle of the month, when the Chairman and the Polish Ambassador will return to Hanoi. It seems likely, therefore, that a most important debate will arise in the Commission later this month. We have been giving some thought to the possible outcome of this debate and to the difficulties that may arise in endeavouring to obtain a sufficiently strong recommendation to both sides that, within a specified time limit — in view of the short time remaining before the expiration of the 300 days<sup>2</sup> — a fair, reasonable and effective exit permit procedure in both north and south should be established and that its application should be supervised by the Commission so that it can satisfy itself that the recommendation is in fact carried out.

5. My own view is that if the Commission addressed the recommendation also to the south at the same time, such complementary action might be conducive to obtaining more cooperation from both sides and we would be on sound ground in recommending to both sides steps which can be considered to be necessary for the effective implementation of Article 14(d) at this stage. Such an approach would involve the additional advantage that it might be easier for us to carry the Chairman with us. The Commission, in making its recommendation to the parties should indicate that it is seriously disturbed by current procedures, that reforms are urgently required and that no pressure to induce people to move or to stay in either zone should be exercised. Although the letter could not say that the Commission will check whether the recommendation is implemented, I feel that if a reasonable recommendation is put forward in a sufficiently strong manner, it will be quite clear that if compliance with it is not prompt and whole-hearted there will be further action by the Commission. The implication would be that the question might have to be referred to the Geneva powers. While at this stage no reference should be made in the letter to a report to the Geneva powers, I feel that we might attempt to secure agreement within the Commission that if the recommendation is not implemented within the time specified and if there was to be found reasonable evidence of non-compliance by either party, in view of the short time which would then be left before the end of the 300 day period, a report would have to be submitted forthwith to the Geneva powers without granting either party further delays for taking more effective or corrective steps. Such action would of course depend on the prospect of Indian support. Furthermore when the recommendation is made, I think we might suggest that the Commission call formally as a body on the Foreign Minister or Giap in the north and on the French High Command in the south to emphasize its importance and to stress the urgency of quick and adequate action being taken if the provisions of the agreement concerning freedom of movement are to be carried out within the time specified.

6. In view of the above, it seems to me that, in the first instance, the recommendation we should seek in the Commission about freedom of movement should recognize that the implementation must be left to the parties but that arrangements must be such that the Commission can effectively exercise control and supervision. The recommendation should cover the following points:

- (a) permit offices empowered to issue permits to go and live in the other zone should be established in each district,
- (b) all that an applicant would need to prove in order to obtain a permit would be that he had paid his normal taxes and no judicial proceedings were pending against him. No politi-

Au cours de cette période, les civils devaient être autorisés à passer librement d'une partie du Vietnam à l'autre, aux termes de l'article 14 (d).

The period, beginning July 22, 1954, during which opposing military forces were to complete the process of disengagement and regroupment under articles 2, 15(a) and 15(f) of the ceasefire agreement. During this period, civilians were to be allowed free passage from one part of Vietnam to the other under article 14(d).

cal or security tests whatever should be applied. On the other hand, there should be no intimidation, threats or coercion to induce people to move to the other zone,

(c) the permit should be valid until the end of the 300 day period. In the north, to go to Haiphong perimeter or to any point of embarkation, in the south, to go to Saigon or any point of embarkation,

(d) the permit should be made valid for whole families including unmarried children and relatives,

(e) heads of districts, villages or communes should be instructed to authorize meetings so that heads of families can discuss their plans freely,

(f) there should be no undue currency restrictions and no confiscation of property,

(g) aid should be provided in the form of food, transportation and medicaments when necessary, temporary shelters should also be arranged,

(h) these arrangements should be worked out within two to the three weeks at most.

(i) The recommended procedure should be given the widest possible publicity.

7. In order to enable the International Commission to exercise effective control, the following two points should be covered:

(a) each party should be required to provide bi-monthly returns of the people they have authorized and assisted to go to the other zone,

(b) mobile teams of the International Commission should visit some of the districts in which exit permit offices have been established, these teams should actively supervise the issuing of permits and the provision of assistance to those people who request help from the local authorities in order to go to another zone.

8. It is probable that some of the suggestions made in paragraphs 6 and 7 above may turn out to be impractical or unacceptable to the Commission or to the parties. These are matters for negotiation, but the essential point is that the procedure should be the same in both zones, simple and effective, there should be no pressure and the Commission should have an opportunity to control effectively its implementation.

9. Two main difficulties will arise in obtaining a recommendation suitable to all three delegations. Although the Chairman has given indications that he might on this issue take a strong stand, it is not unlikely that in accordance with his usual policy, he will wish the recommendation to be, from our point of view, unduly moderate so that it will not seriously embarrass the Democratic Republic of Viet Nam. In the light of the Commission's difficulties in getting full cooperation in the south it is clear that the Commission cannot only take the Democratic Republic of Viet Nam to task. Secondly the Polish Delegation although they may well agree to the principle of issuing a recommendation, will wish to make it excessively innocuous and to relate it to Article 14(c). Depending on the evidence submitted by the mobile teams which are investigating incidents in the south consideration might be given to a broader recommendation covering the whole of Article 14.

10. If the Indians refuse to endorse an adequate recommendation, we will find ourselves in a delicate position. The issue being a very important one, I should appreciate receiving your further guidance as to how far we should go in pressing for what we will consider a satisfactory solution and whether, failing to receive Indian support for this, we should press for a vote even if we are likely to find ourselves in a minority.

C. Control of Implementation

11. A recommendation from the Commission is, of course, only a first step. While the Geneva Agreement does not specifically require the Commission to follow up its recommendations, I think it is obviously necessary for the Commission to treat these recommendations in the same way as it treats the articles of the Geneva Agreement. Through its supervision and control the Commission must ensure that these recommendations are implemented. Assuming that the Democratic Republic of Viet Nam accepts the recommendation we will have to ensure, therefore, that appropriate follow-up action is taken.

12. If the Democratic Republic refuse to accept the recommendation this would, of course, be a very serious matter and would require a report to the Geneva Conference. The Democratic Republic of Viet Nam of course might accept the recommendation and express determination to carry it out, although in fact doing virtually nothing about it. Judging the performance of the Democratic Republic of Viet Nam would probably involve much the same problems of investigation and assessment as has already taken place with respect to freedom of movement. It would be as difficult to prove a violation of the agreement as it is on the basis of current evidence. If there were suddenly a rapid and significant increase in the number of permits issued and in the number of evacuees reaching the Haiphong perimeter, there would seem to be no doubt that the Democratic Republic had implemented the recommendation. However, if there were no increase in the flow of evacuees that in itself I do not think would be sufficient evidence on which to charge the Democratic Republic of Viet Nam that it had not implemented the recommendation. The Commission would have to find further evidence that the permit procedure was not working and that would-be evacuees were being denied freedom of movement. By the time a violation might be proved, the 300 day period would probably have expired (May 18).

13. If it became apparent that the Democratic Republic of Viet Nam were not implementing the recommendation after they had accepted it, the logical step, it seems to us at this stage, would appear to be a reference to the Geneva Conference. Should the Indians and Poles resist this action, the question of a split vote might again arise. In such circumstances, we would be faced also with a very difficult position. However, owing to the difficulties of proving a violation, it seems to me to be much more likely that the Commission could more easily agree to publicly explain its problem. This might be accomplished by inducing the Commission to make a further interim report of the Commission's activities to the co-chairmen. Such a procedure would have the advantage of disclosing to the co-chairmen and exposing to the world at large the efforts of the Commission to assist both sides in implementing the Geneva Agreement. The Commission might consider the issuance of this report within a fairly short period of time, perhaps immediately after its recommendation concerning freedom of movement is submitted to both parties. This would also provide an opportunity to acquaint the co-chairmen with the arrangements made since the first interim report to exercise closer supervision of the implementation of the military articles 15, 16, 17 and 18. From our particular point of view such an early report would make it easier for us, should there be indications that either party was not carrying out the recommendation

(a) to insist on the issue being brought to a vote if the Indians support us

(b) should the Indians hesitate to support us, then on the preparation of a further report to the co-chairmen.

14. I have already explained that if we try to obtain the type of recommendation which I consider necessary, there may well be a rather difficult debate. I have also indicated that it will likely be very difficult to obtain sufficient evidence to say that the Democratic Republic have not implemented a new recommendation. In both cases the outcome of the discussion will largely depend on the attitude of the Indian Delegation. While the ground might be prepared to some extent by a preliminary and informal approach here to the chairman it occurs to me that when the Commission reaches the stage of considering its recommendation the Canadian Government might see fit to approach the Indian authorities to impress upon them the importance we attach to the issuance of a strong recommendation and more particularly with the point that action should be taken quickly either to report a violation to the Geneva powers or at least to inform the co-chairmen of reluctance on the part of either party to carry it out in an effective and determined manner.

15. The whole issue is going to be one of timing and one of determining reluctance on the part of either side to carry out quickly the recommendation. It will not be easy to decide at what exact stage evidence will be adequate or to get our colleagues, and particularly the Indians, to agree on the nature of the evidence. If the Indians as hitherto intend to proceed step by step awaiting additional evidence before agreeing to another move, avoiding any suggestion which might involve embarrassment to the Democratic Republic authorities I fear that it will not be possible to compel the parties to take effective action before the end of the 300 day period. The Indians must, therefore, somehow, be persuaded to support a strong line or we must face the unpleasant choice of either joining them and the Poles in condoning what will amount to a violation of the agreement or of taking the risk of having to submit minority reports based on such evidence as is available either on this recommendation or on its implementation.

16. Your instructions are urgently required.

FREEDOM OF MOVEMENT — ATTITUDE OF THE INDIAN DELEGATION

1. There are 3 points to bear in mind concerning the attitude of the chairman here:
  - (a) he holds a rather aloof position and is reluctant to allow normal informal and private discussions between us. This may be due to his position as chairman and a desire to maintain an attitude of strict impartiality between the Pole and myself.
  - (b) on basic issues, his position, I think, is sometimes firm but on timing procedure and implementation he appears to consider himself very often simply as the arbiter between the Canadian and the Pole. He maintains a neutral position not always endeavouring initially to determine what might be a sensible practical solution to a given problem but looking often for a compromise position between Polish and Canadian views;
  - (c) he is inclined to make progress very slowly, to go very far in making compromises in the hope of obtaining Democratic Republic cooperation, to underestimate importance of freedom of movement issue for public opinion in the west, and of exerting pressure soon on the parties if 14(d) is to be implemented within 300 day period.

2. We can make informal approach here and overcome difficulties outlined in (a) above but it might be helpful if it were possible at the time suggested in our telegram under reference to impress Indian Government and, through them, chairman with desirability, as critical stage is approaching, of taking a more positive line and of pressing for an early and determined effort by the parties to implement 14(d). It would be important, however, if any representations are made in New Delhi that New Delhi and the chairman should not be advised that the move was made at my suggestion.

3. It occurs to me that difficulties might be avoided if United Kingdom and possibly other governments having close relations with India, without referring to any detailed plans, were at the appropriate time to express in New Delhi, (a) concern over the lack of progress in implementing 14(d), (b) a desire to have commission exert more pressure on the parties and more effective control over the implementation of this as well as other articles, (c) wish for an assurance that 300 day period will not be allowed to elapse without the Geneva powers being advised in timely fashion if there are grounds for considering that the provisions of 14(d) may not be carried out.

4. You might then take the initiative of raising the matter in New Delhi suggesting that, in the light of representations received, instructions to your commissioner were under consideration and that some consultation between 2 governments might be desirable. It might even be possible to add, bearing in mind the Chairman's characteristics mentioned in paragraph 1(b) above, that as commissioners have to be given some discretion and must maintain vis-à-vis each other quasi independence, instructions could be issued without reference to consultation between the two governments.

5. I would be glad to learn whether you would agree this approach (2 groups corrupt) and whether you agree that any such moves should be made simultaneously here and in New Delhi.

FREEDOM OF MOVEMENT — INVESTIGATION AT BA-LANG

Mobile team reached Ba-Lang 12.30 on January 8, 5 days after departure from Hanoi, 9 days after Commission's decision to send a team.

2. Team was surrounded on arrival by about 500 individuals shouting and impossible to control. Team took refuge in Catholic mission compound and interviewed local priest who claims that clash took place on January 2 between refugees and soldiers. After this incident civilians involved took refuge in cathedral which was later surrounded and guarded for 6 days. These civilians were dispersed on morning of January 8. Priest further alleges that there are approximately 4,000 to 5,000 Catholics in parish and 90 percent wish to go south. Priest is under house arrest for having incited refugees to concentrate.

3. Team visited cathedral and 2 churches and found no concentration. It reports that refugees who clashed with the authorities were partially armed.

4. I take a very serious view of this incident. Team movements appear to have been delayed while local situation was being altered by force. It would also appear that in spite of concentration reported by team which carried out earlier investigation in the area no exit permits have been granted.

5. At meeting on January 10, I propose to press for investigation whether there was a concentration at Ba-Lang and under what circumstances it was dispersed.

6. If investigation should indicate that there was a concentration and that it was dispersed by force while departure and progress of team were being delayed, I consider that a clear defiance of the Commission is involved and that this represents a brazen attempt to defeat the purposes of the Commission. Under the circumstances, I would propose to recommend that a very strong protest be sent to the Democratic Republic authorities and that the matter should be reported to the co-chairmen. I would hope that it might be possible to get the Indians to agree with this proposed course of action but, should they hesitate, I feel that at this time and given the issue and its implications, we should consider forcing a vote and sending ourselves a special report to the co-chairmen.

7. I will naturally keep you informed of outcome of preliminary discussions in the Commission on this subject and, in particular, whether it will be possible to reach agreement on further investigation to be undertaken. In the meantime, I should appreciate receiving your views on the above course of action.

FREEDOM OF MOVEMENT

I agree entirely with the general proposals you have put forward for seeking further action by the Commission on this important subject. The outline of a recommendation for the Commission to make to the parties appears to be the best possible in the circumstances, and while there will still be plenty of opportunities for the Viet Minh to obstruct movement to the south and to evade their responsibilities under the agreement even if the recommendation is approved by the Commission, I think it is important that you should go forward with it as soon as the report from the Committee on Freedoms makes this possible.

2. With respect to future tactics on this matter, there are some general considerations which will have to be borne in mind in determining how far to go in pressing for acceptance of your recommendation. The freedom of movement question and the plight of the Christian in North Vietnam have a special appeal for the whole free world, and we naturally feel charged with a special responsibility on this issue. I anticipate some searching questions on the matter in Parliament. Nevertheless, important as the freedom of movement question is, your action on it may have to be considered in the context of the Commission's work in supervising the agreement as a whole. We must accept the fact that the Vietnam agreement is primarily a military armistice in which the political provisions were given a secondary position, and that the main purpose of the agreement is to maintain the cease fire and the military status quo; to keep the war from breaking out again. For this reason, therefore, in deciding what action you should take on the freedom of movement question, you have to estimate what effect a strong position taken by the Commission (if the Indians should agree to it) may have on the implementation by the DR of those military clauses of the agreement which have not yet been fully carried out (e.g. the evacuation of the Central Vietnam provisional assembly area by the Viet Minh). Furthermore an upset in the implementation of the main provisions of the Vietnam agreement might prejudice the proper implementation of the Laos agreement, where the Royal Government has yet to gain control of the two northern provinces. For the maintenance of the peace in Indochina it is of primary importance that the withdrawal and transfer of military formations should be carried out in full. This has a bearing on whether the Commission should go on record with a recommendation which we know in advance will not be carried out in good faith by the Viet Minh, and which we cannot in effect force them to carry out.

3. A more immediate consideration is the effect which driving this matter through to a recorded vote may have on your future chances of influencing the Indian chairman in our favour in relation to matters more directly affecting the maintenance of the cease fire. On the other hand, submitting to Communist pressure to refrain from any effective recommendation in a good case may throw the Indian Chairman more completely under Communist influence.

4. You are in the best position to determine how much weight should be given to these factors. In so far as purely Canadian considerations are involved, I would like to see the matter brought to a vote even at the risk of finding ourselves in a minority and I do not think we should permit the teeth to be drawn from your recommendation merely to achieve a compromise of words; but I hesitate to make this a categorical instruction until the initial reaction of the Indian chairman is known. It is unfortunate, perhaps, that there has not been any voting in the past, and that the Indians attach so much importance to what is now really a fictitious and might become a dangerous and damaging unanimity. You will be in a better position to judge whether this unanimity has benefited us in securing wider facilities for our inspection teams in overseeing the military provisions of the Agreement. I am instructing Reid in New Delhi to mention our concern to the Indians over this issue if an early opportunity presents itself; I shall await the initial reports from you on reactions to the draft recommendation before asking him to make firmer representations.

5. From your analysis of the chairman's attitude I would think his most likely tactic will be to try to get you to temper your draft recommendation to meet Polish objections half way and to put off a firm decision in the hope that a compromise formula may be worked out. The drawback in this approach which we must impress upon the Indians is that delay by the Commission will encourage further evasion of their responsibilities by the Viet Minh, particularly as the cut-off date approaches. You might emphasize this point in your informal and private approach to the Indian chairman.

6. As to the course of action to pursue after the Commission makes its recommendation, I think it would be wise to defer a decision on this until the recommendation is approved. Meanwhile it would be a good idea to document carefully all evidence of instances of Viet Minh reluctance to comply with the political provisions of the cease fire agreement. This material may prove useful after the military phase of the settlement is completed and when discussions concerning a political settlement begin.

7. The Ba-Lang incident may help to jar the Indians into taking a more positive attitude on the freedom of movement issue, as they did in a previous instance. I agree with the course of action you have proposed in this case, although it might be worthwhile to make of it two separate (but related) issues: (a) the obstruction to the mobile team, on which there is uncontrovertible evidence and which strikes at a principle basic to all the Commission's operations and not just in the freedom of movement context; and (b) non-compliance with Article 14(d), which is, of course, aggravated in the extreme by obstruction to the team. The investigation which you are demanding may not be able to turn up enough evidence to make a first class case of (b) but it certainly should help to convince the Indians of the necessity for a strong recommendation to the parties.

8. I think it would be desirable for both issues to be covered in a strong protest to the DR and that a report to the co-chairmen of the Geneva Conference should be made. As a price for the latter it may be necessary to accept some reference in the report to the obstruction of the teams in central Vietnam by South Vietnamese officials — or perhaps a separate report would be preferable; in any case, however, the previous instance of obstruction by the Viet Minh at Tra Ly should also be mentioned.

ELECTIONS IN VIETNAM

In telegram No. 28 of January 18† from New Delhi (copy attached) Mr. Reid has reported that the Indian Government favours the establishment before July 20, 1955 of the electoral commission envisaged in the Final Declaration of the Geneva Conference so that it could act as an arbitrator between the two parties in their consultations in preparation for the holding of elections in July 1956.

In our preliminary examination of the elections question last September we did mention the fact that the establishment of the electoral commission before July 1955 might have the advantage of preventing the reference of election problems to the present Supervisory Commission.

It is clear now, however, that early and active intervention by the Commission powers in the negotiations between the two zones of Vietnam on election matters without a clear mandate from the Geneva Conference powers might get the Commission powers — and Canada in particular — into a very difficult position.

Accordingly the attached telegram to Mr. Reid has been drafted for your approval if you agree, setting forth our reasons for being opposed to an active role for the Commission powers in the preparatory negotiations for the elections, and asking his advice as to how our views might best be put across to the Indians.

ELECTIONS IN VIETNAM

I am much obliged for the useful information on Indian thinking on this important subject.

2. I have serious doubts about the propriety of the Commission powers taking the initiative at this time in drafting proposed terms of reference for the electoral commission with a view to establishing it before July 20, 1955 because:

(a) paragraph 7(a) of the Final Declaration does not give this responsibility to the Commission powers, and

(b) paragraph 7(a) also clearly envisages a delay in approaching the settlement of political problems until sufficient progress in the restoration of peace has been made.

3. My present view is that a prerequisite for the drafting of satisfactory terms of reference for the electoral commission will be the reaching of an agreement on electoral procedures and constitutional forms by the representatives of the two zones of Vietnam — an agreement which should be acceptable to the Geneva Conference powers. On the basis of such an agreement — if and when reached — terms of reference for the electoral commission might be drawn up. At this point the Commission powers might have a useful and active contribution to make. I believe, however, that we must insist on the conclusion of an agreement on electoral procedures acceptable to the Geneva Conference powers before the Commission powers are specifically charged with the task of supervising the elections.

4. Such an agreement appears the more necessary since the plan to hold general elections in 1956 is laid down only in the Final Declaration and is only mentioned incidentally in the Vietnam agreement in Article 14. It is the opinion of our Legal Division that the Final Declaration constitutes a formal statement of policy rather than an instrument, such as a treaty, intended to create binding legal obligations. The relationship of the State of Vietnam to the policies laid down in the Final Declaration is a matter which needs some further enquiry.

5. So far as the Commission powers are concerned, while it is clear that they are morally (if not legally) bound to undertake the supervision of elections in 1956, it is equally clear that they have no executive responsibilities for the carrying out of the policies laid down in the Final Declaration, to which they were not party. Moreover there is nothing in the Final Declaration to suggest that either the present International Supervisory Commission or the proposed electoral commission should be involved in the preparations for the elections or the consultations on this subject between representatives of the two zones. In the light of all these considerations I think that the Commission powers should pause and think very carefully about offering their services to the parties directly concerned before being requested by both of them and by the Geneva Conference powers to do so. The Commission powers should be prepared to provide assistance if requested to do so, either by the parties themselves or the Geneva Conference powers, and I think we should make up our minds in advance as to how much assistance we should provide. My present view is that the Commission powers should not do more than provide technical advice and good offices. Since the object of the discussions is that the representatives of the two zones reach agreement on electoral procedures it would, in my view, be quite improper for the Commission powers to seek to arbitrate differences between the two parties.

6. There are two possible ways by which the Commission powers might be able to comply with a request to assist in the consultations between the two parties on preparations for the elections: (a) by agreement with the Geneva Conference powers, the terms of reference of the present Commission might be extended to include technical advice and good offices to the two sides in their consultations; (b) the electoral commission might be set up with preliminary terms of reference, covering only the responsibilities of the Commission during the preparations stage, and with the clear understanding that further terms of reference would be provided to cover the supervision stage, after an agreement on electoral procedures between the two Vietnamese governments had been reached and approved by the Geneva Conference powers. The question will have to be studied further to determine which of these two alternatives is the better.

7. I would not suggest at this stage that you inform the Indian authorities of our views on this subject, although if they raise the matter again with you I think you might appropriately indicate the general direction of our thinking as outlined above.

8. For your own strictly confidential information I believe that it is not desirable that we become too deeply involved too soon in what promises to be the key problem in the post-military phase of the Geneva settlement for Indochina. The issue is of such importance that the responsibility for holding elections — or for not holding them — should rest clearly with the parties directly concerned and with the Geneva Conference powers; not (repeat not) with the Commission powers. Consequently I believe that any proposals for initiative in this matter by the Commission powers should be examined very carefully with a view to their ultimate consequences and the degree to which the Commission powers might be held responsible for any miscarriage of the political settlement envisaged in paragraph 7 of the Final Declaration of the Geneva Conference.

9. I am, of course, most anxious that the Indians should not get the impression that by opposing early and active intervention by the Commission powers in the consultations on electoral procedures, we are striking the first blow against the holding of elections themselves. When the consultations begin the State of Vietnam will certainly demand very elaborate guarantees to ensure that elections really are free, and in doing so they will no doubt have the full backing of a number of other governments including our own. I would think it likely that the conditions which the State of Vietnam will demand for the holding of elections — and quite rightly so in view of the Viet Minh performance on Articles 14(c) and (d) — may be unacceptable to the Viet Minh and may produce a deadlock. Furthermore I suspect that all the mediatory and conciliatory capacity available to the Commission powers may be unable to prevent or resolve such a deadlock. The important thing from our point of view is to ensure that if and when a deadlock does occur, the responsibility for dealing with the resulting situation rests with the Geneva Conference powers, and not with the Commission powers. Meanwhile we must act and speak as if we expected the elections to take place, as we do not wish to give any “lead” to opponents of elections in Vietnam and the prospect of elections occurring may spur the State of Vietnam into setting its own house in order.

10. Your telegram under reference, together with press reports of an interview given by Desai in India and reports from Hanoi lead me to suspect that Desai — if not the Indian Government — is convinced that the Viet Minh will ultimately control all of Vietnam and that it is therefore desirable that this control be established through the peaceful means of elections at the scheduled time so that the consolidation of the “peace area” in Southeast Asia will not be hindered by renewed threats of hostilities which might arise out of a deferment of the elections. The trouble with this line of thinking — if it indeed represents the attitude of Desai or the Indian Government — is that it leaves out of account the fact that the State of Vietnam is not disposed to knuckle under to the Viet Minh and that its voluntary concurrence is essential to any plan for all-Vietnam elections. The problem will be to convince the Indians that the untidy state of affairs which seems to be in the making will be more a consequence of Communist policies and practices in North Vietnam than of United States efforts to assist the government in the south.

11. In view of the foregoing I think it will be desirable for the Indians to be informed soon of our reservations with respect to the role of the Commission powers in the consultations on preparations for elections, well before any of the opponents of elections in Vietnam show their hand. I would appreciate any advice you might have to offer as to how we might best convey to the Indians our misgivings on this score. I am thinking of suggesting to the Prime Minister that he mention the problem in broad terms to Mr. Nehru in any private talks he might have with him at the Prime Ministers’ conference.<sup>3</sup>

1. Your telegram was received on January 28.

2. Am I correct in concluding that your present approach to the problem differs from the preliminary thinking of the Department as set forth in letter Y736 of October 20 and enclosures?† We passed this preliminary thinking on to the External Affairs Ministry. At that time it seemed desirable to the Department that the Electoral Commission should be established before "next April" in order to avoid reference to the existing Commission of problems arising from the joint Viet Nam—Viet Minh discussions on electoral procedures. The Department also at the time thought that some preliminary study of the anticipated functions of the Electoral Commission by the Indians, ourselves and possibly later the Poles might be worth while particularly since it was in our interest to do what we could to see that the terms of reference of the Electoral Commission were precisely drafted.

3. The Commonwealth Secretary's views as set forth in my telegram No. 28 of January 18 are substantially in accord with the Department's preliminary thinking. It will, therefore, be a difficult undertaking to swing the Indians into what now appears to be your line of thinking.

4. My impression is that the Indian Government would become immediately suspicious of our good faith if we were to insist on the conclusion by the representatives of the two zones of Viet Nam of an agreement on electoral procedures acceptable to the Geneva Conference powers before the Electoral Commission is set up. I, therefore, think that the alternative in your paragraph 6(b) is preferable. I understand this alternative to mean that the Electoral Commission could be set up in the near future with preliminary terms of reference so that its technical advice and good offices would be available to the two parties. It would be essential to make clear to the Indians that the restrictions in the preliminary terms of reference would not, of course, apply to the "further terms of reference" which would later be provided to cover the supervision of this stage.

5. The Indians, as you know, suspect that the United States intends to torpedo the settlement in Viet Nam and that in particular the United States will use its best efforts to see that a free election does not take place. The Indians also believe, on the basis of reports from their own people in Viet Nam, that in a free election the Democratic Republic would receive up to three-quarters of the vote in the south. They are confirmed in this view by reports of independent observers.

6. It will, therefore, be likely that any such marked change as you suggest in our policy from that set forth in our preliminary thinking will be interpreted by them to mean that we are giving in to United States pressure.

7. My impression also is that the Indians consider the Geneva settlement as a package deal under which the north give up the possibility or indeed the probability of a complete military victory in the south in return for the promise of free elections. They consider Ho Chi Minh an intelligent statesman and they would find it hard to believe that he will not be willing to agree to any reasonable requirements for free elections since in their opinion he is certain to win them.

8. Because of these Indian beliefs, they have for some time assumed that Viet Nam would be unified under Ho Chi Minh and that the problem which they and their friends face is to prevent an extension of his influence into Laos and Cambodia which they would consider disastrous. I had hoped that if the western world played its cards well we could get substantial cooperation from India in this task.

9. If, however, the Indians come to believe that the prospect of free elections has been frustrated by the United States and its friends, their inevitable tendency will be to wash their hands of the results. Among the results might be a collapse of the régime in the south and a renewal of hostilities.

10. In view of the very great difficulties that lie ahead, I think it is essential that Mr. St. Laurent have as frank a discussion as possible with Mr. Nehru in London. It would be helpful if this were followed up by a talk between Léger, Robertson, Pillai and Menon. It is important to include Menon since he will shortly be made a Cabinet Minister.

11. In the light of Mr. St. Laurent's report of Mr. Nehru's conversation you might then wish to reconsider the line of thinking set forth in your telegram. I shall, therefore, not indicate your present line of thinking to the Indians until I have further instructions from you. I will stick to my present line which is that set forth in the last sentence of your paragraph 9 — to act and speak as if we expect the elections to take place.

FREEDOM OF MOVEMENT

1. The Committee on Freedoms have just completed what I consider to be a very satisfactory report and recommendation on the general question of freedom of movement under Article 14(d). It is on the agenda for the Commission meeting on January 31st (copy is being forwarded in tomorrow's bag).

2. The report is strong on record of Democratic Republic in their failure to carry out their responsibilities in this field; the Poles are willing, apparently, to accept fairly strong recommendation. The Indians in Committee have not been prepared to emphasize fear of people about Democratic Republic reprisals, perhaps because the hope that in some way there might be a better prospect of enlisting Democratic Republic cooperation in the implementation of the recommendation. Under the circumstances to retain unanimity and to avoid stirring up Polish objections, particularly insofar as recommendation is concerned, we did not press our points concerning political tests and fear of harassment. The report still makes it quite clear, both directly and by implication, that so far the situation concerning freedom of movement has been very unsatisfactory and that the Democratic Republic authorities have not taken steps to improve it.

3. The main points in the recommendation are as follows:

(a) Intending evacuees should be able to obtain from officers in charge of communes, within 15 days, permit valid to travel from place of residence directly to the other zone. Persons residing in a place different from their permanent homes should be permitted to apply to local office.

(b) Permits should be valid for 2 months and extension, if necessary, should be automatic.

(c) If permit is refused reasons should be given and applicant should have right of appeal to higher authority and get final reply within 10 days.

(d) Separate applications should be made by each adult but parents as legal guardians should apply for children.

(e) There should be no detailed enquiry into the motives before permits are granted. A simple declaration of a definite wish to go and live in the other zone should be adequate.

(f) Permits should be granted to all persons who have not been either convicted or are undergoing trial.

(g) Reasonable facilities to take moveable property, after discharge of outstanding dues, should be provided.

(h) Transport facilities at a reasonable cost should be made available and the parties should consider giving (or allowing private organizations to give) assistance to destitutes.

(i) Intending evacuees should have freedom to meet and discuss plans in a peaceful and orderly manner.

(j) Parties should indicate every fortnight the numbers of applications received, permits issued, applications refused and the reasons for refusal.

(k) Further detailed announcement as to the new procedure should be made (please compare above with points in paragraph 6 of my telegram No. 9 of January 6).<sup>4</sup>

4. To enable Commission to keep informed of progress made in implementation the Committee recommends that

(a) The freedom branch should provide every week a survey of petitions received concerning freedom of movement,

(b) The PRO should prepare survey of press announcements or news items relating to same subject,

(c) Committee on Freedoms itself should submit fortnightly progress report,

(d) At the beginning of March one or two mobile teams might be sent to main areas concerned to ascertain position and settle any problems in co-operation with local authorities.

5. I anticipate that as soon as agreement is reached by the Commission on the recommendation it will be submitted to the two parties for their comments and suggestions which will be considered before the recommendation is finalized.<sup>5</sup> After the first, but before the second stage I propose to call informally on the Chairman and to enlist his support for three measures which are primarily devised to publicize the recommendation and to exert some pressure on the parties as regards presentation:

(a) A further interim report to the co-chairmen,

(b) A full press release by the Commission, and

(c) A formal call by the Commission on the ministers concerned both north and south, to stress the importance of the recommendation (as you will recall these measures are envisaged in paragraphs 5 and 13 of my telegram No. 9 of January 6).

The recommendation was formally approved "without important changes" and given to the two liaison missions on February 1. See Hanoi to Ottawa, Telegram No. 60, February 2, 1955, DEA/50052-A-40.

6. When I call on the Chairman you may consider it desirable to make similar suggestions in New Delhi. As soon as I can determine when Commission will first submit draft recommendation to the parties I shall advise you of timing of my call on Chairman through United Kingdom facilities.

7. Should you decide to make further move in New Delhi I suggest the 3 following points be taken into account.

(a) It should not be intimated that Chairman's attitude here has not been fully satisfactory as regards the report and the recommendation on this issue, the line should rather be that steps taken so far are encouraging and that measures envisaged in paragraph 5 above are devised to ensure success of the Commission's effort to promote co-operation.

(b) Representations should be made in such a way that Chairman here will not be led to believe that move was made at our instigation.

(c) As in course of my last conversation with Chairman on this subject I referred to Minister's concern, you may find it advisable to present our further comments and suggestions as coming from the Minister rather than have matter dealt with at official level.

ELECTIONS IN VIETNAM

The Minister and Mr. Léger may be interested in the following Departmental Comments on Mr. Reid's telegram.

2. Our position on this last October was (a) that some consultation between the Commission Powers and the Geneva Conference powers would be desirable before representatives of the two zones of Vietnam begin consultations on the holding of the elections next July (reference to next April arose out of an error in our English translation of the Final Declaration); (b) that it would be desirable for the Electoral Commission to be established before that time as otherwise problems arising from the joint Vietnam-Viet Minh discussions on electoral procedures might be referred to the present Supervisory Commission for settlement; and (c) that this latter eventuality would not be satisfactory since the Supervisory Commission as now established has been given no specific responsibilities for dealing with election questions.

3. Departmental thinking on this subject has not changed significantly but a further examination of the procedure for the preparations for the elections and for setting up the supervisory machinery has brought new difficulties to light. We do not object to the establishment of the elections commission before the inter-zonal consultations begin, nor to discussions between the Commission governments and the Geneva Conference powers on this subject before July. What we are concerned to avoid is the establishment, as a result of hasty action by the Commission powers, of the electoral commission with broad and ill-defined executive powers. Moreover we believe that any consultations between the Commission powers and the Geneva Conference powers on the matter of preparing for the establishment of the electoral commission should be carried on in private, so that no public commitments would be involved before we have had an opportunity to study the matter thoroughly and the Saigon government would not be provoked into any rash statement on the elections before the time for inter-zonal consultations arrives.

4. The early establishment of the elections commission with very broad terms of reference perhaps involving some executive responsibilities would in our view have very serious consequences. In the electoral commission our position will be a good deal weaker than it now is in the Supervisory Commission; we cannot, in view of the Indian attitude as described by Mr. Reid, expect the Indians to be as insistent as we may wish to be about adequate safeguards for free elections. If, therefore, in the consultations stage the electoral commission had the power to arbitrate differences between the two parties, we might find ourselves overruled more often than not. We would then — presuming some kind of "agreement" on electoral procedures might be reached — find ourselves in the unfortunate position of having to choose between participating in the organization and supervision of completely farcical elections and walking out of the Commission.

5. It seems to us therefore that it is essential that such a situation be avoided. This we believe can be done if the responsibility for taking the initiative in carrying out the policies laid down in the Final Declaration is left to the Governments which drew up the declaration. It seems entirely inappropriate to us that the Commission powers, which lack the capacity to influence the course of developments in Indochina, should be saddled with or should arrogate to themselves the responsibility of effecting the political settlement envisaged in the Final Declaration.

6. Accordingly we have advanced the view that the Geneva Conference powers could invite the Commission powers to assist by means of good offices in the inter-zonal consultations, and that only after these consultations have produced an agreement on electoral procedures acceptable to the Geneva Conference powers, the latter could invite the Commission powers to supervise the elections and indicate how this supervision is to be carried out. This procedure should ensure that the Geneva Conference powers take responsibility for each stage of the political settlement. Furthermore we can hope that the United Kingdom and France would not consent to any arrangements that would compel the State of Vietnam to agree to a travesty of the political settlement envisaged in the Final Declaration.

7. Mr. Reid's outline of India's attitude on the question of elections suggests that some exchange of views with the Indians in London is indeed desirable, since there appears to be a wide divergence between their thinking and our own, which is based on fair elections as a means to the broad political settlement outlined in paragraph 7 of the Final Declaration. It would, of course, be desirable to follow the principle of speaking and acting as if we expected elections to take place. It might, however, be appropriate to suggest to the Indians:

(a) the desirability of ensuring that the Geneva Conference powers take some continuing responsibility for the implementation of the political settlement envisaged in the Final Declaration;

(b) the desirability for clear and well-defined terms of reference for the elections commission, to be drawn up in separate stages covering first any responsibilities which the

Commission powers may be asked to assume in the consultations phase, and subsequently, the responsibilities of the election commission in supervising the elections;

(c) that we attach great importance to the holding of elections in accordance with all the conditions laid down in paragraph 7 of the Final Declaration — that the political settlement “shall permit the Vietnamese people to enjoy the fundamental freedoms guaranteed by democratic institutions established as a result of free general elections by secret ballot” and that “all the necessary conditions obtain for free expression of the national will”.

8. Expression of our misgivings in another context about the Viet Minh performance on Article 14 (c) and (d) of the Vietnam agreement may help to impress upon the Indians that the conditions mentioned in (c) of the previous paragraph do not appear to be developing, and the fact that they are not developing is solely the responsibility of the Viet Minh.

9. If there should be any suspicion on the part of the Indians that we are retreating from the prospect of elections, we could explain that we have become somewhat more cautious about our commitments because our experiences with the Vietminh over the past few months have caused us to doubt their intention to fulfil any aspects of the Geneva agreement involving personal freedom and we are determined not to accept any responsibility for sanctioning phoney elections.

10. It is only honest to admit to ourselves that our scepticism about the elections is the result also of our awareness of apparent American and South Vietnamese intentions to consider themselves uncommitted by this provision. This, however, is something which, we recognize as a fact of life. We do not encourage this attitude, we are under no pressure from the Americans or the French to this end, and we are in no sense in collusion with the SEATO powers for any purpose inconsistent with the Geneva agreement.

INDO-CHINA

At Saturday morning's meeting [with Nehru], the Prime Minister and I brought up certain questions regarding the work of the armistice commissions in Indo-China, indicating our concern over the obstacles in the way of the free movement from the north to south, and over the forthcoming elections.<sup>6</sup> We tried to make it clear that we did not wish the commissions to be used as a cloak for elections which were not completely free. It was important to give this matter consideration in the Commission, but the initial responsibility in working out arrangements rested, of course, with the two parties in Vietnam. I indicated that the obligation under the armistice for the existing commissions to supervise elections was not clear, but the Indian demurred at this and thought the duty of the Commission had been specifically laid down in this matter.

2. We also brought up the difficulties in the norther provinces of Laos, and the desirability of winding up the Cambodian Commission as quickly as possible. In this connection, we made reference to the fact that the Poles could veto the wind-up action required, but that we must not allow this to happen. I mentioned the desirability of India becoming more and more influential in Cambodia.

3. Our discussion of these matters was in general terms, but Léger will be pursuing them further with Pillai.

My dear Pillai,

Following our conversation yesterday, I have jotted down a few ideas on how we envisage the role of the Commission powers in the supervision of the elections in Indochina. The attached notes may be of some interest to you at this stage in the development of this difficult problem. You may wish to pass on to Escott Reid any comment you may care to make on these notes.

I take this opportunity also to enclose some views on freedom of movement in Vietnam, a subject which was raised at the meeting which you attended on Saturday at the Foreign Office.

VIETNAM — SUPERVISION OF GENERAL ELECTIONS

The task which Canada, together with India and Poland, assumed in Indochina at the invitation of the Geneva Conference is limited to supervision of the implementation of the cease fire agreement only. As the Final Declaration of the Geneva Conference calls for the supervision of general elections in Vietnam in July 1956 by an international commission composed of representatives of India, Poland and Canada, we assume that the Geneva Conference powers will, at the appropriate time, invite these three Governments to undertake the supervision of the elections, and indicate how this supervision is to be carried out. It is our view that terms of reference for a commission which will supervise the general elections cannot satisfactorily be drafted until agreement on an electoral law or on electoral procedures has been reached by representatives of the two zones of Vietnam and approved by the Geneva Conference powers. Such an agreement, we hope will emerge from the consultations on elections between representatives of the two zones of Vietnam which are, according to the Final Declaration, to begin in July 1955. Should the governments of the two zones of Vietnam want to have the assistance of the Commission powers in their consultations, we assume that they or the Geneva Conference powers will take the initiative in seeking such assistance. The responsibilities which the Commission powers might be called upon to assume in this connection would have to be agreed upon by the two governments of Vietnam and, we believe, should be approved by the Geneva Conference powers.

VIETNAM — FREEDOM OF MOVEMENT

Since the International Commission in Vietnam first began its work last August there have been repeated indications that the Democratic Republic authorities in North Vietnam have not carried out in the manner intended the provisions of the Vietnam agreement requiring them to permit and help those persons wishing to do so to move from the northern zone to the south. Recent reports from the Canadian Commissioner in Hanoi (based on reports from the Commission's inspection teams) indicate that the Democratic Republic procedure for issuing permits to persons wishing to go south is so complex as to imply a practical refusal to allow freedom of movement; that the would-be evacuees, due to fear of reprisals, are reluctant to seek the necessary permits; and that there is practically no evidence that aid of any kind has been provided by the Viet Minh authorities to those wishing to move. These indications create a very strong presumption of non-compliance on the part of the Viet Minh with the provisions of the Agreement concerning freedom of movement, although a good deal of the available evidence does not meet the quasi-judicial standards for proof of a violation which must be applied in the Commission.

This situation has been a matter of grave concern to the Canadian Government and the Canadian people and throughout the free world, particularly as it appears that the majority of persons affected wish to leave the north in order to practice their religion freely. The provision for the movement of civilians is an unusual one in a military armistice, and is perhaps secondary in importance to the main provisions of the cease fire agreement concerning the regroupment of military forces. Furthermore it is not altogether surprising that the Democratic Republic, with its Communist orientation, should not comply fully and willingly with these particular political provisions of the armistice agreement. Nevertheless their failure to do so does amount to a violation of the spirit and meaning of the agreement and creates distrust and ill will between the parties, making the implementation of the main provisions of the agreement the more difficult. Finally the Viet Minh attitude in this matter creates an atmosphere which is not at all conducive to the working out of a political settlement for Vietnam as a whole which, in the words of the Final Declaration of the Geneva Conference "shall permit the Vietnamese people to enjoy the fundamental freedoms, guaranteed by democratic institutions established as a result of free general elections by secret ballot".

It is impossible for the International Commission to secure full compliance by a party to the agreement with the provisions for freedom of movement if that party is determined to evade its responsibilities. Nevertheless it is our hope that further recommendations on this subject can be adopted by the International Commission which will define clearly the procedures which the parties should follow in order to facilitate the movement of civilians in the time remaining under the agreement — that is, until May 18 of this year.

FUTURE OF THE INTERNATIONAL COMMISSION

On reviewing the forecast made last October I find that, on the whole, our assessment of the future work of the Commission and of our position in relation thereto was generally accurate. It may be useful at this time, after some six months of experience in Hanoi, to review the situation and to attempt an analysis of its implications insofar as Canada is concerned.

2. The main problems facing the Commission now are the following:

- (a) the control of the import of arms and military equipment;
- (b) the regroupment of forces;
- (c) the exchange of prisoners of war;
- (d) freedom of movement;
- (e) democratic freedoms.

3. I propose to outline my views as to the prospects of action under each heading and then to examine what repercussions, if any, may be foreseen for Canada.

4. On the whole, I still feel that generally the main purposes of the Agreement are likely to be achieved and that the regroupment of forces may be effected without major difficulties. The situation may become complicated later and there may even be a risk of resumption of hostilities should it be impossible to resolve the deadlock over elections. This problem, is not for the present Commission to solve, and I am, therefore, confident that insofar as the supervision and control of the execution of the cease-fire arrangement (as distinct from the political settlement) is concerned the present Commission has a fair chance of being able to conclude its task in a generally satisfactory way, at least, I repeat, insofar as the major military provisions are concerned.

5. On the control of the import of arms and equipment, I foresee that the Commission's net will be drawn tighter. How much, if any, war material have been introduced before the Commission's teams were in position we do not know. There will be long discussions with the Poles and innumerable objections raised by the DR authorities but, gradually, in some way gaps will be covered, better methods of investigation and control will be devised and it is possible that within another six months the Commission may be in a position to exercise a fair degree of control. Because of the nature of the country and given the provisions of the Agreement (which for instance do not allow the Commission to check existing war equipment and bases) control can never be fully effective but it may enable the Commission to detect important movements of major items of war equipment. And it is possible that before too long the Commission may be in a position to satisfy itself and the Geneva Powers that, in general, the provisions of the articles in Chapter 3 are being adequately supervised. The Commission, I think, if the present trend continues, is not likely to find itself in a position of impotence and ignorance if allegations are made that these articles are being violated, and Canada will not, therefore, I think, be placed in the position of having condoned an inadmissible (but not satisfactorily proved) situation or having to enter minority protests on this score. Things will not be fully satisfactory but they will probably not be generally so bad as to raise an awkward issue for us and to involve blame for our association with the Commission.

6. On the regroupment of forces, the prospects are slightly, but just slightly, more encouraging. Both parties have been urged to make plans for the orderly handover of the Haiphong area and of the Central Sector. In the case of Haiphong, as the parties did not seem to be able to reach agreement on principles to govern the removal of stocks and equipment, the Commission has intervened in a decided, if somewhat belated fashion. Given the tactics of the DR authorities, it is perhaps too much to hope that there will not be "spontaneous popular" demonstrations in Haiphong and that attempts will not be made to delay operations in the expectation that anything which the French will not have time to remove will be net profit for the Viet Minh. Given, however, the importance of the material in dispute, I doubt whether the DR authorities will promote agitation beyond the critical point. The Commission will have to make constant and determined efforts to get the two parties together. If the DR authorities do not live up to the spirit of the Commission's proposals, this will have to be established; the Commission may have to intervene in many disputed cases and a major effort will be required to supervise the actual handover but I do not foresee great difficulties or implications insofar as Canada is concerned.

7. The DR authorities may create trouble after they have withdrawn from the Central Sector, in spite of the precautions which may be taken by the National Vietnamese Government and the French. They may repeat their performance of last fall and promote incidents devised to support whatever may be their main propaganda objectives at that time. There is a possibility, however, that as the time for all-Viet Nam election talks draws nearer, the Viet Minh may pursue a more restrained policy. They will still be vituperative and exploit for their purposes such incidents as are bound to occur but I am not sure that they will have recourse on the same scale to their previous tactics. In any case, the Commission through investigations and recommendations may assist in keeping the situation under control. A number of mobile teams will be required as in Haiphong to observe the actual handover but beyond the administrative effort involved, I am not particularly concerned over this phase of the operations. Later on, given the probable Viet Minh hold in the Central Sector, there are bound to be difficulties as the National Vietnamese Government proceeds to set up and consolidate its authority.

8. The question of the exchange of prisoners of war may present some difficulties but not of a very serious character. In fact, substantially all prisoners of war have been exchanged. The present dispute largely concerns the fate of those who have disappeared in the years of fighting and who are now unaccounted for. The French, under pressure from the families both in France and in the French Union, are pressing for definite replies so that pensions, wills and other technical problems can be settled: they also stress the psychological difficulties created by this uncertainty for the families concerned. For their part, the DR authorities are not in a position, I believe, to account accurately for most of those they captured; the nature of the country and the conditions of war here were such that in most cases prisoners had little chance of survival. Yet, if the DR authorities were to give satisfaction to the French on this point, the propaganda implications would be most serious. I foresee that this issue will continue for some time to poison the atmosphere. The Commission, up to a point, can exert pressure on the DR authorities to investigate specific cases and to give definite replies, but I am afraid that this problem is unlikely to be finalized ever to the satisfaction of the French. Again, the issue is not vital, if it is a bitter and sad one, and we are unlikely to be subjected to unusual pressures either from the French or from public opinion in the West generally because of the Commission's obvious inability to solve it completely.

9. The problem of deserters may also lead to an impasse or create an awkward situation for the French under the provisions of Article 21 (para c) but again, this is not an issue which will be important in terms of the Commission's or of our own record.

10. Freedom of Movement has been a subject of permanent and deep interest to us and our record as a member of the Commission is likely to be judged to a considerable extent by the performance of the Commission in this field. As you have pointed out, in your instructions, while the issue is very important in terms of public opinion in the West, it must be remembered that the Geneva Agreement is primarily a military settlement, and that the implementation of the military provisions should not be prejudiced by action taken with respect to Freedom of Movement. As a consequence, we have reached the conclusion that while the Commission must make every effort to induce compliance with 14(d) as long as our position is fully understood by the Geneva Powers, as long as these Powers are fully advised as to the Commission's efforts and the record of the parties, the issue should not be pressed to the point when the precarious military balance established by the Agreement may be upset.

11. I am satisfied that, on the whole, and particularly if the Indians and the Poles maintain their present attitude, it will be possible for the Commission to perform in a manner which will secure such co-operation from the parties as it is reasonable to expect; the Commission has a fair chance of being able to keep the record clear and to show that if Article 14(d) has not been carried out fully the fault lies with the parties themselves. The weakness in this situation and the possible risks for Canada stem from the danger that public opinion in friendly Western countries, may not appreciate that even if the outcome of the Commission's efforts in this field are not as satisfactory as might be desired, failure to achieve full success was not worth risking a resumption of hostilities. We can protect our position to some extent through private discussions with the friendly Geneva Powers and through formal reports to the Co-Chairmen but there is no doubt that it will be easier for most people to yield to emotional reactions than to exercise the articulate political judgment which is needed to accept the situation; friendly political leaders may find it hard to present the problem in its true perspective without appearing to be cynical and unkind.

12. The situation, therefore, will be determined by the record of the parties, by the ability of the Commission to publicize it, and for us, by the degree of understanding for the real problem involved we may be able to obtain from friendly governments and from public opinion in the West generally.

13. It is difficult to forecast whether the DR authorities will alter the rigid and negative policies they have followed so far concerning Article 14(d). The following points may be relevant:

(a) While we have no means of estimating accurately the number, we are told that if the door were wide open, from 1 to 2 million people might leave North Viet Nam. It is clear that this would result in a major political and economic defeat for the Viet Minh, even if the number were very much smaller. I do not expect therefore, for this reason, more than limited co-operation;

(b) it is against Communist policy everywhere, it seems, for the régime to allow people whether Catholics or not, to leave freely: psychologically as well as for political reasons it must be very difficult for the DR leaders as well as for the local authorities to allow people to leave the area under their control;

(c) we are told by the French here that, according to radio monitoring reports, the DR authorities have told the local officials that in places where the Commission is likely to go a few permits should be issued to those who wish to leave at all costs. This is, if true, an ominous indication.

14. On the other hand, the Commission's recommendation is firm, if not entirely airtight; some degree of control is foreseen, the three delegations, for reasons of their own, seem to be agreed that the DR performance so far has been inadequate and the DR leaders themselves must realize that if they adhere to their present policies, they may provide the régime in the South with a good reason for refusing to make an electoral deal with them.

15. On the whole, therefore, my view is that the flow of refugees is likely to increase. I doubt whether it will be very large but, depending on the evolution of the general political situation and on the degree of pressure which the Commission may be prepared to exercise, I anticipate that there will be some improvement in the number of permits issued between now and the end of the 300-day period. It may also be possible to provide proof that due to the Commission's intervention more refugees will have been able to leave North Viet Nam. How many more remains to be seen.

16. I am equally satisfied that there is a fair chance that the Commission may be able to ascertain the extent of compliance by the DR authorities and to keep the Geneva Powers informed in good time. True, the volume or the nature of the evidence which will be available will leave much to be desired but, even in unfavourable circumstances such as Ba Lang, the DR authorities are unable to hide the major facts of the situation. It may be difficult to obtain this evidence quickly enough but it seems that both my colleagues want to make sure that the Commission itself will not be blamed for failure because it has not taken adequate steps or given the Geneva Powers, in good time, an opportunity to intervene. It will be important, particularly insofar as we are concerned to expose DR shortcomings in the implementation of 14(d).

17. Judging from what we know here of the attitude of the French and of the U.K., it would seem that it might not be too difficult for us to persuade at least the governments that, so far, the Commission's record, particularly in the course of the last month, is not too inadequate and that Canada which has made every effort to promote earlier and stronger action has not compromised through her continued membership vital Western interests or principles. The problem may be more delicate in U.S. terms and on this we are not in a position to comment.

18. It would seem to us, therefore, that while full success is out of the question, the Commission's performance in relation to 14(d) is not likely to result in discredit which might reflect on Canada. In fact, there are reasons for believing that energetic, if measured, action may have worthwhile effects even in the short period remaining before the 300-day period. During this period, it will be important for us to proceed with the full understanding and support of the friendly Geneva Powers and for the Commission to report promptly any evidence of DR evasion of their responsibilities so that the problem is submitted in time to the Geneva Conference.

19. I turn now to democratic freedoms which is one of the major issues facing the Commission. In this regard, it is important, of course, to bear in mind that in this part of the world and particularly in this country, after eight years of war, democratic freedom is not and cannot be understood and practised as in the West and a compromise on elections may only be possible if this basic fact is taken into account. It will be obvious that such action as may be taken by the Commission in the field of 14(c) may have an effect as regards the maintenance of peace and order in both zones, the possible improvement of relations between the parties and more particularly the prospect of elections. I foresee that some difficulties are likely to arise in this field even for the present Commission. It may not be easy for us, particularly as time goes on, not to get involved in schemes to define democratic freedoms and in moves devised to assist in promoting pre-elections talks. Even if we succeed in getting the Commission to avoid these issues, it has the continuing responsibility of supervising the behaviour of the parties in relation to 14(c) and the recommendations it may have to make will have implications insofar as elections are concerned. For the immediate future and until the end of the 300-day period, I anticipate no unusual problems; particularly if, as I suspect the DR were now to pursue a more cautious line as the time for election talks is approaching: in any case the issues which will arise in relation to Article 14(c) will soon have to be approached in the light of our policy concerning the general problem of the Electoral Commission.

20. Our task will be all the more difficult in supervising 14(c) in that over the last few months it has become very clear that the Viet Minh régime in fact is undistinguishable from other Soviet Satellites. Democratic freedom not only as we understand it but as it should operate even in these areas is non-existent in the North; so far, by requesting investigation of incidents in the South, the DR leaders have focused attention on the shortcomings of their opponents in the application of democratic principles. The DR performance on freedom of movement is obviously a black mark against them in this field and the determination of Catholics to leave suggests that the DR record is not better insofar as religious freedom is concerned. I doubt, although there is no evidence before the Commission as yet, whether there is here any freedom of speech or of writing. There certainly is no freedom of meeting. I foresee that, before long, the investigations of the Commission will lead to discussions on at least practical definitions of democratic freedoms. As I indicated above, before the election talks, there are signs that the DR authorities may be more cautious but [it] is a question how far expediency will overcome ideological considerations. If the present methods are applied it will be difficult as I see it, for the Commission to expose clearly the real limitations of freedoms as understood and practised by the DR régime; findings or recommendations may be made on the basis of reports submitted by mobile teams operating under the present instructions, which might make it more difficult for the South to insist on principles and guarantees which will ensure fair elections. This is a prospect which I envisage with some concern when I consider the tasks of the present Commission after the 300-day period. For this reason the question of the Electoral Commission and our position in relation to it must be approached with very great caution.

21. The question of the DR subversion and infiltration in the South is also linked to the implementation of Article 14(c) and the outcome of elections. The DR authorities are likely, I think, to develop their subversive activities in the South to improve their position prior to the date set for the elections and to prepare the situation for a resumption of hostilities should this appear to be desirable later on. Unless, therefore, the National Vietnamese Government take effective steps to locate and isolate DR agents, the results of elections are likely to be affected; if their action is effective, the DR authorities will appeal to the Commission claiming that the provisions of 14(c) have been violated. The French have already drawn the attention of the Commission to the subversive activities of the DR authorities in the South and there are indications that the State Department is quite aware of the importance of anti-Communist propaganda in the South and of providing the South Viet Nam

Government with adequate forces for internal security purposes. It is not impossible should there be a deadlock on elections that the Viet Minh might assist a rebellion in the South and attempt to turn in this fashion the provisions of the Manila Pact [SEATO]. Subversion and infiltration in the South will, however, be a continuing operation and may only become a serious problem for the present Commission after the 300-day period and as a result of a deadlock over elections. Even if there is no deadlock the DR authorities as the elections draw nearer are likely to step up their operations in this field and it is possible that delicate issues might arise for the Supervisory Commission.

22. To sum up, if I can make a general forecast, I would say that, as you said when you announced the Government's decision to serve on this Commission, the task will still be difficult and hard but, it may turn out to be a worthwhile contribution to peace in this area, as in the world generally.<sup>7</sup> There have been times when the Indians seemed to us to be weak and procrastinating, when the Poles carried out their usual stalling and blocking tactics, and we ourselves wondered if a more aggressive policy on our part would produce more satisfactory and speedier results. But it is a fact that over a period of six months unanimity, for what it may ultimately be worth, has been maintained and, in some cases, effective if modest and perhaps belated action has been possible. True the results have been on a limited scale and dearly won but the fact that there have been some results and that, in some important respects the task has been carried out may be the most significant feature of this operation. As you know, at times, we have been greatly worried about the situation and we have been concerned lest our continued presence in the Commission might compromise our standing vis-à-vis the West: my present view is that with continued vigilance and determination provided the Indians particularly remain firm and if there is no major shift of policy in France or in the West generally, we can perform a limited but useful task here.

INDOCHINA

In my discussion with Mr. Dulles in New York on Wednesday, I raised the question of the Indochina Commissions and, more particularly, the difficulties which may arise over elections in Vietnam. I told Mr. Dulles that if it was the policy of the United States Government, in conjunction with the French, to delay or prevent elections in southern Vietnam, we should be informed because of our responsibilities on the Commission. Mr. Dulles said that they had no policy in this matter at present, and felt that the question would not arise for some time, at least until July of this year, under the armistice arrangement. He felt, however, that the difficulties in the way of holding elections in two parts of a country which were so hostile to each other would likely prove insuperable.<sup>8</sup>

INDO-CHINA SUPERVISORY COMMISSIONS

1. On February 25 I had an hour's conversation with Dutt, the Commonwealth Secretary. Williams accompanied me. Dutt began our talk by giving about half an hour's exposition of the situation in Indo-China and of the main problems which face each of the three Commissions. Dutt seemed primarily concerned at the moment not with such questions as freedom of movement in Viet Nam or the clashes in the two northern provinces of Laos, but with what appears to him and, I think, to Mr. Nehru to be the danger of the whole settlement in Indo-China breaking down not as the result of developments in Indo-China itself, but because of tensions created by the crisis over Formosa and the coastal islands and the Bangkok SEADO Conference. These tensions appear, for example, to have resulted in the Polish Ambassador in Viet Nam having received new instructions. Desai has reported that because of these instructions the Polish Ambassador is adopting a more obstructionist attitude. When at the very end of our conversation I raised the question of the implementation of Article 19 of the Laotian Agreement, Dutt was inclined to dismiss this matter with some impatience on the ground that it was unrealistic, in the kind of atmosphere which now existed, to expect the Pathet Lao forces to disclose their precise location.

2. The changes in the constitution of Cambodia contemplated by the King, the public charges about the presence of free Thai forces in or near the north of Laos and above all the fact that, according to Dutt, Hoare-Belisha told Mr. Nehru on February 24 that Diem had told him that there would be no elections in Viet Nam have all added to the apprehensions of the Indians of a possible break-down of the Geneva settlement. Dutt said that Nehru, when speaking to Eden next week, would emphasize the concern of the Indian Government that nothing should be done which might upset the present settlement. Dutt emphasized that the Indians believe that the settlement could well be upset if Laos or Cambodia, on their own initiative or because of any action of the SEADO countries, were to come under the umbrella of SEADO. The Indians consider unwise the presence of a Laotian Government observer at Bangkok and the statement which the Prime Minister of Laos issued on the eve of the Bangkok Conference.

<sup>8</sup> Un autre compte rendu de ces discussions est reproduit en tant que document 720. Pearson a également discuté des élections au Vietnam avec Dulles en mars 1955. Voir le document 302.
A further report on these discussions is re-printed as Document 720. Pearson also discussed elections in Vietnam with Dulles in March, 1955. See Document 302.

3. The Indian legal adviser has given interpretations of the armistice agreements and the accompanying declarations by Laos, Cambodia, France and the Geneva powers which are at variance with the opinions of our legal adviser. In the view of the Indian adviser these declarations create binding legal obligations on their signatories. I repeated our view and Dutt said he would have the legal adviser study the declarations again, but I do not think there is likely to be any change in his opinion.

4. The value of this opinion to the Indians is that it provides them with a basis for their argument that para 7 of the final declaration of the Geneva powers

- (a) Makes the holding of elections in Viet Nam mandatory;
- (b) Imposes obligations on the signatories to do their best to see that an election is held and
- (c) Vests authority in the two co-chairmen to request India, Poland and Canada to serve on an elections Commission for Viet Nam.

5. The Indians (group corrupt) the opinion of the legal adviser that the declarations by the Government of Cambodia embody legal obligations to support their broader interpretation of the responsibilities of the Commission in Cambodia in respect of elections there. I found the argument difficult to follow, but it is based on some 'theory of attraction'. I think it is that the Khmer Resistance Forces cannot enjoy their rights under Article 6 unless the population as a whole enjoys its rights under the government's declaration.

6. The Indian legal adviser holds that the words 'democratic freedoms' in Article 15 of the Laotian final declaration includes the right to participate in free elections by secret ballot. It follows that the Commission has a responsibility to ensure that the elections conform to a general democratic pattern. I contended that this was placing much too wide a meaning on the term 'democratic freedoms'.

7. Dutt, of course, agreed when I said that regardless of our differences of opinion over the interpretation of the documents there was of course no obligation on the part of India, Poland and Canada to accept an invitation to serve on a Vietnamese electoral Commission. My own feeling was that it would be difficult for any country to accept membership in any electoral Commission of this importance, if the terms of reference were as vague as those set forth in para 7. Dutt disagreed. His view appears to be that in the initial stages the electoral Commission would act merely as a good-offices Commission to help to bring the two parties together and that before it reached the later stages of its work the members would have been able to reach agreement on the extent and nature of their responsibilities. His main argument, of course, is that it is ridiculous to think that without some outside assistance the consultations between the competent representative authorities of the two zones which are required to begin on July 20, 1955, will be held.

8. On the question of freedom of movement in Viet Nam Dutt said that Desai in his most recent fortnightly report to the Ministry had expressed concern about the attitude which the Democratic Republic has adopted. Desai apparently has indicated his personal opinion as being that the Commission should not make any further recommendations on freedom of movement until the Commission has had an opportunity to observe the record of the Democratic Republic authorities on its most recent recommendations. Although Dutt appreciates our concern about the lack of freedom of movement in the north he is not, I believe, convinced that the problem is as serious or relatively as important as we think it is. My reason for believing this is that when he spoke about the lack of freedom of movement in the north he counterbalanced his remarks about it by referring to

(a) The difficulty which the Commission encountered over a Democratic Republic liaison officer accompanying it to Saigon on its most recent visit there.

(b) The recent incident in the south when a member of the International Commission was stoned when the Commission visited a refugee camp and

(c) Democratic Republic complaints that French ships have entered its territorial waters.

9. It was only at the end of our conversation that I was able to bring up the situation in the two northern provinces of Laos. I said that Canada was anxious to ensure that Article 19 of the Laotian Agreement was fully respected and that, if there was sufficient evidence that the Pathet Lao were contravening it, our Commissioner would feel impelled to press for a clearcut decision of the Commission even if this meant a split vote.

[Ottawa], February 28, 1955

CANADIAN RESPONSIBILITIES WITH RESPECT TO ELECTIONS IN VIETNAM

It is our view that Canada has no binding legal obligation to supervise the general elections in Vietnam, though we are under a certain moral obligation to do so. Our present responsibilities in Indochina derive from the invitation issued by the co-chairman of the Geneva conference on July 21, 1954, to the Governments of India, Poland and Canada. The three governments were invited "to designate representatives to form the International Supervisory Commissions for Vietnam, Laos and Cambodia as envisaged in the agreements on the cessation of hostilities, and on supervision in those three countries." No reference was made in the invitation to the supervision of elections, nor was any reference made to this task in the messages of acceptance to the co-chairman from the Indians, the Poles or ourselves. In the press statement issued when we announced our acceptance of the invitation to participate in the supervision of the cease fire, however, we said that "India, Poland and Canada are also expected to assume responsibility at a later stage for supervising elections".<sup>9</sup>

2. The main reference to elections in Vietnam is contained in the Final Declaration of the Geneva Conference. Paragraph 7 of the Final Declaration states in part:

"In order to ensure that sufficient progress in the restoration of peace has been made and that all the necessary conditions obtain for free expression of the national will, general elections shall be held in July 1956, under the supervision of an international commission composed of representatives of the Member States of the International Supervisory Commission, referred to in the agreement on the cessation of hostilities".

See Canada, Department of External Affairs, External Affairs, Volume 6, No. 8, August 1954, pp. 257-259.

It is clear from this passage that the Commission which is to supervise the elections is to be a separate and distinct body from the Commission which is now supervising the implementation of the cease-fire agreement.

3. The only allusion to general elections in the Vietnam agreement is a passing reference in Article 14(a) which relates to the conduct of civil administration in the regrouping zones. ("Pending the general elections which will bring about the unification of Vietnam, the conduct of civil administration . . .") Elsewhere in the Vietnam Agreement the functions of the International Supervisory Commission are defined as relating solely to the supervision of the implementation of the cease-fire terms: nowhere is there any reference to the responsibilities of the Commission powers with respect to the supervision of elections.

4. Our obligation to participate in the supervision of the elections derives from the passage in the Final Declaration quoted in paragraph two above and from the statement made in the press release of July 28, 1954 quoted in paragraph one above. In addition, our acceptance of responsibilities with respect to the supervision of the cease-fire creates a reasonable presumption that we will consider sympathetically an invitation to participate in the supervision of elections. It would be difficult for us to refuse such an invitation without good and sufficient reason.

5. It is the opinion of the Legal Division that the Final Declaration constitutes a formal statement of policy rather than an instrument, such as a treaty, intended to create binding legal obligations. The question of binding legal obligations deriving from the Final Declaration does not arise in any case so far as Canada is concerned, since we were not a party to it. The issue from our point of view is whether the agreed policy with respect to the supervision of elections is a full and sufficient basis for the Commission powers to proceed with this task without any further act of confirmation by the Geneva Conference Powers. It is our belief that it does not form a sufficient basis for this purpose, and this belief is strengthened by the fact that the invitation to the Commission powers to supervise the armistice did not make any reference to our responsibilities for supervising the elections.

6. It is our view therefore that the Commission powers should not assume responsibilities with respect to the supervision of elections without some further invitation or directive from the Geneva Conference powers defining our task in greater detail than the Final Declaration does. In such an important operation precise terms of reference for the elections commission will be most necessary, and in our view the Commission Powers should not draft their own terms of reference and proceed to act on them merely on the basis of the general statement of policy in the Final Declaration, and without further reference to the Geneva Conference Powers. It is vitally important that the Geneva Conference Powers, which outlined the general nature of the political settlement for Vietnam, should assume responsibility for the manner in which it is to be effected, and that this should not be left to the Commission Powers.

7. When we accepted the invitation to participate in the supervision of the armistice, we said in the press release of July 28 "A study of the information available has led us to the conclusion that the Commissions have a reasonable chance of operating effectively and of making a constructive contribution to the successful implementation of the cease-fire agreements, and hence to peace in Southeast Asia". Before accepting a firm commitment to participate in the supervision of elections, we would similarly wish to be reasonably sure that an elections commission could function effectively and constructively. We cannot satisfy ourselves in this regard unless the task of the elections commission is defined more precisely than it is in the Final Declaration.

8. It should be borne in mind that the Final Declaration makes no mention whatsoever of any part the Commission Powers might play in the consultations prior to the holding of elections between the competent representative authorities of the two zones of Vietnam. It is our opinion that any responsibilities which we might assume in this regard should be assumed only at the request of the governments of the two zones and with the consent of the Geneva Conference powers.

J. L[ÉGER]

P.S. The Indians will not agree with this interpretation nor the Poles if it does not suit them. The situation in fact is very complex.

TELEGRAM 120

Hanoi, March 12, 1955

SECRET. IMMEDIATE.

Reference: My telegram No. 117 of March 12.†

FREEDOM OF MOVEMENT

1. At today's meeting of Commission I introduced general question of Democratic Republic failure to implement satisfactorily Article 14(d) as evidenced by situation at Luu My and near Vinh where Indian signals courier, into whose jeep petitions had been thrown, had been rudely used by Democratic Republic personnel and some of the petitions taken from him. I also referred to French claims that from 70,000-90,000 persons wishing to go south still remain in Phat Diem and other Catholic areas.

2. Against this background I stressed time element facing Commission and formally proposed course of action summarized in paragraph 18 of my telegram under reference. I emphasized that in addition to immediate report to Geneva powers, Commission must make second report on April 1st, so that powers may know whether Commission has sufficient authority to ensure Article 14(d) implemented before May 18, thus giving powers six weeks to devise new solution if necessary. I underlined importance of special mobile teams remaining continuously in action in their respective areas until May 18 if necessary.

3. After my statement meeting adjourned for three hours. Commission then considered my proposals under following headings discussed seriatim.

(a) Sending mobile teams.

4. Polish Ambassador asserted that the reports of mobile teams do not bear out my contention that Democratic Republic is failing to implement article. He intimated that position in south was not clear and that if teams were sent out in the north they should also be sent out in the south. He also thought that the Commission should take note of the positions adopted by the two parties which seem to suggest that there may be some willingness to go beyond the time limit but he worded this portion of his remarks most ambiguously.

5. Indian Chairman supported me strongly in rejecting the suggestion that freedom of movement picture in the south is also unsatisfactory. With his assistance, the Pole was persuaded to agree that Freedoms Committee will study question urgently to determine exact number of teams required, and that teams will be sent out as soon as possible. At Indian suggestion it was also agreed to call a meeting with the high command i.e. General Giap to explain the action contemplated and the reasons for it. This is the first time such a procedure has been proposed.

(b) Devising stronger means of ensuring implementation.

6. It was agreed that the teams would stay in area until May 18 and Mr. Desai indicated support my proposal that team should report situation to Commission by April 1st and then remain in area to supervise active execution of recommendations concerning freedom of movement. The question of what other measures may be taken by the Commission at this time will be further discussed on Monday.

(c) Reporting to Geneva.

7. Mr. Desai was of the opinion that it would not be fair to make a special report to Geneva on Article 14(d) alone. In any event he thinks the Geneva powers would be helpless to take any practical steps to improve freedom of movement. Accordingly he feels that no useful purpose would be served in approaching the powers before the Commission is prepared to place blame. I argued that the Commission has a duty to report to the powers any instance of failure to fulfill an obligation laid down in the agreement. The Chairman, however, believes it to be unnecessary to report on every sub-article in ad hoc manner and implied that at least until the new procedure had been put into effect the question of Democratic Republic failure to cooperate fully under Article 14(d) falls into this category. This aspect of the question will be considered again after meeting on Monday afternoon with Democratic Republic High Command.

8. While pleased with general support received from Indian and softness of Polish objections to my proposals, I am not yet prepared to throw my hat in the air. I am relieved, however, that an encouraging start has been made to face up to the full implication of freedom of movement. In putting the proposals forward I did not overlook possibility of incidents arising in these areas but consider that this is a risk which must be taken if Commission is to carry out its task. The suggestion that Democratic Republic High Command should be informed of their responsibilities in implementing recommendations and facilitating teams' mission should, if accepted by the Democratic Republic, materially reduce risk.

9. Any comment or objection you might wish to make on our proposals or procedures to date should be sent immediately as matters will develop speedily on Monday.

FREEDOM OF MOVEMENT

1. Commission today came to the following conclusions concerning Canadian proposals. With this background the Commission will meet General Giap, probably tomorrow.

A. Sending mobile teams.

2. The previous decision was reaffirmed and the Freedoms Committee was instructed to make recommendations about the number of teams and the provinces in which they should investigate.

B. Stronger measures to ensure implementation.

3. Initially the teams will make a rapid survey of as large an area as possible in order to determine the situation with respect to freedom of movement. On the basis of the teams' reports, Commission will come to a conclusion by the end of this month about the implementation of its recommendations on freedom of movement. Consideration would then be given to whether it would be necessary for the teams to remain in the field and to be given new instructions on the basis of which they would effectively supervise the execution of the Commission's recommendations. This would be done by staying in particular places until they were satisfied that people who wished to go and live in the south were on the way to the demarcation line.

C. Reporting to Geneva.

4. The first point requiring a decision was whether the Commission was in a position to say whether or not the Democratic Republic of Vietnam had implemented the Commission's recommendations of February 2 on freedom of movement. Mr. Desai holds the view that it is not for the Commission to find a violation of an article of the agreement by one of the parties until the Commission has found performance unsatisfactory, has made recommendations, (Article 39) and has found that the recommendations have not been implemented (Article 43). The question, therefore, was whether the Democratic Republic of Vietnam had implemented the freedom of movement recommendations. I was obliged to admit that the Commission does not have at this time a chapter and verse case by which it can say that the recommendations have not been implemented. The findings at Luu My are not acceptable to the Chairman as proving that the recommendations have not been implemented by the APVN because the team commenced its investigation at the same time as the recommendations were issued and left Luu My just before the end of the two week period which was given to the two sides to put the recommendations into practice. With respect to increasing attempts by the populace in various parts of the country to throw petitions into passing jeeps of the Commission, these petitions have not been analyzed. Mr.

Desai stated clearly that as yet the Commission can only say that local officials have not implemented 14(d). On the basis of the reports of the teams which are about to go out, the Commission should then be in a position to say whether the APVN High Command have not implemented the recommendations or cannot effectively implement them before May 18.

5. My compromise proposal that the Commission should now report to the co-chairmen upon major questions which have to be settled by May 18 also did not commend itself to the Chairman. He took the view that the two interim reports already issued adequately reflected these continuing tasks of the Commission which require full implementation by May 18.<sup>10</sup> He proposed, and the Commission agreed, that when the mobile teams are sent out a press release will be issued explaining why these teams are being sent and what action the Commission is taking by way of implementation of its recommendations.

6. A decision can then be taken when the survey is completed as to the action to be taken with reference to the Geneva powers. It is clearly Mr. Desai's views that the Commission must itself do all it can within the terms of the agreement and that the Geneva powers can be of little help. He mentioned the possibility that the commission may wish to act under article 41 (second paragraph) to formulate a recommendation to the two parties for an extension of the present time-limit for article 14(d), assuming unanimous agreement could be reached for such a recommendation. Finally, he does not exclude, although he will not [support] at this stage, possible action by the Geneva powers through diplomatic channels to assist in solving this problem.

7. In brief, our proposals of March 12 have not been accepted at this stage so far as a recommendation to the Geneva powers is concerned. But I think our efforts have produced a greater sense of urgency on part of Mr. Desai, and the Pole has come along rather half-heartedly in this issue as well as a practical plan which, if the Democratic Republic High Command accepts it, may do some good. We realize, of course, the danger is that after April 1 we may not be able to secure unanimity for recommendations under article 41 because the Poles may disagree. Nor am I satisfied as yet that a simple extension of the 300 day period for 14(d) would be of much use if Democratic Republic cooperation with respect to this provision is as inadequate in the new period as it has been in the past.

8. Colonel Tedlie of this (team?) recently returned from mission through Vinh area, reports that large number of petitions were pressed upon Commission team from people wishing to move, and that Commission vehicles are being used as 'post offices' for this purpose. Despite fact that action of kind we have proposed with reference to Geneva powers is not acceptable at this stage, I have no doubt that Democratic Republic are not carrying out February 1 recommendations with respect to 14(d).

9. We are considering further the implications of this possibility and what course of action we could take at such a late date to ensure that recommendations are implemented. We would appreciate your suggestions on this matter by telegram.

FREEDOM OF MOVEMENT

We have become increasingly concerned over the lack of evidence that the Vietminh were implementing the Commission's recommendations of February 1. We fully endorse your proposals for vigorous action on this subject and are pleased to note the degree of success you have had so far. Pressure for action on this subject should be kept up provided it does not threaten interference with completion of the regroupment of forces. We presume that the Vietminh will be sufficiently eager to take over Haiphong that strong pressure regarding freedom of movement is unlikely to affect the regroupment arrangements.

2. There is a question as to what action the Geneva Conference Powers could or would take on the freedom of movement question when the facts are formally brought to their attention by the Commission. You should endeavour to have the report (a) make clear the failure of the Vietminh to fulfil their obligations under (i) Article 14(d) and under (ii) the recommendations of the Commission on implementation and (b) make specific recommendations on how this situation might be rectified by extension of the 300-day period, adequate exit permit system, transportation assistance, etc. A report of this kind would facilitate the task of the western powers in pressing the Russians and Chinese to put pressure on the Vietminh to comply.

3. As regards the timing of the Commission's report we note from your telegram No. 121 that your efforts to have an immediate report made have not been successful but that the question will be reconsidered when the mobile teams have made their survey. You should continue to press for a special report to be made on this question as soon as possible because if it is delayed until after May 18 the Geneva Conference powers may take the position that insufficient warning had been given to enable them to take corrective action before the end of the 300-day period. As a last resort we think you should be able to make a case that a general report should be made by April 11 covering an additional two-month period.

4. It might be suggested that teams sent out in accordance with Freedom Committee's recommendations (Paragraph 5 of your telegram No. 120) should get from local authorities statistics of permits issued.

FREEDOM OF MOVEMENT

1. Agreement was reached in the Commission March 10 for despatch of 3 mobile teams to survey freedom of movement facilities in (a) Red River Delta provinces Thai Binh, Nam Dinh and Ninh Binh, (b) Than Hoa (c) Nghe An and Ha Tinh.
2. Teams are leaving today. Meanwhile, detailed briefing has included special session with Commission.
3. Mr. Desai has told Commission that General Giap has offered full cooperation and assistance in the work of teams in connection with Article 14(d). Democratic Republic were prepared to make available the necessary high level liaison officers to accompany the 3 teams, and local authorities will be advised by the High Command to lend full assistance. General Giap mentioned that he hoped teams would take note of "other side" of the problem, i.e., that pressure had been put upon people to make them go south. To this Mr. Desai had replied that the Commission had already looked into this question and that its present task was to implement 14(d) and we had to get on with it.
4. Further developments must now depend upon the findings of the teams. Obviously it is difficult to say what effect the approach to the High Command will have on the position in the provinces. There would seem to be 2 main possibilities.
  - (a) It may be that the Democratic Republic seriously intend to appear accommodating with respect to 14(d) and will take action locally to avoid being charged under Article 43 with failure to implement recommendations of the Commission. If measure of cooperation is extended to the teams, and satisfactory local procedures can be organized to facilitate free movement during the period of the initial survey, and also in the subsequent period up to May 18, to avoid any clear finding of non-implementation of the Commission's recommendations, it will be difficult for the Commission not to conclude that an effort is being made by the Democratic Republic to assume its obligations, despite previous findings, and our general conviction that 14(d) is not being implemented. If teams on the spot do not find the kind of obstruction we have met in the past, it will be difficult for the Commission to make the kind of finding with respect to the Democratic Republic which it deserves in light of past behavior. Previous experience of such surveys has indicated that evidence upon which to base a clear finding is often extremely difficult to obtain.
  - (b) The second main possibility is that the teams (or perhaps merely a Canadian-Indian majority) will find that, despite the High Command's promise of assistance, the problem of freedom of movement exists in large dimensions, and that the facilities to cope with it at this late stage are lamentably inadequate because of Democratic Republic failure to implement recommendations of February 2.

5. In Commission discussion March 14, Mr. Desai said if on considering magnitude of problem that might exist after survey, it was found that implementation of 14(d) was not possible within the limited period of 6 weeks, Commission had authority under Article 41 to propose an amendment to agreement extending the present time limit for 14(d) and that proposed report after initial survey to Geneva powers could be made exhaustive so as to indicate entire situation. Thus, the chairman has left door open to 2 possible courses by Commission action after fortnight survey.

(a) If implementation not thought possible within 300 day time limit, Commission could go immediately to a next stage under Article 41, and recommend extension, or

(b) A report to Geneva powers under Article 43 of a refusal by High Command to implement Commission recommendation.

6. In examining the position we should take, the important thing is to recall the principle aim of this whole effort. It has been our assumption that the principal aim is a practical one, i.e. to see that as many people who wish to move south are permitted to do so, and that this practical aim takes precedence over other considerations. The programme on which we are now embarking is in fact a compromise between the ideas I first advanced last week, when, on basis of Luu My report I pressed unsuccessfully for a report to the Geneva powers that the High Command had failed to implement the Commission's recommendations, and approach of Mr. Desai who has sought to work with and through the High Command to achieve the practical purposes of 14(d). I think that our approach has given our Indian colleagues a greater sense of urgency in this matter, to which we attach importance and I would hope that so far as possible we will be able to continue to work with them.

7. After first week of April, Commission must take certain specific decisions and our own position must be as clear as possible. There appear to be 2 main courses.

(a) Assuming team reports indicate no significant improvement, Commission will have to bring in a strong finding that DR has not implemented recommendations on question of DR responsibility Commission is unlikely to reach unanimous agreement which has hitherto prevailed except on a statement much weaker than anything we might consider necessary in the circumstances. It is most doubtful that the Pole will support strong finding against DR. It is difficult to forecast Mr. Desai's reaction and the question arises therefore whether we consider this question is of sufficient importance, in the context of the whole agreement, and in light of the fact that the regroupment has not yet been completed, to press matters even to a vote if necessary for a strong condemnation, (a) if possible, the support of the Chairman, and (b) if necessary, by ourselves in a minority position. In this connection, there is no doubt that Mr. Desai attaches the greatest importance to the maintenance of unanimity and, although he may agree, that if the facts of the survey warrant it, he should press for a finding against the DR, he would probably oppose any recorded vote on the question. The finding against the DR would then be reported to the Geneva powers without a request for an extension, but with a request that Geneva powers take such action as they deem necessary to bring about implementation of Article 14(d) by May 18. We consider it possible that strong finding on condemnation could mean end of any practical cooperation that may be possible, even before May 18, and on freedom of movement, and that this might affect orderly transfer of Haiphong.

(b) The second course is based on premise that DR may cooperate to some extent, but that dimensions of problem require continued effort and vigilance until May 18 and possibly justify an extension of present 300-day period. In December, the French Liaison Mission submitted a formal request to the Commission, on behalf of French high command, requesting that the 300-day period for 14(d) be extended "for the benefit of the population of Tonkin". This request was based upon view that population was not being permitted to use its right of option and that the Haiphong transfer would be jeopardized if transfers of material, which must be completed by the end of 300-day period, were hindered by large groups of people at the end of the period requesting transport to the south. Request was therefore put forward both on practical ground as well as on principle.

8. The Commission took no decision on this request at the time since it was decided to press forward with the recommendations of February 2 and to explore all possibilities of solving problems within the existing period. Our present view is that an extension of the 300-day period would only be justified under certain specific conditions:

(a) The team's report would have to show that a serious problem continues to exist and that an extension could reasonably be expected to have the practical consequence of making it possible for substantial groups of people to move;

(b) The French view of December 23 must have present support of French Government;

(c) We should be certain that any move for an extension has the support of the United Kingdom Government as the Geneva power with which we are most closely associated;

(d) Finally, it should be accompanied by DR assurances that they will continue to implement the provisions of Article 14(d) in the extended period, as they have recently undertaken to do.

In other words, I doubt that we should ourselves propose an extension without being entirely sure of our ground. However, if the Chairman should propose an extension, I think it would be extremely difficult for us not to support him, and if necessary to go on record to this effect.

9. I doubt that the DR, whose concurrence would be essential under Article 41, would in fact agree to an extension, since continuance of present procedure under 14(d) has created serious civil difficulties for them. There is further point that unless there is a complete change of heart on the part of the DR, which I doubt, (the present DR offer of cooperation extends only to fortnight survey) it is most unlikely that 14(d) would operate any more effectively in the extension period than it has in the past, and an extension period might result in further clashes and loss of life, such as occurred at Luu My and Ba Lang so long as Article 14(d) continues in force, the populations affected in the north face serious reprisals and persecutions which the Commission can do little to prevent. In other words, there is something to be said for not extending the 300-day period, despite the individual hardships which may be caused. I recognize, however, that this would be a policy difficult to defend in terms of western opinion.

10. These are the considerations involved. On balance, I consider that if there is any prospect of DR assistance, even at this late period, and a sizable problem can be shown to exist, we should pursue the practical course and press use of mobile teams to assist actively in facilitating movement till May 18, and support an extension providing the conditions outlined in paragraph 8 above can be met.

11. Your views, therefore, are urgently requested on the specific action we should take (a) with respect to our action on a finding against the DR, assuming that the reports of the present survey warrant it (b) in regard to either sponsoring or supporting a recommendation for extension. Your telegram makes it clear that you favour full report on situation to Geneva powers as soon as possible after survey completed and, in any event, we shall, of course, press for this and urge continued action by mobile teams up to May 18.

ELECTIONS IN VIETNAM

Our views on elections in Vietnam have not been conveyed to the Indians in the same form as you passed them to the Foreign Office with your letter of January 26.† Most of the same points have, however, been made to them at the meeting on February 5 during the Prime Ministers' conference,<sup>11</sup> in the short memorandum passed to Pillai after that meeting,<sup>12</sup> and by Mr. Reid in his interview with Dutt reported in New Delhi telegram No. 121 of February 25.<sup>13</sup>

2. You may inform the Foreign Office that we could make no objection to their conveying to the Indians the substance of Tomlinson's letter of February 28, though they may wish to reconsider the matter in view of the points set out below.

3. You should in any case ask the Foreign Office not (repeat not) to pass to the Indians the actual text of their letter of February 28. We were most disturbed to note from paragraphs two and three of that letter that the Foreign Office apparently has the impression that our misgivings and reservations with respect to a free hand and a broad mandate for the Commission powers in the presentations for the elections arise from our reluctance to engage ourselves any further than necessary in Indochina. You should make very clear to the Foreign Office that this is not the point at all, and that our attitude is based on the following considerations.

4. Our concern in the first place relates to the object of the inter-zonal consultations and the manner in which they will be conducted. From our reading of the last sentence of paragraph 7 of the Final Declaration we understand that representatives of the two zones are to meet in a bilateral conference in which each side will have full power of veto: the object is voluntary agreement on procedures for conducting the elections. The right of either side to reserve its position on any point might be seriously prejudiced if the present international commission or an elections commission were in a position to make recommendations to the parties as to how disputes are to be resolved. If the present international commission were to perform in relation to the consultations in the same manner that it now conducts its business in relation to the implementation of the cease fire agreements the results could be extremely serious, particularly for South Vietnam. Even if the parties were not legally bound to accept the recommendations of the Commission, a refusal to accept such recommendations would put the party concerned in the wrong morally. South Vietnam will certainly insist on elaborate safeguards to ensure that elections are really free, and its refusal to accept "compromise" solutions advanced by an international commission will put it at a very serious disadvantage in relation to Asian public opinion. The pattern of Indian performance in the present Commission suggests that in relation to disputes on electoral procedures they would be inclined to find a middle way which might frequently involve "compromise" rulings, thus whittling down the safeguards for free elections which will certainly be required in any agreement with a Communist state on this subject. Similarly an elections commission set up without restricted terms of reference would probably tend to adopt the conventions of the present Commission, with results similar to those mentioned above. For these reasons we believe it is vitally important that the United Kingdom as a "co-chairman" power should not suggest or agree to any arrangement which would have the ultimate result of putting the South Vietnam Government at a very serious disadvantage in the consultations.

5. We realize that the United Kingdom may not wish at this time to reconvene a little Geneva Conference or to become involved in prolonged and difficult diplomatic exchanges with the USSR and other Geneva Conference powers on terms of reference for an electoral commission in the consultations stage. We believe therefore that urgent consideration should be given to the devising of a simple formula which will sufficiently restrict the role of the commission powers to meet the difficulties mentioned in the previous and following paragraphs.

6. There is another reason for our wish to see the role of the Commission powers carefully restricted in the early stages of the political settlement. We do not think that a Commission made up of Indian, Polish and Canadian representatives with indeterminate powers should be given the opportunity to make the important decisions in the working out of a political settlement. The course of the inter-zonal consultations on elections will undoubtedly have important implications for the future not only in Vietnam but elsewhere in Southeast Asia. Accordingly we believe that the Geneva Conference Powers, which have a greater stake than the Commission powers in stable conditions in Southeast Asia, should take responsibility for each stage of the political settlement. The United Kingdom and France, as Geneva Conference powers and as members of SEATO, are in a position to exert an important influence on the working out of the political settlement and in our view they should not lightly surrender their powers in this regard to a Commission whose decisions and influence we are not likely to be able to control on their behalf. Although we have a great deal of confidence in the Indians' judgment, in view of their apparent attitude towards a political settlement in Vietnam we are not sure that in this context the Indian approach is always going to work towards conclusions that are in the best interests of free Asia.

7. We are now preparing a paper on the initial stages of the political settlement which we hope to be able to forward to you shortly for transmission to the United Kingdom authorities. At that time we will have some further comments to make on Tomlinson's letter.

POLITICAL SETTLEMENT IN VIETNAM — PART TO BE PLAYED BY INDIA, POLAND AND CANADA

You may wish to examine the attached departmental paper† (with synopsis) on this subject. This paper has been sent to London for transmission to the Foreign Office as a basis for discussion. It has been transmitted as an informal working paper indicating the stage which has been reached in departmental thinking on this subject.

2. The paper was written with a view to the possibility of making copies available to the Indians as well as to the United Kingdom. For this reason the general theme — in favour of a restricted and informal role for the Commission powers during the consultations on elections in Vietnam — is worked out on the merits of the case without reference to the policies or attitudes of the three Commission powers themselves. The United Kingdom has been advised independently of our concern lest the establishment of the elections commission envisaged in the Final Declaration of the Geneva Conference to assist the parties in their consultations might result in some attempt by India, with Polish support, to force the pace of the inter-zonal consultations and to make firm recommendations as to the details of an agreement on electoral procedures and a political settlement.

3. The paper makes a case against the employment of either the present International Supervisory Commission or the prospective elections commission to assist in the inter-zonal consultations. Although it does not come to any firm conclusions, it suggests some informal methods by which India, Poland and Canada might make available to the parties such good offices and technical advice as they may request in the course of their consultations.

4. There would, I believe, be advantage in pressing for the adoption of the proposals put forward in the concluding section of the paper for some informal arrangement which would enable the Commission powers to assist in the consultations. The appointment of individual conciliators by each of the three governments who might if they wished form themselves into a good offices committee would enable them to fulfil the moral obligation on these three governments to do what they can to assist in the inter-zonal consultations. At the same time under this arrangement we would not be irrevocably committed to membership on an International Elections Commission nor to the supervision of elections which might not meet our standards of fairness. If, as seems likely, the inter-zonal consultations on elections continue interminably or break down, it would be much easier for us to drop out of some informal good offices committee than to withdraw a representative from a formally established elections commission.

5. We have asked the United Kingdom to let us know whether they think it would be helpful if we were to pass this paper to the Indian authorities in its present form. We would be grateful for your own opinion on this point.<sup>14</sup>

POLITICAL SETTLEMENT IN VIETNAM
SUMMARY

1. Purpose: To examine the steps which must be taken preparatory to the holding of elections in Vietnam and the possible role to be played during this preliminary stage by India, Poland and Canada. (Paragraph 1).
2. The Cease-Fire Agreement for Vietnam is primarily a military armistice agreement. There is only one non-military provision which is likely to require continuing action and is hence likely to have a bearing on the political phase of the settlement — i.e. Article 14(c) concerning democratic liberties. (Paragraphs 2-4).
3. The responsibilities of the present International Supervisory Commission are confined to the supervision of the implementation of the cease fire agreement, and do not include responsibility with respect to the preparations for elections. (Paragraph 5).
4. The Final Declaration of the Geneva Conference lays down the general principles for a political settlement in Vietnam. In the working out of the political settlement account must be taken of all the provisions of Paragraph 7 concerning conditions for a political settlement — the requirement for elections in 1956 must be read in context. (Paragraphs 6-15).
5. The provision in the Final Declaration for the holding of consultations between the two zones of Vietnam is the first one that must be implemented. Account must be taken of the fact that the State of Vietnam did not declare its acceptance of the Final Declaration at the Geneva Conference and may not consider itself bound by its terms. (Paragraphs 16-18).
6. The object of the consultations is the reaching of a voluntary agreement between the two parties concerning the prior conditions for elections, the holding of the elections themselves under international supervision, and the nature and functions of the body to be elected. (Paragraphs 19-23).
7. The question as to who should convene the consultations and what the convening authority (if a third party) should do will require some consideration. (Paragraphs 24-33).
8. In view of its organization and functions the present International Supervisory Commission is not really suitable for the good offices task that may be required in connection with the inter-zonal consultations on elections. (Paragraphs 34-44).

I would be glad to leave it to your judgement as I have not had time to study the document. L.B.
P[earson]

9. The prospective international commission for the supervision of elections would probably be similarly unsuitable; furthermore employment of this body for a good offices task might prejudice the authority it will require for the proper performance of its main job. (Paragraphs 45-48).

10. India, Poland and Canada might assist the parties in their consultations by appointing conciliators to provide such good offices and technical advice as the parties might request. The conciliators might either work independently or as an informal good offices committee. (Paragraphs 49-58).

FREEDOM OF MOVEMENT

In approaching this problem I believe we should keep in mind that the primary objective is to enable as many people as possible who wish to do so to go from one zone to the other, and that the secondary objectives are (a) to ensure that the public record of the commission — and of Canada — shows that everything possible has been done to achieve the primary objective and (b) to ensure that the Commission's handling of this question will not leave the Viet Minh with an apparently clean bill of health and will not involve some compromise on principles, thus creating an unfortunate precedent for the political phase of the settlement.

2. It appears that the most likely method of achieving these objectives will be to maintain the strong and critical attitude we have previously adopted on this question, on the theory that fear of public criticism is the best stick with which to goad the Viet Minh into action, and that we will also be able to draw the Indians into agreeing to a fairly strong line.

3. If the reports of the teams now making the survey produce plenty of clear and incontrovertible evidence that the Viet Minh are not carrying out the Commission's recommendations and that there are many people who still wish to go south, and have been hindered from doing so, you might inform the Commission you consider the matter of such a serious nature that you will refer it to your Government and seek its views as to whether or not a violation should be called and a reference made to the Geneva Powers. This you might do by DWS. We do not, however, regard this as a likely eventuality, and the following instructions are based on the assumption that the team reports will not produce enough dependable evidence that the Viet Minh have not been carrying out the recommendations of the Commission or that there are large numbers of people who still wish to go south, but that the lack of evidence will not remove our belief that the Viet Minh have evaded their responsibilities under 14(d) and that many people do not apply for permits to move owing to fear of reprisals.

4. If the teams' evidence is of the type suggested above, you should take the attitude that while there may not now be sufficient solid evidence to call a violation of 14(d) firm measures are nevertheless required. You could agree to any proposals which the Indians may put forward to ensure that the Viet Minh continue to take all necessary action between now and May 18 to carry out 14(d), but express scepticism about the adequacy of these measures to fulfil the requirements of the agreement. You should also insist that a telegraphic report on the situation be sent to the Geneva Conference co-chairmen and that this report include a request that the members of the Geneva Conference, in accordance with paragraph 13 of the Final Declaration, consult one another in order to study such measures as may prove necessary to ensure that the terms of Article 14(d) are properly respected, in view of the short time remaining for the implementation of this article and the unsatisfactory record on its implementation up to the present time. If the Indians and Poles will not agree to inserting this request in the report to the Geneva co-chairmen, you should have it included as a minority report.

5. As the foregoing should represent the minimum we are prepared to accept, it will probably be necessary for you to adopt a more extreme position for purposes of your discussions with Desai or in the Commission. The two cards which you can reluctantly agree not to play at this time are (a) the calling of a violation and (b) the recommendation now of an extension of the period for freedom of movement under 14(d). In surrendering these two points in order to achieve the position outlined in the previous paragraph you should do everything possible to get Desai to agree that if it is clear towards the end of the 300-day period that a problem still exists and that the Viet Minh have not made full amends for their poor performance in the past on 14(d), he will go along with a recommendation for an extension of the period for freedom of movement. We realize that he may not be prepared to commit himself now, but you should in any case make it clear that if we are not satisfied towards the close of the 300-day period that the problem has been substantially cleared up, we will certainly propose an extension of the period or support a French request for an extension.

6. We realize that a request to the Geneva Powers to study the measures necessary to ensure performance on this part of the agreement may not produce any useful practical results. We do not, however, wish a situation to come about in which responsibility for not ensuring full performance on this article will rest wholly on the Commission. This responsibility should in our view be shared with the Geneva Conference Powers, particularly as the requirement for freedom of movement is specifically mentioned in paragraph 8 of the Final Declaration.

7. The United Kingdom Foreign Office has suggested that the Commission might invite the Viet Minh to confirm that their declaration of February 4 (calling for free exchanges in all spheres between the two zones of Vietnam) meant that they were willing to continue the application of Article 14(d) after May 18. Such a proposal or a variant of it, involving the direct negotiation of some voluntary arrangement between the parties to finish off the freedom of movement question, may be advanced by the Indians or the Poles. Such a proposal would require careful scrutiny particularly to ensure that any such arrangement would continue to be under the Commission's supervision notwithstanding the expiration of the 300 day period, since any voluntary undertaking by the Viet Minh to complete its obligations under 14(d) by some arrangement outside the Agreement would enable them to argue that their performance was no longer subject to Commission supervision.

8. A United Kingdom Foreign Office view (in favour of an extension and suggesting the approach to the Viet Minh mentioned in the previous paragraph) will be conveyed to you separately. Stephenson, the United Kingdom Ambassador in Saigon, has recommended against the proposed approach to the Viet Minh.

9. We do not intend asking the French whether or when they may renew their request for an extension of the period for freedom of movement.

10. You may use your discretion as to whether you should first state your case privately to Desai or introduce it directly in the full Commission, but Mr. Lett believes that it might be advisable to approach Desai privately in the first instance.

11. This telegram was drafted in consultation with Mr. Lett and has his concurrence.

TELEGRAM 168

Hanoi, April 11, 1955

SECRET. IMMEDIATE.

Reference: Your telegrams No. 139 and No. 141† of April 7 (received April 10).

1. Your instructions both timely and helpful. As Mr. Lett suggested (para 10 of your No. 139) I saw Mr. Desai this morning and had a useful general discussion with him. I began by emphasizing the serious view we took of the problem of freedom of movement. While our primary aim was to see that as many people as possible who wished to take advantage of Article 14(d) are permitted and helped to do so, it was important that both Canada and India do everything possible to ensure that this provision is fully implemented and that the Geneva powers are left in no doubt that the situation at the present time is unsatisfactory so that they can consider appropriate action.

2. From our discussion the following points re Indian position seem reasonably clear

(a) Mr. Desai is not, repeat not, prepared at this time to find a violation against the DR High Command with respect to the implementation of 14(d). His reasons are twofold. First: He stated that legally on the basis of the language of 14(d) which refers to "local authorities" it would be difficult, if not impossible, to pin responsibility on the High Command in view of their posture of cooperation and offer of facilities. It would always be possible for the High Command to place the blame on the local authorities and even to take action against them in individual cases. But it would be very difficult to make conclusive finding, e.g. that under Article 43, they had refused to put into effect a recommendation of the Commission. Second: If we insisted upon finding a violation the Poles were sure to bring up question of reciprocity with respect to 14(c) where the record of French and the South Vietnamese Government, in cases like Poulo Condore and Chi Hoa has been extremely unsatisfactory. On the basis of the reports received at this time while there was a good deal of information to indicate that the freedom of movement situation was bad, it would be better to bring the serious facts of the situation out without finding a violation, particularly if we were anxious to obtain as much DR cooperation as possible in the remaining period. I told Mr. Desai that while all the reports were not yet available the facts indicate that the DR are not carrying out Commission's recommendations and are not implementing 14(d) and I reserved the right to bring this out clearly in the Commission. We can assume, however, that there will be no support from Mr. Desai on the specific finding of a violation against the DR.

3.(b) On question of extension I spoke to him on the lines of your paragraph 5 indicating that our teams have only been able to scratch the surface and that problem is substantial one. Even with good will on the part of the DR problem could not be resolved within the 300 day period and Commission may have to consider recommending extension. I think his views were realistic on this. He emphasized that the prime mover in this matter should be the French authorities since continuance of freedom of movement after May 18 was a gilt edged sword. While under an extended period and with Commission supervision more people would be able to move. The facilities of 14(d) could be exploited by the Vietminh to infiltrate large numbers of their agents into the south. He hoped that we would not on our own initiative and without prior consultation with the French put forward a proposal for extension at this time. He also mentioned the point brought out in paragraph 7 of your telegram No. 139 that the DR may take the initiative in proposing a theoretical unlimited extension on the line of their declaration of February 4.<sup>15</sup> On this point I stressed the need for examining any such proposal with great care since an unsupervised extension on this general basis carried with it no guarantee whatever of adequate and satisfactory implementation. He agreed that any proposed extension should be under continued supervision of the Commission. Indian view re extension is that they would be prepared to support an extension if it should be proposed by either or both the parties and Mr. Desai agreed that this would be their position if such proposal is made prior to May 18. If only, we ourselves advanced such a proposal however, he would have to reserve his position at this time principally on the ground that there were dangers of the kind he had mentioned previously. His own estimate was that while the French would be happy to see such a recommendation put forward by the Commission they would be happier still if unanimity could not be reached in the Commission or if Commission recommendation were turned down by the other side. Although he did not refer to it, Mr. Lett, I recall had a discussion with Mr. Desai before leaving Saigon at which time the latter emphasized the importance of not denuding the north of all its liberal and resistant elements.

4.(c) On immediate Commission action I stressed importance of present freedoms committee oral interviews with the teams. Awaiting preparation of written final reports had not been foreseen in Commission discussions in view of urgent time schedule and would delay report to Geneva powers. It was therefore, all the more important that oral reports from returning teams should elicit facts of the situation as fully as possible to enable the Commission to make its general appreciation in subsequent reports to the Geneva powers as proposed in Mr. Lett's statement of March 12. Mr. Desai agreed. He suggested however that it would be tactically wise in taking up the results of the teams reports in the Commission to consider the problem in 2 stages. First: To review and assess factually freedom of movement on basis of the teams reports and freedoms committee study and second: To decide at second stage view concerning High Command responsibility and terms report to Geneva powers. Otherwise we would be tipping our hand to the Poles.

5.(d) On report to Geneva powers Mr. Desai said he was prepared to go a long way (short of charges of violation) to bring out unsatisfactory situation adduced from current surveys and stress responsibility of DR. i.e. he seems prepared to make a critical report to the Geneva powers. It is impossible of course to say yet whether this report which he intends to draft himself will in fact be strong enough for our purposes, but I have no reason to suspect on the basis of discussion that it will not. Mr. Desai was at first very unwilling to send a long telegraphic report to co-chairmen on the ground of the difficulty of transmission and reasonable speed of bag service. I reminded him of Mr. Lett's (and our own) understanding (para 1 your No. 141†). I can find no definitive record of Mr. Desai's agreement that ample report would be made by telegram. His first suggestion which I resisted was that a warning telegram only should be sent. He then agreed that a telegram would be sent possibly as summary of fuller report but anticipates a difficult drafting exercise, particularly if 2 reports are involved. We may have to continue to press on this score in the Commission. Mr. Lett will be aware that we had been obliged to agree at an earlier stage (March 14) that report to co-chairmen would include not only progress on freedom of movement to which we attached importance but also Haiphong transfer and other major points including possibly 14(c) to which the Poles will want to make substantial reference.

6.(e) Finally he was not easy to pin down on a reference to paragraph 13 of the Geneva declaration on which I said we would insist. Discussion re final declaration might raise difficulties, e.g. elections, further though we might wish to refer to their freedom of movement portion of para 8 of declaration, Poles would no doubt wish to apply the reference in the same paragraph to Article 14(c). I emphasized that 14(d) was a special problem because of the time limit involved and real evidence available that 14(c) applied both in north and south and was not a simple counter weight to 14(d) and that attention Geneva co-chairmen must be drawn to their responsibilities so that they could take appropriate measures. As you know he does not consider that any measures are in fact open to the Geneva powers but he would only go so far as to say while he might agree to a reference under paragraph 13 on 14(d) it might also have to apply to other points which the Commission considered of importance and which might be included in report to co-chairmen.

7.(f) So far as this goes, it is I think not too unsatisfactory. I concluded by telling Mr. Desai that, while reserving our right to find a violation and to raise question of extension at this stage if facts of a survey warrant it, if report of the Geneva powers proposed did not sufficiently reflect the true situation as we see it, it would be necessary for us to submit a minority opinion. Because of the tradition of unanimity in which the Commission has operated he was visibly unhappy about this but he cannot expect us to do otherwise. As matters stand at the present moment and although it is always possible that Mr. Desai may change his tune he seems to be prepared to go a good distance towards action along the basis of your first preference in paragraph 2 of your telegram 141.<sup>16</sup>

ITEM II (D) II: THE FAR EAST — INDOCHINA

Members of the Council may be interested in some comments on the working of the cease-fire settlement in Indochina as seen from the point of view of a government which has been participating in the supervision of the truce. I do not intend to make any comments on the political situation in the countries of Indochina, on which the representative of France is certainly much more qualified to speak; nor do I wish to say anything about the balance of power situation in Southeast Asia, or the significance of the Indochinese armistice in this context. On these matters our colleagues from the United States and the United Kingdom can speak with much more authority. In view of our membership on the International Supervisory Commissions, however, a Canadian comment on the working of the armistice agreements may be of interest.

2. I should like first to make a few general observations which I think should be borne in mind in making an assessment of the work of the Commissions. In the first place the cease-fire agreements, taken together, comprise a general military armistice settlement. The agreements do, of course, contain a number of non-military clauses, and their existence has had a very profound effect on the political life of Vietnam, Laos and Cambodia. The cardinal fact is, however, that where there was a war there is no longer a war. Furthermore there has not at any time since the agreements were signed been any serious danger that fighting on a large scale might break out again. This is not to say that the cease-fire settlement did not contain the seeds of future troubles, or that the threat of hostilities has been permanently removed. There have been incidents between the forces of the Laotian Government and those of the Pathet Lao, and the possibility that these might recur has been the cause of concern. I believe, however, that in considering some of the more disturbing aspects of the situation in Indochina, we should not lose sight of the fact that broadly speaking the cease-fire which was negotiated last July has been maintained.

3. My second observation relates to the system of international supervision which has been established in accordance with the terms of the cease-fire agreements. By and large this system has proved useful and has, I think, been worthwhile. Its value should be neither overrated nor underrated. I do not believe that the International Commissions have been able to persuade the Communists to do many more things than they were prepared to do anyway, or to prevent them from doing things which they were determined to do. On the other hand the Commissions have by their presence and by the existence and activities of their inspection teams probably deterred the Communists from violating the terms of the agreement in more ways than they actually have done. The system of international inspection through the fixed and mobile inspection teams is a long way from being foolproof, but on the other hand it is not a farce. Finally the Commissions have been able to do a most effective job of mediation and conciliation in cases where the parties have been unable to reach agreement on detailed procedures as to how the terms of the cease-fire agreements are to be put into effect.

4. The internal workability of the tripartite Commissions has been somewhat better than we expected. The fact that the Commissions meet privately and that representatives of the three governments concerned do not brief the press individually and separately have meant that the Commissions have not become propaganda forums, and that they have been workable negotiating bodies. Formal voting in the commissions is infrequent, which is in some ways regrettable as there has on occasion been a tendency to prolong discussions (and hence defer action) in the hope of reaching agreed solutions. Initially and on minor matters the Poles made an obvious effort to be co-operative and reasonable. As the problems before the Commission have become more substantial the Poles have tended to adopt more rigid positions and to stick to a pretty strict party line. It is obvious that at every level — in the Commissions and on the inspection teams — the Poles are in collusion with the local Communists.

5. I should like to pay particular tribute to the manner in which the Indians have discharged their very difficult task in the three Commissions. They have tried to play the role of the real neutral and have succeeded to a considerable extent. We have not by any means always agreed with the line they have taken on this or that issue, and have felt on occasions that Indian impartiality has had a mathematical quality to it. However, in Vietnam and Cambodia particularly the Indian Chairmen have made most commendable efforts to ensure that the Commissions' job of supervision is really effective. In Vietnam the fact that the chairmanship of the Commission is in Indian hands has, I think, had a great deal to do with the extent of the co-operation which the Commission has been able to get from the Democratic Republic.

6. Having made these general observations I should like to outline briefly the state of the Commissions' work in the three countries. In Vietnam the regroupment of forces on either side of the military demarcation line is supposed to be completed by May 18, and there is every indication that it will be. The withdrawal and transfer of forces has been carried out without serious incident. There have been difficulties particularly in connection with the removal of stores and equipment from the Haiphong perimeter in North Vietnam, and in working out the detailed procedures for this the International Commission has had a very useful contribution to make. With the final withdrawal of the regular forces of the French Union from North Vietnam and of the Democratic Republic from South Vietnam the chances of any major clash between them will be substantially reduced.

7. The system of international supervision is probably at its weakest in relation to those provisions of the cease-fire agreement banning the introduction into either zone of Vietnam of fresh troops and war materials, except on a limited replacement basis. In accordance with the provisions of the agreement the International Commission placed a number of fixed teams at points of entry designated in the agreement. It took a very considerable time to get these teams installed, and even after that their operations have been fairly effectively limited by the local authorities. As a result of a request by the Commission, and after prolonged negotiations with the Democratic Republic, certain adjustments were made in the placing of the inspection teams in North Vietnam to permit inspection of certain routes of entry into North Vietnam from China which had not been possible under the original placement of inspection teams envisaged in the agreement. While supervision of the entry of goods and personnel into Vietnam can be carried on to a limited degree on the main routes of entry, complete and constant surveillance of the whole border by the Commission's teams is quite beyond their capacity. There is very little that can be done to prevent gun-running across the border over jungle trails, or the import of war materials through airports which are outside the normal zone of operations of the fixed inspection teams. In respect of the import of arms, therefore, the system of international inspection can do little more than provide some deterrent to the import of heavy military equipment.

8. The aspect of the cease-fire agreement in Vietnam which has caused us most concern has been the non-military clauses providing for democratic freedoms and requiring the authorities in each zone to permit and help those persons wishing to do so to move from one zone to another up until the completion of the military regroupment. From the beginning there has been evidence that the Democratic Republic régime in the north have been evading their obligations particularly with respect to freedom of movement for civilians. In spite of the limitations of the inspection system, the Commission's teams have been able to establish this fact on more than one occasion. The Commission has made repeated efforts to persuade the Democratic Republic to honour its obligations with respect to freedom of movement, and while the Commission has never met with outright refusal there has been no evidence that the Democratic Republic has adequately complied with the Commission's recommendations. There has, of course, been a great deal of evidence — most of it, unfortunately, hearsay evidence only which can rarely be substantiated by inspection team investigations — that the Viet Minh authorities have been using many devices to prevent people who wish to do so from going to the south. Most of the several hundred thousand refugees who have been able to get out through the Haiphong perimeter and thence by ship to the south have done so without the assistance and frequently in defiance of the North Vietnam authorities. With the final transfer of the Haiphong perimeter to the Democratic Republic on May 18 the main escape route for the refugees will be closed; furthermore, the provision in the cease-fire agreement for freedom of movement for civilians will lapse on that date unless arrangements are made to extend it.

9. The Canadian Government has taken a very serious view of this situation. We realize that the provision for freedom of movement for refugees is an unusual one in what is mainly a military armistice agreement, and that satisfactory performance on this clause was perhaps never really anticipated by those who had it written into the agreement. Nevertheless we believe that the poor performance by the Democratic Republic on this provision is a very discouraging augury for the working out of the sort of political settlement that is envisaged in the Final Declaration of the Geneva Conference, — a settlement which, in the words of the declaration, "shall permit the Vietnamese people to enjoy the fundamental freedoms, guaranteed by democratic institutions established as a result of free general elections by secret ballot".

10. After the completion of the regroupment of forces the stage will be set for the first phase of the political settlement for Vietnam. According to the Final Declaration of the Geneva Conference consultations between the competent representative authorities of the two zones of Vietnam are to begin in July of this year on the holding of general elections in Vietnam in July 1956 in accordance with certain conditions. We hope that the parties concerned will find it possible to adhere to the general pattern for a political settlement outlined in the Final Declaration. For our part we are prepared to consider providing on an informal basis in co-operation with India and Poland such assistance by way of good offices as the parties to the consultations scheduled to begin in July may request. At a later stage, when agreement between the parties concerning the holding of elections has been reached or is in sight, we will be prepared to consider accepting membership on the international commission which, according to the Final Declaration of the Geneva Conference, is to supervise the elections themselves.

11. At the present time, the situation in the little Kingdom of Laos is very much up in the air. It is now nearly ten months from the date of the Cease-Fire Agreement, and yet the Royal Government has not yet been able to re-establish itself in the two north-eastern provinces, Phong Saly and Sam Neua. Unfortunately for Canada as one of the Commission Powers and for the Government of Laos, the terms of the Cease-Fire Agreement for Laos are very obscure and most difficult to interpret in some respects. They state, for example, that the indigenous fighting units of the Pathet Lao movement shall move into these two northern provinces and shall be free to move in a corridor between them pending a political settlement. I emphasize the words "pending a political settlement", because for several months representatives of the Royal Government and of the Pathet Lao have been meeting in an attempt to arrive at such a settlement and the results of these discussions have been almost negligible. It is difficult to know just what kind of a settlement would be acceptable to the Pathet Lao. It is known that the Viet Minh have exercised considerable influence over the leaders of this movement and that the P.L. representatives at these talks have in the past made it clear that they were not prepared to release their military hold on Phong Saly and Sam Neua, even though their leader some months ago stated that the Pathet Lao recognized the overall sovereignty of the Royal Government.

12. Up until a few months ago, the Canadian representative on the International Commission hoped that the bilateral talks between the two sides would result in some acceptable agreement which in turn would enable the Royal Government to re-establish itself in the northern provinces. Subsequently, developments have shown that either through deliberate delaying tactics, influenced by the Viet Minh, or for other more fundamental reasons, the two sides have not been able to reach any agreement. Meanwhile, there are Government troops in a few posts, but the rest of the two provinces are occupied by forces of the Pathet Lao and are controlled by them. This, naturally, has been a matter of great concern to the Royal Government and, indeed, to many of us here. However, as a member of the International Commission, Canada is in a somewhat difficult position. There are many things that we would have liked to have done which we could not get the Commission to do. Even on matters where a majority vote is all that is required, we have to have the support of the Indian Chairman and you will appreciate the fact that it was in our interests to try to carry our Indian colleagues with us as much as possible. We believed that it was better to get some things done than to have a record full of Canadian initiative but completely lacking in results. Further, we envisaged our role on this Commission, as indeed on all three Commissions, principally as one where we should exercise judicial impartiality in so far as possible.

13. Our Bible has been the Cease-Fire Agreement. This we understand was drafted hastily and under conflicting pressures. Certainly there is no clear cut provision about the way in which the Royal Government is supposed to re-establish itself in the northern provinces, and to integrate the Pathet Lao into the national community. The Agreement simply leaves the fighting forces of the P/L up north, "pending a political settlement"; it does not say what type of political settlement was envisaged or how this should be obtained. It does not say that after the withdrawal period which ended last November, the forces of the Pathet Lao should be confined to certain parts of the two provinces; it merely says that they shall move into these provinces. The Cease-Fire Agreement does not, of course, state that the Pathet Lao forces are empowered to administer the two northern provinces or to exercise political control over them or to enjoy a degree of local autonomy in them. On the other hand, the Agreement does not call upon them to demobilise. It merely asks them to respect the territory under the military control of the National Laotian Army. The N.L.A. forces, which are only located in a few posts in Phong Saly and Sam Neua, are likewise asked to respect the territory under the military control of the Pathet Lao. That, then, is the situation which exists at this time.

14. I do not want here to try to defend what the Commission is or is not doing. I wish it could have done more and I hope that it will be able to do more to assist the parties and to bring conditions in Laos back to normal. The Commission, of course, has no executive powers. It has no teeth. It is only a supervisory body. Last December, it did urge the two sides to get together in an attempt to arrive at a political settlement, and recently it repeated this recommendation. If both parties — who are after all both of Laotian nationality — had shown equal measures of good faith and had been willing to carry out the spirit of the Geneva settlement, then all would have been well long before this. A political settlement would have been concluded by those directly responsible for it, and the Commission would have had only to make certain that individuals were not discriminated against and that no reprisals were taken against the resisters because of their part in the war.

15. Up until as recently as the end of February, the Prime Minister of Laos kept reassuring our Commissioner that things were well in hand and that there was nothing that the Commission need do to assist in the political consultation stage. Nevertheless, incidents kept occurring between the two sides, some of them serious enough and involving shooting and bloodshed, which could not be ignored by the Commission. In these cases, the Commission ordered its teams to conduct investigations as best they could even though they have been constantly hampered until recently by a lack of suitable air transport, by the extremely rugged terrain and, it must be admitted, by delaying devices employed by the Pathet Lao side who, until the Joint Commission was dissolved, were coupled together with representatives of the Vietminh called the People's Vietnamese Volunteers (PVV). A common device was the failure of the PVV/PL side to provide interpreters promptly. Nevertheless, investigations have been carried out, blame apportioned and recommendations made to the two sides to prevent further incidents.

16. A case at point was the Nong Khang incident. As some of you may be aware, it was only with the greatest difficulty that we succeeded in having the Commission, in a split vote, adopt this recommendation. The Chairman, who has the deciding vote in these matters, was very reluctant to proceed once the Polish Commissioner let it be known that he considered the Commission's resolution to be contrary to the Geneva Agreement. He wanted to refer the matter to the Co-Chairmen of the Geneva Conference even though the Agreement does not make provision for references of this nature. I mention this to illustrate the fact that there are obvious limits beyond which an International Commission of this sort cannot go. All has not been sweetness and light in the Laos Commission. There is a definite place in the scheme of things in Laos for the diplomatic front to come into play, and indeed it has on several occasions. I am not necessarily being critical here of the Indian attitude; I am simply noting it. They believe, quite sincerely I am sure, that the Commission should make every effort to act unanimously and thus to maintain its prestige and the goodwill of both parties. We have been told by the Indians that we have been far too rigid. I feel that the Laotian Government thinks that we have been too weak.

17. In recent weeks the Commission, still confining itself to the purely military aspect of the situation, has also adopted two more resolutions by split votes with the Poles dissenting. Our sole concern here was to prevent further incidents and bloodshed and thus help pave the way to a peaceful political settlement. By keeping the two sides away from each other, it is hoped to minimize the danger of future clashes. All of this is being done, of course, without prejudice to the rights of the parties in any political settlement which they may reach.

18. The heart of the question, of course, is to re-establish the Royal Administration in the northern provinces and to get the Pathet Lao to desist from considering themselves as a separate military and political entity and, thus, to rejoin the national community and to become reintegrated into it. A real fear is that they are so tarred with the brush of the Vietminh brand of Communism that they will not take their place in the normal life of the country as loyal citizens but will attempt to turn the country completely over to the Communists if they gain sufficient control of its affairs. That is a calculated risk which the Royal Government may have to take in the general elections which are slated to take place later this year. Meanwhile, some means must be found to get the Pathet Lao to submit to the authority of the Royal Government and, needless to say, force is not the answer. In this political settlement phase, about all that the International Commission can do, with its many limitations, some of which I have already mentioned, is to offer its good offices and to try to give the Government as much backing as possible. If the Government shows signs of disregarding the actual written provisions of the Geneva Agreement, or of misinterpreting them, then the Commission will be unwilling to do even that, quite apart from anything that the Canadian Commissioner would like it to do. A single vote, among three, is completely useless.

19. Recently at Bandung, Mr. Pham Van Dong and Prime Minister Katay had informal talks under the aegis of Nehru and Chou En-Lai, and came to an agreement that the Viet Minh Government would not interfere in the affairs of Laos. We understand that Mr. Pham Van Dong even offered to use his influence with the Pathet Lao and in any event agreed that the question of the Royal Government re-establishing itself in the northern provinces was a purely internal one, which the Laotian Government should resolve in whatever manner it saw fit. India, too, has offered to mediate. These are most interesting developments and we are keeping a close watch on the situation to see whether they are reflected in any future talks held by the two parties or in the attitude of the Poles on the International Commission. It remains to be seen whether the Pathet Lao will become more amenable and reach some agreement with the Government. Events in the last few days do not give cause for optimism. We have received reports of further clashes in Sam Neua.

20. The main objective, I think, is to see that the two northern provinces are not allowed to go over to the Communists. It is India's belief that the Viet Minh and the Chinese do not necessarily want to control Laos or Cambodia, but would be quite content to have them exist as independent states of the so-called neutralist type. I trust that India will use her influence there in such a way that the policies of these two governments will not conflict with our own policies. Certainly, economic aid and technical assistance is required in abundance by both and neither the Vietminh nor the Chinese Reds are in a position to furnish this. I think that there is a great deal to be said for devising some means whereby India herself could provide some of this aid. The more that India becomes committed in Laos and Cambodia, the less likelihood there will be of China or the Democratic Republic of Vietnam attempting to take them over.

21. I have already mentioned Cambodia but perhaps I might say a word about the International Commission there. In general, the work of the Cambodia Commission has not been as difficult as in the other two countries and frankly there is not a great deal for the Commission to do at this time. A few months ago there was a flurry when the ex-King was on the point of introducing electoral reforms which would have been far-reaching. I believe that these reforms, although quite different from anything which we might consider to be truly democratic, were motivated by a sincere desire, on the part of the King, to do what he thought was best for his people. With a few important modifications, they might well have proved effective in doing away with corruption and bad government. However, we did not want the King or his government to find themselves in a position where they might have been justifiably accused of violating a provision of the Cease-fire Agreement, which Canada, as one of the members of the International Commission there, had a responsibility to supervise. We informally let our views be known as did others. The surprising result was that the proposals were dropped altogether and a few days later the King abdicated. A press campaign directed at the International Commission subsequently took place, and many unfair things were said about the Commission's interference in the internal affairs of Cambodia. These statements were completely unjustified and unwarranted by the facts. Since then, the Commission has been going about its normal work of supervising ports of entry, receiving complaints and endeavouring to see that the former members of the Khmer resistance forces are given an opportunity to rejoin the national community without discrimination. The Commission will, we believe, have a measure of responsibility with regard to the forthcoming general elections, now slated to take place on September 11. We believe that this responsibility should be confined to ensuring that the ex-members of the K.R.F. are allowed to participate as electors or candidates on an equal footing with all other Cambodian citizens.

22. Quite frankly, we would welcome an opportunity to reduce our numbers in Cambodia as indeed in the other two countries and even to wind up at least some of the Commissions' activities entirely. However, having accepted membership on these three Commissions, we are, I suppose, bound to observe the rules of the game. These rules are set forth rather poorly in some respects, I think, in the three Cease-fire Agreements. There is no provision in these Agreements for winding up activities entirely. Activities can only be reduced when all three members agree, and then only after consultation with the other two Commissions. Nevertheless, if the time comes when no further useful work can be done, or when activities should patently be reduced but the Poles, for instance, refuse to agree to any such reduction we will not hesitate to act on our own as we see fit.

23. I might mention that the Agreements contain a number of provisions which enable the Commissions to report or to appeal on certain matters to the members of the Geneva Conference. What the Geneva Powers are supposed to do when this happens is not mentioned. I think it is fairly obvious that on a matter where there is a split in the Commission with, for instance, Canada and India on one side and the Poles on the other, there is very little that the Geneva Conference Powers as such could or would do by way of joint action. Any split in the Commission would undoubtedly be reflected in the attitudes taken by the Geneva Powers. There is no provision, in such a case, for the majority view to prevail.

Thus there is in effect no final court of appeal which can render a decision in most cases which might be referred by the Commissions. Nevertheless individual members of the Geneva Conference can — and we hope will — take such measures as are feasible through normal diplomatic channels to call attention to unsatisfactory situations and to suggest remedial action.

24. I mention these points simply to illustrate, in another manner, the facts of life in Indochina from the standpoint of Canada, as a member of the three International Commissions there. It is a most frustrating and trying experience but we shall continue to carry out our responsibilities in the best manner we can and I know that we can count on the sympathy and support of your Governments. Needless to say, we will always welcome any views which any of your Governments may wish to bring to our attention by reason of our membership on the Commissions.

VIETNAM ELECTIONS

Following from Holmes. The following are a few tentative conclusions which I have reached as a result of talks I have had in Paris and London with Roux of the Quai d'Orsay, Allen and Tomlinson of the Foreign Office, Young of the State Department and a few other people. They are based on things left unsaid as well as things said and are not based on specific statements of policy by the persons concerned.

2. The French, British and Americans agreed last week in Paris that pressure should be put on the Diem Government to be ready in July with some specific proposals for elections and to try to beat the Vietminh to the draw. The French are pleased with Dulles' full support of such a policy. They all realize, however, that such pressure will have to be very tactfully applied as the Vietnamese are suspicious and do not want to be driven. One of the approaches considered, for instance, is that the British might ask the Vietnamese if they would like to see the proposals they had drawn up for German elections. By such indirectness they hope to get the Vietnamese started on something concrete.

3. The Vietnamese are particularly suspicious of the Commission and not at all anxious to have it interfere in the negotiations. The Americans, although they have not said so to me, are probably not very anxious either for the Commission to play a part. The French do not seem to have any objections to the Commission playing a mediatory role along the lines suggested in our memorandum but they are nervous of the effect on the Vietnamese of any indication by the Commission that it is thrusting itself forward and trying to put pressure on them. (I sensed this French concern in my talks with Roux, and Denis Allen has confirmed it. When I talked to Roux, however, I made it clear that we had no desire to bring the Commission powers into the act. All we were suggesting was that if the parties wanted assistance from the Commission powers we thought any such contribution should be along the mediatory lines we described. We should be delighted, however, to be excused if we were not needed).

4. The British, French and Americans, approaching the question from somewhat different directions, seem to be agreed that by far the best way for the negotiations to be conducted is for the two parties to get together by themselves without the Commission powers. They already seem to have accepted the principle that it is their job to get the negotiation started because they are already working to that end. If it should seem wise at some time to call on outside assistance, the Commission powers might be asked to help, but the South Vietnamese seem to prefer help from the UN or some other source. It is, of course, not unlikely that the Geneva powers will find themselves drawn into the role of mediators or catalysts now that some of them at least have started putting pressure on what if assumed to be the less willing party. MacMillan has in mind talking to Molotov in Vienna about the elections and the British are not ruling out the possibility of some understanding with the Russians on this subject.

5. All this seems to me satisfactory from our point of view. The Geneva powers, or some of them, seem to be accepting a responsibility we have insisted was theirs, and we may be spared direct participation in the first phase of the election process. There is no doubt that our memorandum has had a considerable effect on British and French thinking, particularly, I think, our arguments on the inadvisability of setting up an electoral commission to direct the final phase and on the advantages of the acceptance of responsibility by the Geneva powers.

6. We may, however, be reckoning without the Indians, I have pointed out that it will be difficult for us to hold back the Indians and the Poles if nothing is under way by July, and the Foreign Office seem to have been making this point already with the French and Americans.

7. These are very preliminary thoughts for your consideration which I may have to revise as I move East.

INTERNATIONAL COMMISSION — CURRENT PROBLEMS

With the end of the 300-day period drawing rapidly nearer, the Commission, since our last report, has concentrated most of its attention and energies on the question of Freedom of Movement, Article 14(d), and the final 300-day phase of the regroupment of forces, Article 15(a), to both of which the deadline of May 18 applies. At the same time the Commission has considered a number of important issues brought to its notice under other articles of the Geneva Agreement, notably 14(c), 16 and 21.

2. While adhering to the strong line which in March he had shown himself capable of adopting against either party thought to be shirking its responsibilities, three facets of the Chairman's approach to the task entrusted to the Commission give rise to some uneasiness. In the first place, he has persistently refused to place blame on the DR Government (where I think it properly belongs) for the failure to implement 14(d) adequately in the North. Secondly, he has always had a preference for finding a middle way, almost at all costs, and certainly frequently without due regard for the objective merits of a question, whenever the Polish delegate and I have differed. This predilection has been more noticeable of late and raises the danger that unless I take a more extreme position than seems warranted on an objective assessment of the point at issue, the compromise eventually hit upon may represent a bad decision from the Canadian point of view. Finally, there have been occasions during the past month when the Chairman has been singularly inept in his handling of General de Beaufort. This has not contributed to the mutual sympathy of the Commission and the French. Despite these weaknesses, I continue to feel that Mr. Desai has managed his arduous task with skill — and purpose, and that his influence has generally been exercised with considerable effect along lines to which I cannot take exception.

3. With respect to freedom of movement from North to South, it has indeed been a trying and a busy time, and the Canadian Delegation has been constantly required to break trail for the Commission in its redoubled efforts to find a solution for this complex problem. The three special teams mentioned in paragraph four of my despatch under reference have each made two extended visits to the areas assigned to them.<sup>18</sup> In addition, they have carried out further limited investigations based on fresh French complaints, while other teams have been despatched on similar missions. On the strength of their reports on the first visits, the Commission enumerated the continued inadequacies of the situation in particular localities, and drew a number of suggested corrective measures to the attention of the PAVN High Command with a recommendation that steps be taken immediately to rectify matters.

4. At about this time the Commission began its debate on the draft Third Interim Report to the Co-Chairmen, which, as finally approved, is a brief and "balanced" document arranged under the same chapter heads used in previous reports.<sup>19</sup> It seeks, in accordance with the Indian Chairman's wishes, to set the fact that the PAVN has fallen down in implementing Article 14(d) against French shortcomings with respect to Articles 14(c) (democratic freedoms), and 21, (prisoners of war and civilian internees). Paragraphs 11 and 19 of the report describe the unsatisfactory situation concerning freedom of movement. The principal defect from the Canadian point of view is that while in tripartite terms, a critical report has been obtained, indicating clearly the unsatisfactory state of implementation of 14(d), the Report does not sum up as clearly as we would wish the true seriousness of the freedom of movement problem in the North, and does not indicate clearly enough the responsibility of the DR for this situation. In order to ensure that the Commission's findings were brought to the attention of the Co-Chairmen of the Geneva Conference, we pressed for a reference under paragraph 13 of the Final Declaration of the question of freedom of movement, but could not carry the Chairman or the Pole with us. Accordingly, a minority Canadian note was attached to the letter of transmittal forwarding the report to the Co-Chairmen, which has helped to focus attention on the seriousness of the situation.

Refers to the three teams mentioned in Document 588.

<sup>19</sup> Voir/See United Kingdom, Parliamentary Papers, Cmd. 9499, Third Interim Report of the International Commission for Supervision and Control in Vietnam, London: Her Majesty's Stationery Office, 1955.

The minority note indicated that progress in the implementation of Article 14(d) would continue to be unsatisfactory unless administrative arrangements and transport facilities were urgently improved, that the delay in respect of Article 14(d) had been a matter of serious concern to the Commission, and that it was not possible to state at that stage that Article 14(d) would be implemented in full within the time limit laid down. The note went on to state that, in view of the short time remaining before the end of the 300-day period and the record to date, the Canadian Delegation requested that the question of implementation of Article 14(d) be referred to the members of the Geneva Conference in accordance with Paragraph 13 of the Final Declaration. Since then your statement in the House on May 3,<sup>20</sup> a copy of which I have given to Mr. Desai, and the immediate steps taken by Sir Anthony Eden to obtain Soviet concurrence in bringing this question to the attention of the Geneva Powers have done much to strengthen the Canadian position.<sup>21</sup>

5. The special teams have returned or are now about to return to Hanoi after completing their second visits. On the basis of their final reports the Commission will draw conclusions as to the implementation of Article 14(d) in the North. The first step will be to assess the size of the remaining problem. This will not be an easy exercise for the main reason that team reports indicate how difficult it is becoming to find evidence that a sizeable problem exists. The present position, as indicated in my telegram no. 220 of May 12,† is that, while there is evidence that some permits are being granted in areas checked by teams, and some movement is taking place under pressure of these investigations, our own view is that teams have faced a widely organized and subtle form of obstructionism which is apparently designed primarily to take up the team's time on complaints about activities of so-called French Union agents who are alleged to be forcing people to go South. It is also apparent that access of genuine petitioners to the teams is more difficult than ever before and the DR have made a very considerable effort for this purpose. Obstructionism of this type is hard to prove as such, nor does it always show up distinctly in agreed team reports.

6. To prepare ourselves for the discussions that will undoubtedly begin in the very near future on the question of the Commission's position in relation to a possible move for an extension of the time for freedom of movement, we have exchanged a number of messages with the Department, the latest of which are your telegrams no. 190 of May 11† and no. 193 of May 13,† and our telegram no. 220 of May 12.† We shall be guided by these instructions, although, as I am sure you will agree, the timing of any Canadian initiative in the Commission will have to be related to the consideration of final team reports, and to any formal request which may be put before the Commission by one or both parties before May 18.

7. In an effort to weaken the case against the DR in respect of Freedom of Movement, the Polish delegate has twice mentioned the announcement made on February 4 that the North would welcome an agreement with the South on the opening of the demarcation line for free intercourse between the two zones. Although it was possible to prevent the Polish delegate from obtaining mention of this proposal in the Third Interim Report, it may not prove to be so easy to keep emphasis on it from diverting attention from the important fact of DR failure to implement Article 14(d).

8. Another means of reducing the impact of this failure has been for the PAVN, seconded by the Polish Delegate, to seek to concentrate attention on the less than perfect performance in the South in respect of Articles 14(c) and 21 (particularly with respect to the unsatisfactory investigations at Poulo Condore and Chi Hoa). I have tried with some success, and most of the time with the Chairman's support, to keep allegations of violations of these articles in their proper perspective, since it seems clear that they are, for the most part, gambits in a propaganda battle. The Commission's ability to establish this has, however, been effectively hampered by the fact that, particularly after the recent difficulties, the French have failed to obtain from the South Vietnam authorities anything like adequate co-operation in facilitating such investigations as the Commission could not avoid instituting. The DR and the Polish Delegation have been quick not to miss the opportunity of emphasizing that there have been demonstrations in the South hostile to Commission teams and that the recent civil and para-military disturbances have brought a number of investigations in the South to a halt.

9. The determination of the DR to exploit every propaganda opening has been especially noticeable in relation to the transfer of the Haiphong perimeter. Allegations of "forced evacuations" in that area, and in areas in which our special freedoms teams are operating, are being received with increasing frequency. In the last days of the Haiphong transfer this propaganda theme was substantially stepped up. Numerous complaints that the French have been removing equipment and services irregularly, and that they have not displayed good faith in the negotiations on these matters in the Joint Commission, have also been sent to the Commission. The importance of these allegations has been played down and the necessity to send teams into the Haiphong perimeter to investigate them has been avoided whenever possible. There has been increasing evidence, however, that tempers were becoming short and that tension has mounted, both in the perimeter and in Interzone 5 in the South, the transfers of which constitute the final phase of the regroupment provisions of the Agreement. The Commission has recognized that this development, if allowed to go unchecked, could constitute a serious threat to the orderly and peaceful execution of the complicated plans for the transfers, which the Commission had helped the parties to work out. Accordingly, both Liaison Missions were called before the Commission and the Chairman was firm in pointing out the need to keep calm and to co-operate fairly and objectively in carrying out their responsibilities.

10. The important thing, however, is that no incidents of any significance have yet occurred. Indeed, as I have already reported by telegram, the hand-over of the city of Haiphong on May 13 was unmarred; and its very order and calm concealed the detailed and careful staff work between the parties, and by the Commission, which were largely responsible. Nevertheless, given that the DR is anxious to embarrass the French, that the French are specially sensitive, that because the people in the Haiphong perimeter are generally in a tense state of mind, the completion of the 300-day period without a flare-up either in the Haiphong area or in Central Vietnam will be welcomed with relief.

Hanoi, May 24, 1955

CONFIDENTIAL. IMPORTANT.

FREEDOM OF MOVEMENT — EXTENSION OF 14(D)

At Commission meeting May 23 (attended by Mr. Holmes) discussion concluded on report of team 56 and continued with Commission's assessment of the size of the remaining problem and preliminary consideration of future measures.

2. On the assessment, it is quite clear that the Commission is not agreed in its judgment of size of remaining problem. Canadian position was that although we could not state the size of remaining problem in precise terms, evidence was that Article 14(d) had not been fully implemented and that a substantial problem continued to exist.

3. In summarizing our conclusions, I made the following points:

(a) That the permit procedure has been inadequate and inefficient and that there have been serious delays.

(b) That people have been refused access to the Commission's teams and that they have been afraid to apply for permits.

(c) That there has been discrimination against certain persons, e.g. landowners, in the issue of permits.

(d) That transport arrangements have not been adequate.

(e) That the recommendations of the Commission have not been fully carried out, and that many people who wish to go and reside in the other zone have not been permitted and helped to do so by the APVN authorities.

4. The occasion did not present itself to place our detailed case on the record (except during consideration of individual mobile team reports) but we were able to set out main reasons why we consider 14(d) has not been fully implemented.

5. In addition, I proposed that the parties be informed that the Commission considers that 14(d) has not been satisfactorily implemented, and that the Commission request the parties to reach agreement as a matter of urgency upon the necessary measures to assure that the provisions of 14(d) are fully carried out. Such continuing implementation should be under the supervision of the Commission, and the Commission should reserve the right to add to or amend the conditions of extension suggested by or agreed to by the parties.

6. The Chairman's view was that the bulk of the problem had been resolved but that there remained small minority groups throughout the north for whom facilities had not yet been provided. The Pole's view was also restrictive and he concluded that the "residual" problem was of very small proportions.

7. Because of the divergencies which exist the Chairman's proposal was that the Commission might only agree that, for our meeting with liaison missions (May 27) he could state that the implementation of Article 14(d) had not been completed, a statement which we believe leaves much to be desired, but which was the only interim compromise possible between the views the Commission expressed. We, of course, reserved the right to state our own view of the problem in detail on the record.

8. On future measures the following principal points emerged.

(1) There was agreement between the Pole and myself, in which the Chairman concurred, that the action by the DR as outlined in their submission of May 20th (see para 2 of my telegram No. 239 of May 20th)† did not in fact constitute an "extension" as it has been interpreted, not only by the press and radio but also in official circles. The DR action of May 20th is essentially a unilateral declaration of intention to clear up what they regard as "residual" cases of persons who have "expressed the desire" to take advantage of Article 14(d) (i.e. presumably a restrictive reference to those who have already applied for permits and who have been prevented from moving because of 'transport or other difficulties') but on its face it does not, as you will be aware, provide for an extension, either through modification of the agreement or through agreement reached directly between the parties, nor does it provide for continued Commission supervision.

(2) In addition you will have noted that the DR statement concerning continuation of Article 14(d) for one month is linked to the more general proposals of February 5th providing for the normalization of relations between north and south and for the virtual abolition of the provisional demarcation line. These proposals, as we know from the French Liaison Mission, are regarded by the French authorities with suspicion, principally because they consider that it would have the effect of permitting the move only of those people whom the DR wished to send out. We have to be extremely careful, therefore, at this stage of consideration of the DR proposals, which seem to us to go beyond the scope of the Commission and probably of the present Geneva Agreement, to distinguish between the need for the continuation of Article 14(d) on the one hand, and on the other the general DR proposals, which are essentially matters for subsequent discussions by the parties, if the parties so wish.

(3) There is, therefore, no specific proposal for an extension yet before the Commission. The Polish Ambassador made it clear that he considered the DR declaration would be adequate to resolve the problem of the residue and that (50 groups omitted, repetition requested) was a matter for the parties and would depend upon basic agreement between them to work towards the consultations foreseen in the final declaration.

(4) Mr. Desai produced the suggestion that the Commission might consider recommending to the parties an extension linking up the continuing implementation of Article 14(d) with the date foreseen for electoral consultation, i.e. July 20th. What he seemed to have in mind was that an extension of this duration would leave to the parties, as "consumers", the determination of the state of implementation of 14(d) and would act as an incentive to the DR to continue freedom of movement in order not to jeopardize the possibility of electoral discussions. Neither the Pole nor myself was prepared at yesterday's meeting to accept his proposal, without careful study, although we did not reject it, and we will be considering it further in due course.

9. The liaison missions are meeting with the Commission May 24th to express their views on the various proposals put forward by each side.

AMERICAN AND INDIAN ATTITUDES TOWARD VIETNAM ELECTIONS

You have asked for our views as to whether a gulf was opening between the American proposal that the Vietnamese should follow the proposals put forward for all-German elections and the Indian view that their own electoral law would suit the situation.

2. WA-833 of May 20† reports that the State Department consider that conditions for free elections in Vietnam should be those put forward by Sir Anthony Eden for the reunification of Germany at the Berlin Foreign Ministers' Conference in 1954. The Eden proposals as made on January 29, 1954 and supported by France and the United States contained the following relevant provisions:

(a) Free and secret elections should be held throughout Germany for the purpose of electing a constituent assembly.

(b) The all-German electoral law as promulgated should include provisions guaranteeing the "genuine freedom of the elections". The Eden proposals specified the kinds of provisions generally associated with free elections in the Western democracies, i.e. freedom of movement throughout Germany, freedom of various mass media, freedom of presentation of candidates, secrecy of the vote, etc.

(c) The elections were to be supervised by a hierarchy of Supervisory Commissions at the national, provincial and local levels. Each commission was to consist of representatives of the four powers with or without the participation of neutrals. All electoral results were to be counted and verified at local headquarters in the presence of the local supervisory commission. In the period between the end of the elections and the full assumption of German sovereignty by the new all-German government to be established part of the supervisory apparatus was to remain in operation "to prevent action after the elections which would impair the conditions of genuine freedom under which they will have been held."

3. There is nothing in the Eden proposals in flat contradiction to Indian electoral law and procedure. However, if the Americans regard the contemporary Vietnam situation as analogous to that of Germany at the time of the Berlin Conference while the Indians attempt to apply directly their own electoral procedures to the same situation difficulties may arise. The core of the German 1954 proposals lay in their emphasis on safeguards for genuinely free elections where such conditions were not easily realizable; there was an understandable and justifiable fear that in Germany, as in Vietnam, the communists would subvert the operation of democratic electoral processes and a determination to prevent them from doing so. In post-1947 India, on the other hand, the conditions for genuinely free elections in the western sense have been much more favourable and there has not been the same preoccupation with safeguards for democratic procedures; freedom of assembly and expression has been established, the more important contending political groups have in general been willing to conduct themselves according to western standards, an impartial judiciary has been in operation and so on. It may thus be guessed that the Indians will be less insistent on the provision of enforceable safeguards for free elections in Vietnam than are the Americans and the representatives of South Vietnam.

4. The actual and potential cleavage in American and Indian attitudes toward the Vietnam elections appears to be based on broader policy considerations than those mentioned above. The Indian attitude consists of three major elements:

- (a) A disposition on their part to accept Vietminh support for free elections at face value.
- (b) A belief that all of Vietnam must inevitably fall under Vietminh control in the near future.
- (c) A profound distrust of the motives of the Americans and the South Vietnam Government with perhaps a suspicion that these parties will deliberately "scupper" the projected elections by insisting on safeguards which are unenforceable and unacceptable to the Vietminh.

The Americans and the South Vietnamese cannot be expected to share the attitude of the Indians to the Vietminh.

5. So far as Canada's attitude on this matter is concerned, I suggest that, while sharing the American view that the South Vietnamese may legitimately insist on adequate safeguards for free elections, we should present such views in a way calculated to bring the Indians along step by step. We can trust the Americans, the French and the British to be on the lookout for the interests of the South Vietnam Government. If the Vietminh run true to form in the consultations preceding the election, it may be possible for us to bring the Indians at least partially around to our recognition of the need for adequate and enforceable safeguards and incidentally contribute something to general Indian political education in the realities of communist practice. Above all we should avoid having ourselves considered by the Indians as the agents of South Vietnam—American group as this eventuality might well frustrate any attempts to bring around the Indians to the recognition of the need for safeguards and further reinforce their attitudes toward the Vietminh and suspicion of the non-communist powers involved.

6. A telegram to Delhi† briefly discussing these different approaches is attached for your consideration.<sup>23</sup>

FREEDOM OF MOVEMENT

1. May 27 the two sides reported at a joint meeting with the Commission that agreement had not been reached on most of the substantive points concerning any extension of the arrangements under Article 14(d). Mr. Desai immediately indicated that the Commission would consider the situation in the light of their statements and that the Commission would make concrete suggestions on May 28.
2. On May 28 the Commission first agreed upon suggestions and subsequently transmitted them to the two sides at another joint meeting.
3. The discussions in the Commission went surprisingly smoothly. The main reason for this being that Chairman had been working behind the scenes. During the negotiation I put on the record that the Canadian delegation considered an extension necessary because Article 14(d) had not been satisfactorily implemented by the APVN and that the Commission should request the parties to reach agreement as a matter of urgency upon measures to ensure that 14(d) is fully implemented. I took the line that any extension of the arrangements should include the following.
  - (a) They should continue until such time as the provisions of 14(d) are fully carried out to the satisfaction of both parties and the Commission. However, a definite time limit I suggest to consider Chairman's suggestion of July 20 might be agreed upon provided that the possibility of a further extension was left open and this was specifically reserved.
  - (b) There should be no restriction as to the persons who could benefit.
  - (c) Implementation of these arrangements should be under the supervision of the Commission and the Commission would make proposals from time to time on the necessary methods to ensure that this supervision is adequate and effective.
  - (d) Each party should be required to assist refugees to move as a matter of right once only.
  - (e) The permit system should conform to the Commission's recommendations of February 2 and other suggestions made by the Commission on basis of team reports, other equalities such as transport and transit arrangements to be worked out by the two sides.
  - (f) Adequate publicity about the continuation of the arrangements would have to be made to secure free exercise and rights of option without hindrance or interference.
  - (g) The High Command should impress upon local authorities that intending evacuees be moved as quickly as possible.
4. Agreement was reached late May 28 on the following six point suggestion to the parties.

(a) Action taken by the two parties until May 18 for the execution of Article 14(d) and Commission's recommendations of February 1 will be continued by both sides until July 20.

(b) There will be no restriction on those who may benefit.

(c) Both sides will continue to give permit facilities to people who change their minds once as a matter of right.

(d) The Commission will continue to supervise, and to undertake investigations on its own initiative if necessary, in order to ascertain whether there is any breach of Article 14(d) and recommend remedial measures.

(e) The two parties will make adequate publicity arrangements (see paragraph (f) above).

(f) The two parties will continue to discuss any mutual problems and will request the Commission's intervention when necessary.

5. The two liaison missions were requested to indicate that night whether their High Commands agree in principle to these suggestions. Final acceptance on any suggested modifications would be communicated formally to the Commission on May 30 while it is in Saigon. The (group corrupt) liaison mission immediately indicated agreement in principle with the suggestions. The DR liaison mission declared that it would consult his High Command.

6. This final result is not so unsatisfactory from point of view of our essential points of duration categories to benefit, and Commission supervision. General de Beaufort privately expressed himself as satisfied with these suggestions (which can become "recommendations" if DR does not accept promptly). We must try to see to it that agreement anticipated results in continued movement from the north, and not merely in continued posture of cooperation that DR have assumed for some time. Public release of position if and when agreed by DR will probably be made early this week in Saigon.

FREEDOM OF MOVEMENT IN THIS DELEGATION, AIM IN CONSULTATION WITH DEPARTMENT

Throughout long negotiations on freedom of movement we have taken view that main aim was to enable as many people as possible to exercise their right under Article 14(d). We have sought to pursue this practical course by the exercise of pressure on the DR following specific investigations, and as considered alternative to the minority course of calling publicly violations on the part of the High Command, which might have jeopardized the limited cooperation extended by the Viet Minh to the Commission on Article 14(d), and during 300 day period, affected vital phases of military regroupment and transfer.

2. The result of this persistent, though largely unpublicized pressure on the DR by the Commission has been that people have moved in substantial numbers (the present official figure is about 930,000). Though it may be said that the vast majority moved without permits or assistance from DR, the overall result is not insignificant, and although Article 14(d) not fully implemented by May 18, a practical extension for further two month period has been obtained in principle from parties, at insistence of Commission.

3. We recognize that this policy of practical effort has not always produced much in the way of documentation and material which could be used publicly concerning the state of implementation of Article 14(d), as you point out, particularly in paragraph four your telegram No. 199 of May 18th. As you know, the Commission's records and team reports, where this material may be found, are classified. Up to now there have been three main methods of making available to the public information on implementation of Article 14(d).

(a) Press releases and press conferences of the Commission. These have been uniformly unsatisfactory and there is little prospect of our being able to change this situation under the system of unanimity and an Indian spokesman to which the Commission agreed early in its history.

(b) Interim reports to co-chairmen. Here too difficulties arise from convention of unanimity on which Commission has overrated, to balance reporting on 14(d) and 14(c) (where the record of south has been extremely bad), and fact that public release of these reports, inadequate as they may be, is invariably delayed since it is dependent upon agreement of all Geneva powers.

(c) Ministerial statements. Needless to say, the statements which the Minister has made in the House are far and away the most valuable method of placing work of Commission and Canadian delegation publicly in their true context.

4. The action which we took in third interim report has not yet been made public. The (tactic?) of submission of a minority reference to co-chairmen by Canadian delegation, together with agreed critical references in report itself, has, I think, been justified by events since United Kingdom co-chairman was able to refer to relevant paragraphs of the report dealing with freedom of movement (which Polish Commissioner had accepted) in his communication to Mr. Molotov with the results we know.

5. There is another point to which in our view, insufficient attention has hitherto been drawn. A publicized indictment of the DR on charge of failing to implement Article 14(d) and a detailed expose of the DR to shortcomings in obstructing and hindering freedom of movement could readily be matched by reciprocal action by Polish Commission (with which the Indians might well be in agreement) to charge the other party with failure to carry out provisions of Article 14(c). The investigations which have been conducted by mobile teams in South (including reports now being received) provide an ugly picture of beatings, tortures and murders of former members of the resistance which took place last fall. These facts are on record in the Commission. Even at present, conditions in certain areas in South are so unsatisfactory that security of our teams cannot be guaranteed by either French or South Vietnamese authorities and Commission's investigations in these areas have been carried out only with greatest difficulty. A fair picture, therefore, of the operations of Geneva agreement would reflect what can only be described as a shocking state of law and order in many areas in South Vietnam, at least in early stages, and, coupled with the present sect troubles, there is ample evidence which the Pole could use at any time to illustrate how insecure and weak government in south has been in carrying out its responsibilities under the agreement.

6. In remaining period, we shall of course endeavour to have the parties work to secure fuller implementation of Article 14(d). Even now, however, it may be said that DR will continue to make every effort to prevent people going south to minimize size of remaining problems. It will make it difficult for Commission to obtain evidence that 14(d) is not being fully implemented and the same time particularly in view of their increasing difficulties with South Vietnam Government it will be difficult to count on an energetic and active approach by the French. Accordingly, while specific and limited measures may be possible we doubt whether much will actually be accomplished during the extended period.

7. If this diagnosis is correct question arises as to what steps are open to question (group corrupt) assessment of the situation on the public record either now or at end of period of extension. The fourth interim report is unlikely to be prepared until after Mr. Desai's return and completion of extension period. Saigon move will take place about that time and previous experience particularly where minority appreciation involved suggests such a report unlikely to be completed before late August at earliest. One questionable alternative might be to again propose that a separate report on freedom of movement should be sent to co-chairmen by telegraphic means immediately following end of extension period and if this were unacceptable to the Indian and the Pole, as was case in March last, to insist upon our right to transmit a separate and unilateral report on freedom of movement to co-chairmen, as soon after July 20 as possible. As a variant on this suggestion you may wish to refer to the idea put forward in your telegram to Canada House No. 745 of May 6† repeated to us as No. 173 of same date, paragraph 6 of which makes suggestion that United Kingdom co-chairman might request Commission for "further information concerning the freedom of movement problem". In view of the interest of United Kingdom co-chairman in this information possibly a request could be made to Commission by one of the co-chairmen for a report on operation of freedom of movement during extended period.

8. Before taking action on these lines, however, consequences should be carefully weighed. Mr. Desai has been anxious that during this period everything should be done to reduce tension as much as possible between the two parties, so that electoral consultations foreseen in final declaration may take place in the most propitious circumstances. This view is not restricted to the Indians but is shared, I believe, by French and United Kingdom authorities, and we think there is a good deal of merit in this approach. The reason for emphasising need for electoral consultations is clear. It is that if such consultations are not held, the effect upon maintenance of peace in Indo-China might be extremely serious, since the DR are unlikely to sit idly by without taking steps of their own to bring about a situation throughout Vietnam more to their liking. This does not necessarily mean a renewal of hostilities in the ordinary sense it may simply mean an increase of infiltration and subversion in the south in order to bring about an eventual situation in all of Vietnam favourable to the cause of the Viet Minh.

9. Canadian policy and action in Commission and elsewhere on freedom of movement issue after July 20 therefore might conceivably directly affect continued work of Commission at critical time and atmosphere in which consultations are to take place. Our policy in this matter seems to us to go to the root of Canadian participation in this Commission. Implementation of Article 14(d) is not sole purpose of agreement (despite volume of publicity concentrated upon it) and our central task in Commission is to assist in continued maintenance of peace in Indo-China and prepare ground for a possible political settlement. The need therefore is to reconcile two elements in our policy

(1) The facts re DR performance not merely on record of Commission but in form of a further minority appreciation in fourth interim report or possibly as a unilateral report (paragraph 7 above) designed for eventual public use and

(2) To avoid action about July 20 which would leave us open to the accusation that Canada had created an unfavourable climate for electoral consultation between north and south and had hindered the negotiations which alone will give the south the time it so badly needs to prepare for elections.

10. In light of foregoing and possibilities which exist for putting our views on the public record in accordance with paragraph 7 above, your early comments and instructions would be appreciated.

PRE-ELECTORAL CONSULTATIONS

Press reports concerning the DR announcement of their readiness to participate in inter-zonal discussions do not suggest that any invitation has been issued to the South Vietnam Government.<sup>24</sup> We are not clear, therefore, as to whether this declaration is indeed the initiative forecast by the Pole or whether something more positive is still in the offing. We would appreciate any information you can supply.

2. I do not believe that the Commission itself should at this time take any action as a consequence of this DR declaration. In the event that the DR should ask the Commission to take some action to get the two parties together for pre-electoral consultations, it would not perhaps be desirable for the Commission to refuse to take any action whatsoever. If the Commission were to refuse, the DR might endeavour to press the matter in the Joint Commission, and by this means to put on the French some measure of responsibility for seeing to it that the provisions in the Final Declaration concerning consultations and elections are carried out by the South Vietnamese Government. We would be grateful for your comments on this possibility.

3. If the Commission receives a request for action from the DR I think that the most that the Commission should do would be to act as a post office: that is, the Commission might <sup>24</sup> Pour l'annonce du 6 juin 1955, voir Allan W. Cameron, Viet-Nam Crisis: A Documentary History, Volume I, 1940-1956, Ithaca, New York: Cornell University Press, 1971, pp. 373-374. appropriately transmit the text of any document received to the South Vietnam Government (preferably directly, but if necessary through the French Liaison Mission) without comment and without a Commission request for a reply. If your colleagues agree that this should be done, I think you should also insist that the Commission send a communication to the Geneva Conference Co-chairmen advising them of the action taken and pointing out that this was done merely as a service to the parties and in full knowledge that the terms of reference of the International Commission do not extend beyond the supervision of the implementation of the cease fire agreement which contains no provisions relating to the inter-zonal consultations on elections.

4. Beyond this I do not think it would be appropriate for the Commission to take any other action, since it has no mandate to do so from the Geneva Conference Powers. For the Commission to take any other action beyond its normal terms of reference on the basis of a request from one party only might be particularly unwise since it could very easily jeopardize the relations of the Commission with the South Vietnamese Government, whose cooperation with the Commission is essential if the provisions of the cease fire agreement which have a continuing application are to be carried out. If your colleagues on the Commission press hard for some more extensive action than that suggested in the previous paragraph, you might say that you are willing to refer their proposals to Ottawa for consideration but you should give them no encouragement to think that we would be likely to take up their proposals.

5. We do not wish to give the appearance of being obtuse in this matter or of quibbling over procedural niceties in order to block progress on the elections question. On the other hand it is most important that we should not slip gradually into new commitments, which could very easily happen if the Commission starts to deal with matters beyond its normal responsibilities.

6. We note from this morning's papers that the South Vietnam Government are taking the line that it is up to the Geneva Conference Powers to reply to the DR statement concerning inter-zonal consultations. This reinforces our belief that the International Commission should stay well clear of the problem for the time being.

Following from Holmes, Begins: The following are my impressions of the electoral intentions of the South Vietnam Government after talks with Diem, various ministers and officials and with British, American, Australian and French representatives in Saigon.

The Government's position was particularly, clearly and candidly outlined to Crépeault and me by Nguyen Huu Chau the very influential (young?) minister without portfolio, the night he left for Paris, with the expressed intention of seeking a showdown with the French on their relations to the Diem Government and the status of their forces in Vietnam.

The members of the government are certainly not at this moment thinking in any concrete terms of entering into consultations on elections in July. (They take trouble to point out that the Geneva Agreement speaks of consultations rather than negotiations). The only positive idea mentioned was Chau's suggestion that the provisions of Geneva might be formally fulfilled if the south pass their views in writing to Eden who would pass them to Molotov for transmission to Hanoi, the same procedure in reverse being available to the north. They undoubtedly recognize the reasons for complying with the provision for consultations in July, and they are being firmly urged by the Americans to make at least a gesture by that time but they continue to repeat that as non-signatories (they?) are not bound by the Geneva terms. The United States Ambassador told me that he thought a legal case could be made to prove that the South Vietnamese are bound by the Geneva Agreement as a successor government and by reason of their acceptance of this Commission and association with the fulfillment to date and the terms of the agreement, but said he was arguing with them not on legal terms but on the ground that it was (group corrupt) for them to show willingness to consider elections.

The official argument is that there cannot be consultations on general election until the people of South Vietnam have expressed their wish through election in the south. These latter elections however cannot take place until a settlement has been reached with the French. So long as the High Command is in the hands of the French, it is said, the Diem Government could not appear as a free government in the eyes of the people, and the French army could interfere grievously on the voting. None of the Ministers I spoke to have said flatly that they will not enter into consultations in July, but they indicated that all decisions are suspended until they know the results of their negotiations with the French. There seems little doubt that they are seeking in this way to squeeze the French into a quick settlement for they know that the French are extremely anxious not to upset the provisions of the Geneva Agreement. At the same time the timetable on which they insist serves as a means of stalling for time.

It is still uncertain, therefore, whether there will be consultations in July. There seems to be very little tendency here among Vietnamese or foreigners to assume that this is a problem which should concern the Commission or the Commission powers and both the United States Ambassador and Counsellor have confidently confirmed my impression that the South Vietnamese do not want the Commission to intervene in any way. Several of the French here and in Hanoi have argued that the Commission should take an initiative, not on the grounds that such a role was assigned to the Commission but because they are desperately anxious that somebody should do something.

My conclusion from all I have heard is that we should be even more reluctant than we have been in the past to be drawn into the matter of electoral consultations. The United States, United Kingdom and France are taking a most active interest in the question and I do not see what we should contribute. Furthermore the "political situation" here is one of bewildering complexity, and the international aspects, particularly relations between France and the United States are extremely delicate and highly inflammable. We can best serve for the time being by plugging away steadily at the supervisory job assigned to us by helping to hold the ring in which the great powers fight this one out. If the Indians insist on getting into the ring, we might consider letting them do so on their own.

ELECTIONS IN VIETNAM

1. When we called on Dutt this afternoon he handed us an aide-mémoire dated today June 14th which we reproduce below. This aide-mémoire sets forth the views of the Government of India on the question of elections in Vietnam. Dutt told us that similar aide-mémoires will be given to the Poles and to the two co-chairmen presumably through their representatives in Delhi since Middleton, Acting High Commissioner for the United Kingdom, is calling on Dutt tomorrow morning to receive the aide-mémoire. In a subsequent telegram Holmes plans to report on the meeting with Dutt this afternoon and to offer comments on the aide-mémoire. Text begins:

1. The military phase of the implementation of the Geneva Agreement on the cessation of hostilities in Vietnam having been concluded, it remains now to give attention to the question of general elections which will bring about the unification of Vietnam.

2. Paragraph seven of the final Declaration of the Geneva Conference mentions that "so far as Vietnam is concerned the settlement of political problems effected on the basis of respect for the principles of independence, unity and territorial integrity shall permit the Vietnamese people to enjoy fundamental freedoms guaranteed by democratic institutions established as a result of free general elections by secret ballot". According to the time schedule fixed in this paragraph consultations are to be held from July 1955 onwards between the competent representative authorities of the two zones on the subject of holding general elections in July 1956.

3. Under Article 14 (a) of the Geneva Agreement on the cessation of hostilities in Vietnam "pending the general elections which will bring about the unification of Vietnam the conduct of civil administration in each regrouping zone shall be in the hands of the party whose forces are to be regrouped there in virtue of the present agreement". Accordingly the civil administration in North Vietnam was pending the general elections to be with the Democratic Republic of Vietnam and in South Vietnam with the French Union. Subsequently however the French Union transferred their sovereign authority in the southern zone to the State of Vietnam. The representative authorities of the two zones between whom consultations are to be held are therefore the Democratic Republic of Vietnam which is responsible for civil administration in North Vietnam and in virtue of Article 27 the State of Vietnam which has taken over the civil administration in South Vietnam from the French authorities.

4. The date on which these consultations are to commence (July 20th) is not far off and if paragraph seven of the final Declaration of the Geneva Powers is to be implemented, expeditious steps have to be taken to ensure that such consultations do take place on and from the appointed date. The implementation of the Geneva Agreement, particularly as non-implementation of paragraph seven of the declaration, must be a matter of vital interest to those who subscribed to the final declaration at Geneva. It is also of interest to Canada, Poland and India who as supervisory countries on the International Commission are associated with the implementation of paragraph seven of the Geneva Declaration involves the risk of reversion to a state of war between the parties through breakdown of the main structure of the Geneva settlement.

5. Having regard (to the?) relations between the parties and the circumstances prevailing in Vietnam it appears to the Government of India that consultations may not take place without some initiative being taken by the two co-chairmen. The Government of India therefore feel that the co-chairmen should request the authorities in charge of the Democratic Republic of Vietnam and the State of Vietnam to start consultations. To facilitate such consultations they may further offer the parties the services of the three delegates on the International Supervisory Commission in Vietnam. The delegates will act not as members of the Commission but as individuals representing their respective governments and their task will be to assist the parties:

(i) To convene a conference of competent representative authorities of the two sides for interzonal consultations and to assist in the preparation and approval of the agenda—and

(ii) To elect a chairman either from among themselves or from outside to preside over the deliberations of the consultative conference. The delegates from the Supervisory Commission will withdraw from the conference after the agenda has been settled and a chairman has been chosen to preside over the deliberations.

6. The chairman agreed upon by the parties will act both as conciliator and as technical expert on the essentials of a free election by secret ballot and will assist the parties to come to agreed conclusions as regards the principles and procedure which would ensure free and fair general elections by secret ballot. The agreed modalities of the elections can thereafter be worked out and adopted by the authorities in each of the two zones as the law in force for the time being to regulate elections. Thereafter the Electoral Commission envisaged in paragraph seven of the Geneva Declaration will be set up to supervise the elections in accordance with the agreed principles and procedure.

7. The Government of India would request the two co-chairmen to address the authorities in charge of the Democratic Republic of Vietnam and the State of Vietnam on the lines indicated in paragraphs five and six above. They are informing the Governments of Canada and Poland that they are making this request with an expression of their hope that the Governments of Canada and Poland would agree with the procedure outlined herein. The Government of India trust that the Government of Canada will agree with the procedure indicated in this aide-mémoire. Text ends.

2. You will presumably in due course let us have your comments on this aide-mémoire for transmission to Dutt.

Following from Holmes, Begins: The principal feature of my discussions with Dutt and Jha on Vietnam was their presentation of the aide-mémoire on election consultations text of which is contained in Delhi's telegram No. 394 of June 14. Dutt stressed the extent to which they had moved from their original point of view to meet ours. I did not commit you but said it seemed to me that they had indeed incorporated many features of our memorandum<sup>25</sup> and we were grateful for their consideration. It is important I think to realize that the Indians consider they have virtually adopted our views and will naturally be upset if we are overly critical. They would undoubtedly like to have our private views as soon as possible.

2. On the question of a neutral chairman Dutt spoke of a Swede or Swiss or Burmese. There was no hint that they might be thinking of an Indian. They seemed anxious lest we be offended at the idea of a single mediator but I said you had reacted not unfavourably when I had reported a similar suggestion from Desai.

3. Dutt was anxious to explain the procedure by which they were passing this memorandum direct to the co-chairman without seeking Canadian and Polish consent. They were doing this because of the urgency fearing that time would be lost if the matter had to be referred to Ottawa and Warsaw. It was clear that they were not commenting or speaking for the Poles or ourselves or on behalf of the Commission and if we had any views we could pass them direct to the co-chairman. I raised no objection as it seemed to me that although there may be theoretical objection to such a procedure it had practical merits. It will save time and it will keep the Commission out of the question.

4. As for the general talk on Vietnam I shall report on my return. I was impressed by what seemed to me a more sympathetic attitude to the Diem Government than hitherto. When I spoke frankly of the unpopularity of the Commission in Saigon and the need to win the confidence of the South Vietnamese Government if members of the Commission were to be of any help in the election, Dutt said they were aware of this necessity.

5. I told them a fair amount of what I had learned of the intentions of the South Vietnamese and drew their attention to the fact that if Diem secured a status-of-forces agreement by which the Vietnamese take over the High Command, the Commission would be faced with a dilemma. We were hardly likely to oppose such a move but the question would arise as to whether the Vietnamese would be willing to take over the function of the French vis-à-vis the Commission and accept the Geneva Agreements. Ends.

VIETNAM ELECTIONS

Our initial reaction to the Indian aide-mémoire is gratification that the Indians have gone as far as they have to meet our views on this matter. We are particularly pleased to note that the proposals do not call for the establishment of the elections commission until the modalities of the elections have been agreed upon between the parties.

2. Although we have some doubts about the arrangements suggested in paragraph 5 of the Indian aide-mémoire, we believe that we could probably express these reservations in terms of observations on the interpretation of this paragraph. We would naturally assume that the statement "To facilitate such consultations (the co-chairmen) may further offer the parties the services of the three delegates on the International Supervisory Commission in Vietnam" is permissive only, and that the Co-chairmen would as a matter of wisdom not offer these services formally if they had discovered through informal enquiries that the arrangements suggested were not acceptable to both the parties. The same would apply to the arrangements suggested in paragraph 6.

3. As to the substance of the arrangements, we are doubtful about the wisdom of having the Commissioners themselves perform even the limited functions assigned to them in paragraph 5, and would prefer that the way be left open to the Commission Governments to appoint some representative other than the Commissioner to perform these functions should they wish to do so. Also we are rather concerned about the prospect of these representatives assisting in the preparation and approval of the agenda, since this could become a very contentious matter.

4. Our preliminary view is that we should inform the Indians that we have no special comments we would like to make on the substance of their paper, but that we would hesitate to agree that the services of a Canadian representative should be offered until we can learn informally that the arrangements proposed by the Indians are acceptable to both the parties.

5. The next move is, of course, up to the United Kingdom, and they are in the best position to judge what use should be made of the Indian proposals in any discussions they will be having with the Diem Government. We think it might be of some advantage to the British in their discussions to be able to show the South Vietnamese the sort of proposals that have been put forward and which are in the hands of the Russians and presumably available to the DR, and to be able to point out that these proposals are probably more acceptable than any that might be put forward by the Poles or the DR themselves.

6. We are repeating to you telegram No. WA-1002 of June 16 from Washington, † indicating initial State Department reaction to the press reports of the much more accommodating attitude of Diem towards the idea of consultations.

Hanoi, July 4, 1955

SECRET

Reference: Our Despatch No. 67 of 7 February 1955.

FUTURE OF THE INTERNATIONAL COMMISSION
PART A — THE FIRST 300 DAYS

In this report — (Part A) — I intend to review the extent to which the Commission has so far succeeded or failed in the fulfilment of its obligations under the Agreement. In a separate report — (Part B) — I will examine against this background what may lie in the future, both in respect of the specific remaining tasks of the Commission and with regard to the more intangible political problems which it will face in the coming months.

2. The Geneva Agreement read in conjunction with the Final Declaration takes cognizance of three periods of time; each with its own distinctive features and purpose, yet each linked with the others to form a continuous chain expected to lead to the holding of general elections and the eventual unification of Vietnam.

3. During the first period, which ended on May 18, the main concern was meant to be the keeping of peace, by separating the forces of the two parties into zones assigned to them on either side of a demilitarized buffer area. The other provisions of the armistice — for exchanging prisoners of war and civilian internees, for facilitating freedom of movement, for preventing reprisals, and for controlling the import of war material and troops — taken with the provision for the regroupment of forces, form a logical pattern for establishing and maintaining a status quo as a pre-requisite to the search for a political solution to the division between North and South. All of these provisions were to have been well in hand by May 18.

4. The purpose of the second period, starting on that date seems to have been to allow the parties a breathing spell in which to organize themselves for the commencement on July 20, 1955, of inter-zonal political consultations. These consultations are to be carried on during the third period, from July 20, 1955 onwards and are envisaged as resulting in the holding of free general elections throughout North and South Vietnam.

5. Any assessment of the Commission's work must, of course be set against the knowledge that responsibility for implementation of the Agreement lies with the parties, and the parties alone. The Commission has no executive powers, and in the performance of its tasks it has had to rely to a great extent on the co-operation extended to it by the parties under Article 25.

6. Looking back on the first period taken as a whole, I think the Commission has done some useful work. Initial administrative problems were rapidly solved during the installation of the three delegations in Hanoi and Saigon. Fixed teams were established at all sites envisaged in the Agreement (some of them belatedly) and more than 100 mobile teams or mobile elements of fixed teams have been employed from time to time on Commission tasks of reconnaissance, control and special investigation.

Regroupment of Forces

7. The long and complicated operations to remove the forces of the two sides into their respective allotted zones and to effect the peaceful and orderly transfer of the provisional regroupment areas — the last of which were the Haiphong Perimeter and Interzone V in the region of Qui Nhon — were successfully completed without incident by May 18. The Commission was undoubtedly of considerable assistance to the parties in working out the basis of these operations and in firmly supervising their execution. It is estimated that during this period approximately 126,000 French Union Forces were regrouped while, on the PAVN side, regroupment involved 173,900 troops and 86,000 additional persons made up of military families, administrative cadres, and liberated prisoners of war.

Import of War Material and Personnel

8. At least some measure of control of the import of war materials and personnel has been continuously effected by the Fixed Teams since their establishment as laid down in the Agreement. The first two at Lang Son and Saigon were in operation on 8 September 1954 and the last by 15 December 1954. Control of the Chinese border as provided for by the Geneva Agreement left some gaps. It has been necessary, therefore, to recommend the relocation of the Lang Son Team at Dong Dang and to station a mobile team at Cao Bang to cover the main roads by which major equipment might enter North Viet-Nam. So far the DRVN have not notified the Commission of any imports or exports and none has been observed by the teams. However there was a period of six months when it must be admitted that control was incomplete and major quantities might well have entered during that time. In the South all import and export of war material reported by the French has been through the port of Saigon where a system of control by check of manifests and by periodic spot checks of equipment being loaded and unloaded has been established. For the future these methods should make it difficult, if not impossible, to import major items of equipment but it is manifestly impossible to stop smuggling by jungle trails or across open beaches if either party decides to resort to such measures for the import of war materials in man pack or animal pack loads.

Control of Airfields

9. Airports situated at Fixed Teams sites have been controlled since the establishment of the teams but no additional airfields have been checked up to the present time. Recently as a result of a French request a list of existing airfields has been drawn up and arrangements have been made for the Air Advisers to check their present condition and to assess the need for the institution of control. No airfield improvement has been observed at any location visited in North Viet Nam. Improvements in the South have been confined to those necessary to meet the needs of the French Air Force as their forces were withdrawn from the North and re-deployed. While it is possible that war material has been introduced by air, we have no evidence of it, or complaints by either party, and we think it unlikely that such importation has taken place.

Military Bases

10. The Agreement is not specific as to what constitutes the establishment of a new military base and no agreed interpretation of this has been arrived at by the Joint Commission or the Commission. In the North there has been no visible build-up of base facilities in any area to which we have access but it should be borne in mind that the most probable location (which is the area of Thai Nguyen North of Hanoi) has never been visited by teams of the Commission. It is believed that whatever base or bases the Viet Minh had established during the fighting were located in this area. So presumably any build-up of existing bases in this area would be within the terms of the Geneva Agreement. In the South the French have expanded base facilities in Tourane area and in the area Baria-Cap St. Jacques. This expansion has been necessitated by the evacuation of troops from the North and is considered to be in keeping with the Agreement.

Prisoners of War

11. There has been progress with respect to the prisoners of war question which loomed so large in the first months of the Commission's work. Under pressure from the Commission, the French had by the end of October 1954 released or handed over approximately 9,000 prisoners and the DRVN something more than 12,000. No further exchange of prisoners has since taken place. You will have seen from our Paris Embassy despatch No. 1001 of May 25† that the French Government has declared that it is not aware of any violation of the Geneva Agreement at this time in respect of prisoners of war and has drawn public attention to Mr. Desai's statement of March 29 that no prisoners of war are being retained against their will by either side.

12. There is, however, a continuing problem which arises from the fact that neither side is completely satisfied with the information it has received from the other about the fate of a number of persons listed as missing and presumed to have been prisoners. A large volume of correspondence, consisting of letters from the parties and of copies of their letters to each other is still being received by the Commission in respect of this matter. According to a French plan recently sent to the Commission to show the position as of June 1, the French had up to that time asked the PAVN for information concerning 28,915 persons while the PAVN had inquired about 13,370. At that time the French had replied to 71% of PAVN inquiries, while the latter, with a sudden rush of correspondence in the recent weeks, had replied to 90% of French requests. The point in this latter figure is that 71% of the replies supplied by the PAVN have alleged simply that the persons in question are "unknown". The French decline to accept this as an adequate reply and are apparently anxious, for both legal and humanitarian reasons, to establish the fate of about 6,605 French and African soldiers and some 12,949 Vietnamese soldiers still listed as missing.

13. The true position with respect to prisoners of war has been confused to a certain extent by the fact that the parties have held differing views as to the relationship of the limited number of so-called "ralliés" to Article 21. The Commission has agreed that the article does not apply to deserters, i.e. a person who deserted to the other side and was not taken into captivity as a prisoner of war. In practice, non-Vietnamese "ralliés" who have expressed a desire to be repatriated have been dealt with in a manner generally acceptable to the two sides and which the Commission had assisted them to work out. In accordance with this procedure, some 1,000 persons of non-Vietnamese origin falling within the category of "ralliés" have been handed over to the French or repatriated to their country of origin through China after passing under the observation of Commission teams.

Civilian Internees

14. By the end of October 1954, the Commission had succeeded in persuading the parties to release the bulk of the political and civilian internees held by them. On that date the French had released or handed over some 59,000 such internees and the PAVN approximately 6,000.

15. Complaints from both parties of continued incarceration or irregular release of internees have since been investigated by the Commission. The only investigation conducted at French request was that of a camp alleged to exist at Yem Luong. Such a camp was found not to be there. The PAVN have laid greater stress than the French on the question of civilian internees. As a result of PAVN complaints, Commission teams have been engaged in lengthy investigations at Poulo Condore and Chi Hoa prisons, where the extreme delays and difficulties encountered have seriously impeded their work.

Democratic Liberties

16. The question of the illegal incarceration of civilian is, of course, related closely to the question of reprisals under Article 14(c). So far this article has been used by the PAVN with most damaging effect against French and Southern authorities in respect of incidents which occurred at the end of last year when a number of murders, beatings and other atrocities undoubtedly occurred. In most of the cases investigated by the Commission as a result of PAVN complaints, violations of 14(c) have been found and the FUF have been held technically responsible. While aware of the difficulties the French have had in locating guilty parties months after the crimes have taken place, and when there is an atmosphere of tense antipathy between the French and the South Vietnamese authorities in many areas of the South, the Commission has pressed the French to take action to punish those responsible for these violations in accordance with Article 22.

17. It is a singular fact that, in spite of the totalitarian methods employed in the North as in every Communist country, the French have yet to present the Commission with a well-founded charge of a violation of Article 14(c) by the Northern authorities. For its part, the North has worked with some success to balance the PAVN failure to implement freedom of movement against the shortcomings in the South with respect to 14(c). In addition, the Polish delegate has on occasion made much of what he has described as the general absence of law and order in large areas of the South, which he has asserted, that from time to time conditions necessary for the implementation of the Agreement generally have not in fact prevailed. Presumably, the main reason why he has laboured this theme is that he has been documenting for future reference, if required, evidence that the Southern Government is neither popular nor effective and that democratic liberties cannot be enjoyed under its authority.

18. The Commission deserves some credit for the impartial and objective manner in which it has conducted its investigations into and discussions of the difficult cases arising under Article 14(c). This has done much to reduce the threat of increased friction between the parties presented by PAVN emphasis on these cases.

Freedom of Movement

19. The sustained and frequently frustrating efforts of the Commission under Article 14(d) and deliberate failure of the PAVN to implement fully its obligations to assist those who wished to go to the South are well known to you. The Commission has been subjected to a good deal of criticism in the world press and other quarters for its alleged failure to ensure the full implementation of this article. It should be remembered that the seed of the difficulty in respect of Article 14(d) is inherent in the text of the article itself which states in the French version that the parties have a duty to "autoriser et aider" persons wishing to change their zones. The fact that "autoriser" was interpreted to mean "to grant a permit to" placed in the hands of the DR the means of impeding the free movement of refugees to the South. The initial determination of the DR to obstruct this movement by most means short of force was increased at an early stage when it became known that large numbers of people were anxious to change their zone. In the later stages of the 300-day period I am personally convinced that even force was used for this purpose, while the co-operation received from local authorities, upon whom so much of the practical implementation of the Commission's suggestions had of necessity to depend, was far from satisfactory.

20. It is, however, to the Commission's credit that in spite of the handicaps placed upon it and in spite of the obstruction encountered in the North, some 930,000 people are estimated to have gone South by one means or another, some with permits, most without. In the effort which has been made, and the results accomplished by the Commission, the Canadian Delegation, including the members of the teams on freedom of movement surveys, has shown both initiative and persistence.

Summary

21. On balance, I think it is fair to conclude that a substantial degree of success has so far been achieved by the Commission during the period under review. At least, there has been no renewal of hostilities, and the chances of such a renewal occurring are a good deal more remote now than when the Commission first arrived. Much of the credit for the progress made is due to the generally sensible and sensitive manner in which Mr. Desai has carried out his onerous duties as Chairman. There is no doubt that his neutralist background and Indian political objectives have influenced his judgment. As a master of the art of compromise he has succeeded in preserving throughout this period a technical unanimity in the decisions of the Commission and has skilfully avoided a single formal majority-minority decision. The Canadian Delegation considers that his record on freedom of movement and control of the importation of war material for example, has not been all that we desired or were entitled to expect. We have found it difficult to adjust ourselves to the tempo and complacency of the Asiatic attitude, and to the subtlety of the Indian mind. But in agreeing to compromises so frequently and adroitly devised by Mr. Desai following our deadlocks with the Poles, we have endeavoured to maintain our attitude of refusing to depart from our own ideas of what is just and proper. While bearing in mind the basic objective of the Armistice Agreement for the period under review, we have, I believe, refused to sacrifice any of our principles, and we have not failed to speak out against practices which we considered improper or unjust.

22. Despite the assumption by the Polish Ambassador of an attitude of judicial impartiality in the Commission, there is no doubt that the Polish Delegation has been working in close co-operation with the PAVN to obtain advantages for the North. It may not be inappropriate to say that had it not been for the Canadian Delegation, the record of the Polish Delegation — from the point of view of Communist objectives — would read far better than it does.

23. In my view, therefore, all members of the Canadian Delegation can take some pride in the tasks they have carried out during the critical regroupment period of the Agreement.

Hanoi, July 4, 1955

SECRET

FUTURE OF THE INTERNATIONAL COMMISSION
PART B — WHAT LIES AHEAD

In my despatch no. 341 of today's date, I have sought to assess the measure of success and of failure of the Commission during the 300-day period of military regroupment and transfer. In this report I intend to review briefly the outstanding specific tasks for which the Commission will continue to be responsible during the interim or middle period, and possibly even after July 20, and to attempt an assessment of the more intangible political problems on which attention will be mainly focussed during the coming months.

2. Despite the measure of success achieved during the first 300 day, there are a number of specific problems which have inevitably carried over after May 18, either because of the continuing responsibility for them laid down by the Agreement, or because special arrangements have been made, as in the case of freedom of movement, for continued action by the parties with the participation of the Commission. The consequence is that during the "breathing space" foreseen, neither the Commission nor the parties will be able to breathe as easily as anticipated, and the way forward is anything but certain.

3. In the first 300 days, the Commission was mainly conscious of the need to prevent a resumption of hostilities, which might have resulted from a general breakdown in the implementation of the Agreement during the difficult phase when the forces of the two sides were being separated and regrouped. No formal attention was given by the Commission during this period to the political issues ahead.

The Continuing Tasks

4. During the middle or "breathing space" period, it seems clear that the Commission will wish to carry out its continuing responsibilities in such a way as not to diminish the possibility that the two sides will come peacefully together to enter into consultations concerning their mutual political problems. The following are the more important continuing responsibilities of the Commission which will be carried out with this in mind:

- (a) Control under Articles 16 and 17
- (b) Study and implementation of measures to ensure that no new military bases will be established—Articles 18 and 19
- (c) Supervision of the demilitarized zone and demarcation line - Article 36(d)
- (d) Continued interest in the residual problems of prisoners of war and civilian internees—Article 21
- (e) Responsibilities with respect to Article 14(c)
- (f) Responsibilities with respect to subversion—Article 14(a)

(g) Supervision of the continuing measures for facilitating freedom of movement—Article 14(d), including a follow-up of petitioners

(h) Possible consideration of what role, if any, the Commission is to play with respect to elections.

Control of Military Bases

5. From my despatch under reference, you will have noted that the whole question of control, both of border areas and of the demilitarized zone, airport and coastal regions not within the zones of action of fixed teams, is not entirely satisfactory. It seems clear that the Commission will continue to seek improvement in this situation and the most effective employment of its teams. The Commission, too, will undoubtedly be calling upon the parties for renewed efforts to resolve the question of defining military bases. Because of the unsatisfactory nature of the control now possible, it seems likely that the Commission will be required from time to time to consider allegations that one or other of the parties is violating the prohibitions on the import of war materials and fresh troops and the establishment of military bases.

Demarcation Line

6. The completion of the military regroupment has increased the urgency of instituting control within the demilitarized zone so as to ensure its effectiveness, not only as a buffer between the forces, but also as an obstacle to the introduction of subversive elements from one zone to another. Slack control along the demarcation line could not fail to assist the D.R. in subversive activities. The danger of incidents cannot be discounted. We should, therefore, continue to press for the maximum degree of Commission control in this area.

Prisoners of War and Civilian Internees

7. The Commission has been pressing forward procedures for dealing with the question of the disposition of so-called "ralliés" as well as procedures for handling the general prisoner of war question with the co-operation of the parties. Once the general definition and procedures have been accepted by the two parties, the solution of individual cases should not present too great difficulties. The Commission will also be required to deal with allegations concerning detention and release of civilian internees in violation of Article 21. The Canadian attitude in respect of the continuing work on problems relating to prisoners of war and civilian internees should continue to be based on humanitarian considerations and practical solutions. On the other hand, the emphasis the PAVN is putting on charges of this kind smacks of propaganda, and we shall urge the Commission not to place itself in a position of aiding one or other of the parties in its campaign to discredit the other by rumour and false allegations. I think the Indian Chairman will be with me in this.

Democratic Liberties

8. There are indications that the PAVN, with the help of the Polish Delegate, will try to derive the utmost possible advantage out of the less than perfect record of the South in respect of Article 14(c). It should, however, now be possible to avoid the worst effects of this tactic. In the first place, and most importantly, the Indian Chairman is determined (and I, of course, support him wholeheartedly) not to allow the Commission to become embroiled in further useless investigations under this article, where the events alleged to have taken place are so old that the trail to be followed by an investigation has grown cold. The results of the Commission's intervention in such cases would almost certainly be inconclusive and, therefore, of use to the North for propaganda purposes.

9. Secondly, the Commission has recently decided not to attempt to formulate a definition of "democratic liberties" within the meaning of Article 14(c), as the Polish Ambassador has repeatedly requested. It has limited itself to ad hoc interpretations of this Article along restrictive lines so as to cover only those persons against whom reprisals may have been taken for acts occurring before the end of hostilities. Those liberties which will be required to pertain in both zones as a pre-requisite for general elections will presumably be the subject of negotiations and specific definition between the parties once the interzonal consultations take place.

Subversion

10. In the meantime, the Government in each zone, and this is mostly important for the Southern authorities, is left free to take action against persons suspected of subversive activities. Subversion by an active organization controlled from the North is something against which the French have complained for a long time, and a Commission team has been investigating along these lines in Quang Tri Province. This is the first such investigation, as it is the first time that a Commission team has been asked to look into both charge (violation of Articles 21 and 14(c) by the south) and counter-charge (subversion practised by the North). Unfortunately, the team reports so far received only record evidence of the former and the charges of subversion, (on which it is far more difficult to obtain evidence) have not been substantiated.

11. It seems unlikely that it will be possible to show either in Quang Tri or in any other area investigated by the Commission that the PAVN is directly responsible for subversive activities. The best we can hope for is that some evidence will be uncovered that individuals are engaged in subversion in the South.

12. I have no doubt however that such activities are controlled from the North and that they will undoubtedly continue and increase up to the moment when the general elections are held. The tempo of Southern complaints will probably also increase, and the Commission's attention will be bound to be engaged in this field. Whenever there is sufficient evidence, we should try to expose subversion for what it is, and to place responsibility for it on the North. I am not too hopeful, however, that we can count on much support from the Indian Delegation here, and the Polish Delegation will spare no effort to defend the interests of the D.R.

Freedom of Movement

13. Because the implementation of Article 14(d) was not completed by May 18, freedom of movement will continue to occupy the attention of the Commission in this middle period. Without a formal amendment of the Agreement, special arrangements have been made through agreement of the parties, and on the basis of suggestions made by the Commission, for the continuation of measures to permit people to exercise their right of option up to July 20. It is impossible to say how effective this period of extension will be, but we are not sanguine that any great exodus will take place from North to South. Apart from obstructions and hindrances enforced by the Viet Minh, and the difficulties encountered by our teams in carrying out objective investigations, it is difficult, if not impossible, to agree upon a reliable test of how well or badly Article 14(d) of the Agreement has been carried out, since success cannot be measured in mathematical terms. On the whole, while there is much to be said for Mr. Desai's view that the real test must be the judgment of the parties themselves as "consumers", the Canadian Delegation cannot without good reason abandon its responsibilities in this matter, and we are awaiting your comments on the Canadian position at the end of the present period of extension. If, on July 20, the French and the South Vietnamese are prepared to forego a castigation of the D.R. on the ground that to do so would postpone electoral consultations, it may be difficult for Canada to take up a position "plus royaliste que le roi".

14. Our real difficulty has been to sustain active interest in the implementation of Article 14(d) in the middle period when the main preoccupation of the Indian Chairman (and of the Polish representative) is to avoid any aggravation of the relations between the parties in the interest of their coming together for electoral consultations.

15. Both the French Liaison Mission and we ourselves have reserved the right to discuss after July 20 what continuing measures we might consider to be required at that time. I am not at all sure, however, that this will be fruitful, since the Polish delegate has strongly indicated his view that the Commission would have no competence to discuss the continued implementation of Article 14(d) after July 20 and the Chairman seemed to favour this stand. In the Polish view, the whole question of movement across the 17th parallel should be absorbed in the political consultations expected to begin on that date, and the Commission should not interfere with what will then be essentially a matter for agreement between the two sides. There are indications that the Indian Delegation may take a similar view.

16. In practice, I am inclined to think one of the two things will happen. On the one hand, the parties may refuse to deal with one another, thus spelling the end of freedom of movement, whatever the Commission might decide. On the other hand, they may have indicated by July 20, or soon thereafter, that they are prepared to consult together. In this event, there is a faint possibility that some such general proposal for opening the 17th parallel to free movement as that advanced by the PAVN on February 4, and since pressed with considerable vigour by the North, may be examined by the parties. It is difficult to imagine, especially in the light of the Polish stand in the Commission, that the PAVN could be persuaded to deal with freedom of movement, in any other way after July 20. Accordingly, what the Commission's responsibilities and activities will be in respect of this matter after that date, it is impossible now to foresee.

17. From the above, it will be obvious that there will be no dearth of work for the Commission during this middle period. There has been some slackening of the pace during Mr. Desai's absence, and it is to be hoped that this will be reflected in a reduction of the tension between the parties before July 20, in conformity with the apparent intention of the Agreement.

After July 20

18. July 20 is used in the report only as a general marker. Obviously, important activities will not necessarily cease, nor drastic changes occur immediately on that date. Nevertheless, the situation may alter so profoundly some time after that date that the member Governments of the Commission, and certainly Canada, may be compelled to take a hard look at the nature of their continuing responsibilities.

19. In one sense, the final period has already begun, with the initiative taken by the D.R. on June 6 to declare its determination, to proceed with the electoral consultations at that time, with a definite view to holding general elections for all Vietnam in 1956. We may be sure that the D.R. will not rest until the victory in 1954 of Dien Bien Phu is matched by what they are confident will be victory in 1956 at the polls throughout Vietnam. Mr. Pham Van Dong, the Foreign Minister, repeatedly refers to "the two great victories of Dien Bien Phu and the Geneva Agreements". Steady pressure therefore may be expected from the North for the full implementation of the political provisions of the Agreement. So far the Commission has merely noted the Declaration of June 6, a copy of which was sent to it for information by the PAVN Liaison Mission.

20. In the South, the situation is far from clear. The Diem Government has been giving first priority to subduing the sects and to attempts to strengthen its general position in the zone under its authority. Throughout the South, since the signature of the Armistice Agreement, there has been a marked lack of agreement between the Diem Government and its potential supporters, particularly the French, and to a lesser extent the United States. The attitude of South Vietnam toward electoral consultations is still obscure. Although there has been much pressure on the Diem Government to ready itself for the stage of inter-zonal consultations, it is now too late for the South to "seize the initiative". In the light of this, it may be worthwhile to speculate on the possibilities on or about July 20.

21. In the first place, it is possible that the south will not in fact be ready, and that consultations will not in fact be held on or soon after this date, despite the insistence of the D.R. In this event, we may look for renewed pressure by the D.R. for the "full implementation" of the Agreement. In our view, the possibility of an actual renewal of hostilities, although it cannot be entirely discounted, is remote. A decision to move against the South by military means would not be taken by General Giap, but by Moscow and Peking. In the present state of international relations, with the prospect of limited understandings with the Communists in other areas of tension, and of a four-power meeting at a high level, it seems improbable that such a decision would be taken, at least for the time being.

22. There are, on the other hand, measures short of war, and the Communists are expert at them. We can look to a continuation of infiltration and subversion in addition to a general stepping up of the propaganda campaign against "the American interventionists and their puppet Diem". There will be renewed charges of violations of the Geneva Agreement, and of alleged attempts to sabotage it by the Americans. It is not unreasonable to anticipate that those governments which support the D.R. would lend their active support and assistance to the continued international pressure for pre-election consultations. If the South does not seem to be prepared to yield to these pressures, the most likely result would be a substantial increase in tension throughout this area, as a result of an all-out effort to overcome South Vietnam by non-military means.

23. In circumstances such as these, the Commission's role would become greatly circumscribed, since the basis of agreement between parties, which is essential for the effective operation of the Agreement and of the Commission's tasks, would have disappeared. It may therefore be said that, if electoral consultations are not held, and if there is no intention on the part of the South to enter into them, the effectiveness of the Commission will be weakened to a point where its continued attempts to fulfil its responsibilities would have only dubious results. It would then be for decision whether the Commission (or Canada) would wish to stay on indefinitely policing what would be virtually a cease-fire situation analogous to that in Kashmir.

24. On the other hand, if electoral consultations begin not too long after July 20 and the South expresses its readiness to discuss the basic conditions for free elections in Vietnam, the position might be substantially different. The Viet Minh has not yet shown its hand, beyond a general insistence that consultations and elections should be held. Nevertheless, given the dominant role which they exert throughout the whole of the D.R. territory, and the strong position which their sympathizers occupy in various areas in the South — particularly those which have been under D.R. occupation for some time — there is little doubt that the mood of the Viet Minh is one of confidence. For this reason, the North is likely to be prepared, at least on paper, and possibly also in fact, to accept electoral arrangements which may surprise the world in their apparent liberality. If they are confident, as I believe they are, that the results of general elections will be favourable to their cause, their most likely tactic will be either to propose or to agree to arrangements for all

Vietnam elections, which will incorporate what they hope will be conditions acceptable to and defensible before free world opinion.

25. The position of the South in the event that consultations are held is not yet determined. If we assume that the influence of the United States on the eventual policy of the Diem Government is likely to be powerful, and I believe this is a fair assumption, the final position to be taken by the South will no doubt reflect the thinking of the United States, which was explained in your telegram WA-833 of May 20.† This thinking places emphasis on the determination of prior conditions for free elections, in the expectation that the existence of the conditions for genuinely free elections could not possibly be accepted by the Viet Minh. If this should be the position after July 20, the South is not likely to contribute to a rapid termination of the consultations in an agreed blueprint for a programme of national elections.

26. What seems likely is that following formal statements of principle and of basic conditions, the negotiations will be protracted, tedious and propagandistic. This period of probing each other's position may be one of danger also, from the point of view of peace in Vietnam. The danger, however, will be less than if such consultations were not held at all, since despite the fact that propagandistic measures may be taken, the conduct of negotiations, if conducted under proper auspices, will provide an organized forum for the presentation of opposing points of view, and processes of discussion and argument will be available to reduce, or at least to prevent, the increase of tension. Although presumably itself having no direct part to play in respect of these discussions, the present Commission will be guided in all its actions by the necessity of helping to ease tension, generally, as much as possible.

27. No one can yet say with certainty what will develop, nor how quickly after July 20 it may become possible to estimate with any degree of accuracy the long-term future of the present Commission. There is, however, no doubt that July 20 will usher in a difficult period for the Commission and for Canada, whichever way the die may be cast in respect of election consultations. All of us will be called upon to apply our calmest and best judgment continuously, not only so that we shall know how best to anticipate sudden and unexpected developments, but also so that we may clearly recognize in good time the danger signals. In this situation, you will wish to weigh carefully whether or not it will be to Canada's advantage to participate directly in the supervision of a type of election in Vietnam, the results of which may not be acceptable to the western world, and which at some stage prior to its being held, certain powers may feel it in the general interest of world peace to prevent.

28. Underlying the basic difficulty about electoral consultations is the fact that up to the present time the Government of the State of Vietnam has not accepted the obligations imposed on the parties by the Geneva Agreement, and no understanding has been arrived at between the French and South Vietnamese as to the succession foreseen in Article 27 of the Agreement. As a consequence, the Commission will increasingly face the difficulty that the French High Command is not in fact the effective authority in the South, and the real decisions rest with the South Vietnamese. If it appears that the South Vietnamese authorities are not prepared to assume the responsibilities of this succession, the operation of the Agreement and the effective carrying out of the tasks of the Commission will become progressively unworkable.

SECRET. MOST IMMEDIATE.

FREEDOM OF MOVEMENT

The Commission has received from its Saigon office a copy of the letter addressed to the Saigon office by the French Liaison Mission there concerning the present position of the South Vietnamese Government with respect to the extension of the right of option to go and live in the other zone. This letter states that, as no discussions have yet been held in the Joint Commission about the guarantees originally claimed by the Vietnamese Government in order to ensure that the exercise of the right of option was more efficacious, permits are not at present being issued to people who apply to go and live in the other zone.

2. This letter will be considered in the Commission today. In view of the origin of this letter, it will be necessary, as I see it, for the Commission, in the first instance, to obtain clarification about the situation in the South from General de Beaufort. We understand from private discussions with FL Mission here that they had hesitated to pass this important communication to the Commission in view of the present impasse with respect to operation of certain teams in the South.

3. We have been in touch informally with General de Beaufort and put to him directly question whether French were planning to ask Commission to undertake further general surveys by mobile teams (on general lines of those of teams 54, 55 and 56), and if not, whether he thought it advisable for us to consider making such a proposal in the Commission. He replied in the negative to both questions. The French Liaison Mission at this stage could hardly ask for teams in the North when investigations in the South had been blocked for months (he referred particularly to teams 61 and 24). In the light of present attitude of South with respect to team investigations in general, and the particular view South Vietnamese had taken (as reported in this telegram) concerning grant of permits for people wishing to go North, it was doubtful whether the South would accept team investigations. At the same time, difficulties experienced in getting teams out in the South would place DR on strong ground in resisting mobile team investigations on freedom of movement in the North. General de Beaufort further said that assuming teams could be placed on the ground, such general surveys in the North would be unlikely to produce useful result in view of techniques perfected for concealing evidence. For these reasons, French do not plan at this stage to make such a request to the Commission.

4. For the same reasons de Beaufort was inclined to think an initiative on the part of Canadian delegation to send out teams might run into difficulties. So far as direct consultations between parties in the Joint Commission were concerned, these had produced little or no result. De Beaufort hoped, however, that in limited period remaining Commission could make some progress on restricted front on settlement of 'residual problems', including following up cases of petitioners, right of option for political and common law prisoners, and of persons jailed for 15(d) offenses.

5. General Dhargalkar in discussion yesterday stated that he is opposed to the Commission embarking on general mobile team surveys on freedom of movement and favours calling in parties for reports on progress in their direct discussions, on what action they have taken to date to implement the Commission's suggestions, and what further action they propose to take between now and July 20, he considers that there is no point in sending out teams unless a specific complaint is put forward by one of the parties.

6. Commission today agreed that as first step, parties should appear before it and explain past and present action to implement Commission's recommendations, plans for remaining period and development in Joint Commission. In the light of report from the two parties, Commission will then have to determine what further action is open to it. As you are aware, under para 4 of the Commission's suggestions of 28 May, the Commission stated it would continue to supervise the completion of the task by the two parties during the continuing period. When progress report and future plans, if any, have been received from parties, Commission can consider whether or not it would be useful to conduct further general mobile team investigations on freedom of movement in the period prior to July 20. In the light of the developments in Saigon, reported in this telegram, the latest views expressed to us by the French Liaison Mission, and the position of the acting chairman (see para five above) which is, I believe, shared by the Pole, proposals for general mobile team investigations on the Commission's own initiative are unlikely to be put forward unless we do so ourselves. On balance, our present delegation thinking is that it might be unwise on our part to press for general team surveys, on two main grounds, (1) that such surveys will not assist us to prove that a continuing problem exists in the North, and, (2) that a request for surveys of this type will only highlight the present uncooperative attitude of the South Vietnamese. The fact that the Commission does not undertake further mobile team investigations may possibly prove difficult to explain publicly. As we (see it?) however, it does not preclude our right, if we wish to exercise it, of registering in the Commission a general assessment of the operation on freedom of movement based on the position up to May 18 and the limited results obtained between May 18 and July 20.

7. Before finally determining our stand, however, and as requested in my telegram No. 323 of June 25 grateful for our instructions soonest by DWS on general lines this delegation should take to enable us to carry out our Commission responsibilities on July 20.

PROSPECTS IN INDOCHINA

The following are a few considerations which I have been turning over since my return from Indochina. You may find these of some interest if you are involved in discussions on Indochinese questions in London, Paris or possibly Geneva.

2. It seems to me almost certain that we shall be faced in the coming months with critical and difficult decisions about our role in Vietnam. The situation within the past week has become particularly worrying and, as you know, is a cause of concern to the Commissioner in Hanoi. It seemed to me serious enough when I left Saigon. At that time I saw the possibilities facing us in the following terms.

3. The I.S.C. has completed almost a year of work on which we should look with considerable satisfaction. The highly publicized difficulties over freedom of movement should not obscure the fact that what was considered in Geneva to be the major preoccupation of the Commission, i.e., supervision of the regroupment of forces, has been singularly successful. To a large extent because of the work of the Commission, the peace has not been disturbed. The Commission, however, is faced in the coming year with a much less satisfactory agenda.

4. The situation on the principal items seems to me as follows:

(a) Regroupment of Forces. This — the work which the Commission has done most satisfactorily — is completed;

(b) Freedom of Movement. It seems almost certain that, not only because of Communist obstruction but also because of South Vietnamese reluctance, there will be very little — if any — movement of refugees under Commission supervision after July 20. This issue, at any rate, will probably be twisted by the Poles into a plea for opening the 17th parallel and may well, therefore, become a subject on which the Vietminh will appear not as the violators but as the upholders of the Geneva principles.

(c) Supervision of Frontiers. While the Communists exploit, although not particularly successfully, certain issues concerning movements of arms into South Vietnam and among the three Indochinese states, the situation on the Chinese border remains unsatisfactory. My impression, after talking to a good many Canadian officers who had served on the Northern border, is that although there may be a certain amount of traffic in small arms or vital parts there is probably no serious<sup>26</sup> violation of the Agreement by the Chinese.<sup>27</sup> The officers seemed to agree that, although the presence of the teams undoubtedly had a deterrent effect, it would be quite possible for the Communists to move considerable quantities of small arms (which are probably what they need) if they really wanted to. The tentative conclusion to which I came was that there had not been much traffic because there was no particular need for it. The Communists are not building up the Vietminh army for active fighting at this point and it would serve their purpose quite well to prepare on the Chinese side of the border for any assistance which might later be necessary. (As you are aware, in spite of the frequent public charges from Washington of violation on the Northern border on a large scale, the Americans have never been able to produce for us through regular or through intelligence channels any valid evidence of such traffic since the time the Commission's teams were established on the frontier last autumn.)

(d) Democratic Liberties. There has been an increasing volume of complaints in the Commission against the South Vietnamese authorities, and we should expect that these will continue to increase. The Vietminh have naturally been anxious to counter charges of their violating 14(d) with accusations that the South was violating 14(c). A good many of these charges against the South are true and could not be honestly opposed by the Canadian Commissioner. Whereas in the North there is a calculated and organized repudiation of isn't traffic in "vital" parts a serious violation [L.B. Pearson]

democratic liberties, these violations in the South are undoubtedly the result of an anarchical situation, the inevitable passions resulting from years of civil war, the activities of the Sects, and probably also the authoritarian tendency of Diem's government. (Whether Diem is something approaching a fascist dictator, as some of the French allege or whether he is merely a strong man doing what is necessary in a turbulent situation, as the Americans think, is a matter of dispute.)

5. The prospects, therefore, are that the Commission will be less and less involved in work which it can do usefully and more and more involved in work which is frustrating and unsatisfactory like the control of the Northern border. It will be more and more involved, furthermore, in work in which the South rather than the North appear in a bad light. They may be swamped with charges under 14(c) against the South, but it is hardly to be expected that many people in the North will be able or willing to prefer charges against the D.R. and give evidence against them.

6. The effect of such a situation on the morale of Canadians, particularly the army officers in the field, needs to be considered. Already many officers, particularly those who have been involved in the disheartening task of trying to liberate refugees in the North, are fed-up and a little bitter. Some of them are critical of the Commission and even of Canadian policy in the Commission. Even more disheartened are those who sit at fixed teams where there is practically nothing to do. The intelligence, the patience and the general morale of the Canadian officers in Indochina is something of which we can be extremely proud. Nevertheless, it will be difficult for them to sit out another year unless they have some feeling of accomplishment. The next group will be more comfortable than the first, but they will not have that sense of adventure and achievement which kept up the spirit of the troops for at least the first six months. It is difficult for men who have been isolated and working on specific tasks to understand all the time that their greatest contribution to peace comes from their simply being on the spot. I have no reason to believe that the next crop of army officers will be any less patient and well disciplined than the first, but, if they are not achieving much apparent success, there will undoubtedly be pressure — and quite justifiably so — to move them to other countries where they are very much needed.

7. All in all, it looks as if we may be faced before long with a situation resembling that which you foresaw in public statements from the beginning. It will be difficult for the general public, for the teams on the spot or for ourselves to point to any concrete accomplishment of the Commission — or more particularly of the Canadian component. In fact, we shall have to ask ourselves whether the Commission is not serving the Communist cause by concealing Northern violations and proving charges against the South. We may well expect that such a charge will be made by South Vietnamese and by Americans. The Americans have never adequately appreciated what the Commission has done to keep the peace and they may not be reluctant to ask for its disbandment. The process might be quite similar to that followed in Korea. Washington might be expected to argue that the Commission is allowing Chinese reinforcement to the North but prohibiting American assistance to the South and must, therefore, be ended. They would plead with us, as they have with the Swiss and the Swedes over Korea, to break up the Commission by withdrawing from it. The British, French and Indians on the other hand might be expected to plead with us to remain; and we shall be in a serious dilemma.

8. Our decision would have to take into consideration the very serious effect of withdrawal. In reaching any such decision we must keep our eyes steadily fixed on the fact that our real contribution in Indochina cannot be judged primarily by our success on any specific item of the agenda. The real contribution is in our being there. There could be no replacement for us on the Commission, and without us, therefore, there could be no Commission. Without a Commission there could be no Geneva Agreement. To break up this framework of peace, however distasteful some of its aspects, would be an extremely serious step. We might, therefore, have to stand firm against serious internal and external pressures.

9. Our decision should depend, to a great extent, on whether the Geneva framework is still holding or whether there is a possibility of maintaining peace on any other basis. It may be that by that time, as a result of the meetings at the Summit, the whole context of the armistice in Indochina will have changed. It is conceivable, although not very easily, that on orders from Moscow the Vietminh will begin to behave differently. In such a situation the Commission could, it might be assumed, accomplish more, but it might well be embarrassed by reluctance and intransigence on the part of the South. On the other hand, if the new meetings at Geneva are not very successful, there may be a retreat in other directions. There may be a new reliance on SEATO, combined with a policy of retreating from the Geneva Agreement, strengthening the Southern régime, and accepting partition as the less dangerous alternative. In the latter situation it is hard to see how the Commission could play a useful role. With South Vietnam turned into an American-backed satellite and with no prospect of free elections, the Commission would receive little co-operation from either side and its position would become untenable.

10. Another possibility is that the South Vietnamese and the Americans will seek to transfer the case to the realms of the U.N. In principle there is, of course, a good deal to be said for this course. It is possible that if the U.N. were to sponsor the cause of South Vietnam independence, the Communists might be more reluctant to subvert it. Such a course is, however, incompatible with a continuance of the Geneva Agreement and the I.S.C. unless, as seems unlikely, the Communists agreed to the reference to the U.N., in which case one might get what amounted simply to a U.N. blessing of the Geneva structure and not very much change in the situation. The Geneva structure was the result of a hard and unpleasant bargain, but, because it was accepted by both sides, it has kept the peace. There is no possibility of the U.N. against Communist opposition achieving the same result. In fact, therefore, the policy of reference to the U.N. would amount to the same thing as the retreat to SEATO. The U.N. might send a Peace Observation Commission, which could be useful in the unpleasant circumstances, but it could not perform the functions of the present I.S.C. In either of the above circumstances, therefore, the Commission would be by-passed and useless.

11. Whether the South Vietnamese and the Americans clearly understand that they cannot have the Commission much longer unless they accept all the provisions of the Geneva Agreement is a matter of doubt.

12. If the prospects for the Commission looked hazardous two weeks ago, they look much worse now as a result of South Vietnamese statements and threatened statements about elections. It seemed to me that I noticed a dangerous tendency among South Vietnamese and Americans in Vietnam to say that there could not be free elections, therefore, the South Vietnamese need do nothing about these provisions in the Geneva Agreement and that was that. Such a course may prove necessary, but it is most imprudent to contemplate it without seriously weighing all the consequences. One of these consequences is the withdrawal of the I.S.C. or at least its decline into total incompetence. I did try to pin down at various times Ministers in the Government and a number of Americans to considering in detail the consequences of a violation of the Agreement on elections, although I had to be careful never to appear to be urging the South Vietnamese to do one thing or the other before July 20. It seemed to me that they did not take the prospect seriously enough or had not given it enough thought at all, although the British and French certainly did.

Few people expected that the D.R. would march across the 17th parallel, but the best informed were certain that they would give the signal to their underground forces in the South to start their campaign of infiltration and subversion in ways which might prove quickly irresistible.

13. If Vietnam policy develops further in this direction then I see little prospect of the Commission being continued successfully. It may not be disbanded but it would have no influence on either party. It is already receiving much less than satisfactory co-operation from the South. (One of the problems facing the Commission regardless of other developments is the increasing unreality of a situation in which it deals with the D.R. and the French but not with the South Vietnamese. The French have been on the whole as co-operative — although terribly inefficient — as it was possible for them to be, but the fact that they cannot speak for the South or secure compliance from the South makes their position absurd.) The North Vietnamese have, in spite of their behaviour on many issues, been well disposed in principle towards the Commission and have certainly given it better facilities than the South. However, they have done so for one purpose only: to them the Commission is an instrument for securing free elections which they will win. When the prospect of peaceful free elections fades, they can hardly be expected to co-operate with the Commission — unless, of course, they follow the even more embarrassing policy of the sweetest reasonableness to the Commission in order to encourage us to stay and to prove that the South are in the wrong.

14. In spite of all these arguments which seem to lead to the conclusion that the South Vietnamese should carry out the terms of the Agreement on elections next year, we must face certain brute facts. It is here, I think, that the British and the French rather than the Americans may be refusing to look at the realities under the formula. There is a basic paradox in the present situation about which we ought not to kid ourselves any longer. The paradox is this: It is of the greatest importance that peace be maintained in Indochina by maintaining the structure established at Geneva. This structure can be maintained only if the provisions concerning free elections are carried out. However, there cannot be elections next year which could reasonably be called free by Asian, European or by any other standards than those of the Soviet Union. It is not a question of the modalities. The North might provide absolutely secret balloting and the other customs of democratic polling booths. They might even allow opposition parties to campaign. However, you cannot have free elections in an unfree atmosphere. Balloting might be secret but campaigning must be open. It is not conceivable that many people in the North, even if they were encouraged by the Government to do so and offered guarantees against persecution, would come out into the open and take a stand.

15. (Superficial impressions may not be reliable, but I was certainly shocked by the Muscovite atmosphere in Hanoi, and even in Haiphong, which I visited only a few days after the transfer. These were the same banners and slogans, the portraits, the mass demonstration on Uncle Ho's birthday, the children dressed like Soviet pioneers marching and chanting all day through the streets, the drab shops and the guards with bayonets everywhere. It was, in fact, much closer to the Moscow of the Twenties or middle Forties than to the more "liberal" Moscow of to-day. I am not at all sure either that the 50,000 people who assembled at the race-track to shout for Ho on his 60th birthday would want to vote against him even if they were perfectly free to do so; they seemed to be having the time of their lives.)

16. It may be possible to see a ray of hope if one does not take too rigid a view of the kind of elections in 1956. Anything like uniform, national, free elections for a legislative assembly or even for a constitutional assembly must not be seriously considered as a possibility. There are possibilities, however, of finding some formula which would allow the two governments to continue in power but provide some kind of federal council or planning body to work towards unification. This might not be strictly in accordance with the Geneva Agreement but it would presumably be acceptable if the parties could agree to it. I found that the Indians and the French in particular were thinking along federal lines or at least looking for practical solutions based on a more flexible attitude towards the electoral provisions. Neither side at the moment seems likely to accept any such thing, but it is just conceivable that they might start looking together for a formula if as a result of the new Geneva meetings they were pressed by their sponsors to do so.

17. Whether or not there can be found any way of carrying out the electoral provisions in 1956, there is a great deal to be said for the argument that consultations should be undertaken. Even if the prospects of finding a formula are very slim, there is an argument for postponing a show-down on the Geneva Agreement for some months at least. This, I found, the most persuasive argument which the French put to me on any subject in Indochina, or in Paris. The best of them, who were also, I think, the more influential, said that they hoped that the Diem régime might strengthen its basis enough in a few months' time to stand on its feet. Diem could not at this stage face a show-down with the Vietminh, given the infinite possibility of infiltration and the ability of the D.R. to exploit the problems with the Sects. If Diem could only be persuaded to maintain the Geneva framework and the bulwark of the International Commission for as long as possible he might be in a better position for a crisis.

18. There is, however, in this position also a danger of delusion which we ought to face. The Americans and others maintain that they are urging Diem to fulfil the terms of the Geneva Agreement by entering into consultation. I did my best to persuade the Indians of the honesty of the Americans' intention in this regard. The Americans unfortunately talk too much to make their position convincing. Various spokesmen have made it perfectly clear to the Indians and others that they are urging Diem into consultations in perfect confidence that the holding of free elections will be frustrated in other ways. On the other hand, it is difficult to quarrel with the argument that if in the course of consultations the North are the ones who make unreasonable demands the blame should be squarely placed on them. Much depends on the way this position is stated. It is tactless to announce in advance that failure will be the result of the consultation and that this is a source of satisfaction. If one recognizes that the suspicions, not only of the Communists but also of Indians and other Asians, of the American role in Indochina arise out of the equivocal and fundamentally irresponsible position the U.S. has adopted towards the Geneva Agreement, it is not surprising that American intentions concerning elections are not generally trusted. Their position, however, if approached and defined honestly, is not inconsistent with the Geneva provisions. It may not, however, make adequate provision for the possibility that the North will offer impeccable paper guarantees which can be rejected only by a charge of bad faith that cannot be proved in advance.

19. Although this memorandum has been concerned entirely with Vietnam, the unity of the Geneva Agreements is becoming more and more clear. For example, I am now almost convinced, and I found such Indians as Desai and Dutt sharing the same suspicion, that the Vietminh are maintaining the Pathet Lao stake in Northern Laos as a hostage pending agreements on elections in Vietnam. The conflict over the Military Aid Agreement in Cambodia is understandable only in terms of the strategic concept on which the whole Geneva settlement was erected. If the Geneva framework collapses in Vietnam, it cannot be maintained in Laos and Cambodia. Chou En-Lai's tacit agreement last June to leave the two Western Indochinese states in the neutralist block was conditional in his mind upon fulfilment of the provisions for Vietnam. So we must take for granted that if the Commission ceases to operate effectively in Vietnam the Commissions in the two other countries cannot survive for long.

FREEDOM OF MOVEMENT

There appear to be two aspects of this question on which decisions as to our future course of action are required: (1) whether you should support or propose further survey investigations by mobile teams to ascertain the present situation with respect to freedom of movement; and (2) what steps should be taken to have our position with respect to the concluding phase of the freedom of movement problem written into the record and publicized.

2. On the former question it does not seem possible to take a definitive decision as to the line to be followed until the parties have made their reports to the Commission. I am impressed with the arguments you mention against our pressing for any further team surveys of a general kind. At the same time I believe we should consider carefully before abandoning our well established position in favour of an active role for the Commission particularly in the making of investigations on this question. In public statements here we have emphasized the value of these investigations while admitting their limitations, and it might be difficult to explain our abandonment of this approach for reasons that are irrelevant to the freedom of movement question itself. I agree that a request for surveys may highlight the uncooperative attitude of the South Vietnamese, but I see no particular harm in this and believe that we should not soft-pedal any justifiable criticism of the South on the issue of freedom for the teams to investigate, which is vital to the whole function of the International Commission. I agree that a further survey may not produce the sort of evidence we would like to get and that the inability of further surveys to produce such evidence might make the maintenance of previous charges against the DR the more difficult, but we may have to take that risk. I would welcome your further comments on these points.

3. In any case the issue may be partly determined by the nature of the reports made to the Commission by the parties. Although the representations which the French make to the Commission on their own or on behalf of the South Vietnamese may not specifically request a general survey by mobile teams, they might be of a kind that would suggest the desirability of such a survey, and in this circumstance failure on our part to propose mobile team investigations of a general type might prove embarrassing to us.

4. On the second question, the pressure of public opinion at the present time on the Government for more information on the freedom of movement question is not as strong as it was two months ago, and there is not the same public interest. My statement in the House of Commons on May 2 and the supplementary statements to the External Affairs Committee did a good deal to satisfy public and parliamentary curiosity, and there is no indication at the present time that the public demand for more detailed information concerning the freedom of movement question is likely to become strong again in the near future.<sup>28</sup> At the same time we must recognize that the interest shown in this matter was not merely a passing one and that Canadians will have a continuing desire to see justice done and the terms of the agreement carried out. Accordingly the Government must be in a position to make an acceptable explanation of the status of the freedom of movement question and the position which Canada has taken in relation to it. At the present time it appears that what is likely to be needed is not so much a catalogue of Viet Minh misdeeds as a clear statement of our policy on this matter and an indication in general terms of the record of our attempts to have this policy adopted by the Commission. Such a statement could when necessary be referred to and quoted in justification of our role on the Commission and possibly at a later stage if in the electoral preparations it is necessary for us to take a stand with respect to safeguards for free elections.

5. The general line of a Canadian statement might be as follows:

Since the beginning of its work in Vietnam the International Commission has been gravely concerned with the freedom of movement issue. Repeated efforts have been made by the Commission to see to it that the provisions of Article 14(d) were properly carried out, and numerous and detailed recommendations were made on administrative procedures which would (it was hoped) ensure that the intent of the agreement on this subject could be carried out. The record of performance has, however, been disappointing both in the 300-day period and during the subsequent extension. Reports of the parties as to what was achieved during the extended period do not indicate that the problem with respect to freedom of movement, in the dimensions as assessed by the mobile teams which completed their general surveys early in April, has been solved during the extended period. So far as the Canadian delegation is concerned, it appears that the reason for the inadequate implementation of the terms of Article 14(d) lies not so much in the inadequacy of the administrative arrangements provided as in the general atmosphere which has existed since the beginning particularly in North Vietnam, an atmosphere which has to a considerable extent cut across all efforts to make the provisions of Article 14(d) work in practice. The Commission took note of this situation in its press release of February 13 when it alluded to the fact that rumours and fears current amongst the population had tended to make them reluctant to apply to the authorities for the permits and facilities required in order to exercise their rights under Article 14(d). The Canadian delegation believes that the continued existence of these fears and rumours in North Vietnam has been largely responsible in that zone for the unsatisfactory implementation of the freedom of movement provisions. These fears and rumours and the general atmosphere of suspicion and distrust referred to in paragraph 22 of the second interim report to which these fears and rumours are related have been and — unless removed — will continue to be a serious impediment to the satisfactory implementation of the cease fire agreement, particularly in those articles which deal with civil matters.

6. The general argument of the foregoing could be used in three contexts: (a) as a Canadian statement for incorporating in the Commission minutes when the Commission is winding up its current efforts to deal with the freedom of movement question shortly after July 20; (b) in any press release issued by the Commission at that time recording its actions with respect to the freedom of movement issue; and (c) in the next interim report of the Commission. I presume there should be no difficulty in getting the statement into the Commission records. I believe that you should insist on getting some record of the Canadian view along the above lines into any contemplated press release or in the fourth interim report.

7. If the general argument of the foregoing could be written into some Commission document which the Indians at least would agree to, so much the better; but I do not think we should accept any watering down unless our own minority view is supplied separately. Certainly we should oppose very firmly any Commission statement which says or implies that the freedom of movement question has been adequately cleared up or that the DR have carried out their obligations.

8. It would appear that there is not much more we can hope to achieve in the immediate future insofar as the practical objective (of enabling as many people as possible who wish to do so to get out of North Vietnam) is concerned. I do not believe, however, that we should give the appearance of throwing in our hand at this point, and you should do everything possible to ensure that in the final assessment by the Commission of the freedom of movement question around July 20, the matter is left open in some fashion or subject to later Commission review. It is also important that our position be recorded before the Commission adjourns its dealings on the matter. You will be in the best position to judge the proper time for recording any statement along the lines suggested above. You should, of course, feel free to add to the statement any further material which may serve to support the general argument or abbreviate it where the context of its use requires something shorter.<sup>29</sup>

PROPOSED CANADIAN STATEMENT ON ELECTIONS

Following is the text of the draft proposed statement commented on in my telegram No. 366, Begins: I would first point out that there is no substantive provision in the cease-fire agreement for Vietnam which relates either to the actual holding of elections, or the preliminary consultation to be entered into between the State of Vietnam and the Democratic Republic of Vietnam. Indeed, the only reference to elections to be found in the agreement is contained in Article 14(a), and that reference is merely incorporated to establish the point up to which the civil administration of each zone shall be conducted by the respective parties. There is, accordingly, nothing in the agreement itself which imposes any duty upon this Commission regarding preliminary consultations. It may be urged that this does not dispose of the question, and that this Commission must have regard to the final declaration, and in particular to the second paragraph of point 7. This paragraph, as you know, states in part that "consultations will be held between the competent representative authorities of the two zones from the 20th July onwards." The first question that arises is whether the final declaration creates binding legal obligations on the signatories. In our opinion the final declaration was not intended to do so. Rather, it falls into the class of those international instruments that are in the nature of statements of policy rather than instruments intended to lay down legal rights and obligations. While failure to carry out an undertaking contained in the final declaration would be a breach of good faith, this is quite different from a breach of a legal obligation. The role of this Commission is of course limited to supervising the execution of the agreement by the parties. This means that the responsibility of this Commission extends only to those provisions of the final declaration that are substantively embodied in the agreement itself and does not extend to supervising the execution of the various declarations. I should not be understood as saying that the final declaration is to be disregarded in determining what the duties and responsibilities of this Commission are. On the contrary the final declaration is considered by the Canadian delegation as containing important statements of policy which may, and often should, be referred to in construing any doubtful or ambiguous article of the agreement. There is a further consideration that arises in assessing the effect of the final declaration. Certain reservations regarding it were made by the representatives of the State of Vietnam during the final sessions of the Geneva Conference. Their precise effect is obscure and any question as to the legal right of the State of Vietnam to refuse to implement any of the provisions of the final declaration can only be resolved in the light of these reservations. We believe that only the governments that participate in the Geneva Conference are competent to decide the exact effect of the reservations. If I may recapitulate, the Commission must consider the following points. First, the role of the Commission is limited to the tasks imposed on it by the agreement and the agreement itself imposes no duty to initiate or supervise the discussions between the parties on the question of general elections. Second, the final declaration, in our view, did not create legally binding obligations upon the signatories. Third, the extent to which the final declaration created moral obligations upon the State of Vietnam can not be determined except by the governments participating in the Geneva Conference, since the Government of Vietnam made certain reservations to the declaration.

Having said this in explanation of the Canadian view of the legal position, I must emphasize the importance Canada attaches to the declarations as considered statements of policy which the participating governments are obligated to carry out as a matter of good faith, though not of legal obligation. Short of regarding the final declaration as a treaty relationship and the individual declarations as amounting to unilateral assumptions of enforceable legal obligations, we consider these instruments should be given their just weight and that default by the participating governments in carrying out the terms of these declarations might constitute a breach of faith.

In view of the foregoing, the Canadian delegation is of the opinion that as matters now stand, the Commission would be unwise, and indeed would be acting without legal justification, if it were to take any action to see that the consultations are actually begun or to supervise or in any other way concern itself with such consultations as may take place. Circumstances would, of course, be changed should the Commission receive a request or an invitation to intervene for the Geneva powers with the agreement of the two sides. While we believe that it would be unwise for the Commission to project itself prematurely into the question of pre-electoral consultations, if there is a helpful role which the Geneva powers and both sides feel might usefully be played by all or one of the Commission Governments, I believe that my government would be prepared to give the matter careful consideration.<sup>30</sup> Ends.

FREEDOM OF MOVEMENT

1. There are three principal aspects to problem:

<sup>30</sup> Cette déclaration a été approuvée par la Direction juridique du Ministère. Voir Ottawa à Hanoi, télégramme N° 342 du 17 juillet 1955, MAE/50052-F-40. Bien qu'il n'ait pas été remis, le Ministère a estimé que ce projet de déclaration résumait très bien les vues du Canada et l'a largement diffusé. This statement was approved by the Department's Legal Division. See Ottawa to Hanoi, Telegram No. 342, July 27, 1955, DEA/50052-F-40. Although it was not delivered, the Department considered this draft statement an important summation of Canadian views and circulated it widely.

- (a) action after July 20 re possible continuation;
- (b) use of mobile teams;
- (c) publicizing Canadian position.

2. On (a) French Liaison Mission have informed us privately French High Command does not propose request further extension after July 20 and consider continuation freedom of movement must be (group corrupt) for general discussion between the North and South Vietnamese. We do not know what South Vietnam attitude will be but assume they will continue exchange general charges with DR rather than seek to achieve practical ends. In light of this, results achieved since May 18 and known Indian and Polish attitude, I see no point in our proposing any further extension. Best we can do at this stage is to try to ensure that the Commission makes a clear statement after July 20 that it will bend its efforts to solve residual problems affecting all those who applied for permits up to July 20 but were not able to move for reasons beyond their control on the same basis as has been done in case of prisoners of war under Article 21. It is unlikely that Commission will agree that there is a general problem which has not been solved which is view we have taken. In this event we should presumably state this fact on a minority basis if necessary. Possibly we might add that only agreement, even on a limited basis, between the parties can provide a solution of this general problem. In so doing we should have to try to avoid any Commission blessing of DR proposal of February 5 which is certain to be resurrected. We might also reserve right of Commission to make investigations after July 20 wherever residual or general problem may be shown to exist. Your comments would be welcomed.

3. On (b) the use of mobile teams, from what we know of Polish and Indian views and fact that the French and South Vietnam authorities have not, repeat not, asked for further mobile teams although they have asked for arbitration of certain procedural points (see paragraph 1 my telegram No. 362 of July 16†) there are real practical and perhaps political difficulties in way of our seeking initiate further freedom of movement surveys at this time. Even if we can succeed in obtaining Commission agreement, which I think is highly doubtful, it is likely that surveys would turn up more damaging evidence of a recent character in the south than in the north if indeed they were able to operate in south. Because of such considerations, please reexamine this problem and advise whether you wish us to propose surveys which we are reluctant to do unless one of parties should require surveys.

4. Finally on publicity I assume you will wish us to press for inclusion statement in fourth interim report on lines of that delivered July 16 if necessary again on a minority basis. This interim report will probably not be prepared until some time in August.

5. You have also referred to possibility of press release on freedom of movement. There would seem to be little prospect with the divided view existing in Commission of an agreed communiqué. The issuance of a 'minority' press release may be desirable but would be a wholly new departure. I should be grateful, therefore, if you would indicate whether you consider we should press for a press communiqué incorporating our minority views in advance of efforts to have these views set forth in a minority statement for inclusion fourth interim report.

6. Mr. Desai will be in Saigon this week and no doubt he will be in a position to give us the up to date views of his government. Meantime appreciate your further comments on (a), (b) and (c). Also look forward with interest to receiving the comments you have sought from the Foreign Office as indicated in your telegram 316.

VIETNAM: SAIGON RIOT<sup>31</sup>

We have had only two reports (53† and 54†) from Mr. Lett who will be in Saigon until Saturday, July 23. In the latter telegram Mr. Lett says "Surely you will agree this serious failure on the part of the French and South Vietnamese requires urgent action." He tells us that the Commission has reported to the Geneva Co-Chairmen on the incident and its implications, but we do not yet have any text. He suggests that "Desai will raise with Delhi question of whether continuance of Commission work is possible unless effective security arrangements by South Vietnam are forthcoming." He asks for our comments.

2. I have already informed you that the State Department have sent us an oral message counselling patience. They have since told us that Reinhart has reported from Saigon this morning that the Commissioners are still in an emotional state and appear quite unprepared to accept apologies from Diem without unequivocal assurances of his assumption of obligations under the Geneva Agreement.

3. I think it politically unfeasible to expect to get such clear-cut assurances from Diem. Similarly we can hardly expect the French to move their troops back into Saigon to protect the Commission. A clash between French troops and demonstrators would compound our problems.

4. We are told that Diem will apologize to the Commission and give assurances regarding security, but not under the terms of the Geneva Agreement. The Americans, British and French have all made strong representations to Diem about this stupid attack on Commission personnel.

5. In these circumstances, I think that we should send an urgent telegram to Mr. Lett counselling patience. A proposed message is attached for your consideration.

VIETNAM — SAIGON RIOTING

My telegram 53† instructing you to associate yourself with any protest the Commission intends to make to local authorities indicates the serious view we take of anti-Commission demonstration and pillaging of hotel rooms in Saigon on July 20. We are particularly unhappy about reports of failure of Vietnamese police to try to stop initial attacks and evidence of Government support for demonstrations even though these may have got out of responsible control in actual pillaging of hotels.

2. Nevertheless, I hope it will be possible for the Commission to show as much patience as possible in these difficult circumstances. I fully appreciate that South Vietnam Government have made the position of the Commission very difficult through (a) failure to provide adequate security for mobile teams in north-central Vietnam; (b) refusal to be bound by Geneva settlement and virtual rejection of pre-electoral consultations;<sup>32</sup> (c) climaxed by July 20 anti-I.S.C. rioting. We can understand desire of your colleagues and yourself to get a firm commitment from the French and the South Vietnam Government to give the Commission the protection and assistance called for by Article 25 of the Agreement. You will appreciate, however, that the French have had to transfer control over internal security in Vietnam to the Vietnamese Government without getting assurances that the latter will take over French responsibilities under Article 25. This transfer of power was an inevitable and proper development and cannot be reversed in its main stream. It requires, as you know far better than we do, that the Commission take a practical view of the degree of protection it can expect to receive from the French themselves, although the Commission may press the French to work out with the local authorities adequate measures. Further, since the South Vietnam Government did not adhere to the Armistice Agreement or Final Declaration you will appreciate the difficulty in pressing it to give explicit guarantees under the terms of the above Agreement, although it would be quite proper to expect the Government to provide adequate security.

3. Do you not agree, therefore that it would be unrealistic for the Commission to insist on obtaining clear assurances from the French and Vietnamese under Article 25 although we would expect the French to recognize their obligations and give assurances that in consultation with the Vietnamese they will do their best to fulfil these commitments.

4. Even though the Commission may not get entirely satisfactory assurances it may have a continuing useful pacifying role to play in Vietnam. If so, this broader view of the Commission role must not be forgotten in the present aggravating circumstances.

5. London, Paris, Delhi and Washington. You may reflect our reactions along the lines outlined above without specifically indicating that these are the instructions that have been sent to Mr. Lett.

FREEDOM OF MOVEMENT

I think that we should maintain our position along the lines contained in my telegram No. 300 of July 11 to you, and in your statement of July 16 in the Commission. Our main objective should be to maintain continuity in our contention that the freedom of movement problem has not been solved adequately, in spite of the fact that we will probably find ourselves in a minority and that there is perhaps little more of a practical nature to be achieved in the way of securing movement of refugees. In this connection we agree with your statement of July 16 that "it is the duty of the Commission, by whatever means might appear appropriate on and after July 20, to see that the provisions of Article 14(d) are implemented to the satisfaction not only of the parties but of the Commission itself and the real 'consumers'."

2. We do not think that you should put too much emphasis on whether or not the French or South Vietnamese authorities consider further action necessary or desirable, since there seems to have been only a trickle of refugees from the north during the extension period, and therefore little can be known by them of the extent of the continuing problem. Nor do we think that you should be deterred by the lack of reciprocity on the part of the South Vietnamese authorities in further investigations, or the possibility that the Indians and/or the Poles will not support a proposal for further surveys by mobile teams. Finally, we do not think that our basic position should be altered in order to avoid bringing further attention to the shortcomings of the South Vietnamese authorities in investigations during the extension period.

3. We therefore suggest that you should take the following action:

(a) You should request a further extension, for the reasons given in your statement of July 16, despite the fact that we will probably receive no support from the Indian and Polish Commissioners. We agree with your suggestion that you should also seek an undertaking by the Commission that necessary action will be taken to solve any residual problems affecting persons who applied for permits before July 20 but have not been able to move for reasons beyond their control.

(b) You should request that mobile teams make freedom of movement surveys. We appreciate the difficulties outlined in paragraph 3 of your telegram No. 371 of July 18, but consider that these surveys are essential to the assessment of the size of the remaining problem, and that you should ask for them in the Commission. The cumulative results of these surveys should be most important as additional proof that, despite a series of Commission recommendations, beginning last February, the DR has failed to implement Article 14(d) satisfactorily, not merely in the extension period, but over the whole period that Commission has been in existence.

(c) You should request the filing of an immediate report to the co-chairmen, in order that the Canadian position can be placed clearly on the record. We appreciate that your Indian and Polish colleagues will probably only agree to the inclusion of a statement on the freedom of movement problem in the fourth interim report when it is prepared; however, we feel that such a request on your part constitutes a further necessary clarification of our position. Moreover the U.K. has indicated its readiness to request the Indians to raise the matter in the Commission. We agree that you should press for the inclusion in the special report or failing that the fourth interim report of a statement along the lines of your July 16 statement in the Commission, and, if necessary, again on a minority basis. In the latter case, the evidence produced by the freedom of movement surveys should be used to substantiate a claim that the DR has consistently failed to implement Article 14(d) satisfactorily throughout the existence of the Commission.

(d) With respect to a possible press release we appreciate the difficulty of pressing for one which would probably include a minority view. However, if we accept that our views on the continuing nature of the freedom of movement problem are not likely to be supported by the Indian and Polish Commissioners there is some danger in allowing the end of the extension period to pass without making our position clear to the public. Depending on the outcome of the Commission's discussion of your July 16 statement, we consider that a press release should be made containing our minority view, if necessary, unless it appears that we can get further Commission action on our above requests. If Commission shows no willingness to agree to any of the requests put forward in this paragraph, we must reserve the right to make our views public in some appropriate way if deemed necessary.

FREEDOM OF MOVEMENT

Since the extension period, which coincided with Saigon episode, Commission meeting July 27 provided first occasion discussion freedom of movement since Commissioners July 16 statement. Occasion arose through consideration French Liaison Mission letter which attempted defend position in South (which has been most unsatisfactory, as you will have noted from previous reports) re Article 14(d) during extension period. Pole used occasion to condemn non-cooperation of southern authorities. Chairman proposed reference of whole problem, which has been subject of voluminous and unsatisfactory correspondence and reports from parties, to Freedoms Committee for study and preparation of detailed report on implementation 14(d) up to May 18th and during extension, together with recommendations re action to be taken by Commission. For purpose committees study Chairman said three delegations would be able to use all information at their disposal. Based on Freedoms Committees study, Commission should then give co-chairmen full account action taken re 14(d) by parties in light Commission's recommendations and provide suggestions for future action. Chairman favours early report, by about mid-August, to co-chairmen, which will include an assessment of implementation of 14(d) along with examination of other articles.

2. Chairman remarked similar Committee might do general review of 14(c).

3. We thought it timely, in order to place our views on record and to provide framework committee's report, to follow up July 16 statement with a statement of points set forth in your telegram under reference (for summary of statement see my immediately following telegram†).

4. There was no disposition in Commission, as we had anticipated, to take action on any of our suggestions pending detailed report of Freedoms Committee. We thought, however, that useful purpose would be served by recording our view at outset, and we shall seek to ensure that position is maintained in Committee's study. This will mean a postponement of final Commission action for a fortnight, but in view of incomplete information now available, and complication arising from position in south, we saw no alternative but to accept Chairman's suggestion, reserving our right to raise again the three proposals concerning extension, a special report to co-chairmen, and mobile team surveys.

5. We are under no illusions that these three proposals will be acceptable to other members of Commission, although there was no disagreement with view that Commission would continue to take necessary action to resolve "residual problems" affecting persons who applied for permits before July 20 but have not been able to move for reasons beyond their control.

6. Following our statement the Polish Acting Commissioner Perl declared Polish position unchanged. He understood that 14(d) would no longer apply after July 20 but said other means for people to move would be found. Pole confirmed teams could still examine "residual problems" but declared it was not up to Commission to request an extension.

7. The suggestion of a special report was opposed by Chairman on well-known lines that 14(d) was only one of several articles of the agreement on which co-operation of parties had left much to be desired.

8. We are on [thin?] ground, requesting mobile teams surveys, not only because of fact that real situation very difficult to establish in north, but also because even freedom of movement record in south is now unsatisfactory and that south is virtually certain to refuse to accept Commissions teams for the purpose. Nevertheless, a proposal that teams should be deployed has been made and will be raised again in Freedoms Committee.

9. Under these circumstances, we hope you will agree that providing we maintain a consistent [line?], as we shall seek to do in Freedoms Committee, no further steps can be taken in Commission for the present. We believe it would be premature to propose a communiqué in advance of Commission's study or determination of what can be put forward in fourth interim report.

NEXT COMMISSION REPORT TO CO-CHAIRMEN

It is possible to discern in very rough outline the next report to co-Chairmen. When we raised in Commission on July 27 question of a special report on freedom of movement, Desai proposed Freedoms Committee should prepare detailed report on whole record and assessment of 14(d) to July 20. He has not mentioned to us privately action taken by United Kingdom High Commissioner in Delhi referred to in your telegram No. 345 of July 29,† but it seems possible that his suggestion of preparation of detailed report takes into account United Kingdom request and that Freedoms Committee report (which is now in preparation) may be used as basis (or possibly as supplement) for section of fourth interim report to co-Chairmen on implementation of 14(d). You will appreciate that preliminary drafting of Freedoms Committee report, which may be virtually a Commission "White Paper" on this subject, rests mainly in Indian hands, though we shall do what we can both in Committee and in discussions with Desai to see that it reflects our views as much as possible. Too early to say whether such report should be submitted to co-Chairmen either by itself or part of fourth interim report, since this obviously will depend on our appreciation of its contents. Our impression is that Desai will certainly oppose any attempt to give 14(d) special emphasis, or to produce material which will publicly castigate Democratic Republic without proposing positive solutions.

2. So far as 14(d) section of fourth interim report is concerned, we shall be governed by present instructions, and while aiming at strong Freedoms Committee report, shall register if necessary minority opinion on general lines Canadian July 16th statement.

3. Fourth interim report which will cover period up to August 10 besides dealing with regular areas of work of Commission, will probably spell out in detail the specific tasks joining under agreement, and a requiring co-operation from South Vietnam Government. There will be a section on 14(c) possibly more detailed than hitherto. The difficulties and delays met by mobile teams operating in south, particularly teams 24 and 61, which have had to be withdrawn, will be indicated, and so brought directly to attention of co-Chairman. We think it unlikely that Desai will press for reference to co-Chairmen under third paragraph of Article 43 in connection with hindrances to the investigations in south. We have hitherto opposed such action in Commission on ground that the article has never been invoked previously, despite obstructions and hindrances in operation of teams in north, (although these are difficult to prove than recent cases of non-cooperation in the south). Desai now appears to have dropped idea of a reference under 43 principally on ground that present need is not to drive parties further apart but to bring them close together.

4. Apart from our interest in 14(d) therefore principal point in next report to co-Chairmen is likely to be position of Commission and its teams in south, and responsibilities of South Vietnam Government, since unless these matters are clarified, Commission will become impotent. We feel we should go a good way with Chairman on this. The regrettable situation facing Commission in south, which shows little or no sign of improving beyond that reported in paragraph 6 of our telegram No. 406 of August 6,† suggests matter deserving your consideration. As you know from our telegram No. 381 of July 27,† we have been guided in respect of Saigon demonstrations by your telegram No. 329 of July 23. We agree with the implication in your telegram that it would be unrealistic for Commission at this stage to press Government of South Vietnam for explicit guarantees under Geneva Agreement, to which it has not adhered.

5. On the other hand, it is clear that Article 27 gave expression to shared appreciation of fact that a successor authority would be called on to assume responsibilities of one of the parties. In addition, Article 14(a) is frequently invoked by Chairmen, and cannot be ignored. Leaving entirely to one side question of final declaration, pre-election consultations and elections themselves, the plain fact is that if south does not assume responsibilities it is doubtful whether Commission on agreement can continue to work effectively. Having in mind known southern view of agreement, your views would be welcomed regarding steps which might be taken vis-à-vis South Vietnam Government, perhaps by co-Chairmen, to take over in practice necessary responsibilities under cease-fire agreement from French.

6. In private discussion August 6 Desai said his personal view was that question of declaration and of election talks was one thing and South Vietnam might well take its time. But continuance Commission's work and obligations under cease-fire agreement would depend on assumption of responsibilities by South Vietnam. Otherwise we should be wasting our time, and a dangerous situation which north would not tolerate for long would develop.

7. He did not specifically mention Article 27 but I understand that his view is that legal successor obligations is matter between French High Command and South Vietnam Government. Nevertheless, he feels that Commission must draw present unsatisfactory situation to attention of co-Chairmen and request efforts for clear acceptance by South Vietnam Government if need for adequate security and continued facilities for Commission and its teams to permit carrying out remaining tasks under cease-fire agreement.

8. There is the possibility that Pole may seek to include a reference to Pham Van Dong's letters re electoral consultations,<sup>33</sup> but we assume we should resist this in next report on grounds that matter is one for direct negotiation of parties and it is not specific concern of Commission.

On July 19, 1955, Hanoi sent letters to Bao Dai and Ngo Dinh Diem, urging South Vietnam to begin the electoral consultations provided for in the Geneva Agreements. The South Vietnam government reiterated its opposition to holding Vietnam-wide elections in a declaration broadcast on August 9. See Cameron, Viet-Nam Crisis, pp. 383-384 and 388-390.

DIEM'S DECLARATION OF AUGUST 10TH [9TH]

French news bulletin published Hanoi August 11th is devoted principally to round-up, on basis AFP reports, of reaction in various capitals to South Vietnamese Government's declaration of August 10th [9th] on elections. Item reporting on Ottawa comment headed "déception et inquiétude à Ottawa" in my immediately following message. †

2. The same edition of the news bulletin contains summary of written reply given by Ho Chi Minh to AFP correspondent. While reply was evidently prepared before response, if it can be called a response, of August 10th, it is nevertheless an interesting official statement of DR line. This text reads as follows, our own translation "The President made it clear that the Government of DRVN will take all necessary measures and will grant all the indispensable guarantees so that the general elections may be truly free, beginning with the application of democratic freedoms, e.g. freedom of propaganda, of organization and of meeting, freedom of the press, of movement, of speech, etc." In addition, Ho Chi Minh referred to possibility of diminution of international tension, with favourable implications for fate of Vietnam, as result of Geneva conference and current Sino-American discussions at Geneva.

3. Definitive reaction of DR to South Vietnam declaration not yet available. In our own view, Diem's statement is utterly negative and will not only be difficult to explain to world opinion, but may also encourage north to believe that only remaining solution must (groups corrupt) subversion. In present conditions in South it is doubtful that Diem's Government could withstand a concerted and determined campaign of subversion, and equally doubtful that patience of North will prove inexhaustible.

4. Much depends on advice given Diem in coming weeks by United States, United Kingdom, and France. While our own position in Commission, and our view that matter of electoral consultations is one for the sides, would clearly preclude any formal approach, it may be that following arrival of new Commissioner you consider that our influence in Saigon, which is considerable, could be exercised informally to make it clear that a wholly negative policy with respect to the remaining tasks of the Commission and also with respect to electoral consultations must lead to serious difficulties for the South. The Indians do not hesitate to make their own views known to Diem whenever possible, and we can see no reason why we should not also point out to South Vietnamese authorities what we consider to be the likely consequences of a continued negative attitude on their part.

[Ottawa], August 12, 1955

VIETNAM — OBSTRUCTION OF THE INTERNATIONAL COMMISSION IN THE SOUTH

You will have observed from telegram 418 of August 8† from Hanoi (copy attached) that the Indian and Polish members of the Commission are pressing hard for Commission action in protest against the obstruction of two of the Commission's teams in South Vietnam which for some months have been unable to complete their tasks because the local authorities cannot guarantee their security in carrying them out. Failing an early improvement in the situation, it is probable that the Poles and Indians may insist upon reference to the Co-Chairmen under Article 43 of the Cease-Fire Agreement, part of which states:

"The International Commission shall inform the members of the Conference in all cases where its activity is being hindered."

2. Since in all cases where the activities of the Commission in North Vietnam have been hindered we have taken a very strong line, we cannot in this instance refuse to go along with the Indians and Poles in a protest against this long-standing case of obstruction to the Commission's work.<sup>34</sup>

3. The transfer of sovereignty in Vietnam from France to the State of Vietnam has now reached a point where the French are unable any longer to discharge all their responsibilities under the Cease-Fire Agreement without interfering in Vietnamese sovereignty. If the State of Vietnam is unwilling to assume its responsibilities a complete collapse of the Agreement cannot long be forestalled. In view of the seriousness of this situation, I believe we should take advantage of Mr. Johnson's arrival in Saigon to impress upon the South Vietnamese the dangers of the situation which is developing. If you agree with this, I would also propose that we bring the situation to the attention of the United Kingdom and French Governments through our missions in London and Paris, and of the State Department when Mr. Holmes pays his visit next week.

4. The recording of our views on this subject with the South Vietnamese may be particularly helpful at this time since Mr. Johnson learned during his visit to Paris that on August 17 a strong ministerial delegation from Vietnam will arrive in Paris to discuss military and other matters with the French authorities. In these negotiations the French will seek to have the Vietnamese Government take over those responsibilities of the French High Command under the Geneva Agreement which the French are unable to fulfil without infringing Vietnamese sovereignty.

5. Attached for your approval, if you concur, is a telegram to Hanoi along the lines suggested above. This will be repeated to New Delhi where Mr. Johnson will be from August 14 to August 18.

DELAYS IMPOSED ON TEAMS IN SOUTH VIETNAM AND RESPONSIBILITIES OF SOUTH VIETNAM GOVERNMENT UNDER THE CEASE FIRE AGREEMENT

I do not believe that we can or possibly that we should try to oppose with much vigour the reference of this matter to the co-Chairmen in the next Commission report, though I would not agree that this reference should be in any stronger terms than that which was made to freedom of movement difficulties in the North. In the circumstances I believe that informing the French in advance of the possibility of some such reference may help them in the discussions they will be having with the Vietnamese in Paris in mid-August, when the question of South Vietnamese responsibilities under the cease fire agreement will be discussed. I agree with the efforts you have made to avoid the Commission's referring in the proposed letter to the French directly to Article 43, and when the draft letter is considered by the Commission you should, if necessary, maintain your objection to the employment of the wording quoted from Article 43. You might say that use of the phraseology quoted from Article 43 goes further than the Commission has previously gone in cases of obstruction and might carry certain implications of bad faith on the part of the French, which would be undesirable since the object is of course to get results rather than to cause ill feeling. You should make clear that your opposition to the proposed wording of the letter is not concerned with trying to shield the French or the South Vietnamese from clearly justified criticism.

2. On the broader question of South Vietnam's failure to assume properly its responsibilities under the cease fire agreement as the successor power to France, I think we might take advantage of Mr. Johnson's arrival in Saigon to make clear our apprehensions on this subject to the South Vietnamese. Mr. Johnson might speak to Mr. Diem when he calls on him along the following lines:

Begins:

Canada assumed responsibilities on the International Commission in the hope of making a constructive contribution to the maintenance of peace in Vietnam and throughout Southeast Asia. The task is a considerable burden to us, but one we have been willing to assume and to carry out so long as we believe we are doing a useful and constructive job. We believe that up to the present time the International Commission has done useful work, particularly in ensuring that the military provisions of the cease fire agreement were carried out without any renewal of the fighting.

We also take some satisfaction from the contribution — even though it was severely limited — which the Commission was able to make towards the movement of refugees, since we are convinced that without the Commission's intervention many fewer refugees would have reached South Vietnam than was actually the case. We believe that the Commission still may be able to perform useful work (even though it may now be of a more routine nature than previously) and that its activities and the maintenance of the structure of the cease fire settlement is some insurance that the Viet Minh will not renew hostilities.

Recent developments concerning the security of the Commission and its teams in South Vietnam have become the source of grave concern to the Canadian Government. The occasion of this concern has not only been the events of July 20 in Saigon, but also the inability of some of the Commission's teams to perform tasks assigned to them because their security cannot be guaranteed. Clearly the Commission cannot continue to carry on indefinitely if it is unable to carry out its functions. Withdrawal of the Commission as a consequence of its being unable to perform its functions would, of course, upset the whole cease fire settlement, and could result in the Democratic Republic's ceasing to regard itself as being bound by the terms of the cease fire agreement. Such a situation would produce a more serious threat to peace in Vietnam than any other development since the cease fire agreement was signed. As this situation would undoubtedly create new threats to the security of the State of Vietnam and its future peaceful development, we feel sure that the Government of the State of Vietnam will give careful consideration to this situation, which becomes more and more difficult as time progresses. Ends.<sup>35</sup>

3. Mr. Johnson should not, I believe, relate his remarks in any way to the elections question, for which we do not regard the present Commission as having any special responsibility, but solely to the cease fire agreement for the supervision of which the Commission is responsible. The cease fire agreement is the real basis for the settlement in Vietnam, and we would naturally regard its collapse much more seriously than the failure to implement the terms of the final declaration. It would also be desirable for him not to acquiesce in any drawing of distinctions by the Vietnamese on this issue between ourselves on the one hand and the Indians and Poles on the other, since in the matter of the ability of the Commission to carry out its functions either in the north or the south we must line up with our colleagues on the Commission.

5. Mr. Johnson might make his statement to Mr. Diem on the occasion of his initial call (if more than the amenities are observed) or on another occasion soon afterwards, if it seems desirable to keep the initial call purely one of courtesy. He should make it clear, however, that he is speaking on instructions.

6. We intend shortly to bring this situation and its implications to the attention of the British, French and Americans.

SOUTH VIETNAMESE ATTITUDE TOWARDS ELECTORAL CONSULTATIONS

We hope that our telegram No. 369 of August 15 which was sent before your 426 received, meets your suggestion with respect to making our views known to the South Vietnamese concerning their attitude to the Commission with respect to its remaining tasks.

2. We are rather doubtful about the wisdom at this particular stage of using our influence with the South Vietnamese in the hope of persuading them to take a more forthcoming attitude towards electoral consultations. We have in other contexts held very firmly to the idea that the present Commission has no special responsibilities with respect to the elections or the pre-electoral consultations, and we would not wish the arrival of the new Canadian Commissioner and the expression of views on these matters to lead the South Vietnamese or anyone else to think that at this point we are prepared to embark on a new policy of closer interest and concern in electoral matters than we have hitherto shown. We recognize that the subject of elections may very well come up in conversations which Mr. Johnson has with Prime Minister Diem and other members of the South Vietnamese Government. If so the line should be that we believe that the provisions of the Final Declaration should be carried out, but beyond that there should be no need to elaborate. If pressed for an expression of views on the statements made by Prime Minister Diem, Mr. Johnson should not conceal the fact that we were disappointed in the terms of these replies in the sense that they did not hold out much prospect for the holding of inter-zonal consultations in the near future. We believe, however, that it would be preferable for him not to enter into any detailed discussions with the Vietnamese of their attitude on this subject at this particular time.

3. As indicated in our telegram No. 369, we believe that the question of the Commission's ability to carry out its functions in the South is a more immediately serious issue than the failure of the South Vietnamese to enter into pre-electoral consultations, and that we should for the present use our influence with the South Vietnamese to adopt a somewhat more forthcoming attitude towards the Commission and to accept for practical purposes and tacitly if not publicly the status quo of the armistice settlement. If a crisis concerning the attitude of the Diem Government to the Commission and to the cease fire settlement can be avoided for a few months, it may be possible after the immediate effects of Diem's statements on elections have worn off for the governments principally concerned to make some progress towards persuading Diem to engage in some form of inter-zonal consultations on elections. Meanwhile it is in our view essential that the armistice settlement as laid down in the cease fire agreement be respected and maintained by the South Vietnamese, and you may take advantage of the opportunity afforded by unofficial contacts to persuade them to accept this point of view and act accordingly. The adoption of this attitude by the South Vietnamese need not in our view involve their public acceptance of all the terms of the Final Declaration at this time. In view of the conspicuous lack of success which the United Kingdom, the United States and France have had in persuading Diem to go some way towards complying with the provisions of the Final Declaration concerning electoral consultations, we do not think it would be wise for us to enter that field at the present time.

FREEDOMS COMMITTEE REPORT ON 14(D)

Initial draft of report, running to 57 short double-spaced pages and expected to cover a number of appendices containing statistical material, has been prepared by Indian Chairman Freedoms Committee and is under active discussion in Committees.

2. Draft deals verbatim with following phases:

First. From the cease-fire to the 31 October, '1954' — initial phase.

Second. From the 1st November, 1954, to 1st February 1955 — period of concentration, incidents and mass evacuation.

Third. From 1st February to 18th May, 1955 — period of recommendations and surveys.

Fourth. From 18th May to 20th July, 1955 — extension period.

Draft also discusses what further action might be taken after July 20th.

3. Original draft presented limited but relatively honest account of work under 14(d) up to May 18th. Unfortunately its early blunt references to Democratic Republic shortcomings are softened towards the end of third phase by overemphasis and a conclusion which read in original. "The general surveys conducted by mobile teams 54, 55, 56 and 73 revealed that local authorities had, in general, brought into force the procedure recommended by the Commission on the 1st February, 1955. The vast majority of people who desired to move south had, in fact, (received?) permits and had proceeded. The reports of the teams mentioned a number of residual problems which existed and on these problems and specific cases the Commission issued to the Liaison Mission specific recommendations which continued to be followed up even after the 18th May".

4. Fourth phase minimizes existence of general problem at time extension was agreed and fails to bring out mitigating reasons for south's failure to implement suggestions in practice during period. It also tends to emphasize size of problem in south as opposed to improvement to point almost of perfection in north. This is exactly danger foreseen in paragraph 2 of your telegram under reference.

5. The final section of the report, dealing with period after July 20th, admits need for Commission to continue to be concerned with "residual cases" such as:

- (a) Persons with permits but unable to move.
- (b) Persons who have applied for permits before July 20th.
- (c) Persons covered by petitions not fully processed.
- (d) Common-law prisoners subject to further examination of their position.
- (e) Persons in forced residence.
- (f) Persons unable to go because of private debts and taxes.
- (g) Land-owners in north.
- (h) Priests and nuns refused permits on grounds that their religious superiors have not given permission.

Section, however, notes that neither party has requested extension and takes position that no one who had not applied before July 20th is concern of Commission. It whitewashes performance of Democratic Republic on grounds of general improvement in later stages, but is severely critical of south during extended period and states "trouble in the south has not yet been completely cleared". It concludes with view that problem has been "adequately tackled by the Commission and in general those who wished to go to their zone of choice have been able to do so".

6. Needless to say, most of this report was immediately unacceptable to us. We have, therefore, submitted a number of substantial amendments to the first three phases in order to remove inaccuracies and as far as possible speculative comment and opinion and to hew closely to established record of Commission. These include quotations from third interim report and separate Canadian note. It is too early yet to say how far our amendments will be accepted, though we think that we have the Indian on our side for the most part. Our hope is to reach unanimous agreement on a strong factual historical account of the phases up to May 18th but we have not lost sight of the possibility that we may have to submit our own report even for these early chapters. We are of course addressing ourselves to the task of rewriting the quotation in paragraph 3 above to remove the unacceptable implication that most people in north have been given permits and to make it reveal unsatisfactory situation obtaining on May 18th.

7. With regard to fourth phase, we shall of course work on inclusion of (group corrupt) which present southern attitude in more favourable and accurate light, as revealed by the record. We anticipate some difficulty in maintaining a proper perspective with regard to lack of co-operation from southern authorities.

8. Our main problem, however, will be with respect to the period after July 20th, and it seems quite likely that we will have to submit a minority report on this section at least, whether or not we can agree on the earlier chapters. We intend to emphasize that problem in south, which has never (reached?) proportion of a serious problem, arose only near the end of May 18th and the real difficulty has been with respect to extended period, i.e. after expiry of Article 14(d), the arrangements for which were not accepted by the south because agreement on its proposed conditions could not be reached in joint Commission. We intend also to have the report speak out as strongly as possible on shortcomings of Democratic Republic, continuing even into extended period, although we will have to recognize the gradual if grudging improvement in its performance.

9. With reference to your instructions, on which our statement of July 27th was based, we think it would be difficult to press for an extension after July 20th of the same kind as applied between May 18th and that date. As you know, neither French nor South Vietnamese have asked for an extension and both are concerned about misuse of freedom of movement to infiltrate Communists in south. We are sending by bag text of letter, addressed by Colonel Nam to French Liaison Mission, which makes general charges that there is evidence of 80,000 people left in north who have not been able to exercise their right of option, but which do not, repeat not, request any extension. This letter has not been forwarded to Commission by French Liaison Mission, so we are not seized of its contents. We understand, however, from our Saigon representative that at this stage there is no intention on part of South Vietnamese authorities to request further extension and that real purpose of this communication is to request Commission to clear up cases of people who applied before May 18th.

10. After careful consideration we think it would be unrealistic to insist on immediate general surveys in north, not only because if accepted, which seems doubtful, south would be embarrassed with reciprocal action in its zone, but more importantly because we frankly do not have enough evidence to justify such surveys. They would in any event not be likely to find any problem at this late stage. We think, however, that we should endorse the view that (group corrupt) Commission must carry out the kind of action with respect to residual problems envisaged in initial draft and press for a blanket statement that Commission has continuing interest in whatever freedom of movement cases might come to its attention along the lines of the precedent for continuing action established in respect of Article 21, and (1) Commission reserves its right to investigate complaints through mobile team investigations.

11. We cannot long avoid entering detailed discussion of what is to be done after July 20th. Your comments on above appreciated, particularly your instructions re action for which we should press for period after July 20th. In this last regard, we would hope that the instructions contained in your telegram No. 228 of July 23rd might be interpreted in light of our views in last preceding paragraphs.

12. Earliest possible reply requested.

FREEDOM OF MOVEMENT

At the present stage of this question there would appear to be two points to be borne in mind:

(a) that there is now virtually no possibility of achieving any practical benefits for the real consumers — residents of the north who still wish to leave; and

(b) that this is the last chance we will have to say our piece on this subject in the Commission, and we should not, therefore, spare the ammunition.

2. On the Freedoms Committee report (which we presume will form the basis, if not actually the text, of the report to the co-Chairmen) you should spare no effort to ensure that it contains a proper and fair representation of the real history of 14(d). In pressing for amendments you can now afford to take a pretty uncompromising position, since the advantage of securing Indian support and thereby overcoming Polish objections is no longer of much relevance in the context of the freedom of movement question. We would hope, of course, that the report could be largely recast in the Canadian image of what has happened in connection with 14(d), and you should certainly endeavour to get agreement to as many of your amendments as possible. On this occasion, however, there should be no hesitation about insisting on a minority appendix giving the Canadian interpretation of events which are in your view inadequately dealt with in the Indian-Polish text. On this you should be quite adamant. The first two interim reports of the Vietnam Commission, with their studious attempts to maintain a balance in the allocation of blame and criticism, were in our view very misleading documents. The main virtue of the third report was not so much its contents as the fact that the Canadian Commissioner added a minority note. This fact (in spite of the lack of substance in the note itself) went a long way towards establishing our position on the freedom of movement question both publicly and internationally. We would therefore be quite happy to see this device employed again. If more substance can be put into it, so much the better.

3. In our view the importance of the report to the co-Chairmen containing the Commission's final assessment of the implementation of the freedom of movement provision cannot be overemphasized. This is not just a matter of setting up propaganda scoring points for the Diem Government. As matters stand now the prospects for the implementation of the political settlement envisaged in the Final Declaration are very poor indeed. That Diem, from the international point of view, seems to be taking an unnecessarily intransigent attitude towards participation in the pre-electoral consultations should not obscure the fact that the atmosphere which now exists is quite inimical to useful discussions about elections, let alone the actual holding of them. Sooner or later the Geneva Conference powers will have to take cognizance of the impossibility of carrying out the policies with respect to a political settlement in Vietnam laid down in the final declaration. They may have to reconvene to endeavour to work out some more realistic programme for the future of Vietnam. In these circumstances it is vital that the Geneva Conference Powers should be fully seized of the reasons for the failure of the political programme mapped out at Geneva a year ago. We would not suggest that unsatisfactory performance by the DR on Article 14(d) is the sole contributing factor in producing an atmosphere in which progress towards a political settlement became impossible, but we certainly believe that it must be given its due weight. In any second look which the Geneva Conference Powers take at the programme for a political settlement in Vietnam, considerable importance will undoubtedly be attached to the reports of the International Commission. It is, therefore, essential that we ensure that the next report, which will cover the conclusion of the first phase of the Vietnam settlement, should present a fair and accurate picture and bring out clearly the fact that in its performance on 14(d) the DR has not only failed to remove the feelings of suspicion and distrust which were a natural legacy of the war but has contributed materially to their perpetuation and intensification.

4. You should, therefore, concentrate your efforts on ensuring that the report contains as much material as possible which will show that the existence of fears and rumours in North Vietnam has been largely responsible for the unsatisfactory implementation of 14(d) in North Vietnam and that the atmosphere of suspicion and distrust (caused by evident efforts in the north to prevent people from leaving) has prevented people from trying to take advantage of their rights under 14(d) and has hence rendered the proper implementation of that article impossible. We see no reason why much of the material contained in Appendix I of your despatch No. 395 of July 25† should not be used in the report or in a minority Canadian appendix if agreement to its employment in the main body is not attainable. We believe that the report should also bring out clearly the obstruction to international inspection which has to a considerable extent rendered nugatory efforts of the International Commission to assist in ensuring that Article 14(d) is properly carried out.

5. We are pleased to note that you will endeavour to have the references to the lack of co-operation from the south during the extension period put in their proper perspective. Certainly we should not attempt to shield the south from justifiable criticism; but it should not be forgotten that non-cooperation in the south came after — and was probably due partly to — months of obstruction and grudging cooperation in the north.

6. Any minority Canadian appendix to the report to the co-Chairmen should, of course, be as factual as possible and a polemical tone would be quite undesirable. If the Indians should tax you privately or in the Commission for trying to produce a report which will render cooperation between north and south on electoral matters more difficult, you might point out that in our view the Commission has a duty to present a true picture of Article 14(d) to the co-Chairmen and that we cannot in fairness to the Geneva Conference Powers or ourselves compromise on our interpretation of the facts as we see them. Any attempt to gloss over the poor record on 14(d) in the north or the south would be misleading and hence a disservice to those to whom the Commission is responsible.

7. We are not in a position to rescind the instructions contained in the Minister's telegram No. 328 of July 23, as he is not in Ottawa and will not be back for another week. We recognize, however, that it might prejudice your ability to secure Indian support on other issues if in this case you continue to demand that the Commission take measures which you — and the Indians — believe to be unrealistic. Possibly your proposals for a further extension and for general surveys by mobile teams which you made to the Commission on July 27 might be maintained in principle without pressing for a Commission decision.

8. With regard to an extension, you might reiterate as the Canadian view your statement on July 16 that it is the Commission's duty by whatever means might appear appropriate after July 20 to see that the provisions of 14(d) are implemented to the satisfaction not only of the parties but of the Commission itself and of the real "consumers"; that since 14(d) has not been satisfactorily implemented in the time provided, logic suggests that more time is an essential condition to any further measures for achieving implementation of that article; and that while the unsatisfactory handling of the first extension by both parties suggests that a further extension might not produce useful results, is it not the duty of the Commission to explore every avenue with the parties which might lead to the proper implementation of the terms of the cease fire agreement?

9. With respect to the general surveys by mobile teams, you might recall your proposal of July 27, in which the conduct of general surveys by mobile teams was put forward as a means of rounding out the assessment of 14(d) by the Freedoms Committee; acknowledge the difficulties which are involved in arranging these general surveys; mention the advantages to be gained in reaching a proper assessment of the situation with respect to freedom of movement by means of surveys conducted under conditions which would permit free access of people to the teams and would enable the teams to carry out fair and adequate samplings of the wishes of the population without hindrance, delays or obstructions; and ask whether it is not remiss on the part of the Commission not to ask for a clearly desirable general survey of this kind merely because in the past it has sometimes been difficult for mobile teams to carry out investigations under these conditions.

10. You should, of course, support the view that the Commission must continue to concern itself with residual cases and we agree that a blanket statement of the kind you mention in your paragraph 10 would be desirable, particularly if it establishes the point that the Commission will investigate specific complaints through mobile team investigations.

11. We leave it to you to determine the most suitable opportunity for putting in our last pro forma bid for an extension and a further mobile team general survey along the lines suggested above. At this stage the proposal for a special report to the co-Chairmen on freedom of movement is no longer one which you need press. The question of a press release might suitably be left open until the report to the co-Chairmen is in its final draft.

PROPOSED INDIAN APPROACH TO CO-CHAIRMEN

Following Commission meeting September 9, Mr. Desai raised with Polish alternate and myself, proposed Indian action to approach co-chairmen concerning situation facing Commission in Vietnam, with particular reference to position of Government of State of Vietnam that it is not bound by Geneva Agreement. Mr. Desai called separately on me and my Polish colleague today to provide further clarification. Position appears to be as follows.

1. The Government of India has already sent an informal communication to the co-chairmen through Indian High Commissioner in London and Indian Ambassador Moscow stressing need for urgent review of position in Vietnam as a result of position taken up by President Diem. Indian Government has also suggested that problems of Laos could also be discussed at meeting of co-chairmen. Main reason for making this informal approach, it was explained, was the increasing difficulties in the working of the Vietnam Commission and likelihood of an early meeting between Molotov and MacMillan in New York during forthcoming United Nations General Assembly. This informal approach had been made by the Government of India but not, repeat not, as chairman country or on behalf of Commission. The Government of India has suggested that Canadian and Polish Governments may make similar approaches if they consider it desirable.

2. I understand from Mr. Desai that Mr. Nehru has already brought this informal approach to your attention.

3. The further important point is that the Indian Government now proposes to make a formal approach to co-chairmen (preferably not later than end of this month,) but would first wish to know whether Canadian and Polish delegations would like Government of India to make this later formal approach itself, or would prefer that the approach be made by Commission through Government of India as the chairman country, or whether either of the governments of the supervisory countries of Canada and Poland would like to be associated with the formal approach by the Government of India, if approach by Commission should be delayed unduly. Suggestions as to line of approach would be welcomed.

4. The general points, in the view of the Indian Government, which should be included in such a formal approach, are the following

(a) Commission owes its origin to Geneva Agreement. Mr. Diem is opposed to Geneva Agreement. Hence future of Commission's working is matter of serious concern.

(b) Neither Commission nor any of the supervisory countries can make new agreement with any party or alter the Geneva Agreement or accept repudiation and, therefore, Commission must necessarily make a reference to co-chairmen to deal with the problem that has arisen.

(c) Commission can continue if Geneva Agreement and final declaration implemented by the parties.

(d) Strain and difficulties in Commission's work. Commission continues despite this but the impasse has to be resolved as Commission cannot continue working under this strain.

(e) Meeting of co-chairmen in September or October in New York. Supervisory countries in Commission being also asked to give their views.

5. I informed Mr. Desai that it would be necessary to consult you before giving him any indication of our views in view of the importance of a formal approach of this kind, and that I hoped to be able to let him know before end of this week our views with respect to

(a) procedure, and

(b) assuming that it was decided either that we should participate in a common approach or make a parallel but separate approach, what the substance of such a communication should be. I pointed out, for example, that with respect to point (c) in paragraph 4 above our view was that the cease-fire agreement and the final declaration were separate matters. He did not disagree with this, but said it was up to co-chairmen and Geneva powers if present timetable envisaged in final declaration was not to be followed, to propose a specific alteration of this timetable. In any event, the Government of India was convinced Commission could not function without formal acceptance of successor responsibilities by Government of the State of Vietnam.

6. You will no doubt wish to consider this matter most carefully, and in light not only of this message, but also of my separate but related message dealing with draft of fourth interim report now before us. I shall be glad to transmit your views to Mr. Desai at the earliest opportunity.

DRAFT FOURTH INTERIM REPORT

Chairman last night September 9 circulated draft fourth interim report advance notice of which we had received only day before. Draft runs to 35 pages double spaced and covers period from April 11 to August 10 under following main chapter headings:

- (1) Establishment and machinery of Vietnam Commission;
- (2) Cease fire provisional demarcation line and demilitarized zone;
- (3) Regroupment plan (Haiphong and central Vietnam arrangements);
- (4) Prisoners of war and civilian internees;
- (5) Articles 14(c) and 14(d) (the latter covered at greater length than previously in 13 brief paragraphs);
- (6) Introduction of military personnel and war materials;
- (7) Future tasks;
- (8) Cooperation of parties to agreement problems of the future (the latter section including two main paragraphs sanction for the working of the Vietnam Commission and duration of the Commission).

In addition the draft contains the following six detailed appendices:

- (1) Implementation of provisions of Geneva Agreement and articles.
- (2) Claims of parties concerning prisoners of war.
- (3) Statistical details regarding complaints and investigations under Article 14(c).
- (4) Not received (statistical details on Article 14(d) up to July 20).
- (5) Catalogue of team investigations indicating obstructions and delays.
- (6) List of cases in which action under Article 22 recommended.

2. Draft follows format and style of earlier reports to co-chairmen and reflects same determination of Indians to balance shortcomings under Article 14(d) against those under Article 14(c) to take same line in respect of Articles 16 and 17 and under Article 21 to equate prisoners of wars in the north with civilian internees in the south. Main differences from earlier reports are:

- (1) Draft suggests that northern intransigence regarding implementation of Article 14(d) gradually overcome while "independent attitude of Government of South Vietnam which controlled civil administration and which had not signed Geneva Agreement" both in respect of extended arrangements on freedom of movement and of other articles "has made obstructions and difficulties progressively more serious." As an illustration of the tendency in the draft to point the finger at the Government of the State of Vietnam attention might be drawn to the conclusion of the section on freedom of movement which states "these residual problems of freedom of movement will be followed up by the Commission but in view of the definite stand taken by the Government of the State of Vietnam against the Geneva Agreement and the strained relations between parties there was no chance of securing extended facilities for freedom of movement to those who may have failed to exercise their choice before July 20."

(2) In chapter dealing with cooperation of the parties the effort is made to report cases of delay and obstruction both in the north and in the south. Reference to delays and obstruction to teams 24 and 61 is brief and not too specific confining itself to statement that these teams had to be withdrawn by the Commission "as the civilian and military authorities of the areas declined to make necessary security arrangements and FUF High Command was not able to alter the situation, Commission activities were being actually hindered in these cases".

(3) The main point about this draft report lies in its continued emphasis on the fact that the Government of the State of Vietnam has taken up attitude that they have not signed Geneva Agreement and are not therefore bound by it. My immediately following telegram contains the text of the draft final paragraphs which deal with the "sanction for the working of the Vietnam Commission" and "duration of the Commission". I think you should have the full text of these two sections because of their political importance.

3. You will note that in blunter and plainer language than that used in earlier reports conclusion is reached that Commission "cannot continue to function with any effectiveness unless difficulties are resolved satisfactorily by the co-chairmen and Geneva powers at a very early date". Difficulties are considered to be:

Because of political developments in the south, in June and July, French cannot carry out responsibilities under Article 25, south although apparently willing to protect and cooperate will not make formal declaration to that effect, programme of political settlement cannot be carried out in view of opposition of southern government. In light of all this, draft envisages that co-chairmen are required "to resolve the uncertainty regarding (1) sanction for working of Commission" (i.e.) whether Geneva Agreement to be respected by southern government and (2) the probable duration of its activities.

4. The two main problems of concern to us on the first reading of this draft are (a) our position with respect to freedom of movement (b) the evident intention in the draft to take a very firm line with the government of the south and to spell out in unmistakable (and eventually public) terms the problem facing the Commission as a result of the attitude of the Diem administration.

5. On the first point we suspect that Indian intentions may be to substitute consideration of fourth interim report for completion of freedoms committee report on Article 14(d) in respect of which our strong stand has been made known. I have emphasized in Commission that we still consider that special report on freedom of movement should be made at once to co-chairmen and that such a report and fourth interim report should be drafted in light of the freedoms committee's report on freedom of movement which I have recommended should be completed as priority task. Desai today agreed that freedoms committee report should be completed by September 14 and submitted to Commission by that date even though parts of it are not agreed. However, I am not at all hopeful that Commission will agree finally to do other than discuss freedom of movement within context of fourth interim report. In any event we shall be guided in respect of this matter by the instructions contained in your telegram 387 of August 31 and the least that we should obtain will be a strong and detailed statement of the Canadian position as a minority appendix to the fourth interim report.

7. With respect to the draft's evident intention to be harsh with southern government and to highlight Commission difficulties we shall of course spare no effort to put the developments in the south in their proper perspective and to emphasize shortcomings in the north under Article 14(d) and otherwise and their probable effect on the course of events in the south. On the more general and perhaps overriding question of the Commission's present position in the face of the official attitude of the Government of the State of Vietnam the draft has clearly been prepared and submitted at this time by the chairman in full knowledge of the initiative recently taken by the Indians, as reported in my telegram 487 of September 10, including the further formal approach the Indians wish to make to the co-chairmen. The Indian delegation is obviously seeking to concert the line to be followed in the report with the position which it has already taken up in its approach to the co-chairman and the later formal approach which is planned although the fourth interim report is perhaps couched in more general terms. One suspects that this is not only the swan song of Mr. Desai, expected to leave the Commission in October, but if present impasse continues it may conceivably be the swan song of the Commission itself.

8. It follows, therefore, that your views in reply to my telegram 487 of September 10 will have to be related closely to the line which we take with reference to these important political sections of the fourth interim report and for this reason your specific comments particularly on the final paragraphs which deal with the responsibilities of the Government of the State of Vietnam and Commission's future role at the earliest date will be appreciated. Discussion draft report begins September 13.

DRAFT FOURTH INTERIM REPORT

Following is text of the concluding political paragraphs in the draft fourth interim report which deal with problems of the future sanction for working of Vietnam Commission and duration of Commission. Begins:

Problems of the Future

44. Apart from delays and obstructions due to the intransigence or truculence of the local authorities, the political developments during June and July 1955 and the Commission's experience regarding the working of its investigation teams and the delay in implementing its recommendations have made it clear that the French High Command cannot carry out its obligation under Article 25 in the zone south of the provisional demarcation line in the face of the categorical attitude adopted by the state of Vietnam, that they have not signed the Geneva Agreement, that they are not, therefore, bound by its provisions and are opposed both to the Agreement and the final declaration. Apart from the demonstrations against the Geneva Agreement on 20 July, 1955, which degenerated into violence against the inmates of the two hotels, Majestic and Gallieni, where Commission's personnel were staying, on which a special report was sent to the co-Chairmen, the political attitude of the state of Vietnam to the Geneva accords and its effects on the work of this Commission and the implementation of the Vietnam agreement require very early consideration by the co-Chairmen to resolve the uncertainty regarding

- (i) Sanction for the (group corrupt) working of the Commission and
- (ii) The probable duration of its activities.

Sanction for the Working of the Commission in Vietnam

(i) As civil and military administration in the zone south of the provisional demarcation line is in the hands of the Government of the State of Vietnam, which has not signed and is, according to its repeated public declarations, opposed to both the Geneva Agreement and the final declaration, further continuance of the Commission's activities and the effective discharge of its responsibilities are in serious jeopardy as the Commission, established under Article 44 of the Agreement can only draw its authority from the Agreement itself and has no other sanction. We would like to add in this connection that during our discussion with the Government of the State of Vietnam, we have been told that it will give full protection and practical co-operation to the Commission as an International Peace Commission but will not make a formal or public declaration to that effect and that its opposition to the Geneva Agreement and the final declaration will continue. It is obvious that the International Commission which has, in the discharge of its responsibilities under the agreement, to undertake various tasks which, in effect, result in the curtailment of the sovereignty of both administrations in the north and in the south, cannot carry on its activities in the face of the declared opposition of the Government of the State of Vietnam to the Geneva Agreement merely on the basis of a personal or practical understanding which can be revoked at any time.

Duration of the Commission

(ii) In any case, an ad hoc arrangement outside the Agreement, however effective, naturally amounts to revocation of the Agreement and the Commission cannot be a party to any such arrangement. Another point arising out of the political developments is the uncertainty regarding the duration of the Commission's activities. Article 14(a) of the Agreement which specifies political and administrative measures in the two regrouping zones on either side of the provisional military demarcation line refers to the conduct of civil administration in each regrouping zone "pending the general elections which will bring about the unification of Vietnam". The various tasks with which the Commission is entrusted under the Agreement have to be carried on as long as these provisional arrangements for civil administration, north and south of the provisional demarcation line, continue. The Commission winds up its activities only after political problems arising out of the regrouping south and north of the provisional demarcation line, are settled. The programme for the settlement of political problems is outlined in the final declaration of the Geneva powers but as this cannot be carried out in view of the categorical opposition of the government of the State of Vietnam, both against the agreement and the final declaration, the Commission is faced with the prospect of continuing its activities indefinitely and, as pointed out above, without any sanction for its working.

45. Despite the uncertainty regarding sanction for the Commission's working created by the political developments in the last few months and the increasing ineffectiveness due to these developments of the French High Command to carry out their obligations under Article 25 in respect of Commission's activities in the zone south of the provisional demarcation line, the Commission has continued to supervise and control the execution by the parties of the Articles of the Agreement throughout Vietnam under extremely trying conditions. It cannot, however, continue to function with any effectiveness unless the difficulties mentioned in the above paragraph are resolved satisfactorily by the co-Chairmen and the Geneva powers at a very early date. Ends.

FOURTH INTERIM REPORT

Opening Commission's general discussion on the draft report today Chairman stated that in chapter 8 he had attempted to make closer assessment of extent of cooperation by the parties and place before co-chairmen certain problems which the Commission had faced in last two or three months. Later, following my remarks, he agreed our job to present factual picture of difficulties faced and ask co-chairmen for advice but not to prejudge solution. Main point was that Commission under Article 41 not competent to make any ad hoc arrangements with South Vietnam Government.

2. In brief statement I suggested Commission again consider immediate and special report to co-chairmen re 14(d) and that Freedoms Committee's report should be considered before 14(d) section in fourth interim report. Referring to reports appendices I questioned appropriateness of revealing so much information which tended present "box score".

3. Re cooperation of parties to agreement, I advised caution pointing out it was a fact that State of Vietnam Government had by not (as received) signed Geneva Agreement and French had been to their credit steadily transferring responsibilities to the south. I recognized this situation caused delays but was not aware of any deliberate obstruction of Commission activities by the French or Vietnam Government. I observed that delays due more to local conditions. Basing myself on your telegram 378 of August 24, I said that "while the present situation is not satisfactory it is difficult to see how the Commission can insist on anything more at the present time until its formal relationship with the State of Vietnam undergoes some change. If, as a result of the present negotiations, the French turn over the High Command to the State of Vietnam then a more positive definition of the responsibilities of the State of Vietnam as the successor to the French High Command will be required.

The real crisis will arise if, as a result of the negotiations now taking place, the French transfer the High Command to the State of Vietnam and the State of Vietnam does not assume responsibilities as successor. At that time the situation can only be clarified by the co-chairmen and the Geneva Powers in consultation with the parties to the Agreement and the Government of the State of Vietnam. It may be worthwhile for the Commission to draw this situation to the attention of the co-chairmen but in so doing we should not prejudge the form the solution may take". Please advise if you agree with this course of action.

4. Desai in the interim report takes the view that the Commission "cannot carry on its activities in the face of declared opposition of the Government of the State of Vietnam to the Geneva Agreement merely on the basis of personal or practical understanding with Diem which can be revoked at any time."

5. Your telegram 407 of September 12† has just been received. Your reply to Mr. Nehru's message would help us in dealing with those sections of the interim report concerning the position of South Vietnam.

6. Pole agreed with general line of report but wished emphasize seriousness of situation vis-à-vis southern government and that south Vietnam had rejected provisions of agreement. Commission must establish that South Vietnam legally bound under Article 27 to adhere to agreement. Re 14(d) Pole declared matter closed and that special report unnecessary.

7. Chairman also opposed special report on 14(d) on grounds it unfair devote a report to one sub article of agreement. Furthermore co-chairmen who had exchange on 14(d) only because of Canadian note to third interim report had not requested special report. In view of Chairman and Poles opposition we shall endeavour insert as strong section as possible re 14(d) in fourth interim report. Our views on freedom of movement sections of report will be put forward again when Freedoms Committee's report available.

8. Commission commences discussion of report chapter by chapter September 15.

PROPOSED INDIAN APPROACH TO THE CO-CHAIRMEN

You will note from my comments which have been sent to London in our telegram No. 1486 (repeated to you as No. 414) that we have not taken serious exception to the content of Mr. Nehru's message to the co-Chairmen. I believe, however, that the timing of the Indian initiative in this matter is unfortunate and that it comes at a time when the co-

Chairmen might not find it possible or desirable to take any immediate steps in response to it. Indeed the transmission of the informal Indian note at this time could be related to objectives of Indian foreign policy; it is not a natural or logical consequence of developments in Vietnam itself. While the attitude of the South Vietnamese Government to the Cease Fire Agreement is unsatisfactory, and while the position of the Commission vis-à-vis the Vietnamese Government leaves a good deal to be desired, it has not been my impression that these matters have reached such a critical stage that immediate action by the co-chairmen is required. Similarly, the non-observance by the South Vietnamese Government of the provision in the Final Declaration for the commencement of interzonal consultations on elections is a problem which would certainly have to be dealt with before July of next year, but I see no compelling necessity why it should be raised with the co-chairmen at this particular stage by the Commission. The general effect of the Indian initiative may be therefore, to add to this confusion without helping in the solution of this problem.

2. Insofar as the Indian initiative in sending an informal communication to the co-chairmen was a purely Indian affair, there was no particular reason for taking umbrage at their making their concern on these matters known to the co-chairmen. With respect to a formal approach as proposed by Desai, you might tell him that we could, of course, have no objection to the Government of India's making such an approach itself if it wished to do so. You might add parenthetically, however, that we are somewhat at a loss to understand the need for a further formal communication by the Government of India when the two co-chairmen have already been seized of the problems with which India is concerned by means of the informal message to Messrs. MacMillan and Molotov.

3. The question of a formal approach by the Commission is, however, a very different affair and since, as indicated above, we have the impression that the reasons for an approach to the co-chairmen at this particular time are primarily Indian reasons we have rather strong misgivings about the Commission's been involved. You might, therefore, tell Desai that we would not be in favour of a formal Commission approach to the co-chairmen along the lines of the Indian approach at this particular time.

4. As for the association of Canada with a formal approach to the co-Chairmen by the Government of India, you might say that we would not be prepared to consider this at this time. If the Government of India (with or without the association of the Government of Poland) decides to go forward with its formal approach to the co-chairmen we would, of course, regard ourselves as being free to make known to the co-chairmen our own views on the subjects touched upon in such a communication.

5. In passing the above indication of our position to Desai you might say that we are not unsympathetic to the broad lines of the Indian approach as set forth in their informal note, although there are certain aspects of it with which we do not fully agree. We do not, for instance, regard it as the responsibility of the Commission powers at this particular time to raise the subject of non-observance by the South Vietnamese Government of the provision in paragraph 7 of the Final Declaration concerning interzonal consultations on elections. The Geneva Conference powers are well informed on this and they (and particularly the co-chairmen) have the primary responsibility for dealing with it. Furthermore, the DR, as one of the parties directly concerned, has just addressed a communication to the Geneva Conference Powers which is now being circulated.

6. You might add that we see nothing very new in the Diem Government's attitude of non-acceptance towards the Geneva Settlement. The South Vietnamese Delegation made its position pretty clear at the Geneva Conference. Unfortunately, not much attention was paid at the time to what the South Vietnamese had to say — presumably because, since their sovereignty was limited, they were not in a position to affect the course of the negotiations, and in the ensuing months we were concerned with the problems of regroupment, etc. which was naturally a matter of primary concern to the High Command of the French Union. Now, of course, the South Vietnamese have acquired almost complete sovereignty, and this change has created a new situation with which the Geneva Conference Powers will have to grapple some time in the coming months. It is a very difficult situation, however, and we believe that it must be approached very carefully indeed. We are, consequently, doubtful about the wisdom of the Commission or the Commission Powers acting as a catalyst at this time: to force the South Vietnamese to declare their position categorically now might produce a much more threatening situation than we now have.

7. You might recall to Desai that when Krishna Menon was in Ottawa he accused us (in relation to our activities on the Vietnam Commission) of being “more priestly than the bishops” and too legalistic in our approach to the Commission’s task. You might point out that the shoe seems now to be on the other foot. We recognize that the position of the Commission in South Vietnam is rather anomalous in view of the attitude of the South Vietnamese Government. We certainly hope that this situation will be corrected. It appears to us, however, that the best prospects for its amelioration lie in the Franco-Vietnamese discussions in Paris and in the sort of diplomatic pressure which the French, British and Americans are best able to apply — and are continuing to apply — to Diem.

8. Furthermore, it appears to us that the situation is improving, and that the Diem Government is endeavouring to take a more co-operative attitude and to “respect” the Cease Fire Agreement if not to acknowledge formally any responsibilities under it. The Commission drew the attention of the co-chairmen to the Saigon riots: apologies were made, provision was made for restitution, and Mr. Diem provided verbal assurances of co-operation to Mr. Desai and the Commission. The case of teams 24 and 61 is in hand and is being dealt with in accordance with normal Commission procedures under the Cease Fire Agreement. The Tourane incident was indeed unfortunate, but there is no evidence to show that it resulted from any deliberate intent on the part of the Diem Government.<sup>36</sup> (Furthermore, in this connection, we understand from the Americans that as a result of Hoppenot’s representations Diem has written to Desai providing further assurances of co-operation: this point might also be mentioned if our information is correct). There would, therefore, seem to be no reason now for a special communication to the co-chairmen when the attitude of the South Vietnamese towards the Commission is showing distinct signs of getting better: we are not convinced that the need for a special report is more pressing than it was in May in connection with the freedom of movement situation.

9. To the best of our knowledge the French have not at any time denied their responsibilities under the Cease Fire Agreement, and, accordingly, it would seem premature to demand that the South Vietnamese formally declare their acceptance of responsibilities which legally at least still rest on the French High Command. We profoundly hope that the Franco-Vietnamese talks in Paris will serve to clarify this situation. Meanwhile, we believe that the Commission can best contribute to the improvement of affairs by carrying out its primary task of supervision; objecting — if necessary strenuously — whenever it is not accorded the rights, facilities and co-operation on the practical level which it has a right to expect. We believe, however, that for the Commission or the commission powers to force the co-chairmen to take formal cognizance of the present anomalies in the Vietnam situation at this particular time (involving the circulation of formal communications originating from the Commission or the Commission powers to all the Geneva Conference Powers including the Diem Government) will succeed only in making the South Vietnamese commit themselves openly to extreme positions and adopt an attitude of resentment to the Commission. Such a move might also seriously prejudice the success of the Franco-Vietnamese talks and the possibility that Diem may return a more promising reply to Pham Van Dong's latest communication on elections.

Anti-Commission rioting forced Mobile Teams 24 and 61 to suspend their investigation of several alleged violations of Articles 14(c) and 15(d) in Tourane and neighbouring provinces in July 1955.

10. In sum, then, we believe that a special approach to the co-chairmen by the Commission or the Commission powers on the subject of elections is undesirable because this is not the responsibility of the Commission and unnecessary since it has just recently been taken up anew by the DR. We believe that a special report on the attitude of the South Vietnam Government towards the Geneva settlement would be unwise at this time, and might produce the opposite to the desired effect; and finally that the misgivings of the Commission powers on this subject can be adequately expressed in the fourth interim report.

11. I will be sending you a separate message concerning the fourth interim report. On this we may be able to take a somewhat more forthcoming attitude, as we obviously cannot object to the inclusion of justifiable criticism of the South Vietnamese, though we have to be careful here not to go further than we were able to go in criticism of the northern government on freedom of movement. We will wish to see some modification of the language, some elimination of the sweeping generalities and concentration on the specific points which are properly the concern of the Commission. You might hint to Desai that it will be open to the Indians (and the Poles) to propose inclusion in the fourth report of some reference to paragraph 13 of the final declaration concerning consultation between the Geneva Conference Powers (as we did in our minority note on the third report), and that we might be prepared to go along with this if a suitable formula can be found. While pouring cold water on the idea of a special formal approach to the co-chairmen either by the Commission or by the Indian Government, you can assure Desai that we do not wish to see the present situation drift on indefinitely, but that we are confident that the co-chairmen are seized of the problems and will not let matters rest as they are.

DRAFT FOURTH INTERIM REPORT

It appears to us most undesirable that the fourth interim report be put in final form until the freedoms committee has completed its report on Article 14(d). It is very important that our position on freedom of movement should be developed as fully as possible in the freedom committee's report, and you should do everything in your power to see that this position is also fully reflected in the fourth interim report as well. It is difficult to see how this can be done if the final draft of the fourth report is prepared before the freedom committee's report is completed. We attach particular importance to the section in the fourth interim report on Article 14(d) in view of the Indian efforts to put the South Vietnamese Government in a bad light.

2. Reference your telegram 488, paragraph 2(1). It should be made clear that while the northern intransigence regarding the implementation of Article 14(d) was gradually overcome with respect to adopting the procedures recommended by the Commission, the North did not apply these procedures in such a way as to remove the rumours and fears and the atmosphere of suspicion and distrust which were so largely responsible for preventing the provisions of Article 14(d) from being carried out fully. Similarly, any reference to strained relations should make clear that the North were primarily responsible for them in connection with the implementation of 14(d). If changes of this kind are not acceptable to your colleagues they should of course be written into a minority Canadian note.

3. If the Commission is to include in its fourth interim report the material on the attitude of the South Vietnam Government, it should keep before it the ultimate objective of contributing to the improvement of the situation rather than aggravating it. If the harsh and indignant tone of the present draft prepared by the Indians is preserved, it will surely only result in the Diem Government's becoming more intransigent, obstructive and unco-operative than ever.

4. Furthermore, we believe it is desirable for the Commission to use different tactics in bringing the South to book than are employed in the case of the North. The DR, as signatories of the cease fire agreement, are fully committed to the carrying out of its terms, and therefore are (or should be) sensitive to Commission criticism of their performance. The Diem Government, however, not being a signatory of the Cease Fire Agreement and not regarding itself as bound by its terms, must be persuaded and induced into better performance rather than needled and bullied. It seems to us important that some account should therefore be taken of the difference in status with respect to the agreement of the North and the South in connection with Commission comment on their performance. This point might be worth mentioning privately to Desai, although it is of course not one which would be stated in the Commission.

5. Furthermore, we believe that in its fourth report the Commission should confine itself to specific cases related to provisions of the cease fire agreement and should not indulge any more than necessary in broad generalizations. As indicated in our telegram No. 422 of September 16, we are prepared to see the problem which is exercising the Indians stated in the report; but it should be included as an analytical statement of a situation which is causing difficulties to the Commission rather than a tirade against the political attitude of the South Vietnam Government. The fact that the South Vietnamese Government did not sign the cease fire agreement and does not at the present time regard itself as bound by its terms must, of course, be mentioned; but we see no need whatever for the reiteration in the report of references to the "categorical attitude" of the Diem Government and "repeated public declarations" of opposition to the cease fire agreement and the final declaration. This sort of thing will only make it the more difficult for the South Vietnamese Government to change its attitude.

6. The following is not intended as a draft substitution for paragraphs 44 and 45 in the present report but is an outline of the manner in which we think it can be most suitably dealt with:

Begins:

During the past two or three months the Commission has encountered certain difficulties in carrying out its task in South Vietnam. (Reference teams 24 and 61; Tourane incident; if necessary the Saigon riots and difficulties in connection with 14(d).) During the period under review the regroupment of forces (with which the French High Command and the PAVN High Command were, as military commands, directly concerned) was completed and the Commission's principal task of supervision was accomplished. Since that time the Commission has become increasingly concerned with matters which in South Vietnam are not (for constitutional and administrative reasons) the direct responsibility of the French High Command, although the French High Command continues to be responsible to the Commission in these and other matters coming under the Cease Fire Agreement. The situation in connection with these matters has been affected by the fact that the authorities in South Vietnam directly concerned with them are responsible to the South Vietnamese Government and not to the French High Command, and by the fact that the South Vietnamese Government was not a signatory of the Cease Fire Agreement and does not at present regard itself as bound by its terms. This situation has an adverse effect on the work of the Commission and the implementation of the Vietnam Agreement.

The International Commission derives its authority from the Cease Fire Agreement and must depend, for the proper execution of its responsibilities, on the protection, assistance and co-operation of the parties to the agreement — i.e., the French High Command and the High Command of the PAVN. In connection with many of the problems with which it is now engaged the Commission must in fact depend more and more on the protection, assistance and co-operation of the South Vietnamese Government, although it can only claim this support through the agency of the French High Command. The Government of the State of Vietnam has given informal and oral assurances of full protection and practical co-operation to the Commission as an International Peace Commission but is not at present formally engaged to provide the protection, assistance and co-operation which the Commission has a right to expect. The Commission is of a view that this ad hoc arrangement is not satisfactory and expresses the hope that the parties directly concerned will be able to work out a more durable and dependable arrangement, which will place the Commission in a more favourable position to carry out its functions. Ends.

7. We would like to consult the British about the possibility of a recommendation for consultations by the Geneva Conference Powers in accordance with paragraph 13 of the Final Declaration. Accordingly, you should not concur in any formula for this purpose until you hear further from us.

8. We do not believe that the section on the duration of the Commission is necessary at this time, and you should oppose its inclusion on the grounds that the Commission must continue to function in any event until July 1956, and that there will be ample time to take this matter up at a later date if no progress has been made on the elections question.

9. We do not believe that you should be quite so precise in your analysis of the problem facing the Commission as you have been in paragraph 3 of your telegram No. 495, since we cannot be confident that the French will in fact agree to hand over the High Command in toto to the South Vietnamese, or that the latter in assuming the High Command or a part of it will accept unequivocally responsibilities under the Armistice Agreement that would thereby devolve upon it. We should leave the way open to the acceptance of half measures which may be as much as the French or any one else can obtain from Diem.

10. We do not agree that any statement to the effect that "an ad hoc arrangement outside the Agreement, however effective, naturally amounts to revocation of the Agreement and the Commission cannot be a party to any such arrangement". It is in this sort of statement that the Indians are being "more priestly than the bishops". The Commission has in fact been a party to this sort of arrangement for some time now, and it is accordingly illogical to make such a statement at this point.

11. Similarly, you should be wary of any flat assertions that the South Vietnamese Government is legally bound under Article 27 of the agreement. We would wish to examine any such statement very closely before agreeing to it; and in any event such an assertion is not particularly helpful if the South Vietnamese stoutly deny it, as they undoubtedly would.

12. Our comments have been addressed to those sections of the Draft interim report quoted in your telegram No. 488, but it will, of course, be desirable to apply the same approach to the document as a whole.

FREEDOMS COMMITTEE REPORT ON FREEDOM OF MOVEMENT

Report running to 50 foolscap pages double spaced and covering appendices including lengthy Canadian note of amendment was signed on September 16 and presented to Commission today. (Copies going forward by bag September 19.) It is basically a second redraft prepared by Indian Chairman on basis of amendments suggested to first draft. Most of the Canadian amendments on early historical section have been incorporated. Although now more realistic than first draft, report still suggests a larger measure of implementation of 14(d), a greater degree of co-operation from the PAVN and a lesser degree of co-operation from the south than we believe to be true situation. Accordingly, Canadian member of the Committee signed with the Pole and the Indian but subject to Canadian note of amendment to cover these points and to reiterate that more time is required and that Commission retain right to use rapid surveys teams if it sees fit.

2. Summary of specific Canadian implementation minority notes follows:

(1) Paragraph suggesting that areas visited by mobile team 54 had been cleared changed to statement (draft?) "while some progress had been made, the Commission was not in a position to say that Article 14(d) had been adequately implemented in these areas".

(2) Paragraph dealing with continuing work of Commission changed to include reference to persons who because of fear, physical obstruction or other circumstances beyond their control, had not been able to put in a petition or to apply for a permit before July 20. The following is also added to this paragraph: "To complete the humanitarian work in this regard, the Commission of course retains the right to take such measures including despatch of mobile team for investigation and rapid surveys as it may see fit".

(3) Paragraph listing remaining residual problems changed to include persons who because of fear, physical obstruction or other circumstances beyond their control were unable to exercise their right of option within the stipulated period.

(4) Paragraph assessing position as of May 18 deleted and four pages giving detailed and blunt Canadian assessment along lines of Appendix A to our despatch No. 395 of July 25+ mentioned in paragraph 4 of your telegram under reference substituted. In addition to hitting PAVN hard, this section emphasizes difficulties facing teams, continued non-implementation of 14(d) in the north and absence of any problem in the south during the 300-day period.

(5) Paragraph devoted to performance of the PAVN during the 300-day period and the extended period up to July 20 rewritten to emphasize PAVN failure to implement Article 14(d). It concludes: "It is clear that the measure of co-operation and of fulfilment of their obligations by the northern authorities during the 300-day period was less than the Commission had a right to expect under the Geneva Agreement and was responsible for the failure to implement Article 14(d) more satisfactorily."

(6) Paragraph devoted to the Commission's role re-written to re-emphasize achievement of the Commission in order not to suggest problem of freedom of movement solved to a greater extent than we think has in fact been the case. This section of the Canadian amending note says that in face of substantial difficulties "the work that has been done by the Commission towards ensuring as full implementation of Article 14(d) as possible represents an achievement which should be recorded." It concludes that "completing its remaining tasks as outlined in performance section of this report the Commission would be continuing its efforts to carry out its humanitarian obligations both in the letter and the spirit of the Geneva Agreement".

3. When discussion commenced on report in Commission I raised question of special report on 14(d) to co-Chairmen. If there was agreement in a special report the Freedoms Committee report would be used as basis for special report. If no agreement on special report to co-Chairmen there was little point in long debate on acceptance of Freedoms Committee report. In that case it would be preferable to proceed with consideration of relevant clauses in fourth interim report and for each delegation to use Freedoms Committee report as a basis for their comments on those clauses.

4. Chairman explained Indels stand stating reference of problem to co-Chairmen would only secure condemnation of one party to agreement without helping people change zones. Furthermore authors of agreement had put time limit on 14(d) while co-Chairmen had never requested special report; therefore it was not justified. Pole also opposed special report. Hence my request for a special report was rejected by Commission.

5. Fourth interim report sections on 14(d) due for detailed discussion next week.

6. Complete redrafting of these sections along lines of Canadian note of amendment to Freedoms Committee report has already been done and submitted to other delegations. We shall press firmly for inclusion of our redraft which may well result in Canadian minority note on 14(d) being appended to fourth interim report.

PROPOSED INDIAN APPROACH TO CO-CHAIRMEN

I am grateful for your timely and helpful comments in reply to my telegram No. 487 of September 10th. I arranged to see Mr. Desai this afternoon and left with him copy of an informal memorandum based upon your telegram under reference. Text of the memorandum is set forth in my immediately following telegram† and is being repeated to Delhi so that you may both know the precise terms in which your views were communicated to Desai.

2. I also indicated to him that the views set forth in this memorandum would necessarily (govern?) our attitude in approaching the final paragraphs of the fourth interim report, and that we would not, repeat not, be able at this stage to go beyond a factual statement as to the present position facing Commission, and in particular that we could not, repeat not, share in any sweeping generalizations as to the responsibilities of the South Vietnamese administration.

3. I also took the opportunity to make informally the point contained in paragraph 7 of your telegram No. 422 concerning what we regarded as an excessive legalism in the Indian approach. At the same time I emphasized to Desai the point contained in paragraph 4 of your telegram (No. 424?) distinguishing between the performance of the D.R. as signatory to the cease-fire agreement, and the performance of the south, which was not, repeat not, signatory and did not, repeat not, regard itself as bound by its terms.

4. Desai indicated that the Indian position, as is clear from the informal approach already made to the co-chairmen, the proposed formal approach and the terms of the first draft of the fourth interim report, (word corrupt) and gave no, repeat no, hint that there would be any change in the Indian position. As he put it, the Indians would be prepared to remain (in?) Vietnam over the next few months if there were useful work to be done. Failing full cooperation from the south, however, then prospect of this was slight. The south had of course been interested in implementation of the terms of the cease-fire agreement dealing with regroupment and transfer in the 300-day period; even now, they were doubtless interested in cooperation with respect to adequate supervision of the demarcation line and demilitarized zone and with respect to border control. On 14(c) however, which to the north was an article of great importance, the southern government's cooperation was not, repeat not, likely to be forthcoming. The present situation was [so] uncertain that in the Indian view the matter should be brought forcibly to the attention of the co-chairmen and Geneva powers, and Desai indicated that if India proceeded with its formal approach on its own, it might indicate that India could be "prepared to quit" unless the situation were remedied.

5. With respect to fourth interim report, Desai did not demur at my suggestion that it may be necessary to submit alternative delegation reports on the (group corrupt?) sections. He mentioned that in his view unanimity of the Commission had been essential to achieve the previous objective of transfer and regroupment up to May 18, but indicated that a long argument in the Commission would prove fruitless in view of the positions taken by the respective Commission governments, and that separate reports (including possibly a Polish minority report strongly critical of the south) might be the only solution. He is hoping to complete consideration of report on this basis by September 23rd. We have now completed submission of our amendments to 14(d) chapters of report. We are preparing our alternative draft on the final sections dealing more particularly with the general question of cooperation of South Vietnam, largely on the basis of the useful outline put forward in paragraph 6 of your telegram No. 424 of September 16. You will note that we did not, repeat not, raise with Desai the suggestion contained in paragraph 7 of your telegram No. 424 of possibility of a reference in accordance with paragraph 13.

FREEDOM OF MOVEMENT — SECTION FOURTH INTERIM REPORT

Commission September 19 considered 14(d) sections in Chapter V of draft Fourth Interim Report. As I reported in my telegram No. 504 of September 19, we had submitted to other delegations for consideration a complete redraft of 11 out of 13 paragraphs on 14(d) sections of Indian draft.

2. Both Pole and Chairman explained in considerable detail their reasons for opposing Canadian redraft.

3. Pole declared his delegation accepted neither conclusions nor argumentation in Canadian amendment and objected particularly to following Candel phrase "the Commission is not only unable to report that full implementation in this sense (re freedom of movement) has been achieved, but it recognizes that this problem has not yet been fully solved". Referring to results limited investigations by teams 74, 75 and (F42?) Pole claimed problem re 14(d) no longer really existed and added that from political aspect the humanitarian solution to any remaining residual problems would be to request complete implementation of agreement, i.e. unification of Vietnam. On political grounds, Pole expressed fear that despite his own good faith, Canadian proposal might be exploited by people who do not want political settlement in Vietnam. Finally, Canadian amendment to 14(d) sections implied amendment of Article 14(d) itself through action under Article 41 and this could not be done.

4. Chairman reiterated remarks made during discussion September 17 on Freedoms Committee's report on 14(d) saying Commission's job was to supervise implementation of 14(d), not condemn either side, while Canadian amendment, based on extracts from team reports, aimed to condemn one party. He pointed out no investigation from May 18 to July 20 discovered any violations of 14(d) and considered Chapter 8 of report would show adequately what difficulties Commission had had in carrying out its investigations.

5. Chairman noted that neither party had requested extension on May 18 but Commission arranged it as it was felt its task under article not completed at that time. Extended arrangements, however, did not work satisfactorily as two parties failed make proper arrangements. Re Canadian suggestion that extension necessary, Chairman observed this could only be implemented by

(a) Agreement of two parties — who obviously were not interested,

(b) Amendment of Article 41 which would require reference to co-Chairmen — a very serious step.

6. Making it clear he did not consider 14(d) worth such attention, Chairman remarked that to extend 14(d) now would impose on parties tasks and duties Geneva agreement had never contemplated. In fact, 300-day limit had been placed on article in agreement itself.

7. Concluding, Chairman stated Indian Delegation could not support "one-sided condemnation of one party for actions before July 20" and therefore could not support Candel amendment of sections on 14(d). He also shared Polish view that our statement will be exploited by opponents of unification.

8. I acknowledged views of my colleagues and stated that as Canadian Delegation could not, repeat not, possibly accept Fourth Interim Report with present 14(d) paragraphs, and since gap between delegations was so wide, we would feel free to bring our own view on this article before co-Chairmen. At next Commission discussion of Fourth Interim Report on September 21, I intended briefly to outline reasons for Canadian position on 14(d), without precipitating general debate which would be useless at this time.

9. Our present redraft of 14(d) sections, on which Canadian minority note on 14(d) will be based, coming forward by bag of September 19. You will appreciate that in addition to our own interpretation of DG performance, our views (which will eventually be made public) include brief statement of Canadian position regarding need for extension of time to complete implementation, and reserve right of Commission to conduct further mobile team survey and require co-operation from parties in so doing.

FOURTH INTERIM REPORT CHAPTER 8

Commission September 21 considered key chapter 8 of draft interim report dealing with cooperation of parties to agreement and problems of future; for text of relevant paragraphs see my telegram No. 489 of September 11.

2. I opened discussion stating that while Candel could accept paras 41, 42 and 43 (with minor amendment to indicate PAVN had taken immediate action in "some cases") there were many statements in para 44 and 45 we could not accept, especially para 44, Part (i) "it is obvious that the International Commission cannot carry on its activities in the face of declared opposition of Government of State of Vietnam to the Geneva Agreement merely on the basis of a personal or practical understanding which can be revoked at any time". I observed situation is actually same now as a year ago, i.e. France signed the agreement and State of Vietnam did not. Furthermore, suggestion in part (ii) that ad hoc arrangements naturally amount to revocation of agreement simply not the case. I also commented on "harsh" tone of final chapters.

3. Pointing out paras 44 and 45 tantamount to threat to pack up and go, I suggested at outset that they be omitted altogether leaving co-chairmen to draw their own conclusions. Observing that negotiations were going [on] between France and South Vietnam which might be helpful in present situation, I stated that while willing to submit facts re difficulties faced in Commission I objected to submission of conclusions. If other delegations insisted on these paragraphs, Candel would be obliged to forward our views. In that case it had ready alternative draft of paras 44 and 45 giving conclusions as Candel saw them. I stressed, however, we would much prefer that agreement be reached on a factual final chapter, if at all feasible, as this would be of much more help to co-chairmen.

4. Pole objected to deletion of paras 44 and 45 maintaining they did present factual picture. Commission could not depend on verbal assurances which might be withdrawn at any time; nor should we wait for results of French Vietnamese negotiations. Pole also asserted situation not the same as last year since administrative power has been passed by French to Vietnamese.

5. Co-chairmen at once agreed it would be better if three delegations could agree on factual presentation rather than submit separate views. He stated paragraphs might be "rearranged" to mutual satisfaction if the general theme therein, i.e. that the Commission cannot work effectively unless existing difficulties are solved, were accepted.

6. Re present situation co-chairmen pointed out since June, 1955, when there ceased to be a Commander-General of FUF in Saigon, Commission had noted progressive ineffectiveness on part of French High command to get civil administration and local authorities in South Vietnam to cooperate. Chairman mentioned appointment of French Ambassador in Saigon as sign that relations between French and Vietnamese had changed. French can no longer be really effective on civil administration side and perhaps in future on military side too. Noting that case after case raised by Commission is referred by French to State of Vietnam Chairman asked how promise of practical cooperation could be of much value when French no longer in control. If Commission refused place situation before co-chairmen, it would stand in danger of being deemed ineffective.

7. Chairman concluded by reiterating that we should try to agree on common draft. Meanwhile, Canadian redraft of paras 44 and 45 was circulated to other delegations (similar to para 6 in your telegram No. 424 of September 16).

8. When discussion resumed September 22 Chairman said, after careful study of Candel redraft, he considered difference in approach so serious that any Candel suggestions to amend it would prove unacceptable. He maintained it not good enough to declare ad hoc arrangements unsatisfactory and simply express hope that parties would work out arrangements placing Commission in a more favourable position. Commission demanded by right that certain cooperation and assistance be given to it. Meanwhile, Commission could not wait and see what happens while becoming increasingly ineffective. There was no doubt that Commission had reached a crisis and co-chairmen must decide whether it was to continue. In support of his remarks Chairman referred to recent official and unofficial statements emanating from South Vietnam to effect State of Vietnam had not signed and was not bound by agreement that Commission was not impartial and that Indian and Polish delegations were pro-Communist, etc.

9. Pole observed that, even if present French-Vietnamese negotiations in Paris were successful, any change of responsibilities by one party would not offer Commission legal basis on which to function.

10. When I pointed out that this was difficult transition period and present Indian draft would tend to add fuel to the flames rather than preserve conditions in which peace could be maintained Chairman replied that, if Commission remained quiet, we would be preparing for end of peace in this area.

11. Although based on your telegram No. 424 of September 16, I made dangers inherent in present Indian redraft abundantly clear Indel view remained firm. It appears, therefore, that Indian draft of paras 44 and 45 (see my telegram No. 489 of September 11) will be essentially unchanged and will probably be accepted by the Pole with minor amendments. Present position, therefore, is that we would also submit minority note on final sections of fourth interim report in addition to Canadian amendment to sections on 14(d). This is not the best solution from point of view of Commission's relations with the South, but in view of Indian position we can see no alternative.<sup>37</sup>

Hanoi, October 31, 1955

CONFIDENTIAL

Reference: My previous despatch of October 19.†

ARTICLE 14(C)

Under its present procedures, the Commission cannot prevent itself from becoming involved in an ever greater burden of work under Article 14(c). So long as the State of Vietnam continues to pursue a vigorous anti-Communist campaign, the PAVN is provided with material on which to base new charges of reprisals and discrimination; and once a complain is made, the Commission is generally forced to take some action on it. Since the PAVN's complaints are carefully drafted, there is almost never an occasion on which the Commission can reject a charge on the grounds that it does not come prima facie within the terms of the Geneva Agreement. From time to time, the Commission, in the light of Article 33, does insist that the PAVN raise a complaint in the Joint Sub-Commission first, in the case of alleged acts of reprisal in the Demilitarized Zone, but except in these special circumstances, it has no way of refusing to consider a charge. The Commission has to proceed on the assumption that the parties are acting in good faith in requesting its intervention. However much it may suspect the motives of the PAVN, and believe that they exaggerate their complaints for propaganda purposes, the only really effective way of finding out whether a charge is true or false is either to investigate it directly or ask the French to investigate and report. This means that the wheels of the Commission are set in motion

<sup>37</sup> La Commission a approuvé le Quatrième rapport provisoire lors de réunions les 27 et 28 septembre. La délégation canadienne a joint des réserves aux sections reçues des autres parties et portant sur la liberté de mouvement et la coopération. Johnson a déclaré : « Report, with exception of sections on which we submitted minority comments, is we think as satisfactory as we could hope in view of rigid position taken by Mr. Nehru. » Voir Hanoi à Ottawa, télégramme, N° 534 du 28 septembre 1955, MAE/50052-A-40. Pour le rapport lui-même, voir United Kingdom, Parliamentary Papers, Cmd. 9654, Fourth Interim Report of the International Commission for Supervision and Control in Vietnam, London: Her Majesty's Stationery Office, 1955.

The Commission approved the Fourth Interim Report during meetings on September 27 and 28. The Canadian delegation attached reservations to the sections dealing with freedom of movement and cooperation received from parties. Johnson observed: "Report, with exception of sections on which we submitted minority comments, is we think as satisfactory as we could hope in view of rigid position taken by Mr. Nehru." See Hanoi to Ottawa, Telegram No. 534, September 28, 1955, DEA/50052-A-40. For the report itself, see United Kingdom, Parliamentary Papers, Cmd. 9654, Fourth Interim Report of the International Commission for Supervision and Control in Vietnam, London: Her Majesty's Stationery Office, 1955.

every time the PAVN makes a complaint. The initiative lies with the PAVN, and if they choose to make as many as twenty complaints a week, they would experience no great difficulty in finding suitable material.

2. The form the investigation takes varies according to the seriousness of the acts alleged, and the Commission, on the Chairman's initiative, distinguishes three classes. The first concerns individual arrests of persons for common-law offences committed after the ceasefire. If the PAVN complains that such an arrest was in fact a reprisal, the Commission asks the FUF to comment, specifying the charge on which the person was arrested and ultimately, the results of his trial and sentence. If from these comments it is clear that the person was arrested, tried and convicted for a common-law offence committed after the ceasefire, then the Commission considers the case closed unless the judge himself indicates some doubt about the validity of the charge. The Commission is obliged to follow the case through to the time when the arrested person is sentenced to be sure that even if the charge is genuine, there is no reprisal in the form either of failure to bring the arrested person to trial within a normal period of time or of the awarding of a more severe sentence than the law provides for the crime of which the person was convicted.

3. The second group of cases concerns alleged reprisals committed by persons or groups not connected with the Administration. Here also, the Commission takes no action itself so long as the French can report that the local authorities are taking the necessary action to trace and prosecute the guilty persons. Only in the third group, which is by no means clearly defined, does the Chairman argue for immediate investigation by the Commission in accordance with Article 37. This group seems to be distinguished, at least in the eyes of the Chairman, by allegations which clearly implicate the authorities in respect of particular brutal reprisals or reprisals affecting particularly large numbers of victims.

4. Whatever the category, it is evident that the Commission is involving itself in a considerable amount of work, either in investigating charges itself through mobile teams, or supervising the investigation of charges by the FUF. Considering the length of time that mobile team investigations can take, and the even greater length of time which it might take the responsible authorities to investigate, say, a murder case thoroughly, it is hard to see an end to the Commission's activities under Article 14(c). From this point of view, the Commission is at the mercy of the PAVN, since it must accept any reasonable charge which the PAVN brings forward. This is especially serious because of the propaganda advantage it gives to the DRVN and because of the real security problems facing the Southern authorities in some areas, which increase their natural reluctance to accept Commission investigations.

5. Because the Commission seemed to be becoming more and more occupied in investigating an apparently endless series of PAVN complaints, we several times suggested altering the present procedures for dealing with Article 14(c) cases. We have suggested that the Incidents Committee might be revived to screen complaints before they appear on the Commission's agenda. Alternatively, we have proposed that the Legal Committee should study the possibility of requiring more evidence from the PAVN before the Commission concedes that a prima facie case has been established.

6. Neither of these suggestions has been accepted, and for several reasons, we have not pressed them. For one thing, it is hard to see what additional evidence the PAVN could reasonably be expected to produce to establish in each case that a person was a member of the Viet Minh during the war, and that he has lived peacefully since the ceasefire. Furthermore, the procedures the Commission now follows are largely the Chairman's own. So long as we cannot suggest a more effective substitute for them, we think it unwise to offend him by continually criticizing them.

7. More important is the fact that, since the Commission's last visit to Saigon, there have been indications of increasing co-operation from the South Vietnamese authorities. The most effective way to deal with the PAVN's charges is to produce evidence that they are false, and only the South Vietnamese are in a position to do this. Until recently, they have of course been reluctant to provide any assistance at all, for fear of compromising their position as a non-signatory of the Geneva Agreement. Lately, however, they have provided through the French fairly satisfactory answers to some of the more serious of the PAVN's charges. As a result, the Commission has accepted delays in despatching Mobile Team 85 to investigate a series of incidents in Chau Doc province, and has reversed its decision to send Mobile Team 90 to undertake a similar investigation in Thua Thien province.

8. If this trend towards increased co-operation continues, the Commission may be able to discharge its responsibilities under Article 14(c) satisfactorily. However, we do not ignore the possibility that an increase in the volume of accusations may eventually lead the French and the South Vietnamese to cut the knot by refusing to have anything more to do with investigations under Article 14(c). This is a possibility which has suggested itself to the Chairman, to the French both in Paris and in Saigon, and to ourselves. So long as such a step could be prevented from having any repercussions more serious than a report to the Co-Chairmen, it might be preferable to the present situation, which benefits only the Democratic Republic.

ARTICLE 14(C) INVESTIGATIONS OF THE SOUTH VIETNAMESE ELECTIONS

You will recall that in our telegram under reference we expressed some concern about the possibility that the general elections which are to be held in South Vietnam later this year might provide the Viet Minh with an excellent opportunity to step up their flow of charges that Article 14(c) of the Cease-Fire Agreement is being violated in South Vietnam. We asked our Commissioner to comment on this possibility and on the desirability of our discussing this matter with the U.S. and other governments.

2. From paragraph 1 of Hanoi's telegram No. 563 of October 20† (copy attached) you will note that our Commissioner agrees that the possibility that the DR will attempt to discredit Diem in this way during the forthcoming elections cannot be discounted.

3. Accordingly, we would be grateful if you would discuss this matter with the State Department, emphasizing that our hope is to obviate as far as possible a further development of the current Viet Minh campaign of pressing charges against the South Vietnamese that Article 14(c) of the Cease-Fire Agreement is being violated. You might inquire about the possibility that the American Ambassador might take this matter up with the South Vietnamese authorities, counselling them to frame their electoral regulations in such a way as not to discriminate against persons or organizations on account of their activities during the hostilities. As indicated in paragraph 5 in our telegram under reference, the objective of this would be to ensure that the activities of Viet Minh agents in the South during the election campaign and the voting be kept in control by regulations of general application, and that thus no charges of discrimination need arise.

4. Please confine your discussion to the substance of paragraphs 3-6 of our telegram Y-470 to Hanoi and paragraph 1 of Hanoi telegram No. 563 of October 20 as you will note our Delegation in Vietnam is not too hopeful about avoiding new 14(c) cases, and we would not wish to raise false hopes on this score.

5. We are asking our missions in London and Paris to take up this matter with the British and French authorities, and you may, if you wish, inform the State Department to this effect.

MINISTER'S VISIT: DISCUSSIONS ON INDO-CHINA

1. The Minister brought up the situation in Indo-China at both talks with Mister Nehru. At Nehru's request Dutt was present for the second talk.

2. At both talks the Minister suggested that the cease-fire line in Indo-China might become the border between the communist and non-communist worlds just as it had in Germany and Korea. In the second talk he referred to the possibility of five Indo-Chinese States emerging.

3. The Minister and Nehru were in general agreement on the following points:

(a) The situation in the two northern provinces of Laos and the situation in Vietnam are linked together. It is probable that if Vietnam remains divided Laos will also remain divided. The Communists will not come to any agreement in Laos as long as South Vietnam refuses to agree to elections.

(b) In view of the link between the situations in Vietnam and Laos it would be unrealistic for the Co-Chairmen and the Geneva Powers to consider one issue separately from the other. Therefore if there is to be an appeal to the two Co-Chairmen and the Geneva Powers the appeals from Laos and Vietnam should go forward at the same time and be considered together as one problem. This requirement should be kept in mind in the timing of movements in either the Vietnam or Laotian Commissions.

(c) Neither Commission can continue to function indefinitely. If no progress can be made with elections in Vietnam or in unifying Laos the question of the continued existence of the Commissions will have to be brought to the attention of the Geneva Powers. Neither Commission should be used for a purpose for which it was not intended: i.e. either as a protection to the régime in South Vietnam (or as a?) protection to the PL forces in the two northern provinces of Laos.

4. In respect of Laos the Minister requested that the Indians take another look at the Mayrand proposal.<sup>38</sup> Dutt commented that the Mayrand proposal did not give due weight to the contradiction in the agreement under which the authority of the Royal Government is to be reestablished in the two northern provinces while at the same time the PL forces have a right to move freely throughout the whole of the two northern provinces.

5. On the Sen Plan<sup>39</sup> Dutt's comment was that it was unwise to force the issue but we had not first decided what we would do if the plan should prove not to be acceptable to both sides.

6. The Minister agreed that the issue should not be forced unless we were prepared to refer the matter to the Co-Chairmen and the Geneva Powers.

7. On Vietnam the Minister said that we were not prepared to use stronger language in criticizing the régime in the South for its refusal to proceed with consultations on elections than we had used in criticizing the régime in the North for its failure to facilitate the movement of refugees. Mister Nehru demurred on the ground that the kind of breach that the South was committing was of a much more fundamental character than that which the North had committed.

8. The Minister said that we differed on the content of the legal obligations of the South under the Geneva settlement but he added that he fully realized that the real issue was not legal but political and that he himself considered that every effort should be made to persuade the South to enter into consultations on the holding of free elections. The Minister repeated several times that he was convinced that the United States was doing its best to persuade Diem to enter into consultations on elections.

9. Nehru showed us the text of the recent note from the Peking régime commenting on the protest by North Vietnam on the failure of the South to hold consultations. The Minister agreed that the Chinese had scored an important point when they had [contended] that it was nonsense for the South to say that the North would not agree to free elections when it was the South which had refused even to discuss the conditions of free elections.

10. The Minister both in his talks with Nehru and at his press conference made it clear that we would not be a party to elections in Vietnam unless they were free in the sense in which elections in Canada and India are free.<sup>40</sup>

SOUTH VIETNAMESE ELECTIONS AND ARTICLE 14(C) OF THE CEASE-FIRE AGREEMENT

We discussed the substance of your message under reference with Hoey and Kattenburg at the State Department on November 9. We took the opportunity as well to go over some of the same ground as had been covered early in October with the State Department (cf. our telegram No. 1708 of Oct. 7).†

2. The two State Department officers saw merit in your suggestion that the South Vietnamese authorities might be counselled to frame their electoral regulations in such a way as not to discriminate against persons or organizations on account of their activities during the hostilities. While no commitment was offered that the United States Ambassador in Saigon would be instructed to raise this point with the South Vietnamese authorities, we got the impression that something would be said to Reinhardt on the matter. Hoey said there was no question but that Reinhardt would continue to advise Diem at every suitable opportunity to offer the maximum co-operation he thought possible under domestic circumstances to the Commission on 14(c) matters as well as on other matters of interest to the Commission. The State Department officials with whom we spoke were inclined to believe that no matter how carefully the South Vietnamese electoral regulations were framed, the Vietminh would carry on a propaganda campaign charging discrimination. Communist organs in Hanoi, Peking and Moscow have already condemned the recent referendum and the plans of the Diem government for the calling of a National Assembly.

3. In the course of our conversation we touched briefly on the more general subject of the Diem government's planning for the election of a National Assembly. This is a matter on which there has been some consultation between United States representatives and the South Vietnamese but the State Department is by no means certain of the details of Diem's plan. United States representatives have been careful to "speak only when spoken to" on this matter so as not to give the impression of undue interference in what are essentially internal matters. Diem and his associates are extremely sensitive on such matters. The State Department understands, however, that a rough draft of a constitution prepared by a Council of Ministers exists. It is not clear to the State Department, however, whether this draft constitution will be publicized prior to the convocation of the Assembly or whether Diem intends to submit it in draft form to the Assembly after convocation. State Department officials assume that the main task of the Assembly will be to approve the constitution. Whether or not the draft constitution is publicized before the Assembly convenes, there will have to be some indication from the present government of the functions and procedures of the Assembly especially if that Assembly is to be kept in hand to any degree.

4. Hoey was of the personal opinion that Diem should be spending more time than he was building up some kind of party organization prior to the convening of the Assembly. In spite of its solid support of Diem, the State Department is not blind to the fact that he has potentially strong opponents, some of whom hold the loyalty of armed forces. In this conversation, as in so many conversations with the State Department in the past, we were made aware of the concern which exists among United States officials that the National Assembly would be less moderate than Diem and may be very difficult to control.

5. Kattenburg pointed out the dilemma which faces Diem in the organization of elections. What little experience the Vietnamese have had in governmental organization has been on the French parliamentary pattern. On the other hand, Diem and his associates are almost forced to strike out along new lines to maintain the support of the revolutionary elements in South Vietnam. The United States system is attractive in theory at least to Diem. How or whether he and his associates can bring about a satisfactory marriage of the French and United States systems (each of which our United States colleague admitted were thought of by many to be the worst in the world) seems to be the problem which the Vietnamese have set themselves. It would not be surprising, therefore, if their first attempts were decidedly unsatisfactory.

DISCUSSIONS WITH MR. NEHRU ON INDOCHINA

Thank you for preparing the summary of my discussions with the Indians on Indochina. As I am anxious that other interested governments should know the context in my rather lengthy conversations of the understandings summarized in your telegram, I am suggesting to our missions in London, Paris and Washington that they write their memoranda for transmission to the governments concerned on the basis of your telegram No. 773 and the following supplementary comments (reference are to your telegram No. 773):

(a) Reference your paragraph 3(a): We recognized that the communist governments regarded the situations in Laos and Vietnam as linked, and that in dealing with the two situations we would have to take this fact into account.

(b) Reference your paragraph 3(b): These remarks were related to the Indian desi[red?] recent initiative to have the situation Vietnam considered by the Co-Chairmen and the Geneva Conference Powers. We would not wish this step to be taken unless consideration was also given to the situation in Laos. However, we think that this simultaneous consideration of the Laos and Vietnam situations can apply only at the Co-Chairman level: at the local level the International Commissions in Laos and Vietnam must be free to deal independently with developments in their local context.

(c) Reference your paragraph 7. I expressed the view that although failure on the part of the Diem Government to engage in pre-electoral consultations might affect the work of the Commission after its normal term of operations had elapsed in July 1956, the question of electoral consultations was not the responsibility of the present International Commission at this time. I did not believe that the use outside the Commission of stronger language in criticism of the régime in the South for its refusal to proceed with consultations on elections than that which had been used by the Commission in criticizing the régime in the North for its failure to facilitate the movement of refugees was justified.

(d) Reference your paragraph 9. The Chinese note was not discussed in any detail.

2. For London, Washington and Paris: You may inform the Governments to which you are accredited of the substance of my conversations with Mr. Nehru on Indochina as outlined in New Delhi's telegram No. 773 (which is being repeated to you separately) modified by the foregoing supplementary comments.

SOUTH VIETNAMESE ELECTIONS AND ARTICLE 14(C)
OF THE CEASE-FIRE AGREEMENT

On November 15 we had an opportunity to continue with Hoey at the State Department the earlier conversation recorded in our letter under reference on electoral developments in South Vietnam and their relation to Article 14(c) of the Cease-fire Agreement. It is apparent that the Diem government is not taking United States representatives fully into its confidence on detailed developments and it may be some time therefore before we can secure through State Department sources at least a general outline of Vietnamese planning with respect to domestic elections. In the circumstances, our reporting from here on this subject must be of the bits and pieces variety but you may be interested none the less in what we can pick up.

2. We took the occasion to pass on to the State Department the information contained in your telegrams Y-1887† and Y-1888† of November 8 dealing with the possibility of a Polish demand for a special report to the co-Chairmen on the lack of adequate South Vietnamese co-operation with respect to Article 14(c) cases. Hoey expressed his appreciation of your willingness to keep the State Department informed. He went on to say that, as a result of our earlier representations (dealt with in our letter under reference), the State Department had suggested to Reinhardt, the United States Ambassador in Saigon, that he take whatever opportunity presented itself to advise Diem of the desirability of framing electoral regulations carefully so as to avoid giving the Vietminh grounds for charging discrimination under Article 14(c). Hoey expressed the opinion that, apart from any friendly advice which was offered Diem on this score, there were practical limitations on the Diem government's freedom to discriminate against particular groups in South Vietnam. These limitations stemmed from the inability of the Diem government to implement a policy of discrimination. Diem was fully aware, Hoey thought, that he had to proceed cautiously to undermine the opposition which existed to his régime. Diem's record over the past year was on the whole a record of moderation and caution, if one took into account the revolutionary character of his régime. It did not seem likely to Hoey, therefore, that Diem would suddenly shuck off this habit of caution in favour of a frontal assault on his political enemies and attempt to implement highly discriminatory regulations. Hoey admitted the highly speculative nature of his comments since there were indications which pointed to opposite conclusions.

3. Stressing again the incompleteness of State Department information of Vietnamese planning, Hoey said that there had been some indication that the South Vietnamese authorities intended to use the "single list" technique in the election of candidates to the National Assembly. If they persisted in this plan, there would probably be repercussions in the way of appeals to the International Commission concerning undemocratic practices.

4. So far as the State Department knew, the South Vietnamese authorities were planning to set up a unicameral legislature. Some mention has been made, however, of an appointive council to deal with economic problems. It seemed likely that direct rather than indirect elections would be held. At an early stage in the electoral planning by South Vietnamese authorities there had been a decided preference for indirect elections, i.e., the choosing of national representatives by local village headsmen. In recent months this method seems to have lost its appeal although, in the State Department view, it is much better fitted to the present capabilities of the South Vietnamese.

5. One further point of interest made by Hoey had to do with the timing of the elections in South Vietnam. He said it was becoming apparent that, when reference was made by Diem and his associates to elections "this year", they had in mind the current Buddhist year, which ends on February 12, 1956. The State Department would therefore not be surprised if elections were delayed beyond the end of December and took place early in the new year as we know it.

6. We shall take whatever opportunities present themselves to pursue this subject with the State Department. It would be useful to us if you could keep us informed of the comments of our own representatives on domestic electoral developments in South Vietnam.

POSSIBILITY OF SPECIAL REPORT OF SOUTH VIETNAMESE
CO-OPERATION UNDER ARTICLE 14(C)

1. Rae has now made a second round of calls to the French, United States and United Kingdom missions and handed over factual memorandum† summarizing present position under Article 14(c), copy of which is going forward to you in the next bag.

2. After seeing Reinhardt and Nam, Rae has reported on the line which Vietnamese wish the French to take with the Commission in order to reduce the volume of 14(c) complaints. Nam complained strongly of Commission practice of "annundating" the South with complaints, many of which, he said, were baseless and raised by DR for propaganda purposes. He wanted onus placed on DR to prove its many charges and has suggested to the French that the French should request Commission to reject:

(a) all petitions which "mettent en cause" the laws and security regulations of Vietnam, and

(b) all petitions which do not at least give the name of the victim, his place of origin, the circumstances of his arrest and "proof that the arrest was for acts committed before the cease fire".

3. The French have not yet forwarded these arguments to the Commission but no doubt will shortly do so. We have already considered the possibilities of screening complaints and discussed the difficulties in our despatch under reference. We are not certain what Nam's point (a) means and are attempting to have it clarified. As for point (b) since the Commission almost never receives a complaint which does not give details of name, place of origin, and circumstances of arrest, to use these tests would not produce a substantial reduction in the number rejected.

4. The heart of the problem is the suggestion that the PAVN should be required to prove that the alleged victim of the reprisal was punished for acts committed before the cease fire. If the PAVN allege that the victim engaged in some form of activity in support of the Vietminh during hostilities and that since cease fire he has been living peacefully in his community the general practice of the Commission is to send the PAVN letter to the French for comments. (The South now contend that the Commission, before taking this initial step should require "proof" from the PAVN.) If the French after getting in touch with the South state that the victim was arrested for offences committed since hostilities, the Commission does not order an independent enquiry through a mobile team but it does not drop the matter. The Commission then requests the French to give particulars as to the nature of the alleged offence and to submit to the Commission from time to time progress reports of judicial proceedings. The purpose of asking for progress reports is to ensure that the victim is in fact tried for the offence alleged and not held indefinitely in jail without trial. If replies are not forthcoming or are unsatisfactory, the Commission may order a mobile team investigation.

5. We have not objected to the procedure outlined above although we fully realise that in effect the PAVN supplies no proof that the victim was a resistance worker and is suffering reprisals for his activities during the hostilities, beyond their own allegation. We have considered the matter carefully and do not see what kind of proof on these points it would be reasonable to ask the PAVN to supply.

6. I propose to point out these difficulties to the French and Vietnamese during the Commission's forthcoming visit to Saigon and to argue that since the Commission has no practical way of ejecting PAVN charges on the grounds that Nam proposes, the answer is for the South to reply promptly when a complain is referred to them, stating that the person in question was arrested for an offence committed after the cease fire. Before doing so and before the matter is again considered in the Commission, however, I would appreciate your guidance on how much proof the PAVN should be required to submit to the Commission before a charge is referred to the French for comments.

7. The Commission will be in Saigon between November 22 and December 3. Could your comments be sent to Saigon and repeated to Hanoi.

ARTICLE 14(C)

It seems to us that if the Commission is to accept any scheme for reducing the volume of 14(c) complaints it must first satisfy itself that a large proportion of these complaints are without foundation and have obviously been advanced for propaganda purposes. Your very useful despatches on the 14(c) problem do not indicate the extent to which recent PAVN complaints have been substantiated. If a large number of these recent complaints have not been substantiated and if the flow of complaints continues at an undiminished rate, the Commission would have adequate grounds for reconsidering its whole procedure for dealing with these complaints in order to ensure that it is relieved from future abuse of its facilities.

2. This is in effect what was achieved in relation to the many third party petitions which were filed by the PAVN under 14(d) alleging forced evacuation: whatever the status of these petitions now, they have in fact been shelved simply because a representative sample of them was found to be baseless.

3. The South Vietnamese — or the French on their behalf — will not be in a good position to demand additional supporting evidence for alleged 14(c) violations as long as there is a sizeable backlog of uncleared cases. To improve prospects of the Commission's accepting these recommendations it would seem desirable that any request from the French for a revision in Commission procedures for handling 14(c) cases should be preceded by a wholesale effort on the part of the South Vietnamese to clear the book of unfinished cases as quickly as possible.

4. Once it has been established that the great majority of 14(c) cases are without foundation, it should be possible for the Commission to take up suggestions for new methods of dealing with 14(c) complaints and to reduce its activities in this field (a) by omitting or reducing its present follow-up procedure and (b) by demanding in future more and better supporting evidence from the PAVN.

5. With regard to (a) above, the present follow up procedure seems to be based on the assumption that the authorities in the southern zone, when once charged with a violation of 14(c), are presumed likely to be guilty until the record of their judicial proceedings in each individual case proves otherwise. It does seem inequitable that the South Vietnamese should be required to prove themselves innocent of reprisal or discrimination every time the Viet Minh makes a simple allegation of a violation. Possibly a satisfactory reply from the South Vietnamese could be regarded as closing the case in the absence of compelling fresh evidence that discrimination is being practised through unusual delay in bringing the case to trial or excessively severe sentences inconsistent with the earlier South Vietnamese explanation.

6. We agree that it is difficult to see what additional proof of discrimination the PAVN can reasonably be expected to produce. On the other hand the South Vietnamese — if they are being victimized by an organized campaign of false or exaggerated charges — have the right to expect some protection from the Commission, and it is difficult to see how this protection can be afforded except through requirements for more and better supporting evidence for charges made. Additional details might be required under the heading of "circumstances of arrest" which would give a more dependable basis to a violation charge. If evidence produced is of the type found groundless in previous cases it might be dismissed. We have not had an opportunity to think this problem through and at the moment have no additional concrete suggestions to make.

7. Looking at the problem broadly, however, we believe it to be intolerable that the internal security measures of the South Vietnamese and their judicial procedures should be subject to constant Commission scrutiny merely on the basis of PAVN allegations. We also doubt that the Commission would be advancing its general usefulness by continuing to accept uncritically an unending succession of PAVN charges under this article. We have the impression that the Indians as well as ourselves would welcome a relief from this situation, but that they feel bound to press on as long as there is a distinct lack of cooperation on the part of the South Vietnamese. It surely should not be difficult for the South Vietnamese to dispose speedily of most of the charges by stating simply that the individuals concerned have been arrested for common law offences and that no discrimination was involved. With this degree of cooperation from the South Vietnamese, the Indians might be induced to drop the present follow-up procedure except in cases where fresh evidence is advanced by the PAVN of discrimination in the form of no trial or excessive sentence.

8. The foregoing ideas are based on the assumption that the South Vietnamese can be induced to clear 14(c) cases quickly — something that in the long run will cause them a good deal less trouble than a continued reluctance to co-operate with the Commission. You will no doubt make this point to them during your visit to Saigon.

Note du sous-secrétaire d'État adjoint aux Affaires extérieures

Memorandum by Assistant Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

[Ottawa], November 30, 1955

For a number of reasons it is time to look again at the long-term prospects in Asia and to examine our policies in Indochina in the light of these prospects. Important decisions on the role of the Commissions will have to be taken in the near future, and our policies should be shaped with ultimate purposes in mind.

2. It is difficult at this point to forecast Communist strategy following the latest Geneva Conference, but it is probable, if by no means certain, that this policy will continue both in Europe and Asia to be cautious, yielding nothing but avoiding provocation.<sup>41</sup> This is what the Russians mean by co-existence, which, as Khrushchev said to the Minister, they will force us to accept.<sup>42</sup> It is probable, of course, that Communist policy in Asia will be more dynamic than in Europe. It is likely to be cautious nevertheless, exploiting opportunities for peaceful subversion and penetration, as the Communist leaders know that the dangers of war, fear of which has inspired their present policies, are equally terrible if the war starts in Asia rather than in Europe.

3. It would seem, therefore, that the best we can hope for in Asia for some time to come is co-existence along the present boundaries. This is not very satisfactory, and it leaves Korea, Formosa, Vietnam and Laos in a dangerously unsettled condition, but it is better than war and it is better than demoralized retreat before creeping Communism. It allows us to go on the offensive in economic and ideological terms, but it requires a prudent approach to anything in the nature of an offensive military posture. Leaving aside the last resort of nuclear weapons, the West is in the weak military position in Asia, and it is in our interest, therefore, not to provoke or to frighten the Communists into military advance. What is required, therefore, is that we should hold firm, maintain a reasonable attitude towards any preferred negotiations and recognize that although we may have to demand Communist concessions in order to keep the record straight we should not count on any of these being made except in reciprocity for concessions on our part.

4. The Communist military offensive in Asia has been dormant since the achievement of armistice agreements in Korea and Indochina. (Their offensive gestures against Formosa last winter must be classified as irredentism rather than expansionist aggression.) These two agreements, therefore, and the Commissions which they established, are basic instruments of the détente which exists at the moment and which it is in our interest to preserve. Because they represented compromises by both sides and were tokens, therefore, of the willingness of both sides to stop the fighting in Asia, the two armistice agreements and the Commissions have significance beyond the territorial limits of Korea and Indochina. The

This idea is developed more fully in Document 213.

denunciation or deterioration of either of these agreements might put an end to the détente. It is not that the Communists in Korea or Indochina are scrupulously observing the terms of either armistice, or, for that matter, that the record of the non-Communist régimes in these countries, though much better, is not perfect either. Nevertheless, they have accepted the armistice in principle in that they have not resumed the fighting, and this, from our point of view, is what is most important.

5. On the Communist side, great importance is attached to the Western acceptance of the armistices, and any moves by the West to do away with the armistice structure would be viewed with deepest suspicion and might promote dangerous reactions. They would probably be prepared to tolerate such tacit violations of the armistices on our part as the reduction of teams in Korea or postponement of the elections in Vietnam provided that we did not give indication that we wanted to render the armistice ineffective — by the withdrawal of non-Communist members from one of the Commissions, for example.

6. In this delicate structure of co-existence, the international supervisory commissions play an important role. It is a role which could well be extended if we are to achieve a state of co-existence throughout the world. Eventually, some kind of supervisory commission might be invoked to settle even the question of Formosa. We must bear in mind therefore the present and future importance of the principle of supervisory commissions in considering any policies which would destroy the commissions now at work. It is for this reason that we have been unhappy about American policy towards the Neutral Nations Supervisory Commission in Korea. We don't minimize the nature of Communist provocation. We certainly don't pretend that the Commission is carrying out satisfactorily the duties allotted to it and we are therefore prepared to accept changes in the Commission's structure. Nevertheless, we think that the effect of unilateral U.S. or U.N. action to remove the Commission altogether might have very dangerous repercussions. The Commissions, whether they are carrying out their specific functions very satisfactorily or not, remain as symbols of international responsibility and serve therefore as an important deterrent. In Communist terms, furthermore, they represent the core of a bargain reached with the West and a bargain is the only kind of agreement to which they will remain faithful — or at least relatively so.

7. The effect of this threat to the Korean Armistice in Korea itself is pretty obvious. What we are directly concerned with is the effect on Indochina where the shoe is on the other foot. In Vietnam, it is the Indians who are dissatisfied with the Commission and threatening to withdraw from it. The Americans (after some persuasion on our part) have become strong advocates of the retention of the Commission, however unsatisfactory its performance on the details of the armistice agreement. In Cambodia, the Americans would like to finish off the Commission, but in Laos they would certainly not want to do away with it as yet. There are of course quite different situations in all these countries, and in Cambodia there is some hope of ending the Commission legitimately and by mutual agreement. Nevertheless the Western attitude towards commissions has tended to vary in accordance with the degree to which they seemed to be serving our purpose or that of the Communists. If, however, it is true that the commissions are related in the minds of the Communists, then U.S. policy toward the N.N.S.C. should be tempered by awareness of the repercussions in Vietnam and Laos. (See Tokyo Letter No. 1161 of November 12† for evidence of the connection which exists in the Polish mind.)

8. There are of course sound arguments for ad hoc policies in the four countries of Asia where there are now supervisory commissions. Nevertheless, there are political reasons for viewing them in relation to each other and as part of the delicate fabric of peace in Asia. The connection between Korea and Indochina has already been mentioned. Even more important for us is the connection between the roles of the Commissions in Vietnam and in Laos and to a lesser extent in Cambodia. We have good legal grounds for arguing that the three armistice agreements are quite separate and that the roles of the Commissions must vary greatly. It is not suggested that we should abandon this correct position in our arguments in the Commissions. Nevertheless, it would be folly on our part to ignore the fact that the Communists are deliberately balancing Laos and Vietnam, and that the Indians tend to look at the political realities of Southeast Asia rather than the terms of the written agreements. Furthermore, public opinion throughout the world, less mindful of the legalities than the Department of External Affairs, is inclined to think roughly that what the Commission does in Vietnam, it should do in Laos and vice versa. Even if we disagreed in principle with this conception, we should have to come to terms with it because of the necessity of trying constantly to associate the Indians with us in all three countries.

9. It should also be said that there is some historical justification for the conception of the Geneva Agreements as a package deal. It was a nasty bargain accepted by all parties as the only way to avoid a dangerous conflagration. It can be justified only as such; its terms are not based on great moral or legal principles. A deadlock was reached in the middle of the Geneva Conference which was broken when Chou En-Lai made privately to Eden concessions which were recognized at the time as meaning that the Communists were prepared to allow Laos and Cambodia to join the neutral bloc if Vietnam could be allowed to proceed in due course and by the most respectable methods into the Communist camp. We are not obliged to recognize this bargain to the extent of considering that South Vietnam should now be pushed into the arms of Ho Chi Minh, but we should constantly remember that the Communists see the Geneva Agreements in these terms and can be negotiated with further only on these terms. We can proclaim, as we undoubtedly should for the record, that it is entirely wrong for the Viet Minh to use the Pathet Lao as a means of securing their aims in Vietnam but we must not expect to achieve anything thereby.

10. It follows from the above arguments that the urgent steps pending in Laos must be taken with the situation in Vietnam in mind. In Laos, our friends, the Americans in particular, are pressing us strongly to find the Pathet Lao guilty and refer our findings to the Co-Chairmen. We have ourselves been proceeding in this direction because it has seemed the only honest thing to do, but we have been trying consistently to remind the Americans that although such a reference to the Co-Chairmen may satisfy our consciences, it is not likely to move us much closer to the unification of Laos, which is our primary concern. The British are more aware of this problem because they are on the receiving end of reports to the Co-Chairmen and only too well aware of the unlikelihood of Messrs. MacMillan and Molotov delivering up Phong Saly and Sam Neua. We must bear in mind, furthermore, that in Vietnam the last thing we want at this moment is a reference to the Co-Chairmen. We do not want a reference concerned with 14(e) because the South Vietnamese would inevitably come out the worse. We would refuse a reference to the Co-Chairmen on the question of electoral consultations because this is not the Commission's business, but we know that this question could not be ignored if there were to be serious talks between the Co-Chairmen on the situation in Vietnam. It seems almost certain, furthermore, that if we were to succeed in getting a majority reference from Vientiane which condemned the Pathet Lao, the Communists would retaliate by tossing Diem's "failure" to enter electoral consultations into the negotiations. We should thereby be forcing the Communists to raise a dangerous question which they have for some time now been prepared not to agitate.

11. To compromise at this point in Laos will be difficult and may upset our friends, particularly the Americans, unless we are able to get them to understand the need to look at Indochina or indeed all Asia as a whole and to agree that there is more at stake than scoring points against the Communists. Such a compromise will be only one of many, if we are to continue balancing on the Indochinese tightrope. Yet we must bear in mind constantly that it is in our interest to hang on tight, to avoid controversies, to lie low and accept the best bargains possible. We may have to accept the de facto separation of Indochina into five rather than three states, never admitting that the condition is permanent but accepting the reality. (It may be that Laos will be healthier with the Communists confined to two minor provinces divorced from the body politic.)

12. One of the most serious consequences from our point of view of these tentative conclusions about the prospects of peace is that the Commissions may last a long time. Even in Cambodia we might have to ask ourselves whether we could force the issue lest we affect the delicate balance on which the essential commissions in Vietnam and Laos rest. We might of course consider a reduction in numbers, but, so long as the commissions are performing even perfunctorily their obligations, it is difficult to reduce them very much without placing an intolerable load on those who remain. The best we could hope for would be to do away with fixed teams in all three countries, as we are now seeking to do in Cambodia, and to depend entirely on mobile teams based at headquarters. Such teams would be unable to perform effectively the tasks allotted to them, but it is doubtful how effective they have been even at full strength in such tasks as supervising the Chinese frontier or investigating complaints under 14(e). In order to maintain the Armistice it might be sufficient merely to have the commissions in existence and in situ as symbols of international concern. This, however, could be a humiliating position in which we would be pretending to do something which we were not in fact carrying out. It goes against our grain to accept frustration and ineffectiveness, and it would be difficult to maintain the morale of our forces if they were required to do nothing but participate in a shadow play. The unhappy dilemma in which we are placed is that there are abundant reasons for our seeking to get the Commissions out of Indochina as soon as possible but on the other hand it would be a terrible responsibility to break the delicate structure on which the peace of Asia might depend.

LÉGER-ROBERTSON DISCUSSION ON INDOCHINA

At the meeting of consultation on Dec. 5<sup>43</sup> it was agreed that the Under-Secretary and Walter Robertson should continue their discussion on Indochina in a separate meeting. This took place on Dec. 6. We shall forward a full report on this meeting in due course.<sup>44</sup> This telegram will touch only on the highlights of the conversation.

2. Léger indicated that the nature of the Commission's work in Vietnam was changing and that probably the main problems to be faced now centred on the relations between the Diem government and the Vietminh government. It was understood that the United States and Canadian governments shared a common interest in maintaining the Commission. It was apparent that, if the Commission was to continue, ways and means had to be found of keeping the Indians on the Commission. We were both aware that the Indians were unhappy with the lack of co-operation offered by the Diem government and that they might withdraw from the Commission in the next few months. We knew that the United States Ambassador in Saigon was urging on Diem the advantages of displaying a more co-operative attitude towards the Commission and on the elections issue.

3. Canadian experience on the Indochina commissions and the recent discussions in New Delhi between Mr. Pearson and Mr. Nehru, (Léger continued) had led us to appreciate the real connection between the situations in Vietnam and Laos insofar as the commissions had to deal with them. The Canadian government would prefer to have the commissions operate independently in the two states and under their separate terms of reference. It was a fact, however, that the other interested parties, the Chinese communists on the one hand and the Indians on the other, viewed the two situations as related parts of a larger problem. For this reason, in the Canadian view, decisions taken in Laos might precipitate a crisis with respect to Vietnam and Indian withdrawal from the commissions. The Canadian Commissioner would continue to press insofar as it was possible for a satisfactory finding in Laos. The Canadian government, however, hesitated to have him press too far too fast for fear of creating a situation which would result in the Commission's departure from the scene and a serious deterioration in the situation.

4. Robertson said that, while United States authorities realized why the communists wished to connect the settlements in Vietnam and Laos, there was not, in the United States view, any justification for linking the agreements. The different situations in the two countries were recognized even at the Geneva Conference and separate agreements had been worked out. It concerned the United States that the Commission in Laos was not able to make some statement to strengthen the Royal government position. The result was that the Pathet Lao, a dissident element, were put on the same basis as the Royal government and the situation was made to appear as that of two equal authorities trying to mediate a dispute.

5. So far as Vietnam was concerned Robertson was sure that we were familiar with the United States efforts to convince Diem to be more co-operative. Diem, however, had grown in stature in part by reason of his defiance of Western advisers. Vietnam had been divided at Geneva by alien powers — the Chinese communists and the French. The South Vietnamese were psychopathic on this point and had no intention of falling into the election trap. If elections "on the Geneva model" were carried out, South Vietnam would automatically be turned over to the Communists. On the other hand, some progress had been made in convincing Diem to correspond on the subject with the Vietminh. Robertson said he did not believe Diem would make any further decisions on the election question until after the National Assembly was convened in the South. The United States would continue the present policy of encouraging Diem to exchange views with the Vietminh on the holding of free elections. Diem was not amenable, however, to other people's opinions when he thought he was right, and the United States had no power to force Diem to do something to which he was unalterably opposed.

6. Robertson said the United States regarded the Commission's continued presence in Vietnam a "constructive and contributory factor towards stability". The United States would be disturbed if the Commission were to be disbanded. Nevertheless, consideration had to be given to "how far one could go". It was the United States objective to do everything consistent with honour and principle to avoid war in this area as elsewhere. It did not seem likely that the Vietminh would pick conditions such as existed now, (i.e., with the presence of a Commission on which there was a Communist representative), to start fighting.

7. Léger said it seemed that Canadian and United States views did not diverge on the basic issues in Indochina. It seemed further that we did not disagree that a link existed between the commissions' problems in Vietnam and Laos. Our positions would be identical if we could agree that the Canadian Representative should always go as far as the Indian traffic would bear. He had wanted to put before the State Department the Canadian worry that, if we were to go further, the Indians might withdraw and the commissions would collapse.

8. You have now provided us with material elaborating the Canadian position set out by the Under-Secretary (e.g., your telegram G-2049 of Dec. 1†) and we shall take what opportunities are offered us to "persuade the State Department that it would be folly on our part to allow the Communists alone to plan their strategy with the whole of Indochina in mind".

CONFIDENTIAL. IMPORTANT.

ARTICLE 14(C)

Your telegram under reference and suggestions concerning new procedure to operate Commission activity in handling 14(c) cases would appear to be based on two main premises:

- (a) The Commission must first satisfy itself that large proportions of DR complaints are without foundation and have been advanced for propaganda purposes.
- (b) That there should first be a concerted effort by the French and South Vietnamese to clear the book of unfinished cases as quickly as possible.

2. It must be recognized that neither of these conditions has yet been satisfied. Although a number of replies have been received from French in answer to DR complaints referred by Commission, Commission is not on solid ground in stating that the PAVN is merely waging a propaganda campaign. The South's record on basis of team investigations covering the early period of the agreement has been a bad one and only a handful of the cases raised since August 1 have proven to be unfounded. In the overwhelming majority of new cases the Commission has received no substantive information from the South. The absence of this information in spite of repeated requests from the Commission and our own persistent informal efforts in Saigon, tends to lend colour to the DR charges. While we are well aware of the propaganda aspects of present emphasis on 14(c) we are also aware that in the interests of internal security in South Vietnam, there has been a concerted programme of anti-communist action involving many arrests throughout the country. Some at least of these arrests no doubt warrant investigation as possible violations of Article 14(c). Further, in the anti-communist report of the South we do not believe that such arrests will cease, and despite our continuing pressure on the South Vietnamese to cooperate with the Commission in this and other matters, we have no definite indication that they will in fact do so.

3. It must also be recognized that there is no formal request before the Commission for any new procedure to moderate Commission action with respect to Article 14(c). The actual position is that the agenda is overloaded with new charges and complaints, and requests for follow up procedures on previous cases which have been taken up with the French. The cumulative effect if the recent trend is allowed to go unchecked is that the fifth and sixth interim reports will contain severe criticism of South Vietnam. In this connection if any initiative is to be taken on the lines of the views expressed in paragraphs four to seven of your telegram under reference this must presumably be done by the Canadian Delegation. We are quite prepared and indeed anxious to do so, and at an early date to make clear our views as to the general policy which we consider should be followed in handling 14(c) cases. Such a statement in the Commission might include the following points:

(a) The Canadian Delegation objects in principle to [the?] [Commission's?] present procedures for handling 14(c) cases [which?] imply that the South cannot be trusted to try and sentence a former Viet Minh supporter fairly when he has been arrested for a common law offence unless the Commission keeps intervening;

(b) The procedures are impractical because the Commission does not have enough people to deal thoroughly with each case, nor has it experts competent to make a meaningful assessment of whether a trial has been fair according to the standard of North or South Vietnam;

(c) We propose that arrests for common law offences should not be followed up unless new evidence is brought forward to indicate that a formal support of either party is either being held in jail without trial or has received an excessive sentence;

(d) We have grave doubt about the régime of "democratic liberty" in the North, but because of the Commission's restrictive interpretation of Article 14(c) cannot intervene. The consequence therefore is that the Commission's activities and efforts tend to be wholly "unequal" (previous word in quotes received corrupt. Appears as was received.) and to give a distorted picture of the true situation with respect to democratic liberties in Vietnam.

4. You will recognize that we shall certainly face Polish opposition and possibly Indian opposition as well in putting forward these proposals. Further, to abandon the question the statement of the South that action is being taken against individuals on common law charges will prevent us from following up the few cases which we have been able to muster in the North, e.g. the case of Sister Toan, who was arrested at Phat Diem ostensibly on grounds of stealing church property. Despite these disadvantages, however, we consider [that?] the time has now come for a determined effort on our part to [?] the scope of the Commission's efforts in dealing with [these?] allegations. Before proceeding, however, I thought it essential to draw the present situation to your attention and request your final instructions. As you will recognize the obligations of this course are that at a subsequent stage we would probably be forced into taking up a public minority position with respect to 14(c) as has been necessary in the case of 14(d).<sup>45</sup>

THE NEXT MOVE IN VIETNAM

Mr. Holmes' memorandum of November 30 entitled "Canadian Objectives in Indo-China" (copy attached) indicates the general lines along which we should move in Indo-China in the next few months.<sup>46</sup> The purpose of this memorandum is to consider the major immediate problem facing us in Vietnam, and to seek your approval for a course of action to deal with it.

2. The immediate problem in Vietnam is the future of the International Commission — should it be kept in being despite the anomalies of its present position and despite the virtual certainty that there will be no political settlement in the foreseeable future to replace the present military settlement which the Commission is charged to supervise? These two factors affecting the Commission's future have become linked and there is no need to consider them separately.

3. However bad a bargain the Geneva settlement may have been, and however unworkable its political provisions, it is clearly in our interests and in the interests of our friends that the military armistice which has been achieved should be maintained. Furthermore it is quite clear that the parties are legally obliged to maintain it. The Cease Fire Agreement — concerning the status of which as an international agreement there is no shadow of doubt — does not prescribe any condition under which the provisions of the agreement would be no longer binding on the parties. Furthermore the term of the agreement is not limited by any calendar date. (July 1956 is mentioned only in the Final Declaration.) From the nature of the Geneva settlement as a whole and from the text of the agreement it is clear that the provisions of the Cease Fire Agreement are intended to apply "pending the general elections which will bring about the unification of Vietnam" (Article 14). Until elections and consequent reunification take place, therefore, the parties remain bound by the Cease Fire Agreement, unless they can be relieved of these obligations by entering into some new agreement short of a political settlement which might replace the Cease Fire Agreement. There is an analogy with the situation in Korea.

This text was reconstructed from the best available original. The proposed statement was approved by the Department on December 28, 1955. See Ottawa to Hanoi, Telegram No. Y-555, December 28, 1955, DEA/50052-A-40.

4. The arrangements for international supervision form an integral part of the Cease Fire Agreement, and just as the parties are under legal obligation to observe its provisions on a continuing basis, so the Commission Powers, by virtue of their acceptance of the invitation from the Geneva Conference Powers to form the international commissions, are under a continuing legal obligation to provide the international supervision prescribed in the Cease Fire Agreement until the agreement is superseded by the political settlement envisaged in the Final Declaration or by some other agreement between the parties. Withdrawal of one of the supervisory powers from the Commission prior to one or other of these developments would, therefore, be a technical breach of a legal obligation,<sup>47</sup> and however justifiable on other grounds, would unquestionably affect the sense of legal obligation which the parties to the agreement may have towards the maintenance of the armistice.

5. Quite apart from the legal aspect of the problem, withdrawal of one of the supervisory powers from the Commission could have very far-reaching practical effects which might seriously jeopardize the maintenance of the armistice. In his memorandum Mr. Holmes has mentioned the value of the Commissions as "symbols of international responsibility" and that they "serve therefore as an important deterrent". It is perhaps only necessary to add here that the military demarcation line in Vietnam, never having been a battle line, lacks the stability of the line in Korea, and without the presence of the International Commission in Vietnam could very quickly become an area of dangerous friction between the two halves of Vietnam, particularly since the South Vietnamese Government exercises very uncertain control in that era.

6. In the light of the foregoing observations recent indications of Indian thinking about the future of the Commission assume an ominous importance. The Indians have made known to us informally on a number of occasions that unless something is done to put the Vietnam Commission on a new and firmer legal basis, they will have to give notice soon (perhaps in March) of their intention to withdraw from the Commission in July.

7. India is the only country concerned with Vietnam which appears to be contemplating action which might threaten the maintenance of the armistice.<sup>48</sup> The communist governments — Poland, the USSR, Communist China and even the Democratic Republic of Vietnam do not appear to wish to disturb unduly the status quo — i.e. continuance of the armistice and stalemate on the political settlement.<sup>49</sup> In varying degrees they have demanded that South Vietnam get on with the electoral consultations, but none of them has made any threats, either implicit or explicit, of dire consequences if the South Vietnamese do not perform by a certain date. This situation could of course change quickly; but for the present it seems that Mr. Molotov's dilatory attitude last month at Geneva towards Indochinese problems reflects a general inclination on the part of the Communist powers to let things be for the moment.

8. Polish support for the line which the Indians took in the Fourth Interim Report is not necessarily inconsistent with this interpretation: it is probable that the principal reason for the Poles' following the Indian lead in this matter was their desire to step up pressure on the South Vietnamese Government.

Merely to ignore or evade it when they so desire [L.B. Pearson]

9. Basically, the French, British and the Americans all have the same long-term objectives in view in Vietnam: the establishment of a strong non-communist government with a broad national basis. Similarly, the French, U.K. and U.S. governments have the same short-term objective in the sense that none of them wishes to see any reconvening of the Geneva Conference powers or any major reconsideration of the Geneva settlement within the next few months.

10. The South Vietnamese Government's attitude towards the Geneva settlement is fairly clear. Foreign Minister Mau indicated to Mr. Johnson on December 6 that the South Vietnamese Government would not be prepared to assume any specific legal responsibility as successor to the French High Command for any of the residual tasks remaining under the Cease Fire Agreement, or to participate in any new agreement or redefinition of the Geneva settlement. While favourable to the continuance of the International Commission for the time being, the South Vietnamese will take no responsibility for proposing that the Commission should either continue or discontinue with its activities. Like the other governments mentioned above, therefore, the South Vietnamese favour the continuance of the status quo provided they can maintain their attitude of being in no way bound or committed by the Geneva settlement. This attitude is of great value to the Diem régime domestically, but it is also very useful internationally, in that so long as the South Vietnamese refuse to accept responsibility as a participant in the Geneva settlement the other Geneva Conference powers must be responsible. In a sense this ensures that the other Geneva Powers guarantee the armistice and hence the security of South Vietnam.

11. India's motive for advocating a revised settlement and a new set of instructions for the Commission appears to be a desire to escape from continued participation in an arrangement which appears to them to be fraudulent. Recent Communist propaganda has harped on the theme that the South Vietnamese refusal to participate in electoral consultations is an American plot to prevent the Geneva bargain from being completed and to prepare the way for American aggression against the Viet Minh and the Chinese People's Republic. Even if the Indians do not believe this sort of thing they are undoubtedly influenced by it. They are probably afraid that if they do not make some gesture of protest against the continuance of the status quo (and hence the non-fulfilment of the Geneva bargain) they will be regarded by the Russians and the Chinese as having permitted themselves to be "used" by the Americans in frustration of the Geneva settlement.

12. The Indians are probably not unduly dismayed by the fact that the continuance of the status quo in Vietnam prevents the Viet Minh from taking over the whole country. In other words the stalemate in Vietnam as such probably does not bother them much: it is their own apparent collusion in the frustration of the Geneva settlement that seems to upset them. The Commission under Indian chairmanship was asked to do a supervisory job in Vietnam which was originally conceived as the first stage towards a political settlement; this presumptive basis for the task seems to be no longer valid, since it is clear that there is not going to be a political settlement as and when envisaged by the Geneva agreements. Therefore the Indians wish to have a new basis for the continued performance of the supervisory task, or that part of it which will remain to be done after July 1956. They want a marriage ceremony to legitimize the changeling "settlement" which has replaced the settlement originally conceived at Geneva, so that they will not be accused of condoning illegitimacy.

13. Within the Commission the Indians have been pressing for the formal assumption of legal responsibilities under the Geneva Cease Fire Agreement by the South Vietnamese and for a resolution of the difficulties arising out of the refusal of the South Vietnamese to get on with the pre-electoral consultations. Informally and outside the Commission the previous and present Indian Commissioners have been talking about revised terms of reference for the Commission, a redefinition of the Cease Fire settlement, or some alternative arrangement outside the Geneva settlement. The disadvantages of these proposals will be discussed below. In order to exert pressure on the South Vietnamese to assume formal legal responsibilities under the Geneva settlement and, at the same time, in order to force the pace towards a recasting of the Cease Fire settlement the Indians have been talking about withdrawing from the Commission if some move has not been made within the next few months. There is some reason for suspecting that this talk of withdrawal is not much more than a threat — that it is two thirds bluff. It is hard to imagine that India, which values its reputation for responsibility in the international field so highly, and which has a special interest in peaceful conditions in an area so close to its own borders, should seriously contemplate taking a step which would immeasurably increase the threat of renewed hostilities in Indochina.<sup>50</sup>

14. While the threat of Indian withdrawal may be regarded as a ploy to force the revision of the Geneva settlement (or to force the hand of the South Vietnamese) it would certainly not be wise for the governments concerned to force India to the point of having to decide whether or not to carry out this threat. In other words it is in the interests of Canada and other friendly governments to respond to Indian pressure and to seek a solution to the present impasse which will preserve the armistice and enable the Indians to carry on their supervisory task with a clear conscience, and to do this before the Indians take too rigid a position as to what they will accept as a condition for their carrying on.

15. From conversations which Mr. Johnson has had with Mr. Desai and Mr. Parthasarathi the Indians are thinking mainly of new terms of reference for the Commission which would define its continuing tasks and provide the Commission with a more satisfactory legal "sanction" for the performance of its tasks. Mr. Desai has also suggested that if this would not be acceptable to the South Vietnamese some arrangement outside the Geneva settlement might be worked out. From conversations which Mr. Johnson has had with Foreign Minister Mau of South Vietnam, we know that such solutions would not be acceptable to his government.

16. There are other considerations, however, which militate against a solution along the lines mooted by Mr. Desai, and since the Indians are unlikely to be sympathetic to South Vietnamese obduracy on this point, it is perhaps desirable that particular attention should be paid to these other considerations in any discussions which we have with the Indians on the solution to the present problem.

17. If the Commission powers were to ask the Geneva Conference for new terms of reference for the Commission, they would in fact be demanding a renegotiation of the whole package deal of the Geneva settlement, since it would be impossible to alter one aspect of the settlement without bringing the whole range of it into the bargaining. Renegotiation of the whole settlement, particularly under the threat of Indian withdrawal from the Commission with the consequent prospect of the collapse of the International inspection system,<sup>51</sup> would introduce a dangerous element of fluidity into the Indochinese situation at a time when the stabilizing influence of the armistice itself, and particularly the steady effect of the ISC would be most necessary.

how effective is it in any case? [L.B. Pearson]

18. Furthermore, a request for new terms of reference for the Commission would in effect be a demand that the unrealistic nature of the political settlement for Vietnam outlined in the Final Declaration be openly recognized and that it be replaced with a more realistic programme for a political settlement. The drafting of a realistic programme would mean that most of the high-sounding objectives of the Final Declaration would have to go out the window. Sensible as such a project might be, it must be recognized that it would be tantamount to asking the Viet Minh to surrender their birthright for a mess of pottage. For their own domestic political reasons the Viet Minh have interpreted the political settlement provisions of the Final Declaration as virtually their title deed to the whole of Vietnam, and we can be quite sure that they would resist to the uttermost any attempts to part them from it. Even though they cannot get delivery on the political half of the Geneva bargain they still have an unfulfilled claim which will have a continuing value for them both domestically and internationally. A renegotiation of the Geneva settlement in more realistic terms would require a modification of the bargain — something which the Viet Minh could never accept and in which the Communist Chinese and the Russians could hardly acquiesce. This is a most important consideration which the Indians do not appear to have taken into account.

19. The conclusion is inescapable that the Indian idea of new terms of reference for the Commission is impracticable, and that it is essential to get along somehow with the half settlement we already have. The problem, therefore, reduces itself to finding some "obscure formula" (as Mr. Macmillan put it) which can be accepted for the time being by all the Geneva Conference Powers — as well as the Commission powers — in such a manner as to give the Commission the necessary sanction to carry out such residual tasks as may remain after July 1956 "pending the general elections which will bring about the re-unification of Vietnam".<sup>52</sup>

20. Possibly the best way to do this would be for the Commission Powers to make a report to the Geneva Conference Powers which would require little more than assent by silence to preserve the present framework of the armistice and international supervision of it. The Commission powers might, for instance, report to the co-Chairmen that most of the provisions of the Cease Fire Agreement have been carried out, might indicate the nature of the residual tasks (supervision of the demilitarized zone, supervision of the entry and departure of military personnel and military equipment, supervision of residual tasks under Articles 14(c) and 14(d) and then continue in the following vein:

In accepting membership on the International Supervisory Commission the Supervisory Powers acted on the assumption that their responsibilities would terminate shortly after July 1956, by which time the political settlement envisaged in the Final Declaration of the Geneva Conference was to replace the armistice settlement. Developments since July 1955 suggest that it may not be possible to bring the political settlement into effect by the date originally conceived. Until such time as a political settlement is agreed upon and put into effect by the competent representative authorities of the two zones of Vietnam, the Cease Fire Agreement will remain in effect. With the consent of the Geneva Conference Powers and in the absence of any fresh directive from them, the Commission Powers will continue to perform the supervisory tasks<sup>53</sup> assigned to them in the

how long? [L.B. Pearson]

Cease Fire Agreement, subject to such reductions in the activities of the Commission as may be agreed upon in accordance with Article 46 of the Cease Fire Agreement.

21. Anything but outright rejection of such a proposal could be regarded as the assent of the Geneva Conference Powers, including the South Vietnamese. Given such assent it could be assumed that all the Geneva Conference Powers recognize — albeit tacitly — the unworkability of the existing programme for a political settlement but wish to see the armistice continue in effect. The door would not be closed to initiatives from any quarter for the working out of the first stages of a political settlement, but the armistice itself and the international supervisory system linked with it would be confirmed by all the parties concerned.

22. Selling this project to the Indians will be a difficult task and may require repeated efforts at persuasion over a considerable period. It would be desirable to concentrate the main effort of persuasion in New Delhi, particularly as Mr. Desai, whose recent experience in Vietnam is likely to make him more amenable to our line of argument than the new Commissioner, Mr. Parthasarathi, will be occupying a key position in the Indian Ministry of External Affairs.

23. We would propose to ask Mr. Reid to raise the following points with the Indians:

(a) Desirability of maintaining the armistice as an essential prerequisite for peace in the area (perhaps with some allusion to the probability of a much more active role for the United States and SEATO in the area should the armistice settlement begin to come apart);

(b) Legal obligation of the Supervisory Powers to continue their task, and the bad moral effect of renegeing on these obligations;

(c) Impracticability of a request to the Geneva Conference Powers for new terms of reference for the Commission with special reference to the probable attitude of the Viet Minh;

(d) Comparison with Korea, where the armistice was based on the assumption of a political settlement which is still a long way off, but is nevertheless reasonably stable;

(e) Comparison of the practical cooperation of the South Vietnamese with the Commission with the vociferous opposition of the South Koreans to the NNSC;

(f) Comparison with the situation in Laos, where a roughly parallel situation also clearly requires the continued presence of the International Commission.

We would propose to enlist the support and cooperation of the British in this démarche.

24. You will be aware that one feature of the plan outlined above is that it will not enable us to terminate our commitment in Indochina in the near future. Given the long term objectives of our own policy in the area and those of other friendly governments this seems inescapable. We should, perhaps, be able to take another look at this aspect of the problem in another eight or nine months. Once we have passed the magic date of July 1956 and all governments concerned get accustomed to regarding the political settlement provisions of the Geneva settlement as a dormant letter, the armistice should achieve something of the stalemate stability that we have in Germany and Korea, and we will be able to contemplate with more equanimity the withering away of the International Commission.

25. Meanwhile, in conjunction with our discussions with the Indians as suggested above, we would propose to carry out an intensive review of the Commission's residual tasks after July 1956 with a view to reaching agreement on the maximum possible reduction in the Commission's activities consonant with the maintenance of the armistice and the international supervisory system.

26. Your authority is requested to prepare instructions for Mr. Reid to begin discussions with the Indians along the lines suggested, and for Mr. Robertson to take the matter up with the United Kingdom.

U.S. MILITARY AID AGREEMENT WITH CAMBODIA

As the text of the Agreement<sup>55</sup> was just received late this Friday afternoon, we are able to offer at this time only the preliminary views of the Legal Division on the two specific points raised by the Indian Chairman which are mentioned in your telegram No. 68.

2. Legal Division's preliminary views are as follows:

Clause (c) of Footnote

This clause is not inconsistent with the Cease Fire Agreement<sup>56</sup> (and specifically Article 7 of that Agreement) for these reasons:

A summary report on Commission activities until this point can be found in Document 593, paragraph 21.

<sup>55</sup> Voir/See United States, Department of State, United States Treaties and Other International Agreements, 1955, Volume 6, Part 1, Washington: United States Government Printing Office, 1956, pp. 995-1006.

<sup>56</sup> Pour le texte intégral de l'accord de cessez-le-feu au Cambodge que devait surveiller la CISC, voir France, Ministère des Affaires étrangères, Conférence de Genève sur l'Indochine (8 mai-21 juillet 1954), Paris: Imprimerie nationale, 1955, pp. 427-442.
For the complete text of the ceasefire agreement for Cambodia that the ICSC was to supervise, see United Kingdom, Parliamentary Papers, Cmd. 9239, Further Documents relating to the discussion of Indo-China at the Geneva Conference June 16-July 21, 1954, London: Her Majesty's Stationery Office, 1954, pp. 11-18.

The undertaking by Cambodia to make a full contribution "to the development and maintenance of its own defensive strength and the defensive strength of the free world" is merely an assertion of the inherent right of individual or collective self-defence recognised in Article 51 of the [U.N.] charter.

This undertaking on the part of Cambodia does not, in our opinion, constitute a military alliance not in conformity with the principles of the Charter nor does it embody any obligation to establish bases on Cambodian territory for the military forces of foreign powers. Further it should be noted that Cambodia undertakes, in para. 4 to utilize the equipment and materials furnished under the Aid Agreement "solely for the maintenance of its internal security and legitimate defence of its territory".

Para. 2 of Annex A

We take it that the objection is to Cambodia permitting the passage through Cambodian territory of United States military aid material destined for other countries. This does not conflict with the provisions of Article 7 because, in cases such as this, the Government of Cambodia would not itself be soliciting foreign aid. There is no provision in the Cambodian Agreement (along the lines of Article 9 of the Laos Agreement) which could be interpreted as prohibiting the passage through Cambodia of war material. Even if there were, there would not be a violation of the Cease-fire Agreement until such time as war materials were brought into the country.

3. Please keep us informed. We shall forward you as soon as possible the further views of the Legal Division but do not necessarily wait for these before giving our preliminary views to the other Commissioners.

UNITED STATES-CAMBODIA MILITARY AID AGREEMENT

The Chairman of the International Commission in Cambodia was given a copy of this Agreement on May 23 and the Commission has been examining it to determine whether it is entirely consistent with the relevant provisions of the Cease-fire Agreement. At first the Chairman was concerned about paragraph nine but later he was more concerned about clause (c) of the footnote to the second paragraph of the introduction which ends "and the defensive strength of the free world", and with the second sub-para. of para. two of Annex A. The Chairman and the Polish Commissioner have been pressing for an interview with the Cambodian Government to express the Commission's concern with these two points. We have already repeated to you the text of our preliminary telegram No. 54 of May 28 to Phnom Penh.

2. Please inform the State Department along the lines of para. one and ask whether they have a specific Legal Opinion on the compatibility of the Military Aid Agreement with the relevant provisions of the Cease-fire Agreement (in particular, Article 7). If they have one, we would like to see it to supplement our own legal opinion which we are now preparing.

3. You might inform the State Department that on May 14 Ambassador McClintock informally assured the Indian Chairman and our Acting Commissioner that "all concerned were careful not to contravene the terms of the Geneva Agreement". However, we were not shown the Agreement before it was signed nor have we any report from our Delegation that any prior detailed discussion was held with the American Embassy or with the Cambodian Government on the relationship of specific clauses of the Military Aid Agreement to Article 7 of the Cease-fire Agreement. Hence we would like to have the benefit of any paper which the Americans may have produced on this question. You might also, if you consider it advisable, hint that it would have been particularly helpful if some advance discussion had been held with us or, at least, if we could have been shown a copy of the Agreement in advance. If consideration is being given to concluding an agreement with Laos (the relevant provisions of the Laos Cease-fire Agreement are much more restrictive than are those of the Cambodian Agreement) our Delegation will have to be very carefully briefed beforehand. As the Americans are aware, the Poles automatically raise objections to these Agreements and, what is more worrisome, the Indians are viewing them with some concern.

4. Because of its length, we are sending you by bag a copy of telegram No. 67 of May 23† from Vientiane which contains the text of the Military Aid Agreement. No doubt you can obtain a copy from the State Department and so you need not wait for the bag.

UNITED STATES-CAMBODIA MILITARY AID AGREEMENT

We discussed on May 31 the contents of your telegram under reference with Hoey and Purnell of the State Department's office of Southeast Asian Affairs. They said that they did not, repeat not, at the moment have in the State Department a clear copy of the agreement in its final form. The original draft had gone from the State Department but over the almost four months of negotiation numerous changes had been made. While these changes were known to the State Department, they had not been drawn together into a revised document. The State Department expected to receive sometime this week by pouch a copy of the agreement as finally concluded. The State Department had not believed there was any urgency in having the final text in Washington.

2. Hoey said that as soon as the final text had been received he would be glad to ask the State Department's legal adviser for opinions on the points which are raised in your telegram under reference. He believed, however, that the reply would be in general terms. As various points had arisen in the course of the negotiation of the agreement with the Cambodians, the Legal Adviser's Office had participated in the opinions sent from Washington. It had been taken for granted that nothing would be included in the agreement which would constitute a violation of the Geneva accords. Presumably, therefore, the Legal Adviser's opinion would be simply that the agreement did not contravene the Geneva agreement. There was nothing in it; (a) which obligated Cambodia "to enter into a military alliance not in conformity with the principles of the charter of the UN"; (b) which provided for the establishment of bases on Cambodian territory; or (c) which constituted a Cambodian acceptance of foreign aid for other than the effective defence of its territory. So far as Hoey was aware, therefore, on all of these specific points the agreement was in harmony with Article 7 of the Cambodian cease-fire agreement.

3. Hoey said the new agreement simply brought up to date the mutual defence assistance agreement between the United States, France and the Associated States of December 1950 (treaties and other international acts, series 2447, copies of which you already have.)

4. Hoey showed us a number of recent telegrams from Phnom Penh, one of which reported that the Canadian representative on the International Control Commission had already made known his view in the Commission that nothing in the United States-Cambodian agreement contravened the Geneva accords. Another message which we saw reported that on May 29, the Cambodian Government issued a statement which asserted; (a) that the United States-Cambodian agreement involved neither military bases nor an alliance; (b) that the numbers of the United States MAAG were to be limited to some 30-odd personnel; (c) that the agreement was in complete consonance with the Geneva accords; (d) that Cambodia intended to observe the undertakings given at Bandung by its representatives with respect to its neutrality, and (e) that the agreement, in providing for direct aid to Cambodia (ie, not through the French), in fact represented an enhancement of Cambodia's national independence.

5. Hoey made no direct comment on the rights or wrongs of the International Commission's involving itself in what might be thought of as the internal affairs of Cambodia. By indirection, however, he left the impression that, in the United States view, an agreement such as that recently concluded, which took cognizance of the Geneva agreements, should not be a matter of great concern to the International Commission. He said he believed the Cambodian Government would hold the view strongly that it did not have to account to the International Commission in this instance. He said it occurred to him in addition that if the Commission did believe that it should investigate agreements concerning military aid concluded by Cambodia after the Geneva conference, it should properly examine the agreement concluded in December 1954 between France and Cambodia, which he understood went much further than the United States-Cambodian agreement in providing for French training of Cambodian personnel. The French-Cambodian agreement had never been made public and in fact had never been shown to the United States Government although its main lines were known to United States authorities. The United States-Cambodian agreement will be made public in the normal course of events.

6. Hoey said that consideration had been given some time ago to providing the Canadian Government with a copy of the agreement in advance. It had been decided, however, that such a course of action might embarrass us and might have appeared as an attempt to prejudice the views of the Canadian member of the International Commission. In any case, while United States authorities had guessed that the Poles might automatically raise objections, they had believed that the agreement was so innocuous that there would be no special difficulty in defending the view that the agreement in no way violated the Geneva accords. Hoey went on to say that now that we had expressed an interest in this agreement and in any future agreements which might be considered (e.g. with Laos) there would be no hesitancy on the part of the State Department in bringing us into the picture in advance. (Hoey's explanation seems reasonable to us in that on a number of occasions we have on your instructions made it clear to the State Department that our actions on the Commission must be free of any suggestion of collusion with other interested governments).

7. Hoey said that the attitude of the Indians with respect to the United States-Cambodian agreement caused concern in the State Department. It was difficult to understand what the Indian desires were with respect to Cambodia or, indeed, Laos and South Vietnam. The Indians seemed always suspicious of United States motives but had never made any concrete offer to "share the burden" in that area. The rumoured agreement reached at Bandung between India and China as to Laos and Cambodia being protectorates of India remained in the status of rumour so far as the State Department was concerned. At no time had the Indian Government made any suggestion to the United States Government that they were willing to offer concrete assistance (particularly military assistance) to the three states. (Hoey's remarks reminded us of the report in New Delhi's letter No. 437 of April 13† of the Indian Secretary-General's remarks that the United States Chargé d'Affaires had expressed United States opposition to an Indian military mission in Cambodia. Hoey's flat assertion noted above seems to us to cast some doubt on the Secretary-General's comment.) Every effort, Hoey said, would continue to be made to disabuse the Indians of the belief that the United States was attempting to upset the peace of the area.

MILITARY ASSISTANCE AGREEMENT

1. As reported China advised India that MAA would violate Geneva and would free her to rearm Viet Minh. Delhi considers MAA would violate spirit of Geneva, Poles that it would violate text as well. Chairman appreciates legal weight of Canadian view but emphasizes spirit of agreements and political effect on "other side" apparent that Poles and Indians take parts of agreement out of context and judge them in the light of political considerations extraneous to Geneva.

2. Informal meeting this morning brought out following:

(a) All commissioners agree that Cambodia entitled to obtain military aid from any source for the effective defence of her territory;

(b) Chairman insists and Poles agree that following contravene Geneva.

(1) Inclusion of phrases "subject to the requirements and limitations of any United States legislation" in second paragraph of MAA because it (ties?) Cambodia to United States legislation. This appears to be a reference to United States-Cambodian agreement of 1951 concluded under terms of mutual security act.

(2) Phrase "free world" in clause (c) of footnote second paragraph because it puts Cambodia firmly in a bloc.

(3) Paragraph 9 because it commits Cambodia to supplying United States or other states all assistance to increase capacity for collective defence or facilitate effective participation in collective security and this goes beyond role assigned Cambodia at Geneva.

(4) Annex (a) paragraph 2, second sub-paragraph, because it commits Cambodia to allowing passage of war materials under all and any circumstances thus endangering her neutrality.

(c) Pole also insisted that following contravenes Geneva but Chairman did not agree.

(1) Paragraph 7 and annex (b) because they permit the storage of surplus (he interprets this to mean excess) war material for use elsewhere as the United States may dictate.

(2) Paragraph 112 and paragraph 1 of annex (a) because they give United States personnel a measure of control of Cambodian army.

(d) I have strongly opposed all these views and have given reasons but I appear to be unable to convince Chairman or Wolniak. Next informal meeting is tomorrow afternoon to continue discussion and try to find further points of agreement.

(e) Any additional opinions you have will be appreciated.

MILITARY ASSISTANCE AGREEMENT

1. At informal meeting on June 11th Indian and Pole continued to insist that MAA contravenes Geneva and would not modify their views as given in telegram under reference.

2. Chairman feels discussion has gone far enough and suggests three courses for commission.

(a) Forward to co-chairmen majority statement that MAA contravenes Geneva.

(b) Attempt to persuade Cambodia and United States to amend MAA to eliminate offending clauses.

(c) Ask Cambodia and United States to give categorical statement explaining details of offending clauses in an attempt to assure us that clauses do not mean what Indian and Pole think they mean.

3. Chairman is prepared to adopt (c) and say he will accept unequivocal statement from Cambodians and United States. Pole is not prepared to do so and holds out for amendment.

4. We know United States are not (ready?) to make a statement as they are not signatories of Geneva. We might be able to make compromise with Indian to request statement only from Cambodians if you agree but we may have to go whole way with (c). Would appreciate instructions. Have asked Hanoi for services of legal adviser.

5. Yesterday June 12 chairman said his government had requested ratification through diplomatic channels. He added Chinese had been pressing Indian Government for last month. McClintock told me if commission attacks agreement he will himself brief Cambodians on effective rebuttal. Our view is that Washington will react strongly to criticism.

MILITARY ASSISTANCE AGREEMENT

Your two telegrams under reference received only late yesterday (June 14) and this morning (June 15) respectively.

2. As the United States Government did not join in the Final Declaration of the Geneva Conference you should take the position that it would be improper for the Commission to request the United States Ambassador to make a statement. If the statement made by the Prime Minister to the Commission on May 28 is considered by your colleagues not to have covered all the points which they are concerned with then we think it would be in order to request a further statement.

3. We suggest that you should seek an appropriate way to advise the Cambodians confidentially and in your personal capacity that you think a mild and forthcoming reply along the lines of the Prime Minister's previous statement would be helpful in avoiding a majority report to the Co-Chairmen that the MAA contravenes the Geneva settlement. An assurance of intention to continue to live up to the Cambodian obligations under the Geneva settlement and to cooperate with the Commission would round out such a statement nicely.

4. You should keep the U.S. Ambassador informed on a confidential basis. While he will be aware that you have expressed [ . . . ? ] our view that the MAA does not contravene the Gen[eva Accords] he will also appreciate, we are sure, the desirability of trying to find a way to help the Indians to overcome their reservations so as to avoid a majority report critical of the MAA. Such a report would be used for propaganda purposes by the Vietminh and Chinese and also might be used as an excuse for some other inimical action.

MILITARY ASSISTANCE AGREEMENT

1. My immediately following telegram contains text of draft resolution submitted by chairman for consideration of Commissioners.
2. Although chairman has not yet cleared text with New Delhi, he maintains that it is only compromise Indian Government would be prepared to accept. Wolniak finds resolution "too mild" but states he is prepared to concur provided "Mr. Nehru states it is satisfactory".
3. After long discussion at informal meeting this morning I was able to obtain watering down of original resolution which was wholly unacceptable. I consider that even the present wording is unsatisfactory on grounds that final paragraph implies that MAA contravenes Geneva. My view which is rejected by chairman and Wolniak is that resolution should include statement that MAA does conform to Geneva. Furthermore, the last sentence of para seven appears to me to be a repetition of what has already been said in para six. This sentence is also in my view quite offensive to Royal Government since it gives the impression that Commission is not certain that government will live up to its promises. Finally the words "objections are still expressed in the Commission" indicate that Commission has not reached any decision and considers that there is still room for argument as to whether MAA contravenes Geneva. This, I am convinced, will be used as instrument of Communist propaganda and will not remove MAA as issue in political campaign.
4. For these reasons, I suggest we should oppose present resolution. Possible compromise might be to delete completely last paragraph; paragraph six providing suitable ending.
5. Showed resolution to McClintock who expressed satisfaction with wording on grounds it was much less objectionable than he expected. He suggested however that Canadian agreement to inclusion of para seven could be given on condition resolution would not be published. My view is that copy of resolution will be sent to DRVN, when replying to their letter who will probably publish it in any case.
6. Please instruct me soonest on course you wish me to follow.

MILITARY ASSISTANCE AGREEMENT

Following is text of draft resolution mentioned in my preceding telegram.

1. On 23rd May 1955 the Royal Government of Cambodia informed the International Commission for Supervision and Control that it had on 16 May, 1955 concluded an agreement with the United States of America for direct military aid from that country. The Commission very carefully examined the new agreement to determine its compatibility or otherwise with the Geneva Agreement.

2. Objections were raised in the Commission that certain clauses of the Military Aid Agreement, as specified later in our letter of July 5th, were not strictly in conformity with the Geneva Agreement. The Commission, therefore, asked the Royal Government of Cambodia for certain clarifications. The implications of these clauses were also discussed between the Royal Government and the International Commission on May 30th when the Prime Minister of Cambodia gave his Government's interpretation and understanding of the Military Air Agreement.

3. On June 17th the Commission received a request from the Royal Government of Cambodia to examine the provisions of the new Military Aid Agreement vis-à-vis the Geneva Agreement. On June 21st the International Commission received a protest from the Democrat Republic of Vietnam stating that the new agreement violated the provisions of the Geneva Agreement relating to Cambodia.

4. With a view to having a formal record of the Cambodian Government's understanding of the Military Aid Agreement, the Commission addressed the Royal Government on July 5th embodying this understanding in their letter of that date.<sup>57</sup> On July 13th the Royal Government confirmed that its understanding and position were exactly as stated in the Commission's letter of July 5th.

5. The International Commission takes note of the clarifications given by the Royal Government, particularly its assurance that it will scrupulously and always respect the terms of the Geneva Agreement and that it will follow a policy of neutrality.

<sup>57</sup> Pour la lettre du 5 juillet 1955, voir United Kingdom, Parliamentary Papers, Cmd. 9579, Third Interim Report of the International Commission for Supervision and Control in Cambodia, London: Her Majesty's Stationery Office, 1955, pp. 8-11.

6. The International Commission is confident that the Royal Government will honour all the assurances it has given and will give full cooperation to the International Commission in supervising the implementation of the Military Aid Agreement in terms of Article 7 and Article 13(c) of the Geneva Agreement.

7. Objections are still expressed in the Commission that some of the clauses of the new agreement go beyond the limitations imposed by the Geneva Agreement. However, in view of the assurances given by the Cambodian Government, the Commission hopes that in practice the receiving of aid under the new Military Aid Agreement will be in conformity with the terms of the (Geneva) accord.

CAMBODIA-U.S. MILITARY ASSISTANCE AGREEMENT

Following preliminary comments are based on text of proposed Commission resolution received through U.S. Embassy here and your telegram No. 97 of July 15.

2. In general the resolution is satisfactory except for the last paragraph. We would have hoped, however, that Commission could have (a) agreed to "accept" rather than just coldly "take note" of the clarification given the Royal Government and (b) determined that MAA is compatible with Geneva settlement.

3. We dislike the wording, the apparent intention and the likely effect of including the final paragraph in a resolution which would be communicated to the Government and which it will certainly wish to make public because of its declared desire to settle political controversy over the MAA. Even if the last paragraph was not sent to the Government, there is the risk of it being leaked by Poles. This paragraph, as now worded, may be interpreted as undoing the two previous paragraphs. It appears to us to be undignified and unnecessary since once the Commission has accepted the assurances of the Royal Government it is improper to continue to express objections. In so far as either of the other Commissioners entertain continuing "reservations" these are surely covered by the decision of the Commission to supervise implementation. Publication of this paragraph will keep the MAA issue alive in the forthcoming electoral campaign and play into the hands of the Opposition parties. The Indians should realize that opponents of the present Government and Prince Sihanouk will try to make out that the Indian Government really sides with them in maintaining a critical attitude toward the MAA. This is bound to reflect on relations between India and the present and probable future government of Cambodia. There is also a threat of continuing disquiet in and about Cambodia if the Chinese and Viet Minh are given this excuse to continue their propaganda.

4. Our preferences in descending order are:

(a) eliminate last paragraph and send to Government resolution if possible with amendments indicated in paragraph 2 above;

(b) agree to Indian and Polish Commissioners stating their reservations along the lines of last paragraph for the record but not for communication to Government or Vietminh at time resolution minus last paragraph is passed in formal Commission meeting.

(c) accept inclusion of last paragraph in resolution only if amended as indicated in following paragraph.

5. Following are minimum amendments to final paragraph of proposed resolution to make it acceptable to us:

(a) for first word "objections" substitute "reservations";

(b) for 4th word "expressed" substitute "entertained";

(c) after 14th word "agreement" insert word "might" before word "go";

(d) for 13th word "hopes" in second sentence substitute "is confident".

6. Phnom Penh please inform Indian Chairman of our reactions in paragraphs 1-3 and negotiate step by step on basis of paragraph 4 and 5. In view of time taken by Indians and Poles you should state that you cannot deviate from these instructions without approval from Ottawa. Please report by Immediate telegram repeated to New Delhi giving your recommendations based on

(a) discussions with Indian Chairman and

(b) probable reactions of Cambodian Government and Prince Sihanouk.

7. New Delhi please take up with Ministry of External Affairs, but only indicate that 4(b) and (c) are compromises we might accept until you have had report from General Snow on his discussion.

8. London, Washington and Paris please inform Governments to which you are accredited.

MILITARY ASSISTANCE AGREEMENT

1. After two long meetings with Chairman today, I could make little progress. I informed him of objections in your telegram but he would accept none of them. He pointed out that India had gone very long way from their stand in order to obtain unanimity and he had been certain you would over-ride my objections to resolution and agree with his wording. He was obviously greatly disappointed.

2. I handed him my suggested new paragraph 5 of resolution as follows: "The I/C accepts the clarifications given by Royal Government, and as a result of these clarifications is of the opinion that the MAA is in conformity with the Geneva accord. The I/C also takes note of the assurance of the Royal Government that it will follow a policy of neutrality". I further stated that paragraph 7 must be eliminated before resolution is acceptable.

3. Chairman refused to consider for a moment that MAA is in conformity with Geneva. He said Indian and Polish stand all along has been that MAA is not in conformity and only way to get unanimity was to leave out any mention that it is, or is not, in conformity.

4. He insisted that either original or India's new paragraph 7 must remain. I argued that neither were acceptable in that although the new one omits the words "objections are still expressed" the last phrase could be considered offensive to Cambodian Government. He was adamant that there must be a paragraph 7 and it must be one of the two submitted.

5. I asked him if he would submit my suggested amendment to paragraph 5 (see paragraph 2 above) and the suggestion that paragraph 7 be eliminated to his government before condemning it out of hand. He said he would not as already he had, in interest of unanimity, persuaded his government to alter their previous stand.

6. I asked Chairman if he would agree to my suggested paragraph 5 if reference to MAA being in conformity to Geneva was omitted. He finally agreed to following: "The IC welcomes the clarifications given by the Royal Government and takes note of the assurance of the Royal Government that it will follow a policy of neutrality".

7. I then tried preference (b) but he somewhat rudely poo pooped it. My own view is that it is not feasible.

8. Finally I suggested new paragraph 7 as follows: After words Cambodian Government in Indian paragraph 7 add "and is confident that in practice", etc. to end of original paragraph 7.

9. Chairman said he would think it over and later at second meeting, he asked me to send my suggested paragraph 7 to you and, if you approve, he will recommend it to his government. However, he said that the words "is confident" must be replaced by the word "hopes". I argued that he may not be confident about MAA but having accepted the clarifications of the Royal Government surely he is confident that they will abide by their assurances. He wavered here so it is possible that he will agree to word "confident". In any case, I recommend you approve my suggested paragraph 7 as I consider it more favourable than other two.

10. I have discussed matter with McClintock who indicated satisfaction with my suggested paragraphs 5 and 7. At my request, he has agreed to obtain in strictest confidence from Prime Minister and Sam-Sary respectively, government's and Sihanouk's probable reaction to resolution. I have proceeded in this way because I considered it unwise for me to approach Cambodians directly on matter. As soon as McClintock has informed me of Cambodian views I will communicate by wire. New Delhi, you can obtain text of resolution from Indian authorities. ## POST-ELECTION ACTIVITIES AND SIZE OF INTERNATIONAL COMMISSION

We have had a number of informal discussions with our Indian and Polish colleagues about possible reduction in activities and establishment of delegations and secretariat after the Cambodian elections.

2. Immediately after the elections there may of course be considerable work in connection with petitions arising out of election campaign and perhaps question of report to co-chairmen. Thereafter, however, Indian and Polish delegations agree that Commission's responsibilities will be limited to supervision of Cambodian declaration in Article 7 and supervision of arms imports under Article 13(c).

3. Indian and Polish delegates tell us that they would be prepared to recommend to their governments reduction of headquarters establishment and elimination of 3 teams, leaving teams only in Phnom Penh, Stung Treng, Svay Rieng, Kampot and Battambang. They have sought our agreement to join an unanimous recommendation along these lines to our government.

4. I have told them that we certainly favour post-electoral reduction but are inclined to think that our tasks could be effectively discharged with three mobile teams of one officer each per nationality all located in Phnom Penh. Cambodian Government told us some time ago that all imported war material would be brought to Phnom Penh.

5. I am setting out in my immediately following telegram† the approximate figures for personnel suggested by Indian and Polish and which we would require under various plans.

6. Parthasarathi has recommended that in October civilian Commissioners depart and Brigadiers would be named Commissioners. He suggested it might have a favourable psychological effect in Cambodia should all three civilian Commissioners withdraw together soon after elections. Wolniak said that he would recommend this to Warsaw if Indians and we are doing the same but he has told me that he is doubtful about whether they will agree. I have told both of them that I am doubtful whether we would have a Brigadier as Commissioner for our part; but that each member government could make its own decision on this point. I have not told them, but personally I am inclined to recommend against having an active force officer as Commissioner. I do not think a senior military officer is necessary merely to supervise routine entry of military equipment, while if any issue of alleged violation of agreement arises there will at once be important political and propaganda implications which a political officer would seem best suited to handle. Moreover, if any Canadian Commissioner headquarters is to remain in Cambodia (which, as reported below, I do not necessarily consider essential) a political officer could usefully do some travelling and political reporting on this region and thus justify their existence by broader activities than an exclusively military mission could be expected to discharge. In other words the only possible task for any senior man will be a highly political one. Indians have, of course, a legation here in addition to Commission delegation; while Polish interpreters may be discharging some sort of surreptitious political activities.

7. A radical idea for future establishment of Commission has occurred to me which may be worth considering. It would involve no Canadian personnel normally stationed in Cambodia.

8. The idea would be to have only Indian team members stationed in Phnom Penh or any other points considered necessary in Cambodia to check arrivals of war material. If at any time their preliminary count should suggest any ground for a more serious investigation they could wire Laos or Vietnam and Canadian and Polish team members would arrive within twenty-four hours to join them in an official count. If the agreed count then should suggest a prime facie case for Commission consideration then the Commissioners could be called to meet within a few days. The Canadian Commissioner for Laos or Vietnam could then turn up here as Commissioner for Cambodia wearing a different hat. Since it appears unlikely in the extreme that war material will in fact be introduced into Cambodia in the next twelve months on a scale so great as to exceed the territory's need for effective defence under Article seven of the agreement it is unlikely that the extra duty on our Commissioner in Laos or Vietnam would be heavy. They might (group corrupt) the need for an extra junior military officer or two for assignment when occasion arose for temporary team duty in Cambodia.

9. The more I consider this idea the more it appeals to me. The Indian and Polish Governments might well not accept it. However if I were authorized to suggest that Indians discharge this preliminary role on behalf of Polish Commission and ourselves it could, I think, do no harm and might do some good. If presented in New Delhi and (Warsaw?) as well as here it should at the very least stimulate India into considering a more extensive reduction than they at present propose. Canada's willingness to trust India to do preliminary counting alone should flatter them and if the Poles were for their part unwilling to accept this the implications could do us no harm. If our proposal were also made known to Cambodian Government, as might well be a good idea, it should also at the least jolt them into assessing seriously the value to them of active Canadian participation here.

10. Conceivably a mid-way course might also be possible; having teams in Phnom Penh and if necessary elsewhere in Cambodia but no headquarters here; this would involve adding the administrative and headquarters tasks to our delegation in Vientiane or Saigon where Commissioner would also be Commissioner for Cambodia. (Laos is much more popular with Cambodians than Vietnam). We are by no means sure that a solution along these lines would prove administratively or operationally feasible and if it were to be seriously considered we would have to give it detailed study including a careful discussion with our delegations in Vientiane or Saigon/Hanoi before we were in a position to make any recommendation on it.

11. I hope you do not think that I am trying to talk myself out of a job. I am greatly enjoying this fascinating post.

12. I would appreciate your comments and instruction on this whole problem. You might wish to authorize me to submit my radical proposal on the record at a formal meeting of the Commission but stating that it represents purely delegation thinking on which Canadian Government has not yet taken up a position. The reactions should be interesting.

13. Incidentally I raised informally the question how long my Indian and Polish colleagues think task of counting arms shipments should continue in Cambodia if North and South Vietnam do not in fact agree on holding elections next summer. Both replied very vaguely on this. The Pole had referred to announced United States intention of building a new port for Cambodia at Kompong Som and hence possibility that Commission might have to transfer to Kampot team there later on. The new port is not scheduled to be ready to function until November 1956 at earliest.

POST-ELECTION ACTIVITIES AND SIZE OF INTERNATIONAL COMMISSION

Your telegram under reference outlines some attractive possibilities for post-election reductions in the activities and staff of the Commission. As you know we are keenly interested in this matter and we will study your suggestions and those of your colleagues closely. However, with the Minister away until the end of the month we can give no, repeat no, approval to your suggestions and you are not, repeat not, authorized to discuss your radical proposal with your colleagues. We would have no objection to informal discussion of reduction along the lines outlined in your paragraphs 3—5.

2. If the Indians and the Poles agree on a given scale of reductions, chances are that these will not be so drastic that we will want to oppose them. For this reason you may concur in principle with their point of view if it is a majority one while reserving your right to bring in Canadian suggestions when these are better defined and have been carefully examined here and have received the Minister's approval.

3. For the time being, therefore, we think it would be preferable to hold back your "radical suggestion". While we recognize those of its merits which you have yourself well summarized, we think it deserves a little more thought on two counts: its practicality and its tactical value. As tactics, it would be interesting to flatter the Indians, make the Cambodians realize the value of our presence and put the onus for rejecting the proposal on the Poles. If we are reasonably certain that the latter will reject it, which we are inclined to believe because of their conception of the Commission as a strictly tripartite body, then the tactics could pay off in terms of bringing the Indians away from the Poles and closer towards us. On the other hand, as a practical possibility, it has to be weighed against the following factors:

- (a) the desirability of keeping a political officer in Cambodia and the degree of seniority he should have;
- (b) the feasibility of a transfer of work to the Laos Commission, which will be tied up with elections at least until the end of the year, or to the Vietnam Commission, which might not be so popular with the Cambodians.

4. We are not too sanguine on the transfer question, with its implications of an absentee Commission or of one with Indians only. Apart from the radical alteration of the Commission's tripartite character, complications could arise as a result of the view the Indians, once left to themselves, might take of their supervision responsibilities with regard to MAA imports and also of their reporting responsibilities thereon vis-à-vis the co-chairmen.

Any disagreement we might have on this score with the Indians would be further complicated by the fact that they would be the only ones left on the spot. On balance therefore, we think that the practical difficulties may outweigh the tactical advantages. For the time being, it might be better to limit ourselves to working out possibilities along the lines of paragraphs 3, 4 and 5 of your telegram under reference.

5. In principle, we would prefer maintaining a civilian component in all three Commissions, reduced where possible on the basis of the needs in each country, while making the military component interchangeable on a call basis. We think it would be easier for the latter than for a full or acting Commissioner to put on a different hat in order to alternate from one country to the other.

REDUCTION IN INTERNATIONAL COMMISSION ESTABLISHMENTS

1. The Polish delegate yesterday told us that he had "at last" received authority from Warsaw to accept the reduction outlined in paragraph 3 of my telegram No. 122. Parthasarathi, who is impatient to effect large-scale reduction within the next four weeks and if possible himself to leave Cambodia in early October, called an informal meeting of the Commissioners yesterday afternoon to work out a draft memorandum on post-election activities and establishments.

2. The memorandum on which the three Commissioners finally agreed to give approval in principle is set out in my immediately following telegram.†

3. I made it clear that Canadian approval at this stage was only in principle (paragraph 2 of your telegram No. 107 of August 18) and also that we reserve the right to make further suggestions in due course. The status of the agreed memorandum is best defined in the text of a letter which I drafted and which the Commissioners formally approved this morning and sent to the International Commissions in Vietnam and Laos with the memorandum as an enclosure. The operative paragraphs of this letter are as follows: Text Begins:

I have the honour to inform you that, as a first stage in the progressive reduction of its activities the International Commission for supervision and control in Cambodia is giving consideration to the possibility of a reduction in the near future along the lines set out in the attached memorandum before we reach a decision on this matter, this Commission must consult with the International Commission for supervision and control in Vietnam and Laos, in accordance with the terms of Article 25 on the cease-fire agreement for Cambodia. I would, therefore, be grateful if you would let me have for consideration by the International Commission here the comments of the International Commission for Vietnam, Laos since this Commission hopes to take a decision quickly on this matter, I would be grateful if you could arrange for the comments of your Commission to reach us at the earliest possible moment. Text Ends.

4. While I would prefer a more extensive reduction of teams, along the lines set out in paragraph 4 of my telegram No. 122 of August 15, it is clear that the reduction set up in the memorandum is the most extensive to which either the Indians or the Poles will agree at this time. I therefore recommend that you confirm my tentative approval of it. The total reduction in Commission personnel would be of the order of 40 percent, and the elimination of four of our nine teams. The psychological impact should therefore be considerable.

5. As far as Canadian personnel are concerned the reduction from 32 to 23 would involve the elimination of nine military officers only. If you approve this I propose that my Military Adviser or Deputy Military Adviser might proceed in due course to Hanoi or that Brigadier Dunn come here to discuss details including possible relocation of certain officers.

6. The Chairman has personal reasons for wanting a very early completion of reduction, but in addition he points out, I think with reason, that an early proposal from the Commission to the Cambodian Government is desirable in view of local political situation. Indeed he thinks that the Cambodian Government may at any moment ask the Commission to leave the country. As you know from my earlier telegrams, I have considered this a real possibility ever since my arrival here, but I think that at present a request to withdraw completely is perhaps less likely than it was previously. There is no, repeat no, doubt however that a substantial reduction particularly of the Indian and Polish components (which the Commission's present plan would involve) would be most welcome to the Cambodian Government.

7. I would be grateful for your early comments. The Chairman hopes that we will be in a position to take a firm decision within a week.

REDUCTIONS

First we think that you should ascertain that the present reductions will be made with the full knowledge and general concurrence of the Cambodians (who are expected to pay a significant part of the Commission's bills) and that our position on these as well as on further reductions is clearly understood by them. With a new Government in formation and its composition still unknown, at least to us, we think it desirable that you discuss the matter with more than one person in Sihanouk's entourage or in the potential cabinet. Care should be taken not to present our views on greater reductions in such a way as to feed Cambodian feelings in favour of a prompt and complete withdrawal. What we want is to maintain confidence on the part of the Cambodians in our desire for maximum reduction compatible with the Commission's obligations under the Agreement and taking into account the need to secure Indian and Polish cooperation. You might therefore find it advisable to remind them of, and exchange views on, the continuing tasks of the Commission under the Geneva Agreement, as recorded in your second telegram under reference. It would also be important that your United Kingdom, French and United States colleagues be kept informed of our position.

2. Next, and in the light of Cambodian reactions, you should formally recommend to the Commission the additional reduction in the number of teams which you outlined in paragraph 4 of your telegram 122 of August 15. Regardless of whether it is accepted or not, this recommendation would have the desirable effect, in our opinion, of keeping the matter alive as well as of keeping the initiative in our hands in this matter.

3. Then, if you cannot get early acceptance of this more substantial reduction, you may state that, in accordance with the principle of progressive reductions, we are willing to agree to those suggested by the Indians as a first step in the right direction. At the same time, while reserving your right to bring in Canadian suggestions for further reductions later on, you should put on the record the Canadian view that greater reductions would in our opinion be warranted by the present situation in Cambodia.

4. With reference to paragraph 5 of your first telegram under reference, we suggest that a discussion on the possible relocation of certain officers should take into account the possible temporary need that may develop shortly in Laos for additional mobile teams. These might be required for a short period to supervise the military provisions of a plan<sup>58</sup> for a political settlement which Mr. Sen has recently produced. These military provisions are for the regroupment, checking and eventual integration of the Pathet Lao forces into the Laotian National Army. If this plan is accepted, the destination of the officers released from Cambodia might be affected by developments in Laos. Please therefore ensure that these possible requirements in Laos are discussed by Brigadier Dunn with our Commissioner in Laos and his military adviser before making final recommendations regarding disposal of any surplus officers.

FUTURE OF INTERNATIONAL COMMISSION

As we understand it, the comments and attacks on the Commission have been largely the result of Cambodian excitement and nervousness in the last stages of the election campaign. We have the impression that since the elections they have died down and perhaps the tone will have been set by Prince Sihanouk's press conference statement that the Commission would be welcome in Cambodia to complete its work. Your report of Sam Sary's desire to get you a better villa seems to confirm this.

2. When you see Prince Sihanouk it might be advisable to follow these lines:

- (a) describe the reduction about to be done in accordance with the Indian plan;
- (b) explain the Canadian attitude on the desirability of some additional reductions but in such a way as not to feed Cambodian desire for greater reductions than would be feasible;
- (c) discuss the tasks left for the Commission to perform;

(d) suggest that, owing to the extent of their triumph, the party that will form the Government can afford some leniency towards its political opponents and should at least take care to assure the completion in practice of the integration task envisaged in the Geneva Agreement, in other words avoid giving any grounds for complaints concerning post-electoral reprisals or discrimination (e.g. complaints based inter alia on last two paragraphs of Article 6);

(e) any undue manifestation or expression of impatience towards Commission by a government that enjoys such complete victory could have the unfortunate effect of giving impression abroad that said government had something to hide;

(f) such moderation as may be shown in the post-electoral period would facilitate the task of the Commission and bring closer the time when further reductions could be made.

REDUCTION OF PERSONNEL

The Commission today unanimously approved the memorandum on reduction transmitted to you in my telegram 164 of September 14. I regret that despite my immediate telegram No. 171 of September 20 through British diplomatic wireless, I had still not received your final instructions on reduction. But I consider it impossible to delay acceptance of the envisaged 40 percent reduction, the most on which unanimous agreement can at present be reached, without laying Canada open to charges of obstructing reduction in the international Commission's establishment, which in the present political situation in Cambodia could be greatly embarrassing in relation to public and government opinion, and which is of course directly contrary to our general policy of trying to get maximum practicable reduction here as soon as possible. I also took comfort in reflecting that your telegram No. 107 of August 18, particularly paragraph 2, can be construed as blessing this degree of reduction.

2. We had during the last day or two received replies from the International Commissions in Laos and Vietnam, whom we had consulted as required under Article 25 of Cambodian cease-fire agreement, saying that these Commissions had no comment to offer on our proposed reduction.

3. The agreed plan has, as you know, been worked out on "off the record" and informal meetings between the three Commissioners. On the record at to-day's meeting, I proposed consideration of a more extensive reduction, by elimination of our teams outside Phnom Penh but maintenance of mobile teams here which could move when necessary to investigate conditions anywhere. This proposal was set out in paragraph 4 of my telegram No. 122 of August 15, which you had tentatively approved and on which our Commissioners in Vientiane and Hanoi had also commented favourably.

4. The Polish Commissioner said he could not, repeat not, accept the idea of a more extensive reduction, and the Indian Chairman said that since the 40 percent reduction and elimination of four of the present teams was the maximum on which present unanimous agreement would be reached, he considered it inexpedient to state whether India would favour or oppose further reduction at this time. I urged that continued careful consideration be given by Indian and Polish Governments to the possibility of further reduction as soon as possible, and asked that Military Committee arrange to obtain a weekly report of activities from the remaining five teams and to report to Commission monthly so that we could consider whether their activities justify the continued existence of the teams outside Phnom Penh.

5. I also suggested that in view of Article 12 of the cease-fire agreement it would be desirable to give Cambodian Government an opportunity to comment on our proposed reduction. Polish and Indian Commissioners maintained that this article, which requires Cambodian consent to alteration of fixed teams location, was inapplicable to elimination of any fixed teams location and that Cambodian Government should merely be informed rather than consulted. My own view that inviting formal Cambodian consent to proposed reduction would be a way of obtaining their formal implied consent to the maintenance of remaining teams, which should serve to reduce likelihood of Cambodian Commission friction during coming few months. As compromise the Commission agreed to sending a loosely drafted notification to Cambodian Government about our reduction plan.

6. In any case I had previously in private talks informed Sam-Sary and Prime Minister Leng Ngeth about our reduction plans. Though, they have not, repeat not, committed themselves to continuation of Commission on the basis of 60 percent of present strength, they appreciated our private consultations with them.

7. This morning at the formal weekly meeting of the three Commissioners with Prime Minister Leng Ngeth, we mentioned to him inter alia our reduction plan. He asked a number of searching questions about the number and location of teams, and whether the Commissions in Laos and Vietnam were decreasing or increasing, but he would not commit himself on Government's reaction to future plans of the Commission. As you will appreciate, in that period of post-election behind-scene cabinet making, there is no, repeat no, firm Government view on the question.

8. Though I think the present reduction is the best at present obtainable and more than we might have expected, I hope that if we continue to press discreetly, but on the record, we may get agreement on further reduction in a month or two. It is my own judgement that the Commission would do no, repeat no, service to international relations generally by remaining here too long or in unnecessary strength. We should not, repeat not, allow ourselves to be squeezed out, but should withdraw with dignity and good order in due time. However, the situation in Indo-China as a whole is still too fluid to make any confident predictions of the Commission's future.

9. Parthasarathi is leaving within a week. Brigadier Kullar, his military adviser, will be Acting Chairman and there is no, repeat no, decision yet who will eventually replace him though I understand that an Indian diplomat is likely to be posted here. Wolniak, the Polish Commissioner, hopes to leave within "a few weeks", but tells me that none of his present staff are capable of acting on their own and that Warsaw has not, repeat not, yet decided who will replace him.

10. Kullar is much more pro-Western than Parthasarathi. Incidentally, he told Bourbonnière that he expects the Commission to wind up completely by January 1st.

DRAFT OF ELECTIONS CHAPTER FOR FOURTH INTERIM REPORT TO THE CO-CHAIRMAN

1. On September 19 Parthasarathi submitted a draft elections report which consisted of a long narrative of the elections campaign. It contained a number of snide remarks about Cambodian Government and Sangkum, and implications of unfair practices, although it nowhere brought them into sharp focus as an issue, and although it concluded by "passing" the elections on the expressed grounds that despite pressures the Prince's popularity was such that his party could have won "anyway". Parthasarathi explained privately that in his view the Sangkum "should have won about 65 percent of seats and the Commission's problem was to explain the other 35 percent".
2. The Polish Commissioner and Parthasarathi had (compared?) their lines on the elections report ahead of time, as they had done throughout most of the discussion on the United States-Cambodian Military Aid Agreement last summer. Wolniak has, therefore, not proposed any changes in the Indian draft, contenting himself with general remarks that he considers it too favourable to the Government but accepts it as a "factual compromise". Indeed my general impression of Polish conduct in Cambodia during recent months is that they have had instructions to subordinate their particular interest to cultivating a cordial pattern of relations with India. Wolniak shows no real solicitude for the protection of the ex-KRF and privately speaks with contempt of Cambodian Communists. He is, however, interested in embarrassing Cambodian Government and painting an unfavourable picture of it in the Report. He shows no inclination to push this line further than Indian Chairman will accept but Parthasarathi's own left-wing and anti-Sangkum predilections make this a relatively easy position for the Polish Commission.
3. In the hard negotiations on this Report, we have started from a minority position on almost all important issues. However, Parthasarathi is understandable reluctant to see a minority Canadian Report, which gives us some real leverage.
4. I myself would be reluctant to have a minority Canadian Report on the elections if this can be avoided, since it would revive controversy in Indo-China, and also inevitably exacerbate Indian-Cambodian relations which is not, I think, in our overall interest. However, I am not prepared to pay an unreasonable price for unanimity.
5. Parthasarathi and Wolniak have been trying to get agreement on a report to the Co-Chairman by the end of this week, as Parthasarathi is returning to Madras. He is very tired and has become increasingly contemptuous of the Cambodian Government.
6. I circulated informally a counter-draft report which was a relatively short and analytical rather than narrative account concentrating more on the actual polling and voting results (which gave about 20 percent opposition votes) the seats (100 percent) for the campaign [sic]. Our draft proceeded from viewpoint (a) that we should base our report only on official results, actual reports of our teams, and the Commission discussions with the Government, rather than the general complex of charges and counter-charges; (b) that Commission's responsibilities arose out of Article (group corrupt) of the cease-fire agreement; and (c) that we should avoid unnecessary detailed comments on the election campaign, merely recognizing that there was competitive campaigning by all parties. The Indian and Pole certainly would not accept this type of report, and I have left it on the table as a bargaining lever while attempting to see to what extent the narrative approach can be re-written in a way satisfactory to us as well as that of our two colleagues.

7. Privately, however, I am not too unhappy at including some description of the election campaign itself since there was considerable freedom and since recognizing by implication the relevance of this as an important requisite for free elections may conceivably prove useful some day as a precedent in relation to Vietnam, East Germany, Korea or any other area in which nations may eventually be involved in internationally supervised elections.

8. The main issues on our negotiations on the draft report, apart from the elimination of one-sided dirty cracks about the Cambodian Government, have been:

(a) the attempt of the Indian and the Pole to characterize the Pracheachun Party as the official representative of ex-members of the KRF. If we recognized this we would prejudge the issue that could rise under Article 6 if the Government or Parliament later declares the Pracheachun Party illegal (see my telegram No. 161 of September 10, 1955, para 4†);

(b) a related issue which arose in the section of the Indian draft of the Commission's successful intervention with the Government to obtain the registration of Pracheachun as a legal party to the Cambodian electoral law the Indian draft implies that the Commission made a finding that non-recognition would have (group corrupt) by Cambodia of the cease-fire agreement. (group corrupt) maintaining (truthfully) that no such decision was reached and that we only agreed that a serious question would arise which we advised the government to avoid. There are unfortunately no minutes of the Commission's discussions on that point, which took place before my arrival here;

(c) whether to state that the Commission and its teams in Cambodia have had, throughout this electoral period as always, complete freedom to move anywhere without notice. The Pole opposed this and the Indian also states that he could not accept such a statement in the report "as it would merely put ideas into Cambodian heads." He went so far as to argue that the reason why freedom of movement without notice was denied to our teams in Vietnam is because teams insisted on advance provision of luxury facilities, which takes special organizing;

(d) whether we should concentrate analysis on the count (group corrupt) where Sangkum won 100 percent victory, or on a constituency breakdown of popular votes where Sangkum gained about 80 percent overall, but only slight majority in certain districts. Official popular vote count is not yet out and Parthasarathi has been trying to get us to finalise the report before it is published and without regard to it;

(e) whether report could mention as I wish the government's suggestion to the Commission that some democratic and Pracheachun candidates tried to get themselves arrested in order to pose as martyrs;

(f) I have suggested in concluding statement that the Cambodian Government (group corrupt) discharged its electoral obligations under Article 6 of the cease-fire agreement. This suggestion has, I fear, greatly embarrassed our Indian colleague who dislikes clear statements. I might at the end (group corrupt) it (group corrupt) but it is in any case an (group corrupt) for the time being. At the very least such a finding must be implicit if not explicit in the final report. But I would not like to have such a statement appear cool in a minority paragraph by Canada.

9. We have already won tentative Polish and Indian consent to our position on points (a), (b) and (c). The points (d), (e) and (f) remain to be resolved. I am not unhopeful that we will in the end win on these too.

10. Another major issue which we have discussed at some length but which is far from resolved is how to report on the election petitions.

11. We have of course conceded that petitions about arrests must be reported although we wish to include inter alia the mention of the Prime Minister's suggestion in (e) above. The Commission discussed these petitions re arrests officially with the Prime Minister (as you know—my telegram No. 149 of August 26, 1955,† para three — I also discussed this privately with Prince Sihanouk and we did manage to have the arrest of candidates stopped and three of the six arrested candidates released before the elections).

12. There are in addition now about 100 petitions alleging miscellaneous electoral pressure and abuses. Some weeks before the elections, the Indian and Polish Commissioners tried to get me to agree to a letter to the Government outlining these petitions in terms which implied serious concern by the Commission about the pattern they suggested. We successfully resisted this, saying that they could be investigated. Our position has been that so long as the charges are uninvestigated it would be unfair to report them at any length in such a way as to imply a pattern of abuses by Government officials and Sangkum supporters. The Indian and Polish Commissioners stoutly resisted our suggestion last month that we should investigate such petitions, the Indian saying that it could constitute "interference" in Cambodian affairs and the Pole saying that it could take too long to affect the election results. However, para 18 of Indian draft report to Co-Chairmen revives this issue by proposing a lengthy analysis of such petitions. This will probably be the stickiest question and the one on which the delegations may have to split. I am considering proposing a paragraph giving a brief description of these petitions but stating that since Cambodian electoral law gives facilities for judicial remedies and the petitions do not show that any attempt has been made to use, much less to (effect?), these remedies, it would be improper for the Commission to deal or draw conclusions from them. It remains to be seen how far this can get.

13. I do not yet know whether we can manage to get an agreed report, but think it not impossible, particularly if we can resolve impasse on the uninvestigated petitions about electoral pressure. On this issue the line I am considering has the merit of giving an explanation for the fact that the Commission did not investigate the (group corrupt) if we report this (fact?) without an explanation it will be assumed that the Poles pressed for investigation and that Canadians refused, whereas the facts are the opposite. The discussions were all unfortunately off the record, at the Chairman's insistence. Undoubtedly, however the legal ground that it would be improper for the Commission to investigate until domestic judicial processes have been exhausted will not be very palatable to our colleagues.

14. Throughout the drafting of the Chapter on elections we have attempted to do what we could to prevent an unfair or unduly unfavourable picture of the government's conduct during the elections, while being honest, objective and relatively fearless.

15. The Chairman's desire for early agreement is understandable in view of his impatience to get out and his reluctance to leave Brigadier Kullar, his military adviser (who would be Acting/Chairman) with such a can of worms. I do not want to appear to be stalling unreasonably, and I am making every effort to progress as far as possible on an (agreed?) re-write of a narrative report. I am forwarding by to-day's bag Indian draft and my tentatively agreed re-write of most of these (sections) of the report except those on the uninvestigated petitions and the final conclusions. I have intimated that I (meant?) to send the report home by bag for our consideration. However, the time table local conditions and the quite remarkable slowness of telegraphic communication between Ottawa and here may make it impracticable for us to delay eventual approval that long, and unless I hear from you to the contrary I may agree within a week to a report if it seems to us on balance to be a generally satisfactory document.

FIRST INTERVIEW WITH NEW PRIME MINISTER

I had a 45 minutes interview with Prince Sihanouk, now Prime Minister, this morning. He is still functioning from his headquarters in the palace and his method of receiving visitors is still regal (guard of honour, champagne, etc.). Rather than prime-ministerial in substance, however, the interview was as usual informal and very friendly. He is much more relaxed than before the elections.

2. I spoke to Sihanouk about the Canadian position on reduction of the Commission along lines set out in your telegrams No. 129 of September 21 and No. 131 of September [23]. Sihanouk said he quite understood and appreciated our position: but he hesitated at first to commit himself on the Commission's future. Unlike last time, he did not say anything on that occasion critical of the Indians, but he regretted the presence of the Poles and suggested that they might be more interested in stirring up trouble than in pacification. I said that the Poles naturally follow the general Communist line, but surely this is what he would have expected. I added that the Communist line at times might appear to be conciliatory.

3. I formed the distinct impression, which I had also got from recent talks with various other members of the Government group here, that the Cambodians have been toying with the idea of trying to retain the Commission while somehow eliminating the Poles. I therefore pointed out that I myself could see no way in which Cambodia could unilaterally alter the composition of the Commission which was written into the agreement she had signed at Geneva. I told Sihanouk that North Vietnam might be preparing a political and psychological offensive against the South, and that it probably would not be in the Cambodians interest to give a pretext to Hanoi for calling the Cambodian settlement into question by a Cambodian breach of the cease-fire agreement. Sihanouk, after a pause said that he agreed with this, and added that the Commission could stay here as long as it considered necessary. He recognized, he said, that its presence might help to deter undue Viet Minh interest in Cambodia this coming winter. He expressed satisfaction at the 40 percent reduction already achieved and at the Commission's recent transfer of £100,000 in reimbursement to Cambodia for Commission expenses.

4. Sihanouk told me that he expected his policy of national reconciliation to progress satisfactorily. He was receiving letters of penance from many erstwhile political opponents and was, he said, accepting them more or less at face value. He said he would give orders forthwith for the provisional release from prison of Keng Vansak, Deputy Secretary-General of the Democratic Party, held on a murder charge (My despatch No. 406 of September 21†).

5. I told him about the Commission's election report and showed him the concluding paragraph. He expressed warm appreciation for our success in obtaining the Polish signature to the Final Statement that the election completes Cambodia's electoral obligations undertaken at Geneva. He recognized that to obtain this report we had in some respects to go some way to meet Polish views, but agreed that this was preferable to a non-unanimous conclusion.

6. Sihanouk said he appreciated what the Canadian Delegation had done in the Hanoi radio case (my telegram No. 178 of October 6†).

7. He spoke of Hanoi's suggestion for an exchange of political representatives, saying that he had seen the Peking radio report. He said that Hanoi was trying to take advantage of a statement made at his September 13 press conference that he would welcome relations with any country which behaved correctly. He mentioned, however, that he had imposed conditions, e.g. in the case of the U.S.S.R. the removal of the veto on Cambodia's membership in the United Nations, and in the case of North Vietnam cessation of interference in Cambodian affairs. Hanoi radio broadcasts were, he said, an example of such interference. He had not yet decided what to do if Hanoi met Cambodian conditions. (I got the impression that this question is still very much open).

8. Speaking of relations with France, Sihanouk said that he thought relations would remain very friendly provided France did not insist on a categorical juridical clarification of Cambodia's relations with the French Union. In practice Cambodia was behaving as fully independent and entirely ignoring the French Union. Providing France left this question alone, Cambodia would try to avoid embarrassing France for the time being by a formal denunciation of the French Union. Sihanouk said he preferred the Anglo-Saxon acceptance of illogical but pragmatic solutions to the French tendency to insist on formal logic irrespective of results.

9. Sihanouk said his main hope was to give his country a new impetus in economic and social development. He added that Sambath now Minister of Health, is going to Colombo Plan meeting at Singapore.

10. I told him of Mr. Paul Martin's reference at the General Assembly to Cambodia and Canada's hope that it will soon be able to take rightful place in Council of United Nations.<sup>59</sup> Prince Sihanouk said he deeply appreciated this.

FOURTH INTERIM REPORT — ELECTIONS CHAPTER<sup>60</sup>

Many thanks for your thoughtful telegram No. 139 of October 7.† Though it arrived after the contents of the report were finally agreed and signed, it is re-assuring to know that our decisions were in line with your judgment. Text of report to Co-Chairmen has gone forward to you by bag, but I apologize for delay in reporting on the long and arduous negotiations, pleading in extenuation only that after exhilaration of the debate ceased with signature, the heat and humidity here combined with competition of other tasks to give post mortem reports a low priority.

2. The fact that we finally got a unanimously agreed as well as satisfactory report was a great relief, settled only after a final day's uncertainty at midnight before Parthasarathi's departure. The negotiations were pretty tough throughout, but the report as finally agreed includes adequate mention of a brief but, I think, effective analysis of the popular vote, the Government's charge that some opposition candidates and campaign workers deliberately courted arrest for propaganda purposes, and a reasonable concluding statement that Cambodian Government has completed obligations under Article 6. As described in paragraph 4 below, the Commission nearly split on this point.

3. An earlier breach, which would have placed Canada rather than Poland in the minority, was finally avoided on the question of describing uninvestigated petitions. I opposed giving international circulation under official aegis to uninvestigated charges without reasonable statement and explanation of fact that Commission did not investigate them. I had to push our version early to verge of a minority report. To disabuse Indian and Pole of their suspicion that our position sprang from favouritism of Sangkum and to drive home the point that it was based on fundamental principle, I pointed out (to my colleagues evident embarrassment) that mere deadpan publication of uninvestigated charges and denials smacked of McCarthyism, and that if such a course were adopted it would be equally logical to include reference to Sangkum charge that "Polish communists working in Cambodia had contributed 3.0 million piastres to Prachea Chun campaign funds" and merely state that Polish delegation had denied this (my telegram No. 166 of September 16†). I dropped this final point when it was agreed to include our brief statement that Cambodia had provided judicial remedies for electoral abuses and denial of rights under constitution, and that, opposition had "chosen instead" to petition Commission, and also statement later in report that Government informed us that no complaints of electoral abuses had been filed under Article 71 of Electoral Regulations during two week period after elections which law provides for appeals. The Pole finally accepted all this, but rather unhappily as he maintained that it brought the effect of the petitions "to nul".

4. The second issue on which agreement proved almost impossible concerned Commission's overall judgment. My position had been that Commission responsibilities were in our view limited to Article 6 of cease-fire agreement rather than Article 3 of Final Declaration. I argued, however, that the main justification for long narrative account of electoral processes as a whole was that it would lead to some judgment regarding government's conduct of elections under "Geneva Settlement" (by implication, the fundamental freedoms and all). The Indian and Polish Commissioners concurred in this. As finally approved at meeting on Sunday, October 2, the final paragraph stated that "considering fact that conditions of war and civil strife prevailed in the country until a year ago and that sharp differences have arisen regarding national policy and constitutional structure, it is a matter for gratification that elections went off as well as they did.

The Commission considers that conclusion of the election completes the political settlement for Cambodia foreseen in the Geneva Agreement." (My underlinings.)

5. This decisive judgment was accepted by Polish Commissioner in the draft report finally initialled by the three Commissioners. However, he telegraphed it home (his communications, unlike ours, are based on Polish wireless in Indo-China and make possible long two-way messages within 24 or 36 hours). But during day on Monday, October 3, Wolniak received instructions which (he told Parthasarathi and myself, with evident and, I believe, quite sincere embarrassment) made it impossible for him to draw any conclusions regarding the election. "facts but no conclusion", Warsaw apparently said.

6. This last-minute upset greatly disturbed Parthasarathi, who said that he considered our agreed draft just, and was prepared to sign it alone as it stood. However, he wished me to join him in signing.

7. In this case Pole would have had to submit a rather nasty minority report. The issue of signing had been (group corrupt) at the formal Commission meeting on Monday morning, October 3, when we paid final tributes to departing Chairman, but before Polish instructions were received. We met again late Monday evening after Commission reception in honour of departing Chairman which Cambodian Government and society attended. The three Commissioners finally agreed at midnight to substitute for final section, quoted in paragraph 4 above, the following paragraphs:

"In spite of the fact that conditions of war and civil strife prevailed in Cambodia until a year ago and that sharp differences had arisen between the Government and the opposition, which alleged that it did not have full freedom, the elections passed off peacefully.

The Commission did not supervise or control the elections but had only an observatory role. Therefore, it has no right to draw any conclusions on the elections as a whole. It considers, however, that the settlement foreseen under Article 6 of the Geneva Agreement has been completed"

By these concessions, which I regard as minor, Wolniak was induced to sign. He did, I think, consider by stretch his instructions to do this.

8. Events of the final 24 hours of this report illustrate, I think, the contradiction in Polish policy in Cambodia which has aimed at consolidating Communist-Indian relations but at the same time avoiding consolidation of Cambodian Government and preserving possibility of (group corrupt) on elections if this could later prove expedient for Ho Chi-Minh. As suggested in my telegram No. 188† and my despatch No. 426 of October 12† on the remarkable change of tone in D.R.V.N. Government's letters to the Commission regarding Hanoi Radio Broadcasts and D.R.V.N. desire to exchange political missions with Cambodia, Viet Minh authorities find themselves in similar contradiction. In any case the election report negotiations showed Wolniak, though not over-subtle nor perhaps any too brilliant as a negotiator, to be a man of some sincerity and considerable courage.

9. As reported in my telegram No. 185 of October 10, I told Sihanouk about getting an agreed finding on Cambodian elections, and I am confident that he sincerely appreciates the advantages of this.

10. Perhaps the most important issue in the negotiations, however, has been the struggle for Parthasarathi's soul and judgment, since he is likely to be increasingly influential in Indian foreign policy. I have felt that the long-term advantages in Parthasarathi's education lie not in making unreasonable concessions to his left-wing predilections but rather in convincing him of essential fairness and firmness of western, or at least Canadian, attitudes. I think that on the whole this goal has been achieved and that G.P., while somewhat chastened, may in future be somewhat more sympathetic and more respectful toward Western views.

1. Kalelkar has now told Boubonnière, after extracting pledge from latter not to reveal to his Chief, General Kirpal, the source of the information, that Kirpal and he have spoken to Polish Commissioner Wolniak about the clandestine Polish wireless transmitter at Kratie. Apparently Indians told Poles that such activities are inadmissible and "they must stop such nonsense". Kalelkar says he does not know what results, if any, this démarche has had or whether transmitter is still there.

2. Suddenly Polish military and political advisers, with two henchmen, visited Kratie last Thursday, cancelling committee meeting which had been called at their request.

3. In this atmosphere the fact that I gave notice last Tuesday of my intention to introduce at tomorrow's Commission meeting a resolution to eliminate all teams outside Phnom Penh, is inevitably considered darkly significant by Poles and Indians, and I have not discouraged this interpretation, at tomorrow's meeting I anticipate that Indians will ask time to consult their government and that no decision will be taken. While I cannot well insist on immediate vote, I shall probably press for a vote within next two weeks. Indians have suggested informally to me that we might get compromise agreement from Poles to eliminate one or two teams, but not, they say, Kratie.

4. Since Poles now know that Indians at least are aware of their clandestine transmitter at Kratie, and since they must suspect that we also know, it occurs to me that there may be little to lose in taking a very tough line here, and perhaps also in New Delhi implying that if agreement is not forthcoming on early elimination of all teams we might have to consider whether it would be proper to remain silent on illicit Kratie activities.

5. The fact that the Indians could now hardly deny to us that Poles use Commission teams for subversion (though we are, of course, unable to prove this) might also conceivably be used in pressing Delhi to agree to an early wind-up of Cambodian Commission. But though I hate to mention this, there is always the horrid possibility, which I mentioned to the Minister at Singapore that if the Vietminh seem likely to get nasty during the coming months, we may reluctantly have to re-examine the desirability from the western viewpoint of an early winding-up of the Commissions. Conceivably the balance of advantage might lie in retaining them a while longer, as a deterrent.

6. Incidentally, if we talk to the Indians it would, as things stand, be necessary not to disclose that Major Hanspal and Kalelkar were our informants. But presumably if Indians asked us for our sources, we could refuse to disclose them, letting Indians assume that we gained the information about Polish transmitters directly (by?) our own methods, which we are not prepared to discuss.

7. I have just read Beaudry's interesting report on Vietminh activities in South Vietnam, which was enclosed with Hanoi's despatch No. 6 of November 30.† Beaudry reports that Vietminh are said to have installed many secret radio transmitters all over South Vietnam. This has made me wonder again about the advisability of tipping off CIA about Polish transmitter at Kratie (but?) perhaps asking that they try a monitoring check on team sites, though Kratie may, of course, be silent now. I am still inclined to be dubious about bringing in CIA, but it is I think worth consideration, particularly if it is thought likely that Vietminh may be contemplating serious renewed subversive action in South Vietnam and perhaps in other parts of Indo-China this winter or next spring.

While we are interested in reducing the establishment of the Cambodia Commission as much as possible, we should be careful not to press for this in such a way as to affect the future of the Commissions in Laos and Vietnam where we are interested in their maintenance as a deterrent to any potential disturbance of the cease-fire. The same argument about the usefulness of the Commission also applies in Cambodia although to a lesser extent.

2. Accordingly we would not wish the information we now have about the Poles at Kratie to reach the ears of anybody who might use it as a means of bringing pressure on the Commission to get out of Cambodia. Until otherwise instructed I should be glad if you would refrain from discussing it with any of your diplomatic colleagues including British and Americans. I think it would also be wise to keep it within the smallest possible group of people in the Canadian delegation.

3. In the hope of obtaining the removal of all teams outside Phnom Penh, use of the information with the Indians in order to put and maintain moral pressure on them to get your resolution passed may have had some useful effect. We think it would have been better, however, to leave this unexplicit. In our argument with the Indians we should prefer to emphasize the fact that the fixed teams should be abolished because, as the record shows, they have not enough to do to justify their existence. The charge of subversion, as your talk with Kirpal has made clear, would be very hard to develop successfully, in spite of the evidence from Kratie. In our experience the Indians are more likely to appreciate the real nature of Communist activity if we do not press them too hard.

4. We shall telegraph separately our views on the legal question of reduction of establishments as opposed to reduction of activities under Article 25.

5. We are replying by bag on a number of technical points raised in your letter. For purely political purposes however we do not think that monitoring would give any better proof of the existence of the transmitter than the visual observation of the Indian concerned. For this reason we do not wish to bring the United States in at the present time. We intend however to consult with the United Kingdom authorities, but prefer to do this through London, rather than have you talk to them locally.

REDUCTION

The Poles have been stalling on our reduction proposal, saying they had received no instructions. In order to allow time for the situation to mature and to demonstrate to Indians our patience and reasonableness we have accepted repeated postponement of consideration of our reduction resolution moved on December 6. However, I insisted with General Kirpal's warm approval that it be taken up at a Commission meeting yesterday.

2. Wolniak opened discussion by saying that his instructions had not yet arrived but were expected any day, and that he therefore could not contribute to the debate. I recalled that I had first put forward the substance of our plan last August (and?) the time for decision had, I thought, now come. If any Government wished to retain in being Commission teams which had no legitimate function, that Government could express its position on the report.

3. The day before the meeting I had at General Kirpal's request agreed with him on tactics. These were that I should urge a decision and that Kirpal would place on record that India favoured reduction and would then propose as concession to Poles one further weeks delay or clear understanding that we would (group corrupt) reluctantly accept this final delay.

4. (Group corrupt) At the meeting Kirpal blurted out the gist of the instructions from Delhi which he had transmitted to me in confidence the day before. The General who is an honest and good soul does not seem to have realized that in diplomacy as in war one need not reveal ones falling-back position before the battle. Kirpal explained to Wolniak that his instructions were to endeavour to eliminate straight away during January the teams at Kampot and Kratie. Also according to Delhi the question should again be reviewed in mid-February to consider not only elimination of the two remaining teams at Battambang and Svay Rieng but also now much longer an International Commission should remain in Cambodia.

5. Though it is a pity India would not press more effectively for our full reduction programme at once there is a great deal of advantage in having India squarely on the record for some reduction as well as for considering the future of the Commission as a whole. I hope that this will be sufficient pressure for the Pole to agree to eliminating two teams in January.

6. I have told Kirpal that if he can get the Pole to agree to this plan for team reduction I would be prepared to go along with (him and?) amend my resolution accordingly. I hope you will agree with this course. I have not heard from you on reduction since your telegram Y165 of November 23† except for the repeat of your telegram Y89 of December 20 to Stockholm.†

7. I was however somewhat disturbed by paragraph 3 of your wire to Stockholm. If India and Poland should get the idea that Canada will back away from a position we favour merely because Poland threatens to vote formally against us this would inevitably weaken our position in the Commission. In my view such a development would in the long run make agreed or smooth solutions to Commission problems much less likely rather than more likely. (For example one of our main problems is how and when to wind up the Commission — and if we and India are afraid to be firm about getting out this summer on our own initiative, then it seems that this would make it probable that the Commission would be asked by the Cambodian Government to leave: Poland and the Viet Minh might protest this and the end result would be to increase rather than decrease tension.)

8. To revert to the immediate issue I hope that the Poles will not have gleaned from the Swedes the idea that Canada will not go through with our December 6 proposal for a vote on reduction. My promise to Kirpal to accept the Indian compromise would adequately demonstrate that we are in no way rigid or unreasonable. Unless I hear from you in time therefore I may vote next Thursday with India for eliminating two teams even if the Pole votes against us — providing India still agrees to vote and nothing new develops to make a change in tactics seem wise.

9. We (group corrupt) have to interpret the effect of a two to one vote. I might suggest that the Chairman take time to examine the various legal considerations before determining whether the motion was carried or defeated. This procedural ruling could be postponed for a week or so while the Pole felt further time to "get instructions at last" and (group corrupt). Even if after the Indians rule that the (group corrupt) applies in this case, we could accept this gracefully: and we would still I think be far ahead for the next interim report by having got the Pole on to the record on a minority of one, against reduction, with ourselves, India in favour.

RESTORATION OF ROYAL ADMINISTRATION<sup>61</sup>

At meeting of May 21 Indian Acting Chairman expressed view that holding of free elections should be our goal and that one of the steps leading to it was restoration of Royal Administration in northern provinces. It was agreed that we would all set to work and that for my part I would submit draft resolution for restoration of Royal Administration.

2. Yesterday I submitted my text, cleared with Royal Government, which I consider improvement on that previously submitted to you and which I am communicating in my immediately following telegram.

3. Poles allege that Commission is not competent to pass such recommendation on ground that question of restoration of Royal Administration may not be disassociated from political settlement.<sup>62</sup>

4. Indians, desperately non-committal, indicated they have in mind to ask Royal Government how they propose implementing paragraph A of their Geneva declaration if Pathet Lao accept to reintegrate. They would then turn to Pathet Lao and ask them why they do not reintegrate under those conditions. My opinion is that Pathet Lao would raise other unacceptable conditions and that nothing would be done.

5. I am sure that my resolution, if accepted by Indians would be rejected by Poles and ultimately by the Pathet Lao on ground of unconstitutionality. At least we would save our honour and disengage our responsibility lest Royal Government resort to force and accuse International Commission of not having attempted to assist them in their just claim.

6. Indians privately agree with my legal interpretation but fear that passing of resolution might affect adversely proposed good offices mission of Mr. Sen. If you approve of my attitude our Acting High Commissioner in New Delhi might assist in convincing Indians that adoption of resolution would not impair chances of success of Mr. Sen.

7. Once this resolution would have been rejected by Pathet Lao, I would propose informing members of the Geneva Conference of such rejection as well as of Pathet Lao rejection of Indian declaration, resolution and Nong Khang resolution (no reply has yet been received from Pathet Lao High Command about Nong Khang resolution but I have no doubt they will also reject it).

RESTORATION OF ROYAL ADMINISTRATION

Following is text of my draft resolution on restoration of Royal Administration in two northern provinces, Begins:

The International Commission for Supervision and Control in Laos.

1. CONSIDERING that the sovereignty, the independence, the unity and the territorial integrity of Laos were recognized in the Geneva settlement and expressly underwritten by all the members of the Geneva Conference in paragraph 12 of their final declaration;

2. CONSIDERING that political administration is an attribute of sovereignty and that the authority of the Royal Government (groups corrupt) exercise of this function throughout the whole of Laos is apparent from the terms of its declaration of July 21, 1954, at Geneva of which note was taken in paragraph three of the final declaration of the conference;

3. CONSIDERING that the (group corrupt) this declaration of the Royal Government can be considered a guide to the interpretation of Article 14 of the agreement and that the nature of the political settlement envisaged therein;

4. CONSIDERING that the declaration of November 4, 1954, made by the Pathet Lao delegate on this joint commission, that the Pathet Lao forces recognize the Royal Government and that in principle the Administration of Pathet Lao in the two provinces of Sam

Neua and Phong Saly is classified under the supreme authority of the Royal Government, was recognition of the existing legal situation;

5. CONSIDERING that the Royal Government was entitled as from August 6, 1954, to exercise directly its right of administration in the provinces of Sam Neua and Phong Saly;

6. CONSIDERING that insofar as the International Commission is concerned the actual re-establishment of the Royal Administration in the provinces of Sam Neua and Phong Saly was delayed because of the belief in the possibility of an early political settlement;

7. CONSIDERING that by its unanimous resolution dated December 3, 1954 the International Commission recommended that representatives of the Royal Government and Pathet Lao should examine together the means to adopt with a view to attaining within the framework of the political settlement envisaged in Article 14 of the Geneva Agreement the re-establishment of the Royal Administration in the provinces of Sam Neua and Phong Saly;

8. CONSIDERING that the negotiations have so far led neither to the political settlement nor to the re-establishment of the Royal Administration in the provinces of Sam Neua and Phong Saly, that until this is accomplished the unity and integrity of Laos and the sovereignty of the Royal Government remain impaired;

9. CONSIDERING that the question of the re-establishment of the Royal Administration in the provinces of Sam Neua and Phong Saly is independent from that of the political settlement envisaged in Article 14 of the Geneva Agreement;

10. CONSIDERING that the re-establishment of the Royal Administration in the provinces of Sam Neua and Phong Saly has become immediately imperative in view of the approaching general elections;

11. RECOMMENDS:

(a) That the Royal Administration in the provinces of Sam Neua and Phong Saly should be re-established without further delay;

(b) That the Royal Government in resuming administration of the provinces of Sam Neua and Phong Saly should abide by the terms on its unilateral declaration at Geneva of July 21, 1954 referred to above;

(c) That the fighting units of Pathet Lao should endeavour within a limit of eight days from the date of the receipt of this recommendation to concert with the Royal Government the appropriate arrangements for the reintroduction of the Royal Administration;

(d) That if at the end of this period no, repeat no, agreement has been reached both parties will fully inform the International Commission on the situation and of their attitude.
Ends.

RESTORATION OF ROYAL ADMINISTRATION

At informal meeting today with Kirpal and Banerjee Indians gave us text of draft resolution, which they have submitted to New Delhi for approval, making recommendations regarding the political settlement. You will note that preamble is almost identical to preamble of my draft resolution on restoration of Royal Administration. Following is text of Indian draft resolution:

"The International Commission for Supervision and Control in Laos:

(a) Considering that the sovereignty, the independence, the unity and the territorial integrity of Laos were recognized in the Geneva settlement and expressly underwritten by all the members of the Geneva conference in paragraph 12 of their final declaration;

(b) Considering that the terms of the Royal declaration of 21 July, 1954, and the final declaration can be invoked as a guide to the interpretation of the nature of political settlement as envisaged under Article 14;

(c) Considering that the declaration of November 4, 1954, made by the Pathet Lao delegate on the Joint Commission that the Pathet Lao forces recognize the Royal Government and that in principle the administration of Pathet Lao in the two provinces of Phong Saly and Sam Neua is classified under the supreme authority of the Royal Government was recognition of the sovereignty of the Royal Government;

(d) Considering that by its unanimous resolution dated December 31, 1954, the International Commission recommended that representatives of the Royal Government and Pathet Lao should examine together the means to adopt with a view to attaining within the framework of the political settlement envisaged in Article 14 of the Geneva Agreement inter alia the re-establishment of the Royal Administration in the provinces of Phong Saly and Sam Neua;

(e) Considering that the negotiations between the parties have not so far led to the political settlement;

(f) Considering that the political settlement has become very urgent in view of the general elections which are to be held in 1955.

Recommends:

1. That the Royal Government should take immediate measures to integrate all citizens without discrimination including the fighting units of Pathet Lao into the national community and to guarantee them the enjoyment of the rights and freedoms for which the constitution of the kingdom provides;

2. That the Royal Government should take steps so that all Laotian citizens may freely participate as electors or candidates in the forthcoming general elections by secret ballot;

3. That pending the outcome of the general elections the Royal Government should promulgate measures to provide for special representation for the fighting units of Pathet Lao and for the Laotian nationals who did not support the Royal forces during hostilities in the Royal Administration of the provinces of Phong Saly and Sam Neua;
Recommends further:

4. That the fighting units of Pathet Lao should agree to be reintegrated in the national community and to offer their allegiance to the king of Laos and obedience to the law and constitution of Laos;

Recommends further both to the Royal Government and the FULP;

5. That they should create mutual confidence, trust and good will in order to implement the above stated recommendations and to build up one united stable, stronger and peace loving Laos."

2. Our first reaction is that this is much more than we expected Indians to propose. At meeting we suggested following small revision to recommendation to Pathet Lao. This was to add following to beginning of sentence. "In order to enable the Royal Government to implement the recommendations contained in the three paragraphs above the fighting units of Pathet Lao should." Indians agreed to this. Further comments will follow in separate telegram.

INDIAN DRAFT RESOLUTION FOR POLITICAL SETTLEMENT

You will have observed that Indian draft resolution practically reproduces "considering" one, three, four, seven, eight and 10 of our draft resolution on restoration of Royal Administration; also that its specific recommendations to the Royal Government correspond to the obligations undertaken by them in paragraph (group corrupt) the unilateral declaration. Its conclusions are broader insofar as it goes for the political settlement and not only for restoration of Royal Administration.

2. While I had so far maintained the thesis that the political settlement mentioned in Article 14 was solely the business of the parties, who had, therefore, the right to conclude it at the moment of their choice, the Indian resolution formally recommends that it be concluded now. I should welcome your legal opinion on this. For my part I feel I might elegantly fall in with the Indian proposal on the ground that the political settlement has now become necessary if the general elections are to take place before the end of 1955, as envisaged in paragraph three of the final declaration.

3. Last paragraph of Indian resolution is of course pure Indianish.

INDIAN DRAFT RESOLUTION FOR POLITICAL SETTLEMENT

We have referred the Indian resolution to Legal Division and shall forward its views early next week. In general, we think that you might hold your resolution in abeyance and go along with the Indian one provided you are satisfied that the Royal Government would consider it helpful.

2. It would perhaps have been better if the Commission were to state outright that the Royal Administration should be re-established in the northern provinces without further delay. However, we consider that paragraph 3 of the operative part of the Indian resolution is important because it implies that the Royal Administration should be so re-established. This point should be made clear to the Government. Recommendations 1 and 4 are also important in that they will give the Government the Commission's backing in any steps it takes to reintegrate the Pathet Lao into the national community, and this, in turn, will wipe out the separate authority of the Pathet Lao. It will, of course, be very difficult for the Government to implement these recommendations but, if the Pathet Lao do not cooperate, it would seem desirable for the Government to refer each such instance to the Commission so that the latter can, if necessary, give its blessing (in formal resolutions) to the Government measures which the P.L. refuse to follow. It will be very important in the following critical weeks for the Indians and ourselves to proceed in agreement and for the Government to work closely with the Commission insofar as possible and not to antagonize the Indian Delegation. It is to be hoped that the Indian Delegation will not be content to sit back and do nothing more.

3. On the other hand, if this Indian resolution is adopted, there is no specific obligation on the Government to clear everything with the Commission and it is perhaps better that way as the Government will be freer to push ahead with its task within the general framework of the Indian resolution.

4. You will gather that we consider that the Indian resolution represents an advance along the right lines in Indian thinking, and it is to be hoped that New Delhi will approve this initiative on the part of the Indian Delegation. We would have no objection if Williams were to let the Indian authorities know that you would be amenable to keeping your resolution in abeyance and voting for the Indian resolution, provided that the latter is not watered down. If you would like Williams to do this, please wire him direct with our blessing.

RESTORATION OF ROYAL ADMINISTRATION

1. The initiative of Kirpal and Banerjee in producing a draft resolution has not been welcomed by the ministry here.

2. At Dutt's request I called on him Saturday June 4. He told me that Sen would act as Chairman of the Indian delegation during the absence of Khosla. (I am inclined to think that this decision which was taken yesterday morning resulted from ministerial displeasure at Kirpal and Banerjee's action). Dutt went on to say that it has not yet been decided whether on Khosla's return Sen would become his political adviser or whether he would act as some sort of special representative of India in Laos.

3. Dutt told me that Banerjee's resolution did not jibe with the thinking in the Ministry, particularly in view of the appointment of Sen as a sort of mediator. Dutt said that he had only received Banerjee's resolution by mail on Friday June 3. A telegram was sent to Banerjee almost immediately instructing him not to proceed with the resolution.

4. Essentially the Indian position is that the restoration of the Royal administration in the two northern provinces and a political settlement must to some extent go hand in hand and that this may possibly be more easily achieved by the efforts of Sen rather than by a Commission resolution. Given this general position it is understandable why the Indians do not like our commissioner's resolution. Although Dutt said that he was not trying to influence our attitude he hopes I think that we will not press our resolution to a vote at this time.

5. I did not ask Dutt whether Sen, as acting Chairman, would support our resolution if it were put to a vote. Nor did Dutt give any specific indication of what the Indian attitude on our resolution might eventually be. I am inclined to think, however, that the Indians are not disposed to support us at this time.

6. I pointed out to Dutt that the record of the Commission must clearly show that it has done its best to assist the Royal Government to restore its administration in the two northern provinces. I emphasized that this was an important consideration. Dutt then alluded to the question of the Royal Laotian Government resorting to arms. He said such action would undoubtedly result in the Pathet Lao seeking assistance from its friends and in these circumstances it was by no means certain that the Royal Government would succeed. In any event the resulting situation would clearly upset the Geneva settlement. I argued that Commission approval of a resolution like that of our commissioners might deter the Royal Government from taking any precipitate action. This line of argument seemed to make some impression on Dutt.

7. Dutt told me that Desai who has recently returned to Delhi has reported that it is his considered opinion that it is unlikely that there will be any final settlement in Laos until the Vietminh see how things are working out in Vietnam. Dutt suggested that the Vietminh are probably unwilling at present to lose the protection to their flank which the Pathet Lao in the two northern provinces provide.

8. Although the Indian attitude is undoubtedly influenced to a very considerable degree by Sen's mission they also do not want the Commission to pass a resolution which would produce no practical result but would merely harden the existing deadlock which they seem to think might be resolved given more time for negotiation. The Indians are not, I think, optimistic that the Pathet Lao will suddenly become more cooperative than they have been in the past. On the other hand the Indians appear to be hopeful that the Pathet Lao may eventually provide more cooperation.

9. In view of Dutt's present attitude to Mayrand's resolution you may wish to consider the desirability of going slow for the moment until Mayrand has spoken with Sen and Holmes has seen Dutt. It is, I believe, going to be a difficult job to bring the Indians along with us certainly until Sen has been if not disillusioned at least frustrated. There is I suppose something to be said for giving Sen a chance, as long as the Indians understand that we will not cool our heels interminably.

RESTORATION OF ROYAL ADMINISTRATION

At yesterday's meeting as I was pressing for vote on our main resolution, adding that I would insist on publicizing results, Sen offered to substitute draft letter to Prime Minister in answer to Katay's questions as to right of Royal Government to re-establish its administration in the two northern provinces. Sen's draft letter was not satisfactory to us because it did not make clear distinction between theoretical right as already admitted by Pathet Lao and claim to effective administration as affirmed by the Royal Government, this claim having so far been rejected by Pathet Lao pending political settlement.

2. We proposed alterations to Indian draft and to our pleasant surprise succeeded in having Polish delegate accept our principal amendments. Main paragraphs unanimously adopted; text reads as follows: "The Geneva Agreement in Laos does not, repeat not, make any specific mention of the establishment of the Royal Administration in any part of Laos but the right of the two provinces from the date of the cease fire may be deduced from the recognition by the Geneva (powers?) of the unity of Laos and the sovereignty of the Royal Government over the entire country. This has never been disputed and has been recognized in principle by the fighting units of Pathet Lao in their declaration of November 4, 1954."

3. Our concession was in second part of letter which reads as follows: "The Commission realizes, however, that in view of the conditions prevailing in the provinces of Phong Saly and Sam Neua it would be difficult to establish the Royal Administration in these two provinces effectively without the political settlement envisaged in article (14(d)?) of the Agreement. It is presumed that what ever arrangement might be arrived at by the parties must conform with the basic pattern of the Geneva Agreement. The Commission, therefore, reiterates its hope that the talks between the parties will be resumed without delay and that all efforts will be made to pursue them until the political settlement is reached".

4. I consider it an appreciable gain to have secured the admission by Polish delegation of Royal Government right to (group corrupt) actual administration as from the date of the cease fire. We even obtained from Poles their assent to communicating contents of this letter to the press.

5. Polish Acting Commissioner is too experienced to have yielded to us by mistake, and I, therefore, presume he must have received new instructions from his government. Could it be result of negotiations at higher international level? I cannot say but will watch for further indications of a change.

6. I announced that I would merely suspend action on my draft resolution while observing progress of political negotiations. We now propose to cooperate with Sen in assisting parties in these negotiations if feasible. If and when Sen has had opportunity of seeing for himself that Pathet Lao are simply opposed to (full?) political settlement at present juncture, then we might re-introduce our resolution again.

SITUATION IN LAOS

The following is a review of the general progress of the work of the Laos Commission and proposals on the position which we might take during the next two months.

(a) SEATO. Present indications are that nothing will come out of the Bangkok meeting which would give opportunity for Poles or Indians to raise objections (see our recent progress reports on subject). Any publicity on military aid agreement, however, might result in this being discussed in Commission. August eight Lao Presse carried story concerning direct aid for the armed forces of Laos being transferred to a special semi-autonomous section of the State Department. At Political Committee meeting on August nine Poles raised possibility of military aid agreement and Indians assured them that Commission would examine any such agreement carefully. The text of exchange of notes which you sent to us under Washington's letter No. 1214 of July 18<sup>†63</sup> would indicate there is nothing in them contrary to Geneva Agreement.

(b) We have no reports of increasing Vietminh intervention except those referred to you in our military appreciations. We cannot, however, rule out possibility suggested by you as there seems little doubt that situation in Vietnam is closely tied up with (group corrupt) of two provinces. We will continue to press for investigation into Vietminh activities but cannot be too optimistic about success (see our telegram number 139 of July 21†).

(c) Attitude of Royal Government on political talks has not been encouraging. A combination of inexperience and laziness has led them to procrastination. They delay talks on most flimsy pretexts and do not present arguments well. Full reports of political negotiations have gone forward to you in our weekly progress reports and despatches. Royal Government seems more anxious to conclude reasonable military settlement, at least in Province of Sam Neua, probably due to difficulties of supply and reinforcement of isolationists. They indicate preference for good sized area based upon border of Xieng Khouang Province but with additional wedge projecting well into Province of Sam Neua for purposes of prestige and retention of degree of influence. Consolidated area would permit them to set up nucleus of Royal Administration. Royal Government have continually pressed Commission to take more active role in helping settlement of problems in Phong Saly and Sam Neua. They have particularly called for Commission assistance in interpretation of contentious articles 14 and (19?) and in re-establishment of Royal Administration.

(d) Our relations with Indians continue to be good. At recent Commission meeting Sen told Poles that only real difference between Canadian and Indian views are on method and timing. Indians do not wish to become involved in legal question or interpretations of articles unless there is complete breakdown in negotiations. We on other hand, think that clarification by Commission of points of difference might facilitate negotiations. For Sen's plans see paragraph 2(d) below.

2. Following are our views on various questions you have raised:

(a) Possibility of agreement on election procedure seems slight as Royal Government will not agree to amendment of electoral law nor would there appear to be time for them to undertake or implement amendments. They have promised no discrimination against Pathet Lao sympathizers, but their assurances are not accepted by Pathet Lao. For latest points of view see paragraph 1 of our weekly progress report No. 45 of August 6th† and my despatch No. 335 of August 6th.†

<sup>63</sup> Pour l'échange de notes, voir United States, Department of State, United States Treaties and Other International Agreements, 1956, Volume 7, part 3, Washington D.C.: United States Government Printing Office, 1957, No. 3664, pp. 2833-2838.

For the exchange of notes, see United States, Department of State, United States Treaties and Other International Agreements, 1956, Volume 7, part 3, Washington D.C.: United States Government Printing Office, 1957, No. 3664, pp. 2833-2838.

(b) Sen raised question of elections yesterday. He seemed satisfied with views expressed in your telegram No. 98 of July 2nd† and apparently realizes Commission could only play limited supervisory role. There is no indication Royal Government wish direct Commission intervention, although they might seek our advice and agree to Commission acting in observatory and limited supervisory capacity. They consider, however, that conduct and management of the elections is their sole prerogative. We are aware of danger of establishing precedent in Laos which might embarrass you in Vietnam and will not make commitments without consulting you.

(c) Prospect for agreement on restoration of Royal Administration in two northern provinces has deteriorated (see paragraph one of our telegram No. 152 of August 6th†) which indicates that two positions are very far apart indeed. Royal Government expressed satisfaction at Commission's letter of June 15th but would prefer stronger recommendation such as that proposed in my resolution.

(d) Sen is extremely concerned about slow progress of political negotiations, and new Polish Commissioner unlike predecessor shows some awareness of need for urgency. Because political talks did not get underway as soon as expected and have progressed more slowly than we hoped for, Sen has somewhat revised timetable. His plans as told us yesterday are as follows:

(i) As elections are scheduled for December 25 and campaigning is to commence 60 days beforehand with nominations on October 20, the last possible date for settlement, keeping in mind that minimum time needed for arrangements and preparation of electoral rolls is one month, would be September 19.

(ii) Because of inexperience and poor administration longer time would be preferable so Sen agrees if discussions have not made progress by September four Commission must start making recommendations. This would give three weeks for Commission to pass resolution but Sen hopes we would accomplish this by September 10 which would give ten days for parties to accept or reject. In the meantime Sen leaves on August 13 to call on Prince Souvannavong at Sam Neua in last attempt to persuade Pathet Lao to be more reasonable. He bases hope that this might produce some results on talks he had with Pham Van Dong during recent visit to Hanoi. I think Sen's timetable shows his complete awareness of need for action. Final attitude of Indian Government is, of course always element of doubt.

LAOS

In the course of a general conversation today the Laos Desk officer at the State Department, Miss Byrne, expressed again the State Department's concern at developments in Laos.

2. As you are aware from previous correspondence, the State Department hopes that the International Control Commission will find it possible to report to the co-Chairmen of the Geneva Conference in a fashion which will lend strong support to the Royal Government's claim to authority over the two northern provinces. The State Department realizes the importance of the Indian attitude on the point and recognizes that the Indian Government must be convinced of Pathet Lao intransigence. Interested United States officials are concerned, however, at Sen's willingness to delay Commission action unduly.

3. Miss Byrne said that the State Department had learned of Sen's most recent change of timetable, which would delay Commission action several weeks. They heard as well that the visit to New Delhi of Crown Prince Savang has been put off until late in September. They are inclined to believe that New Delhi has been responsible for delaying the Crown Prince's visit in order that Sen may continue his efforts.

4. There has been some thought given in the State Department to a United States approach to New Delhi on the Laos situation. It had been decided, in the light of Prince Savang's forthcoming visit, not to make United States representations at this time. The State Department believes that Savang is the most capable spokesman Laos can field and was, therefore, not inclined to "steal his thunder" in New Delhi. The delay in his trip may, however, cause a change in the State Department's plans.

5. Miss Byrne asked us to express to you the State Department's appreciation for your willingness to provide it with the accounts of Sen's talks with Souvannavong and the Vietnam Foreign Minister (your telegrams No. 1504 and 1493 of August 26).† As you might expect, responsible State Department officials regard gloomily Sen's appreciation of the good faith of the two individuals with whom he spoke. The State Department understands that Sen has also made arrangements for a meeting between Prime Minister Katay and Souvannavong.

LAOS

Please tell State Department that we share their concern at delays in the Commission's action and their desire that the Commission lend support to the Government's case in the two northern provinces.

2. On the first point Mayrand's reports indicate that Sen is quite conscious of the need for the Commission to act in time before the election preliminaries (nominations, preparation of rolls) are under way. We understand that the United Kingdom Ambassador in Laos is sounding out Sen discreetly with a view to getting some confirmation of our understanding of the Indian timetable and with the hope of getting Sen a little more firmly committed to dates for Commission action.

3. In the first place, the Commission's effective intervention will, in our opinion, depend on how fully and responsibly the Government has presented its case in the current political negotiations, in order to make the Pathet Lao's bad faith and obstructionism apparent to all. We have received reports of an intended joint approach by the United Kingdom Ambassador with his American and French colleagues to the Royal Government to impress upon the latter the necessity of making the required presentation of its case.

4. Please convey to the State Department our view that it would be preferable for them to hold their hand with the Indians pending the United Kingdom Ambassador's soundings of Sen and the intended tripartite approach to the Royal Government. We think that United States intervention in Delhi might be a little premature at this time and not achieve the desired results; later it might be more effective. We would appreciate receiving any information which the State Department may have regarding the tripartite approach.

5. You might wish to remind the State Department that Indian tactics are not the result merely of an ingenuous attitude towards the Pathet Lao and a need to be convinced of Pathet Lao sincerity — although that is an element in it. Their chief concern, however, arises from their doubt as to whether a reference to the co-chairmen will achieve any useful result and their fear that it might only prevent what slight chance there is of the political settlement which alone could change the actual situation in the northern provinces. For our part we are, as the State Department knows, prepared to go ahead with a clear-cut finding against the Pathet Lao and a reference to the co-chairmen because we consider ourselves obliged to do so because we think this clarification of the legal position will be of some value. However, we doubt very much that such an act will alter the real position in Laos — unless, of course, the Western Powers are prepared to make an issue of Indochinese questions with the Communist Powers at the present time. While we do not quarrel with the State Department's desire for a Commission decision, we think that they may be overestimating what it would accomplish.

INDIAN PLAN FOR A SETTLEMENT IN LAOS

The Indians have submitted to the Commission their plan for a settlement in Laos and we have been asked to send our views on it to Vientiane at the latest by September 30 when Katay and Souvannavong are due to meet.

2. We have already receive from the United Kingdom and the United States a number of observations which we have taken into account in drafting the attached telegram of guidance for our Delegation which we submit for your signature if you approve.

3. We also attach a memorandum discussing the Indian plan in the two successive versions in which it was submitted to us.

J. L[ÉGER]

[PIÈCE JOINTE/ENCLOSURE]

NoteMemorandum

[Ottawa], September 28, 1955

THE TWO VERSIONS OF THE INDIAN PLAN FOR A POLITICAL SETTLEMENT IN LAOS

Our main objective in Laos is the re-incorporation of the two northern provinces, Phong Saly and Sam Neua. There are three aspects to this re-incorporation:

- (a) Administrative: the restoration of Royal Administration in the two provinces;
- (b) Electoral: the holding of national elections under the conduct of the Royal Laotian Government;
- (c) Military: the demobilization and/or integration of the Fighting Units of the Pathet Lao in the Laotian National Army.

2. On September 12, the Indian Chairman communicated informally to our Delegation his plan for a political settlement which would achieve this triple re-incorporation. All three aspects were worked out in some detail although without a precise enough procedure on timetable for their implementation. On September 21 we sent Mr. Mayrand a telegram [Y-162]† instructing him to press for a procedure and timetable. These instructions were based on the premise that a sufficient degree both of Royal Administration in the two northern provinces and of military integration of the Pathet Lao had to be achieved in order that the elections in effect be held under RLG responsibility and that there be no post-election possibility of Pathet Lao disengagement from the political settlement.

3. In the meantime, the Indian Chairman submitted to the Commission a much watered down version of his plan:

Original Plan

(a) a fifty-fifty division of RLG and PL officials in the two northern provinces.

(b) elections to be fully under responsibility of RLG.

(c) regroupment and check of PL forces and integration of them by small groups into limited number of LNA units.

Modified Plan

(a) appointment of Royal Laotian Governor and one or two high functionaries; joint RLG-PL administrative councils to recommend other appointments.

(b) same but with joint RLG-PL advisory councils to check possible irregularities and closer I.C. supervision of and participation in electoral proceedings.

(c) no military integration scheme provided except in most general terms.

4. The main purpose of this watering down was apparently to make it more difficult for the Pathet Lao to refuse the plan: thus restoration of Royal Administration was limited to the appointment of a minimum of officials, more "guarantees" concerning elections were given and no suggestion was made of disappearance of PL units into the LNA.

5. The watering down was also the result of a series of behind-the-scenes conversations in Vientiane. For instance, the military integration scheme was dropped by Mr. Sen at the insistence of the U.S. Ambassador, Mr. Yost, that it would result in the LNA being contaminated by Communist elements and the whole future of American aid for Laos would be prejudiced if it became known that the U.S. Government should subsidize an army containing appreciable communist elements.

6. Mr. Young, the director of the State Department's Office of Southeast Asian Affairs, has told our Embassy in Washington that "the State Department agrees (i.e. with Mr. Yost) that the integration of Pathet Lao forces throughout the Royal Army might lead quickly to the subversion of the only element of strength on the Royal Government's side, the Royal Army" (paragraph 5 of telegram 1609 of September 21 from Washington†).

7. On the subject of Royal Administration, the Laotian Prime Minister himself said to the United Kingdom Ambassador in one of the behind-the-scenes conversations that restoration on a fifty-fifty basis was not required and that it would suffice, in order to achieve control of the electoral machinery, that the Governor, the President of the tribunal and the Tassengs<sup>64</sup> (officials who control the polling stations according to the electoral law) be all Royal Laotians. It would appear that the modified Indian plan has been kept vague on the subject of Royal Administration in order to permit the hammering out of an agreed scheme between the two parties.

8. However, there is another aspect of the restoration scheme in the modified plan. It calls for joint RLG-PL administrative councils which would have the task of recommending the officials to be appointed in addition to the few high functionaries. The Foreign Office has commented that it does not like this formula because in effect the Royal Government would be giving hostages to the Pathet Lao and the joint administrative councils would play straight into the latter's hands. The State Department have also expressed concern at his scheme which would, in their opinion, not only compromise the fundamental principle of the Geneva Agreement that the Royal Government had authority over the two northern provinces, but also that the scheme would leave the way open for needless negotiations, during which time the Pathet Lao would continue in de facto control in the provinces and would reinforce that control.

9. With regard to the conduct of the elections, the modified Indian plan, while providing for joint RLG-PL councils to check possible irregularities, does not seem to give these councils much teeth in that it requires that they take action only on a two-thirds vote. In practice this would probably mean that the Pathet Lao would find it difficult to push a complaint through: the Progressive and the Independent Parties, who now form the governmental coalition, would together be able to block any such complaint even if the other party (National Union) now in opposition with only four deputies should do the unlikely and vote with the Pathet Lao on those committees. However, the existence of such councils could conceivably prevent irregularities from being committed, even if no complaint could effectively be made should an irregularity have in fact occurred.

10. Of more immediate interest to us is the provisions in the modified Indian plan according to which the Commission would have representatives:

- (a) At the polling stations, to ensure fairness and to sign papers recording the count;
- (b) at the taking of the final count at the provincial headquarters.

11. The Pathet Lao would apparently attach some importance to such a safeguard which would not be unreasonable in Foreign Office opinion. The latter have expressed the hope that we will not be "too unbending" on this point. Our attitude so far is that the Commission should take no direct responsibility in the election and should only supervise them generally in accordance with the provisions in the Geneva Agreement concerning the safeguard of democratic freedoms and the prevention of reprisals.

12. As can be seen from the foregoing, the modified Indian plan removes drastically any possibility that our Delegation implement our instructions of September 21 and seek to obtain acceptance of the principle that Royal Administration be sufficiently restored and the Pathet Lao sufficiently integrated to permit an effective conduct of the elections by the Royal Laotian Government. The original Indian plan was definitely slanted in favour of the RLG and would have put the onus of rejection on the Pathet Lao, whereas the modified plan is more "neutral". Conceived, as Mr. Sen says, to make it more difficult for the Pathet Lao to reject it, the possibility is however increased that the onus of rejection will be on the RLG, which causes considerable dissatisfaction in the Foreign Office. The modified plan would clearly give the Pathet Lao a maximum chance of getting their candidates elected in the two northern provinces and it gives no guarantee that, after the elections, Royal Administration will have been restored to any effective degree. Finally, with the Pathet Lao forces still intact there would be no change in the practical situation. There would only be a new national assembly with probably some Pathet Lao deputies.

13. It is against the background described in the foregoing that we have prepared our telegram of instructions to Vientiane.

LAOS: PLAN FOR POLITICAL SETTLEMENT

It is not clear to us here just what procedure is envisaged by you and by Sen in putting his plan to the parties and in subsequent Commission action should the plan be rejected by one of the parties. Your telegrams have tended to emphasize the formal character of the recommendations and automatic reference to the co-chairmen if the recommendations are rejected. Williams' telegrams suggest that both Sen and the Ministry conceive of the plan as more informal proposals to the parties with the question of a reference to the co-chairmen in the event of rejection less automatic. It may be well, therefore, for us to clarify first our views as to the competence of the Commission to make recommendations regarding (a) restoration of the Royal Administration in the two northern provinces, (b) elections and (c) military settlement.

2. Competence of the Commission Regarding Restoration of the Royal Administration: It has been our view that the Commission is competent to recommend the restoration of the Royal Administration in the two northern provinces along the lines of Mayrand's proposed resolution.<sup>65</sup> If the RLG and the PL are unable to reach agreement on a procedure for giving this recommendation effect then we think that the Commission could propose a procedure which recognizes the sovereignty of the RGL (i.e. is acceptable to it) and protects the PL against reprisals. Should (a) the general recommendation and (b) the proposal of a procedure to give it effect be rejected by the PL then we think that a report should be made to the co-chairmen under Article 36.

3. Competence of the Commission Regarding Elections: We do not think that the Commission is competent (a) to recommend a plan for the elections as this would trench upon the sovereign authority of the RLG or (b) to serve in any executive capacity in the conduct of the elections as this would exceed its supervisory functions as defined in paragraph 27. Its role should be confined to observation, hearing complaints and reporting. In addition, as you know, we have a special private reason for wishing to avoid establishing a precedent in Laos for the Commission laying down a plan to ensure fair elections which could be used as an argument for the Commission laying down a similar plan for elections in Vietnam. For these reasons we cannot agree to the Commission sponsoring Sen's plan for elections although we would have no objection to modified proposals being put to RLG by Sen on a personal basis. Rejection of such proposals by RLG would not, however, fall within provisions of paragraph 36.

4. Competence of the Commission Regarding Military Settlement: Article 14 gives the fighting units of the Pathet Lao a special status in Phong Saly and Sam Neua only "pending a political settlement". We interpret the political settlement to be one reached directly between the RLG and the PL or the holding of elections by Royal Government whose administration has been restored in the two northern provinces. As the political settlement can only be implemented progressively we consider that a military settlement might properly go hand in hand with the restoration of the Royal Administration. If the RLG and the PL fail to reach agreement on a procedure we consider it within the competence of the Commission to recommend a procedure. If rejected, we consider that a report to the co-chairmen would be called for under article 36.

5. It should be observed that the Laos agreement does not contain provisions similar to those of articles 5 and 6 of the Cambodia agreement relating to the demobilization on the spot of the Khmer resistance forces and their acceptance for service in the regular army or local police formations if they satisfy the conditions required for current recruitment. The Laotian Government is only obliged by its declaration to take the necessary measures to integrate all citizens, without discrimination, into the national community and to guarantee them the enjoyment of the rights and freedoms for which the constitution of the Kingdom provides. It is evident, therefore, that the RLG is not obliged to accept members of the fighting forces of the Pathet Lao for integration into the Laotian National Army and we do not think that the Commission is competent to make such a recommendation. The Commission is competent to recommend how the LNA should progressively take over the two provinces in step with the progressive implementation of the political settlement and in interpretation of articles 14 and 19.

6. From a practical point of view we imagine that the RLG is concerned to find some plan to minimize the continuing threat that would be posed by part of the fighting forces of the Pathet Lao taking to the jungle or retreating into Vietminh territory as the LNA takes over the two provinces. Although carrying evident risks we thought that Sen's original plan for integration of the FFPL professionals might serve as some inducement to the latter not to go to the Maquis while retaining sufficient guarantees of preponderant non-communist control of the army. We consider that this or any other plan is solely the responsibility of the RLG and that it is for them to weigh the pros and cons including the U.S. reservations which should be given due weight. You are authorized to discuss the problem informally but not to make any recommendation.

7. Presentation of the Plan: For the reasons mentioned above we believe that the Commission should not adopt Sen's plan as a formal recommendation to the parties, but should instead pass a modified version of the assumptions and chapter I of it to them as informal suggestions for a political settlement. At the Commission meeting when this decision is taken, you should inform the Commission that if the parties have not signified their willingness to accept the plan by October 11, you plan then to call for a vote on your resolution for the restoration of RLG sovereignty. The stage will then be set for a reference to the co-chairmen at a later date when the time seems suitable, at which time a factual report could also be presented recounting the presentation of the informal suggestions and the reaction to them.

8. You should also indicate at the Commission meeting that in view of the limitations on the Commission's competence we cannot agree to the inclusion of the section of the plan concerning elections as part of the Commission's informal suggestions, although we would be quite happy if these are passed to the parties as purely Indian proposals.

9. Finally, you should indicate that if the political settlement plan is accepted by the parties, the Commission will have to consider at a later stage the question of a military settlement (which will have to be implemented in conjunction with the political settlement), this being a matter properly within the Commission's competence and therefore a legitimate subject for a Commission recommendation.

10. Detailed Comments: We think that it would be useful to incorporate a brief statement containing the essential assumption of the resolution on the restoration of Royal Administration, i.e. that the latter is consistent with the Geneva Agreement and that the unilateral Laotian declaration as well as necessary for the holding of the elections. This incorporation could take the form of a preamble to paragraph 5(a) of your telegram under reference.

11. We note that paragraph 5(a)(i) provides for "nomination and establishment of Royal Governors, etc." We think that it should be made clear that the nomination is to be made by the RLG. The present wording is so vague as to permit the Pathet Lao to argue that they also could make nominations. We note that the RLG requested, and that the Indians consider, that the plan should be amended to permit the two governors to take such a number of Royal officials, both administrative personnel and police, as may be necessary to enable them to carry out their tasks. We would welcome such an amendment and would like to add that the tasks should be defined sufficiently so that they will include the conduct of the elections and everything necessary to the actual restoration of Royal Administration.

12. Paragraph 5(b)(ii) merely provides that the implementation of the scheme about changes is to begin on October 11. We think that this procedure should be speeded up so that the fifty-fifty formula or any other one acceptable to the RLG can be achieved by the time the elections are held. Otherwise, a loophole would be provided for the PL to carry out obstruction and delaying tactics.

13. Apart from not being very satisfactory to the RLG and the United States, the Joint Administrative Councils provided for the two provinces leave something to be desired in our opinion as well. We recognize that the governors should have some machinery at their disposal for consultation with the Pathet Lao concerning the change over. However, the Joint Administrative Councils in their present form could be used by the Pathet Lao to upset or even veto the regular administrative procedures. The word "joint" in their designation also smacks a little too much of Pathet Lao proposals made earlier in the year. We would therefore prefer that the designation reflect, or at least that the body be given, a consultative role, i.e. one which would not involve the veto and would be decreasing to the point of an eventual windup once the fifty-fifty formula is established in practice or alternatively by the time the elections are held. In this respect we think that the plan should set a date for the termination of activity of the administrative councils.

14. Paragraph 6(b)(vi) of your telegram under reference should be restricted to its first repeat first and third repeat third sentences, as the second sentence implies the taking of initiative which could be construed as interference. The fourth sentence might be replaced by something to the effect that the Commission's teams should inform the Commission.

15. We understand that the Indians have objections to the teams signing the record of the results. We share those objections on the grounds that the teams should restrict themselves to an observation role.

16. We trust that the "Commission" referred to in sub-paragraph (xi) is the Royal Laotian electoral commission described in subparagraph (viii) and not the International Commission.

17. We would have no objection to paragraph 7 of your telegram under reference provided its dispositions are acceptable to the RLG. Finally we are happy to note your views as expressed in your telegram 209 of September 27† that "it is now more essential than ever that the plan be made acceptable to the Royal Government." We would like to emphasize the corollary of this which should be our guiding principle: that if the plan is to be rejected, the rejection must be made by the Pathet Lao and not by the RLG. Now that the Pathet Lao are taking a stiffer attitude and that Prince Souvannavong has called off his meeting with Katay, according to CRO telegram, the rejection will very likely come from the expected quarters. We trust that within the framework of the above instructions it will be possible to achieve at least a moral RLG victory.

PLAN FOR POLITICAL SETTLEMENT

As it seems important to carry Sen with us as far as possible before the plan is discussed in the Commission, at my first meeting with him on September 29 and at the two meetings with him and Talbot on September 30 I conveyed to him our views as I understood them when I left Ottawa and as outlined in your telegram Y162 of September 21 (Ballachey had already conveyed similar views to the Indians before my arrival). At the second meeting with Talbot, the latter proposed, in somewhat greater detail, the modifications which Malcolm MacDonald had already suggested in New Delhi.

2. The result of these conversations may be summarized as follows (references are to text as in our telegram No. 198).

(a) In paragraph 5(a)(i). Sen has agreed to replacement of words "and one or two high functionaries" to words "with sufficient officials to enable them to carry out their tasks".

(b) In paragraph 5(a)(ii). Sen has agreed to alteration of "Joint Administrative Councils" to "Pathet Lao Advisory Councils" or some such designation, the important point being that the function of these bodies would be advisory, not, repeat not, administrative, and that they would be entirely Pathet Lao. He has also agreed to consequential changes in other parts of paragraph 5, i.e., in 5(a)(iii) which incidentally would now be moved into the second phase; in 5(b)(ii) the opening word of which would read "the Governor, on the advice of the Advisory Councils should, etc."; in 5(b)(v) and in 5(f)(ii).

(c) The right of the government to take disciplinary action without veto by the Advisory Councils would somehow be safeguarded in 5(f)(i) although it is not, repeat not, yet clear whether Sen would be prepared to abandon the concept of a discharged Pathet Lao man being replaced by another Pathet Lao.

(d) Paragraph 6(b)(vi) would be amended so that there would be no, repeat no, expectation that the Commission's teams would normally be present at the polling booths or that they would take any initiative themselves to remedy a defect on the spot.

(e) The provisions for signing of results by members of the Commission team could be deleted from paragraph 6b(vii) although consideration might be given to team members, where feasible, observing the count. The Royal Government have indicated they would not, repeat not, object to this.

3. On Saturday evening, on receipt of your telegram No. Y168 I had a further meeting with Sen, at which Ballachey was present. I told him I had received my instructions and outlined to him the main substance of your paragraphs 2-16. The results of this conversation may be summarized as follows:

(a) Restoration of Royal Administration: Sen in no way disputes the competence of the Commission to recommend restoration but points out that it is implicit in the plan that the Royal Administration be restored. He feels that a statement such as that suggested in your paragraph 10 would be rather out of place as a preamble to paragraph 5(a) and he would prefer to expand the introductory point in paragraph 4 by including a statement to the effect that the suggestions are made on the assumption that the settlement is to be in accordance with the Geneva Agreement, the Laotian declarations and the final declaration of the Geneva powers which provide for restoration of Royal Administration, elections, democratic freedoms and guarantees against reprisals.

(b) Elections: Sen accepts your judgement that the Commission is not, repeat not, competent to recommend a plan for the elections but observed with a shrug that, in a sense, "the whole thing is illegal". By this he meant that the Commission is not, repeat not, really supposed to be in the business of suggesting a basis for a "political settlement". He supposed that the election proposals might be put forward by him personally but rather shrank from the prospect of another piece of the plan being handled on a different procedural basis from its main body. I will enlarge on this point when discussing "presentation of the plan". So far as the Commission role vis-à-vis conduct of the elections is concerned, there is little difference between the Indian view and ours. I think we can reach a satisfactory understanding along the lines of your paragraphs 14 and 15.

(c) Military Settlement

(i) Sen agrees with the sense of your paragraphs 4-6. We are agreed that the first essential is an agreement between the parties which would separate the forces. The attitude of the Defence Minister, when I talked to him on September 30, was not, repeat not, encouraging. He clearly felt that the Pathet Lao were in bad faith and were simply buying time and he gave no indication that the RLG intended to end the remaining area of disagreement by giving favourable consideration to the latest Pathet Lao proposal. Katay, when Sen saw him the same day, gave him the impression that the latest Pathet Lao proposal had not, repeat not, yet been considered by Cabinet. Sen is doing his best, in Katay's absence, to impress on the Pathet Lao their desirability of military agreement and will, I hope, take the matter up with him on his return.

(ii) With respect to integration I was glad to learn through the Americans here that you had discussed in Washington the difficulty posed by their opposition to absorption for a portion of Pathet Lao forces to LNA. I was disappointed to learn subsequently from the Americans that, in despite of Canadian and United Kingdom views, the State Department had officially confirmed Yost's stand. I do not know whether or not, repeat not, Yost has yet advised RLG accordingly. When I saw Katay on September 30 he spoke of the need to integrate some Pathet Lao forces in at the LNA. When Sen saw the Crown Prince the following day the latter spoke of certain difficulties in the way of this, though he said nothing about the United States attitude and I believe was thinking of Laotian difficulties. I take it last sentence of your paragraph 6 does not, repeat not, imply objection to paragraph 5(e)(i) of draft plan. In absence of some basis for discussion between parties of integration of some Pathet Lao into LNA, inclusion of 5(e)(ii) is all the more desirable; it is, however, a very inadequate substitute for a more concrete proposal outside the plan, and negotiations might well founder for lack of practical means of bringing about disbandment of the Pathet Lao forces.

(iii) I will endeavour to have Sen include in the plan something along the lines of the last sentence of your paragraph 5 but I am doubtful if he would consider this useful in present circumstances.

(d) Your Detailed Comments

(i) Sen is agreeable to the suggestion in the first sentence of your paragraph 11.

(ii) Sen is somewhat at a loss as to origin of suggestion re police in this paragraph. The only time that police have been mentioned as far as we know was in the Foreign Office plan which Sen has not, repeat not, seen. I will endeavour to have phrasing broad enough to include police.

(iii) The important point covered in your paragraph 12 is one which we have several times made to the Indians without success. Sen says that it would be impossible to have the administrative changeover completed by the time election takes place. This is especially the case because of the absence of a military settlement. Until Sen can feel assured that establishment of Royal Administration can march hand in hand with a military settlement as well as with electoral preparations, it will be very difficult to move him on this point. I shall probably have to bring to bear more specifically the arguments in your paragraph 2. Perhaps the key passage here is your interpretation of a procedure which recognizes the sovereignty of the RLG as one which is acceptable to it. You will have noticed from the information we have sent you on the RLG attitude to the plan, that they would probably be satisfied with something like the 50-50 formula. Our recent information suggests they will revert to the view that what they really need is control of all the Tassengs; according to Sen this means they are confident the Tassengs could exert their traditional influence to win the elections for them. Furthermore, the Crown Prince has sounded Sen out on the idea that elections in the two northern provinces simply be postponed until such time as the Royal Administration is effectively restored. Talbot has discouraged Sen from thinking seriously of this because he fears that, in effect, the status quo would simply be prolonged indefinitely. For the reasons outlined, however, I am not, repeat not, hopeful at present that Sen will agree to tightening of the plan in the manner you suggest.

(iv) The suggestions in your paragraph 13 have already been met, except for that in your last sentence which I think I could get covered by some modification of 5(b).

(v) The important points in your paragraphs 14 and 15 have been met.

(vi) The assumption in your paragraph 16 is correct.

(vii) We understand that paragraph 7 would be acceptable to the RLG.

(e) Presentation of the Plan: Sen envisages the plan as going forward as informal suggestions from the Commission, preferably on a unanimous basis. He hopes that this technique will allow us to agree to inclusion of the chapter on elections. I have said that I might be able to agree to this if he would agree in advance that, in the event of there being no agreement, the substance of the plan would be formally written into the Commission records along with a formal record of the attitudes adopted by the parties. Sen thought this reasonable and suggested that the plan might then be included in an interim report to the co-chairmen with a covering explanation that it was not a formal recommendation but only informal suggestions which all three delegations had agreed to make to the parties. Sen said he realized it might also be necessary to pass recommendations on specific issues such as restoration of the administration, within the Commission's competence which, if turned down by one or both of the parties, would provide basis for reference under Article 36. He would like, however, to be sure that the plan as a whole could be drawn to the co-chairmen's attention and he felt this was a way of accomplishing his aim without becoming involved in legal controversies. If this procedure were followed I would prefer that the recommendations be made simultaneously and forwarded at the same time as the interim report. I have not, repeat not, yet spoken to Sen about the use we would make of Mayrand's resolution in the event there is no settlement, though he doubtless guesses we have this in mind. I will of course speak at the meeting in the sense of the second sentence of your paragraph 7.

4. There is to be a Commission meeting tomorrow but I doubt if the plan will be discussed. As of last night Zambrowicz was still waiting for his instructions. In any case Sen intends to discuss the plan with him privately, as he has with me, before it is discussed by the Commission. I intend to have another session with Sen after he sees Zambrowicz and before discussion in the Commission. This discussion must, of course, take place soon, whether or not, repeat not, there is to be a Katay-Souvannavong meeting. If there is, the plan would be introduced with the agreement of the parties if they are unable to reach a settlement themselves. Last night I asked Sen what he proposed to do if there were no meeting. I thought it might be presented simultaneously to the RLG and the Pathet Lao delegation here.

5. It is perhaps unlikely that we can agree unanimously in the Commission on the substance of the suggestions to be made to the parties. For this reason my main objective is to obtain maximum agreement with Sen, while preserving the essentials of our position in the light of our interpretation of the agreement and the legitimate rights of the Royal Laotian Government. Sen will try very hard for an agreed plan; failing this, he will be much inclined to put the plan forward himself. He does not, repeat not, want to side with us against the Poles in this matter or vice versa, if he can possibly avoid it. If it comes to this, I will try to convince him that our views flow from an objective appraisal of the Geneva agreement.

PLAN FOR POLITICAL SETTLEMENT

In view of the positive instructions in your telegram Y168 regarding deletion from plan of section on elections I tried hard this morning to persuade Sen to accept deletion. I was unsuccessful and Sen made it clear that if we insisted he would put the whole plan forward as his own indicating degree of concurrence by colleagues.

2. I said we prefer plan to go forward as informal suggestions from Commission and suggested our position vis-à-vis the elections might be somewhat eased if the prefatory assumptions were to include one to the effect that, even though some of the matters touched on do not fall within the Commission's competence, the parties desire to receive informal suggestions on these as well as on other matters as a possible basis for settlement. Sen said he would be agreeable to such an addition to the preamble.

3. I also made another effort to have the draft tightened up with respect to effective restoration of administration during election period. After consulting Talbot I decided that, in view of Sen's previous attitude, it would be impossible to have paragraph 5(b)(ii) strengthened to an extent satisfactory to the RLG. Since the RLG appear to make a distinction between the officials required to supervise the conduct of the elections and those needed to fully restore their administration, I decided to ask Sen to add to the first sentence of paragraph 5(a)(i) as now amended a definition of the tasks as including supervision of the conduct of the elections. He agreed to this if it were prefaced by the word "primarily". I am satisfied that this was as far as Sen can be moved at the present time.

4. Sen said Zambiwicz had raised no real difficulties but had warned Sen that he might have more points to raise in the light of his instructions which he has still not yet received. In spite of this Sen is now redrafting the plan in the light of our comments and intends to discuss it with us tomorrow. I understand that, if plan is sufficiently agreed by Friday afternoon, Sen will raise it in Commission meeting that afternoon making clear it would be put forward in Rangoon as informal suggestions if and when desired by parties. He hopes agreed (group corrupt) and translation can be completed before departure but will not insist on this.

5. With regard to inclusion of section on elections I would be grateful if you would weigh possible future difficulties in Vietnam against likely consequences of deletion with respect to more immediate Laotian situation. It appears that Royal Government is fully prepared to receive suggestions regarding elections and is reasonably satisfied with proposals as now drafted; also, I understand that the Commission made some suggestions regarding elections in Cambodia and that our role here would be along similar lines. Also if section is deleted Sen will almost certainly put plan forward himself and we would have no guarantee that the important amendments we desire would be included. Result might be proposals difficult for RLG to accept even after discussion. Further disadvantage would be possibility that if plan is not accepted by Sen he (group omitted) not support us on recommendation re restoration of Royal Administration. As you know we do not rate chances of agreement in Rangoon very high and are anxious to reserve satisfactory basis for future action in which Indian co-operation essential.

6. I made it clear to Sen that, while I hope to be able to agree to inclusion of section on elections on basis outlined above, I cannot guarantee this. At the Commission meeting I will reserve our right to disassociate ourselves from inclusion of this section in the plan but I very much hope that you may be able to authorize me to agree to its inclusion.

7. I take it that paragraph two of your telegram No. Y-168 refers to a recommendation along the line of Mayrand's which we may introduce at a later date and not to the Sen plan.

8. I would be grateful for your speediest advice in Rangoon on point raised in paragraphs 1-2 and 5-6.

PLANS FOR POLITICAL SETTLEMENT

Sen asked Zambrowicz and me to meet him yesterday afternoon to discuss his plan with a view to having it cast in a form in which it could be presented to the parties with a covering letter from Sen as Chairman of the Commission. This letter would take the place of the prefatory assumptions in paragraph four of our telegram No. 198† and would contain some additional introductory material. The general purport of the letter is that the Chairman has drawn up an outline of settlement which might provide an adequate basis for discussion between the parties if desired by them. He incorporates the points covered in paragraph 3(a) of my telegram No. 219 and in paragraph 2 of my telegram No. 224. There is a new paragraph on integration of forces, the object of which is simply to draw the parties attention to the problem, which I have succeeded in having modified in a manner which is consistent with the instructions in your telegram Y-168.

2. The presentational basis in this letter is a little vague. At one place it says the Commissioners "have agreed to let the Chairman present the attached informal suggestions". In another it refers to "the views of the Commission" and in another that "the outline is presented to the parties for their consideration by the Chairman after full consultation with and concurrence of his colleagues". Sen was most reluctant to tidy up this verbal confusion and I can only conclude that, until he is sure that the Pole (who still says he has not received his instructions) will not throw some last minute monkey wrench and that I will not disassociate myself from inclusion of the elections chapter, he wants to leave himself free to put the plan forward himself with what he calls "negative concurrence" from his colleagues — i.e., he would say we have no objection to his putting it forward.

3. As matters stand there is an agreed draft which would go forward as informal suggestions to the parties with the concurrence of all three Commissioners. This morning, consulting separately with Talbot, I had two further sessions with Sen with the object of getting the draft as near as possible to what we believe the RLG would accept. Zambrowicz was to see Sen after I left him. I expect to see the final draft later this afternoon. If it is not substantially different from what Sen has agreed to in talking to me, I will concur in it as a basis for discussion between the parties.

4. The draft as it now stands, after discussion with Zambrowicz and Sen, and subsequently with Sen alone, provides for a first phase from D to October 31 and a second phase from November 7 to November 12. It meets first point in paragraph 11 of your Y-168 by providing for establishment of Royal administration with Royal Governors and with sufficient staff, (Zambrowicz would not agree to specific mention of nomination by Royal Government). The balance of this section provides for sufficient staff to enable them to carry out their tasks in connection with the election and the preparations thereof.
5. The main change mentioned in paragraph 2(b) of my telegram No. 219 has been made.
6. Paragraph 5(a)(iii) is still in the first phase and says "the groups are required to examine the structure ... and to recommend etc."
7. Paragraph 5(b)(ii), as presented to us by Sen merely said the advisory groups should recommend to the provincial governors etc. I have persuaded him to change this to read "at the request of the provincial governors the advisory groups should recommend to them etc." (this, of course, is a compromise with the formula reported in my telegram No. 219). Sen has added to 5(b)(ii) "the implementation of this process should begin and be completed to a point where the election procedure in all the provinces to be considered uniform and in accordance with the legal provisions."
8. There has been no change in 5(b)(v).
9. I have got 5(f)(ii) reworded to read "to advise us on the working out of etc."
10. I believe that, in view of strong opposition by the Pole, Sen may, as he told me he would, reword 5(f)(i) to make it less open to a veto interpretation, but of this I cannot yet be sure.
11. Sen has added under "considerations"; "the scheme has been so drawn up that the establishment of Royal administration before the elections should be made primarily with a view to ensuring a uniform force of elections throughout Laos".
12. I found that Sen's rewording of paragraph 6(b)(v) left something to be desired as implementation of the amendment foreshadowed in paragraph 2(d) of my telegram No. 219. I have been able to persuade him to agree to a wording which, while not perfect, largely meets the intent of your instructions. There is still more than a suggestion that the teams should assist the supervisory teams but the main responsibility is clearly thrust on the latter. The Commission's team would be expected to report to the Commission if it was dissatisfied with the action taken by the supervisory team. I hope that this formula, which is the best I have been able to secure, will not be too unpalatable.
13. I feel that the plan, if the final draft conforms to my expectations, is sufficiently close to what you would wish and to what we expect the RLG may be able to consider favourably to enable me to concur in its presentation. If, either as a result of changes demanded by the Pole or in the event that you are unable to authorize me to agree to inclusion of the chapter on elections, I am unable to concur in it, I will have no alternative but to allow Sen to put it forward himself saying that his colleagues have no objection to its being presented. If this happens I can only hope that Sen's own appraisal will lead him to preserve the essential features of the plan which we feel flow from a correct interpretation of the agreement.
14. I will forward the text on the final draft when received insofar as this is necessary in the light of our telegram No. 198.
15. At the Commission meeting which took place after the above was written, Sen said he would be putting the plan forward as formal suggestions with the concurrence of his colleagues. The Pole indicated concurrence. So did I but reserved our position with respect to inclusion of elections chapter. I also made appropriate observations regarding alternative action in event of no political settlement and regarding need for military settlement. Pole's concurrence and fact that his previous firing at plan was little more than sporadic is hard to understand. Whatever the explanation I have a feeling it bodes no good so far as Communist attitude is concerned. Let us hope we have produced something the Royal Government will find reasonably acceptable.<sup>66</sup>

RANGOON TALKS ON LAOS

The Prime Minister of the Royal Laotian Government, Mr. Katay, and the head of the Pathet Lao (Communists), Prince Souphanouvong, held talks in Rangoon October 9-13. The International Commission for Laos was also in Rangoon at the same time to lend its good offices if required in order to assist the parties to reach a political settlement. The three Commissioners sat in at the beginning of the first meeting at which the Indian Chairman submitted his "Outline for a Settlement" which he had previously discussed with his two colleagues. Immediately after, the parties decided that they would conduct the talks alone, i.e., without the Commission, and would only brief the latter at the end of each meeting.

2. Mr. Katay then led off by suggesting a discussion of the Indian Chairman's plan but the Pathet Lao leader answered that they should discuss practical problems one by one. Both proceeded to draft an agenda in which they agreed to include the following points:

- (a) Cessation of hostile acts;
- (b) Restoration of royal administration (in the two northern provinces now held by the Pathet Lao);
- (c) Elections;
- (d) Disposition of Pathet Lao forces.

3. On the first point the parties reached an agreement to put a stop to the incidents which had been going on throughout last summer in and around the areas where the Laos National Army held some posts in the two northern provinces. A substantial measure of agreement in this respect had already been achieved after weeks of military negotiations between the parties in Vientiane so that this agreement, while giving welcome assurance that there will be peace at least for a period of time in Northern Laos, merely finalized previous agreements and is therefore not a development of major proportions. One thing that surprised us, though, was the Government's acceptance of a provision precluding it from reinforcing its units in the two northern provinces.

4. On the three other points, no agreement was reached at all. The parties merely stated their conflicting points of view. On the last point, the disposition of Pathet Lao forces, they did not even initiate any discussion. On the restoration of royal administration, the Royal Laotian Government Delegation insisted on appointing a sufficient number of officials to enable the royal administration to carry out its tasks whereas the Pathet Lao Delegation refused to accept more than a Governor for each province assisted by one or two high functionaries. On the subject of elections, Mr. Katay restated his Government's intention to hold elections on December 25, 1955, which requires the electoral campaign to begin on November 10 and nominations of candidates to be in by October 11. He stated that the Pathet Lao had lost their right to participate in the elections outside the two northern provinces as they had not put up any candidates by October 11. He offered a postponement of the date for nominations in the two northern provinces only, but the Pathet Lao insisted that they should participate in nation-wide elections. Mr. Katay offered to ask the Permanent Bureau of the National Assembly whether it would be willing to accept Pathet Lao nominations up to October 31.

5. At the conclusion of the meetings the parties issued a vague communiqué, the main point of which was that they were agreed to continue their political negotiations in Vientiane.

6. The outcome of the talks is on the whole rather negative. The Royal Laotian Government has given further proof of its conciliatoriness but the Pathet Lao have made no concession at all. They have instead been successful in exploiting the Government's spirit of conciliation to drag out the negotiations further. They have evaded the Indian plan and the timetable which it contained. They have even managed to weaken Mr. Katay's stand on the necessity to adhere to the election's timetable at least with regard to nominations. Meanwhile they are continuing to maintain their hold on the two northern provinces, which risks with the passage of time of acquiring the status of a fait accompli. There is as a result no timetable nor firm basis permitting the Government to pin the responsibility on them for the failure to reach a settlement. Nor is there any clear timetable or basis for the Commission to bring matters to a head in such a way that the Commission can report to the co-Chairmen and help the RLG score a moral victory at least.

COMMISSION ACTION

It appears in the light of your telegram under reference that there are two ways for resumption of action by the Commission: an Indian way and a Canadian way.

2. The Indian way would be:

- (a) to recommend the Sen plan formally to the parties;
- (b) simultaneously to put the question to the co-Chairmen as to the Commission's competence to recommend the Sen plan formally;
- (c) to follow up with our resolution<sup>67</sup> on restoration, if necessary.

3. The Canadian way would be:

(a) to recommend restoration formally and thereby lay the stage for the adoption by the Commission of the Sen plan as a whole with the chapter on procedure for restoration being susceptible of later interpretation as a formal recommendation, and the chapter on elections only to be regarded as a Commission restatement of its understanding of the way in which the government would apply the electoral law in matters of special concern to the Pathet Lao; or

(b) to recommend restoration formally, followed by a request from the RLG on how to implement this recommendation upon which Sen's plan on restoration only could be reintroduced as a formal recommendation under article 34.

4. We also understand that Sen would want to strike a bargain with us according to which we would support their plan as a whole in a formal recommendation, while in return they would support our resolution. It might as well be recognized straightaway that we could not bargain away our legal position in this fashion. While we fully understand Sen's desire to formalize his plan in view of the ineffectiveness of the previous informal presentation of it and while we fully understand and endorse his intention of regaining the initiative which was lost in Rangoon, we can only envisage the Commission taking action under the provisions of the agreement on the cessation of hostilities in Laos. There is no basis in that agreement for the Commission making a recommendation regarding electoral procedure.

5. In this respect, it seems to us that the admission reflected in paragraph five of your telegram under reference that there is some doubt regarding the competence of the Commission to recommend Sen's plan as a whole weakens the whole Indian course of action. If the question of competence is put to the co-Chairmen at the same time as a recommendation goes forward to the parties, either the question is framed in such a way as to inform the co-Chairmen only and this will give ground for the Pathet Lao (who will no doubt be kept posted by the Poles) to reject the plan if they don't like it; or the Commission puts up the question with a request that the co-Chairmen establish the Commission's competence, and this will have the practical effect of postponing the implementation of the recommendation until the co-Chairmen's opinion is received, which may cause undue delays, quite apart from the fact that the co-Chairmen in all probability may not be able to settle the issue.

6. There is in addition a danger that the doubt surrounding the first phase of the Indian course of action will reflect on the subsequent introduction of our resolution. Apart from putting the cart before the horse, this could probably cripple the horse and remove the already slim chances the Commission has of regaining the initiative.

7. It seems to us that in the present circumstances and with time running out fast, we should not squander the one sure resource of the Commission's established competence to recommend restoration.

8. If the Indians cannot be made to see the validity of the above argument and consequently to adopt our course of action then the precondition for any Commission action will be the resumption of the initiative by the RLG itself. In this respect it should be noted that it is not the informality of the introduction of Sen's plan which caused the initiative to be lost in Rangoon but rather Katay's failure to lead off with and adhere to the Sen plan or at least a sufficient number of its provisions in the negotiations with the Pathet Lao. This should now logically be the move for him to make, coupled with the move described in our telegram No. Y-196 of November 1.†

9. Delhi: without referring to the latter move, nor (in view of paragraph 8 of the telegram under reference) to Sen's course of action as being Sen's idea, please discuss with your Indian colleagues the general alternative of the re-introduction of our resolution followed by that of Sen's plan versus the reverse procedure and our opposition to the latter, with the help of the arguments outlined in the foregoing. Such a discussion may forestall the effects of Sen's views if these are not yet known in Delhi. If they are known, we should still try to press our arguments once again before falling back on some other course of action such as the one mentioned in the last line of the preceding paragraph.

COMMISSION ACTION

Talbot and I have been trying to persuade Sen that, apart from whatever steps the Commission may take to forward the RLG letters<sup>68</sup> to the co-Chairmen, the next step should be the Mayrand resolution suitably amended rather than reintroduction of the Sen plan. I have had two (long?) sessions with Sen on the text of the resolution and Talbot has helped out informally. We have now produced a revised draft which is substantially different from the <sup>68</sup> Le gouvernement royal du Laos a envoyé deux lettres à la Commission internationale (datées du 8 novembre et du 10 novembre) pour faire rapport sur l'impasse dans les négociations avec le Pathet Lao. The Royal Laotian Government sent two letters to the International Commission (dated November 8 and 10) reporting on the deadlocked negotiations with the Pathet Lao.

May 24 text but which Talbot and I feel would serve the essential purposes of this resolution. Sen, who hopes that Zambrowicz might possibly associate himself with the resolution, is going to sound him out later today. Particularly in view of the letters the Commission has received from the RLG, I would not agree to the revised resolution without discussing it informally with them beforehand. I will forward the present revised draft in a separate telegram. It seems quite possible, especially if Zambrowicz should agree to support the resolution, that Sen, who has asked his government for a free hand, would give up his present plan to reintroduce the Sen plan.

2. This latter possibility is little more than a "hunch" at the moment and I would like to be in a position to discuss any redraft of Sen's plan which he may produce. I would of course do my best to make the section on restoration susceptible of acceptance by the RLG. I would be grateful for your earliest possible advice on two other points. The first, which I have already put to you, is the question of the suitability of paragraph 6(b)(vi) of our telegram No. 198† from the point of view of International Commission responsibilities. The second, is the more fundamental question of the basis on which we could agree to the section on elections being put forward.

3. Last night Sen told me he was not happy about the revised wording of the introductory part of paragraph 6(b) proposed in your telegram Y-171. He suggested that if the plan were to go forward as a formal Commission proposal but not as a formal recommendation he might be satisfied with the present wording of 6(b) which merely puts forward suggestions for consideration. I reminded him that it is our view that the Commission is not competent to recommend anything, even informally, on the conduct of elections and we feel that the Commission should only put forward its understanding of the arrangements which the RLG would be prepared to make having heard the views of the Pathet Lao. He did not comment but I think that, if we came to discussing a redraft of the plan, we would probably find ourselves irreconcilably opposed on this point.

4. I fully appreciate both the legal considerations which underlie your instructions and the related considerations with respect to a possible Commission attitude towards elections in Vietnam. Sen knows that both these considerations weigh with us and I think you are probably right in believing that a time might come when the Indians would propose similar action by the Vietnam Commission. You are best able to judge whether it is more important to protect our position in Vietnam, in relation to what may be a rather remote contingency, than to prevent a break with Sen over his plan which might reduce the chances of his supporting our resolution. I think this is a point of significance because I have gathered from Sen that his government, which would still like him to exhaust the possibilities of the plan, would be surprised if Zambrowicz and I, having associated ourselves with it when it was put forward on a personal basis, were not able to support it, with some revision, as a Commission proposal. I would therefore be most grateful for any further latitude you may be able to afford me which would make it possible for me to associate myself with a suitably revised Sen plan in the event that Sen persists in reintroducing it. I might add that, in fact, I would do my best to have the section on Supervisory Commissions greatly watered down or if possible removed and, before using any further latitude you may give me, I would use my present instructions as a lever to achieve this if at all possible.

INDIAN DRAFT RESOLUTION ON OBSERVATIONS OF CEASE FIRE AGREEMENT

Following is text of Indian draft resolution which I received from the Indian Chairman; "The International Commission for Supervision and Control Laos,

1. Considering that cessation of all hostilities between the Forces of the Royal Laotian government and the fighting with the Pathet Lao is one of the principal purposes of the Geneva Agreement,

2. Considering that in spite of several agreements signed between the parties to give effect to the cease fire the Commission continues to receive several complaints of breaches of the cease fire,

3. Considering that on 11 October 1955 the parties signed an agreement in Rangoon providing for effective cease fire and separation of the Forces and that in spite of this agreement no effective steps have yet been taken to achieve either of these 2 objectives, recommend

(1) that neither party should take any action which might disturb the cease fire in the 2 northern provinces and that any infringement in this respect will be a grave violation of the Geneva Agreement for which the delinquent party must be held responsible for all the consequences;

(2) that both parties cease all hostile activities towards each other;

(3) that the Military Committee of the International Commission, in cooperation and close consultation with the military delegations of the two parties at Vientiane, will draw up demarcation lines separating the two forces in an effective manner;

(4) that the work of the Military Committee, referred to in paragraph (3) above, should be completed by the 30 November, 1955 at the latest;

(5) that the parties concerned will render to the Military Committee full assistance and cooperation for the fulfilment of its task;

(6) that the Military Committee should report to the International Commission from time to time the progress made, and

(7) that the parties should indicate their acceptance of this resolution not later than 15 November, 1955.

OBSERVANCE OF CEASE-FIRE AGREEMENT

1. Yesterday the Chairman gave me the draft of a resolution on the above subject which he hopes to introduce at an early date. The draft is in my telegram under reference. He said he feels the Commission should now make formal recommendations to the parties because of a potentially dangerous military situation. Moreover, he is dissatisfied with the lack of progress in implementing the cease-fire agreement signed in Rangoon, particularly with respect to a demilitarized zone.

2. I said that I would want to give careful consideration to the terms of the proposed resolution, and that I expected we would have modifications to propose. We face two main difficulties with respect to this resolution. First, the PL delegation to the military talks takes the position that the delineation of a neutral zone should simply complete what was worked out before Rangoon, whereas the LNA are prepared to accept only part of this and are making substantial new demands (see our telegrams No. 280† and No. 269† of November 12 and 5). The second difficulty is that the remedy proposed in the draft is the drawing up of demarcation lines by the Military Committee meant to be binding on the parties. This raises the problem discussed in your telegram No. Y-170† of October 6. As indicated in our reply No. 248† of October 21, I do not feel that we can now (group corrupt) the decision to establish a neutral zone and indeed must support its implementation; at the same time, we are again faced with the question of how positively the Commission should act.

3. I propose to suggest to the Chairman that operative paragraph 3 be modified to provide for the Military Committee drawing up demarcation lines to be put as a proposal to the parties. I realize that even this would be open to the objection raised in your Y-170 but, since the Military Committee has proceeded in this manner in the past, it would be difficult to revile from our previous support of this procedure.

4. I will also suggest

(a) deletion of the latter part of the first recommendation beginning at the words "and that any infringement" and the introduction at the end of the second part of the preamble of the words "which if true constitute serious violation of the Geneva Agreement".

(b) Rewriting of the third part of the preamble as follows "considering that on October 11, 1955 the parties signed an agreement in Rangoon providing, for, amongst other things, the separation of the Forces designed to facilitate an effective cease-fire and that, in spite of this agreement, no effective steps have yet been taken to achieve this objective" and

(c) Deletion of operation paragraph 6 and substituting of "International Commission" for "Military Committee" where appropriate.

5. I very much doubt if the Military Committee could be persuaded, under present circumstances, to take the line suggested in the latter part of paragraph 3 of your Y-170. We have, however, made the point in recent discussions that it was assumed by all concerned in the Commission, when the military settlement was being negotiated, that it was designed to facilitate a political settlement which would make the need for a neutral zone gradually disappear. I will take this line, when opportunity offers in the Commission and attempt to have the following added to operative paragraph 3 "pending political settlement as envisaged in the Geneva Agreement". At the same time, it was necessary for us to avoid giving any encouragement to the RLG in what we believe may be their intention to abrogate the Rangoon Agreement.

6. When I called on the Defence Minister on November 10 I received only limited satisfaction with respect to RLG intentions. He said that the RLG would respect the cease-fire though they would defend themselves if attacked; that the RLG certainly had no desire for hostilities during the elections; and that they would declare the Pathet Lao rebels only if they did not get satisfaction from the Geneva parties. He gave me no clear indication that the RLG intend to implement the demarcation line, or that they do not intend to abrogate the Rangoon agreement.

7. I will see the Defence Minister privately as soon as possible in order to ascertain likely RLG reactions to proposed resolution.

DRAFT OF REVISED RESOLUTION ON RESTORATION OF ROYAL ADMINISTRATION

Following is working text of revised resolution: "The International Commission for Supervision and Control in Laos,

1. Considering that the sovereignty, the independence, the unity and the territorial integrity of Laos were recognized in the Geneva settlement;

2. Considering that, as the International Commission informed the Prime Minister of the Royal Laotian Government in a letter dated June 15, 1955, such recognition involves the right of the Royal Laotian Government to the administration of the two northern provinces of Phong Saly and Sam Neua;

3. Considering that the exercise of this right could not be effective in the circumstances prevailing in the two northern provinces and that the parties were asked to enter into negotiations with a view to making the political settlement envisaged in article 14 of the Geneva Agreement on Laos;

4. Considering that these negotiations have not yet led to an agreement;

5. Considering that general elections are to be held in Laos on December 25, next;

6. Considering that without the Royal Laotian Government's administration in the two northern provinces it would be impossible to hold valid elections throughout the country on that date;

7. Considering that restriction of the area in which general elections are held to a part only of the country would gravely impair the unity and territorial integrity of Laos, and would be furthermore, likely to impede the attainment of a political settlement conforming to the above pattern of the Geneva Agreement;

8. Recommends:

(a) That the Royal Administration should be re-established forthwith in the two provinces of Phong Saly and Sam Neua;

(b) That with this end in view, the Royal Laotian Government should make, and the fighting units of the Pathet Lao accept, within seven days from the passage of this resolution, sufficient administrative changes in these two provinces to enable the Royal Laotian Government to undertake measures necessary to conduct the general elections there;

(c) That immediately thereafter the Royal Laotian Government should, bearing in mind the terms of their unilateral declaration at Geneva of July 21, 1954.

(i) Submit to the National Assembly, and use their best endeavours to obtain the latter's agreement to, measures enabling the Pathet Lao to participate in the general elections on December 25 next;

(ii) Enter into discussions with the fighting units of Pathet Lao for the hand over of the rest of the administrative structure in the two northern provinces for the re-integration of the fighting units of Pathet Lao as soon as possible into the national community.

(d) That the Royal Laotian Government and the fighting units of Pathet Lao should inform the International Commission for Supervision and Control, Laos, within four days of the passage of this resolution whether they agree to put these recommendations into effect, and that failure to reply within the time limit should be considered as a refusal within the meaning of article 36 of the Geneva Agreement on Laos."

COMMISSION ACTION

My telegram under reference contains the draft of the revised resolution on restoration as amended by Talbot. Sen and I agreed to it as a basis for discussion in this form and I have proposed the following further changes to him:

(a) First part of sub-paragraph three to be rewritten to read: "considering that in the same letter the International Commission expressed the opinion that, in view of the conditions prevailing in the two northern provinces, it would be difficult to establish the Royal Administration effectively, and that the parties etc. etc.";

(b) In sub-paragraph six the word "nationwide" to be substituted for "valid";

(c) In sub-paragraph seven the word "any" to be inserted before the word "restriction" and the words "to a part only of the country" to be deleted;

(d) The latter part of sub-paragraph eight (b) to be reworded to read: "to enable the Royal Laotian Government to undertake such measures as they deem necessary for conducting the general elections there";

(e) In sub-paragraph eight (c)(ii) the word "expeditious" to be inserted before the word "handover";

2. I wish to emphasize that I am not committed to this radical revision of the Mayrand resolution. It represents a revision of a general kind desired by Sen which, as you know, I had been firmly resisting. I was persuaded that, in something like its present form, it is worth our serious consideration because I have been impressed with the need, at this eleventh hour, for the Commission to place the issue before the co-Chairmen in a way which might provide them with a workable basis for possible breaking of the deadlock. I am inclined to think that the revised resolution meets this criterion and that it also could achieve the fundamental objective of the Mayrand resolution — to put the restoration issue squarely up to the Pathet Lao. Indeed, in this respect, it may be an improvement, in that Pathet Lao refusal to accept it would be the more blatant. Admittedly the resolution is in the nature of a compromise between the Mayrand resolution and the Sen plan. However, Sen has accepted it to a degree that he never would have accepted the Mayrand resolution, except possibly under duress, (for?) I believe he will probably do his best to convince his government that the resolution should be passed instead of the Sen plan. In my presence this morning he wrote "dead" over the face of the plan.

3. The touchstone will be the RLG attitude. This is linked to the question of Commission action on the letters from the RLG. The Commission did not meet yesterday but will meet November 15 when the letters will be formally considered. Talbot, who has sent full texts in French to Foreign Office, rather hopes (subject to Foreign Office views) that letters might not go forward separately from fuller report from Commission. Sen says he is indifferent on this point. I think it important that the Commission should satisfy the RLG that it is taking its letters seriously and is prepared to act. Katay's letter asking that (his?) and the other letter be forwarded came as a complete surprise to us as well as to Sen and to Yost. While RLG clearly desires that letters be forwarded now, Talbot thinks they might be prepared to have them go forward as part of fuller Commission report if they were satisfied that Commission was paying appropriate additional step. After consulting with Talbot, and unofficially with Sen, I have tentatively decided to go to Pakse to see Katay, if and when it appears opportune, to ask him if, in the light of the proposed resolution, he would be prepared to leave his letters to go forward later. In doing so I would privately seek his reactions to the resolution.

4. I have stressed to Sen that, in agreeing to recommend the revised resolution to you, I have given way very considerably and that in his discussion with Zambrowicz, he must keep in mind that I cannot give up much more to assist him in achieving his desired unanimity. Two points remain unclear — whether Delhi will approve and whether Sen will stay with the resolution if he fails to carry Zambrowicz.

5. Talbot undoubtedly has some reasons of his own for favouring the revised resolution for it fits the Foreign Office interest in a workable report to the co-Chairmen which might prevent the situation from hardening beyond repair. I think I can fairly say, however, that he is genuinely convinced that it is the best available course. I have no doubt if his government gave its agreement at the appropriate time, he would do his utmost to persuade the RLG to accept.

6. Sen seems to attach great importance to the "cease fire" resolution (our telegram No. 282 of November 12†) and, I believe, would be most unwilling to see one passed without the other.

7. I would be most grateful for your earliest advice as to what course you would wish me to pursue in the light of paragraphs 3(b) and 6 of Mr. Reid's telegram No. 773 of November 9.<sup>69</sup>

The negotiations for a political settlement which have taken place during past six months between Royal Laotian Government and Pathet Lao representatives have covered subjects outside the competence of the International Supervisory Commission under the terms of the Agreement on the Cessation of Hostilities. For this reason the Commission has quite properly not insisted on taking a part in these talks but has been content to be kept informed and to be available for good offices.

2. A good part of the talks was about the conditions for PL participation in the national elections. This subject is outside the scope of the Agreement on Cessation of Hostilities and pertains to the declaration of the RLG whose sovereignty in this field was clearly recognized by the Geneva Conference Powers in the Final Declaration.

3. The fact that the RLG was discussing with the PL conditions for their participation as a national party in the general elections has, in our opinion, led to a mistaken acceptance by some people of the PL claim to a right under the Agreement on Cessation of Hostilities (which it is the Commission's business to supervise and interpret) or under the RLG's declaration and final declaration to recognition as an equal party with the RLG. To accept this claim would be to make a mockery of RLG sovereignty and to give the PL the power to hold the national affairs of Laos at a standstill until they get what they want in the political settlement.

4. We are not prepared to authorize you to support any Commission recommendation in regard to the procedure for holding elections. Our view of the Commission's competence in regard to elections was clearly stated in paragraph 3 of our telegram No. 168 of September 28. Such latitude as we are able to give you in the application of this view of the Commission's competence was outlined in paragraph 5 of our telegram No. 171 of October 5,† paragraph 3 of our telegram No. 193 of October 28 and paragraphs 3(a) and 4 of our telegram No. 200 of November 4.†

5. We are opposed on political as well as legal grounds to going beyond this. If the Commission assumes competence in this field, it would then be an easy step to declaring that the December 25 elections are not those envisaged in the RLG's declaration at Geneva. It is not up to the Commission to interpret this declaration. This is the responsibility of the RLG and the Geneva Conference Powers who noted it in their Final Declaration.

6. This precludes your associating yourself with the chapter of the Sen plan on elections as a formal Commission recommendation as mentioned in paragraph 4 of your telegram No. 278 of November 11. It also precludes your associating yourself with recommendation in paragraph 8(c) of your telegram No. 283 of November 13. We could only accept such a sub-paragraph as an "understanding" of what the RLG has clearly stated that it is prepared to do and not, repeat not, as a "recommendation". It would also preclude acceptance of any proposal regarding the holding of fresh elections later in the event of a settlement as suggested in the Delhi outline of a possible resolution mentioned in your telegram No. 287 of November 14.†

7. This does not mean that we have given up hope of a political settlement. It does mean that we are firmly opposed to the Commission exceeding its competence by making recommendations in regard to the elections which fall within the sovereign competence of the RLG. We are not prepared to interfere with the Government's decision, which conforms with paragraph 3 of the Final Declaration, to hold general elections before the end of this year.

8. We would like to see the Commission's action in the present impasse directed constructively toward further efforts to achieve a political settlement. But in doing so the Commission should not exceed its terms of reference. Indeed we believe it can best assist in bringing about a settlement in line with that envisaged at Geneva by giving a proper legal interpretation of the agreement as a basis for resumption of negotiations.

9. We consider the responsibility of the Commission in relation to the political settlement to be twofold.

(a) In national affairs it is to supervise the undertakings in article 15 regarding no reprisals or discrimination and guaranteeing democratic freedoms. This does not mean that Commission should recognize FULP claims to bargaining rights as a National Political Party equal in status to Government itself. Position should not be out of line with article 6 of Cambodian agreement and article 14(c) of Vietnam agreement.

(b) In Phong Saly and Sam Neua to see to proper implementation of articles 14 and 19 pending a political settlement. The Commission is concerned with stopping hostilities. It is also concerned with preventing the PL from misusing Articles 14 and 19 to give them a veto over political settlement and to prevent restoration of Royal Administration. In discharging these responsibilities Commission could go some piece in formal recommendations to parties and supervising stage by stage related pieces of settlement plan including (i) cease fire; (ii) restoration of Royal Administration; (iii) military settlement; and (iv) closer supervision of elections in two provinces (because of concentration of persons to be protected under article 15) than would be warranted in rest of country.

10. The Commission must respect RLG sovereignty except where the cease fire agreement gives it authority to intervene. In general this means on civil side keeping out of broad area of national affairs, such as elections, except in supervision of article 15.

11. From the foregoing you will see that we consider that the Government's discussion of a basis for PL participation as a national party in the general elections lies within the area of sovereign authority of the Government. We have seen nothing in the reports of these discussions to indicate that the Government contemplated infringing article 15. Indeed they offered to go a good deal further than required in special concessions to the PL. We think that the Government is fully justified if it wishes to take the position now that (a) it is too late for the PL to qualify as a national political party in these elections and (b) there is insufficient time before the opening of the political campaign for the Royal Administration to be effectively restored in the two northern provinces. We are not prepared to support at this late date a last minute effort to reach a settlement on the old basis unless you have it in writing from the Prime Minister that he would accept such a Commission initiative.

12. If you are informed that the Government will accept the sort of resolution aimed at a last minute settlement outlined in your telegram No. 283 as amended by your No. 284 both of November 13, then we agree to your supporting this if paragraph 8(c) is taken out of the "recommendations" and placed under a new heading entitled "understand[ing]s".

13. If Government acceptance is not clearly indicated we wish you to go back to a simple resolution of principle reaffirming the Government's right to re-establish its administration in the two northern provinces and calling on the Pathet Lao to accept this promptly. We could accept something along the lines of the resolution outlined in your telegram 283 of November 13, amended by your 284 with the following further amendments:

- (a) In paragraph six delete the word "nationwide" before "elections";
- (b) In paragraph 8(b) delete the words "within seven days from the passage of this resolution" and substitute the words "before the end of 1955"; and delete the words "conducting the general elections there" and substitute "effectively restore their administrative control";
- (c) In paragraph 8(d) we think 4 days might be extended to 7 days;
- (d) Delete paragraph 8(c) from the "recommendations" and insert a new paragraph between 7 and 8 reading

"Considering that in their unilateral declaration at Geneva of July 21, 1954 the RLG affirmed that all citizens may freely participate as electors or candidates in general elections by secret ballot."

If RLG is prepared to hold delayed elections in two northern provinces if PL will accept prompt restoration, then you could insert an additional paragraph before 8 saying:

"Understands that the RLG will use their best endeavours to obtain the National Assembly's agreement to measures enabling members and former members of the FUPL to participate in elections which will be held in the two northern provinces 90 days after the effective restoration of the Royal Administration there."

14. We think that it will be necessary for you to take a strong stand even if you cannot carry your Indian and Polish colleagues with you. We consider that the RLG is entitled to our support and that it is important that we at least should put on the record our interpretation of the agreement and recognize the efforts made by the RLG to seek agreement. Friendly governments expect us to introduce a Mayrand type resolution and we must do this for the record at least. If it is not passed you should ensure that our views are conveyed in the letter transmitting the RLG letters, even if it is necessary to record a minority viewpoint.

DRAFT SIMPLE RESOLUTION ON RESTORATION OF ROYAL ADMINISTRATION IN LAOS

The following working text is based on Vientiane telegram No. 283 amended by telegram No. 284 both of November 13, with the further amendments contained in paragraph 13 of Ottawa telegram No. Y-214 of November 18 to Vientiane.

The International Commission for Supervision and Control in Laos,

1. Considering that the sovereignty, the independence, the unity and the territorial integrity of Laos were recognized in the Geneva settlement;
2. Considering that, as the International Commission informed the Prime Minister of the Royal Laotian Government in a letter dated June 15, 1955, such recognition involves the right of the Royal Laotian Government to the administration of the two northern provinces of Phong Saly and Sam Neua;
3. Considering that in the same letter the International Commission expressed the opinion that in view of the conditions prevailing in the two northern provinces it would be difficult to establish the Royal Administration effectively, and that the parties were asked to enter into negotiations with a view to making the political settlement envisaged in article 14 of the Geneva Agreement on Laos;
4. Considering that these negotiations have not yet led to an agreement;
5. Considering that general elections are to be held in Laos on December 25, next;
6. Considering that without the Royal Laotian Government's administration in the two northern provinces it would be impossible to hold elections throughout the country on that date;
7. Considering that any restriction of the area in which general elections are held would gravely impair the unity and territorial integrity of Laos, and would be furthermore, likely to impede the attainment of a political settlement conforming to the above pattern of the Geneva Agreement;

8. Considering that in their unilateral declaration at Geneva of July 21, 1954 the RLG affirmed that all citizens may freely participate as electors or candidates in general elections by secret ballot.

9. Optional

(If RLG is prepared to hold delayed elections in two northern provinces if PL will accept prompt restoration, an additional paragraph could be inserted saying):

Understands that the RLG will use their best endeavours to obtain the National Assembly's agreement to measures enabling members and former members of the FUPL to participate in elections which will be held in the two northern provinces 90 days after the effective restoration of the Royal Administration there.

10. Recommends:

(a) That the Royal Administration should be re-established forthwith in the two provinces of Phong Saly and Sam Neua;

(b) That with this end in view, the Royal Laotian Government should make, and the fighting units of the Pathet Lao accept, before the end of 1955 sufficient administrative changes in these two provinces to enable the Royal Laotian Government to undertake measures necessary to effectively restore their administrative control;

(c) That the Royal Laotian Government should enter into discussions with the fighting units of Pathet Lao for the hand over of the rest of the administrative structure in the two northern provinces and for the re-integration of the fighting units of Pathet Lao as soon as possible into the national community.

(d) That the Royal Laotian Government and the fighting units of Pathet Lao should inform the International Commission for Supervision and Control, Laos, within seven days of the passage of this resolution whether they agree to put these recommendations into effect, and that failure to reply within the time limit should be considered as a refusal within the meaning of Article 36 of the Geneva Agreement on Laos.

INDIAN CEASE-FIRE RESOLUTION

If as we said in paragraph 9(b) of our telegram No. Y-214 of November 18 the Commission is concerned with stopping hostilities, it is also concerned with preventing the PL from misusing articles 14 and 19 to give them a veto over a political settlement and to prevent restoration. There is therefore in our mind a clear relationship, under the terms of the cease-fire agreement itself, between the military and political settlements so that the former cannot be considered except within the broader context of the latter.

2. From our point of view, it is a minimum requirement that this relationship be reflected in both the preamble and the operative section of any cease-fire resolution before we can associate ourselves with it. You should therefore insist that the words "pending a political settlement as envisaged in the Geneva Agreement" be added to part 1 of the preamble as well as to operative paragraph 3.

3. Under the agreement on cessation of hostilities the RLG's legal grounds for keeping forces in the northern provinces is that they already had troops there on August 6, 1954. We are concerned lest the cease-fire resolution change these grounds and become the only foundation of the RLG's right to have troops in the two provinces and then only in the area delimited by the demarcation line. In view of PL attitude (cf. paragraph 2c of your 293 of November 16†) the implications of this change should be carefully considered and the undesirable effects limited at least by relating the resolution firmly to the agreement.

4. Especially at this late stage it seems to us that a cease-fire resolution should also be related to the general problem of the military settlement and integration of the Pathet Lao into the national community, which problem has its military as well as its political aspect as a consequence of Article 14 which separates the forces while not providing for the immediate demobilization of the PL as the Cambodia Agreement does for the ex-KRF. You should try to obtain a reference to this in the form of an additional operative paragraph to the effect that the parties will work out the application of this resolution bearing in mind the problem of the eventual military and political settlement envisaged in Article 14. You might also suggest that this question should be discussed by the parties with the assistance of the Military Committee so that plans will be evolved when the political settlement is reached.

5. The drawing-up of demarcation lines by the Military Committee raises the question put in our Y-170 of October 4† about the degree of commission authority which would uphold the cease fire and for what length of time. In the case of the Muong Peun incident, we note that the Commission at its meeting of July 21st authorized the Military Committee to make suggestions only and not formal recommendations to the parties. Presumably the Commission had in mind the ineffectualness of the Indian demarcation resolution of last spring. As it is this procedure which was at the origin of and was maintained throughout the long series of talks between the parties and the Military Committee since July, we would like to see it maintained even now, in the sense that the resolution should make provision for continued supervision by the Military Committee under whose auspices periodic reviews of the situation should be made by the parties in the light of developments, as we suggested at the end of paragraph 3 of our Y-170. Operative paragraph 4 would thus have to be modified accordingly.

6. Finally, we think that this resolution offers a good opportunity for re-opening the question of team operations in the two northern provinces, especially in Sam Neua, on the grounds that, if the cease fire lasts beyond the time envisaged in the Geneva Agreement as the result of failure to reach a political settlement, it becomes more important for the Commission to have teams operating on the Laos-North Vietnam Frontier not only to prevent illegal imports of arms but also to prevent the implied acceptance of a de facto partition and of the attachment of the northern provinces to North Vietnam.

7. Although you may not be able to get commission support for all these proposals we think that they should be put forward formally in order to emphasize the view outlined in paragraph one.

DRAFT SIMPLE RESTORATION RESOLUTION AND POSSIBLE COMMISSION ACTION

Katay did not return to Vientiane as expected on November 25. Consequently was unable to discuss with him the question of understanding on elections envisaged in my telegram 283 as modified by para six of your Y-214. I now feel quite certain, however, that the RLG would not give the required undertaking and I regard this draft as dead.

2. On November 25 I gave Sen informally a draft resolution drawn up by me in the light of your Y-214. The draft which is contained in immediately following telegram makes no reference to elections and is, in effect, a simple restoration resolution. I regard it as a minimum and am awaiting Sen's reactions. All he has told me so far is that he would like to include something like the declaration in 4(iv) of the draft in my telegram 305 of November 23.† He points to the Laotian Declaration and the Final Declaration.

3. Commission action will be unavoidably delayed by three-day visit of Commissioners to Luang Prabang to pay formal respects to Crown Prince. We leave this morning. I have arranged to see Katay in Pakse on December 1st and will discuss with him the proposal outlined in last part of paragraph 13 of your Y-214. I may also very informally seek his views on a possibility the Acting Prime Minister mentioned to Sen, that after December 25 elections it might still be open to Pathet Lao candidates to run for (a further district?) which may possibly be set up to provide additional deputies now said to be required because of an increase in number of electors.

4. As instructed, I aim to introduce a resolution along the lines outlined in your Y-218 even if it seems certain to be defeated. Talbot has shown me several recent Foreign Office telegrams including one which I assume you have seen which outlines four possible courses of action in order of United Kingdom preference. I am working for alternative (1), a Commission resolution calling for restoration within a seven (day?) limit, which is also your first preference. I am taking a stiff line. Such a resolution adopted by the Indians would clearly be best from the Laotian point of view and also, because of Article 36 from that of Vietnam. From recent conversation with Sen I have the impression that Indian tactics are to try for agreed resolution with us which would meet their aims in Laos. Nevertheless and even if Katay is agreeable to delaying election in north Sen and I may be so far apart that he may feel himself obliged to vote against our simple resolution. Clearly, alternative (2) in the U.K. list would be no more appealing to him than (1); (2) would certainly be (feasible?) but is not very attractive to us.

5. In these circumstances, and in view of possibility that Sen if he loses hope of agreement with me might introduce an Indian resolution which he might try to make acceptable to the Pole, you might wish to consider whether I should have latitude to settle for a report of the kind envisaged in U.K. alternative (3) which reads: "Reference to co-Chairmen with a clear majority view expressed by Commission that it is the Pathet Lao who have prevented a settlement" I am inclined to think this alternative might appeal to Indians failing an agreed resolution with us, since they may hope that it would make a linking of Vietnam and Laos easier.

6. In favour of giving me this latitude is the risk that, if alternative (1) proves impracticable (as I am inclined to think) then the chances of reaching agreement on alternative (3) would be lessened if we pressed our simple resolution to the point where it was expressly repudiated by the Indians. The disadvantages are: (a) that we would fail to introduce or rather to move a "Mayrand-type" resolution for the record; (b) that we run the risk of Sen trying to water down the report envisaged in alternative (3). To offset this latter risk we have Sen's statement to both Talbot and me that he would collaborate in and associate himself with a report which did not shrink from making the Pathet Lao attitude abundantly clear. I have instinctive misgivings about such a statement but, nevertheless we should not rule out a straight report as a possible course of action. This could — and should — include comments on RLG and PL letters.

7. Reverting to simple resolution, if the RLG would not agree to delayed elections in the North on the conditions outlined, you may wish to consider the possibility of deleting not only paragraph 9 but also paragraphs 5 to 8 inclusive from the draft in your 118, or (group corrupt) of modifying them without any substantial reference to elections these paragraphs as they stand may be somewhat out of place.

8. I entirely agree with the attitude which seems implicit in your telegrams on the question of the December 25 elections constituting the political settlement envisaged by the Geneva Agreement and I was surprised to learn that it is the Foreign Office view that these elections do constitute such a settlement. As I have previously indicated I believe the RLG would be wise at this stage to take no decision and to make no announcement on this question, while maintaining the correctness of their present actions. I also think that even if we should form the same opinion as the Foreign Office it might be better for us not to state it at this time to the RLG or the Indians. Clearly, we cannot accept the latter's extreme view but I think there is still some real value in doing what we can to keep the door open a little in case there might ultimately be some possibility of the provinces being restored. All the signs point toward indefinite partition but at the present time there may be merit in our at least going no further than the RLG in the political settlement question.

DRAFT SIMPLE RESOLUTION

Draft resolution referred to in paragraph 2 of my telegram under reference follows essentially along lines of text contained in your telegram No. 218 of November 21, with following modifications:

(1) Delete paragraphs 5 to 9 inclusive of the preamble and substitute new paragraph from as follows: "considering that, unless the Royal Administration is effectively restored without further delay, the unity and territorial integrity of Laos would be gravely impaired and the attainment of a political settlement conforming to the basic pattern of the Geneva Agreement would be impeded";

(2) Amend operative part to read: "it recommends (a) that the Royal Administration should be re-established forthwith in the 2 provinces of Phong Saly and Sam Neua; (b) that with this end in view, the Royal Laotian Government should make, and the fighting units of the Pathet Lao accept, before the end of 1955, administrative changes in these two provinces which would enable the Royal Laotian Government to effectively restore their administrative control; (c) that the Royal Laotian Government and the fighting forces of Pathet Lao should inform the International Commission for Supervision and Control, Laos, within 7 days of the passage of this resolution whether they agree to put these recommendations into effect, that failure to reply within this time limit should be considered as a refusal within the meaning of Article 36 of the Geneva Agreement on Laos."

2. We have made these modifications on tactical grounds in order to give ourselves some room for manoeuvring and in hope that by putting forward stiff wording now we may, in subsequent discussion, be able to persuade Sen to accept a text close to that of your telegram No. 218.

COMMISSION ACTION

Immediately after returning from Luang Prabang where I had a useful talk with the Crown Prince, I flew to Pakse to see Katay taking Langley with me. We returned yesterday. My main object was to ascertain if Katay would be agreeable to insertion in a resolution of something along the lines of paragraph 9 of your telegram 218. He spoke himself of the plan to hold supplementary elections mentioned in paragraph 3 of my telegram 315. He said that about fifteen new deputies might be so elected. He also spoke of the possibility of "new elections" in the northern provinces in the event of restoration but made it clear that deputies to be elected from these provinces in present elections would remain seated. After consulting with Talbot I feel that something along the lines of the sub-paragraph contained in my following paragraph is the most it would be safe to include in the resolution. I also suggest some changes in sub-paragraph 4-8 in your telegram Y-218.

2. My proposal is that sub-paragraph 4-9 of the draft resolution might be replaced by the following:

"(4) Considering that these negotiations have not yet led to an agreement and that the FUPL are not participating in the general elections which are to be held on Laos on Dec 25 next;

(5) Understanding that the Royal Laotian Government will use its best endeavours to obtain the National Assembly's agreement to measures enabling members of the FUPL to participate in complementary elections which may be held throughout Laos (including the two northern provinces) (if such?) elections are held after the effective restoration of the Royal Administration in those provinces;

(6) Considering that, unless the Royal Administration is effectively restored without further delay the unity and territorial integrity of Laos would be gravely imperiled and the attainment of a political settlement conforming to the basic patterns of the Geneva Agreement would be impeded". On the basis of our conversation with Katay I also suggest deletion of the words "to undertake measures necessary" from sub-paragraph (b) of the recommendations and deletion of the words "for handover of the restoration of the administrative structure in the two northern provinces and" from sub-paragraph (c). Katay said that there is no mention of "administrative cadres" in the "Geneva Agreement" and clearly would like to have relevant part of (c) deleted. I think the other deletion is needed as a consequential change. I asked Katay if the Government would still stand by the moitié moitié formula. He said (group corrupt) the suggested changes would not disturb the existing assumption underlying sub-paragraph (c) that this is the case.

3. The main object of the (group corrupt) changes would be to bring the draft more closely in line with RLG (thinking?) and to adapt it more closely to meaning of the new (group corrupt) paragraph containing the understanding on elections. To a greater extent than the existing draft it subordinates the question of elections to the need for restoration, I think this is desirable because the existing draft still retains something of the flavour of the earlier resolution which contemplated the possibility of the Pathet Lao participating in the present general elections. With my proposed revisions the draft would go somewhat farther in the direction of leaving open the possibility of the present elections being regarded as the political settlement; I would be prepared to bargain back to something nearer your draft, if necessary, to accommodate Sen but it might be as well for present to preserve the language of paragraph one (1) of my telegram 316 as opposed to the language of sub-paragraph 7 of your Y-218.

4. I have told Sen that I am working on the draft I have given him (which you will recall from my telegram 316 is a limited restoration-type resolution) to see if I can reflect something on elections based on my conversation with Katay. He is working up his own ideas and seems a little hopeful that we may be able to agree on a text; in view of his basic instructions and because of his apparent desire to include a provision on elections which would imply the possibility of the RLG being prepared to do a great deal more than they likely would, I am much less sanguine nor at this moment can I quite envisage a resolution of principle such as that suggested in paragraph 6(b) of your Y-225 which Sen and I could both support. I would be grateful for any further guidance you can give me regarding the sort of resolution you have in mind.

5. I am anxious to introduce our draft resolution in the commission as soon as possible but fear I should await your reactions to the revisions proposed in this telegram. In the meantime I intend to continue my discussions with Sen with the object of seeing whether or not we can reach agreement on a text. This should not preclude me from introducing our own resolution at the appropriate time and I would be grateful if you would do your best to put me in a position to do so by the middle of next week.

LAOS: POLITICAL OBJECTIVES

With the breakdown of the talks seeking a political settlement and with the Government determined to go forward with holding general elections in the areas it controls on December 25 it has become increasingly necessary to fix broad political objectives in Laos and to view these against the general settlement for Indochina envisaged at the Geneva Conference in July, 1954.

2. We have taken the position in all three States that the Commission Governments were only invited to take part in supervising the implementation of the Agreements on Cessation of Hostilities. In Vietnam this has enabled us to take the line that the present Commission has no responsibility for pressing the competent representative authorities of the two zones to reach the political settlement outlined in paragraph 7 of the Final Declaration. This is the business of the Geneva Conference Powers. In Laos, on the other hand we have taken the line that the Commission is competent to take some part in pressing for a political settlement by insisting on a correct interpretation of Article 14 so as to prevent the Pathet Lao from misusing this to exercise an effective veto over any political settlement.

3. While we will continue to maintain that the Laos and Vietnam agreements are distinct and different in conception and that the position of the Pathet Lao is different from that of the Diem Government in South Vietnam, it is evident that at this stage the Communists and the Indians draw analogies between the two situations. Although we may maintain in law the differences between the situations in Laos and Vietnam, the Communists and the Indians in varying degrees look at the law in its broad political and even strategic setting.

4. Our object in Vietnam is to separate the Agreement on Cessation of Hostilities from the political settlement and to argue that the implementation and maintenance of the armistice is an important contribution in itself to peace and stability in the Far East. Unification of Vietnam, like that of Korea and Germany should be pursued by peaceful means.

5. The Indians favour drawing a line in Indochina between the Communist and non-Communist worlds but considered at the Geneva Conference that this would eventually be drawn between Laos and Cambodia on the one hand and a united Vietnam under Ho Chi Minh on the other. For this reason, although favouring stabilization and an eastern Locarno arrangement, they have talked about withdrawing from the Vietnam Commission in two or three months rather than remain to protect the Diem Government in what they consider to be its wrongful opposition to the unification of Vietnam by the procedures of paragraph 7 of the Final Declaration.

6. If we think it desirable that the Commission should remain in Vietnam for some time yet as the symbol of the maintenance of the Armistice, then we will have to endeavour in the next two or three months to try to persuade the Indians to accept the distinction between the military and political settlements in Vietnam. And we should endeavour to demonstrate the broad advantages of maintaining the Armistice while pursuing unification by patient peaceful means.

7. If we are to take this line with the Indians in Vietnam we cannot be blind to or altogether unsympathetic toward their taking a somewhat similar attitude in Laos — that is seeking to separate the military from the political settlement. They now argue in Laos — although they have not accepted the full implications of the analogy for Vietnam — that the Commission's business is to sit on the cease-fire line and to help to achieve a political settlement by peaceful means.

5. With this analysis as background we have been examining the question of whether the Laotian Government could and should try to argue that the December 25 elections are the political settlement envisaged at Geneva. Following this there is the additional question, which falls clearly within the Commission's competence, as to whether the Fighting Units of the Pathet Lao will be entitled after December 25 to Commission support for their special sanctuary in Phong Saly and Sam Neua under Article 14 of the agreement on Cessation of Hostilities.

6. We have taken the position all along that elections are the sovereign responsibility of the Royal Laotian Government and that the Commission is not competent to make recommendations in this field except to ensure under Article 15 that there are no reprisals or discrimination against ex-members of the FUPL. We take the view that it is not up to the Commission to determine whether the December 25 elections are those envisaged in the RLG's unilateral declaration at Geneva. This is the responsibility of the RLG who can argue that it is acting in conformity with its declaration and the constitution. The Communist members of the Geneva Conference, which noted the RLG declaration in its Final Declaration, may argue that that is certainly not their interpretation and there may be no final resolution of the difference. We think it possible in a negative way to refute the PL allegation that the holding of elections without PL participation is a violation of the Geneva settlement. We would also argue that the Commission is not competent to recommend fresh elections as part of a settlement with the PL. In general, then, by arguing Commission incompetence in respect to elections we have protected the freedom of the RLG to go ahead with its elections and to defend its action in doing so but, having argued that the Commission is not competent to intervene in elections matters, except on Article 15 complaints, we must also take the line that the Commission is not competent to approve or disapprove the RLG's offers of electoral concessions to the PL in the political negotiations. All the Commission should do is say that Article 15 was not infringed.

7. We are concerned lest some members of the RLG, desiring to show themselves in the current political campaign to be zealous patriots, should make sweeping claims that, having made a sincere and sustained effort within the recognized time limit to reach a political settlement with the Pathet Lao, the Government will have discharged its responsibilities under the Geneva Agreement with the holding of general elections on December 25. They might declare the Pathet Lao outlaws and say that they have no more right to a special position in Phong Saly and Sam Neua under Article 14. There may be some who think that an effort should be made to recover control of these provinces bit by bit by military means.

8. Such argumentation is understandable since the RLG has made a convincing effort to reach a settlement which we will try to get the Commission to recognize. They are also quite justified in not postponing general elections further.

9. However understandable, we see certain grave difficulties and possible repercussions if the RLG should adopt this attitude:

(a) The Indian and Polish members of the International Commission would certainly not accept such a line of argument by the RLG and would specifically recommend continuing observance of Articles 14 and 19.

(b) It would be unrealistic since the PL are in fact in military control of almost all of Phong Saly and Sam Neua. Any attempt to dislodge them by force would invite the risk of Vietminh intervention, which in turn might be brought before SEATO with the challenge of giving RLG support in a very difficult military campaign or losing face.

(c) A resumption of hostilities in Laos with Vietminh intervention would run the serious risk of upsetting the ceasefire in Vietnam.

(d) It would seriously impair future chances for resumption of negotiations between RLG and PL.

(e) RLG would lose Indian sympathy and Indians would probably be confirmed in their determination to withdraw from Vietnam and Laos Commissions.

10. In our view a certain amount of patience on the part of the RLG is called for in the face of fact of continuing PL military control of northern provinces and risks involved in trying to force the issue militarily. If they are not going to try to force the issue militarily, then they should avoid making statements which close the door on future negotiations and lead some to think of military action.

11. We have been thinking that in these circumstances following might be the wisest course of action:

(a) Canadian Commissioner would introduce into Commission our recently redrafted resolution with end-of-year time limit for restoration of Royal Administration in two northern provinces and seven-day time limit for acceptance or rejection by parties so that reference could be made to co-Chairmen under Article 36. This would put on record our view that PL should have come to agreement by end of year.

(b) If this resolution does not have Indian support (as now seems almost certain), our Commissioner should negotiate for strongest resolution showing RLG right to restore administration and if possible implying blame on PL for which he can get Indian support.

(c) In addition, Canadian Commissioner should endeavour to get as much more of our views written into report to co-Chairmen, even in a minority note if necessary provided that this does not undermine Indian support for (b).

(d) When Commission report is received, U.K. Foreign Secretary might try to make as much as possible out of it for a letter to Molotov urging PL acceptance of fair arrangements offered by RLG for their re-integration.

(e) RLG should go ahead with general elections ensuring that there are no grounds for justified complaint of discrimination under Article 15.

(f) Either now or after elections RLG should indicate willingness to resume negotiations with PL on narrower basis of settlement covering two northern provinces only as PL chance to secure recognition as a national political party in these elections will have passed.

(g) Commission would take the position that Articles 14 and 19 still stand and would seek to maintain the ceasefire "pending a political settlement".

10. In general our object should be to give proper legal interpretation to agreement and recognize RLG's efforts to reach settlement. We should respect RLG's sovereign rights. But we should not push matters to the point where there is a risk of resumed hostilities with Vietminh intervention or where Indians divide definitely from us. It is of great importance to maintain ceasefire agreements in Vietnam and Laos and Indian support for them even if this means that unification of Laos like the unification of Vietnam may be delayed through separation from the Armistice Agreement.

COMMISSION ACTION

The guidance contained in your telegram under reference, which was received here yesterday, is most helpful.

2. With respect to the resolution which I am to introduce, I have concluded, on the basis of our conversations with Sisouk since my earlier talk with Katay, that it would probably be safer not to allude in our resolution to the possibility of complementary elections throughout Laos. If Katay who was to return to Vientiane today, agrees, I will revert to a formula of the kind contained in your telegram Y-218 referring to northern provinces only. Subject to Katay view and your expected instructions the resolution would otherwise follow the lines outlined in my telegram under reference.

3. As reported in that telegram I have been acting in accordance with the tactical suggestions contained in your telegram Y-225 of November 29† and have made some progress toward working out as strong a resolution as I can with Sen. On December 5, having given him a simple restoration draft some days earlier, I gave him a draft of the type outlined in the preceding paragraph indicating that this was as far as I was prepared to go in the resolution I was to introduce. (This draft, of course, is essentially the same as that which I have been authorized to introduce). My present discussions with Sen are understood as personal explorations and I have been careful not in any way to suggest that I have been authorized to move beyond the draft I have given him. He produced on a personal basis a draft he thought might be acceptable to his government and it was a distinct improvement over the draft which was reported in my telegram 305 of November 23† but contained several features I could not accept. I expect that by December 12 it will be apparent whether or not we can reach common ground on a draft resolution which we could submit to our governments as the basis upon which we would be prepared to settle after debate in the Commission. I shall do my best to postpone submission to Delhi and Ottawa until I receive your further instructions.

4. If Sen and I can agree on a draft he would like to show it to Zambrowicz before giving it to Delhi. (He told me that he has already shown him the latest draft which (underline) he (end underline) presented to me). He contends it would be necessary for him to report Polish reactions in order to get a considered view from his government. I have told him I would prefer Polish reactions to develop first in the Commission, but he states that to refer any compromise draft to Delhi as a draft discussed only with the Canadians would prejudice chances of acceptance from there. I may agree to his showing it to Zambrowicz on the understanding that I could accept no consequent watering down that [if] Zambrowicz would not support such a resolution he will not hesitate to advise his Government to disregard unanimity and to consider draft on its merits.

5. Particularly if I can succeed in having any specific reference to elections excluded from the compromise resolution, it might be desirable to delete from our own resolution the last part of sub-paragraph 4 and sub-paragraph 5 of paragraph 2 of my telegram under reference, thus making it a straight restoration resolution. Even if Sen succeeds in finding a formula on elections which we might accept in a compromise resolution, it might still be desirable for our own resolution to make no mention of elections so that I might more easily bargain toward a compromise in the Commission.

6. If your instructions would seem to permit, I will use my own judgement as to which type of restoration resolution I will introduce. I feel that our resolution must be introduced some time next week at the latest because it would be unrealistic to do so at a later date. It will also be important to have any resolution passed by the Commission adopted well before December 25. To allow time for debate our resolution should be introduced very soon.

7. I would be grateful for your present view as to whether or not I should press our own resolution to a vote (and presumably to defeat)

(a) in the event that it proves impossible to carry a compromise resolution acceptable to us or

(b) in the less likely event that the Indians might work out a resolution acceptable to the Pole but not to us.

8. We do not end up with a resolution which will provide a basis for a report to the co-Chairmen unequivocally under Article 36 do you have a strong preference as between (a) a letter to the co-Chairmen, commenting on the Royal Laotian Government and Pathet Lao letters and containing a clear expression of Canadian views, and (b) a straight report to the co-Chairmen (which might or might not take the form of the next interim report) containing these same comments and views.

COMMISSION ACTION

I will introduce our restoration resolution on December 14 and make a suitable statement. The text of the resolution will be in a following telegram.<sup>70</sup>

2. Sen and I have reached agreement on draft compromise resolution which we are submitting to Ottawa and Delhi for consideration. This resolution would be introduced by Sen following debate of ours. The text will probably reach you first through United Kingdom channels since our communications seem to have slowed down again. Sen and I have both taken Talbot into our confidence on the draft.

3. Sen says he will put the proposed compromise to his Government as the fairest basis he can mark out in the light of discussions here. He tells me that he has gone only some distance to meet Delhi's views which were briefly that it is impracticable simply to assert that the Royal Administration be restored, that the elections now being held should be without prejudice to future elections as part of political settlement that there must be further negotiations and that the whole situation should be reported to the Geneva powers. He believes it will be by no means easy to sell the draft in Delhi.

4. Sen will tell Delhi that I also consider the draft (as a?) compromise and he will explain the basis on which I am putting it to you. After talking to Zambrowicz he will inform Delhi of the Polish attitude. I expect he will also say that he hopes Delhi can accept the draft with an absolute minimum of change and that it may be possible for him to decide whether or not to support it in the Commission, with any modifications considered essential, without further reference to Delhi.

5. I hope that it may be possible for you also to consider the draft on this basis. I would have preferred to await the further instructions mentioned in your telegram Y-232 of December 5 but, because time is very short and because suspension of my discussions with Sen would have had an undesirable effect, I have decided to go ahead and let Sen do the same, as you know, I have been careful not to suggest to Sen that I have authority to go beyond the terms of our own draft resolution as outlined in your telegram Y-218. If, in the light of your further instructions, there would seem to be aspects of the compromise draft which you would find unacceptable, I will refrain from mentioning these difficulties to Sen on the assumption that, if you still wish me to press them, you will so indicate in your comments on the draft.

6. You will not find the compromise draft altogether to your liking, but I can assure you that it represents the strongest possible resolution I can work out with Sen. The following partial comments may be of assistance:

(a) Five of the preamble has been recorded from an earlier draft which left the impression that the Commission had put forward an informal scheme of settlement. Similarly, I have had the words "both by the parties and by the Commission" deleted from the first operative paragraph.

(b) Six of the preamble is a distinct improvement over an earlier version which would have recorded that, while the Royal Laotian Government has the sovereign right to hold elections, the elections to be held on December 25 shall be without prejudice to any political settlement as may be reached in accordance with Article 14. It is also an improvement over a subsequent version which would have added to the present wording "(as?) part of a political settlement". I tried without success to have it replaced by the paragraphs on elections considered stable for our own resolution. I hope, though it is somewhat (group corrupt), you may allow it to stand.

(c) I was able to secure the wording "act in conformity with" in paragraph (ii) of the recommendations as a substitute for the words "abide by the terms of".

(d) I think that Sen has included the word "full" and "fully" in paragraph seven of the preamble in (iii) of the recommendations as a (group corrupt) toward the fullest possible participation by the Pathet Lao in elections and toward integration of the FUPL into the LNA to the extent necessary. I can nevertheless see no real harm in these words being included.

(e) Paragraph four of the recommendations is, of course, crucial. I have been able to have the word "consultations" substituted for the word "negotiations" and, with more reluctance on Sen's part, to have the word "thus" inserted before the words "to come to a practical settlement". I hope you will agree to deletion of "thus" if Indians should insist on this. Sen was at first inclined toward "as soon as possible" instead of a time limit but came down on the side of the latter on the grounds that otherwise talks might never get started. He is thinking of about January 10 as the target date, by which time he expects reports to co-Chairmen would be on its way. When I suggested that talks at this stage are bound to be fruitless and that only conceivable chance of settlement would arise from some action by co-Chairmen, he said this could not happen until April. When I asked why he spoke of April he said he thought that by that time the co-Chairmen would also have to consider Vietnam.

(f) The meaning of (v) of the recommendations taken with the decision at the end is that there would be either a report under Article 36 or a simple report. Sen would be prepared to have the latter take the form of a communication referring to the letter covering the letters from the parties and commenting on them, though he would not want such a report to be necessarily restricted to direct comment on the letters.

7. I have not discussed the compromise draft with the RLG and am still of an open mind as to whether or not this would be desirable before such time as it may have been passed.

8. If you should decide to ask our High Commissioner in New Delhi to discuss the draft with the Indians please advise me so that I may inform Sen.

9. I would be grateful for the earliest possible expression of your views on the compromise draft, particularly if you should contemplate my referring a final version to you before voting. If the resolution is to be raised this should be done as far as possible in advance of December 25.

DRAFT COMPROMISE RESOLUTION

Following is text of draft resolution worked out with Sen (for consideration in Ottawa and Delhi) as possible compromise for introduction in International Commission following discussion of Canadian simple restoration resolution, begins:

(i) Considering that the sovereignty, independence, unity and territorial integrity of Laos were recognized in the Geneva Settlement;

(ii) Recalling its unanimous resolution of December 3, 1954, by which it recommended that representatives of the Royal Government and of the Fighting Units of the Pathet Lao should examine together the means which should be adopted to attain the political settlement envisaged in Article 14 of the Geneva Agreement, including the re-establishment of the Royal Administration in the Provinces of Sam Neua and Phong Saly;

(iii) Considering that on June 15, 1955, the Commission unanimously addressed a letter to the Royal Government recognizing its right to the actual administration of these two provinces and at the same time realizing that in view of the conditions prevailing there it would be difficult to establish the Royal Administration without the political settlement;

(iv) Recalling that in that same letter the Commission expressed the hope that the talks between the parties would be renewed without delay and that all efforts would be made to pursue them until a political settlement was reached;

(v) Observing that these discussions, in the course of which the Chairman, acting in a mediatory role, put forward an informal scheme of settlement, have not yet led to an agreement;

(vi) Considering that general elections, in which the Pathet Lao are not participating, will be held on 25 December, 1955, and understanding that the forthcoming elections do not preclude the possibility of Pathet Lao participation in such future elections as may be agreed to by the Royal Government;

(vii) Considering that, without the Royal Government administration in the two northern provinces, it would be impossible to obtain full integration of the Fighting Units of the Pathet Lao into the national community as envisaged in the Geneva Settlement;

(1) Expresses regret that the efforts hitherto made to bring about a settlement have so far produced no result;

(2) Reiterates that the intention of the Geneva Agreement is to preserve the unity of Laos;

(3) Reiterates the undisputed right of the Royal Government to establish its administration in the two northern provinces;

(4) Expresses concern at the difficult situation which has arisen as a result of the failure of the negotiations;

(5) Recommends to the parties:

(i) to observe strictly the recommendations contained in the Commission's resolution of December 9, 1955 for the effective cessation of hostilities;

(ii) that the Royal Administration should be re-established in the Provinces of Sam Neua and Phong Saly without further delay and that the Royal Government should, in this respect, act in conformity with its Unilateral Declaration at Geneva of July 21, 1954;

(iii) that the Royal Government should promptly take the necessary measures to enable the Pathet Lao to be reintegrated fully and without discrimination into the national community;

(iv) that, within ... from the passage of this resolution, the two parties should enter into consultations to achieve ends (ii) and (iii) and thus to come to a political settlement as envisaged in Article 14 of the Geneva Agreement;

(v) that the parties should indicate their acceptance of this resolution by ..., keeping in view the provisions of Article 36 of the Geneva Agreement;

Decides to report fully to the co-Chairmen of the Geneva Conference on Indo-China on the present situation in Laos in relation to the Geneva Agreement for such consideration as they may wish to give." Ends.

SIMPLE RESTORATION RESOLUTION

Here follows the text of the resolution on restoration of Royal Administration which I will introduce in the Commission tomorrow: "The International Commission for Supervision and Control in Laos,

1. Considering that the sovereignty, the independence, the unity and the territorial integrity of Laos were recognized in the Geneva Settlement;

2. Considering that, as the International Commission informed the Prime Minister of the Royal Laotian Government in a letter dated June 15/55, such recognition involves the right of the Royal Laotian Government to the administration of the two northern provinces of Phong Saly and Sam Neua;

3. Considering that in the same letter the International Commission expressed the hope that representatives of the Royal Laotian Government and of the Fighting Units of the Pathet Lao would resume discussions with a view to reaching a political settlement as envisaged in Article 14 of the Geneva Agreement on Laos;

4. Considering that these discussions have not yet led to an agreement;

5. Considering that, unless the Royal Administration is effectively restored without further delay, the unity and territorial integrity of Laos would be gravely imperilled and the attainment of a political settlement conforming to the basic pattern of the Geneva Agreement would be impeded; recommends:

(a) that the Royal Administration should be re-established forthwith in the two provinces of Phong Saly and Sam Neua;

(b) that with this end in view, the Royal Laotian Government should make, and the Fighting Units of the Pathet Lao accept, before the end of 1955 sufficient administrative changes in these two provinces to enable the Royal Laotian Government to undertake measures necessary to effectively restore their administrative control;

(c) that the Royal Laotian Government should enter into discussions with the Fighting Units of the Pathet Lao for the re-integration of the Fighting Units of Pathet Lao as soon as possible into the national community;

(d) that the Royal Laotian Government and the Fighting Units of the Pathet Lao should inform the International Commission for Supervision and Control, Laos within seven days of the passage of this resolution whether they agree to put these recommendations into effect, bearing in mind that failure to report within the time limit would be considered as a refusal within the meaning of Article 36 of the Geneva Agreement on Laos."

2. As I suggested I might in my telegram 329, I have decided on a simple restoration resolution without reference to elections. Yesterday I received from the Prime Minister an approved formulation relating to the possibility of complementary elections to provide for additional deputies and alluding to the further possibility of this being extended to the northern provinces if the administration had been effectively restored. Under existing circumstances I do not regard this as a firm enough prospect to be included in our resolution; and in any case, since it opens up the possibility of Pathet Lao participation in further elections in the ten provinces, it would be difficult to fix without risk with the other preambular paragraphs on elections in your Y-218.

3. I have revised paragraph 3 of the preamble, omitting the expression of opinion, because this should have the words "without the political settlement envisaged in Article XIV of the Geneva Agreement" after the word "effectively" if it is to reproduce fairly the relevant part of the June 15 letter. This would create a logical difficulty in relation to para 5. As it stands the resolution is logically sound and I am prepared to cope with arguments relating to the opinion, or its omission, which we should have had to form in any (case?).

4. As anticipated in my telegram 322 of December 3, I have deleted "for handover of the rest of the administrative structure in the two northern provinces" from paragraph two of the recommendations. This leaves no doubt that the RLG would alone be responsible for the balance of administrative changes following the step to be taken in accordance with paragraph 1. In view of the short time left before the end of 1955, I have decided to leave this paragraph as in our Y-218 and not to make the amendment anticipated in my 322.

INDIAN CEASE-FIRE RESOLUTION

I am enclosing two copies of the Indian Cease-Fire Resolution which, as mentioned in our last weekly summary, was adopted by the International Commission at its meeting on December 9.

2. During the discussion of the Resolution, I made a statement in which I said that the Canadian Delegation considered this to be a good resolution and that we attached importance to its objective, the maintenance of the cease-fire in the northern provinces. I thought, however, that it was regrettable that this kind of a resolution should be necessary and stressed that I regarded it as essential that the Commission should take positive action in the other sphere for which it had some responsibility under the Geneva Agreement, namely the promotion of a political settlement in the country. I was glad to note that the Resolution emphasized the foregoing in paragraph IV of its preamble which refers to "a political settlement, which by its nature would include a solution of all outstanding military problems".

3. Having been unable, in informal discussions, to persuade the Indian Chairman to accept all the changes suggested in your telegram no. Y-221 of November 25, I next proposed formally to the Commission that a new operative paragraph should be added to the effect that the parties should work out the application of the Resolution, bearing in mind the problem of the eventual military and political settlement envisaged in Article 14 of the Geneva Agreement. I also suggested that operative paragraph VI(d) should include some provision for the exercise of continuing supervision by the Military Committee.

4. As I had anticipated, neither of these suggestions were acceptable to the other two Commissioners. The Chairman pointed out that paragraph IV of the Resolution had been introduced into his original draft in order to try to meet the first of my points and he did not see how it would be possible to go much further since it was difficult to ask the parties to work out the application of a resolution bearing in mind a settlement, the exact nature of which it was impossible to foresee at the present time. I should perhaps add that, in our informal discussions, Mr. Sen was not prepared to include the phrase "military and political settlement" in paragraph IV, stating that the Geneva Agreement only made mention of a "political settlement". He was nevertheless prepared to accept my suggestion to the extent represented by the present wording of that paragraph.

5. The Polish representative's only comment was that the latter part of the warning contained in the last paragraph of the Indian draft resolution required re-wording. He suggested that it state that the party responsible for any provocative military act should bear the entire responsibility for all consequences which might ensue from that act. This was clearly unacceptable to both the Indians and ourselves and after some discussion the present wording, which seems to meet the Indian point in unexceptionable language, was adopted.<sup>71</sup>

6. After the passage of the Resolution I took the opportunity of making a brief statement, along the lines of paragraph 6 of your telegram Y-221, concerning team operations in the two northern provinces, stating that with the passage of the military resolution it was more than ever important that the teams should be able to work effectively on both sides of any neutral zone which might be established. I said that the Canadian Delegation would be happy to consider ways and means of getting more Commission personnel onto the ground in the northern provinces, and suggested if the accommodation situation permitted that the military committee might consider the possibility of moving one or other of our teams from the south to the troubled areas of the north. I also took the opportunity of tabling a fairly lengthy memorandum† which we had prepared on the failure of the Pathet Lao to cooperate with the Commission under the terms of Articles 20 and 26 of the Geneva Agreement. (Two copies are enclosed.) In tabling the memorandum I followed up earlier statements I had made about Pathet Lao obstruction in the northern provinces with another statement on this problem. I think it may be possible to have the Military Committee study this question and the related question of the extent to which the activities of our teams might be somewhat extended in the northern provinces.

COMMISSION ACTION

Any reference to elections in Commission resolution must be very carefully framed so as not to intrude on area of RLG's sovereignty and not to make recommendations beyond Commission's competence. On the other hand we think that it was generally expected that general elections before the end of 1955 would be the culmination of the political settlement. Reference in Mayrand's May draft resolution to need for restoration so that elections could be held uniformly throughout the Kingdom was a telling means of pressing for prompt acceptance by the PL of restoration. We would be reluctant to give up this argument from preamble to resolution if it can possibly be maintained. Nevertheless we would not press for inclusion or preamble paragraphs relating to elections in our draft resolution in our telegram No. 218 if you think that they would in any way place the RLG's position on elections in a bad light.

The Pathet Lao and the Royal Laotian Government accepted the terms of the cease-fire resolution in late December.

2. We are prepared to accept your amendments as set out in your telegram No. 316 of November 29 if you consider this shorter form more acceptable to RLG. In paragraph 4 of your preamble we think it desirable to qualify FUPL with phrase "who have not yet accepted demobilization". In paragraph 5 of your preamble FUPL would be further qualified by phrase "who have accepted demobilization and integration into the national community".

3. We think that you should introduce in Commission with suitable statement a resolution along the lines of our 218 or your 316 at a convenient early date. We do not think that you should press this resolution to a vote if you are not assured of Indian support. There is the danger that if voted on clause by clause and defeated PL and Poles might argue that opinion of majority of Commission was exact opposite of that set out in your resolution.

4. A few days or so after introduction of resolution mentioned above we would hope that you could persuade Sen to introduce compromise resolution along lines discussed in your 332 of December 12 text of which we have just received in Talbot's telegram No. 519 to F.O. Although this falls short of our hopes we much appreciate effort you have made to exclude unacceptable Indian views and get many of our ideas worked in. We are therefore prepared to authorize you to support this draft with such minor amendments as you may think acceptable. You are authorized to vote for a resolution substantially along these lines without further reference.

5. We have two specific observations to make on this compromise resolution:

(a) Preamble VI

Please try to secure amendment to phrase "in which the PL are not participating" to read "in which members of the FUPL who have not yet accepted demobilization are not participating" in order to emphasize our view that the armistice agreement only recognizes the FUPL as a military group, those who moved into two northern provinces under Article 14 are those who did not accept demobilization in the provisional assembly areas. Those who accepted demobilization are free to participate as individuals in the general elections as you have indicated and should receive the protection of Article 15.

(b) Recommendation IV

Before agreeing to a specific time limit (which we think desirable) we think it would be wise to ensure the acceptability of this provision to the RLG even if you do not discuss the whole draft resolution.

6. If Indian Government insists on greatly watering down this draft compromise resolution you may wish to consider referring to us for further instructions. We shall then have to consider whether the best that the Indians offer represents some advance over the June 15 letter or whether it would be better to drop the idea of a resolution and concentrate on trying to get a strong report to the co-Chairmen, including a possible additional Canadian minority note.

7. We recognize the taxing problems you have had in trying to steer a course through the many difficulties in the way of finding a sound, honourable and acceptable position to adopt in respect to the breakdown of the political negotiations. We very much appreciate the perseverance and resourcefulness and good sense you have shown in this situation and regret that slow communications have added to your problems.<sup>72</sup>

LAOS — POLITICAL OBJECTIVES AND COMMISSION ACTION

Miss Byrne at the Laos desk in the State Department was finally able to give us today, Dec. 23, the considered views of the State Department on the Canadian outline of broad political objectives in Laos which was set out in your telegram under reference. The State Department comments on our outline were included in a "guidance telegram" dated Dec 22 to a number of interested United States Missions, including the United States Embassy in Ottawa. The Embassy was instructed to speak to you along the lines of the State Department's comment to us. In fact, Miss Byrne allowed us to read the whole telegram.

2. Part of the State Department message contains the State Department's assessment of Canadian policy as it is understood here. This assessment takes into account Mr. Léger's discussion with the State Department two weeks ago.<sup>74</sup> It is a not unfair assessment of our position and shows a real appreciation on the part of the State Department of the difficulties which we face in reconciling the diverse and conflicting factors which vie for Canadian consideration.

3. Referring specifically to the points in paragraph 14 of your telegram under reference, the message indicates that the State Department agrees with points (a), (b), (d), (e) and (g). It agrees as well with point (c) but "would add that if the resolution which the Indians will support is weaker than that contemplated in point (b), a strong Canadian minority report even in the face of Indian objections appears essential". Point (f) is acceptable to the State Department if it proves acceptable to the Royal Government.

4. So far as point (f) is concerned, i.e., the willingness of the Royal Government to resume negotiations with the Pathet Lao, the State Department believes it would be a good tactical move for the Royal Government to declare, after the Dec 25 elections and at the

After several more minor drafting changes, the Indo-Canadian compromise resolution was finally adopted by the Commission on January 7, 1956. The Polish delegate abstained. Commission's request, that, while the December elections were the elections specified in the unilateral Laotian Declaration at Geneva, the Royal Government was nevertheless willing to negotiate the re-integration of the Pathet Lao into the national community according to the constitution of Laos. In the State Department's view, negotiations on such a narrow basis would at least "prevent the crystallization of the partition of Laos" and place the onus squarely on the Pathet Lao if they refused to negotiate.

5. There were in addition general State Department comments on our outline. The message which we read indicated that the United States Government continued to oppose strongly the linking of the Vietnam and Laos settlements and any semblance of the partition of Laos. The United States Government, however, recognized the strength of the Canadian reasons for believing that the Indian Government and the Communists connected the two issues. The State Department was inclined to believe that we might be excessively sensitive to Indian views in this context. The State Department doubted that the Indians were truly anxious to withdraw from the Commissions in Indochina.

6. It was the firm view of the United States Government that the International Control Commissions (especially in Vietnam and Laos) served as deterrents to hostilities. For that reason the United States Government would wish to see the Commissions remain on the ground. Consequently, the State Department saw the necessity of not antagonizing the Indians. The State Department was, however, inclined to believe that the Indians could bear more pressure than we considered possible.

7. The State Department message finally examined the Canadian fear that the Royal Government might regard a favourable Commission resolution as giving it licence to use force against the Pathet Lao. It was the intention of the United States Government to continue to counsel the Royal Government to caution in this respect. The United States Government was unable, however, to advise the Royal Government not to respond with all available resources to a Pathet Lao attack. "To tell the Royal Government to hold back because re-occupation of the two provinces was not militarily possible was one thing but to request it to accept violation of the Geneva Agreement without protest was quite different." The United States Government had limited ability to influence the Royal Government, and the possibility of unilateral Lao action even in the face of Western advice could not be ruled out. It was the United States view that positive Commission action in support of the Royal Government would be the most effective demonstration that there was still hope for a recovery of the Royal Government's territory by peaceful means.

8. We took careful notes from the State Department's message and much of the above is in the original words of that message.

RECOGNITION OF THE GOVERNMENT OF VIETNAM.

Since we have now received a message from the Vietnamese Government formally notifying us of the elevation of President Diem to the position of Chief of State, and of the fact that the State of Vietnam has been proclaimed a republic, it is necessary for us to decide whether we should now extend recognition to the new government in the State of Vietnam,

2. In our telegram No. Y-690 of October 21† to Paris (repeated to Hanoi) we gave the following as the Department's preliminary view on this matter of recognition:

"Recognition of Diem's régime by us is not, in our view, necessary for the performance of our task on the Commission any more than recognition of the DR régime is necessary, and we would prefer that this step be taken as a result of the normal requirements of our relations with the State of Vietnam independent of the performance of our tasks on the Commission."

In telegram No. 103 of October 26† from Saigon, Mr. Johnson said that he agreed that there was no need for us to take any hasty action with respect to the recognition of Diem as head of state following the October 23 referendum.

3. While we have been kept informed of the intentions of the United States, the United Kingdom and other governments to extend recognition to Diem promptly following the referendum, no other government suggested that we should take this step at the same time.

4. In telegram No. 574 of October 28,† Mr. Johnson has suggested that recognition of Diem as head of state should not be delayed too long, and that recognition by Canada now would come after an appropriate interval following recognition by the United States, France, the United Kingdom, Australia, New Zealand, Japan and Thailand.

5. We see no objection to extending recognition at this time, and the receipt of the telegram from the Vietnamese Foreign Minister will make it difficult for us to delay in doing so without good reasons.

6. Attached for your approval if you agree is a telegram to New Delhi for the Minister on his arrival there on November 3 recommending that a message be sent in reply to the Foreign Minister's telegram. Our reply would constitute recognition of the new régime in South Vietnam.

7. The message we have suggested that the Minister send to the Vietnamese Foreign Minister is similar to the corresponding messages that have been sent by the United Kingdom and United States Governments. These messages read as follows:

"Her Majesty's Ambassador acknowledges receipt of the Foreign Minister's letter and looks forward to the continuance of the friendly relations which have existed in the past between Her Majesty's Government and the Government of the State of Vietnam."

"The Government of the United States looks forward to maintaining with the new Government of Vietnam the same cordial and friendly relations which have in the past so happily existed between the two governments."

8. There would seem to be no need for us, on the one hand, to take special note of the reference in the Vietnamese telegram to the de jure recognition by the Government of Canada of the State of Vietnam, nor, on the other hand, of the fact that under the Geneva settlement the administration in South Vietnam is a provisional one pending the establishment of a government for a unified Vietnam after elections have taken place. Our message to the Vietnamese Foreign Minister is, accordingly, drafted to omit reference to these two points.

9. We see no necessity for making any public announcement concerning the message to the Vietnamese Foreign Minister which accords recognition to the new régime.

Memorandum from Legal Division to Far Eastern Division

CONFIDENTIAL

[Ottawa], November 3, 1955

Reference: Your memorandum of October 21 to Legal Division† and your memo of November 1 to the Under-Secretary.

RECOGNITION OF THE NEW RÉGIME — VIET NAM

Your first memorandum under reference raised the question as to whether the Canadian Government should recognize Diem's Government in South Viet Nam, while the second memorandum forwarded to this Division a proposed telegram to New Delhi, recommending to the Minister that a message be sent to extend recognition to the new South Vietnamese Government.

2. As you know, on December 30, 1952, the Canadian Government recognized Viet Nam "as an associate State within the French Union, in accordance with the terms of the Agreement, dated March 8, 1949 between President Auriol and His Majesty Bao Dai and recognizes the Government of His Majesty Bao Dai as the Government of this State". It is, of course, to be assumed that the Geneva Agreement and, in particular, the subsequent Canadian membership in the International Commission is not to be construed as having caused the withdrawal of our recognition given in 1952. The two questions were independent of each other.

3. However, following Bao Dai's decree of October 18 terminating the Mission entrusted to President Diem, and especially following Diem's referendum of October 23 and subsequent declarations, a new régime was established in South Viet Nam by unconstitutional means.

4. From a strictly legal point of view, in such cases, the first question is to determine whether "the new authority which purports to be the Government of this State is entitled to be regarded as representing the State in the international sphere". Lauterpacht — "Recognition in International Law" p. 98 — says that "The rules of International Law on the subject are based on the principle that the revolutionary government which wields effective power, with a reasonable prospect of permanency, over the whole — or practically the whole — territory of the state is entitled to recognition."

5. It might be mentioned that a change of government which was brought about by unconstitutional means is not regarded as unlawful in International Law. In this connection, recognition of a new government does not mean approval of the method by which a new government assumed power nor approval of the policies of this new government.

6. Lauterpacht and the bulk of authors on International Law consider that recognition is a legal duty although, in practice, it is usually dealt with as a matter of political discretion. This Division has usually advocated, however, — from a legal point of view — that recognition should be granted "whenever, at the discretion of the Canadian Government, conditions prescribed by International Law are fulfilled".

7. Therefore, if you consider that Diem's Government "exercises effective control over the national territory, has a reasonable prospect of permanency, and has the obedience of the bulk of the population," recognition could be extended. However, although it is true that our task on the Commission is substantially independent of the question of recognition, the considerations discussed below may be relevant in assessing the extent to which the Diem régime conforms to the principles of international law affecting recognition.

8. In this connection, it might be mentioned that the willingness of governments to fulfill their international obligations has sometimes been taken into account by Canada in granting recognition. Although such a requirement has never been insisted upon, we have given it some weight in certain past decisions in regard thereto. For instance, in the recognition of Pinilla's Government in Columbia, Canada noted that "this Government was unreservedly prepared to fulfill the international obligations of the Republic". In Viet Nam, in view of our membership in the Commission, the hope might be expressed (if this is considered opportune) in our telegram giving recognition that the new Government will undertake to fulfill the international obligations binding South Viet Nam. Otherwise, it might be legally doubtful for Canada to recognize a government which might not consider itself bound by the Agreement.

9. The type of recognition to be extended is another factor which should be taken into consideration. In your proposed telegram addressed to the Minister in New Delhi express recognition is recommended in the form of an acknowledgement of the telegram received from the South Vietnamese Minister for Foreign Affairs. This is the best possible course of action under the circumstances. However, your telegram leaves little doubt of our intention of giving de jure recognition. Such recognition is normally given, when in fact a new government has complied with all the conditions required for recognition, i.e. reasonable prospect of permanency. On the other hand, de facto recognition is usually of a more provisional nature and often extended in cases where, notwithstanding the existence of the principal conditions, other conditions which might be considered necessary remain unfulfilled. In the case of South Viet Nam, we are of the opinion that, perhaps, some conditions remain unfulfilled: in accepting to participate in the Commission, the Canadian Government can also be deemed to have accepted the intention that Viet Nam would be reunited in July 1956, as put forward in Article 7 of the final Declaration at Geneva. If this is so, then it seems to follow that we consider at present South Viet Nam as the temporary successor state of Viet Nam while, at the same time recognizing that the future status of this country would be decided by election; thus we would, to a certain extent, be bound to consider Diem's Government as provisional in character. In view of these circumstances, it might be more appropriate to grant de facto recognition only.

10. We would, of course, be pleased to consult further with your Division on this question if this last suggestion were politically acceptable. We fully appreciate that political reasons might supersede the suggestions of paragraphs 8 and 9 above which are based on a purely legal interpretation of the factors involved in this issue. In the circumstances, I would not object, therefore, to the form of recognition contemplated in your telegram under reference.

RECOGNITION OF THE GOVERNMENT OF VIETNAM

Attached is our memorandum of November 1 addressed to you on this subject which was sent to Legal Division for clearance. Legal Division has, however, advanced certain considerations which should be taken into account in a decision on this matter. Their memorandum of November 3 setting forth their views is attached.

2. Despite the reservations of Legal Division we believe that on political grounds it would be unwise for us to withhold recognition at this time.

3. To cover the inconsistency between de jure recognition of the new régime in South Vietnam and our acceptance (by participation on the International Commission) of the Geneva settlement, under which the administrations in both halves of Vietnam may be regarded as provisional only, we have amended the second sentence of the message we have suggested the Minister might send to the Vietnamese Foreign Minister. This sentence formerly read:

"It is the hope of my government that the friendly relations which have existed in the past between our two governments will continue in the future."

It has now been amended to read:

"It is the hope of my government that the friendly relations which have existed in the past between our two countries — particularly in relation to the tasks which Canadian representatives have been carrying out in Vietnam — will continue in the future."

4. This qualification should not cause offence to the South Vietnamese or embarrassment to the United Kingdom or France. They have both recognized the Diem régime without qualification. At the same time, we should be able to maintain that our act of recognition has not been inconsistent with our responsibilities on the Commission.

5. With this amendment, therefore, we recommend that our telegram to the Minister in New Delhi go forward.

RECOGNITION OF SOUTH VIETNAMESE GOVERNMENT

Following for the Minister on arrival, Begins: Telegram dated October 31 from Saigon from Vu Van Mau formally advises you of elevation of Diem to position of Chief of State and of Constitutional Act establishing the State of Vietnam as a Republic. Full text is contained in our immediately following telegram.†

2. In telegram No. 574† from Hanoi (repeated to New Delhi as No. 64) Johnson suggests that recognition of Diem as Head of State should not be delayed too long. While such recognition is not in our view necessary for the performance of our task on the Commission and should take place in conformity with the normal requirements of [our relations with the State of Vietnam, we see [no objection to our taking this step now, particularly] since States more closely concerned have a[ready] extended recognition.

3. Accordingly, you may wish to send [a] message to Vietnamese Foreign Minister along [the] following lines:

Begins: I acknowledge receipt of your T[elegram of October] 31 informing me of the elevation of Preside[nt Diem] to the position of Chief of State of Vietnam. [It] is the hope of my Government that the friendly relations which have existed in the past between our two countries — particularly in relation to the tasks which Canadian Representatives have been carrying out in Vietnam — will continue in the future. I thank you for your expressions of good will which I sincerely reciprocate. Ends.

The formula is similar to that employed by the United States and the United Kingdom with the exception of the phrase between dashes in the second sentence. This phrase is considered a desirable qualification in our message or recognition, to cover the inconsistency between our acceptance of the Geneva Settlement (as a consequence of our participation in the Commission) and our de jure recognition of a régime which, under the Geneva Settlement can be regarded as provisional only and exercising sovereignty [only] in areas south of the 17th parallel, pending reunification of the coun[try] after general elections. The reference is intentionally obscu[re] to avoid disturbing the South Vietnamese or embarrassing the United Kingdom or France, but it would enable us to meet a[ccusations] which might be advanced by the Indians or others that we hav[e] done something inconsistent with our responsibilities on [the Commission].

4. If you agree to a reply along these lines you may [wish] to send it directly to Mau from New Delhi (repeating it [to the British] Ambassador in Saigon who represents Canadian interests [(in Saigon] Candel, Hanoi, and Candel, Saigon.) Alternatively y[ou may wish] to authorize the Acting Minister here to send the reply[.] We would be grateful if you would inform us [which method] you intend to employ.<sup>75</sup>

FORMOSA AND THE COASTAL ISLANDS

I should like to expand some of the views expressed in my statement in the House of Commons yesterday about the situation in the Formosa Strait.<sup>76</sup> The passage in President Eisenhower's message to Congress about the series of recent Chinese Communist attacks in the Formosa Strait is quite striking.<sup>77</sup> The President quotes the Chinese Communist statements that their objective is the conquest of Formosa and his speech suggests that the United States authorities may agree that this is their objective. Our understanding is that the Chinese Communists lack the strength, particularly naval and air strength, successfully to invade Formosa. Further, we have little if any indication that the Chinese Communists are thinking in terms of direct hostilities with the United States which, of course, an attack on Formosa would entail. The immediate objective of the Chinese Communist operations in the Formosa Strait seems to be limited to the taking over of the coastal islands.

2. In my statement Tuesday, I made a distinction between the status of the coastal islands and that of Formosa and the Pescadores. From the terms of the defence treaty we gathered that defence arrangements could be made for Formosa and the Pescadores without the retention of outposts in the coastal islands.<sup>78</sup> Indeed, we have hoped that with the more formal guarantees of United States support in the treaty, the Nationalists would in time have come to regard these outposts as of minor importance in their defensive arrangements. Moreover, as some of these islands are so close to the Chinese coast, it obviously would be difficult to defend them locally and possibly the only effective method would be by retaliation against the Chinese mainland.

See Canada, House of Commons, Debates, 1955, Volume 1, pp. 498-499. On January 28, Pearson made a similar statement regarding Formosa during a broadcast of "The Nation's Business" on the C.B.C. See Canada, Department of External Affairs, Statements and Speeches, 1955, No. 4.

<sup>77</sup> Voir/See United States, Department of State, Bulletin, Volume XXXII, No. 815, February 7, 1955, pp. 211-213.

3. In this connection there is an obvious danger that in assisting the Nationalist forces to evacuate the Tachens, there may be some brush between United States and Chinese Communist forces. We sincerely hope that the United States Administration will do everything possible to play down such incidents if they occur.

4. To obtain a cease fire agreement it is, of course, necessary that the Chinese Communists should participate. The United States Government has made one important concession in the abandonment of any sponsorship of Nationalist claims to re-establish themselves on the mainland. They may well feel that it is now up to the Communist Chinese to make a concession. As President Eisenhower pointed out recently, although the allies of the United States have no doubt as to her defensive intentions, the Chinese Communists may well entertain other notions and the continued occupation of islands so close to her coast may cause the Chinese to doubt United States intentions. In order to attempt to overcome these suspicions, I consider it very desirable that the question of the coastal islands should be kept open. It is unlikely that the Chinese Communists will agree to cease fire discussions unless it is indicated to them in some fashion that the possession of the coastal islands is open to negotiation. It might be possible, for example, to suggest that some of these islands be de-militarized while remaining provisionally under Nationalist Administration.

5. I have emphasized the importance of securing participation by the Chinese Communists in cease fire discussions because I assume that the type of United Nations action that is envisaged is good offices or mediation action. I do not consider that the situation in Formosa at present lends itself to collective security action and we assume that this is not what the United States Administration has in mind.

6. I should be obliged if you would express these views to the State Department; preferably to the Under-Secretary of State or Mr. Murphy.

SITUATION IN THE FORMOSA STRAITS

It seemed to me that it would be useful to record briefly in a telegram to you the conversations which had taken place in the last twelve hours between Merchant and myself and most recently between you and the Secretary of State over the telephone.

2. After you spoke to me on the telephone last evening, I called on Merchant at his house and explained the circumstances of the decision that you should accompany the Prime Minister to the Commonwealth meeting in London.<sup>79</sup> I said that without doubt the current situation in the Formosa Straits would be discussed by the Prime Ministers, and that you wished the Secretary of State to know that you would do what you could to explain the intentions of the United States, and to dispel extreme and erroneous impressions of United States policy. It was to be anticipated that the Asian representatives particularly would be very apprehensive. In these circumstances it might be useful if you and Mr. Dulles had a word over the telephone before you left.

3. Merchant and I decided that the best procedure would be for him to arrange for me to call on the Secretary this morning. I could then explain the position to him after which, if he wished, he could call you on the telephone. This is precisely what happened. Merchant and I were in the room when Mr. Dulles spoke to you.

4. Mr. Dulles began by saying that he was very glad that you were going to London. He was also grateful for the opportunity of speaking to you before you went. He then went on to explain the policy of the United States as summarized in the following paragraphs of this message.

5. The United States does not want war. If it had wished to precipitate a war with China there had been much better opportunity when hostilities were being carried on in Korea and in Indo-China. On the contrary, the United States had made great sacrifices to bring the Korean hostilities to an end. Hostilities in Indo-China had also been terminated. If, with the Chinese Communists facing hostile forces on three fronts (Korea, Formosa and Indo-China), the United States had not then launched a war, it was surely unlikely that it would decide to do so now under much less favourable conditions.

6. On the other hand, Mr. Dulles went on, the United States were determined to hold the island chain which began in the Aleutians and of which the Pescadores and Formosa formed an integral part. Of the American determination in this respect there should be no shadow of doubt. Formosa was essential to the security not only of the United States, but also, indirectly, of Canada, and more directly of Australia and New Zealand. If Formosa went, Japan could not be held, and the potential combination of the Soviet Union, Communist China and Japan would create a situation of unbalance which would be disastrous.

7. The reasons why the Administration had decided to request specific approval from Congress (following the stepped up propaganda from Peking with respect to their Formosan intentions and the assault on the Tachens) were two:

(a) To bolster the morale of Nationalist China which was deteriorating seriously; if the Nationalist forces disintegrated the United States would find it difficult to man the defences of Formosa with United States troops;

(b) To make it abundantly clear to Peking that the United States would fight rather than give up Formosa and the Pescadores.

8. Mr. Dulles went on to remind you that the United States Government had hoped that gradually the situation in the Straits would become stabilized. They had been in consultation with the United Kingdom Government since September, as you knew. It was the action of Peking in increasing their threats with regard to Formosa, and finally assaulting the Tachens, that made it necessary for the United States to react strongly. This was not an evidence of any aggressive intention on the part of the United States Government, Mr. Dulles repeated, but a necessary indication of their determination to stand firm before Formosa.

9. The conversation ended at this point. You told me subsequently that, on your side, you had expressed appreciation of this exposition of United States intentions, and that it would be helpful to you in London in explaining the American point of view. I am satisfied that the conversation was very useful, certainly in terms of our own relations with the United States.

10. It may not be possible to get the Minister's directions before he leaves this afternoon, concerning repetition of this telegram. I take it, however, that you will wish to repeat it at least to London for him.

FORMOSA AND THE COASTAL ISLANDS

It seems to us that there is a momentary lull at this stage in the hectic pace of developments of United States policy with respect to the situation in the China coastal area. The New York Times coverage in the past week of the important elements of what we believe to be a gradual clarification of United States-China policy has been essentially accurate and we need not deal at any great length with what is public property. It may be useful for you, however, to have our brief roundup of fact and speculation at this moment of relative quiescence.

2. It seems to us that recent events have in some measure at least served to clear away much of the emotional fog which has made it so difficult to see the basic outline of United States policy towards Communist China. There are grounds for belief that Mr. Dulles, by his persistent and energetic attention to the whims of Congress and public opinion, has arrived at a point where he can with some safety reveal a China policy close to the much-maligned Truman-Acheson doctrine of an earlier day.<sup>80</sup> It is at least conceivable that the one-time powerful China lobbyists may be in a position similar to that which in another context produced the Herblock caption "don't look now but I don't think we are being followed". It may be too much to assume that Mr. Dulles has over a long period worked consciously toward his present policy; it cannot easily be denied, however, that he has been instrumental in creating the climate of opinion within which it was possible for the Administration to indicate that it would withhold its concurrence from any Nationalist Chinese attempt to restore by force its control of the mainland of China.

3. What we believe to be the four cornerstones of the United States policy which is gradually becoming more apparent are (in over-simplified terms) the following:

(a) The containment of Communist Chinese expansionist tendencies; these to be considered more in terms of their effect on balance of power in the area than in terms of their ideological connotations. Formosa and the Pescadores are integral parts of the line of containment and will be denied to Communist control.

(b) The United States has no aggressive intentions against mainland China and will earnestly seek to achieve a peaceful settlement through United Nations channels of the immediate problems in the China coastal area. Communist China must realize, however, that the United States is prepared to fight if attacked either before Formosa or in the course of any United States-assisted evacuation of Tachens by the Nationalist Chinese.

(c) United States concurrence will not be given to any action by Chinese Nationalist authorities to restore themselves by force to the mainland of China. While the Administration must still be cautious towards the idea of "two Chinas", and particularly towards any suggestion that the United States is taking the lead in such a move, the possibility is no longer beyond the pale.

(d) The eventual disposition of the offshore coastal islands must be left open and can be determined only after a period of successful cease-fire in the Formosa straits.

4. Domestic reaction to the President's message to Congress has run the gamut from Mr. Wilson's inept remark that Formosa was "just a ripple" to the comments of Senators Morse and Flanders that the President was seeking "a quasi-legalization of preventive war". The President's request for Senate concurrence to the commitment of United States forces in defence of Formosa and the Pescadores, if that should prove necessary, was, however, granted by a vote of 85 to 3 in the Senate on January 28. The House of Representatives gave its assent on January 25 by an unprecedented vote of 409 to 3. The President's personal assurance offered on January 27 that "any decision to use United States forces other than in immediate self-defence or in direct defence of Formosa and the Pescadores" would be a decision which he would take and a responsibility which he would not delegate, and the strong defence of the President's action by Senator George on the floor of the Senate are thought to have had great influence on the final vote.

5. The Senate debate has not been without domestic political overtones. Democrats have charged that the President is simply reinstating the policy of the Truman Administration and by that action is admitting the falsity of Republican condemnation in the last two electoral campaigns of the Truman Administration's China policy. Republicans, of course, contest this appreciation. In spite of differences of opinion which have been expressed in the course of the Senate debate, however, the President's hand has been strengthened immensely to take whatever action he considers necessary in the Formosa Straits.

6. Finally, we have been struck by the state of mind of some of the working-level officials in the State Department with whom we deal regularly on China matters. It can best be described as a kind of sense of relief on their part that at last their superiors have made up their minds on a consistent and purposeful policy towards Communist China which will indicate to the Communist Chinese without any excessive bravado the limits beyond which the United States will not be pushed.

FORMOSA STRAITS NEUTRALIZATION

Following for Léger, Begins: We have been wondering whether, after the deployment of Nationalist forces from the coastal islands, which we would hope might take place under a Security Council cease-fire or some tacit acceptance by the Communists of peaceful withdrawal of the Nationalist garrisons, some further action could be taken to discourage the outbreak of any further hostilities between the Nationalists on Formosa and the Communists on the mainland.

2. We recognize that the United States Mutual Defence Treaty with the Chinese Nationalists and the accompanying exchange of Notes will have the practical effect of both defending Formosa and curbing the forces there from attacking the mainland. Nevertheless, it would be difficult for the United States or the Nationalists to spell out any more clearly than they have done in their exchange of Notes any limitation beyond "consultation" on offensive action being taken by the Nationalists. It would also be difficult for the United Nations to take special note of this special agreement between the United States and the Nationalists even though it may have some of the practical effects desired.

3. Any proposed resolution in the Security Council or the General Assembly envisaging the neutralization of Formosa would appear to be unacceptable to both the Nationalists and the Communists because they would regard it as an intervention into an area of domestic jurisdiction.

4. However, it might be possible for the United Nations, representing the international community to pass a resolution neutralizing the international waters of the Formosa Straits. Such a resolution might call upon the parties and on all member Governments and non-member Governments to refrain from sending any armed vessel into, or armed aircraft over a defined corridor down the centre of the Formosa Straits. If such a corridor were plotted about 40 to 50 miles wide it should still give sufficient room for Chinese Nationalist and United States warships, on the one hand, to sail down the west coast of Formosa and out to the Pescadores and Communist Chinese warships, on the other hand, to sail down the more indented mainland coast and visit any of the inhabited off-shore islands. A 3-Power International Commission might be established to supervise the neutralization of the Formosa Straits. This Commission might have as its members the United Kingdom which could provide naval base facilities at Hong Kong, Australia or France which both have naval vessels available in the Pacific area and which recognize the Chinese Nationalists and India or Burma or Ceylon which recognize the Chinese Communists. An international naval patrol, under the direction of the Commission, might be based on Hong Kong, or possibly Manila which would be somewhat further away. The objective might be to keep one aircraft carrier and 3 destroyers or frigates on patrol at any one time in the neutral corridor. Various member states might be prepared to contribute vessels to this patrol from time to time. Any vessel wishing to pass through the neutral corridor would be required to identify itself on demand from the neutral patrol. If considered desirable, a system of navicerts might be instituted.

5. The suggestion outlined above has been drafted rather hastily as a departmental think-piece that might be helpful in your discussions of ways of dealing with the problem of neutralization after the immediate problem of the hostilities in the coastal islands has been solved. The idea of dealing with international waters is to avoid assertions from both the Nationalists and the Communists that the United Nations has no right to intervene in their domestic affairs. If the idea of establishing an International Commission and an international patrol is accepted for Stage 2, then that Commission and the patrol might also be useful in Stage 1 in overseeing the evacuation of Nationalist forces from the coastal islands, as outlined in Menzies' memorandum† to you of January 28.

6. We are not repeating this telegram to either Washington or New York at present but would be interested in your reactions and any suggestions you may have as to ways in which the Department might be of further assistance in your deliberations in London. Message Ends.

Repeat for information to UKDEL New York, Moscow, Peking and Saving to Paris.

This was a useful conversation and I approve your language. Mr. Dulles' attitude over the evacuation of the Tachens (paragraph 1) and the future of Chiang Kai-shek (paragraph 3) seems realistic and reassuring. But I am concerned about other aspects of his argument particularly his suggestion that he may not be ready to face giving up the other coastal islands for at least another six months (paragraph 6) and the Administration's decision to rest their case over Formosa only on strategic arguments (paragraph 4).

2. My concern springs from a keen desire to find a basis upon which we can work closely with the United States in the Far East. I fully understand Mr. Dulles' grave difficulties with Congress and with the Chinese nationalists. But I am most anxious that American policies should also command the full support of opinion in this country and the rest of the free world.

3. Public opinion here understands and approves the human reasons for not handing over the inhabitants of Formosa to Communist rule. It also recognises that the juridical status of Formosa and the Pescadores on the one hand is different from that of the Mainland and the Coastal Islands on the other. But it is troubled by the lack of clarity in the United States Government's intentions as expressed in their public statements both concerning Matsu and Quemoy and in regard to the use of Formosa as a base for operations against the Mainland. On the first of these two points it is argued that if the evacuation of the Tachens is to be undertaken now it would be better to evacuate all the other islands at the same time rather than wait until attacks develop against them and the operation becomes all the more difficult. On the second point it is felt that the provision in the American exchange of notes with the Nationalists of December 10 that no such operations can take place except with the agreement of the Americans must mean that when such operations do take place they have American support or at least consent. Opinion here is also uncomfortable about the implications of basing the defence of Formosa which is not under American sovereignty and far from the United States upon the strategic argument along that it is considered essential to the defence of the United States. It goes without saying that Formosa has strategic significance not only to the United States but to the other non-Communist countries in the Pacific. But this is surely one of those truths which it is less politic to emphasise and which might have awkward implications if invoked by Russia to justify occupation of Austria and satellite territory. By contrast the telling points in the first two sentences of this paragraph do not suffer from these disadvantages.

4. It will be hazardous to allow the present situation to persist for another six months. It is most unlikely that in such circumstances we shall avoid serious incidents in which as things now are the United States might not command that support of world opinion which is so desirable.

5. It is therefore a matter of some urgency that despite the very real difficulties the United States Government should nevertheless find some means of making clear publicly and beyond all doubt what appear in fact to be their real intentions: namely (a) that they propose to encourage and assist Chiang Kai-shek to evacuate all the coastal islands, and (b) that it is their purpose in future to confine Chiang Kai-shek to Formosa and the Pescadores and to prevent him from using it as a base for hostile activities of any kind against the Mainland.

6. The Americans would command full support here in all efforts to secure a cease-fire designed to enable them to fulfill these two purposes. And once these purposes had been fulfilled the American determination to defend Formosa and the Pescadores would be seen to rest upon a much more solid foundation than at present.

7. I shall be glad if by whatever means you consider appropriate you will urge these considerations as strongly as possible upon the United States Government and press them to consider making some public statement on these lines at an early date. If the United States Government nevertheless conclude that they cannot take the initiative suggested above you should ask them whether there is anything we or New Zealand could do to give them a lead over the jump.

FORMOSA STRAITS

Please pass the following message to the Ambassador, Washington, from the Minister, Begins: The Foreign Secretary has shown me a copy of a telegram which he has sent to Makins, No. 497, of February 1, which comments on Makins' talk last Friday with Mr. Dulles, a report of which you have no doubt seen. In this message, a copy of which Makins will no doubt be able to show you, he has been asked to urge certain considerations upon the United States Government, which it is hoped will remove some uneasiness in this country which has arisen over the uncertainties and ambiguities of United States policy.

2. Eden said that it would be most helpful if we saw fit to make the same kind of approach to the State Department. As the British position and our own on this matter is very similar, I would be glad if you would do this, basing your observations on my statement in the House and in my broadcast on January 28, which could be reinforced where appropriate, by the points which the Foreign Office raise in their message to Makins, and which seem to me to be sensible and very much to the point.

3. I do not think, however, that you need go so far as is suggested in paragraph 7 of the telegram to Makins, which pressed upon the United States Government the desirability of a public statement at an early date along the lines indicated. It will be enough if, at this stage, we merely make clear to them our own views and worries on the matter which, I should add, are shared in varying degrees by all the governments represented at the Commonwealth conference.<sup>81</sup> Ends.

FORMOSA

There was a meeting at Sir Anthony Eden's office yesterday morning, attended by Mr. St-Laurent, Mr. Nehru, Madame Pandit, Krishna Menon, Mr. Pillai, Sir Harold Caccia and myself.<sup>82</sup> It was stated to the conference, and also to the press, that this meeting was being held to discuss the work of the Indo-Chinese Commissions, but when we assembled, Eden raised at once the question of Formosa. He read us a telegram which he had received from Moscow,<sup>83</sup> and which I assume has reached you, with a Russian proposal for a conference, to be held this month in Shanghai or New Delhi to discuss Formosa in the light of the Chinese Communist refusal to attend the Security Council and the United Nations, a refusal which the Russians consider to be entirely justified.

2. Eden was inclined to agree that this proposal of the Russians, though obviously unacceptable to the Americans, was no mere propaganda move and that it indicated the Russians were worried about the situation. He asked our views.

3. Nehru made quite an impassioned defence of the Chinese attitude, at which Eden from time to time demurred, and he was very critical of the United States. He felt that with the Security Council now out of the picture, some ad hoc approach to a settlement through conference should be attempted. He agreed that the Russian proposal would be difficult for the Americans to accept, and to our surprise that any conference which was held should be under the cover of the United Nations. He was very worried that Chiang Kai-shek was pulling the United States and its friends into courses from which it might be impossible to withdraw. Eden felt the same about Chou En-Lai. Of one thing Nehru, however, was absolutely certain; that the Chinese would not yield to United States threats and bullying, and were determined to secure Formosa.

4. We expressed our own view that the Russian proposal, while it might have to be taken seriously, was obviously quite impossible of acceptance by the United States. We felt that a better approach would be for the Security Council to set up a small Good Offices Committee, with wide terms of reference, which, if it so desired, could even recommend a Far Eastern conference. However, though this, or something like it, might have to be done eventually, the immediate danger arose out of the possibility of "incidents" connected with the evacuation of the off-shore islands, and something should be done about that at once, but through diplomatic channels. We suggested that if the USSR or India could approach Peking with a view to getting an assurance that evacuation of these islands would not be interfered with, we, on our side, could ask Washington for a private reassurance that disengagement from these islands, including Quemoy, remained the policy of the United States. It was recognized that it would be quite impossible for the United States to make any public declaration to the above effect, but they might reassure us privately, in return for which India might try to get the assurances required from Peking regarding non-interference. Meanwhile, the larger question of a solution to the problem could be deferred for the time being as the atmosphere which existed now made any general discussion of such a solution fruitless.

5. Both Eden and Nehru were attracted by the above ideas and Eden is to prepare a telegram to Washington which will go at once, and which we will be shown. We were all perfectly aware of the difficulties in securing even a private assurance from the Americans on this question of disengagement from the islands, but we felt that it should be tried in conjunction with an effort to secure an assurance of non-interference from the Chinese.

FORMOSA

A draft of the telegram from the Foreign Office to Washington, referred to in telegram No. 153, was discussed with Robertson, Léger, and myself yesterday afternoon by Sir Harold Caccia, and it is now proposed to send the following message: Begins:

"This Russian approach confirms my view (my telegram No. 196 to New York) that no good can come from any further effort by the Security Council to concern itself with the substance of this question at present. The Russian proposal suggests that they would not dissent from this.

2. If the stage is reached when a Conference or a Commission of Good Offices can be set up to consider this question, it will of course be important that this should be done, if possible, under the aegis of the United Nations. But I do not think that that stage has yet been reached.

3. In my view the essential preliminary is to bring the fighting to an end. As things are, an incident might take place which could have grave consequences and our present efforts should be concentrated on preventing this.

4. In order to have a workable basis for achieving this, it is essential that we should know what it is that the United States Government aim now to achieve. Our understanding is that they would wish to move to a position where Nationalist troops would have been removed from all the coastal islands to the Pescadores and Formosa, and would there be held in accordance with recent arrangements between them and the Nationalist Chinese Government.

5. If this is the position and the United States Government cannot for internal reasons make it plain in public, but would agree to tell us confidentially, then we would be ready to consider an approach to the Russian and Chinese Governments. This approach might take the form of saying that we have noted what Molotov had told United States journalists (Moscow telegram No. 86) and were therefore seeking confirmation that this was the position of the Chinese Government. We would add that if it were, we should be willing so to inform the United States Government without disclosing to the Russian and Chinese Governments the information of United States intentions which had been given to us.

6. I shall be considering what reply to send to Molotov and shall be glad of any comments which the United States Government may have. While I am clear that the present Russian proposal is not acceptable, I see advantage in seeking to continue these confidential exchanges through the diplomatic channel and I think it would be most unwise to slam the door on some eventual Conference or Good Offices Commission, or other technique, provided it was on an acceptable basis. But I repeat that, meanwhile, it is essential to try to reach an arrangement which will at least tacitly avoid the possibility of a dangerous incident.

7. There will not be a formal meeting of the Commonwealth Conference until Monday afternoon. But I shall be informing Commonwealth Prime Ministers individually of my views. I have no reason to think that they will not agree with them". Text ends.

This message should be sent at once to Mr. Heeny. It embodies our views and will be of assistance to him in any discussions with the State Department on this subject. I am telling Butterworth of the American Embassy about it this afternoon, associating ourselves informally with the United Kingdom approach. We are however, anxious that there should be no impression created in Washington that anything like collective pressure on the Americans is involved, nor do we wish to irritate them by a succession of Commonwealth representations repeating the same arguments and observations.

FORMOSA AND THE COASTAL ISLANDS

We saw Scott at the United Kingdom Embassy today, February 7 (Makins had left for New York). Scott had just despatched a report on the interview which Makins and he had with Dulles this morning arising from the instructions from the Foreign Office contained in London's telegram to Ottawa No. 154 of February 6. Presumably, the full report will be immediately available to the Minister in London and eventually will be available to you in Ottawa through Earncliffe. We will not therefore attempt to deal at any length with the message which we read but we might record the main points in it as well as some of Scott's personal comments.

2. Dulles said that it was impossible at this time to clarify further United States intentions with respect to the coastal islands. It was impossible therefore to offer any commitment even privately that Nationalist troops would be removed from all the coastal islands. The governing factors in this context were not Congressional or public opinion in the United States. They were: (a) Communist intentions, and (b) Nationalist Chinese morale. Perhaps, Dulles said, the Communists really intended to take Formosa and the Pescadores, and if their action in the immediate future with respect to the coastal islands indicated the clear intention of proceeding on to an attack on Formosa, the United States Government would have to be free to take what action the situation seemed to require. So far as Nationalist Chinese morale was concerned, Dulles reminded the United Kingdom representatives that Chiang Kai-Shek had suffered serious setbacks in the course of the last few months. Any further setbacks at this moment might be the straw which broke the camel's back. If that were the case, a gap would be created which would have to be filled by other free world forces.

3. Dulles went on to say that the free world must not make the mistake which was made in the reading of Hitler's Mein Kampf. No one had believed Hitler and yet he had worked to the timetable set out in his own writings. The Chinese Communists might really mean what their propaganda organs were saying and the time might have arrived when Communist Chinese intentions and capabilities should be re-assessed by our military planners. The aim of his foreign policy in the Far East was to achieve the balance of power which would provide for reasonable stability. Until Japan was in a better position to exert its influence, the United States would have to be the main counter-weight to the potential power of China and the Soviet Union in the area.

4. Scott found Dulles' arguments convincing. Indeed, the United Kingdom Embassy has been advising the Foreign Office in this vein for some time. Scott believed that if the Chinese Communists were content to "lie doggo" for a few months before moving against other coastal islands lacking strategic significance, the Administration could view such action with reasonable equanimity. If, however, the Communist Chinese moved immediately to take over other of the coastal islands and continued their "stepping-stone propaganda" with respect to Formosa, this would be another matter. Scott is convinced that the initiative lies with Peking, and that the United States will not provoke hostilities with Communist China unless pushed to the wall. You will be aware from our reports that we share this view completely and that we are convinced that the United States Government will not give up its freedom of action as to the disposition of the coastal islands until Communist China has shown some signs of giving up its intentions to take Formosa by force.

5. Dulles was concerned that today's United Kingdom approach might indicate a United Kingdom desire to drop "operation oracle".<sup>84</sup> He was told that this was not the case but that the United Kingdom would prefer not to table a resolution now which might provoke a Soviet veto. Dulles agreed that a resolution should not be tabled immediately so long as this did not mean the abandonment of some effort through the United Nations to bring about a cease-fire in the straits. Dulles has not had time to give the matter his personal attention and will not have much free time in the next few days since he will be appearing before various committees of Congress to testify with respect to the mutual defence treaty with Nationalist China. Makins and Scott hope that action in the Security Council can be delayed for a week or two at least until the evacuation of the Tachens is completed or nearly completed. Incidentally, Scott is of the opinion that the Chinese Communists will be completely surprised by the evacuation of the Tachens. They are so accustomed to disbelieve anything the United States says that it will come to them as quite a shock that the United States is in fact carrying out its stated intentions.

6. We tend to agree with Scott's general conclusion that it is impossible for the United States to further clarify its intentions with respect to the coastal islands because neither the President nor Mr. Dulles knows for certain what United States action will be called for in the islands. United States moves will be made in reaction to Communist initiative in this matter. Makins and Scott are offering what we consider to be sound advice to the Foreign Office — that it should take the President's statement to Congress at its face value, i.e., that the United States forces will be used "in situations which are recognizable as parts of, or definite preliminaries to, an attack against the main positions of Formosa and the Pescadores."

7. Since the Minister will receive a more detailed account of Makins' interview with Dulles, we will leave it to your decision as to whether or not this message should be repeated to London.

provide an opportunity for a full exchange of views about many subjects of international importance. The talks, in fact, did range over a wide area, although the situation in the far east and problems of nuclear energy predominated.

With regard to Formosa, the Prime Minister of at least one Asian country, Pakistan, as well as those of the United Kingdom, Australia and New Zealand, were all anxious that the island be held as part of the defence chain in the Pacific, with the U.K. considering it essential for the defence of Malaya. Mr. Nehru, on the other hand, felt the United States should not be participating in Asian affairs to the extent that it was, and that, ultimately, it would have to alter its present policies. However, he did not cause any embarrassment during the talks and appeared to be just as anxious as anyone else to avoid incidents.

Sir Winston Churchill was convinced that the only effective deterrent to aggression at the present time was the superiority of the U.S. in thermo-nuclear weapons. At all costs, a split between the rest of the free world and the U.S. had to be prevented. Sir Anthony Eden had expressed the opinion that, if war did occur over the Chinese coastal islands, public opinion in the U.K. would not be allied with public opinion in the U.S. Sir Winston, however, was not so convinced. It had been difficult to be sure of the exact nature of the undertakings about these islands given by the U.S. to Chiang Kai-shek. It seemed, though, that if the islands were attacked by the Chinese Communists, the U.S. would come to the aid of the Nationalist forces on Quemoy and the Matsus.

He proposed to make a brief statement on the conference to the House of Commons that afternoon<sup>85</sup> and, among other things, reiterate the approach of the government to the Formosa problem, as announced by the Secretary of State for External Affairs on January 25th, 1955.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs said it now appeared that fairly clear assurances had been given Chiang Kai-shek that, if the coastal islands were attacked by the Chinese Communists, the U.S. would assist the Nationalist forces. There were really three issues of importance in this matter. The U.S. was implacably hostile to the Chinese Communist régime and, therefore, would try to destroy it. For this reason, they wished to keep the forces at the disposal of Chiang Kai-shek strong. Mr. Nehru felt that Asian public opinion would never understand this feeling because the revolution which had occurred was, in his opinion, more Chinese than Communist. The second point was the change of attitude towards Formosa. Two years ago, the island had not been regarded as essential to the defence of the U.S.; now it was considered vital for military and political purposes. Thirdly, the off-shore islands had assumed greater importance now than they had some months ago and were, at the moment, the main cause of anxiety. When the treaty of alliance between the U.S. and the Chinese Nationalists had been made, a guarantee had been given in respect of Formosa but no specific mention had been made of the coastal islands. The treaty had been regarded, initially, as defensive in nature and it was thought that through it Chiang Kai-shek would be stopped from using Formosa and the coastal islands as bases for attacks on the mainland. President Eisenhower's action in securing control of the situation himself rather than letting the matter be handled by Congress had also been reassuring. During the meetings the British government had attempted to secure a clarification of the U.S. position on the islands and an assurance that they would not be used as bases for attacks on the mainland. It had been thought that, if this could be obtained, Mr.

Nehru would be in a position to inform the authorities in Peking in the hope that the situation might be eased. However, the U.S. reply to these overtures was disturbing. In effect it said that American aid would be given to the Nationalists if Quemoy and the Matsus were attacked. This information also had been confirmed by a New Zealand approach to U.S. authorities.

Apart from Sir Winston, ministers in the U.K. felt there would be little public support in that country for a war over these islands. The Canadian Ambassador in Washington had informed the State Department that Canada would probably also find it difficult to support the Americans in any such hostilities. On the other hand, it should not be forgotten that the U.S. government was confronted with a good many difficulties in the present situation. They were endeavouring to hold the Nationalists back and, at the same time, not give the impression that Chiang Kai-shek was being abandoned, otherwise Nationalist morale would disintegrate. There was a large body of domestic opinion in the United States, which felt that much more vigorous action should be taken by the U.S. in support of the Nationalists.

The Russians seemed to be almost as worried about the situation as the British. Mr. Molotov felt sure the invitation to the Chinese Communists to attend meetings of the Security Council would not be accepted and this had turned out to be the case. The Commonwealth governments thought the matter should be kept out of the Security Council for the present, that no resolutions should be passed about it and that the council should not be used for action against the Chinese Communists. A conference on the Geneva model had been considered, and the U.S.S.R. had proposed a ten-power meeting but the U.S. could not accept because the Chinese Nationalists would have been excluded. This proposal had leaked to the press with unfortunate results. The Secretary-General of the United Nations had also been in touch with Chou En-Lai, who said he would be glad to have discussions with the U.S., but the latter felt it could hold no discussions relating to the interests of the Chinese Nationalists in the latter's absence, and Chou En-Lai had not contemplated the attendance of the Chinese Nationalists at any such meetings.

4. In the course of discussion the following points emerged:

(a) It was difficult to understand how the U.S. could agree to the evacuation of the Tachen Islands and, at the same time, insist upon the protection of Quemoy and the Matsus. Strategic and political reasons had been given to explain this anomalous situation. Strategically, the off-shore islands did not seem necessary for the defence of the U.S. and its outer chain of bases. There was some foundation, however, in the belief that, if support for the Nationalists was not to be continued there would be a collapse of morale, the effects of which might be felt in Japan, Korea, the Philippines and south east Asia. Perhaps the strongest motive for the U.S. administration's actions was to be found in domestic political considerations.

(b) Strong elements in the U.S. contended that the Nationalist government was still the government of the whole of China. Other powers friendly to the U.S. felt that Chou En-Lai's government would remain in power for some time to come and had endeavoured to impress this upon U.S. authorities. Eventually, both the governments in Peking and in Formosa might be recognized, and this might be a long-term solution acceptable to the U.S. In fact, public opinion there was moving in that direction in the present crisis. There had been less inflammatory talk and intemperate debate than during previous Chinese incidents.

(c) It was hoped that a full debate on these problems in the House of Commons could be avoided at this time. However, there would be a debate on foreign policy soon, when a motion to refer the external affairs estimates to the standing committee would be made. It could then be pointed out that irresponsible statements at this time would not be helpful in finding a solution to these difficult problems.

FORMOSA AND THE COASTAL ISLANDS

My immediately following telegram reports my discussion with Dulles in New York on February 16. As you will see from this report, it presents us with the possibility that if the Chinese Communists could refrain from attacking Quemoy and the Matsus for a few months at least the Americans would endeavour to withdraw the Nationalists from those islands and create thereby a position which, although it would not be accepted as satisfactory by either side, would make a de facto peace possible. Although it is obviously impossible for the United States to make a public statement to this effect it is clearly important that American intentions should be understood in Peking. I gained the definite impression that Dulles expected me to pass on his views in directions which might eventually lead to Peking and I indicated to him that I would be reporting our conversation to some of our friends.

2. Robertson discussed with Eden in London the possibility of the report being passed by him directly to the Chinese Chargé in London. Eden's view, however, was that there would perhaps be a better chance of a serious warning getting through to Peking if it passed from me to Nehru. The British were discouraged by their previous attempt to send a warning of American intentions through the Chinese Chargé in London which received a very hostile reception in Peking.

3. I am mindful in particular of the complications involved in an operation of this kind which you pointed out following our previous intervention on the subject of the American prisoners, and I do not wish to appear as an intermediary passing messages in this matter from Washington to Peking via India.<sup>86</sup> I think, however, that you might show my telegram No. 101 to Nehru telling him that I was anxious to report to him my conversation with Dulles. You might say to him further that I thought it important that there be no misunderstanding in Peking of American intentions. It was necessary for them to understand American long-range intentions but it was also urgently important that they understood the consequences of an attack on Quemoy or the Matsus. You might tell Nehru that I realize the danger that anything in the nature of a message to that effect passed from us to the Chinese Communists might well be interpreted by them as an attempt on our part to blackmail them on behalf of the Americans. If Nehru thinks, however, that it would do any good for him on his own initiative to report to Chou En-Lai what I have told him, he would not be betraying any confidence in doing so.

4. It is my conviction after my visit to New York that our best and possibly our only hope of avoiding hostilities is to persuade the Chinese Communists to restrain any attacks on the coastal islands and the Chinese Nationalists from using these islands for attacking the Communists. I realize that there may well be Nationalist provocation, but I believe that the American Administration is sincerely using its influence to hold back the Nationalists. I believe also that if hostilities can be avoided for a few months the Americans will use their best endeavours to clear up the anomalous position of the coastal islands and an atmosphere will be created in which we can hope for some progress towards a more permanent settlement. I have discussed this matter with the Prime Minister who knows that I am reporting to you in the above sense.

FORMOSA AND THE COASTAL ISLANDS

I have just returned from New York where I had a very important talk with Mr. Dulles during which he discussed Formosan and Far Eastern matters with great frankness and <sup>86</sup> En décembre 1954, Pearson et Saint-Laurent ont prié Nehru d'intervenir auprès du gouvernement de la République populaire de Chine en faveur de plusieurs aviateurs américains condamnés à de longues périodes d'emprisonnement pour cause d'espionnage. Le Canada s'est trouvé, par la suite, dans une situation délicate en raison de « the wide difference in interpretation in New Delhi and Washington of the facts concerning the imprisoned airmen. » Ottawa à Washington, télégramme N° Ex-2313 du 13 décembre 1954, MAE/621-PT-40.

In December 1954, Pearson and St. Laurent asked Nehru to intervene with the government of the People's Republic of China on behalf of several American airmen sentenced to lengthy terms in prison for espionage. Canada was subsequently caught in the middle by "the wide difference in interpretation in New Delhi and Washington of the facts concerning the imprisoned airmen." Ottawa to Washington, Telegram EX-2313, December 13, 1954, DEA/621-PT-40.

sincerity but without any appearance of tension or excitement. In the course of the conversation I explained to him very candidly the views expressed on these subjects at the Commonwealth Conference in London and left him in no doubt of the anxiety displayed by all members at the Conference over certain Formosan developments, particularly over the possibility of the United States intervening to assist the Chinese Nationalists if they should be attacked on Quemoy or the Matsus.

2. Mr. Dulles accepted these views without surprise and explained the difficulties of the United States Administration in familiar terms with particular reference, of course, to their commitments to the Chinese Nationalists. I told him that I appreciated his problems but felt nevertheless that the Americans would be wise to take the risk of liquidating their obligations of assistance to the Chinese Nationalists so far as the coastal islands were concerned. Dulles felt, however, that they had gone as far as possible in present circumstances by getting them off the Tachens. He reminded me that their treaty with Nationalist China gave them powers to ensure that the coastal islands were not used for any offensive action. Indeed they would prevent the transmission of military material from Formosa to the islands for this purpose. He told me quite frankly that he would be delighted if these coastal islands could disappear and he hoped to persuade the Chinese in due course to withdraw from them by convincing them that the Nationalist Government had no future except on Formosa; that there was no possibility of their getting back on the mainland by force but that they had real opportunity to build up a strong and stable free government on Formosa. He told me that he had been working hard to convince George Yeh of this, telling him frankly that the Chinese Nationalists had no other future. That was the United States policy but it would take time and patience to work it out and their friends should understand their difficulties in this regard. Meanwhile however, he said, if the Chinese Communists attack the islands and if the Nationalists need help, the American Government would give it. If the Chinese Communists really wanted peace and he was not sure of this, why could they not refrain from any military action against the islands even if they had to maintain, as they would, their view that not only the islands but Formosa itself must eventually become part of China.

3. I then said that the situation seemed to boil down to this: we had American assurance that they would work for Nationalist China's withdrawal from the islands but that while this was in progress they would if necessary help the Chinese if they were attacked and asked for help. Meanwhile (he said he could give a 99% guarantee on this) they would prevent Chiang Kai-shek from using them for any offensive purpose. Therefore in the knowledge of this defensive policy, which is also one of ultimate withdrawal, those who had contact with the Chinese Communists should persuade them to take no military action against the islands. We would then have a de facto cease-fire and at least a chance of working out later some satisfactory solution.

4. Dulles agreed that this was the situation and hoped that Peking could be persuaded to act accordingly.

Ottawa, February 21, 1955

Dear Mr. Heeney,

Current developments in the coastal islands of China and what we have learned about U.S. intentions in the event that these should be attacked by Communist Chinese forces, have prompted the examination of the possible consequences for Canada if the United States Government were to become involved in hostilities with Communist China. A departmental paper has been prepared, in which some of these possibilities are analyzed. A preliminary discussion between Mr. Pearson and Mr. Campney took place on the basis of this paper on February 18. A copy of the departmental paper and notes on the discussions are attached. These notes have not been seen by the Ministers and have not been agreed with the Department of National Defence.

2. In view of the stated government position, which as you know was made clear to Mr. Dulles by the Minister in their meeting on February 16, that if hostilities were to develop over the coastal islands, the United States Government would likely have to act alone, the consequences for Canada have been examined in the limited context of certain precautionary measures which the United States Government may wish to take in the field of continental defence.

3. We recognize, of course, that the possible consequences, particularly of a political nature, may be wider than that. It may well be, for instance, that one of the principal considerations in the minds of the Communist leaders in pressing the issue of Formosa and the coastal islands at this time, is the desire to isolate the United States from her principal allies. This will obviously have repercussions upon NATO which are not being overlooked, but which are not considered in the present paper.

4. The desirability of taking every opportunity of impressing our American friends with the possible consequences upon their allies of any trouble they may get into over the coastal islands, was one of the main reasons why the Minister thought that the possibility of holding another meeting of consultation in the near future should be explored. Following telephone conversations between you and Mr. Léger and myself, the Minister has reconsidered the question of a meeting, and has decided that we should not ask for one at the present time.

5. It would be useful to us to have your comments on the enclosures to this letter.<sup>87</sup>

Yours sincerely,

R.A. MACKAY

PROBLEMS WHICH MIGHT BE POSED FOR CANADA, IF THE UNITED STATES WERE TO BECOME INVOLVED IN HOSTILITIES OVER THE CHINESE OFFSHORE ISLANDS

I. Background

Information has been received that there is a considerable concentration of Chinese Communist forces opposite the Matsu Islands, including a substantial number of planes and a large fleet of junks. There is a consequent possibility of United States air and naval forces in the area becoming involved in hostilities in support of Chinese Nationalist forces. Under the Congressional resolution, the President may employ United States armed forces not only to defend Formosa and the Pescadores, but also "such related positions and territories" as he judges to be necessary for that purpose. These include the offshore islands. From what is known about United States intentions, it seems likely that the United States military authorities would ignore harassing air raids and shelling against the islands. If the Chinese Communists attacked the islands, and if the Chinese Nationalists requested help,<sup>88</sup> the United States Government is expected to give it. It is understood that a formal National Security Council decision has been taken to that effect.<sup>89</sup> Because of the geographical proximity of these coastal islands to the mainland, there is a risk that action taken by United States forces in support of the Nationalists for the defence of the islands might extend hostilities to the mainland. This paper is intended as an analysis of the type of problems which might be posed for the Canadian Government in the event that the United States were to become involved in hostilities over the offshore islands and is not intended as an appreciation of the current situation or anticipated developments.

II. Possible Extent of Involvement of the United States in Military Action

Warlike activities arising from possible attacks by the Communist Chinese forces against the Matsu Islands<sup>90</sup> might lead to the following contingencies:

(a) local armed encounters limited to the Matsu Islands and involving the use of local United States forces only, acting in support of Chinese Nationalist forces to repel attempt at landing;

(b) extension of the armed encounters to the mainland, involving counter-action by local United States forces against concentrations of Chinese Communist ground, naval and air forces and supplies or "hot-pursuit" of Communist aircraft;

(c) general war between the United States and China.

(Because of the geographical location of these islands, contingencies 1 and 2 might tend to merge.)

III. Possible Consequent Approaches to the Canadian Government from the United States Government

Although the Sino-Soviet Treaty specifically provides for Soviet intervention only in the event of attack by Japan or an ally of Japan, it must be assumed that the possibility of Soviet support in the form of military intervention cannot be ruled out by the United States Government in their evaluation of the risks. This consideration presumably accounts for the caution with which the United States military authorities are conducting their activities in relation to the Chinese offshore islands. No precise information is available on Soviet intentions. The Malenkov administration was thought to be exercising a restraining influence on the Chinese Communists. The new Soviet Premier Bulganin, in a statement in Moscow on February 15, made at a reception marking the fifth anniversary of the Sino-Soviet Treaty of Alliance, said: "China knows it can look to us not only for sympathy but for help. This help will be forthcoming whenever necessary."

Possible United States approaches to the Canadian Government, therefore, will probably be based on the assumption that if the United States forces were to become involved in hostilities against the Chinese Communist forces, there would be at least a risk of Soviet military intervention. It must be assumed, therefore, that in addition to deployments of United States forces in support of any military action that may be undertaken against Chinese Communist forces in the area, the United States Government may take certain precautionary measures against the possibility of Soviet intervention.

The nature of the possible approaches which might be expected from the United States Government in relation to each of the contingencies set out under II above include the following:

Contingency 1 (fighting limited to the offshore islands):

(a) request for overflight of Canadian territory for precautionary deployments of SAC aircraft and nuclear weapons to bases in Alaska;

(b) precautionary alert of continental air defence.

Contingency 2 (extension of fighting to the mainland):

(a) a full alert of continental air defence;

(b) precautionary deployment of SAC aircraft and weapons to Goose Bay.

Contingency 3 (general war between the United States and China):

Request for co-operation in full mobilization measures of continental air defence and probable request for activation of base facilities, in addition to possible requests for overflights preparatory to making air strikes.

IV. Canadian Attitude

The Prime Minister defined the Canadian attitude in a statement in the House of Commons on February 14, when he said: "I should also like once more to emphasize this; Canada has no commitments regarding collective security in the Far East, and indeed no commitments of any kind in respect of the Formosa area except those which arise out of our membership in the United Nations." This statement confirmed the Government's attitude as first given by the Secretary of State for External Affairs in the House of Commons on January 25, when he said: "Although we are not involved in United States commitments in this area, we are of course deeply concerned over the dangerous situation existing there and we, with other free governments, are anxious that steps should be taken to bring to an end the fighting which has now been taking place for sometime along the China coast."

In the absence of any United Nations decision authorizing the United States to take military action in the defence of the offshore islands, and in the absence of any relevant treaty or collective security commitments binding Canada as indicated in these Government statements, it remains to examine to what extent, if any, Canadian interests or any principle are involved in determining what the reaction should be to the possible United States approaches outlined above.

It is difficult to identify any precise Canadian interests in the denial of the coastal islands to the Chinese Communists. The considerations governing United States interests in the islands appear to be political rather than strategic. The islands may have some tactical value as a site for early warning of attack from the mainland against Formosa and vice versa and for preventing Chinese Communist shipping from using the Formosa Strait. The military importance of the islands, however, is overshadowed by political considerations such as the possible effect of their loss on the morale of the Nationalists and upon United States prestige in the cold war.<sup>91</sup>

If the question of principle is taken as a determining factor, the main consideration which would seem to arise is the "inherent right of individual and collective self defence if an armed attack occurs against a member of the United Nations" (Article 51 of the United Nations Charter). If the risk of general war between the United States and Communist China were assumed to involve the risk of Soviet retaliation against the United States with nuclear weapons, the concept of collective self defence would presumably include the protection of United States nuclear retaliatory power as well as other measures of continental air defence. Thus, especially if there were any question of nuclear weapons being used in the event that the United States were to become involved in hostilities against Communist China, it would be difficult to distinguish between requests made by the United States Government to the Canadian Government which were related strictly to the hostilities with China, as distinct from precautionary measures which would have to be taken in anticipation of Soviet intervention.

The evidence available on the intentions of the United States Government, does not indicate the likelihood of the President authorizing the use of nuclear weapons in hostilities against Communist China. The President is on record with a number of statements showing his abhorrence of nuclear warfare, such as: "War would present us with only the alternatives in degrees of destruction, and there could be no successful outcome." The President, moreover, cannot be unmindful of the deplorable effect that the use of nuclear weapons against Communist China would have on Asian opinion. Nonetheless, the advantages that could be gained by striking the first blow in nuclear warfare are such that if the United States Government were to apprehend the possibility of Soviet intervention, they would almost certainly take certain precautionary measures to prepare their defences including their retaliatory atomic potential.

This possibility would pose the most serious problem to the Canadian Government, in that precautionary measures of the types envisaged might lead to a chain reaction of events which would tend to precipitate general war,<sup>92</sup> if the Soviet Union were to interpret such precautionary moves as indicating a risk of imminent attack. It is imperative, therefore,<sup>93</sup>

? Comment [A.D.P. Heeney]

? Secrecy? [A.D.P. Heeney]

SAC [illegible] now? [A.D.P. Heeney]

that in the event that the United States were to become involved in hostilities against Communist China, every effort be made to limit such hostilities and to bring them to an end without precipitating general war. For this reason all precautionary measures of continental air defence would have to be taken in such a way as not to provoke Soviet reactions and to avoid as far as possible drawing public attention to them.<sup>94</sup>

V. Conclusions

It would be premature to recommend any specific course of action in relation to the conjectural possibilities outlined above. As a basis for further consideration only and taking into account the arguments set out above, one possible course of action might be:

- (a) Accede to a request for the precautionary alerting of continental air defence;
- (b) accede to a request for overflights of Canadian territory for the limited purpose of precautionary deployments of SAC aircraft and weapons to Alaska and Goose Bay;
- (c) refuse overflights of Canadian territory, or the use of Canadian bases for the purpose of carrying out air strikes, and participation in any full mobilization measures for continental air defence, in the absence of a prior determination by the Canadian Government that general war is imminent.

Present

General Foulkes, Mr. Léger, Dr. MacKay and Mr. Ignatieff.

The Ministers had as a basis for the discussion an External Affairs draft dated February 17, 1955, a copy of which is attached. These notes include comments on the various parts of the Departmental paper and the conclusions reached.

Background

Mr. Pearson said that Mr. Dulles in his talk with him on February 16 had confirmed the information about the concentration of Chinese Communist forces opposite the Matsu Islands. He had also given him the information about a formal decision of the National Security Council having been taken that, if the Chinese Communists attacked the coastal islands, and if the Chinese Nationalists requested help, the United States Government would give it. Mr. Pearson added that it was his understanding that as of that time this information had not been given to any other government.<sup>95</sup>

Yes [A.D.P. Heeney]

? [A.D.P. Heeney]

General Foulkes confirmed the information about the concentration of Chinese Communist forces from military sources in Washington. Weather conditions at the present time were favourable for an attack on the offshore islands, with visibility poor. There was some indication also that the Communist Chinese had been preparing for such an attack in addition to the evidence of concentrations. For instance, call signs had recently been changed and some I.L. 28 bombers had apparently been obtained from the Soviet Union. The 7th United States fleet, which was the only element of the United States forces immediately available to give support to the Chinese Nationalists, was in a difficult position to carry out this task without available ground forces. They would presumably have to limit their intervention to supporting Chinese Nationalist forces by shelling, bombing and strafing. It could not, therefore, be assumed that the 7th fleet would be able to ensure the denial of the offshore islands with immediately available forces at this time of year. Mr. Pearson said that he had emphasized to Mr. Dulles that if the United States became involved in hostilities over the Chinese offshore islands, they would have to act without Canadian support; indeed they would likely have to act alone. If they were to intervene it would seem essential at least that such intervention would be justified from the United States point of view by an expectation that it would be successful; otherwise, the consequences on United States opinion as well as Nationalist morale would be serious.

Possible Extent of Involvement of the United States in Military Action

Mr. Léger asked whether the likelihood of hostilities being extended to the mainland was as great as indicated in the paper. Mr. Pearson said that if United States intervention was limited in the first instance to air and naval support, it was probable that armed encounters would extend to the mainland especially in the form of hot pursuit by United States aircraft.

Possible Consequent Approaches to the Canadian Government from the United States Government

With reference to the applicability of a Sino-Soviet treaty of alliance on the possibility of Soviet intervention in the event that hostilities developed between the United States and Communist China, Mr. Pearson observed that the Chinese might claim Soviet support under the treaty on the grounds that the United States is an ally of Japan under the bilateral security agreement. It was difficult to say, however, what would be the reaction of the new administration in the Soviet Union.

Canadian Attitude

Mr. Pearson confirmed that judging from what Mr. Dulles had said to him, political rather than strategic considerations governed United States interests in the coastal islands. Mr. Dulles had particularly stressed the possible effect of the loss of these islands on the morale of the Nationalists.

On the possibility of the United States using nuclear weapons in the event that they were engaged in hostilities against Communist China, Mr. Pearson asked whether the United States might not use tactical weapons, if the U.S. military authorities on the spot had them available. General Foulkes said that it was quite probable that tactical weapons were available to the 7th fleet.

Precautionary Alert of Continental Air Defence

Mr. Campney stressed that any precautionary measures would have to be taken in such a way, if possible, so as not to provoke Soviet reactions. General Foulkes outlined some of the difficulties of instituting even precautionary alert measures without some public attention being drawn to them. Present staffing of the early warning system was incomplete and he would have to ask the Chief of the Air Staff whether a precautionary alert could be instituted without calling up reserves. It would be difficult to call up reserves without drawing public attention to the alert measures. Consideration might be given to instituting exercises as a cover plan for such precautionary alert measures. It would also be necessary to restrict civil air traffic. Goose Bay might present a special problem since under conditions of alert it would have to revert to being a military airport. The United States might also wish to station extra interception squadrons there for its protection. Again it might be possible to do something in relation to Goose Bay under cover of an exercise. General Foulkes said it was desirable to review the possible effect on Canada of precautionary alert measures (in continental defence) which may be desired by the U.S.

Precautionary Deployments

If the United States wish to make precautionary deployments to Alaska and requested the right of overflight of Canadian territory, Edmonton would lie on the probable route. To avoid drawing public attention to such precautionary deployments, it might be necessary to persuade the United States to avoid Edmonton and make overflights on other routes. If it was envisaged that refusal would be given to the use of Goose Bay as an air base from which air strikes could be made in the event that the United States were at war and Canada was not at war, there would seem to be grounds for denying the right to make precautionary deployments of SAC aircraft and weapons to Goose Bay. It would make more sense from the United States point of view if all such precautionary deployments were directed to Alaska. General Foulkes said that it was obviously desirable to review existing procedures covering the authorization of United States aircraft.

The Effects of United States Precautionary Measures on Countries Other than Canada

Mr. Pearson said that the discussion had indicated that despite the fact which he had emphasized to Mr. Dulles that the United States would likely have to act alone if hostilities developed over the offshore islands, the consequences of such trouble would seem to inevitably involve other countries. He asked what effect precautionary measures might have on the United Kingdom. General Foulkes said that problems would not arise in the same way in the United Kingdom, as they would not be involved in continental air defence precautionary alerts and the United States airfield bases in the United Kingdom were for use in support of SACEUR under NATO. Mr. Léger said that if the United States were to become involved in hostilities with Communist China the consequences could not be localized. If Canada were to be affected by precautionary measures of the type suggested, why should not other NATO allies? Mr. Pearson suggested that this was particularly relevant to an appreciation of the imminence of war and asked what the relation of these precautionary alerts might be to the question of the United Kingdom proposals for alerts and NATO alerts.* General Foulkes said that the question of the relation of the United Kingdom alert proposals and the NATO alert system was currently under consideration. Mr. Pearson asked whether consideration should not be given to having another of the series of meetings of consultation in Washington on the risks of war. General Foulkes said that this might give him an opportunity of talking frankly with Admiral Radford about the whole question of precautionary measures. Mr. Léger said that he would consult Mr. Heeney about the desirability of holding such a meeting in the immediate future. It was recognized that there was a justification for further consultation with the United States authorities not only because of the risk of the United States becoming involved in hostilities, but also because Canada would be faced with a totally new situation in those circumstances. The * Voir/See Document 168.

United States would be at war and Canada not at war, and a whole set of new problems would evidently arise in connection with United States precautionary moves, especially against the possibility of Soviet intervention.

Conclusions

(1) It was agreed that notes on the discussion should be prepared, to be attached to the External Affairs paper;

(2) that this record and the Departmental paper should be sent to the Canadian Ambassador in Washington for his information and comments;

(3) that Mr. Léger would explore with Mr. Heeney the advisability of holding another meeting of consultation in Washington;

(4) that General Foulkes would explore the possible effect of United States precautionary alert measures on Canada; and

(5) that a review should be made of existing arrangements for authorizing United States flights.

TELEGRAM 108

New Delhi, February 22, 1955

SECRET. IMMEDIATE.

Reference: Your telegrams No. 100 and 101 of February 19.

FORMOSA AND THE COASTAL ISLANDS

Your telegrams arrived February 21 when I was in Kanpur for the inauguration of the Canadian Cultural week. On my return this afternoon, February 22, I saw the Secretary-General at six and the Prime Minister at seven at his residence, each for about twenty-five minutes.

2. I gave Nehru and Pillai orally your views as set forth in paragraphs 3 and 4 of telegram No. 100 omitting, of course, the first sentence of paragraph 3, and I gave them the text of telegram No. 101. I emphasized you were not making any request of Nehru but that he would not be betraying any confidence if he passed on to Peking your report of your conversation with Dulles.

3. On first reading your telegram Nehru said that in a sense it contained nothing new about Dulles' views since in his public statements Dulles had already said by inference that the United States wanted the Chinese Nationalists to withdraw from the coastal islands. He was sure the Peking Chinese knew that if they attacked the coastal islands the United States would, if necessary, assist the Nationalist régime to resist. Indeed, he thought the Peking régime believed that the Americans wanted an excuse for launching attacks on the mainland not, of course, by landing large numbers of men. I suggested it was important they should be disabused of this idea. Nehru said that he believes that the Americans are afraid of the Nationalist régime collapsing because of the lack of support for it in Formosa and he analyzed, in terms which are no doubt familiar to you, the internal opposition in Formosa to the régime. I said I assumed that if the Americans did believe this, this would be the reason they did not feel they could push the Nationalist régime too fast in getting out of the coastal islands.

4. Nehru said that one main difficulty in finding a way out of the present situation is that there are no signs of any progress being made toward a more permanent settlement. India had suggested that the Security Council might ask the Soviet Union, the United Kingdom and India to explore what might be done to reach a more permanent settlement, possibly by the holding of a conference. No one had turned this suggestion down but it had not yet been taken up. I assume that what Nehru meant was that it would be easier to persuade the Peking régime to take no military action against the coastal islands if Peking had something more definite to go on than the assurance contained in your telegram that this would result in a de facto cease-fire which would provide a chance of working out some satisfactory solution. The something more definite might, for example, be concurrence in India's suggestion about Security Council action.

5. Nehru was very agreeable and relaxed but made no commitment as to what he might do.

6. Pillai picked up your phrase that the Chinese Nationalists should be persuaded to refrain from using the coastal islands "for attacking the Communists" and that there might be "Nationalist provocation". He said it was not enough for the United States to persuade the Chinese Nationalists from using the coastal islands for attacking the Communists. The United States must persuade the Chinese Nationalists not to use Formosa as well as the islands for attacking the Communists. They must also insist that the Chinese Nationalists stop the petty incursions by air over mainland territory which do them no good but merely provoke the Chinese Communists. It is not possible for the Chinese Communists to distinguish between those attacks or petty incursions which originate in the islands and those which originate in Formosa. Chou En-Lai had mentioned the incursions to Nehru on his visit to China. (You will recall that the Chinese Communists alleged that the reason they had to divert Nehru's plane inland was to keep out of the way of Chinese Nationalist aircraft operating along the coast.) It was one thing, Pillai said, for the United States to say it could not immediately get the Chinese Nationalists out of the coastal islands. They should, however, be able to stop the Chinese Nationalists from using either the islands or Formosa for raids on the mainland. The United States must stop the Nationalists from being provocative. He concluded by saying that certainly India would have a better chance of persuading the Chinese Communists to refrain from attacking the coastal islands if India could tell the Peking régime that the Chinese Nationalists had now stopped both offensive operations and petty incursions. One type of petty incursion he mentioned was pamphlet dropping or dropping of agents.

7. After Nehru and Pillai have had a chance to think over your message I expect I will be receiving some more comments from them.

FORMOSA AND THE COASTAL ISLANDS

The Acting United Kingdom High Commissioner gave me today orally a brief summary of the telegrams he has received recently. It seems to me that the line that Dulles took with Eden on February 24 is not consistent with the line which he took with you on February 16. On February 16 he was in essence promising ultimate Nationalist withdrawal from the coastal islands if the Communists would take no military action against the islands. On February 24 he was, I understand, adding to these demands that the Communists should renounce the use of force as a method of acquiring Formosa. Moreover, the remarks of the Admiral who was with Dulles cast doubts on the willingness of the United States to take effective measures to secure the withdrawal of the Nationalists [sic] forces from the islands.

2. My impression is that Nehru took no action as a result of my call on him on February 22. This is perhaps fortunate since the receipt by Peking of two not wholly consistent versions of United States policy, one from you and one from Eden, could have deepened their suspicions of the United States. Moreover, Nehru's usefulness as a go-between might have been diminished.

3. As, Eden seems to think, there is danger that atomic warfare may break out in the Far East, it is clearly essential that the Chinese Communists do not receive conflicting or confusing accounts of United States policy. Has not the time come for an unambiguous message from President Eisenhower to Mao Tse Tung transmitted either through Nehru or Hammarskjöld?

4. I suggest that any message from Eisenhower to Nehru should be transmitted either through the United States Chargé d'Affaires here or the Indian Ambassador in Washington and not through a third country.

5. If Nehru is to be asked to transmit such a message, there would be advantages if he received it before Eden leaves here early on March 4.

PROVISIONAL INTERNATIONAL RÉGIME FOR THE FORMOSA STRAIT

Enclosed is a copy of a Departmental Memorandum dated February 25, which outlines a suggestion for a "Provisional International Régime for the Formosa Strait".

2. Some preliminary thoughts on this subject were outlined in a telegram which was sent to the Minister during the meeting of Commonwealth Prime Ministers. He mentioned the suggestion informally to some of those there. Later, the suggestion was further developed. When in New York on February 15 and 16, Mr. Pearson outlined the suggestion orally and informally to Sir Pierson Dixon, the United Kingdom Permanent Representative, and Sir Leslie Munro of New Zealand. Following this discussion, the Minister said that he thought that it might be useful to have this tentative proposal examined further by some of our friends to see whether it might contain a suggestion as to a way of approaching a provisional agreement that would deal with the immediate problem of stopping armed hostilities in the area. Accordingly, copies of this Departmental Memorandum were conveyed to the United Kingdom, Australian and New Zealand authorities in Ottawa, London, Washington and New York on a confidential and informal basis with a request for their comments. It was explained that this should not be regarded as a formal Canadian proposal but rather as an idea for the pot.

3. The proposal as presently outlined makes no mention of the United Nations because of the Chinese Communist rejection of the Security Council's invitation. If the proposal should prove acceptable to the Chinese Communists consideration could be given to a possible Security Council resolution asking the three proposed Commission powers to use their good offices, or even to rewording the joint declaration as a Security Council resolution.

4. The proposal also does not attempt to deal with the longer-range problem of the Chinese civil war, the future of Formosa and ways of relaxing tension in the Far East. If this proposal is tried on the Chinese Communists they may wish to tie arrangements to grapple with some of the long-range problems to acceptance of the provisional régime. It would be necessary to be prepared to take a position on any such proposal.

5. For the time being we are not proposing to enlarge the group of those discussing this suggestion, however, we wished you to be in possession of a copy of the Memorandum in case it is taken up. Naturally, we would welcome any comments or suggestions which you would care to make.

Memorandum

[Ottawa], February 25, 1955

PROVISIONAL INTERNATIONAL RÉGIME FOR THE FORMOSA STRAIT

Current exploratory diplomatic discussions regarding the threat of hostilities in the Formosa Strait are directed toward (a) securing some sort of tacit understanding between the possible belligerents that they will refrain for the time being at least from attacking each other; and (b) considering a possible international conference where more permanent solutions could be discussed. But an unwritten truce is an uneasy truce. It is desirable, therefore, to explore every hopeful path that might lead to something more secure in the way of a written agreement. It will be difficult to overcome the reluctance of the Chinese Nationalist and Chinese Communist Governments to sitting down together at a conference and to putting their signatures side by side to a single agreement. This paper, therefore, suggests the device of employing a joint declaration in which three proposed international commission powers offer their services to supervise a provisional international régime for the Formosa Strait. The régime would come into force when a named list of governments had deposited instruments of acceptance with one of the three proposed commission powers.

2. Attached to this memorandum is a Draft Joint Declaration Regarding a Provisional International Régime for the Formosa Strait which provides for:

- (a) peaceful evacuation of the coastal islands;
- (b) neutralization of the Formosa Strait for a period of two years under the supervision of an International Commission.

3. The purposes of the proposed declaration can only be achieved without the threat or use of force if the Chinese Communists are offered some inducements to accept it. It is desirable to endeavour to convince the Chinese Communists that certain tangible advantages would accrue to them from accepting a written "agreement" of this kind that they cannot have if they only accept a tacit understanding. The proposed declaration has been drawn so as to offer them the following inducements:

- (a) it enables them to take over control of the coastal islands with civilian facilities intact;
- (b) it leaves their coastwise shipping free from attack by the Nationalist Navy and permits them free use of the ports of Amoy and Foochow;
- (c) it eliminates Nationalist raids on the mainland and eliminates air dropping of agents on the mainland;
- (d) it gives assurance that no action prejudicial to the general Chinese claim to sovereignty over Formosa and the Pescadores will be taken during the life of the instrument, i.e. no new special international legal status for Formosa.

4. The proposed declaration might be considered in principle by the Americans for possible application at the time they think that the Nationalists should be persuaded to withdraw from the coastal islands. This would leave for negotiation the question of when the régime might be brought into force. In this context the proposed declaration might have some appeal to the United States Government since:

- (a) it would internationalize responsibility for getting the Nationalist forces out of the coastal islands;

(b) it would internationalize responsibility for guaranteeing Formosa against attack for 2 years and yet would not interfere with the United States security treaty with the Nationalist Government.

5. The proposed declaration would fall short of meeting the wishes of the Chinese Nationalists, but would correspond to the actual situation in which they may expect to find themselves in a few months' time when the Americans decide to try to persuade them to evacuate the coastal islands and it would have certain practical advantages for them then:

(a) it permits peaceful evacuation of forces from the coastal islands under face-saving international arrangements;

(b) it guarantees Formosa and the Pescadores from attack from the mainland for 2 years;

(c) it respects the general Chinese claim to sovereignty over Formosa and the Pescadores.

6. This proposal hangs on its acceptability to the Chinese Communists and the United States and Chinese Nationalists. Some of the arguments that might be used in putting the proposal to these interested parties are outlined above. The technique envisaged of having an offer made by third parties conditional on acceptance by the interested parties may have some interesting possibilities. The substantive articles could be modified by diplomatic negotiation. If a proposal of this kind could be put forward to the Chinese Communists through the Indians or to the Russians through the United Kingdom it might help to keep the door of negotiation open and might also serve to smoke out whether the Chinese Communists would be prepared to accept any sort of written "agreement".

DRAFT JOINT DECLARATION REGARDING A PROVISIONAL INTERNATIONAL RÉGIME FOR THE FORMOSA STRAIT

1. The Governments of India, New Zealand and the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland,

Conscious that the occurrence of armed hostilities in the Formosa Strait constitutes a situation, the continuation of which is likely to endanger the maintenance of international peace and security;

Desiring the termination of these armed hostilities;

Desiring to promote a relaxation of international tension in the Far East so that the solution of the problems of the area may be approached in a more peaceful atmosphere;

Agree to establish an International Commission for the Formosa Strait to supervise a provisional international régime for the Formosa Strait as set forth in this instrument.

2. All armed hostilities in the area of the Formosa Strait shall cease from noon local time two days after the coming into effect of this instrument.

3.(a) Within 90 days of the coming into effect of this instrument the Government of the Republic of China shall withdraw all its armed forces from all the coastal islands.

(b) Within 105 days of the coming into effect of this instrument the Government of the Republic of China shall transfer administrative control over these islands to the International Commission.

(c) Within 120 days of the coming into effect of this instrument the International Commission shall transfer administrative control over these islands to the Government of the People's Republic of China.

(d) During phase (a) and (b) fortifications may be destroyed only with the approval of the International Commission. All public property and buildings, utilities, private residences and other facilities of a peaceful nature shall be preserved.

4. A neutral strip 20 nautical miles wide under the supervision of the International Commission shall be established down the centre of the Formosa Strait, as outlined in Annex A.† Governments signing or accepting this instrument undertake for a period of two years from the coming into effect of this instrument not to permit any war vessels or military aircraft under their control to infringe the waters or airspace of the neutral strip.

5. Unarmed vessels or aircraft may pass through the Formosa Strait without hindrance provided that if they enter the neutral strip (a) they shall submit when requested to inspection by the patrol vessels or aircraft designated by the International Commission to carry out its supervisory functions; and (b) they shall not engage in any activities considered by the International Commission to be inimical to the maintenance of this agreement.

6. For the duration of the present provisional régime the Governments signing or accepting this instrument undertake not to enter into any agreement or take any action which would be prejudicial to the Chinese claims to sovereignty over Formosa and the Pescadores, or involve recognition of any change in the international status of these territories.

7. This instrument will come into force when instruments of acceptance are deposited with one of the proposed Commission Governments by the Governments of the People's Republic of China, the Republic of China, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics and the United States of America. In order to ensure respect for this provisional régime the proposed Commission Governments invite other interested Governments to accept this instrument also.

FORMOSA AND THE COASTAL ISLANDS

1. I had a talk this morning, March 2, with R.K. Nehru, the Foreign Secretary. He said the most important development of the last week or so was that the Peking Government had made it clear (I assume to India) that they were incensed over the way in which the evacuation of the Taichen had proceeded. According to Peking the Nationalists had destroyed everything and had taken away the whole population. On the basis of what Peking had said the Foreign Secretary thought it was doubtful that Peking could stand idly by if the Nationalists attempted to do the same thing when evacuating Quemoy and Matsu.

2. A second development which had aroused feeling in Peking was the holding of the Bangkok conference.<sup>97</sup> It was obvious to Peking that the conference was directed against them and it was possible it might appeal to the co-chairman of the Geneva conference on the ground that the activities of SEADO constituted a violation of the Indo-Chinese settlement. The timing of the Bangkok conference was certainly unfortunate.

3. The Foreign Secretary was not surprised by the statement made by Prime Minister U Nu of Burma that the Peking Government wanted direct negotiations with the United States. The Foreign Secretary said the Chinese Communists "had always wanted this". I assume that Peking has told the Indians of the message they gave Hammarskjöld on this. The Foreign Secretary explained that Peking considers Chiang as merely an agent of the Americans and wishes to negotiate with the principal, not the agent.

4. The Foreign Secretary contended with me, as he did a few days ago with the Acting United Kingdom High Commissioner, that for Commonwealth countries to support what appears to be the present United States line on the coastal islands is to retreat from the position they unanimously took in London. He quoted to me from the minutes of, I think, the last meeting when there was a discussion on Formosa.<sup>98</sup> These minutes, he said, made it clear that the Prime Ministers were agreed that the evacuation of Quemoy and Matsu should take place as soon as possible and that the only quid pro quo that should be sought from Peking was that it should not interfere with the evacuation. Now the Americans were demanding that as a condition precedent to the evacuation of the islands, Peking should make a public declaration that it renounced the use of force in its efforts to liberate Formosa.

5. He said the reason the Americans wanted this public declaration was to help to save Chiang's face since they feared that unless his face was saved his régime would collapse. I said I could not see how the declaration would do much to save Chiang's face.

6. I took advantage of this opening to try to draw him out on the Indian analysis of the internal opposition in Formosa. The impression he gave me was that the Indians have no independent source of information about Formosa and that their analysis is based mainly on recent articles in the American press by Lipman, Alsop and others and perhaps by statements made to the Indians by Peking that it is certain that in course of time the régime in Formosa will collapse. The Foreign Secretary said that the Chinese army in Formosa wanted to go back to the mainland and once it was clear they could not go back to the mainland as an invading army the members would want to go back by making their peace with Peking.

7. The Foreign Secretary believes that Peking will never agree to the two-nation theory of two Chinas, but that it will continue to insist that Formosa is part of China and that by doing this it will make more likely the collapse of the Formosan régime.

8. The Foreign Secretary said that he was in the midst of preparing a note for the Prime Minister for his talks with Eden who arrives this afternoon. He went on to say that one point he was mentioning was the failure to go ahead with a Locarno type agreement on South East Asia. It may therefore be that Prime Minister Nehru will bring this matter up with Eden reminding him that India had indicated its willingness to enter into such an agreement, that India had taken soundings of Peking who also seemed willing and presumably concluding that if this kind of agreement had been entered into and not the Manila treaty the international situation in this part of the world would be much better.

The Bangkok Conference of February 23-25 was the first meeting of the SEADO powers. The Formosa situation was among the issues discussed.

9. While I am by no means certain about this, my impression of the line which Prime Minister Nehru may take with Eden is

(1) The British and the other friends of the United States should stick to the position taken by the Commonwealth countries in London that the first step towards the settlement of Far Eastern questions is the evacuation of the coastal islands after private assurances have been received from Peking that it will not harass the withdrawal and that this evacuation should take place very quickly.

(2) If, as stated by Peking, the evacuation of the other islands was accompanied by scorching the earth and withdrawing all the inhabitants, Peking has a right to protest and a right to be assured that this will not take place during the evacuation of Quemoy and Matsu.

(3) It is irresponsible of the United States to run the risk of war with the Chinese over the coastal islands even though their evacuation may so weaken Chiang's régime that it may collapse and be succeeded by a régime which is willing to come to terms with the mainland and join it.

PROVISIONAL INTERNATIONAL RÉGIME FOR THE FORMOSA STRAIT

The Minister is considering referring to this suggestion in his review of External Affairs to Parliament Thursday afternoon, March 3, in the following terms: Begins:

QUOTE. In regard to this immediate problem of an assured ceasefire, I wonder if we might gain general acceptance for a provisional arrangement whereby an international commission might supervise a ceasefire providing for the evacuation of Nationalist troops from the coastal islands in a fixed period of time and then supervise the neutralisation of the Formosa Strait. For this purpose a twenty-mile wide strip of the high seas down the centre of the Formosa Strait might be charted. The governments in that area might be asked to undertake for a period of say two years not to permit any war vessels or military aircraft under their control to infringe the waters or airspace of the neutral strip.

A provisional régime of this kind would depend on its acceptability to all the principally interested governments. It would have advantages and disadvantages for each. But if something of this kind was accepted it would help to create the appropriate atmosphere for the negotiation of the longer-range problems of the Far East that also require resolution if we are to secure the peace. UNQUOTE. Ends.

2. I would be grateful if, as a matter of urgency you would tell the State Department that he has this thought in mind and let them have the proposed text. At that time you should also give copies of our Memorandum of February 25 to the State Department. We would be grateful to have their comments as soon as possible.

Washington, March 3, 1955

CONFIDENTIAL. IMPORTANT.

Reference: Your telegram EX-398 of March 2.

This message will record my telephone conversations with you and the Under-Secretary yesterday and this morning.

2. The draft statement which you were considering using in the course of the External Affairs debate, (the text of which was contained in your telegram under reference) was passed yesterday afternoon to the State Department at several levels. The draft statement alone was given to Murphy. The draft statement with an oral explanation based on the memorandum enclosed with the Under-Secretary's letter No. Y-273 of February 25 was given to Director of the State Department's Office of Chinese Affairs. He [Walter P. McCaughy] in turn brought it to the attention of Mr. Hoover, the Acting Secretary. Because of the amended instructions received in my telephone conversation with the Under-Secretary, a copy of the departmental memorandum was not given to the State Department.

3. As I informed you over the telephone this morning, the Acting Secretary's reply was given to us through McCaughy late last night. The reply was to the following effect — Hoover asked if you could be informed that he would be greatly appreciative if your mention in the House of Commons of the idea of an international régime in the Formosa Straits could be delayed until the Secretary of State had had an opportunity to comment on the proposal after his return to Washington this week-end. Hoover was inclined to believe that it might be premature to put forward such a scheme for internationalizing the straits at this time. He said he was unable, however, to give us the reaction of the United States Government in Dulles' absence. He offered assurance that your proposed statement would be brought to Mr. Dulles' attention as a matter of urgency when he returned to Washington.

4. Murphy called me later (without having had an opportunity to speak to Hoover). His personal reaction was similar to Hoover's. This idea of an international régime for the straits was an interesting one, but he wondered if this was the time for it to be put forward.

He thought it unlikely that it would appeal to the Nationalist Chinese upon whose forces the United States had to count. He hoped that more time would be given to all concerned for its consideration.

5. Acting on the instructions which you gave me by telephone this morning, I informed Hoover that you had decided not to make reference to the idea of an internationalization of the Formosa Straits if you had to speak on the subject this week. I did not mention that you had been influenced in this decision by the "brush off" which had been given Eden by Peking. I said that it now seemed likely that the debate on external affairs would go over to Monday. You would still wish to have Dulles' reactions soon after his return. I added that you did not regard the idea of an international régime as a cure-all likely in present circumstances to be acceptable to all. You had been searching for some constructive suggestion to be included in your statement, something which might be of assistance in easing the tension; at some later stage the idea you had in mind might acquire merit as a way out of the present dangerous situation.

6. I was assured again that the State Department would promptly bring your suggestion to Dulles' attention when he returned to Washington. The hope was expressed that Dulles' reactions could be made known to you early next week. The State Department again, as it had done yesterday, expressed the appreciation of all concerned that you had brought your suggestion to their attention and had permitted them to offer comments.

7. As I mentioned above, I did not give to the State Department a copy of the departmental memorandum enclosed with letter Y-273. You instructed me on the telephone today not to circulate the departmental memorandum to my Commonwealth colleagues as previously directed. I understand that distribution in the other interested capitals and in New York would also be withheld. We shall be sending you our own observations on the substance of the memorandum within a day or so.

PROVISIONAL INTERNATIONAL RÉGIME FOR THE FORMOSA STRAITS

For Ambassador, Begins: It seems to me to be clear now that not much would be accomplished by attempting to pursue at this time any proposal for neutralization either of Formosa or the Straits, and, therefore, we should go easy in regard to discussing our ideas on this matter. I do not wish Mr. Dulles to feel that he is under any obligation to spend time examining or giving us his views on the proposals which you have, at our request, been discussing with the State Department, I am a little worried that they might be taken more

FORMOSA AND THE COASTAL ISLANDS — SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION

I called on Munro (New Zealand) this morning to inquire about the latest developments with regard to the New Zealand initiative. Munro told me that he would go to Washington tomorrow and that he hoped to see Mr. Dulles within a day or two on this question. He would then have more definite information which he would pass on to us.

2. In the meantime about all Munro could say was that his Minister, Mr. MacDonald, had discussed this question with Mr. Dulles in Bangkok. At that meeting Mr. Dulles had made it clear that he thought that the New Zealand initiative should not be abandoned. If New Zealand did not wish to proceed, then Mr. Dulles had indicated that the United States would probably wish to take the initiative. Munro did not know whether Mr. Dulles would wish to make any changes in the agreed draft resolution or whether in the face of an expected Soviet veto he would nevertheless wish to have the resolution voted upon.

3. I asked Munro whether or not he had received definite instructions from his government to proceed with the New Zealand initiative. He replied that the matter was still under consideration by his government. New Zealand's difficulties would be resolved if the United Kingdom and the United States agreed either (a) that New Zealand should proceed with the initiative or (b) that the initiative should be abandoned. Munro did not know what his instructions would be if the United Kingdom were opposed to proceeding with the initiative and if the United States decided to proceed with the initiative if New Zealand failed to do so. This obviously would place New Zealand in an embarrassing position. Munro hoped to see Mr. Menzies about this matter this afternoon. As Australia had never been enthusiastic about the New Zealand initiative, Munro did not expect support from them now.

4. Munro then asked me what your views were about further action in the Security Council along the lines originally proposed by New Zealand. I replied that when you were in New York your view, if I remembered it rightly was that, without the presence of a representative of Communist China, you would not favour a full dress debate in the Security Council on this issue when a resolution would be introduced and put to a vote. I thought that you had also said that there would not be the same objection to a meeting of the Security Council at which, without a prolonged debate, a resolution would be tabled but would not be put to a vote. This would indicate the action which New Zealand had in mind when it placed the item on the agenda and sponsored an invitation to Communist China.

Munro said that he would, however, be interested in our latest thinking on this question. It obviously gives him concern that New Zealand may be under pressure to take action which will not carry the judgment of some members of the old commonwealth.

5. Munro told me that he, Laking and their wives were the sole foreign guests at a dinner given by Zarubin on March 3. Though nothing very startling emerged from a long conversation which Munro had with Zarubin, he nevertheless thought that you might be interested in reading his account of that conversation. He has promised to let me have sometime tomorrow a copy of a report which he is making to his government.

FORMOSA AND THE COASTAL ISLANDS

We are not particularly impressed by the arguments which have been advanced for a further Security Council meeting on Formosa. From a formal point of view it is, of course, undesirable that a non-member government should be able to prevent the Security Council from taking action. However, by maintaining their present attitude the Chinese Communists can prevent the Security Council from taking the type of conciliatory action we would like to see, and there is something to be said for not making this fact too obvious by further meetings. From the report of Hayter's meeting with Molotov on February 26 it appears that the Soviet Union is not anxious for further United Nations action now.

2. A further consideration is the fact that the Western Powers are divided on the Formosa issue, and a Security Council discussion may serve to make public our divisions. Furthermore, suggestions such as the despatch of a peace observation team to Formosa may be made, which would cause embarrassment. The argument put forward by Dulles that another Security Council meeting would keep up the pressure of world opinion on Peking does not, in my view, outweigh these considerations. Accordingly, for the time being I am in favour of continuing the attempts to find out through diplomatic channels if a basis exists for negotiation, even though these attempts have been very discouraging, to say the least.

3. If it is decided that the Security Council should meet, there would be no particular harm in tabling the New Zealand draft resolution. I have had another look at it and have no changes to propose. It may also be suggested that the Council should designate India, United Kingdom, and Soviet Union to explore the possibilities of a settlement. This proposal was originally put forward by Nehru to Eden on February 11. Molotov indicated an interest in the idea in a conversation with Hayter on February 26, but he said that the three powers should not act under United Nations auspices. Appointment of such a committee of good offices might well be the best step for the Security Council to take, if it meets.

4. As we are not on the Security Council, I see no need for us to play a leading role in discussions as to its further moves. You may, however, give these views to Munro and to any others who ask for them.<sup>100</sup>

FORMOSA AND THE COASTAL ISLANDS

Last night (March 28) a member of the staff had a conversation with Marquis Childs (a Washington Post and Times Herald columnist well known to you and whom we consider reliable) about the private briefing given by Admiral Carney, Chief of the Naval Staff, on Thursday, March 24, to some fifteen Washington newspapermen. Childs said that he had been trying to arrange an interview with Admiral Carney for some time. Last week he had a telephone call from the Admiral's aide, who said that Carney would be willing to meet with a select group of newspapermen at dinner on March 24 and suggested a list of those to be invited. At this prompting, Childs agreed to arrange the dinner.

2. Childs said that Admiral Carney's main theme was that the Chinese Communists would almost certainly attack the offshore islands within the next few weeks and that the United States had inadequate forces for the large-scale war in Asia in which it would soon be involved. The United States, Carney predicted, would be forced into partial mobilization by the end of April and into total mobilization by the middle of May. Carney made it clear several times, according to Childs, that he was speaking with the full concurrence and support of Admiral Radford. That what he was contemplating was a major war in Asia was plain from one detail that Childs reported. He said that at one point in his talk Carney spoke at some length of the problems of military government on the mainland of China.

3. Carney did not try to disguise the fact that he and Admiral Radford believe that this is the moment for a showdown with Communist China. In a major war now, the Chinese Communists would totally lack tactical atomic weapons and could not rely on being provided from the Soviet Union with strategic atomic weapons, even if the Soviet Union has mastered the problem of delivering them over long distances. In any case, Carney said he was confident that the Soviet Union would not intervene.

4. In other words, Carney provided the newspapermen with a fairly complete blueprint of the war which he believes to be imminent. Childs thought it was clear that the main purpose of the briefing was to bring pressure to bear on the President so that he would have even less freedom of action than he has at present if a Communist attack were made on the offshore islands.

FORMOSA AND THE COASTAL ISLANDS

I find the information from Marquis Childs in your telegram WA-516 together with the newspaper story in last Saturday's New York Times frightening.<sup>102</sup> I realize that there has been a reaction in Congress and no doubt also in the State Department to Admiral Carney's activities, and probably representations have been made by other governments. Nevertheless, I think it desirable that we should express our concern about irresponsible activities of this character in such a delicate situation as the present one in the Formosa Straits. You should accordingly arrange to express our views on this matter in an appropriate way and a suitable opportunity to the State Department.

2. You might use as a point of departure any discussion of this matter the question in the House of Commons on March 29 referred to in my immediately following telegram.<sup>103</sup> You might then inquire whether there has been any change in the intelligence about Chinese Communist intentions and capabilities to warrant the notion that an early attack is imminent. You might go on to quote the alleged statements of Admiral Carney and refer to the report that these were made with the concurrence of Admiral Radford. You might particularly refer to the statement about a show down with Communist China and the argument that a general war with Communist China now would be advantageous to the United States. You could further refer to the estimates that a partial U.S. mobilization would be necessary in April and a complete mobilization in May. You might point out the difference between these views and those expressed by President Eisenhower and Mr. Dulles. More particularly, Mr. Dulles has emphasized the fact that consideration is only being given at present to the possible use of tactical atomic bombs against small military targets.

3. It is becoming apparent that the statements attributed to Admiral Carney do not represent the policy of the United States Government. Nevertheless such statements from one so important in the Services are very disquieting to an allied and friendly government; moreover, these statements will be duly noted in Moscow and Peking. It may well be that in the Soviet and Communist Chinese administrations there is some doubt as to what course to pursue, and there are discussions between advocates of attack and advocates of moderation. Statements such as those of Admiral Carney which do not leave much hope for a peaceful solution can hardly encourage the advocates of moderation.

[Ottawa], April 1, 1955

AUTHORITY OF THE UNITED STATES ARMED SERVICES TO USE
ATOMIC WEAPONS TACTICALLY

Information becoming available to the effect that the United States armed services are prepared to use tactical atomic weapons should hostilities develop in the Formosa Straits prompts this note, analyzing the President's control over atomic weapons under United States law.

2. The law of the United States (Atomic Energy Act of 1954) makes the President responsible for making the decision to issue atomic weapons to the armed services. The United States Atomic Energy Commission is the custodian of the atomic weapons, but may on the direction of the President deliver atomic weapons or their nuclear components to the armed services. The relevant section of the Atomic Energy Act is Chapter 9, Section 92, which reads as follows:

"Chapter 9. Military Application of Atomic Energy

"Sec. 91. AUTHORITY:

"a. The Commission is authorized to

"(1) conduct experiments and do research and development work in the military application of atomic energy; and

"(2) engage in the production of atomic weapons, or atomic weapon parts, except that such activities shall be carried on only to the extent that the express consent and direction of the President of the United States has been obtained, which consent and direction shall be obtained at least once each year.

"b. The President from time to time may direct the Commission

(1) to deliver such quantities of special nuclear material or atomic weapons to the Department of Defense for such use as he deems necessary in the interest of national defense, or (2) to authorize the Department of Defense to manufacture, produce, or acquire any atomic weapon or utilization facility for military purposes: Provided, how- ever, That such authorization shall not extend to the production of special nuclear material other than that incidental to the operation of such utilization facilities."

3. Thus, while it is clear that the President's authority is required to issue atomic weapons of any kind to the armed services, it is by no means as clear what control the President exercises on the use of these weapons once they have been issued. Indeed, with the information presently available, it could only be a matter for speculation whether weapons have already been issued to the United States armed services; and, if so, whether these weapons include a nuclear core, without which the weapons of course are useless.

4. It has been our understanding that while atomic weapons without their nuclear core have been issued to the armed services both for purposes of deployment as well as for training, the nuclear cores have been retained under the custody of the Atomic Energy Commission. Our understanding of the procedures governing the issue of nuclear cores is that it is done on the authority of the President with the advice of a special committee of the National Security Council including the Secretary of State, the Chairman of the United States Atomic Energy Commission, and the Secretary of Defence.

5. The only official statement which may imply that complete nuclear weapons may have been issued to the United States armed forces in the area of Formosa is Mr. Dulles' statement on March 8 in which he said: "The United States in particular has sea and air forces now equipped with new and powerful weapons of precision, which can utterly destroy military targets without endangering unrelated civilian centres."<sup>104</sup> The word "equipped", however, may mean no more than that bombs and other types of weapons have been issued to the 7th Fleet, but without the nuclear material which is necessary for an atomic explosion. In this event, presumably the nuclear cores would be flown out to the scene of action, if or when the President so decided.

6. Assuming that the complete weapons have already been issued, however, it is possible that the United States armed forces are ready to use tactical atomic weapons as soon as they have the President's decision to engage in hostilities in support of the Chinese Nationalist forces. The President has the authority of Congress by a resolution to employ United States armed forces and if the Chinese Communists launched an attack, it would be sufficient for the President, under this assumption, to issue orders to the United States forces to engage in hostilities, for tactical atomic weapons to be used. Alternatively, the complete nuclear weapons may have been issued to the 7th Fleet; but there may be an understanding between the President and the Department of Defence that atomic weapons will be used in certain circumstances, the President reserving to himself the decision as to whether or not tactical weapons will be used after hostilities break out.

7. Judging from the press reports emanating from Washington on the President's reaction to the bellicose statements attributed to Admiral Carney last week, it seems likely that the President, aware of his responsibilities both as President and Commander-in-Chief, is determined to reserve to himself the vital decisions both as to initiating hostilities and as to the use of atomic weapons. It would seem to be in the Canadian interest, therefore, to take the occasion in public statements to support the President's authority against his bellicose military subordinates by expressing confidence that the President will only take such grave decisions after weighing the consequences and taking into account the known views of the allies of the United States.

For the text of Dulles' statement, see United States, Department of State, Bulletin, Volume XXXII, No. 821, March 21, 1955, pp. 459-464.

8. If the President is retaining effective control over these important decisions, the probability is that he has either authorized the issue of nuclear weapons to the United States armed forces on the spot without their nuclear cores (the weapons to be completed by special flight when war is imminent) and at the same time authorizing the use of such weapons in the event of United States military intervention against select military targets, or, alternatively, has reserved the final decision on the use of atomic weapons in addition to the use of armed force in support of the Nationalist Chinese, to be made in the light of the circumstances as they develop.

9. It may be difficult to obtain much more specific information through official enquiries in Washington. I am sending, however, a copy of this memorandum to Mr. Heeny with the request that he take whatever opportunity offers to clarify the situation and at least to let us have comments on this paper.

FORMOSA AND THE COASTAL ISLANDS

In view of the repeated references in Washington to the possibility of the use of tactical atomic weapons in the event that hostilities develop in the Formosa Straits, I should like you also to take the occasion of your approach to the State Department along the lines suggested in my telegram, to try to clarify the nature of the civilian control over the issue and authorization of the use of these weapons.

2. I realize that this is a delicate matter and that it may be difficult to raise the question directly, but we have had occasion in the past to discuss this question of procedure of civilian controls with the State Department in view of Canada's special relationship with the United States in atomic matters and particularly in continental defence.

3. A memorandum reviewing information now available to us has been prepared for the Minister and is going forward by bag to you for comment. You should not hold up your approach to the State Department, however, pending receipt of this memorandum.

FORMOSA AND THE COASTAL ISLANDS

I saw Murphy for an hour on April 7. I had interpreted your instructions as putting priority on (a) a re-emphasis of the Canadian concern at the possibility of a major conflict developing out of events in the Coastal Islands, and (b) a re-statement of the Canadian case in such a fashion as to strengthen the hand of the President and his like-minded advisers in the way of moderation. I did make enquiries of Murphy on a number of specific points but a major portion of the interview was taken up with my exposition of the Canadian attitude. I believe it was thoroughly worthwhile to do this and had the impression that my representations found an echo in the State Department. Certainly Murphy listened sympathetically to the case which I made. McConaughy was with Murphy; McCardle with me.

2. I shall not deal in any detail with my arguments but I might mention briefly the major points which I raised. I referred in some detail to the discussions which Mr. Dulles had with you and with others in Ottawa and then read aloud some of the significant passages in your statement to the House of March 24.<sup>105</sup> I stressed the Canadian concern arising out of the inter-dependence of our two countries which is such that involvement is not necessarily related to commitment. I said that the Carney episode had brought a resurgence of anxiety in Canada which had been expressed in the House of Commons in the form of questions to the government. I spoke of the grave doubts which the Canadian Government were inclined to feel as to the possibility of limiting the scope of any conflict which might develop over Quemoy and the Matsus. I mentioned our particular concern arising out of the possibility that nuclear weapons might be used if in fact the United States intervened. Talk in supposedly responsible circles that it was "time for a showdown with Communist China", we believed did not serve the interests of peace. I suggested that the unfortunate effects on allied unity which would follow any unilateral United States action in the Coastal Islands would certainly be felt in NATO and this created additional concern for the close allies of the United States. I took a good deal of time to make these points and I believe it was time well spent.

3. Murphy's response was not unexpected. (I had the feeling indeed of speaking to the already converted.) Murphy emphasized that the United States Government did not take lightly the matter of possible intervention in the Coastal Islands. Dulles, he said, spent most of his waking hours with the problem. Many of the same concerns which were felt by the Canadian Government were felt by the United States Government. The President had made his attitude clear, and it could not be over-emphasized that final decisions with respect to United States intervention would be taken solely by the President. Murphy said it seemed inevitable that wherever there was tension there developed a symbol of the conflict which had little intrinsic value. He was reminded of the "die for Danzig" talk which was current in 1939.

For Pearson's statement on Formosa, see Canada, House of Commons, Debates, 1955, Volume 3, pp. 2341-2346.

4. In answer to my specific question as to whether intelligence reports suggested that a major attack by the Communist Chinese was imminent, Murphy said he knew of nothing which would leave that impression. He reminded us that Carney had now specifically denied that he mentioned April 15 as the likely date for an outbreak of hostilities involving the United States. There was, he said, a steady Chinese build-up in the way of airfields and gun positions. The departure of six Chinese divisions from North Korea with substantial quantities of heavy equipment was of interest. He had seen nothing, however, which would lead him to believe that the Chinese Communists were about to launch a major offensive. Murphy said that there could be no positive assurance that the Soviet Union would not intervene if conflict broke out but it was the State Department's analysis that the Soviet Union would not wish to involve itself in Chinese adventures in the coastal area.

5. The conversation turned then to a discussion of the possibility of limiting any conflict which might break out over the offshore islands. While admitting here again that there could be no certainty, Murphy believed it would be possible to limit any conflict which might develop. The Soviet Union had not intervened directly in the Korean war nor had it responded fully in the 30's when Japan created the Manchurian incident. The history of the Soviet Union, he thought, suggested that there was little likelihood of Soviet intervention unless intervention was really forced upon the Soviet Union, and the United States had no intention of doing that. As for the United States side of the question, there had been great concern during the Korean war at the possibility of a crossing of the Yalu. The Administration had, however, been successful in resisting strong pressures within the government and from public opinion and had in fact not allowed a breaching of the Yalu boundary. It was questionable as to how far the Chinese Communists could go by themselves to expand any conflict which might develop.

6. It was, as you suggested, rather difficult to raise the question of civilian control over the issue and authorization of the use of tactical atomic weapons. Murphy assured us that the decision to use atomic weapons rested with the President and only he could decide. He left the impression, however, and admittedly this part of our conversation was in somewhat vague terms, that the decision to deploy (but not to use) the core of atomic weapons was not necessarily one which had to be taken by the President himself. The legislative base for civilian control of atomic weapons would seem to be that which is covered in the memorandum enclosed with your letter D-453† of April 1. From what Murphy said, however, we would assume that the President's decision is required only for the actual use of nuclear weapons.

7. Finally, I might add that in the course of our conversation, Murphy developed most of the familiar arguments of the United States case with respect to the Administration's current policies concerning Formosa and the Coastal Islands, which I need not repeat. In the course of the United States argumentation, with which we are all familiar, I asked whether the present situation did not work to the political advantage of the Communists and whether the United States stand would not be strengthened considerably if it was taken on Formosa itself. Murphy said he did not find this argument too convincing at the moment. The withdrawal of United States support from the Nationalists on Quemoy and the Matsus would obviously affect the morale on Formosa and might even lead to internal collapse. In these circumstances, he asked, would the allies of the United States go as far as assisting in the garrisoning of Formosa? We admitted that we thought this most unlikely. Murphy said that this too was his estimate and it was an estimate which was much in the minds of senior officials of the United States Government. They could only hope that time would solve the problem of Nationalist morale and give the United States more elbow room in working out its policies in this important and potentially explosive area.

DISTINCTION BETWEEN LARGE AND TACTICAL NUCLEAR WEAPONS

1. The following communication dated April 18 addressed to the High Commissioner, on the above subject, has been received from P.H. Dean of the Foreign Office.

Letter Begins:

We have been disturbed by recent statement on this question by President Eisenhower and Mr. Dulles. We hear from our High Commissioner in Canada that during Dulles' visit last month he said to Mr. Pearson that he was constantly stressing the distinction between tactical atomic weapons and the hydrogen bomb, that United States defence policy was now based on the use of small atomic weapons, and that reliance on conventional weapons would be hopelessly costly. Mr. Pearson was reported as saying that Canadians were realising that Canada would inevitably be involved in international trouble even where no Canadian commitments were involved, and that this worried Canadian public opinion and would lead to more agitation for having a voice in important decisions.

Clearly this question is of the highest importance, and ministers here have recently considered it. They invited the Foreign Secretary to arrange for consultations to be held with the Canadian Government with a view to the submission to them in due course of the draft of a joint communication on this subject to the United States Government, provided of course that the Canadian Government wished to join with the Government of the United Kingdom in this manner.

I enclose a tentative draft paper which, subject to the comments of your government, might be submitted as the basis for the joint communication in question. We should be most grateful if you would let us have your Government's views on it. Should you wish for a preliminary discussion of the matter I am of course at your disposal at any time. Letter Ends.

2. My immediately following telegram contains the text of the tentative draft paper referred to above.

3. Please pass copy of these telegrams to N.A. Robertson.

DISTINCTION BETWEEN LARGE AND TACTICAL NUCLEAR WEAPONS

Following is text of tentative draft paper referred to in paragraph 2 of my telegram under reference, Begins: Her Majesty's Governments in the United Kingdom and Canada are disturbed at the divergence between their views and those of the United States Government on this very important matter and its practical implications.

2. President Eisenhower and Mr. Dulles have both publicly advanced the thesis that a clear distinction can be drawn between small and precise nuclear weapons on the one hand, and large thermo-nuclear weapons on the other. The suggestion had been made on the American side that Her Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom should also consider taking suitable opportunities to make clear the technical and moral justification for the use of tactical nuclear weapons.

3. It is true that the NATO powers have decided that military planning should be based on the use of nuclear weapons and are reorganising and re-equipping their forces on that basis. It is also true that the NATO powers cannot afford to be strong in both nuclear and conventional means of waging global war. The process of re-equipping will be a gradual one: but in the not far distant future a stage will be reached in the re-equipment of the forces at which to deny them the use of nuclear weapons would hamstring their operations. This position was accepted by the NATO Council in December 1954, with the proviso that the decision to use nuclear weapons shall remain with the governments concerned.<sup>106</sup>

4. Her Majesty's Governments in the United Kingdom and in Canada have considered the American proposition. In their view there is no point in the graduation of nuclear weapons at which any such dividing line can be drawn, and it is not necessarily true that the smaller ones produce no fall-out. In addition, the precision of any weapons is in no way related to its contents, but to the means of delivery. Furthermore, the American suggestion that the smaller weapons can legitimately be used in the framework of conventional armaments and only against military targets leads to the sterile argument as to what constitutes a military target.

5. Even if it were possible scientifically and militarily to draw the suggested distinction between small and large nuclear weapons the two governments consider that there are grave objections from the point of view of the West to doing so. The possession by the West of a stock of nuclear weapons of all kinds and the ability to deliver them is at present the most important factor in achieving the aim of preventing war. An attempt to divide them into those which are small and therefore morally justifiable, and those which are large and therefore immoral, would inevitably reduce their deterrent value as a whole. It would be fatal to give the impression that as long as no hydrogen bomb was dropped on allied territory none would be used against Russia, or that the only likely victims of nuclear weapons in a new global war would be the armed forces and not the civilian populations or centres of government and industry. Moreover, for the deterrent to achieve its maximum effect, the Russians must be left in no doubt that the use against the West of any of their nuclear weapons would immediately bring upon them retaliation from the whole allied armoury.

6. The conclusions of Her Majesty's Governments in the United Kingdom and Canada are as follows.

7. The time is coming when the Western forces will only be able to fight a global war with nuclear weapons. The decision to use these weapons will remain under political control.

8. It is not possible to draw any definite dividing line between small and large nuclear weapons. Even if it were possible to do so, it would be gravely against the interests of the West, because it would reduce their deterrent value and would encourage the Russians to think that they might be able to resort to aggression without receiving the full weight of allied retaliation. Ends.

DISTINCTION BETWEEN LARGE AND TACTICAL NUCLEAR WEAPONS

Because this proposal relates so directly to United States policies, we are offering some preliminary comments on the telegrams under reference. Our comments, however, are necessarily tentative partly because of the wide implications of the United Kingdom proposals and partly because there may be some background to Dean's brief message of which we are unaware.

2. From the information available here, the descriptions in paragraph 1 of EX-702 of Mr. Dulles' and Mr. Pearson's views do not appear to be accurate.

3. As we understand the covering letter and the draft paper, the main concern of the United Kingdom is that the Soviet Union will be misled by current United States statements on nuclear weapons and may falsely assume that "massive retaliation" has been whittled down. If this is the object of the proposed approach, we would hope that it might be put more clearly (if made at all).

Documents 736 and 737 were retransmitted to Washington as Telegrams EX-702 and EX-703.

4. We would have thought that the first conclusion (EX-703, paragraph 7) is an understatement in relation to the emphasis publicly made here on the degree of dependence on nuclear weapons.

5. The second conclusion (paragraph 8) seems to begin with an over-simplification. The dividing line between small and large tactical weapons is surely the use to which they would be put, the one being tactical and the other strategic. We do, however, share the United Kingdom doubts on another form of distinction, that is, that the small bombs can safely be used without serious threat of leading to a global war.

6. We find it hard to envisage in the NATO area a minor war in which tactical bombs alone would be used. On the other hand, such a situation is envisaged for the Quemoy area and it is in this context that we have seen the practical problem involved in the distinction between the two types of bombs.

7. You have already made clear the possible consequences of United States operations over the Chinese mainland. We cannot help feeling that once unleashed the USAF would with difficulty be restricted to direct military targets or to the coastal area. This danger involved in any such operations would be increased by the use of tactical bombs.

8. As we see it, then, the pressing problem is to find some plan under which the United States could and would abandon its present policy in respect of the coastal islands. With that change, the immediate problem of the use of tactical bombs would virtually disappear.

9. We cannot help feeling that the presentation by one or more countries of a general essay on large and small bombs would be ill received in this country. If some clarification is needed for this purpose, could not some less formal approach, and certainly some clearer argument, be considered?

10. Finally, from the information available to us, we do not understand the reason which has led the United Kingdom to suggest a combined United Kingdom-Canadian approach to the United States. It is true that we have a common interest in atomic matters, but as the United Kingdom draft is untechnical and raises a problem of concern to a large number of countries, the reason for a dual approach is not clear to us.

I. DISTINCTION BETWEEN LARGE AND TACTICAL NUCLEAR WEAPONS

The Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs said the United Kingdom had expressed its concern over the apparent U.S. view that there could be a distinction between large and tactical nuclear weapons, that the U.S. defence policy was now based on the use of the small atomic weapons, and that reliance on conventional weapons would be extremely costly. U.K. Ministers had considered this important question recently and now proposed that consultations be arranged with a view to the U.K. and Canadian governments approaching the U.S. jointly on this matter. A paper which might form the basis of such a submission had been received. The Canadian Ambassador in Washington had made certain preliminary comments on the proposal.

Relevant documents had been circulated to those at the meeting, and included:

Telegrams No. 536 and 537, April 18, from the High Commissioner in London.

Telegram No. WA-633 of April 20, from the Canadian Ambassador in Washington, and

An excerpt from a memorandum, dated March 17, reporting a conversation between Mr. Dulles and Mr. Pearson.<sup>108</sup>

The Chairman of the Chiefs of Staff said the U.S. had no intention of fighting any war without using all the kinds of weapons that were available. The U.S. Chiefs of Staff had been told by the National Security Council that they were to plan on the use of mass destruction weapons in the event of war. The U.S. forces were being organized accordingly and it would be increasingly difficult as time went on to change and attempt to fight a war on a different basis. In other words, the type of war that would be fought had been settled and once a decision had been taken to go to war, it could be assumed that every kind of weapon would be employed. He thought that President Eisenhower's and Mr. Dulles' attempts to distinguish between sizes of nuclear weapons was being made because of the public reaction against the previously stated intention of the U.S. to retaliate massively against aggression at times and places of its own choosing. In the face of this public attitude, they had now come around, so it seemed to the view that, in the Far East at any rate, only small weapons would be employed and only on strictly military targets. The difficulty in this approach was twofold. First of all, once a war was started, it would be quite impossible to stick only to using small bombs, particularly if the desired results were not realized and U.S. aims were not achieved, and secondly, whether or not a 20-kiloton or a 5 or 6 megaton bomb were dropped, the whole of Asia would be completely alienated by such action.

Mr. Léger observed that Canada had agreed, insofar as NATO was concerned, that the Supreme Commander could, for planning purposes, rely on the use of nuclear weapons, large or small.

General Foulkes added that if NATO dropped its shield by saying that it would not use nuclear weapons in its defence, Russia could easily overrun Europe with conventional forces. We should hold the shield firmly and keep SAC in being as the main deterrent to war.

The Chairman of the Defence Research Board said that the U.S., through their attempted distinction were, it seemed, taking a different line in the Far East than in Europe. According to presently understood plans, all forms of nuclear weapons might be used in Europe but if the latest statements were to be believed only the smaller tactical variety would be employed in Asia.

Mr. Bryce said that the question was whether, in the East, there was any use in trying to make this distinction. The apparent Ottawa view was that this was not possible. Should such opinions be advanced to the U.S.? It was unfortunate that the U.S. Secretary of State had not been informed of these when he was in Canada some weeks ago.

Mr. Léger agreed, but said that this was understandable because the effort to distinguish between the big and the little weapons was quite a new theory at the time and Canadian thinking had not then been very far advanced.

General Foulkes said it was likely that the U.S. would use the smaller atomic weapons in the Far East under present circumstances if hostilities involving the Chinese Communists broke out. Such tactical weapons would not only destroy military targets and personnel but would also, of course, affect civilians as well.

Mr. Drury said the essential thing was to define the nature of the target. He was quite sure that if any kind of bomb were dropped by the U.S. on a Chinese target on the mainland, e.g. Peking, general war would develop.

Dr. Solandt thought the initiative lay with the Russians as to whether full all-out war would occur. The Russians would suffer more relatively than the Chinese and the latter might feel this would be to their advantage and might therefore endeavour to precipitate hostilities. On the other hand, the Russians would enter a war only after the most careful thought and calculation. They might in turn not be adverse to standing aside while the Chinese were weakened in a struggle with the U.S.

Mr. Léger said that one additional complication was that we did not know if the Chinese knew how devastating atomic weapons were. A lack of knowledge might lead them to take grave risks.

Mr. Drury asked whether Canada was interested in not having the U.S. administration establish a morality about the use of large and small nuclear weapons. The real issue to his mind was whether the U.S. should be discouraged from fighting limited wars in the Far East at all.

Mr. Léger observed that if such a war in Asia were a U.S. enterprise we might not have anything to do with it. If, however, it became a matter for the United Nations, then decisions would have to be made as to whether and how the war would be localized and as to what type of weapons might be used.

Mr. Drury added that we would have no control over strictly U.S. Operations. It was difficult to guarantee a localized war and in the present circumstances it seemed clear that nuclear weapons of some kind or other would be used. The rest of the world nevertheless had a tremendous stake in what the U.S. would do.

Mr. Bryce thought that the U.S. concept of planning for the use of mass destruction weapons was appropriate when the U.S. had a preponderance of those weapons, say two or three years ago. This was perhaps the logical policy until the Russians also had a significant number of the same weapons and equipment and the means to deliver them. Once this stage was reached, it would seem advisable for the U.S. authorities to re-examine their defence policy.

Mr. Drury said, however, that the U.S. could not afford an effective defence apparatus unrelated to mass destructive weapons, particularly in NATO. If they abandoned plans for the fullest use of them they would not have the conventional forces required to meet the current threat and provide the appropriate deterrent.

Mr. Bryce was not sure that this was correct insofar as Korea was concerned. If the United Nations forces there under the direction of the U.S. authorities had not gone right to the Yalu and thus brought the Chinese into the war, the action to defeat aggression involving the use of conventional weapons alone might have been much more successful. The alternative to the present U.S. strategy in the Far East was the provision by the U.S. itself and possibly by other Western nations of substantial conventional forces. Such forces were not available and the nations concerned, including Canada were not prepared to take the steps to follow this alternative.

Dr. Solandt said that in the paper prepared as a basis for a joint approach to the U.S. it was clear that the British felt there was no point in distinguishing between large and tactical nuclear weapons. In addition to the probable U.K. concern over differing U.S. policies in the Far East and in NATO, he suspected the U.K. were worried that if small nuclear weapons were used on China, a general war would break out and the British Isles might then be destroyed.

Mr. Bryce thought that this U.S. difference in policy as between the Far East on the one hand and Europe on the other might give Canada some reason for joining in the approach. We might also base a submission on what Mr. Dulles had to say when he was in Ottawa some weeks before.

Mr. Léger was not satisfied that Canada should join in the U.K. exercise at this stage at a high level. Rather, we might discuss the matter with the appropriate desk officers in the State Department; get what reactions that could be obtained and, based on these, approach the higher authorities later on.

Mr. Bryce observed that in any event the U.S. was aware of Canada's views on possible hostilities over Quemoy and Matsu.

Mr. Drury said that the Australian proposal for a joint guarantee of Formosa by the U.S., Australia and possibly other countries including New Zealand, the United Kingdom and Canada which was now being mooted was most attractive to him. As he understood it, the quid pro quo would be a U.S. commitment to evacuate Quemoy and Matsu. If such an arrangement did emerge it would mean that there would be a collective determination as to whether there was an act of overt aggression against Formosa. Such an alliance would be free to use any kind of weapon, he assumed, unless there were mutually agreed restrictions. It would perhaps also make the present approach respecting the distinction between types of nuclear weapons unnecessary. Canada's accession to such guarantee, though, might involve a fairly significant military contribution.

Mr. Léger said that the possible guarantee of Formosa with Quemoy and Matsu reverting to the Chinese government on the mainland was only a new idea. He agreed though that it was attractive in many ways. He was not so sure that Canada's contribution need be very great if we joined. However, any such arrangement might not come about for some time and the next few weeks might well be critical in the Formosa straits. Nevertheless, he was concerned that a joint approach at a high level by Canada and the U.K. would only be resented by the U.S.

Dr. Solandt said that our line might be that we had joined in defensive arrangements with the U.S. based in the main on the deterrent provided by SAC armed with nuclear weapons. In the attempt to distinguish between the size of these weapons there was an implication that the use of the big ones was immoral and this undermined the whole basis of the West's defence.

The Chairman said he felt the sense of the meeting was as follows: The British should not be discouraged in approaching the U.S. direct if they so desired. But we should advise the U.K. that, at the moment, we did not have an occasion to join with them in the exercise. The U.S. Secretary of State had spoken to Canada some weeks ago about this matter, but we had not then offered any views. We did, however, share U.K. feelings on the U.S. attempt to distinguish between the size of weapons and we would use what opportunities we could to discuss the matter with the U.S. authorities ourselves. It could also be explained that the possible guarantee of Formosa now being discussed might present an occasion to express our views.

DISTINCTION BETWEEN LARGE AND TACTICAL NUCLEAR WEAPONS

Please inform Dean that we also have been giving active consideration recently to some of the problems relating to the strategic and tactical use of nuclear weapons. We agree on the importance and urgency of reaching a meeting of minds on this subject between the allied governments principally concerned, and we welcome the suggestion for an exchange of views with the United Kingdom authorities. My forthcoming visit to London might provide an opportunity for such an exchange orally.<sup>109</sup>

2. While we have not yet reached any firm conclusion with regard to the United Kingdom proposal for a joint or parallel approach to the United States Government, our preliminary and tentative view is that it might be inadvisable in the form and manner suggested.

3. As we understand it, the main concern of the United Kingdom is that the Soviet Union may be misled by current United States statements on nuclear weapons and may falsely assume that the doctrine of "measured retaliation" in peripheral areas, expounded recently by President Eisenhower and Mr. Dulles, implies some weakening of the policy of "massive retaliation" where vital allied interests are attacked. We are inclined to think that the danger of a miscalculation arises less from the possibility of such a misconception on the part of the Soviets than from the practical difficulty of placing restrictions on either the type of weapons or the choice of targets in situations such as that in the Formosan straits. The problem, therefore, as we see it, is essentially one of reaching agreement on the positions to be regarded as justifying military retaliation of any kind.

4. We are also not entirely clear on the nature of the "suggestion" or "proposition" by the United States referred to in the tentative draft paper. The Americans have made no such specific proposals to us. Mr. Dulles, when he was in Ottawa, did refer to the statements which he and President Eisenhower had made about the use of small atomic weapons against battlefield and tactical targets, and said that he thought it important that the public should come to recognize (1) that they are distinct from the big thermo-nuclear weapons; and (2) that they are not distinct from other tactical weapons. United States defence forces and policy, he said, had been shaped on the predicated use of small atomic weapons. If they had to prepare also to fight only with conventional weapons, the financial and eco-conomic strains would be such that the United States would have to introduce far-reaching economic and political controls for an indefinite period, and thus sacrifice many of the free values for which they stood. The decision therefore to rely on atomic weapons was more than merely a financial one.

5. Mr. Dulles did not, however, develop more fully the reasons for the distinction he and the President were seeking to make, nor did he make any attempt to relate the distinction to the policy of nuclear deterrence. We would therefore be interested to know whether the United Kingdom authorities have been given a fuller outline of the "technical and moral justification" for the use of nuclear weapons in a tactical as distinct from a strategic role. I had myself something to say on this matter in my first Princeton lecture.<sup>110</sup>

Please pass the following message to Léger.

Had discussions with Gruenther and Norstad regarding the big and little problem. It is Gruenther's view that the reason for this propaganda was to take attention off the previous cliché of massive retaliation in the place of our own choosing. When this was associated with fallout it tended towards creating panic especially when considered in the small war. Gruenther admits he had never considered that the little bombs designed to deal with military targets would be considered morally and tend to imply that the big ones would therefore be immoral. He fully appreciates that any such interpretation might have serious effects on political decision regarding the use of such weapons. I emphasize that we were concerned lest this propaganda might be considered by the Russians as an indication that we would hesitate to use the big bomb in a global war. Therefore this would have a serious effect on the deterrent power. Gruenther immediately realised the force of this argument. He is to see Dulles on the seventh of May and is going to raise this issue with him particularly the moral side and the deterrent. He suggested that perhaps Mr. Pearson may wish also to raise it if he has more informal talks with Mr. Dulles.<sup>111</sup> I have passed this information to Brownjohn who is returning to UK tomorrow.

FORMOSA; REPORT BY SECRETARY OF STATE FOR EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

11. The Secretary of State for External Affairs said there had been very serious developments in regard to Formosa which might require a difficult decision on the security of that island. However, the offer of Chou En-Lai to negotiate with the United States over differences in the area, and the second comment of the U.S. on this offer, saying that they would be willing to hold discussions, appeared hopeful and might solve the problem which had arisen.<sup>112</sup>

The possibility of a difficult decision arose out of negotiations initiated by the Australian Prime Minister in Washington. Mr. Menzies had proposed that the U.S. persuade the Chinese Nationalists to evacuate Matsu and Quemoy, and, in return, the U.S., Australia, and, presumably, New Zealand, the U.K. and Canada, would undertake to assist in resisting an attack on Formosa. In a sense, this was a form of guarantee. When he heard about this he had informed our friends that any proposal to Canada of this sort could cause trouble and that it ran counter to Canada's announced policy of undertaking no obligations about Formosa except those that might arise out of Canadian obligations to the United Nations.

This proposal was probably the reason that Admiral Radford, the Chairman of the U.S. Chiefs of Staff and Walter Robertson, the U.S. Assistant Under-Secretary of State had gone to Formosa. Presumably, it was to find out if Chiang Kai-shek would agree to something along the lines of the Australian suggestion. The British reaction had been cautious. They had given the U.S. no reason to expect any support unless such an arrangement was worked out under U.N. auspices.

If Cabinet agreed, he proposed to take a firm stand with both the U.S. and the U.K., stressing that Canada had no commitments in the Far East except those arising out of her membership in the United Nations and no wish to undertake any new commitments there. It would be difficult, however, if the U.S. persuaded Chiang Kai-shek to withdraw his forces from Quemoy and Matsu and then asked the United Nations to ratify a Formosan guarantee.

12. In the course of discussion the following points emerged:

(a) It would be a grave decision for Canada to become a partner in any arrangement to guarantee the integrity of Formosa. Australia, however, would say that this did not involve a guarantee to the Nationalist forces but merely a commitment that the status quo would not be changed by force.

(b) There had been no formal or final determination of the future of Formosa although Japan had ceased to exercise sovereignty over the island and had given up rights there under the Peace Treaty. In fact, its sovereignty had not been entrusted to anyone, except possibly by the U.S. as conquerors, to China under Chiang Kai-shek. Presumably, all the former belligerents in World War II would have to agree on its final legal disposition.

(c) It would be embarrassing if the U.S. succeeded in persuading Chiang Kai-shek to abandon the coastal islands and then, as part of the quid pro quo, asked Canada to join in guaranteeing Formosa. The U.K., Australia and New Zealand regarded holding the island as in their interests. However, the situation was different here, and it had never been maintained that the island was of vital strategic importance to Canada.

13. The Cabinet noted the report of the Secretary of State for External Affairs on the possibility of Canada being asked to join in a guarantee of Formosa if Chinese Nationalist forces were to evacuate Quemoy and Matsu, and agreed that, for the present, Canada maintain the position taken heretofore, that no commitments would be undertaken in this area except such as arose out of Canada's obligations as a member of the United Nations.

BILATERAL DISCUSSIONS BETWEEN THE UNITED STATES AND COMMUNIST CHINA

At the first suitable opportunity, would you tell the State Department how pleased we were here with the attitude toward bilateral talks with the Chinese, as outlined by Mr. Dulles in his press conference last Wednesday,<sup>113</sup> and as reported in the New York Times.

2. We welcome the cautious encouragement Mr. Dulles has given Chou En-Lai's offer of negotiations. Like him, we hope that the developments of the last few days may represent a real trend away from the international tension of recent months, particularly over the Formosa issue.

3. We are very conscious that it will be difficult for the United States and Communist China to establish contact even though both sides may really desire to do so. The State Department might accordingly be receptive to a few informal and very tentative ideas about how this might be done. If this is so you might make two such suggestions, though of course, these might have already occurred to them. In the first place, they might find it useful to establish first contacts in a capital where both Communist China and the United States have diplomatic representatives. This might provide the best way of starting confidential discussions free from the pressures of the press. If these preliminary talks showed any promise they could then be carried on at a higher level.

4. We recognize the dangerous consequence of a failure of negotiations to make much headway because of the intractable nature of the problems to be discussed. We notice that Mr. Dulles has emphasized the reaching of a cease-fire without raising substantive questions regarding the future status of Formosa. It may be difficult to get a formal cease-fire. It may also appear wise to avoid heading into the question of the future of Formosa when the possibility of reaching agreement at this time is slight. If any progress is to be made it might be better to deal with peripheral matters of mutual concern where mutual concessions might be made. If some mutual problems could be cleared up then the atmosphere might be improved and the Chinese might decide for their own reasons to not make an issue out of Formosa at this time.

BANDUNG CONFERENCE AND FORMOSA

I should be obliged if you would convey the following views to the Indian authorities.

2. We have followed the proceedings at Bandung with a great deal of interest and can well imagine that the Conference was a fruitful one for the participants. We have noticed that the communiqué is, generally speaking, couched in moderate terms and reflects the desire of the participants to play a full role in international organizations, rather than any exclusive spirit. The influence of responsible leadership is clear, both in the proceedings and in the communiqué.

3. The public statement of willingness to negotiate by Chou En-Lai is a step forward which has created a better atmosphere. I have sent a message to Washington welcoming Mr. Dulles' agreement to participate in bilateral discussions. Mr. Menon's statement quoted in paragraph 10 of your telegram No. 293† appears to be based on the initial State Department release of April 23.<sup>114</sup> In his press conference of April 26 Mr. Dulles did not insist on a cease fire as a prerequisite to direct negotiations, but he said that the first topic to be raised in any bilateral discussions was a cease fire. I shall see Mr. Dulles and other foreign ministers at Paris next week and we shall doubtless touch upon the Formosa situation, probably in informal conversations.<sup>115</sup> I am sure that these conversations will bring out the general desire to profit from the more hopeful atmosphere which has recently arisen and possibly, too, some practical ways of pursuing negotiations may emerge.

4. I am inclined to agree with Mr. Dulles' statement on April 26 that Chou En-Lai's declaration of willingness to negotiate was in some measure motivated by the emphasis on peaceful solutions of the other countries represented at Bandung. It is to be hoped that the Colombo powers will find ways of continuing to exercise this beneficent influence in the months to come, and in this connection I have read with interest of the forthcoming visit of Mr. Krishna Menon to Peking. I found my talk with Mr. Menon at the end of March very useful even though I could not entirely accept some of the ideas Mr. Menon discussed, and I felt that they would be even more unacceptable to the United States.

5. I can understand that in performing the very helpful function of explaining how the Chinese Communists would approach the Formosa problem, Mr. Menon would wish to be very cautious about suggesting the sort of concessions that the Peking authorities might be prepared to make in any negotiations. Indeed it will be very interesting to learn if Mr. Menon is able to confirm that the Chinese Communists are prepared to make concessions. On the other hand, I am sure that Mr. Menon is fully aware that there is little room for the Nationalists and the United States to make further concessions on the Formosa issue except with respect to the coastal islands and not attacking the mainland. Indeed the questions of the future of Formosa and the Nationalist Government seem to me to be very difficult ones to resolve at this time. It might be easier to make progress on some minor matters of mutual concern to Peking and Washington. If that were possible a better atmosphere would be created and Formosa might become less important as a focus for mutual distrust and antipathy. Mr. Menon's exploratory talks might facilitate later negotiations and particularly direct contacts between the United States and Communist China.

6. However, I am somewhat surprised by Mr. Menon's remark reported in paragraph 12 of your telegram 293 about the likelihood of Communist Chinese attacks on the coastal islands. It is understandable that at the present stage of exploratory discussions Mr. Menon may be talking over with the Communist Chinese ideas which are not altogether acceptable to us. I would hope, however, that we would all agree on the importance of the exercise of restraint on all sides while exploratory talks are going forward. This seems to me an essential basis of progress towards a modus-vivendi.

VISIT OF KRISHNA MENON TO PEKING

I had a somewhat confusing hour this morning with Menon who returned to Delhi yesterday. Menon saw Middleton, the Acting High Commissioner for the United Kingdom just before I visited him. He is seeing the United States Ambassador this afternoon.

2. It is my impression that Menon enjoyed his trip to Peking. He was there for ten days and had six interviews with Chou En-Lai, each lasting about three hours. He also met Chou En-Lai and other Chinese officials socially.

3. Menon read me the text of the message which Prime Minister Nehru sent to you about Menon's visit to Peking.<sup>116</sup> It was only at the end of the conversation that I had an opportunity to read it. There is one typing error in this message which you should correct. In the sentence in paragraph 6 which begins "We believe substantial progress can be made etc." the words "can be made" should be changed to "has been made".

4. You will note in paragraph 6 of Nehru's message that he comments that the nature of the talks do not lend themselves to an exchange of views by telegram and that he is taking steps "for conversations with you and your Prime Minister". It is, I think, highly likely Menon will make his way to Ottawa via London.<sup>117</sup> He told me on a private basis that although the Prime Minister has not yet approved his itinerary he thought that he might be leaving for London next week, proceeding to Ottawa about June 10 and then going on to Washington before Dulles leaves for San Francisco. If Menon does not make this pilgrimage I do not know who will.

5. I was not too successful in getting Menon to say much more than is contained in Nehru's message. He emphasized, however, on several occasions that he hoped you would do your best to get a favourable public reaction in Washington to the announcement of the release of the four United States airmen. He said that he did not expect the Americans to go overboard in praising the generosity of the Peking Government in the release of these men. He thought, however, that a moderate reaction would be useful and might make it easier for Peking to release the remaining airmen. I suggested that Mr. St. Laurent might even wish to consider sending a message to President Eisenhower. When speaking about the release of the four airmen Menon told me that the date of May 30 had been selected to give him time to report to Nehru and to inform London, Washington and ourselves. The release of these airmen will be made public in Delhi at a press conference to be held at about eleven o'clock on Monday, May 30, and will be announced by Peking Radio on the same day.

6. I understood Menon to say that Peking would probably release the other airmen if their relatives visited China. He said, however, that Peking had no intention of making a public declaration to this effect. He also said that Peking was prepared to release all American nationals and indeed intended to make entry into China of United States nationals easier. If this latter development takes place Menon hopes that responsible and respectable American citizens will visit China and see conditions there themselves. He also hopes that we would encourage Canadian private citizens to visit China.

7. I reminded Menon that you had indicated that you would be interested to learn if he was able to confirm that the Chinese Communists were prepared to make concessions. In reply I understood Menon to say that:

(1) There was a general relaxation of tension. The willingness of Peking to negotiate opened the way "for other things" and given the proper conditions this could lead to a broader settlement.

(2) More concrete form had been given by Peking to their views on negotiations by suggestions as to how these negotiations might be carried out and in particular by their suggesting that negotiations might start at a lower level. I also understood him to say that negotiations might be carried out through a third party.

(3) A common basis can now be found for taking into negotiation various unresolved questions.

8. Menon is, I think optimistic that he has laid the groundwork for a situation which, if it were not a cease-fire, at least would have all the earmarks of a de facto cease-fire.

9. It is my impression that Menon feels he has made a contribution to the solution of a ticklish problem. When I remarked that he had indeed done so he purred gently. Undoubtedly, however, he thinks the ball is now in the American court. He does not, however, want to be quoted that he thinks it is now up to the United States.

10. Menon then discounted the two-China theory and remarked that the Peking Government will not carry out reprisals against Nationalist Chinese. He illustrated this by referring to one or two persons he had met in Peking who had been integrated into the new régime without loss of stature. Menon said in passing that Peking was willing to enter into discussion with Chiang Kai-shek, but not as the head of a nationalist government. He would be treated as though he were a provincial leader.

11. I found it rather difficult to follow Menon since my only knowledge of Nehru's telegram was Menon's hasty reading of it to me. Menon has, I think, views which he did not disclose.

12. As I was leaving Menon said he hoped that you would let him have your initial reactions to Nehru's telegram.

VISIT OF KRISHNA MENON TO PEKING

A. Following is the text of a message which Nehru has sent to the Minister and which was delivered by the Indian High Commissioner here today.

"Krishna Menon has returned from Peking and reported to me today on his talks with Chou En-Lai and others. I had asked him to visit Peking in response to an invitation from Chou En-Lai. No report of his talk while he was there was either expected or received by me before he returned here. Hence I have not been able to send you a communication on the subject till now.

2. "These talks have resulted in showing the way clearer to:

- (a) A basis for negotiations which can be accepted by both sides;
- (b) Steps both immediate and subsequent to the lowering of tensions and create a climate for negotiations;

(c) The consideration of steps and procedures to bring about and facilitate negotiations themselves.

3. "The Chinese Government have decided in response to our request and "as a first step" to release four U.S. airmen of the FISTISM group. I believe the way has now been definitely opened for further and more final solutions of the issue of the U.S. nationals in China and their return. We may believe now this can be brought about by further efforts and goodwill.

4. "An announcement about the four flyers will be made in Peking on the evening of the 30th May. Until then the decision must be treated as secret and my communication to you is on this basis.

5. "I would like to say to you that a helpful response to this announcement from the responsible leaders in United States will help the progress and speed the release of all the remaining nationals and reduce tensions. It will bring about a definite and helpful change in the Chinese mind and all-round.

6. "I would like to refer to the concluding part of your message which your High Commissioner communicated to us as your impressions and views on this problem in which you express particular concern about the use of force pending the negotiations and your hope that there should be abstention from such use to help negotiations. We believe substantial progress can be made in this respect which will be a definite gain. Nature of the talks and of the procedures and steps which have been considered do not lend themselves to the exchange of our views by telegram. I hope therefore to take steps for conversations with you and your Prime Minister in Ottawa for this purpose as soon as convenient to you.

7. "Kindly convey to Mr. St. Laurent that I feel that the talks in Peking are a distinct contribution to progress towards peaceful settlement and we look much to Canada in conveying to the United States that helpful response to the initial progress achieved in Peking will help to secure further results. This will involve no sacrifice of principle and no commitment on the part of the United States Government."

B. My immediately following telegram [EX-979] contains the text of telegram No. 348 of May 27 from Williams in New Delhi reporting an interview with Menon which throws additional light on this message. We are not clear but are inclined to think that it is Menon rather than Nehru who is proposing to come to Ottawa.

VISIT OF KRISHNA MENON TO PEKING

Although the State Department had not had any word from their Embassy in New Delhi when I spoke to Murphy on the telephone last evening before receiving your telegrams under reference, they had received a message from Cooper by the time I called on Murphy at ten o'clock this morning. So that when I saw him Murphy was aware of the intention of Peking to announce the release of the four United States airmen on Monday next, May 30th.

2. Cooper's report of his interview with Krishna Menon on May 27th,<sup>118</sup> or rather the message from Mr. Nehru which it conveyed, was substantially similar to the message from Mr. Nehru to you. There was, in addition, an introductory passage expressing the Prime Minister's judgment that Menon's mission had disclosed an important relaxation of tension, and the hope that advantage would be taken of the opportunity to engage in fruitful negotiations. There was this further difference, of course, the omission of the suggestion that we seek to persuade the Americans to avoid a provocative reaction. Murphy read Cooper's message to me, I think in full text.

3. Although Murphy's attitude exhibited his normal caution in committing himself, he was clearly very much interested in what we had to add to the information he already had. Since he himself was aware of the probability of Menon wishing to follow up his Peking visit by a trip to North America (there was reference in Cooper's message to conversations with the President and the Secretary of State — the implication being conversations with Menon), there was no point in my withholding reference to this prospect. I was therefore able to read to Murphy the whole of Mr. Nehru's message to you.

4. I also quoted largely from Williams' report (telegram EX-979) pointing out, however, that Williams himself was left in considerable doubt on a number of points and that not too much weight should be placed on certain of his impressions of what was in Menon's mind. We agreed that it was evident that Menon was not showing his whole hand.

5. I said that for our part we did hope that there would be no provocative reaction in the United States when news of the release of the four airmen became public. I drew attention to the fact that Mr. Nehru was not suggesting that the United States Government should "go overboard" enthusiastically. Nor did we suggest any such thing. The point was, we thought, to avoid saying things which might prejudice what appeared to be a disposition on the part of Peking further to lessen tension and to engage in some kind of negotiations looking toward a broader settlement. At the same time we fully realized the difficulties on the American side, and would not expect the Menon-sponsored flight of a single swallow to be greeted as the arrival of the full summer.

6. Murphy pointed out at once that the release of these four airmen alone — a cynical trafficking in hostages — would be little evidence of a change of heart. They were in a totally different category than the eleven against whom charges had been made and upon whom sentences had been pronounced. Furthermore there were some 24 other Americans under restraint in Communist China and a total of 481 unaccounted for. Again, whatever was said by the United States Administration, there was no way of preventing others (he instanced McCarthy) from reacting publicly with some violence.

7. Nevertheless, Murphy went on, we could rest assured that there would be no disposition on the part of the President (and the State Department) to say anything which would prejudice the possibilities of making progress in obtaining the release of the remaining Americans and indeed toward larger solutions. He told me that he would be working later in the day on a draft statement for the President (who is at Gettysburgh for this Memorial Day weekend — Dulles will be at Duck Island until next Thursday), and he promised to let us see the draft before it was issued. He suggested that the statement might be a simple "expression of gratification" at the release of the four.<sup>119</sup> This was a personal opinion on his part with which, of course, I heartily agreed.

8. You may take it that there will be no enthusiasm in Washington for a visit by Krishna Menon. Nevertheless, so far as Murphy is concerned, Americans will not allow their distaste for an individual to prevent their taking any opportunities which, otherwise, seem to offer grounds for hopeful negotiation. Murphy showed a good deal of interest in Williams' understanding that Menon had indicated that the Chinese Communists had suggested "that negotiations might start at a lower level" (Your telegram EX-979, paragraph 7(2)). This would obviously suit the United States book a good deal better. I pointed out that the meaning of this reference was pretty obscure. Menon might have in mind actual negotiations following an American journey on his own part.

9. There seems to be doubt as to the timing of the actual release. Mr. Nehru's message to the United States (as to us) mentions "the evening of the 30th May." On the other hand, Menon apparently told Williams that the news would be made public in Delhi "at a press conference to be held at about eleven o'clock on Monday May 30th and will be announced by Peking radio on the same day." Murphy and I agreed that there was real risk of the news breaking earlier over the weekend.

10. Incidentally, and finally, Murphy told me that a careful analysis of Peking broadcasts indicated in the last two weeks almost complete absence of any reference to the liberation of Formosa. Nevertheless the build-up on the coast opposite Quemoy and the Matsus continued, although not at an alarming pace.

RECOGNITION OF PEKING<sup>120</sup>

Mr. Dulles' recent statements on American negotiations with the Peking Government suggest that U.S. policy on China may be moving more rapidly than we had supposed or

A copy of this memo was given on April 30 to Mr. Gabites, N[ew] Z[ealand] Office, for transmission to Alistair McIntosh. A. M[enzies] expected.<sup>121</sup> The attitude of Senator George is only slightly less significant. It might be noted also that the New York Times of July 27 stated:

"Meanwhile at the Capitol the strongest backers of President Eisenhower's foreign policy were confident that a Foreign Ministers' meeting was on the way. There was no doubt of this in the mind of Senator Walter F. George, Democrat of Georgia, chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee."

In spite of Mr. Dulles' pious talk about remaining loyal to the Nationalist Chinese ally it does seem possible that, deliberately or not quite consciously, preliminary steps to at least de facto recognition are being taken. In view of the extreme delicacy of the question in domestic politics, it is also possible that the U.S. will not be able to discuss its policies very frankly with its friends and we shall, therefore, have to guess at what they might have in mind.

2. In view of these new developments, or assumed developments, we should perhaps have a new look at Canadian policy. It is by no means certain, of course, that the U.S. will in the near future recognize the Peking Government, but there is a good chance that it will do so, and we should be prepared for such an eventuality. If the U.S. does recognize Peking, I presume that Canada and most other countries will do likewise. The question arises, therefore, whether we wish to do so before or after the U.S. step is taken.

3. I presume that there would be less opposition to the move within Canada if it were taken after the U.S. than if it were taken before. There are, however, objections to our following the Americans or even to our joining in some prearranged simultaneous move with the U.S. and other Western countries. It has all too frequently been alleged that we have in our policy on recognition humbly followed the U.S. and not taken a position of our own. We have constantly denied this charge and have pointed to the clear differences in many ways between our policy towards China and that of the U.S. However, if we delay recognition until a short time after the U.S. or even till the same time, we should confirm in the minds of most people that the charge had been correct. Perhaps it does not matter very much what the Paraguayans or the Portuguese think of our policy, but it is of some importance that the Indians and the Chinese themselves respect and recognize our independence of approach.

4. Perhaps there is another argument for our preceding the Americans. Our policy has, I think, been based on the belief that recognition at some time was more or less inevitable. This view has been implied in public statements by the Prime Minister and yourself. If it is inevitable, there is a good deal to be said for getting on with it in order to clear the air and establish relations essential for at least co-existence. It is, of course, recognition by the U.S. which really matters. Recognition by Canada is of much less importance in the international scene. However, recognition by Canada could have an important effect in starting a process which might hasten considerably recognition by the U.S. You will recall a suggestion some time ago from Mr. Casey that Canada, Australia and New Zealand might at some suitable time take the important step of recognition and that in the right circumstances such a step would be welcomed secretly by at least some elements in the administration in Washington. It would probably be followed by similar action on the part of countries like France, Belgium, Mexico, Germany, Japan and prepare the way for the much more difficult step by the U.S.

5. Recognition by Canada would, of course, have the right effect in Washington only if it were not premature. Up to the present there has been good reason to think that it would be premature. American opinion would have reacted strongly against our recognition during the height of the Formosa crisis of last spring or in the emotional excitement over the American prisoners. We ourselves would have appeared inconsistent with our own declarations, furthermore, if we had recognized while the Chinese were still behaving in an obviously aggressive manner. The present period of détente, however, might be an appropriate time in which to settle this embarrassing question. Even if the situation should deteriorate later we need not regret having recognized because we would have taken the step necessary for us to deal more adequately with crises. We have not supported the theory that recognition means approval, and we have found diplomatic relations with other Communist countries like the Soviet Union useful in periods of emergency.

6. No one would be so bold as to say that the Chinese Communists have now clearly abandoned all aggressive intentions. Their behaviour at the moment, however, is less obviously offensive than it has been for some time in the past. They have been quiescent in Korea for some time. They may well be violating the Armistice Agreement in Korea by reinforcing the North Koreans; these charges have never been clearly proved, though I suppose we must accept that the North Koreans are receiving military assistance from China. As for Quemoy, Matsu and Formosa, they have not renounced their intention to use force, but they have been for some time less aggressive in their statements. Chou En-Lai, for instance, has been putting increasing emphasis on seeking a peaceful solution to the Formosa dispute. The present Chinese position is that the question is an internal Chinese matter, which does not concern the United States, but which is capable of solution by negotiation. On July 30, Chou proposed negotiations with the provincial authorities of Formosa, a proposal which represents the first explicit admission by the Chinese Communists that the dispute could be settled by negotiation with a governmental agency more or less closely associated with Chiang. There is also a good case to argue that their intentions vis-à-vis former Chinese territories must be considered in a different category from their behaviour towards Korea and Indochina. It is not certain in fact that this can be properly described as aggression. As for Indochina I think that on the whole it would be difficult to prove that the Chinese, during the past year, have misbehaved badly with regard to the Geneva Agreement. We have had good reason to complain against North Vietnamese behaviour, but in spite of what we know about the central control of international Communist policy we can hardly pin the blame on Peking. As for the importation of war materials from China into Vietnam, it would be difficult for Canada to charge that this has taken place. We suspect that there may have been movements, but the Commission has found no evidence and we have received no reliable proof from other sources.

7. None of this adds up to a clear argument to prove the virtue and innocence of the Peoples' Republic of China. It merely suggests that the arguments against recognition are no longer as strong as they were. We should be careful not to get ourselves into a position where we seem to be demanding positive proof of utter purity from any state we recognize. We do after all recognize the Bulgarians who behave like barbarians.

8. Another argument for recognition at this point is that this direct Canadian contact with China may serve some specific useful purposes. We know that the Chinese do look upon us as somewhat more reasonable and trustworthy than other Western powers without, at the same time having any doubt as to where we stand on major issues. The Indians, the Swedes and the British in Peking have performed useful services, but the Canadians might strengthen the team and perhaps be used for purposes which the others could not so easily perform. The Americans, for example, might rely on our representatives' reports more even than on those of the British. If we were to send so experienced, fluent, and well connected a man as Mr. Ronning it is conceivable that he might achieve a good deal. At the same time it might be valuable to have a Chinese representative in Ottawa whom we could seek to influence, (although we must bear in mind that he would be in a position to influence improperly our Chinese community.) Such contacts might prove particularly valuable over Indochinese questions during the next year when the future of the Geneva Agreement will be in the balance.

9. A very practical, if perhaps slightly sordid, motive for beating the pack to Peking has to do with property. One might assume that the Chinese would give us pretty benevolent assistance in finding places to live and work in Peking and perhaps a reasonable settlement of our property in Nanking if we took a lead in recognizing them. However, if we were to arrive in company with or shortly after several dozen other contenders, we might find ourselves on the top layer of an old pagoda.

10. There are, of course, arguments against such a step. There is the difficulty of breaking relations with the Nationalist Chinese. These relations, however, have been in a twilight state for some time, and it is doubtful if there would be much difficulty in concluding them. Canadian public opinion has never been very enthusiastic about the Chiang Kai-shek régime even when it has been least friendly to Peking. There might also be an argument against taking a move of this kind so soon after the Geneva Conference lest it be thought that we had been moved by a superficial optimism. It is unlikely, however, that any such step could or should take place for a few months at least. Recognition in the near future would raise the ticklish question of acceptance in the United Nations as well. The British, of course, have recognized but not pressed for acceptance in the U.N. and we presumably could do likewise. Nevertheless a step by us now would certainly cause renewed interest in the subject at the forthcoming Assembly, whereas there is a good deal to be said for not debating this issue this year in New York lest it exacerbate the relations between China and the U.S. at the wrong moment.

11. It has become evident recently that the French attitude to the problem is changing rapidly. About two weeks ago, Mr. Pinay said in the Conseil de la République that the Western powers who have not recognized Peking would have to give consideration to a positive decision in the more or less near future. Such action, however, should be taken in concert with all the Western powers concerned, and particularly the United States. In the meantime, the French Government envisages contacts with Peking on the economic and cultural plane. When our Embassy enquired of the Quai d'Orsay what was the background to Mr. Pinay's statement, we were informed that the French Government intends to move cautiously in the direction of closer contacts with China, and that a French Parliamentary delegation would visit Peking at the end of September subject to the agreement of the Peking authorities.

12. If there is a case for Canada's recognition of Peking, it seems that it might be wiser to put off such a step for a few months at least.<sup>122</sup> Such an important step would presumably have to be preceded by considerable discussions inside the country and with our Commonwealth friends. Concerted action with Australia and New Zealand might be desirable, and this would require some negotiations. It is a step which I presume the Cabinet would wish to discuss, and I presume, furthermore, that it is not a step which the Government would wish to take soon after the adjournment of Parliament. It may not be too soon, however, to look again at our policy on the subject and possibly to begin some tentative conversations with the Australians and New Zealanders.<sup>123</sup> In view of the importance of secrecy you might wish to begin by raising the subject in a personal letter to Mr. Casey.<sup>124</sup>

RECOGNITION OF CHINA

We have been giving some thought to the factors influencing the study of our policy towards China proposed in your speech in Vancouver.<sup>125</sup>

2. Your statement has attracted interest both in Canada and abroad, but the most notable feature of the reaction has been its mildness. No violent criticism has come to our attention, and the attitude of Washington seems so far to have been pretty temperate. Fairly clear-cut dissent has been expressed in two or three Canadian papers, but approval of your statement and implied approval of a policy of recognizing Peking in the near future has been expressed in such leading newspapers of both political parties as the Toronto Globe and Mail, Vancouver Province, Winnipeg Free Press, London Free Press, Kingston Whig Standard, and the Toronto Daily Star. There have, so far as we are aware, been no statements on the subject from any public men. One has the impression that the country as a whole does not feel very strongly one way or the other, but this lack of feeling may be partly attributable to the dog days.

3. Two other foreign ministers, Mr. Spaak and Mr. Casey, have shown strong interest in your statement and in the direction of your policy and would clearly like to bring their countries along to recognition of Peking in the near future in association with Canada. As Mr. Casey's views seem to be somewhat in advance of those of his colleagues, he would probably like Canadian support to convince them. We have had no reports on opposition on this subject to Mr. Spaak in Belgium, but our impression is that he himself might be prepared to move to recognition whether or not Canada does likewise. The French seem to favour moving towards recognition, but they are more concerned not to offend the Americans and also worried about the South Vietnam reaction.

4. It would seem the wisest policy to sit back for several months at least, encourage public debate, and watch developments in Geneva, Washington, Peking and perhaps even Phong Saly. There are events already in motion, however, which may force our hand

Note for Mr. Macdonnell: When Mr. Pearson gave me this on Sat[urday] at Burnett to return to you he said we should discuss the question with some of our other friends such as the Belgians. The formula he suggested was that we were re-examining our policy in the light of developments and that if these continued as they had, it may be difficult not to do something. J.W. H[olmes] somewhat. First and most imminent is the question of the Chinese seat in the U.N. Assembly.

5. Logically, any move towards recognition of Peking should be accompanied by a change in our policy in the United Nations in the direction of supporting their claim to membership. In view of your statement, a good deal of attention will no doubt be paid to our position. This may, however, be an occasion when it will not be politic to be logical, and for substantial political reasons we could adopt the British course of distinguishing between policy on recognition and policy in the United Nations. The State Department are continuing to insist on a moratorium resolution regarding Chinese membership at the forthcoming Assembly. They acknowledge, however, the possibility of a reduced majority. Our policy hitherto has been to support the resolution, and unless we alter it quickly we shall be doing so at this Assembly. A possible alternative to the moratorium resolution which was suggested to you in a recent memorandum, and which Mr. Spaak advocated to Mr. Hébert, is the appointment of an ad hoc committee of the Assembly which would review all aspects of the question including, inter alia, the possibility of determining that the Chinese aggression in Korea is now over.<sup>126</sup> Even if we had recognized beforehand, we would be no more inconsistent than the British if we supported the moratorium resolution. On the other hand, you may consider that the alternative proposal regarding a special ad hoc committee would be a useful card to have in reserve if an acerbitous debate on the moratorium resolution develops, or if a serious possibility arises that the usual majorities in its favour will this year be substantially reduced. It is unlikely that the United States could accept this proposal at the outset, but they might be able to accept it later on as an inevitable compromise.

6. If there were any likelihood of settling the question of the Chinese seat in the U.N. at the forthcoming Assembly, there would be an argument for switching our vote. There is no possibility, however, that the U.S. could yet accept Peking, and there is little to be said for doing so at this time against vigorous U.S. resistance. It is important, however, to endeavour to avoid too acrimonious a debate on the subject at this session, and this may well be an argument for our postponing any further action on recognition until after the Assembly.

7. There are certain other factors favouring delay:

(a) Your statement emphasized that there would be no precipitate action. You spoke of a reconsideration of our policy, and time should be allowed for study.

(b) Action too soon after the Summit Meeting might give the impression that our action was the result of a naive optimism about Communist policy. It may be prudent to wait and see what happens in Geneva at the bilateral U.S.-Chinese talks and at the Foreign Ministers' Meeting.

(c) It would hardly be possible to take a step of this kind before you leave for Moscow. To take action, however, shortly after you return from Moscow and New Delhi might give a wrong impression of the influences under which you acted.

(d) Mr. Sinclair's report on China will no doubt be important in reaching a decision. However, he is due in Ottawa only a few days before you depart, and you may wish to discuss the matter in Cabinet when he is present.<sup>127</sup>

<sup>127</sup> Sinclair est revenu d'une visite officielle en Union soviétique en passant par la République populaire de Chine en septembre 1955. Aucun rapport n'a été trouvé.
Sinclair returned from an official visit to the Soviet Union via the People's Republic of China in September 1955. No report was located.

8. Factors which, on the other hand, might encourage more rapid action are:

(a) It is none too certain that the détente in the Far East will last indefinitely. From Peking's point of view it must seem that the West has made no concession in return for their restraint. They may well have been persuaded by the Indians (partly no doubt because of your message last February about Mr. Dulles' intention) that if they held back over the off-shore islands, the Americans would by now have got Chiang Kai-shek off Quemoy and Matsu. They also no doubt see the Americans trying to scrap the armistice in Korea, persuading Diem to disregard the elections provisions of the Geneva Agreement in Vietnam, and no progress being made on their position in the U.N. or on trade restrictions. The Americans, on the other hand, say they cannot persuade Chiang to leave the islands, and there is little prospect of a change in U.S. policy in Vietnam, Korea, or the U.N. There are few concessions the West can make at this stage to encourage Peking to restraint. It is possible, however, that a move by Canada and a few other influential countries to break the logjam on recognition would give the Chinese some grounds to hope for improvements which are not brought about by force.

(b) The impatience of India with Western countries over this issue is undoubtedly an important factor in prejudicing it against other Western policies. We may well be in for a precarious period in our relations with India, particularly because of our position in Vietnam. A gesture towards China in the near future would undoubtedly alleviate Indian impatience with our policies.

(c) Your statement has placed you in a position of leadership on this issue, and many governments which believe in recognizing Peking but are more dependent than we on the good will of Congress are undoubtedly looking to you to make a move which would help them. It is possible that other countries — Belgium or Egypt, for example — will take the step regardless of what we do. In a matter of this importance, the maintenance of Canadian prestige should not be a governing factor, but, all else being equal, the chance might be seized for a Canadian initiative which could be a very substantial contribution to the amelioration of international relations.

(d) The important aspect of recognition by us would be its effect on American policy. If we are to take this step, therefore, it might be well to do it before the U.S. election year is far under way and American reactions become flippant and eccentric.

(e) If public discussion continues too long, positions tend to harden. Those who are now flexible and objective may dig themselves into partisan positions.

9. The above considerations do not touch the substance of the issue but only questions of timing. It is not assumed that the argument for recognition of Peking has been established; it is to be studied. If the decision is to be in favour of recognition, however, then these considerations apply. If we are to recognize, therefore, there is something to be said for tentatively setting a target date about the end of the year.<sup>128</sup> Such a date would be too late to stir up controversy in the Assembly and a respectable time after your return from Moscow and Delhi; it would allow a reasonable period for public discussion, precede by a few months the opening of the election campaign in the States and by a month or so the opening of Parliament. It might be in time to affect Chinese policy before they become rambunctious again. Needless to say, of course, a great deal can happen in the course of the next three months which would make more or less desirable our taking such a course.

I would much prefer that no tentative date be set. Would it not be wiser to agree on a period such as between the end of the year & the 1956 General Assembly? [J. Léger]

1578

10. A course to which we have been given some preliminary attention as a first step or as a possible compromise is the according of de facto recognition. A separate memorandum on this proposal is attached. There has not been time as yet for this to be studied by the Legal Division, and its conclusions, therefore, are put forward with reservations.

SECRET

RECOGNITION OF PEKING

One of the ways in which recognition of a state may be implied is a continuing line of conduct by the recognizing government towards the foreign government concerned. Without taking any of the formal and legal steps associated with full de jure recognition, it amounts to de facto recognition if, provided the recognizing government shows clear evidence of an intention to recognize, it pursues a course of action which might imply recognition. The recognition so implied may be either de facto or de jure, but since de facto recognition is an act as deliberate and formal as de jure recognition, there is no legal basis for implying de facto recognition more readily than de jure recognition. It may be permissible, however, to make a distinction between the two for purely political reasons or if there are unfulfilled conditions of international law.

2. In the light of this doctrine, it might be possible to suggest that the implication already be drawn from Canadian statements on recognition since, let us say, the conclusion of the Armistice in Korea, that we already recognize the Peking régime as the de facto government of the mainland. You or your colleagues have never said, for example, that we would not in any circumstances recognize the Peking Government so long as it remained a communist government. In your recent public statements, the problem has usually been treated as one of timing. You have said that recognition depends not on approval or disapproval of a government being recognized, but (in the case of Communist China) on that Government's pursuing a course of conduct which would result in a more favourable atmosphere for the re-consideration of our policy of non-recognition. In short, it has already been implied that once certain objective conditions have been fulfilled, full de jure recognition would be granted.

3. There may be other ways in which de facto recognition of Peking by Canada has been implied. Any incidents of contact with the Chinese Government, such as the negotiations concerning the release of Squadron-Leader MacKenzie and our participation in the Geneva Conference a year ago, while not in themselves constituting acts from which recognition could be implied, nonetheless do form part of the larger pattern of Canadian policy.<sup>129</sup> You might also recall that when the question of withdrawing recognition from the Nationalist Government was canvassed in 1951, we determined that if the Department were requested

Voir aussi/See also Volume 20, Document 50.

even then to provide a certificate regarding the respective jurisdictions of the Peking and Formosa governments, our certificate would have been given in accordance with the facts.<sup>130</sup>

4. If you consider that the possibility of according de facto recognition before de jure recognition is worth exploring, we could examine it carefully from all angles, including the legal ones. We might also seek Indian views on it, particularly as to whether the Peking Government would welcome such a start.

5. To give effect to de facto recognition would probably involve indicating the Government's intention to accord it, i.e., a public statement on the subject. The advantages, as we see them, of making such a statement before the opening of the General Assembly and before you leave for Moscow would be the following:

(a) You might find it useful in your talks in Moscow and New Delhi to have de facto recognition clearly on the record;

(b) It would indicate to the Chinese that we are not blind on this subject and would provide tangible evidence to the world at large of our long-term intentions;

(c) Since it might be possible to accord de facto recognition to Peking without concurrently withdrawing de jure recognition from the Nationalists, the question of the ultimate disposition of Formosa would be left open for further study in the light of developments, and might only need to be settled at the time we accord full de jure recognition to Peking. The disadvantages of publicly stating our position would also have to be carefully considered, particularly as de facto recognition might not have any marked effect on the conduct of the Peking régime and might only be regarded by them as an unnecessary delaying tactic. De facto recognition would also be a step which, while in accordance with the political and legal facts of the situation, might not be much easier than de jure recognition to revoke if the Peking Government should happen to attack Formosa.

RECOGNITION OF COMMUNIST CHINA

I thought you might like to know where we stand legally on this question. We have been exploring how close the Minister's public statements and our dealings with the Communist Chinese on such matters as Squadron/Leader MacKenzie's release might have brought us to de facto recognition of the Peking Régime. A related question was "How long a step would we have to take to make recognition an accomplished fact?"

2. The opinion of the Legal Division is that:

(a) Neither the Minister's statements nor any of our dealings with the Communist Chinese can be held to constitute recognition. Recognition is a matter of intention and we have not intended by our past acts or statements to extend de facto recognition.

(b) We are in a position to extend de facto recognition any time we consciously choose to do so; we could adduce our doubts about the willingness of the Peking Régime to fulfil its international obligations as a reason for continuing to withhold de jure recognition.

(c) We would not have to explain publicly why we chose to extend de facto instead of de jure recognition.

3. The possibility that it would have been useful to the Minister in his talks at Moscow and New Delhi to have de facto recognition a matter of record was our chief reason for toying with the idea in the first place. I am, therefore, inclined to think that we should now abandon the notion of extending de facto recognition as an intermediate step.<sup>131</sup> If the Chinese should get the impression that our recognition policy towards them is equivocal and hedged about with private reservations, it is not likely to enhance the atmosphere in which we shall be dealing with them once we are established in Peking. We should rather think in terms of extending full de jure recognition without any reservations whenever we take the basic decision to recognize. In the meantime, however, this exercise has clarified our present legal position quite considerably.

CHINA POLICY

At the meeting of consultation on December 5<sup>132</sup> the points of view of our two Governments on the China situation were restated; in particular on (a) the recognition of Communist China, and (b) the offshore islands and Formosa. The divergence of views was noted. More important perhaps was our agreement that this divergence be examined having in mind the capital which might be made by the Communists (not alone in China) of a split in the free world's ranks.

2. There was no elaboration at the meeting of what might follow on this recognition of a divergence of attitude. It occurs to us that the time may have come for us to put to the State Department with some precision and on paper (albeit informally) a fully rounded statement of the Canadian position on China. It can of course, be argued that the Canadian attitude has been stated on a number of occasions both in public and in private. Such statements have tended, however, to relate to specific aspects or situations rather than to the problem as a whole. Perhaps then we should take the opportunity following naturally from this recent meeting of consultation to set out our whole case.

I agree. After the Minister's return we might have a somewhat clearer picture. J. L.[éger]

3. The principal object of such an exercise, as we see it, would not be so much an attempt to bring about a radical change in current United States China Policy, no matter how much we might welcome some change; it would be two-fold; (a) to clear up any misunderstanding of our own position which may still exist in the State Department; and (b) to find out exactly wherein our views diverge from those of the United States. We should have in mind the question: why is it that, while the Canadian and United States Governments agree on many of the basic facts of the China situation, our separate processes of thought lead us to differing conclusions on specific aspects of the problem? We agree on the Communist orientation of the leaders in Peking. Our ideas on the threat which an expansionist China poses to the interests of the free world in Asia are similar; what differences exist in our views in this context are more of degree than of substance. Our appreciations of the strategic importance of Formosa are not greatly different. Neither of us believe that the nationalists on Formosa should be thrown to the wolves. This in turn leads to a measure of likemindedness on some future separate existence for Formosa. Yet at the end of this logical train of agreed thought we differ on the important matter of recognition and on the desirability of defending the offshore islands. It would seem as well that there is some difference of outlook between us on the desirability of military pacts such as SEATO and on the application in specific instances of the policy of containment of Communist China.

4. Upon a number of occasions when policy towards China has been discussed between Canadian and United States representatives, the customary phrase "we understand one another's position" has been used. We have a somewhat uneasy feeling that, on the United States side at least, the correct phrase might rather be "we take note of your positions". That is to say we are by no means satisfied that U.S. authorities really comprehend the logical process by which we have reached our conclusions.

5. It seems to us therefore, that on a matter of such critical importance and of such complexity as the China problem, it is essential that, on each side, we appreciate fully wherein Canadian and United States views diverge and why. It might not be too sanguine to hope that, if State Department officials were confronted with a well-argued and complete case for the Canadian point of view and required to indicate wherein they disagreed with specific steps in our argument, they would be impelled to do some re-thinking of their own position. We are not certain that United States officials, let alone outsiders, understand where current United States China policy is supposed to [lead in] the future.

6. The kind of paper we have in mind would distinguish between recognition of Communist China, and the threat of Chinese expansionism (particularly with respect to Formosa and the off-shore islands). It is, of course, obvious that these are elements of a single problem but it is possible, we think, to look upon them as separate if interwoven strands. And it can be argued that these two elements in the same situation could be treated by different methods. In other words, it may be possible to recognize the Communist Chinese Government for what it is — the Government in effective control of the mainland of China — while at the same time recognizing the need for a policy of containment of Chinese aggressive tendencies by drawing a line (preferably a defensible one) in the Formosa Straits.

7. With the above considerations in mind, we have tried our hand at an outline of a paper. This outline is included in our immediately following teletype. We should add that it is by no means a complete outline even of our own thinking. We have not mentioned the question of Chinese Communist representation in the United Nations, although presumably it should be touched on in any such paper. Certainly the paper does not include all the considerations which would be apparent in Ottawa. There is no mention of what possible further commitments Canada might be prepared to assume in the area with a view to making some change in current United States policy easier. We have deliberately excluded any discussion of United States views. The main lines of United States thinking you know and, in any case, the paper we have in mind would be primarily a full statement of the Canadian case. The outline we submit then is only an illustration of what we have in mind in the event that you considerable favourably our general suggestion that some such statement of the Canadian position could usefully be brought to the attention of United States authorities at this time. At a later stage, if you think there is merit in our recommendation, we should like to offer some suggestions as to the tactics involved, i.e., the level at which we should approach the State Department, the timing of the presentation of our views, and the degree of formality of the Canadian paper.

CHINA POLICY

The paper might begin with an outline of the basic elements of agreement between the Canadian and United States Governments. The present Government on the Chinese mainland is a revolutionary Government. Its leaders are doctrinal Communists. They share both the enthusiasms and the misapprehensions of all Communists regarding the Western world. There is a close working partnership between Peking and Moscow which, for the time being at least, has glossed over the natural differences which traditionally have existed between China and Russia. The goal of the Peking régime may well be to gain influence over the whole of Asia; this partly because of the militant evangelism of Communist doctrine and partly for the fundamentally nationalist reason of a desire to extend Chinese power and influence. It is in our general interest and that of the free world to ensure that these expansionist Chinese tendencies be kept within reasonable bounds.

2. The paper might then go on to examine in general terms the main elements in Canadian thinking. A rigid and inflexible policy of military [containment] combined with the attempt to isolate the Peking régime politically (and for the moment economically as well) from the non-communist world was likely to increase rather than modify whatever aggressive tendencies (whether doctrinal or nationalist) are ascribed to the Peking régime. There was a good deal to be said for deliberately establishing contacts with Communist China, while at the same time maintaining a strong position in defence of essential free world interests. If our difficulties stemmed, in part, from lack of understanding on the part of the Chinese Communist leaders of the real objectives and strength of the free world, there must be something to be said for an attempt to expose them to the facts of life at close quarters. The present "stand-offishness" tends to confirm the preconceptions of the Communist Chinese concerning the West, and particularly concerning the United States.

3. The paper might then deal with recognition and the problem of Formosa and the offshore islands separately. On recognition, the Canadian position might be restated, namely, the traditional historical position that recognition of a government does not involve approval. It is a fact, however unpleasant, that a Communist Government controls the mainland of China. It should be possible to explain a policy of recognition without approval of the régime in Peking in a way which would keep to a minimum the injurious effect of recognition on the morale of smaller non-communist States in Asia and the overseas Chinese population of Southeast Asia. Recognition would not necessarily involve any change in the policy of military containment of Chinese expansionism. Support could still be promised and rendered to the fledgling independent states of Asia against any avaricious Chinese designs.

4. Turning then to Formosa and the offshore islands, the view might be expressed that it was possible to draw a firm military line in the area without insisting on a crusade for the destruction of Communism or indeed for the overthrow of the Communist Government of mainland China. At the moment the NATO concept was simply not applicable in the Far East. The states neighbouring on China had neither the resources nor the will to combine in the face of a potential enemy. Indeed, many of these states did not recognize China as the potential enemy. In the circumstances, therefore, the military line should be drawn in the fashion which would least disturb the susceptibilities of such a friendly Asian state as India. No doubt there would be a divergence in this context between political and strategic requirements. Some compromise would be essential. In considering Formosa and the offshore islands it was possible to argue that both our military and political requirements could be met with very little change in current strategy. The offshore islands at the moment are difficult to defend whether militarily or politically. A successful military defence of the islands would, willy-nilly, involve the United States and, perhaps automatically, the free world would be at the "brink of the chasm". Politically, many states regarded the offshore islands as part of the mainland.

5. The regroupment of Chinese nationalist forces on Formosa would put the straits between the opposing forces. If the Chinese Communists had aggressive intentions they would have to declare themselves more completely in these circumstances than was currently the case. There was a certain amount of sympathy even in Asia for a separate existence for Formosa divorced from mainland control. Withdrawal from the offshore islands was not retreat and an explanation of such a withdrawal might be made to appear as a consolidation to a position of greater strength and not as a retreat in the face of superior force. The face-to-face confrontation of opposing forces at the moment was almost bound to provoke fighting and perhaps in a manner which would not suit the long-term interests of the free world. If there was merit in drawing a firm line of containment, it was reasonable to draw the line in such a fashion as to achieve the maximum military advantage with the minimum political disadvantage.

6. These then are a few ideas which have occurred to us here. We might stress (again?) that we are less concerned at the moment in developing the exact arguments which might appear in the Canadian paper. Our main interest has been to put before you the suggestion that we should submit to the State Department in the not too distant future a full outline of the Canadian position on China. The kind of step by step joint appraisal of the China situation which we believe might result from such an initiative on our part would, we believe, serve a useful and, indeed, an essential purpose.

CHINA POLICY

When, in my conversation with the Secretary of State this morning, we had disposed of the U.N. new members (my telegram 2068),† we went on to discuss in more general terms the problem of consultation between our two Governments. Mr. Dulles, once more, emphasized the importance which he and the State Department attached to the closest possible contact with us, particularly respecting subjects upon which our attitudes might diverge.

2. Given this opportunity, and because I had raised previously with Merchant in a purely personal way the suggestion put forward in our telegram No. 2051 of December 16, I then put to Mr. Dulles, very tentatively and on my own responsibility, the outline of our proposal. I said that at the moment you were considering whether or not to suggest that we sit down and examine together the processes by which our respective attitudes on China had been reached and the elements of which our respective policies were composed. I went on to say that it occurred to us in the Embassy here that such a deliberate and informal exercise might be of value on both sides.

3. Mr. Dulles reacted very favourably and without hesitation. He said that it was of great importance that we should discuss and examine our differences (and he referred particularly to the Far East with a view to seeing whether they could not be composed). Frequently there were differing appreciations of fact which led to conflicting conclusions. Years ago, when he was advising the State Department in connection with Japanese Treaty, he had been "brash" enough to suggest in a meeting that a similar effort be made to prevent U.K. and U.S. policies coming into conflict in the Far East. This would have been a useful exercise because U.K.-U.S. differences had operated to frustrate the objectives of both governments. But it had not been undertaken.

4. Canada and the United States, Mr. Dulles went on, should profit by experience. He would be glad to have a joint study, such as I had suggested, undertaken. It would have to be more than a "one shot" exercise — rather a continuing process (after the first thorough-going joint examination had been made).

5. I said that, when I had heard from you on the subject, I would be in touch with the State Department and, if you had given your approval, would then consult his advisers on the next procedure to adopt. Both Hoover and Merchant were present during this conversation and I told them that they would be hearing from us before very long.

6. In view of the Secretary's favourable reaction I am satisfied that we should push on and see what can be accomplished. At the worst, as I said to Merchant afterwards, we will have a better understanding of the reasons which have led us to different conclusions.

CHINA POLICY

In view of the interest — and I hope it will be an active and continuing interest — shown by the Secretary of State in a joint examination of our respective policies on China, I have agreed that work should begin here on a paper setting forth the Canadian viewpoint and what we understand to be the main points of conflict with the United States position. One such paper relating primarily to the future of Formosa and the offshore islands questions has been under preparation for some time, but it will need to be broadened in scope to be appropriate for the kind of consultation now proposed. My own inclination is to see what conclusions we reach before finally deciding whether to approach the Americans and at what level. Quite frankly, the problem which most concerns us is the difficulty of conducting really useful consultations on China if the Robertson-dominated element in the State Department are speaking for the other side. We shall have to ensure that the consultations amount to something more than a convenient opportunity for the American side to criticize particular aspects of Canadian policy while paying only passing attention to the fundamental differences in approach which have led our policies to diverge. I have the impression that Robertson and most of his Far Eastern advisers are not really free agents to discuss anything but the established United States policy on China — an important element of which has been to keep her allies in line — and that in an election year they are likely to be even less flexible than usual. On the other hand, Mr. Dulles' personal interest is encouraging and might have a salutary effect on the people with whom we would be dealing. If you would like to send us your views on this particular aspect of the problem at an early stage it would be quite helpful.

2. As to timing, I expect that it will take us at least a month to get ready. I hope that this is not too much longer than you were contemplating when you spoke to Dulles and Merchant, but as this will be by no means a simple exercise, I am anxious that it be handled on the Canadian side with plenty of care and preparation.

CHINA POLICY

Your telegram under reference leaves us with the impression that perhaps we failed in some measure in our telegrams 2051 and 2052 of Dec. 16 to make clear the main purpose which we had in mind in suggesting a Canadian initiative on the matter of China policy discussions with the State Department. Too prominent mention in our recent telegrams on this matter of "points of agreement and disagreement between Canadian and United States policy" may perhaps have been responsible.

2. The difficulty may in part also be a problem of words. What we had in mind was not so much consultation but rather an exposition of views. In our view the main reason for the discussions we have suggested would be to achieve a fuller understanding of each other's position. In that sense the discussions might be thought of in terms of Canada-U.S. relations rather than in terms of the China policies of our two governments. It might be helpful if we were to set out schematically the various phases of the initiative as we would envisage them:

- (i) the discussion at the meeting of consultation on December 5;
- (ii) preliminary consideration in Ottawa and Washington of next steps;
- (iii) further informal discussions with the State Department on the nature of the exercise;
- (iv) exposition of each other's views on the basis of prepared papers;
- (v) preliminary discussion of the papers to ensure full understanding of their meaning;
- (vi) discussion of the substance of the papers with a view to the possible harmonizing of divergencies.

3. We might offer further brief comment on each of these phases. Phase (i) has been completed. At the meeting on December 5 senior officials of our two governments agreed that a serious look should be taken at our separate policies with respect to China. The meetings of consultation are in themselves indicative of the degree of cooperation between the Canadian and United States Governments. If they are to continue to be useful, action should be taken to follow up agreements in principle which are arrived at in the course of the meeting. One such agreement in principle, that on alerts procedure, has been followed up. It happened that the political question on which further action was called for was China policy.

4. Phase (ii) has been embarked upon. You have expressed some general interest in the idea of a joint examination of our respective policies on China although we note from your telegram under reference that you wish to conclude your examination of Canadian policy before finally deciding whether to approach the United States Government. Mr. Dulles, in speaking to the Ambassador (our 2069 of Dec. 21), reacted favourably to the idea of a joint examination of policy and also took the view that we should not have in mind a "one-shot exercise". Our suggestions for a Canadian initiative in the matter were based, as we stated in our telegram 2051, on our uneasy feeling that United States authorities may not fully comprehend the logical process by which Canadian conclusions have been reached. The essential purpose of the exercise would be the exchange of information.

5. Phase (iii) would come if you decide finally that an approach should be made to the State Department, such an approach to take place a few weeks before arrangements were made to present our paper. In this phase the object would be to delimit the exercise. We agree entirely with you that we should ensure that our initiative is met with a like response from the United States side. We should not simply set our policy up as a target for impromptu criticism.

6. Phase (iv) would involve the exchange of papers. We think it would be unproductive if either of the papers underlined the main points of conflict between the Canadian and United States positions. They will become apparent upon comparison of the two national papers. We would not expect that there would be much discussion of the papers at this stage.

7. Phase (v) would still be essentially exploratory and informative. It could not be expected that papers written separately would necessarily cover exactly the same ground nor is it likely that the import of all the arguments in the separate papers would be immediately apparent. There would be some need, therefore, for oral elaboration of the papers, and possibly some modifications in their drafting could usefully follow.

8. Phase (vi), of course, would be the most difficult. At this stage there would probably be criticism of particular aspects of each other's policies. This does not strike us, however, as something to be avoided. Constructive criticism is always helpful and destructive criticism cannot harm a good case. It is our view, however, that at this stage effective consultation could take place for by that time each side should understand the other's attitude. It might prove that each side still chose to follow its original policy unchanged. It is not impossible that there are two equally valid methods of dealing with the China problem — one most appropriate for Canada and the other for the United States — which, if properly meshed, would constitute the strongest policy for the alliance vis-à-vis Communist China. The success of the discussions as a whole would in our view be measured more in terms of the understanding reached between the two sides rather than in any agreement on policy which they might achieve.

9. In the initial phases, as we saw them, the personalities on the United States side, and indeed the fact that 1956 is an election year in the United States, would not be of major importance. Our idea is that each side should examine the fully-stated case of the other, with the primary view of understanding it. Personalities and circumstances cannot impinge too sharply on statements of fact. Only in the last phase, when it came to making suggestions for harmonizing the cases, would such factors affect the ease or difficulty of the discussions.

10. In your telegram under reference you asked for our views on this question of personalities and circumstances. These are questions on which it is difficult to offer firm advice for they are essentially matters of opinion rather than of fact. With this difficulty in mind, then, we might offer our comments on your concern at the difficulty of conducting really useful discussions on China "if the Robertson-dominated element in the State Department is speaking for the other side." This phrasing suggests a belief that Robertson's views are in some sense different from the views of the United States Government. In our opinion they are not. We have suggested (our 1619 of Sept. 22,† for example) that perhaps Dulles is somewhat more flexible in his personal views on China than Robertson. We have never suggested, and we have seen no evidence, that there is conflict between the views of the two men when they speak in their official capacities. In other words, Robertson (and his officials, of course) when speaking officially voice the established policy of the United States Government. Until that policy is changed, we cannot expect him or his subordinates to do otherwise. We might have that policy — including the idea that the allies of the United States should stay on the team — explained more attractively and informally by other senior officers of the State Department. They could not be expected, however, to depart substantially from established United States policy.

11. Perhaps it would be useful if we mentioned a specific example of the kind of exchange of views which we have in mind, and this a recent one. We believe that the memorandum which we left with the State Department on political objectives in Laos (your Y-2048 of Dec. 5)<sup>133</sup> was close to what we have in mind with respect to the China problem. We believe that the State Department was inclined prior to receipt of that memorandum to question the wisdom of some of our specific moves on the Commission in Laos primarily because officials could not be brought to understand how these actions fitted a logical pattern. The effect of our presentation of the memorandum, therefore, was to make more apparent the reasons for specific Canadian actions. More, however, was achieved than simply this. In the United States response which was finally made to our memorandum (our 2084 of Dec. 23/55)<sup>134</sup> the State Department was forced admit the strength of our case and to modify certain United States views on the matter. Our explanation did not, of course, bring about a complete change in United States views on the matter of the link between the settlements in Laos and Vietnam. The upshot, however, was to clear away misunderstanding which might have existed between us on the question, and which might at some stage have arisen to bedevil Canada-U.S. relations. Our paper on China policy would be a good deal more complex than was the case with the Laos paper under reference but in our view it would not be essentially different in nature.

12. While in principle it would, we think, not be wise to let this project grow cold, we would share your view that the Canadian paper on China policy should not be rushed. It is important that it be a complete and careful statement of our position if it is to have the kind of impact on the State Department which we would wish.

WITHDRAWAL OF CANADIAN TROOPS FROM KOREA<sup>135</sup>

It has been suggested that the forthcoming Commonwealth Prime Ministers' Conference might provide the occasion for a useful discussion to determine the conditions in accordance with which a final withdrawal of Commonwealth troops from Korea could be accomplished. (Letter to Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs from Chairman, Chiefs of Staff of December 30, 1954, † copy attached.)

2. Canada's military contribution to the Korean conflict resulted from obligations accepted by this country under the terms of two United Nations resolutions. On June 27, 1950 the Security Council recommended by resolution that "the members of the United Nations furnish such assistance to the Republic of Korea as may be necessary to repel the armed attack and to restore international peace and security in the area". On July 7 it approved another resolution calling on all members providing military forces to make them available to a Unified Command under the United States. In a note to the Secretary General of the United Nations dated September 26, 1950 our Permanent Representative stated that the Canadian Army's Special Force, upon reaching a satisfactory state of training, would "be made available for combat service with the United Nations Forces in Korea as required".<sup>136</sup>

3. The extent of our present military commitment if the armistice should collapse as a result of further aggression from North Korea is delineated by a sentence contained in the Warning Declaration signed on July 27, 1953 shortly after the conclusion of the Armistice Agreement by the representative of Canada and of the other fifteen nations which had participated in the United Nations military effort. This sentence reads: "We affirm in the interests of world peace that if there is a renewal of the armed attack challenging again the principles of the United Nations we should again be united and prompt to resist."<sup>137</sup>

4. Canada might be considered to have some responsibility deriving from the provision of the Armistice Agreement which enjoins the military commanders of both sides to protect the Neutral Nations Supervisory Commission (NNSC) and its inspection teams. This task could not be left to South Korea in view of its hostility towards the Commission and its instruments generally, and their Czech and Polish members particularly, and its refusal to recognize the continued existence of the Armistice Agreement.

See Canada, Department of External Affairs, External Affairs, Volume 5, No. 9, September 1953, p. 268.

5. Our support of the United Nations objectives in Korea is a matter of record. The General Assembly most recently reaffirmed these by a resolution of December 11, 1954, to which we subscribed: they remain "the achievement by peaceful means of a unified, independent and democratic Korea under a representative form of government and the full return of international peace and security in the area".

6. Would the withdrawal of our troops from Korea be consistent with the obligations we have assumed there?

7. It might be argued that in the absence of a Korean settlement, those Commonwealth countries which have been most conscious of their responsibilities as members of the United Nations should leave at least token forces in Korea to guard what has already been achieved by the United Nations there. The Armistice Agreement, although binding on both sides until superseded by another mutually acceptable agreement, is still an interim arrangement and the Commonwealth countries which sent troops to Korea to further United Nations objectives should not withdraw them all until it is quite clear that their presence no longer serves a useful purpose. There is still no peace in Korea, and United Nations objectives have yet to be realized.

8. On the other hand, it could be said that the withdrawal of our troops would be consistent with our obligations for the following reasons:

(a) The Union of South Africa, which assumed the same obligations relating to Korea that we did, has withdrawn its military contribution without being criticized as having shirked any responsibilities. Of the non-Commonwealth countries concerned, Colombia, Luxembourg and the Netherlands have withdrawn all their troops, also without being subjected to adverse criticism.

(b) The words of the Warning Declaration quoted in paragraph 3 do not say how we should be prompt to resist in the event of a renewed communist attack and therefore we cannot be regarded as having to leave troops in the area to meet this obligation.

(c) As the Canadian representative stated before the General Assembly on August 19, 1953 "all that the United Nations ever undertook to do by armed force has been accomplished. The aggression has been repelled."<sup>138</sup>

(d) Only a distorted interpretation of United Nations objectives would require us to leave military forces in the Korean theatre indefinitely. We have met our obligation to seek a peacefully united Korea through our attendance at the Geneva Conference and will continue to meet it through the appropriate instrumentality of the United Nations which remains seized of the problem. Presumably, the two United Nations objectives are consistent with each other. Thus if Korea is to be unified peacefully then peace and security in the area cannot be restored by force. Moreover, while the Armistice Agreement is not a peace treaty, it has made for a cessation of hostilities. Finally, the phrase "restoration of international peace and security in the area" should be considered a broad one, with at least as many political as military implications.

(e) Concerning the protection of the NNSC, no particular responsibility seems to devolve on this country. The Canadian view has been that the two sides of the Armistice Agreement consist of the communist powers on the one hand and the United Nations on the other. The General Assembly has approved of the Armistice Agreement. Therefore, it would seem to follow that Canada has no more responsibility concerning the NNSC than any other United Nations member which supported the resolution approving the Agreement. It might be argued that Canada having contributed troops during the fighting has less responsibility to keep them there to protect the NNSC than a country which has consistently supported United Nations objectives by its vote in the General Assembly but has not sent any forces. Finally, there is a strong possibility that either the Swiss or Swedes, or the United States, will take action in the near future either to reduce the NNSC to little more than a token organization or to render it inoperative at least in South Korea.

See United Nations, Official Records of the General Assembly, Seventh Session, First Committee, 615th Meeting, August 19, 1953, pp. 709-710.

9. It might be mentioned here that the withdrawal of our troops probably need not entail the recall of the Canadian destroyer now on duty in the Korean theatre. The destroyer by remaining there in these circumstances could provide concrete evidence that we were not neglecting our military obligations.

10. Is it now opportune to take up with the Commonwealth countries concerned the question of withdrawal of forces with a view to subsequent consultations with the United States? The following arguments may be listed in support of an affirmative answer:

(a) The armistice has become more of a fixed reality. The Geneva Conference provided evidence that the United States on the one hand and the Soviet Union and Communist China on the other were prepared to live with the situation resulting from the Armistice Agreement. Communist China has followed the United States lead in South Korea and has reduced substantially its forces in North Korea. The danger of President Rhee breaching the armistice in a manner calculated to bring about a resumption of hostilities has declined, and there is no evidence that the North Korean régime has further direct aggressive designs.

(b) Differences between Canada and the Republic of Korea (ROK) as to the principles upon which the unification of Korea should be based became evident during the Geneva Conference and since that time certain ROK authorities have on occasion misrepresented Canadian views.<sup>139</sup> Thus in November this country and the United Kingdom were falsely accused of seeking to promote in the General Assembly a compromise election plan for unifying Korea which would involve an international commission, on which communist states would be represented, to supervise elections throughout Korea. A demonstration against this alleged plan of some 20,000 Koreans was organized in Seoul. According to radio reports the Korean Foreign Minister has since explained to the National Assembly that he was able to prevent the plan from being put forward through his activities in New York. In these circumstances it is doubtful that the ROK Government attaches the same importance to the continued presence of Canadian troops as it did, say, during the period immediately following the armistice.

(c) The United States has not informed us of its future military plans relating to Korea. We do know, however, that the United States is building up ROK military strength and that it intends to reduce its forces to one division next spring. The concern of the United States with the Korean problem goes beyond the concern of Canada which is that of a responsible member of the United Nations. Korea represents but part of the pattern of United States defence interests in the Western Pacific. Basic to these interests is the concept of mobility. However, the continued stationing of our troops in Korea would seem to impede our defence mobility. Recently the ROK and the United States ratified a mutual defence treaty, which was signed as long ago as August 8, 1953. Under the treaty the United States has the right to bases in Korea and the treaty should form the basis of future United States contingents to have troops in Korea should not unduly inhibit us from taking our forces out.

(d) The continued presence of our troops in Korea inhibits us to a considerable extent from expressing views in the United Nations and elsewhere concerning the Korean problem may be solved. Such presence tends to put a premium on our conforming with the United States-ROK views in the matter.

11. Do other Commonwealth countries wish to withdraw their troops?

12. It may be that New Zealand, the United Kingdom and Australia will wish to retain present forces in Korea for eventual employment of some of them as a strategic reserve in the Southeast Asia area. There seems no reason why Canada should agree to leave troops indefinitely to support this objective, since the territory most likely to form the eventual base in Malaya, and a speedy transfer of troops there should pose no insuperable obstacles. Although Canada is not a member of the Southeast Asia Defence Organization, we are making an important contribution to peace and security in the treaty area through our membership on the three International Supervisory Commissions in Indochina — a contribution which has made for a relatively large drain on our officer strength.

13. Should the other Commonwealth countries concerned strongly wish to keep troops in Korea, then the question arises of whether we should unilaterally cut back the strength of our ground forces. Since this would involve a delicate matter of Commonwealth relations, it would require further reflection. Perhaps our leaving of an ambulance unit might meet the requirements of the situation.

14. If the Commonwealth countries concerned favour a troop withdrawal to what extent should the United States be pressed to concur in this view?

15. Perhaps the United States, wanting at least token United Nations military representation to remain in Korea, will wish such representation to come from Commonwealth countries. In addition to advancing such United Nations considerations as that it is yet too early for Commonwealth troops to withdraw, the United States may argue that the implementation of this action while its own forces remain will create domestic political problem. The United States having borne the brunt of the fighting in Korea and still having by far the greatest number of foreign troops there, deserves to have its views given careful consideration. Nevertheless, since a good case can be made out that continued stationing of United States troops in Korea is partly dependent on United States interests lying outside the United Nations frame of reference, the Commonwealth might pursue a rather firm line in Washington. If, however, discussions there should indicate the desirability of our maintaining some troops rather than, or in addition to, naval representation in Korea along with the other Commonwealth powers concerned, then there would seem to be political merit in the suggestion of the Chairman, Chiefs of Staff that only our Field Ambulance Unit should be left.

Dear Jules [Léger],<sup>140</sup>

I assume that you will have seen Air Vice Marshal Smith's telegram to General Foulkes (CJS(L)42 of February 9th<sup>141</sup> reporting on the meeting at the Commonwealth Relations Office regarding reduction of the Canadian commitment in Korea.

We have now received the enclosed note on this meeting, circulated by the C.R.O., addressed to Ross Martin. I have had an extra copy made for your files, and should be grateful if you would pass on the original.

As you will see, this note is not quite an accurate account of what transpired, since it leaves the impression that all at the meeting had agreed that it would be bad tactics to approach the United States at this time, and that it would therefore be best to delay this approach, and since it quotes Air Vice Marshal Smith as saying that his Government would probably continue with its present arrangements for the relief of the Canadian battalion. In fact, these were questions which were to be left for Ministers to consider, and Smith is getting in touch with the C.R.O. to correct any misconceptions they may have.<sup>142</sup>

Yours sincerely,

New Zealand

Mr. A.D. McIntosh

The meeting was called at Canadian request to consider the possibility of further reduction or withdrawal of the Commonwealth forces from Korea.

Sir Saville Garner said that there had been a brief reference to this at the meeting on Friday, 4th February, between the United Kingdom, Australia and New Zealand. The Foreign Secretary had remarked that the Commonwealth could not really afford to keep forces locked up in Korea indefinitely.

Air Vice Marshal Smith said that Canada had in Korea one battalion and one field ambulance. The battalion was due to be replaced on the 1st April. The Canadian Government was under promise that troops would not serve in Korea for more than one year. Reliefs would have to sail within a week if this promise was to be kept. If the Commonwealth forces were to be further reduced or withdrawn in the near future, it would be a needless expense to despatch a new battalion.

Mr. McIntosh said that New Zealand maintained a transport unit of about 400 men, which cost about £900,000 per annum. They were only too anxious to get rid of this commitment. What they did in Malaya was contingent on this. The United States was pulling out of Korea fast with the aim of getting down to about one division.

Sir Saville Garner pointed out that there was a difference between United States' reduction to a division and the Commonwealth withdrawing altogether. It would be essential to consult the United States first.

Mr. Tange confirmed that Australia too would gladly be rid of the Korea commitment of one battalion.

Mr. Clark suggested that it was not a very good moment, with the question of Formosa and the islands on the boil, to go to the United States with a proposition for immediate withdrawal. There was a good deal to be said for leaving the approach to the Americans for a week or two. It would also be an advantage to be able to explain to them the intentions of the United Kingdom, Australia and New Zealand over a Strategic Reserve in Malaya and to advance this as a reason for Commonwealth withdrawal from Korea.

Sir Saville Garner summed up the U.K. view as:

- (1) withdrawal of Commonwealth forces from Korea was justifiable on military grounds to enable other pressing obligations to be met;
- (2) but politically it would be bad tactics to approach the United States right now with a request for a decision in a week; and
- (3) it would be best to delay the approach for a little.

He also expressed the hope, shared by the Australian and New Zealand representatives, that Canada would not, in the circumstances, act unilaterally over its contingent.

Sir Saville Garner suggested a further meeting in London in about a week's time to take the matter further.

REDUCTION OF COMMONWEALTH FORCES IN KOREA

Following is text of telegram JH5 dated 25th February to United Kingdom Chiefs of Staff from C.I.G.S. on tour at Singapore. Begins.

Foreign Secretary raised question of withdrawal of Commonwealth forces from Korea during discussions with Dulles on 24th February (i.e. at Bangkok). I urged complete withdrawal, but the two Secretaries of State decided it was important for political reasons for Commonwealth to maintain a token force. I then suggested next step should be agreement between Commonwealth countries concerned on size and composition of force, followed by parallel approach to United States J.C.O.S., Foreign Secretary agreed.

2. As retention of Commonwealth forces in Korea will henceforth be dictated solely by political considerations, I consider that full requirement can from now on be met by an army contingent only, with a strength not greater than a battalion group. I suggest that military representatives in London of Australia, Canada and New Zealand should be brought together urgently to work out composition of the contingent preparatory to an early approach to Americans. Australia and New Zealand military advisers here have agreed this method of handling. Ends.

3. (Ottawa, Canberra, Wellington) Please consult Commonwealth authorities and seek their urgent concurrence to proposal for early meeting in London of Commonwealth military representatives. Three High Commissioners in London have been informed.

WITHDRAWAL OF FORCES FROM KOREA

Following our discussion this afternoon, I spoke on the phone to Brigadier Rothschild. I pointed out our misgivings about the CRO message and indicated that we would not consider ourselves committed in advance by any agreement which Sir Anthony Eden might have reached in Bangkok with Mr. Dulles. It was our view that the Canadian representatives at the meetings in London should consider themselves free to take any position in accordance with our national policy. Brigadier Rothschild said that this was entirely in accordance with National Defence's conception of our present position. It was their intention that in London we should argue first for complete withdrawal. We should be prepared to listen to arguments for a token force but we would put forward our preference for naval over land forces. Brigadier Rothschild was quite sure that the other Commonwealth military authorities with whom the discussions would be taking place were so fully aware of the Canadian position that they would expect us to argue on the above lines.

REDUCTION OF COMMONWEALTH FORCES IN KOREA

My immediately following telegram contains agreed recommendations of meeting of Commonwealth military representatives held in London on 10th March. Representatives were asked to obtain urgently agreement of their military authorities to recommendations at (a) to (e).

2. Recommendations are being submitted urgently for approval by Chiefs of Staff of countries concerned and, subsequently, by governments. They will be submitted to United Kingdom Chiefs of Staff at beginning of next week on return of C.I.G.S. from tour, and to United Kingdom Ministers immediately thereafter.

3. (Ottawa, Canberra, Wellington, only). Please inform Commonwealth authorities that

- (a) we hope to let them know decision of United Kingdom Ministers by end of next week
- (b) we should like to know decision of other governments as soon as possible
- (c) as soon as all Commonwealth Governments have agreed we should again favour concerted approach to United States military authorities by Canadian, Australian, New Zealand, and United Kingdom military representatives in Washington as in August 1954
- (d) we hope they will be prepared to instruct their military representatives in Washington accordingly.

4. Canadian, Australian and New Zealand High Commissioners in London informed.

Repeat Capetown and Saving Delhi No. 50, Washington, Tokyo, Seoul.

Following are recommendations agreed at meeting of Commonwealth military representatives in London on March 10th.

(a) Requirement was for a token Commonwealth land force in Korea of battalion group strength in which all countries should be represented. This token force should not be regarded as a balanced fighting unit, and need not, therefore, be provided with its own artillery.

(b) Most effective method of forming a new force was to base it on reductions of units already available in Korea rather than to provide new units.

(c) Countries should be recommended to contribute to reduced force as follows -

United Kingdom—one battalion

Canada—Medical detachment

Australia—Signals detachment

New Zealand—Supply and transport

(d) United Kingdom and New Zealand should be invited to retain their present naval commitments and Australia to continue to provide ships to United Nations command on a part time basis.

(e) Canada could withdraw her naval forces if she made a contribution to land force as at (c) above.

(f) Reduction in size of force should be accompanied by a corresponding reduction in its administrative machinery. Initially it could be looked after on existing arrangements at reduced scale but as run-down proceeded possibility should be considered of moving base to south Korea. Countries should be asked to maintain in integrated administrative units only those officers and men who were required for handling a specific equipment or personnel problem.

(g) After approval of Governments has been obtained to the recommendations at (a) to (e) above, Commander, B.C.F.K., should be informed of intended reduction in size of force and invited to forward his recommendations for corresponding administrative reductions on lines of (f) above.

REDUCTION OF FORCES IN KOREA

1. Please approach State Department at high level urgently and make following points:

(a) that it was our understanding and that of the other Commonwealth governments concerned that Mr. Dulles had discussed with Sir Anthony Eden at Bangkok on February 24 the question of withdrawing Commonwealth forces from Korea, and that the two Secretaries had agreed that for political reasons it was important for the Commonwealth to maintain "a token force";

(b) that the composition of this token force was discussed between the Commonwealth governments concerned and that agreement was reached on proposals to be discussed with the Unified Command;

(c) that these agreed proposals were transmitted to the United States Joint Chiefs of Staff by the Commonwealth military representatives in Washington on or about March 23;

(d) that as the United States military authorities have been aware the Canadian battalion now in Korea was due to be withdrawn in accordance with normal rotation procedure at the end of March, that arrangements had been made for it to sail at that time, that this was known to the Canadian public, and that the Canadian Government sees no reason to alter the arrangements now;

(e) that pending a decision on the [Commonwealth] proposals the move from Canada of the battalion which was to replace the battalion now in Korea has been held in abeyance, that this was publicly announced by the Minister of National Defence on March 12, and that the suspension is still in effect;<sup>143</sup>

(f) that we have now learned that the normal movement of the battalion from Korea has had to be postponed because the United States military authorities in Tokyo have not had instructions from Washington which they regard as necessary, and that it would be most unfortunate from the standpoint of Canadian-American relations if the Canadian public were to become aware of this fact;

(g) that it would be appreciated if the necessary instructions could be sent at once to allow this normal movement to proceed, and

(h) that the suspension of the replacement movement remains in effect pending the outcome of the consultations on the proposals for a general reduction of Commonwealth forces in Korea.

REDUCTION OF FORCES IN KOREA

Following from Glazebrook, Begins: I saw the Deputy Under-Secretary, Robert Murphy, this afternoon. He had with him two State Department officers concerned with the subject. I made the points in your telegram, and, as it was evident that he had a very sketchy knowledge of the subject, I filled in the facts as to how this situation had arisen.

2. As I reported by telephone to Mr. MacKay today, we had already been given by a desk officer one answer orally late this morning, our memorandum of this conversation reads as follows. Memorandum begins:

(a) The Commonwealth proposal for reduction of Commonwealth troops in Korea made by the military representatives of the Commonwealth on March 23 was under "urgent consideration" in both the Departments of Defense and State;

(b) It was not likely that the United States Government's reply to the proposal would be forthcoming before April 3;

For a report on the Minister's statement, see Montreal Gazette March 12, 1955.

(c) It was not possible to take up the Canadian request separately since withdrawal of the Canadian battalion without replacement would affect the military position of CINCUNC. Any Canadian withdrawal, therefore, would have to be considered against the background of the broader Commonwealth proposal. Memorandum ends.

3. Murphy was understanding and sympathetic. I did get the impression that he was personally convinced by the argument put up, but he said that they would take immediate steps to consult the Defense Department again and would let us know as quickly as possible. Presumably, therefore, we can only await that reply. Message ends.

For Glazebrook from Minister, Begins: I hope this matter will now be quickly and satisfactorily concluded, so that the Battalion will be able to sail on April 6.

2. For the record, I want it to be very clearly understood that we do not recognize the right of the United States Government, or any branch thereof, to decide on this withdrawal, which is purely a matter for the Canadian Government to decide in the light of its United Nations' obligations; nor do we recognize the validity of any conditions that the United States may attempt to attach to the withdrawal. That is why we have been so disturbed by reports of the attitude adopted by the Pentagon and why no communications should be sent to any branch of the United States Government by any Canadian officials which would indicate any weakening of the principle that I have stated above.

REDUCTION OF FORCES IN KOREA

Following from Glazebrook, Begins: Horsey gave me the United States answer this morning as follows:

2. Pending a review of United Nations [correction on original] strength in Korea (and in this connection the Commonwealth memorandum of March 23) being conducted on a most urgent basis by military authorities, the United States is not in a position to concur in the withdrawal of the Canadian battalion.

3. If, nevertheless, the Canadian Government wishes to proceed with the withdrawal of this battalion on the previously arranged schedule, the United States will make shipping available.

4. However, the United States consider as vitally important the maintenance of a Canadian unit as part of the United Nations Command (note: This refers to the Canadian field ambulance which, it is understood, will be retained though with fewer personnel).

5. Magruder (acting at the moment for General Hull) will be informed as above and will have specific authority to arrange for embarkation of the Canadian battalion as previously planned. We were advised that you should inform the Canadian commander in Korea to renew his request for shipping on April 6 on the understanding that appropriate authority to Magruder will be transmitted from Washington. Ends.

KOREA; WITHDRAWAL OF CANADIAN TROOPS

22. The Minister of National Defence, referring to discussion at the meeting of March 18th, 1955, said the U.S. military authorities, who had been consulted on the matter as representing the United Nations, were not prepared to agree to the further reduction of the Commonwealth formation in Korea which was caused by the remaining Canadian infantry battalion having been brought back to Canada. When the matter had last been discussed, the question of replacement of this unit had been left in abeyance. The U.S. authorities, apparently, still expected Canada to keep a battalion in Korea and he had been informed that a formal communication would soon be forthcoming expressing the hope that Canadian commitments would not be reduced. He assumed that similar communications would be sent to the other Commonwealth governments concerned. He did not think that the battalion should be replaced, but it would be advisable to confer with the other Commonwealth nations when the letter in question was received.

23. The Secretary of State for External Affairs, pointed out that it had been inadvisable to seek the approval of the U.S. when it had been first decided to reduce the size of the Commonwealth division. The U.S. authorities should now be informed that no replacement battalion would be sent to Korea. The U.S. Secretary of State had recently stated that Korea, Formosa and Indo-China were three sectors of the Asian front.<sup>144</sup> If the U.S. were to infer from this that an outbreak of hostilities in one area directly affected the situation in the other two, it would be a very dangerous matter. Canada had never accepted such an interpretation of the situation.

24. In the course of discussion it was pointed out that, since it was virtually certain that a formal request from U.S. military authorities would be received shortly by the Commonwealth governments concerned, it would be advisable to consult them immediately and be prepared to reply saying that Canada proposed to proceed with the reduction. It should be kept in mind, however, that other Commonwealth countries, particularly Australia, might not have the same incentives as Canada had to remove their troops from Korea.

25. The Cabinet noted the report of the Minister of National Defence and agreed that, following consultation with other Commonwealth governments concerned, any U.S. request to maintain an infantry battalion in Korea be refused.

KOREA; WITHDRAWAL OF CANADIAN FORCES

14. The Minister of National Defence, referring to discussion at the meeting of April 20th, 1955, reported that no communication had been received yet from U.S. authorities expressing disapproval of the reduction in the Commonwealth contingent in Korea, and it was possible that nothing might be heard at all. In the meantime, he felt it would be desirable to determine definitely whether or not the battalion which had already been withdrawn would be replaced. Secondly, he felt it would be desirable to make a statement on the future of the forces in Korea. Before doing so, however, the Commonwealth nations concerned and the United States should be told what it was proposed to say publicly. He read a draft statement which said it was not intended to replace the battalion already withdrawn and that the unit which would have done so would continue its normal training in Canada. He would go on to state that discussions looking to further reductions were continuing between the Commonwealth governments concerned and the U.S. government in its capacity as unified command for the U.N. forces. In the meantime, the Canadian destroyer and the field ambulance supporting the Commonwealth forces would remain in Korea.

15. The Minister of Fisheries said he hoped the destroyer in question would return soon, as the ship had been promised for work on a survey to be carried out by the International North Pacific Fisheries Commission. The U.S. were providing 15 ships, Japan 10, and Canada had agreed to provide one. This contribution, however, depended upon the Navy being released from its Korean commitment.

16. The Cabinet,

(a) agreed that the Infantry Battalion recently withdrawn from Korea would not be replaced; and,

(b) noted with approval the statement to be made by the Minister of National Defence, after advising other Commonwealth governments and the United States of its contents on Canadian forces in Korea.

REDUCTION OF FORCES IN KOREA

On April 25, in answer to a question in the House of Commons regarding the future of the Canadian commitment in Korea, the Minister of National Defence said that he hoped to be able to make a statement on the matter within the next few days. He confirmed, in answer to a supplementary question, that the 2nd Battalion Black Watch were still standing by in their camp in the Maritimes.

2. The Minister now intends to make the following additional statement on Monday, May 2, Begins:

Last Monday I told the House that I would make a statement regarding the Canadian forces in Korea.

As the House is aware the 2nd Battalion, Queen's Own Rifles of Canada, which had completed its normal tour of duty with the Commonwealth forces in Korea, embarked on April 6 and has now returned home. It is not intended to replace this Battalion, and the 2nd Battalion, Royal Highland Regiment of Canada (Black Watch), which would have relieved the Queen's Own Rifles, will continue its normal training at Aldershot, N.S.

Discussions looking to further reduction in the Commonwealth forces in that area are continuing between the Commonwealth Governments concerned and the United States Government, in its capacity as Unified Command for the United Nations forces in Korea.

In the meantime the Canadian Destroyer H.M.C.S. Sioux and the Third Canadian Field Ambulance, Royal Canadian Army Medical Corps, supporting the Commonwealth Brigade are remaining in Korea. Ends.

REDUCTION OF FORCES IN KOREA

The text of a State Department note on the subject of the reduction of Commonwealth forces in Korea, which was given to Commonwealth representatives late this afternoon, is contained in the following paragraphs. The State Department did not as yet know of your proposed statement in the House (EX-787 of April 29). Hemmendinger made only one substantive comment. He said he was aware that the Canadian authorities had not liked the use of the word "concurrence". It was only used once in the text of the State Department note. He implied, however, that if it might be the desire of the Canadian Government at some stage to make public use of the text of the note, it might be possible for the State Department to make what changes in language of the note would be required.

2. Text of the note begins:

The Government of the United States, acting in its capacity as the Unified Command, refers the Government of Canada to a memorandum received March 23, 1955 by the United States Joint Chiefs of Staff from the representatives of the Canadian, Australian, New Zealand, and United Kingdom Chiefs of Staff asking for the concurrence of the United States Joint Chiefs of Staff to a reduction in their combined forces in Korea to a battalion group.

The proposal of the Commonwealth countries to reduce their forces in Korea at this time, and the probable effect such an action would have on the decision of other participating countries, is a matter of concern to the Government of the United States. In the face of the current tension in the Far East, this government believes that further reductions in the size of the United Nations Command would have serious adverse impact militarily and politically on the interests of the free world in Asia. If the Commonwealth forces are further reduced, less powerful and less concerned nations will find it difficult to continue their contributions. Should such reductions continue, the international composition of the United Nations Command would be jeopardized and a point would soon be reached at which the continued existence of the United Nations Command would be in question. It is the view of the Government of the United States that the continued existence of the United Nations Command is important to the maintenance of the armistice and to stability in the area of Korea by reason of its deterrent effect upon the Communists and the assurance it affords of united policies on the part of the free world nations toward the Korean problem.

The Government of the United States believes that further reductions in the forces of the United Nations Command will seriously weaken the capacity of that command to meet the ever-present possibility of renewed Communist aggression. Proportionally, the reductions which have already taken place in the forces at the disposal of the United Nations Command have not been matched by withdrawals of Chinese Communist troops, which in any event remain in close proximity to the line of demarcation.

While the joint policy declaration of the United Nations members who fought in Korea is in itself a deterrent to aggression, its efficacy is greatly enhanced by the continued and effective military contributions of the nations who stand behind it. Additional withdrawals and a narrowing of the international composition of the United Nations forces cannot but weaken the effect of this declaration and increase the risks of Communist miscalculation.

The Government of the United States recalls the participation of the United Nations in the evolution of the Republic of Korea; its response to the Communist aggression against the republic of Korea; and its continued interest in a peaceful solution to the Korean problem. It is the belief of the Government of the United States that the search for a solution to the Korean problem through the United Nations as well as the maintenance of the peace are advanced by retaining an effective and representative United Nations defensive force in the Republic of Korea.

For these reasons the Government of the United States does not plan further to reduce its combat forces in Korea at this time. The Government of the United States hopes that the Commonwealth governments will be disposed to reconsider their proposal and to defer additional withdrawals of their forces. Ends.

REDUCTION OF COMMONWEALTH FORCES IN KOREA

As you know, on April 29, the U.S. State Department replied in identical Notes to the Note from Commonwealth military representatives to the Pentagon of March 23 about the reduction of Commonwealth forces in Korea. We have already sent you a draft statement which the Minister of National Defence had intended to make to Parliament on Wednesday, May 4, but this statement has been reconsidered in the light of the United States Note.

2. In our view the military situation in Korea as distinct from the general situation in the Far East does not warrant deferring implementation now of the Commonwealth proposal and we consider it undesirable that the United Nations effort in Korea should be used to effect solutions elsewhere in the Far East for other problems.

3. As is known to other Commonwealth Governments the Canadian battalion has already been withdrawn. It would be, from the domestic point of view, quite impracticable to consider sending a fresh battalion to Korea with the prospect that it would not be long after its arrival there that it would be re-embarked to return home.

4. In any event the despatch of a Canadian battalion to Korea at this juncture would lead to the public belief that the situation in Korea had in some way worsened since March or April which we do not believe to be the case and attempts to allay this misapprehension could only indicate an undesirable casualness on the part of the Government with regard to quite substantial expenditures and the serious inconvenience of those involved, including dependents.

5. On the other hand, the ambulance unit and the destroyer Sioux are still in Korea and we are prepared to reconsider the running down of the ambulance unit, as contemplated under the Commonwealth proposals to the Unified Command, and the withdrawal of the Sioux out of deference to United States views.

6. The Minister of National Defence feels that he is obliged to make a statement to Parliament at the earliest possible date and he proposes to do so on Monday, May 9th. The proposed statement would now read as follows:

Statement begins.

"Following discussions with the other Commonwealth Governments having forces in Korea and with the United States Government in its capacity as Unified Command for the United Nations Forces in Korea, shipping was made available and on April 6 the 2nd Battalion of the Queen's Own Rifles which had completed its year's service in the Far East returned to Canada.

Discussions concerning the reorganization of the Commonwealth Forces in Korea are continuing and pending their outcome, the Canadian Destroyer, HMCS Sioux and the Canadian Field Ambulance Unit, Royal Canadian Army Medical Corps, supporting the Commonwealth force, will be remaining in Korea.

It is not intended to replace the Queen's Own Rifles in Korea and the 1st Battalion, Royal Highland Regiment of Canada, (the Black Watch), which would have relieved the Queen's Own, will continue its normal training at Aldershot, N.S." Statement ends.<sup>145</sup>

7. We would propose giving the U.S. Government a copy of the statement in advance of delivery in Parliament and replying to their note along the lines of the statement amplified by the arguments suggested above. I would be grateful if you would inform the United Kingdom/Australian/New Zealand Government promptly and if they have any comments please convey them to us immediately.

REDUCTION OF COMMONWEALTH FORCES IN KOREA

We welcome the proposals now agreed in Ottawa for the retention in Korea of the destroyer and the ambulance unit. This should go some way to soften the reaction here to the decision not to replace the battalion. I feel bound, however, to comment frankly and at once on certain other features which I find disturbing in the course now proposed.

2. First, with reference to the proposed statement, we believe that the wording of the first paragraph is open to serious misunderstanding. The sequence of events as known to us was as follows: In the letter sent to the United States Joint Chiefs of Staff by representatives of the United Kingdom, New Zealand, Australia, and Canada, was included paragraph 5 asking for a quick answer to the substantive enquiry because of the desirability of taking advantage of available sea transport facilities. United States officials consistently took the position that it was fully within Canadian rights to withdraw forces from Korea. But their answer on the particular question of meeting shipping requirements (WA-526 of March 31) explicitly stated that "the United States is not in a position to concur in the withdrawal of the Canadian battalion". The only additional gloss offered by the State Department at the time indicated a quite evident reluctance to see our battalion withdraw before agreement had been reached on the general question.

3. We feel, therefore, that the first paragraph of the proposed statement if interpreted, as it might well be here, in the sense that there was general agreement on withdrawal of the battalion could not be supported by the facts.

4. We are at least equally concerned with the indication in your paragraph 7 that the explanation to the United States should be amplified by the arguments suggested in the earlier part of your telegram.

5. With reference to your paragraph 2, we have no knowledge of any United States suggestion that "the United Nations effort in Korea should be used to effect solutions elsewhere in the Far East". The United States note of April 29 does refer to the impact of reductions "on the interests of the free world in Asia" but we do not believe that this was intended to imply that United Nations forces in Korea would be implicated in other Far Eastern areas. United States officials might bridle at what might be taken to be an implication of ulterior motives.

6. We venture to question also the effect of the argument in your paragraph 3. We have no reason to think that the United States would not welcome the replacement of the Canadian battalion for a relatively prolonged period. Their argument is that there should be no reduction now and without any suggestion of time limits. The United States intention not to withdraw further United States units is flatly stated in the note.

7. We also question seriously the reception of the argument in your paragraph 4. As we understand it, the Queen's Own Rifles had returned on rotation. If it is not replaced, there would be a reduction of the United Nations force by one battalion. If, however, it were replaced, it would not increase the forces but merely return them to the March level; in other words, it would not be an increase of forces suggesting a worsened situation.

8. I hope you will understand that we are not in any way commenting on the general decision the government are making. We do feel, however, that, in view of the great emphasis laid on this matter by the United States Government, it is important for us as for them that every effort should be made to explain the decision both publicly and privately to United States officials in such a way that, while the decision itself might be (and indeed will be) unwelcome, the arguments used could not be questioned by reference to the facts.

REDUCTION OF FORCES IN KOREA

1. At a meeting of the Cabinet held on April 29, 1955, it was agreed that the Infantry Battalion recently withdrawn from Korea would not be replaced and that discussions looking to further reductions would continue between the Commonwealth Governments concerned and the United States Government in its capacity as unified command for the United Nations forces. In the meantime one Canadian destroyer and the field ambulance supporting the Commonwealth forces would remain in Korea.

2. A meeting of Commonwealth Military Representatives was held in the United Kingdom on 30 June, 1955, to discuss further reduction of Commonwealth forces in Korea. The meeting requested the concurrence of Governments on agreed views as summarized below:

(a) Character of the Forces. The object of retaining the forces in Korea is political rather than operational. It should therefore, retain its Commonwealth character and be recognizable as a Commonwealth force.

(b) Role. The force should continue to operate from the present area carrying out its share of operational tasks. A role confining it to base or lines of communication duties would be unacceptable.

(c) Composition. The battalion group should be composed as follows:

- |                                  |                |
|----------------------------------|----------------|
| (i) Skeleton Brigade HQ          | Integrated     |
| (ii) Infantry Battalion          | United Kingdom |
| (iii) Signals Detachment         | Australia      |
| (iv) Detachment, Field Ambulance | Canada         |
| (v) Detachment, RNZASC Company   | New Zealand    |

The United Kingdom would also provide an engineer detachment and possibly a light battery. A Detachment Infantry Brigade Work Shop was also considered necessary and should be integrated. The term integrated is used in the sense that the unit is primarily United Kingdom with sufficient personnel from other Commonwealth countries to look after their special national requirements in the administrative field.

(d) Command. For the time being the United Kingdom should continue to provide a Commander for the reduced forces.

(e) Title. The residual force be known as the "Commonwealth Contingent Korea".

(f) Timing of New Approach to Americans. Approach the United States authorities both through political and military channels as early as possible so that the reduction can be made operative by the end of August. Australia and New Zealand are particularly anxious to get a large part of their forces out of Korea by that time.

3. It is recommended that the agreed views referred to above be accepted by the Canadian Government.<sup>146</sup>

REDUCTION OF COMMONWEALTH FORCES IN KOREA

At a meeting today, September 2, arranged by Sir Percy Spender, the Australian Ambassador, Commonwealth representatives discussed the possible reply which could be made to the United States memorandum of April 29 with respect to the reduction of Commonwealth Forces in Korea. After a thorough (and at times difficult) canvassing of views, a draft note was prepared, the text of which is contained in our immediately following telegram.

2. At the meeting this morning it quickly became apparent that the view of the Australian Government was not that which one would have expected, in the light of the agreement reached by Commonwealth Military representatives in London in June. The Australian Government would, in fact, be prepared to reconsider its decision to reduce its forces in Korea if the United States Government continues to press its point of view vigorously. At the same time, the Australian Government would like to carry through the reductions agreed to by the Commonwealth Military representatives. Spender's instructions, therefore, did not allow him to agree entirely with our point of view that the reply to the United States memorandum of April 29 should state what is in effect a fait accompli.

3. The United Kingdom representative had put before the meeting a draft prepared by the Embassy here which among other things "sought the concurrence" of the United States Government to the Commonwealth proposals for reduction. We, too, submitted a draft note to the meeting which followed the lines set out in telegrams WA-1311 of August 3† and EX-1408 of August 9,† and which noted simply that the Commonwealth Governments "had reached agreement as follows".

4. In spite of the obvious differences of approach to the question, it was apparent that all of us at the meeting were agreed

(a) that Commonwealth Forces in Korea were to be reduced; and

(b) that there were political advantages in producing similar replies by the four governments to the United States note. Incidentally, it seemed sensible to the group to plan that similar notes be presented separately by each representative to the State Department with whatever further oral explanation was considered appropriate by individual governments.

<sup>146</sup> Approuvé par le Cabinet, le 15 juillet 1955/Approved by Cabinet, July 15, 1955.

5. The United Kingdom representative was the first to move towards the Canadian point of view. The New Zealand representative was inclined to share the views of his Australian colleague. When it became apparent that without some compromise there could be no agreement on similar notes, Spender suggested finessing the problem by omitting from the note the details concerning the composition of the reduced Commonwealth Force and leaving them for discussion between the Pentagon and the Commonwealth Military representatives. In his estimation, the note to the State Department would then simply suggest that reductions were to take place. It was his idea that in the discussion between Military representatives which would follow, the opportunity would be given for different actions by individual members of the Commonwealth, i.e., Canada could stand fast on the reduction while Australia could agree perhaps not to reduce to the extent presently planned.

6. While we could not accept his suggestion in that form, we did come around to accept a much watered down version of it in return for Australian and New Zealand acceptance of the inclusion in the note and its Annex of the contents of the agreement reached by the Commonwealth representatives in London and set out in your 1298 of July 20.† The Australian point is covered in the last paragraph of the draft text contained in our immediately following teletype. You will note that this paragraph does not weaken the statement of our intent to reduce as planned, but does provide an opportunity for further discussion with United States Military representatives which while directed towards an administrative necessity, i.e., the re-deployment of reduced forces, could provide an opportunity for the Americans to influence their Australian opposite numbers.

7. It was understood that the draft provisionally agreed to here would be submitted to our individual governments and that our agreement to it in no way prejudiced the final views of our individual governments. It seems to us, that there are two courses of action open to us. We can accept the substance of the draft contained in our immediately following telegram, or we can send to the State Department a note different at least from the Australian note and which would state the reduction and offer no opportunity for further United States comment. The latter choice would probably embarrass other Commonwealth Governments, particularly the Australian Government. We would recommend, therefore, that you give us authority to agree to a text substantially similar to that contained in our immediately following teletype. You might also be willing to allow us a little leeway to agree to changes in form which do not affect the substance.

8. It was agreed that a separate paragraph could be added by each government, if it desired, to the text dealing with naval commitments. Since we are not certain of your exact plans for the withdrawal of H.M.C.S. Sioux, we should be grateful if you would draft that paragraph in Ottawa. We would draw your attention to the fact that, contrary to the statement in paragraph 4 of your teletype 1408 of August 9,† the withdrawal of the remaining Canadian destroyer was not mentioned in the memorandum of March 23 submitted to the United States Joint Chiefs of Staff by the Commonwealth Military representatives.

9. If you can agree to a note along the lines of that drafted by the meeting, we might take the occasion of our presentation of the note to the State Department to draw its attention to the sentence "in the light of other commitments the four governments have found themselves unable to abandon their proposal to make reductions". Presumably the Australians would not make mention of this point in their oral explanation. (Incidentally, we agreed to the sentence in the draft note which follows immediately upon that just quoted and which makes mention of "certain modifications of their original plans", on the understanding that in fact there has been some infinitesimal change in the plans with respect to the brigade headquarters, a change which is mainly in name, if we understand the situation correctly).

10. While we are by no means certain that the draft agreed to here will be acceptable to Canberra or Wellington, we do believe it will be acceptable to London and we hope you may find it satisfactory.

REDUCTION OF COMMONWEALTH FORCES IN KOREA

The following is the text of the draft note concerning the reduction of Commonwealth Forces in Korea which was prepared in consultation with our Commonwealth colleagues. The negotiations involved in drafting this text are dealt with in our telegram under reference.

2. Draft text begins:

The (blank) Embassy presents its compliments to the Department of State and has the honour, under instructions from the (blank) Government, to reply to the Department's memorandum of April 29 in which the Government of the United States, acting in its capacity as the Unified Command, commented on the proposal of March 23 of the four Commonwealth Governments with respect to a reduction in their combined forces in Korea.

The (blank) Government has given careful consideration to the views of the United States Government and agrees with the following points expressed in the memorandum of April 29; that the continued existence of the United Nations Command is important to the maintenance of the Armistice and the stability in the area of Korea; that the international composition of the United Nations Forces should be maintained; and that the search for a solution to the Korean problem is advanced by the retention of an effective and representative United Nations Defensive Force in the Republic of Korea.

With these criteria in mind, the Governments of Canada, the United Kingdom, Australia, and New Zealand, have consulted together as to the continuing Commonwealth contribution to the United Nations Command. In the light of their other commitments, the four Governments have found themselves unable to abandon their proposal to make reductions. After carefully considering the United States representations, they have, however, found it possible to make certain modifications in their original plan and have reached agreement as follows.

The Commonwealth Force should be self-contained and have a clearly defined identity. It should retain its operational character and be located in an operational area. It should comprise a brigade headquarters with under command, a force of all arms including one infantry battalion. (Details are contained in the appendix to this note). The Commander of the force would be a Brigadier who would also act as the Commonwealth representative on the Military Armistice Commission. The force would be called the "Commonwealth Contingent, Korea".

The Commonwealth Governments propose that there be discussion between the United States and Commonwealth Military representatives in Washington on questions arising out of the detailed implementation of the reduction indicated above, notably the re-deployment of the Commonwealth force which it will necessitate.

(Then will follow in our note a statement with respect to the withdrawal of HMCS Sioux. Since we are uncertain of your intention in this respect, we believe this paragraph might be drafted in Ottawa).

Composition of Commonwealth Contingent Korea

Brigade Headquarters	Integrated
Infantry Battalion	United Kingdom
Detachment Engineers	United Kingdom
Signals Detachment	Australia
Detachment Field Ambulance	Canada
Detachment RNZASC	New Zealand
Detachment Infantry Brigade Workshops	Integrated

REDUCTION OF COMMONWEALTH FORCES IN KOREA

The draft Note contained in your telegram No. 1508 of September 2 is acceptable to us. We agree that in presenting the Note to the State Department you should take the occasion to draw attention to the statement in the Note that in the light of other commitments (in our case, NATO) the Commonwealth Governments have found themselves unable to abandon their proposal to make reductions. Accordingly, the reductions decided upon by the Canadian Government, in agreement with the other Commonwealth Governments, have been completed by the recall of HMCS Sioux.

2. The separate final paragraph on naval commitments, which it was agreed each government might add if it wished, should state that HMCS Sioux has been withdrawn to meet other urgent commitments.<sup>147</sup>

3. Although we would have no objection to minor changes in form, not affecting the substance of the Note, we could not accept any change which would have the effect of reopening, so far as we are concerned, the decision to reduce which has been taken by Cabinet. For this reason we consider that the Annex outlining the composition of the Commonwealth contingent should remain in the Note.

4. While we agree that it would be desirable that similar Notes be presented separately but simultaneously, we would not wish the delivery of the Canadian Note to be delayed more than a few days. Our views are accordingly being communicated to the other Commonwealth Governments concerned in the hope that they will find it possible to send urgent instructions to their representatives in Washington.<sup>148</sup>

ADMISSION OF ASIANS

1. In December, 1950, the Regulations dealing with admission of Asians were amended to raise from eighteen years to twenty-one years the age of admissible children.<sup>149</sup>
2. In June, 1951, the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration announced in the House of Commons that favourable consideration would be given to application by Canadians of Chinese extraction, in cases where the application was for the admission of unmarried children over twenty-one up to the age of twenty-five, when circumstances would warrant their admission on the grounds of "real hardship and perhaps suffering".<sup>150</sup>
3. On the 10th of March, 1955, the undersigned announced before the Special Committee on Estimates that from that date it was "proposed to adhere to the Regulations in Chinese cases just as we do in the case of persons of other Asian origin";<sup>151</sup> in other words, the only applications to receive favourable consideration after the 10th of March, 1955, in the case where the proposed immigrant was an Asian, would be those in which the application was for the wife, the husband, or the unmarried children under twenty-one years of age, of any Canadian citizen resident in Canada who is in a position to receive and care for his dependents.

4. The handling of Asian cases presents many administrative problems, as their customs are very different from European customs. In addition, vital statistics are not maintained in most of the countries of Asia. The identification of the proposed immigrant as the person described in the application can only be made by checking the statements made by the applicant as well as those made by the proposed immigrant. Very often the applicant in Canada, in order to facilitate the admission of the persons he desires from Asia, will apply for one person at a time so as to avoid conflicting statements.

5. Experience has shown that immigrants become settled in this country more readily when they establish themselves here as a family unit.

6. In order to facilitate the administration of Asian immigrants, encourage the re-union of families, and prevent numerous misrepresentations, it is considered advisable to amend the Regulations now in existence so as to provide that unmarried children under the age of twenty-one will be admissible only if the father and the mother have already been landed in Canada, or if the father or the mother, as the case may be, is landed concurrently with the child or children of the applicant.

7. For humane reasons, it is felt that Canadians of Asian origin, in view of the conditions now existing in Asia, should be allowed to apply, on compassionate grounds, for their parents. This privilege, which has existed for Europeans, could without increasing the security risk, be extended to Asian immigrants in cases where the mother is sixty years of age or over and the father is sixty-five years of age or over.

I, THEREFORE, RECOMMEND:

(a) That the Regulations governing the admission of Asians to Canada be amended to read as follows:

"20. (2). Subject to the provisions of the Act and to these Regulations, the landing in Canada of Asians is limited to any immigrant who satisfies the immigration officer in charge that he is the husband, the wife, or the unmarried child under twenty-one years of age of any Canadian citizen resident in Canada who is in a position to receive and care for his dependents, but no such child shall be landed unless his father and his mother have already been landed in Canada or his father or his mother as the case may be is landed concurrently with him."

(b) That as a matter of policy, favourable consideration be given to applications from Canadian citizens residing in Canada for the admission of their Asian parents when, in the case of the mother, the proposed immigrant would be sixty years of age or over and, in the case of the father, sixty-five years of age or over at the time of entry to Canada.<sup>152</sup>

ASIAN-AFRICAN CONFERENCE

The following are our views in the Asian-African Conference for your guidance in discussions which you might have with appropriate officers in the Ministry of External Affairs if an occasion presents itself.

2. We regard the Conference as a natural development arising out of the concern of the countries of the area to meet and discuss common problems, and significant of the increasing importance of the Asian countries.

3. A great deal of the eventual importance of the Asian-African Conference will lie in the reciprocal effect of the contacts between the Chinese and the non-Communist delegations. We very much hope that the effect of bringing the Chinese out of their dangerous tête-à-tête with Moscow will be salutary and may lead them to a better appreciation of the attitudes of other countries.

4. It is obvious, however, that this happy result will not be possible without the active leadership of India. The position of India at the political centre of the Conference will probably bring about a situation in which its attitude will influence strongly the attitudes of the other delegations. The role that India chooses to play will in effect decide whether the Conference is to be constructive or not. We hope, therefore, that the Indians will not overlook the fact that the results of the Asian-African Conference will inevitably affect public opinion in the West, particularly in the United States.

5. Should the Conference yield too easily to Chinese efforts to give the Asian-African Conference an anti-western complexion, in an effort to preserve good relations with the Chinese, this could very well lead to a hardening of United States policy in the Far East. The Asian-African Conference is possibly almost as important in its potential effect on the United States in a negative way as on the Chinese in a more positive way. This point could, I think, be emphasized to good advantage.

6. There is the possibility that a permanent organization will develop from the Asian-African Conference, and to a certain extent duplicate the work of the United Nations and its specialized agencies. We trust that any continuing organs set up at Bandung will not displace the Colombo Plan in its special field, nor tend to supplant the United Nations.

7. As there are likely to be representatives from North and South Vietnam, Laos and Cambodia at the Conference, it is possible that Indochinese problems may be discussed. In this event, since India will be the only Commission member represented at the Conference, we will look to the Indian representative to explain what the various Commissions have been trying to do and we would appreciate being kept informed of this aspect of the discussions.

8. As regards Formosa, we realize that there will be a good deal of sympathy at the Conference for the Communist Chinese position, but we would hope nevertheless that many delegations would stress the desirability of seeking solutions to this problem as to other ones by negotiation rather than by force.

THE ASIAN-AFRICAN CONFERENCE

The purpose of this letter is to try to draw certain general conclusions from the despatches we have received thus far on the Asian-African Conference, rather than to relate the sequence of events. The actual sessions of the Conference were fully reported in the press in spite of the theoretical secrecy of all but the first and last plenary sessions, and a number of despatches have been referred to missions concerned with the Far East.

2. The Asian-African Conference was misnamed in the sense that it was hardly African at all. Only Egypt, Turkey and Iraq among the countries outside East Asia contributed much to the discussions, and even they were overshadowed by the Asian countries which have recently become independent. Because of this, the Conference was filled with the sense of mission which animates these new countries. The Bandung Conference would have been impossible ten years ago when many of the participants were under some sort of foreign rule. Many of the countries of the area consider that while they have gained their independence, they have not yet achieved a position of influence commensurate with their size and the contribution to the maintenance of peace which they are in a position to make. They also consider various aspects of Western policy in Asia, such as the Manila Treaty, to be intrusions into Asian affairs affording evidence that the Western nations are not yet prepared to abandon their positions of influence. Although they claim to have better solutions to Asian problems, they would prefer in any case that Asia be badly run by Asians than efficiently governed by Europeans. It was, therefore, all the more gratifying to these countries that the Conference was a success, and that almost all the delegations gave proof of responsible attitudes in the discussions. The sponsors of the Conference also derived satisfaction from the apparently encouraging results of their efforts at mediation in the Formosa dispute, and believe that they have made significant progress towards reducing tension. While the basis for these attitudes may appear more emotional than Western nations are accustomed to, the end result of the Bandung Conference may be both to increase Asian influence and to make the countries of Asia less insecure in the presentation of their policy.

3. The Conference of Colombo Powers Prime Ministers which met at Bogor in December, 1954, set out the objectives of the proposed conference as follows:

(1) to promote good will and co-operation among the nations of Asia and Africa, and to explore and advance their mutual as well as common interests, and to establish further friendly and neighbourly relations.

(2) to consider social, economic and cultural problems and relations of the countries represented;

(3) to consider problems of special interest to Asian and African peoples, e.g., problems affecting national sovereignty and of racialism and colonialism;

(4) to view the position of Asia and Africa and their place in the world of today and the contribution they could make to world peace and co-operation.

4. There was, therefore, no intention at Bogor that the Bandung Conference should be presented with any particular set of problems to solve. It is doubtful whether any of the Prime Ministers, with the exception of Dr. Ali Sastroamidjojo, was sufficiently enthusiastic about the Conference to look upon it as providing more than a first opportunity for this group of states to discuss common problems and perhaps lay the basis for useful co-operation at some later date. However, even this limited objective of the sponsors demanded, for the Conference to be successful, that a spirit of moderation should prevail between the participants which seemed a priori to be impossible in view of their ideological differences. It was feared that the Conference would either pass from anti-racialism and anti-colonialism to a negative anti-Westernism, or else break up into opposing camps divided by ideologies. In the Department we were impressed by the Indian view that the Conference would be useful in bringing Communist China out of its isolation and we hoped that Indian influence would be such as to lead the Conference along constructive lines. It was a surprising development that, in its current policy of withdrawing pressure from the states of Southeast Asia, China had to give as many assurances of its future good behaviour as it did. The Bandung Conference provided a good opportunity for the Chinese to make public a shift of tactics which may be reversed at some later date when it is convenient for the Communists to do so. In this way, Asian opinion has its effect on Peking. It is also interesting to note that Indian influence, though important, was far from dominant.

5. The importance of the Asian-African Conference lies in the changed relations which developed between the various states represented. The results of the Bandung Conference are, therefore, similar to those of the first Colombo Powers Conference of April, 1954, which established an effective Colombo Powers grouping, although it would be difficult to point to any other concrete act. While much the same may prove to be true of the Asian-African Conference, a study of the communiqué is not entirely unrewarding (it has been circulated in the supplementary papers series<sup>153</sup>).

6. The communiqué is in three sections:

(1) economic co-operation;

(2) cultural co-operation, human rights and self-determination, and problems of dependent peoples;

(3) world peace and co-operation.

The Conference also adopted declarations on the problems of dependent peoples, and on world peace and co-operation.<sup>154</sup>

7. Economic Co-operation. Although this first section of the communiqué is long, it is not of great interest, since it does little more than catalogue as desirable certain objectives with which no one could disagree, and does not propose any specific suggestions. Many of the proposals are not entirely practicable; it is difficult to see, for instance, how any of the countries of the area with the possible exception of Japan could be in a position in the immediate future to provide technical assistance to others. In general, the Conference recognized the importance of economic co-operation without apparently having settled any means to ensure their co-operation, although it is recommended that liaison officers be appointed in the various countries "for the exchange of information on matters of mutual interest". It is also interesting to note that the Conference agreed that economic co-operation within the Asian-African region does not "preclude the desirability or the need for co-operation outside the region, including the investment of foreign capital. It was further recognized that assistance being received by certain countries from outside the region through international or under bilateral arrangements had made a valuable contribution to the implementation of their development programmes". These references were included in spite of the fact that the Chinese delegation had proposed that all foreign aid be condemned as detrimental to national sovereignty.

8. The Conference also supported the establishment of a special United Nations fund for economic development (SUNFED) and the allocation by the International Bank of a greater part of its resources to Asian countries. Mention was made of the need for a unified approach on the question of the stabilization of international prices, particularly in the United Nations Permanent Advisory Commission on International Commodity Trade. It is possible that these recommendations, which do not require the creation of special machinery for their execution, may have some concrete effects. It would seem that there was little reality to the discussions in the Economic Committee. The communiqué gives evidence of a division in the minds of the delegates; economic arrangements on a regional basis were considered to be a suitable economic expression of anti-colonialism, but it was recognized that existing arrangements which are either on a United Nations or Colombo Plan basis should be preserved for more hard-headed reasons. Concrete proposals to set up regional arrangements were opposed although, in contradiction to this, lip-service was paid to the principle in the communiqué. This same approach was noticeable at the Simla Conference, which agreed that bilateral arrangements should be maintained, in spite of the desire of the United States to see a greater degree of regional co-operation among the Asian countries.<sup>155</sup>

9. Cultural Co-operation, Human Rights and Self-Determination, and Problems of Dependent Peoples. With the exception of the declaration on the problems of dependent peoples, the drafting of these sections apparently presented no difficulties, after a Chinese resolution that the colonial powers should be called on to grant independence to all colonial territories within fifteen years was defeated. It is difficult to say much that is refreshingly original about cultural co-operation, but the Conference recognized, apparently on the initiative of the Philippine delegation, that there was a danger that the participants

A conference involving the Asian members of the Colombo Plan, as well as the United States and Japan, which was held in Simla, India, in May 1955 to discuss regional development issues. For a report on the conference, see United States, Department of State, Foreign Relations of the United States (FRUS), 1955-1957, Volume XXI, Washington, D.C.: Government Printing Office, 1960, pp. 105-106.

might fall into the trap of racialism themselves. This point was repeated in the section on racial discrimination. It is also encouraging that the communiqué in almost all instances uses the United Nations Charter or relevant resolutions of the United Nations as the basis for its recommendations.

10. A summary listing all those areas in which the Conference decided that national or minority rights were not being respected is revealing:

1. Algeria, Tunisia and Morocco,
2. "Certain parts of Africa" and South Africa,
3. West New Guinea,
4. Palestine,
5. Aden.

Although this list could stand without commentary, it is interesting that British colonialism is not mentioned except in the case of Aden, in spite of the activities of Archbishop Makarios and of certain Malayan nationalists. The Indians gave proof of their moderate approach towards the question by not insisting on a reference to Goa. However, although the right of all nations to self-determination is emphasized both in these sections and in the declaration on the promotion of world peace and co-operation, Soviet colonialism was not referred to in spite of the fact that Sir John Kotelawa's attack on it was the signal for a strong offensive on the part of the anti-communist delegations and a majority existed in the Political Committee to make a direct reference to the suppression of national aspirations in Eastern Europe. The controversy, which was very bitter, was carried on into the Drafting Committee where it was apparently Mr. Krishna Menon who proposed the compromise of condemning colonialism in "all its manifestations".

11. The reference to the Palestine question in the communiqué, and the exclusion of Israel from participation in the Conference indicates both the strength of feeling on the subject in the Muslim countries, and the willingness of the non-Muslim states such as India to yield to them. Chou En-Lai made a pointed reference in his first speech to the fact that a Muslim religious leader formed part of the Chinese delegation. Only Burma was willing to defend Israel in the debate on the Palestine question, although Mr. Nehru did try to exert a moderating influence. Although the strength of the Muslim grouping, and the willingness of the other nations to cater to them and their own Muslim minorities was not surprising, the Conference did provide a striking illustration of this situation.

12. The Promotion of World Peace and Co-operation. These sections, which are probably the most constructive in the communiqué, give the impression of expressing more closely the aspirations of the participants than do the other parts. An Indian official described the economic paragraphs as being more politics than economics, while the sections on racialism and colonialism do not add anything to our knowledge of the attitude of the Asian-African countries to these problems. The section on world peace and co-operation, however, deserves fuller consideration, for in it the participants give evidence of their desire to formulate an approach that would put Asian and African opinion in a better position to make its influence felt. This seems to be particularly true in those paragraphs which record the opinion of the Conference that the representation of the Asian and African nations in both United Nations and the Security Council is inadequate. There was no mention of creating a permanent seat for India. The attitude in this part of the communiqué is similar to the Canadian view that the representation of the Asian nations on the Security Council could be broadened. However, we have not been in favour of creating a special seat for India, lest such action would prejudice the "Commonwealth seat", and thus make it more difficult for us to be elected. The position of these recommendations at the beginning of the section leads one to believe that they are important to the participants and that these questions will be raised again, perhaps in a more embarrassing manner, in the near future. The list of countries which in the opinion of the Conference were qualified for membership in the United Nations — Cambodia, Ceylon, Japan, Jordan, Laos, Libya, Nepal and unified Vietnam — only includes participants in the Conference. Nevertheless, the proposal cuts across the controversy in the United Nations on "package deals" and so may prove acceptable to the Soviet Union. In any event it is a new initiative and may provide a way out of the present impasse on the admission of new members.

13. We may also expect that the Asian-African Conference will result in increased co-operation in the United Nations between the participants in furthering some of the Conference's objectives. The demonstration that the Arab and Asian nations could agree on a wide range of subjects will increase the tendency already noted in the United Nations for the Arab-Asian grouping to consult on policy matters. Such a development would increase the authority of these countries in the United Nations, and make it more likely that resolutions sponsored by them will be adopted.

14. The question of disarmament was treated in a manner which approaches the Western position, since the problem of the prohibition of nuclear weapons was not disassociated from the more general one of disarmament and the recommendation that experiments in nuclear weapons be suspended is phrased in moderate terms. The recommendation that experimentation in nuclear weapons should be prohibited pending the total prohibition of the manufacture of nuclear and thermo-nuclear weapons has never formed part of the Western proposals on disarmament. Nevertheless, this recommendation which was first put forward by Mr. Nehru a year ago has been incorporated in the Soviet proposals submitted to the Disarmament Sub-Committee on May 18, which must be considered as an indication of the present sensitivity of the Soviet Union and China to Asian opinion.

15. The final conference text is the Declaration on World Peace and Co-operation, a thoughtful and construction document. The ten principles are more concrete guides to international behaviour than the Sino-Indian five principles and their main advantage to the West may lie in the fact that they are as yet not tainted with any aura of communist peace propaganda. It is difficult to comment on principles which should form the basis of the actions of all nations in international affairs, but it has been pointed out that the fact that the Chinese Communists have subscribed to these principles gives the nations of Asia a standard by which to measure their future behaviour.

16. Although Nehru attacked arrangements for collective security, and Chou En-Lai sought to undermine the Manila Treaty by more devious means, the Conference could not condemn outright the Manila Treaty and other alliances because of the participation of Pakistan, Thailand and the Philippines which are members of the Manila Treaty, and Turkey, a member of NATO. The formula in the Declaration on World Peace and Co-operation which resolves the disagreement is obviously the result of compromise:

Principle 5: Respect for the Right of each nation to defend itself singly or collectively in conformity with the Charter of the United Nations.

Principle 6A: Abstention from the use of arrangement of collective defence to serve the particular interests of any of the big powers.

17. It would be too much to say that members of the Conference had thereby reached agreement on the desirability or the opposite of defensive alliances. Since the end of the Conference, and during his trip to Europe, Mr. Nehru has continued to attack collective defence systems, which would indicate that this section of the Declaration was merely a convenient means of covering up abiding differences between the participants.

The Role of the Communist Chinese

18. The proceedings provided some interesting light on Communist Chinese policy and tactics. The evidence which has accumulated since the signing of the Sino-Indian agreement on Tibet, and which has been confirmed by the behaviour of the Chinese delegation at Bandung, indicates that the Chinese leaders think that the condition for the extension of Chinese influence in Asia at the present time is the elimination of direct Western influence. An attempt to extend Chinese power by military means would have the contrary effect of confirming Western influence. The Chinese apparently seek to eliminate the influence which the United States exercises over certain countries of the area through the Manila Treaty and economic aid. Over the past six months, policy towards Japan has become important for China, and the statements of Chou En-Lai at the Bandung Conference seem to indicate that they have hopes of developing relations with the Philippines and Thailand as well.

19. The events of the past year have also given some indication of the tactics which the Chinese mean to pursue in order to eliminate Western influence in Asia and to isolate the United States over the Formosa question. By repeated assurances of their peaceful intentions (which they contrast with the West's preparations for war), and the development of diplomatic and trade relations with the non-communist countries, the Chinese hope to develop a climate in which their size and strength and overseas communities will not excite undue suspicion. If they are successful in presenting Communist China as essentially another Asian nation which has successfully completed its national revolution, they may hope that the United States and its allies will not be able to create a viable system of collective security in the Pacific and even that the basis of the present Manila Treaty will be undermined. By holding out the prospect of profitable trade, the Chinese may believe that they can reduce the effect of the aid programmes of the United States and its allies.

20. The behaviour of the Communist Chinese delegation at the Asian-African Conference seems to bear out the analysis that the Chinese have decided not to exercise undue pressure in Southeast Asia in order to keep the situation fluid and to prevent it from crystallizing into the formation of an anti-communist bloc. Chou En-Lai apparently had to adopt a line at the Bandung Conference that was more conciliatory than he would probably have wished, in order to achieve the maximum effect. His first public statement at Bandung, before the Conference opened, spoke of the price that the Chinese delegation had to pay in connection with the Conference, a reference to the crash of the Air India Constellation carrying certain Chinese delegates to the Conference. If this was an indication of the atmosphere that the Chinese hoped would pervade the Conference, events did not conform to their expectations. After this first statement, Chou's attitude became progressively more moderate, and did not go beyond a number of references to the fact that the United States was creating tension in the Formosa Straits. His speech at the plenary session was notably milder than the advance text, circulated some hours before. His statement before the Political Committee on the second last day of the Conference emphasized China's uneasiness in the face of the creation of the Manila Treaty. Nevertheless it was, as were all of Chou's interventions, remarkably free of the tone of strenuous denunciation usually associated with the speeches of a communist delegate. On the other hand, the reports of the New China News Agency, while less violent than usual, were never as moderate as Chou's statements and referred continually to the efforts of the United States to wreck the Conference.

21. It is interesting to speculate how much Chou's performance was dictated by the pro-Western attitudes of many non-communist delegations. The Chinese delegation probably thought that it would only be necessary to emphasize anti-colonialism and China's character as an Asian nation to win over the Conference, and that imputations that the United States was unalterably opposed to the Conference as to all manifestations of Asian independence would be well received. This misconception was perhaps based on a confusion between anti-colonialism and resentment of continued Western influence, and anti-Americanism per se.

22. Since most of the attacks on Communism by Conference delegates were directed against Soviet colonialism, the Chinese delegation was anxious not to allow itself to be associated with Soviet policies but to stress China's similarity with other Asian countries which have recently gained their independence. On only one occasion did Chou say that the Chinese delegation would not accept the criticisms by various delegations of the Soviet Union, because it not unnaturally felt itself involved by them. This attitude of non-involvement was a matter of tactics, but the Soviet leaders may feel that Chou did them less than justice at Bandung. At any rate, the obvious disinclination of the Chinese to stress the Sino-Soviet connection at Bandung indicates that it is a liability to present Chinese policy in Asia.

23. The second question which the conciliatory attitude of the Chinese poses is the degree to which it was successful in allaying the suspicions which most Asian countries entertain of China. It would seem that Chou was at least partly successful in convincing the non-communist nations of his good faith. Although many delegates expressed doubts about Chinese intentions, none attacked China openly, and all were plainly impressed and confused by Chou's attitude. The chief Philippine delegate, General Romulo, even went so far as to say that Chou's first speech "showed democratic spirit". The Chinese made progress towards establishing informal relations with those countries which do not recognize them. They offered to negotiate agreements regarding the nationality of overseas Chinese. It seems likely that the question of Chinese representation at the United Nations will become progressively more difficult and that China will be able eventually to establish wider trade and possibly even diplomatic relations with Japan, if not with Thailand and the Philippines.

The Friends of the West

24. This question brings up the related one of United States influence at the Asian-African Conference. There is no doubt that some of the countries represented saw their role as spokesmen for the West. Nevertheless, what were taken by most observers to be pro-Western stands on the part of certain delegates, appear after closer study to be better described as anti-communist. The Asian countries which are Western inclined seemed to value the Western alliance according to the magnitude of the Chinese (or Soviet) threat. There are other factors which determined the stand of the non-communist delegations, among which was the consciousness of sharing similar political ideals with the Western nations. Nevertheless, it is difficult to escape the conclusion that the countries of Asia which are allied with the West support its policies often for negative reasons, the most important of which is fear of Chinese intentions, but among which opposition to Indian leadership should also be mentioned. It seems to follow from this that the Chinese are in a position to undermine Western influence in Asia with some degree of success.

Indian Influence

25. Some observers have concluded that, as Chou En-Lai was so prominent, the Conference was a diplomatic defeat for India. This may be a reflection of wishful thinking upon the part of those who are not favourably disposed towards Mr. Nehru or his policies. It does not describe the facts adequately, since, as despatch 562 of May 9† from New Delhi points out, the Indians did not see the Bandung Conference as "a third force demonstration" and were, in fact, not very enthusiastic about the whole idea. Mr. Krishna Menon played a large part in the drafting of the communiqué and Mr. Nehru was very active in the important task of bringing various delegations together in informal meetings outside the Conference, and was apparently always listened to with respect. However, many of the delegations often took a negative stand in opposing India, and Mr. Nehru is reported not to have stood up very well in debate. Whatever the reasons for the apparent reluctance of the Indian delegation to play a leading part at Bandung, this failure on its part was surprising and has not facilitated the spread of Indian influence.

Other Delegations

26. From the despatches from our missions in the area and especially from conversations in Ottawa with Mr. Raju Coomeraswamy and Mr. John Senduk, both of whom attended the Conference, the former on the Ceylonese delegation and the latter as an Indonesian supervisor of the press arrangements, the following summary of the attitudes and effectiveness of the various delegations is possible. What is most immediately surprising in such a review is that the Japanese delegation, which undoubtedly included officials with a wide experience of international conferences, played a minor role in the Political Committee, although it was more active in the Economic and Cultural Committees. The Japanese doubtless feared that too active a role in the political discussions might both appear insincere and be badly received. For that reason, the Japanese had probably decided that it would be wiser to wait until Japan's position in Asia has been made more secure before attempting to exercise any political influence in the area.

27. With the exception of Egypt, the African states contributed little. Colonel Nasser played a helpful if not a dominating role in his position as chairman of the Drafting Committee and acted as a mediator between the Western-inclined states and the Indians and the Chinese. Even Salah Salem was relatively subdued and left delegates with the impression of being an astute and moderate adviser to Colonel Nasser. The latter was in increasingly close touch with Mr. Nehru and although he seems to have been impressed by Chou, he apparently undertook no commitments to develop diplomatic relations with China. Nevertheless, the Minister for Religious Foundations (Waqf) did visit China at Chou's invitation. In the Conference proceedings, the Egyptians were mainly concerned to have a resolution on Palestine adopted. If this resolution is not more strongly worded than it was, this was due to the moderating influence of U Nu, whose role once again was to infuse the Conference with an aura of peace and good will.

28. Turkey, Iraq and Pakistan lead the anti-communist group, which was mainly composed of the Arab States and was known among the other delegations as the "American bloc". Among these, Syria was the most moderate and Dr. Charles Malik of Lebanon was, according to an Australian despatch, "at his philosophical best". The Pakistan delegation was perhaps the most effective of the Western inclined states, although it sometimes opposed proposals merely because India supported them. The Turkish delegation gave the impression of being able, but somewhat unyielding when it would have profited it to do so. Both the Thai delegation (whose head, Prince Wan, was rapporteur of the Political Committee) and the Philippine delegation were surprisingly restrained. One of the happier results of the Conference may lie in the fact that India seems to have modified its former attitude of disdain towards both these countries and may attempt to develop better relations with them.

29. The Ceylonese Prime Minister came to the Conference with the intention to act as mediator in the Formosa dispute and was apparently greatly disappointed that his first efforts were not taken as seriously as he would have wished. For this reason, many delegations suspected that Sir John's attack on Soviet colonialism was dictated more by pique than because of any sincere desire to place on record the facts of Soviet colonialism in Eastern Europe. Although this is probably too extreme a view of Sir John's role, it is not unfair to speculate whether Sir John would have made his controversial statement if his attempts at mediation had been successful. The final result of this affair would seem to be an unfortunate worsening of Indian-Ceylonese relations. Finally, it is encouraging that not only did Indonesia acquit itself well in laying down the arrangements for the Conference, but seems to have gained a new access of international confidence, which may have the final effect of making its foreign policy less insecure. However, Prime Minister Ali Sastroamidjojo's activities as Chairman of the Conference were not marked by any great firmness or imagination.

30. North Vietnam, Laos and Cambodia all sent strong delegations, headed respectively by Foreign Minister Pham Van Dong, Prime Minister Katay, and Prince Sihanouk. In contrast to this the South Vietnamese delegation was rather weak and appeared to be on the defensive, which was in part due to the civil war in Saigon which was going on at the time. Any hopes which the Indians may have entertained of bringing the North and South Vietnamese delegations together were not realized. However, an understanding was apparently reached between India, China and the Viet Minh regarding Laos and Cambodia. Prime Minister Katay and Pham Van Dong signed, in the presence of Nehru and Chou, a protocol in which the Viet Minh agreed to respect the sovereignty and territorial integrity of Laos and acknowledged that the settlement of the Pathet Lao problem was an internal matter. Prime Minister Katay interpreted this as giving him a free hand to deal with the Pathet Lao as he saw fit, while the Indians and the Viet Minh rather interpreted it as an offer by the Viet Minh to lend their good offices to assist in reaching a settlement between the Pathet Lao and the Royal Laotian Government. Prince Sihanouk, in his opening speech at the Conference, asserted Cambodia's support for the Five Principles, and said that he did not consider them inconsistent with assistance from Western countries.

31. The final communiqué did not include a section supporting the Geneva settlement, because it was evident that the South Vietnamese would not agree to such a reference and would probably use the occasion to attack the settlement. For the same reason Indochina was not a subject of discussion at the Conference, in spite of the fact that Mr. Nehru had intended to give an account of India's stewardship as chairman of the Indochinese Commissions. Nevertheless, the understandings reached outside the Conference were of some importance to ourselves as members of the International Supervisory Commission.

32. On April 17, Mr. St. Laurent sent the following message to the Prime Minister of Indonesia:

"On the occasion of the convening of the Asian-African Conference, I would like to convey through you the good wishes of the people and Government of Canada for the success of the Conference. I hope that the Conference will contribute to the welfare of the people of Asia and Africa and promote the settlement by peaceful means of all disputes likely to endanger the maintenance of international peace and security."

33. On May 3, the Prime Minister of Indonesia replied in the following terms:

"As Chairman and on behalf of the Asian-African Conference, I would like to express our high appreciation for the good wishes of the people and Government of Canada to the Conference. The heartfelt sentiment underlying these good wishes were warmly received by the Conference. I am convinced that you and your Government receive in the same spirit the results of the Conference which I hope may contribute to the promotion of world peace and co-operation. With assurances of my highest consideration, Ali Sastroamidjojo”.

34. From other sources as well we learned that the message was very well received by the Conference, the more so as it was the only direct message sent by a Western country.

35. Most of the other aspects of the Asian-African Conference have been emphasized in the press and need only be repeated summarily. In spite of the remarkable diversity of its participants, the Conference was able to agree in formulating a common general attitude on a wide agenda, though this does not mean, of course, that this unanimity would be maintained if more specific problems had been considered. Nevertheless the spirit of compromise prevailed and it was evident that almost all the participants were anxious to make the Conference a success. This may have been in part a reflection of the determination of the Asian countries to make their influence more effective in foreign affairs which would have been impossible if the Conference had broken down. It was also due to the conviction that the countries represented could make a contribution to peace, and there may have been present in the minds of all the delegates the contrast between the responsibility in the Bandung Conference and the controversy which is normal in the United Nations. One point, however, which has not been emphasized to any great extent, is that Asia seems to feel that it has a responsibility towards Africa. It is difficult to see how this development can take place without conflict with the European colonial powers, not to speak of South Africa.

36. This letter does not do full justice to the complex problems raised by this remarkable conference, which seems to have given the independent nations of Asia and Africa a new sense of confidence which will not only increase their authority but may have the final result of bringing closer the time when Asia will be able to co-operate with the West without any of the after-thoughts of colonialism which have impeded good relations until now. If this is so, the beneficial effects of the Asian-African Conference from the Western point of view will outweigh Communist China's undoubted success there.

CLEMENCY FOR MAJOR JAPANESE WAR CRIMINALS

I am informed that Mr. Campney will be submitting the attached memorandum to Cabinet at its meeting tomorrow, March 18, 1955.

You will recall that last March, in discussing the Araki case, Cabinet expressed the hope that some formula would be unanimously agreed upon by the eight Governments entitled to the exercise of clemency under the Japanese Peace Treaty under which the early release of some of the major war criminals at present serving sentences in Japan could be effected; Cabinet indicated at the time, however, that Canada should not take the initiative in proposing such a formula. Last Fall the Japanese Government applied for the release of all the major war criminals and the United States has now proposed to the other Governments concerned that these men should be released on parole upon completion of ten years imprisonment, i.e. at the end of 1955 in all but one case.

The attached memorandum recommends basically that the United States proposal be accepted by Canada, provided that it is accepted by a majority of the governments concerned. It is based on the views of the Interdepartmental Clemency Review Committee on which this Department is represented.

CLEMENCY FOR JAPANESE WAR CRIMINALS

On 8 October, 1954, the Government of Japan requested amnesty at the earliest possible date for the following Japanese class "A" war criminals who are presently serving life sentences and who are now, with the exception of OKA and HATA who are medically paroled, confined in Sugamo Prison in Japan.

Name Age Name Age

ARAKI, Sadao	77	OKA, Tukasumi	64
HASHIMOTO, Kingoro	64	OSHIMA, Kinoshi	68
HATA, Shunroku	75	SATO, Kenryo	59
HOSHINI, Naoki	62	SHIMADA, Shigetaro	71
KAYA, Okinori	65	SUZUKI, Teiichi	66
KIDO, Koichi	65

Alternatively, the Japanese Government requested that consideration be given to clemency for those war criminals who are over the age of 70.

2. At a recent meeting of representatives of the eight allied governments that had been represented on the International Military Tribunal for the Far East, namely, the United Kingdom, Netherlands, France, Australia, New Zealand, United States, Pakistan and Canada, the United States recommended that view of the governments concerned be sought on the acceptability of a general formula providing for release on parole of Japanese class "A" war criminals upon the completion of ten years imprisonment.

3. If the United States' proposal is accepted it will mean that all "A" class Japanese war criminals with the exception of SATO will be eligible for parole by the end of December 1955. SATO would be eligible in April 1956.

4. The United Kingdom is now considering the United States proposal. In the past the United Kingdom has opposed granting a "blanket" amnesty, preferring a formula which treats a life sentence as one of 21 years subject to one-third time off for good behaviour. Any request for clemency beyond this, the United Kingdom thinks, should depend on its merits.

5. The effect of the United Kingdom's approach would be that the majority of the "A" class Japanese war criminals would not be eligible for parole until the latter part of 1959.

6. The position of the other interested governments, with the exception of France, Pakistan and Australia, is one of approval of the United States proposal if a majority of the other governments also approve of it. France approves but attaches a condition of parole to be abstention from political activity. Pakistan favours immediate and unconditional release of all war criminals. Australia has not expressed a firm opinion.

7. In the past the Canadian Government has taken the position that it would not adopt a firm stand on the issue of early release of Japanese "A" class war criminals. Cabinet has expressed the hope that unanimity could be achieved on some formula as for example, that put forth at an earlier date by New Zealand which was essentially the same as the present United States proposal. See Cabinet Conclusion dated 25 March, 1954.

8. Although there are differences of opinion on this particular point, the view has been expressed that a general parole of Japanese class "A" war criminals would, to the Japanese people, be tantamount to admitting that they were wrongly imprisoned in the first instance. It has further been suggested that an amnesty of this nature would not inspire the Japanese to respect law and order and would put the governments concerned in the position of sacrificing principle for political expediency.

9. Also pertinent to the question of early release of Japanese "A" class war criminals is the question of minor Japanese war criminals. According to a recent Japanese survey there are still 706 minor war criminals being held. Of this number the United States hold two hundred and seventy-seven. At the last meeting of the representatives of the said eight governments it was agreed that recommendations should be made to the governments it was agreed that recommendations should be made to the governments it was agreed that recommendations should be made to the governments holding minor Japanese war criminals that expeditious action be taken on their release in order that they would not be penalized more heavily than "A" class war criminals. Canada did not try and consequently has never held any minor Japanese war criminals, nor has Canada had any responsibility, collective or otherwise for the administration of their sentences.

10. While the Clemency Review Committee considers that the position hitherto taken by the United Kingdom (see para 4), is most sound, in order to achieve unanimity among the governments concerned the Committee recommends that the Canadian Ambassador in Washington be instructed:

(a) to support the United States proposal that Japanese "A" class war criminals be released on parole upon completion of 10 years imprisonment, if a majority of the governments concerned support it; or alternatively

(b) to support any proposal for clemency to those "A" class war criminals who are over the age of seventy years; and in any event

(c) to support the French proposal that paroles granted be made subject to the condition that parolees abstain from political activities.

Respectfully submitted,

DESPATCH L-483

CLEMENCY FOR MAJOR JAPANESE WAR CRIMINALS

I attach for your information a copy of the memorandum which was submitted to the Cabinet last week on this issue.

2. The Cabinet did not approve this memorandum, but merely noted it and agreed that you should be instructed to submit a confidential report on this matter after discussing it with the United States State Department and the United Kingdom Ambassador in Washington, and expressing at the same time the hope of the Canadian Government that the United States and the United Kingdom could come together in their approach to the problem.

3. I understand that in the Cabinet discussions which led to the decision reported above, the following points were brought out:

(a) Class "A" war criminals consisted of individuals who had been responsible for the policy that had led to the last war, and who had been in senior positions of authority during that war. Minor war criminals were those who had been convicted for specific crimes. It did seem incongruous to release Class "A" criminals while holding those in the latter category.

(b) The best course would be to settle the whole problem immediately rather than release the prisoners in small groups over a period of time. In following the first course, a certain amount of good will might be gained. It would be desirable, also, not to impose any conditions on the former prisoners, such as the one suggested regarding political activities on release.

(c) The U.K. has had a good deal of experience in dealing with Orientals and there might be something to be said for their view that a general release would lead the Japanese to think these persons had been wrongly imprisoned. On the other hand, the Japanese probably felt that way anyway. Furthermore, the U.S. had the main responsibility in Japan and this seemed to be a clear case where it would be preferable for Canada to take a similar position.

(d) It was not desirable to prevent the exercise of clemency. At the same time, in working out a procedure it should not appear that there was to be a blanket reversal of the policy adopted at the end of the war. If a majority of the countries concerned agree with the U.S. position, Canada should not stand in its way.

(e) If there were some position between the U.S. proposal of release after ten years and the British view that a life sentence should be regarded as a period of twenty-one years, subject to one-third off for good behaviour, it might be an acceptable compromise. It was observed, on the other hand, however, that these trials had been purely political in character and there was no established jurisprudence for such cases.

(f) In general, Canada should go along with the U.S. who felt it essential to have the friendship of Japan. Before taking a final decision, however, it would be useful to have a confidential report from the Ambassador in Washington, after he had spoken to the U.S. State Department and the U.K. Ambassador there on this matter. Mr. Heeney might express in these talks the view that Canada hoped the U.S. and the U.K. would come together in their approach to the problem.

CLEMENCY FOR MAJOR JAPANESE WAR CRIMINALS

By Cabinet Decision dated March 23, 1955, it was directed that the Canadian Ambassador to Washington be instructed to submit a confidential report on the question of clemency to major Japanese war criminals after discussing the matter with the United States State Department and the United Kingdom Ambassador in Washington. The hope of the Canadian Government was expressed that the United States of America and the United Kingdom could come together in their approach to the problem.

United States Position

2. The Ambassador subsequently reported that the question of Japanese war criminals has currently been under study in the United States State Department. The "mass release" formula was no longer favoured, considering particularly that it might cause repercussions over the United States handling of German war criminals. This approach however in no way vitiates the United States' proposal to release class "A" war criminals on parole after they have completed ten years' imprisonment. The new approach would be to release each prisoner as he became eligible. The first will become eligible on September 11, 1955, and the last on April 25, 1956.

3. An alternative method suggested was to arrange releases on medical parole. This suggestion was based on the assumption that requests for clemency on medical grounds would be made prior to the end of 1955 for all class "A" war criminals. Paroles of this nature have already been granted to Jiro Minami, Shunroku Hata, Tukasumi Oka, Shigetaro Shimada and Sadao Araki. If and when a formula for release of Japanese war criminals is agreed upon such formula will be applied to these war criminals as well as those who are still confined in Sugamo prison.

4. With the release of Sadao Araki on medical parole all war criminals over the age of 70 have now been released.

5. The United States is now concerned over the fact that some "hard core" minor war criminals will still be in prison after the class "A" war criminals are release. The United

Mr. Wershof consulted Mr. Paul Pelletier before this Despatch was prepared: Mr. Pelletier authorized the incorporation in paragraph 2 above of the report of the points which were brought out in the course of Cabinet discussions on March 23/55. G. S[icotte].

States view seems to be that the crimes of some of the minor war criminals were of a heinous nature and deserving of severe punishment whereas some of the class "A" war criminals were convicted on general grounds. The release of minor war criminals held by the USA other than the 20 or 30 "hard core" cases, is proceeding, their release being now a question for the Clemency Board to decide and not one needing the President's approval as in the past.

6. The United Kingdom has now decided to treat life sentences of minor war criminals within its jurisdiction as being 15 years' imprisonment. This coupled with one-third time off for good behaviour will mean that normally prisoners will be eligible for parole after ten years. The United Kingdom reserves to itself the right to detain individuals longer if this is necessary. The United Kingdom is not giving publicity to this decision and has passed it to Commonwealth authorities in confidence.

United Kingdom Position

7. While the United Kingdom has in the past favoured the fourteen year formula, i.e., considering the life sentence of Japanese war criminals twenty-one years, with one third time off for good behaviour, it has now instructed the British Embassy in Washington to support the United States proposal for release on parole after ten years in confinement. Until recently the United Kingdom favoured unconditional release on the ground that parole was unrealistic since there is no means of ensuring enforcement of parole restrictions imposed upon the parolees for the rest of their lives.

Other Governments Position

8. The position taken by the other interested Governments on the United States proposal for the paroling of the war criminals after ten years is at present as follows:

PAKISTAN—favours unconditional release but would accept something less if majority approved;

FRENCH—approves United States position but is inclined to favour a release with the qualification that parolees should abstain from political activity;

NETHERLANDS—while he was without instructions from his government, the Netherlands representative felt that his government would support the then United Kingdom approach, i.e., unconditional release;

NEW ZEALAND—favours United States proposal;

AUSTRALIA—favours United States proposal.

9. It appears from the foregoing that there now exists a consensus among most of the Governments concerned in favour of releasing major Japanese war criminals after they have served ten years of their sentence.

10. In the circumstances the Interdepartmental Committee on Clemency Review recommends that its former recommendation which was considered by Cabinet on March 23, 1955, be amended and that the Canadian Ambassador in Washington be instructed:

(a) to support the United States proposal that Japanese "A" class war criminals be released individually as each such war criminal completes ten years' imprisonment, if a majority of the Governments concerned support it;

(b) to support, but not initiate any proposal that releases be unconditional, but if no such proposal is made, or if a majority of the governments concerned favour release on parole, to support such latter proposal; and

(c) to support the contention that abstention from political activity on the part of the reprieved should not be made a condition of parole release in the event this form of release is adopted.

JAPANESE WAR CRIMINALS

Cabinet has now approved recommendation of Interdepartmental Committee relating to release of Class A war criminals. This recommendation conforms to paragraph 3(a) of my teletype under reference: i.e. it approves proposal for release of war criminals individually as each one completes ten years imprisonment, if a majority of the Governments concerned support this.

2. With respect to the conditions of release, the Government would support (but would not, repeat not, wish you to initiate) any proposal that might be made that the release be unconditional. At the same time, if no such proposal is made, or if a majority of the Governments concerned favour release on parole, we are to support such latter proposal. Finally, we are also to support the contention that abstention from political activity on the part of the reprieved should not, repeat not, be made a condition of parole in the event that this form of release be adopted.

3. You may govern yourself accordingly in discussions with representatives of other Governments concerned in Washington.

JAPANESE WAR CRIMINALS

Representatives of the eight interested governments met today, September 7, at the call of the State Department to consider once again the ten-year eligibility formula with respect to the release of Japanese class "A" war criminals. In view of all the discussion which has gone on concerning the ten-year eligibility formula, the meeting took a somewhat surprising turn. The upshot of the meeting was a decision to recommend to governments a kind of "gentlemen's agreement" that class "A" war criminals be considered eligible for parole after serving ten years of their sentences, without governments having to take a firm position on a "formula" and without the interested governments informing the Japanese Government of the adoption of a rigid plan.

2. Agreement in the above term came about partly as a result of a desire to meet The Netherlands position (our telegram 1432 of August 22†) and partly as a result of further elaboration of the United States position. The Netherlands representative said that his government would be prepared to vote for the release of the three war criminals who became eligible for release on September 14, but would not be able to join other governments in approving the ten-year formula. (He implied that his government would probably agree to the release of the other major war criminals as they become eligible after serving ten years of their sentences.) The United States representative said that in the United States conception of the ten-year eligibility formula there was a distinction between eligibility and a decision to release. The United States would regard acceptance of the eligibility formula as simply committing governments to examine the case of an individual war criminal after he had served ten years. Agreement to the formula did not, in the United States view, commit governments to automatic approval of the parole after ten years.

3. The "gentlemen's agreement" approach seemed acceptable to other representatives. Since it did not run counter to your instructions, we offered the opinion that it would probably be acceptable to you.

4. It was agreed, therefore, to recommend to governments that they instruct their Embassies in Tokyo to consult on the sending of similar notes to the Japanese Foreign Office which would deal mainly with the three war criminals eligible for parole on September 14, i.e., Hashimoto, Kaya, and Suzuki, but which would also make passing reference to the ten-year eligibility formula. (The same procedure would be followed when the remaining war criminals became eligible). If this plan of action could be agreed to by governments, it seemed desirable that the substantive paragraph of the notes to the Japanese Government should read as follows:

"The Government of (blank) has consulted with the other Allied Powers concerned, amongst whom it has been decided in accordance with Article 11 of the Treaty of Peace with Japan that Hashimoto, Kaya, and Suzuki may be released on parole, effective upon the completion of ten years imprisonment, on September 14, 1955."

It was thought that the first paragraph of the notes might refer to the recommendations of the Government of Japan for parole of these individuals in much the same terms as has been used in past cases where medical parole has been granted.

5. So far as publicity was concerned, all representatives at the meeting were prepared to accept your suggestion (your telegram 1482 of August 23†) that publicity be left to the Japanese Government.

6. There was some discussion as to whether the terms of the parole should be spelled out, but it became clear that it would be difficult to get agreement among the governments concerned if they were forced to state their individual positions on this score. It seemed desirable, therefore, that no attempt be made to elaborate on what was meant by parole. In practical terms it would probably be synonymous with outright release, but some of the governments represented at the meeting were not prepared to admit this fact in official correspondence with the Japanese Government.

7. If the view reached by the meeting is acceptable to you, you might instruct our Embassy in Tokyo to co-ordinate their action with that of the other interested Embassies there. We should be grateful, however, if you would keep us informed.<sup>158</sup>

JAPANESE IMMIGRATION — RETURN OF FORMER RESIDENTS OF CANADA AND SPECIAL CASES

1. During World War II and immediately after the termination of hostilities, a number of Canadian citizens and residents of Japanese race were repatriated to Japan. By Order-in-Council P.C. 10773 of November 26th, 1942, Canadian citizens by birth or naturalization who effected departure from Canada under a wartime exchange were deprived of their status as Canadian nationals and British subjects. Twenty-two adults and nine children lost their status as Canadian nationals and British subjects under this Order-in-Council. Canadian citizens by naturalization who were repatriated after the war under the provisions of Order-in-Council P.C. 7355 of September 15th, 1945 were also deprived of their status as Canadian nationals and British subjects by Order-in-Council P.C. 7356 of the same date. Five hundred and sixty-five persons are listed under this Order-in-Council. Those who were not British subjects or Canadian nationals but who were repatriated, lost any claim to Canadian domicile under the Immigration Act and, therefore, have no right of return to this country.

2. A considerable number of persons who did not lose their Canadian citizenship through repatriation have indicated a desire to come back to Canada and an undetermined number have returned. In the case of the others, i.e., those who relinquished Canadian status through repatriation, it is not intended to allow a return movement on any scale nor, in the usual course of events, to give favourable consideration in those cases where the individual concerned, acting on his own initiative and in full realization of the consequences of his act, accepted repatriation. However, a few cases have come to the attention of the Immigration Branch where there are strong humanitarian grounds for making exceptions and allowing the return of repatriates even though such persons may not come within the admissible classes under existing regulations governing Asians, i.e., spouses and unmarried children under 21 years of age of Canadian citizens resident in Canada.

3. In the deserving cases, there is usually a pattern of long previous residence in Canada and Canadian-born children residing in Canada on whom the prospective immigrant is dependent for support. A number of cases involve widowed or legally separated mothers who accepted repatriation in order to accompany their husbands and families to Japan and in those cases where adult males are involved, there is usually some extenuating circumstance such as previous service in the Canadian Armed Forces or Canadian sons with such service.

4. In addition, a few cases not involving repatriates have come to the attention of the Immigration Branch where very strong compassionate grounds exist for the admission of relatives of Canadian citizens not coming within the admissible classes defined in the regulations.

5. A strict policy has been followed in respect of immigration from Japan since the war. Only in very few cases has special authority been sought for the admission of persons not coming within the admissible classes. These involved parents or children of Canadian citizens where the humanitarian and compassionate circumstances were most compelling.

6. It is considered that a close check should be maintained on Japanese immigration and, in general, that the regulations laid down should be adhered to. Nonetheless as indicated above, there are now and undoubtedly will be in future, cases involving close relatives of Canadian citizens not coming within the admissible classes where special consideration would seem to be warranted on humanitarian or compassionate grounds.

THE UNDERSIGNED, THEREFORE, RECOMMENDS THAT:

(1) Notwithstanding the provisions of Orders-in-Council P.C. 10773 of November 26th, 1942 and P.C. 7355 and P.C. 7356 of September 15th, 1945, the Governor-in-Council be requested to grant authority in individual cases as they arise for the admission or re-admission of persons of Japanese race not coming within the admissible classes of persons laid down by regulation where:

- (a) such persons are close relatives of Canadian citizens, and
- (b) strong humanitarian or compassionate grounds for admission exist.<sup>159</sup>

ENTRY TO CANADA OF AGED JAPANESE PARENTS

The Deputy Minister of Citizenship and Immigration has enclosed, with the attached letter of November 15,† a copy of a memorandum addressed by him to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. The memorandum deals with the admission to Canada of certain classes of Japanese.

2. The question Mr. Pickersgill wishes decided is whether the Cabinet Directive of October 12, admitting to Canada aged Asian parents of Canadian citizens provided strong humanitarian or compassionate grounds for entry exist, should be interpreted as applying to Japanese parents who lost their Canadian citizenship by Orders-in-Council through repatriation during or immediately after World War II.<sup>160</sup>

3. Colonel Fortier in his letter states that the Minister of Finance has been asked to discuss the question raised in the memorandum with you either over the telephone or at the next meeting of Cabinet. He says Mr. Pickersgill will agree to whatever you and Mr. Harris decide. Attached is the text of the memorandum of the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration to Cabinet of April 18 referred to in Colonel Fortier's memorandum. The Cabinet decisions of April 20 and October 12 are quoted in this memorandum.

4. Colonel Fortier's memorandum opposes re-admission of the Japanese parents concerned. He argues that Japanese parents, after having accepted Canadian nationality before the last war, renounced their adopted nationality on the first occasion their country of adoption was at war with their country of origin.

5. You might wish to favour the re-admission to Canada of aged Japanese parents who lost their Canadian citizenship through repatriation, in the same way as other Asian parents are admitted. Their entry would be subject to the proviso that they are joining their children who are Canadian citizens, and that strong humanitarian or compassionate grounds for re-admission exist. The arguments in favour of this course are:

(a) Canada's relations with Japan are now friendly and the Canadian Government is subject to criticism in Japan for preventing reunions of families. The Japanese attach a good deal of importance to arrangements permitting children to care for aged parents. The number would not be large; at most a few hundred would be eligible over a period of years and not many of these could afford to come.

(b) The aged parents (they must be 60 years of age or over in the case of the mother and 65 years of age or over in the case of the father to be re-admitted) are a harmless group and in entering Canada would not become involved in domestic political matters. Nor would they represent any permanent increase in the population of Japanese origin in Canada.

(c) The proviso that strong humanitarian or compassionate grounds for admission must exist will still leave the Department of Citizenship and Immigration with discretionary powers.

(d) The Canadian Government was not as strict during the war in its treatment of Canadian citizens of German and Italian origin as it was with those of Japanese origin; there are no restrictions against the entry to Canada of German or Italian parents of Canadian citizens. It might be desirable, therefore, not to establish special regulations affecting the Japanese.<sup>161</sup>

Ottawa, November 11, 1955

On October 12th, Cabinet approved your recommendation that favourable consideration could be given to applications from Canadian citizens residing in Canada for the admission of their Asian parents when, in the case of the mother, the proposed immigrant would be 60 years of age or over and, in the case of the father, 65 years of age or over at the time of entry to Canada.

This decision covers all cases of parents who are Asians.

Earlier this year, Cabinet had to consider, on your recommendation, the admission of Japanese who, during World War II or immediately after the termination of hostilities, were repatriated to Japan and who, consequently, lost their British or Canadian status under Order in Council P.C. 10773 of November 26th, 1942, or Order in Council P.C. 7355 of September 15th, 1945. On that occasion, it was decided that, "notwithstanding the Orders in Council referred to above, authority be granted in individual cases as they arose for the admission or re-admission of persons of Japanese race not coming within the admissible classes of persons laid down by regulation, where such persons were close relatives of Canadian citizens and where strong humanitarian and compassionate grounds for admission existed."

In your memorandum of April 18th, 1955, to Cabinet it was stated:

"In the case of others, i.e., those who relinquished Canadian status through repatriation, it is not intended to allow a return movement on any scale nor, in the usual course of events, to give favourable consideration in those cases where the individual concerned, acting on his own initiative and in full realization of the consequences of his act, accepted repatriation."

"In the deserving cases, there is usually a pattern of long previous residence in Canada and Canadian-born children residing in Canada on whom the prospective immigrant is dependent for support. A number of cases involve widowed or legally separated mothers who accepted repatriation in order to accompany their husbands and families to Japan and in those cases where adult males are involved, there is usually some extenuating circumstance such as previous service in The Canadian Armed Forces or Canadian sons with such service."

OK L.B. P[earson]

In interpreting this directive, each case has been studied on its own merit. Generally, when the proposed immigrant included the head of the family who had applied for repatriation, the application was refused except where there were extenuating circumstances.

In the case of widows or separated wives, applications often received more sympathetic consideration and, in most cases, were approved.

The question now to be decided is whether or not the directive of Cabinet of October 12th which provides for the admission of aged parents should equally apply, without the restriction by Cabinet directive of April 18th, 1955,<sup>162</sup> to Japanese aged parents who were repatriated during the war or immediately after the termination of hostilities.

It is felt that favourable consideration should not be extended to those who, after having accepted British nationality before the last world war, renounced their adopted nationality on the first occasion their country of adoption was at war with their country of origin.

I would appreciate receiving your instructions in this regard.

When I brought this matter to your attention earlier this month, you indicated that you would like discussing it with your colleagues at a Cabinet meeting following Mr. Pearson's return.

RE APPLICATIONS FOR READMISSION OF JAPANESE AGED PARENTS WHO HAD RELINQUISHED PREVIOUS STATUS IN CANADA BY ACCEPTING REPATRIATION AFTER WORLD WAR II

We have on hand several applications in the above category which are entirely acceptable from the standpoint of compassionate grounds and reunion of families but the question has arisen as to whether they should be excluded from the benefits of the Cabinet Directive of April 18, 1955 concerning Japanese and the announcement of October 12, 1955 concerning aged Asian parents solely because they had accepted repatriation. Under date of November 30, 1955 the Deputy Minister furnished the following instructions:

"Reference you memorandum of November 9th† concerning the admission of aged parents from Japan. I have asked the Minister for a directive and he has ruled that, in the case of Japanese parents who renounced or were deprived of their Canadian citizenship during the last World War or following the war, the directive of cabinet of April 18th should be followed and we should admit only such parents when there are very special circumstances.

In other words, those who have accepted repatriation or have applied for repatriation should generally be refused except when there are extenuating circumstances.

Should be April 20 [Auteur inconnu/Author unknown]

In the case of widows or separated wives, when the head of the family accepted repatriation, these applications could receive more sympathetic consideration.

If you refer to the Memorandum of Cabinet of April 18th, 1955 you will see that it was stated that it was not intended to allow a return movement on any scale from Japan, but that only deserving cases would receive consideration.

Therefore, in the interpretation of Cabinet directive, it would be appropriate to refer to the statements made in support of the recommendation and, notwithstanding the recent decision of Cabinet to admit Asian parents, Cabinet directive of April 1955 still applies."

We are having difficulty in interpreting the above ruling. We cannot say truthfully that these Japanese repatriated aged parent applications offer any "very special circumstances" over and above the basic humanitarian grounds. The only extenuating circumstance in these cases is the fact that the parents made an unwise choice when they elected to return to Japan after the war. In this connection it could be taken into consideration that Japanese Canadian citizens had been treated differently from other Canadian citizens following the declaration of war with Japan. All persons of Japanese race, whether or not their loyalty was in question, were evacuated from the restricted areas of British Columbia and the administration of their property and assets was taken over by the Custodian of Enemy Property. Notwithstanding the assistance given them, they suffered hardship in this uprooting from their homes and restriction in management of their affairs. After the war ended, they were still debarred from returning to their former homes and there was no indication that the barrier would ever be lifted. It is understandable that many of them were thoroughly discouraged at that time and felt there was no future for them and their children in Canada.

The view could be taken that these repatriates have been suffering the consequences of their act for the past nine or ten years since they were repatriated. Most of them are in difficult circumstances in Japan and their Canadian-born children either remained in Canada or have returned since. It is not likely that there will be any large scale movement of this type. While we have no definite statistics, it is estimated that the total number of applications or inquiries on behalf of repatriated Japanese parents since the end of the war does not exceed fifty. There may be more which have not yet come to our attention but there cannot be any large number.

If we turn these cases down without any explanation, while at the same time we are approving other aged Asian parents, our decision will appear inconsistent and discriminatory. On the other hand, if we inform the applicants that we are turning them down because the parents were repatriates, undoubtedly there will be protests and the somewhat controversial issue of the post-war Japanese repatriation movement may be revived.

I am bringing this matter to your attention as we are reluctant to notify the applicant in these cases of refusal until the above ruling is fully clarified.<sup>163</sup>

POLITIQUE DE DÉFENSE ET POLITIQUE ÉTRANGÈRE
À L'ÈRE NUCLÉAIRE
DEFENCE AND FOREIGN POLICY IN THE NUCLEAR AGE

Note éditoriale

Note by the Editor

À l'automne de 1954, R.A. MacKay pressait L.B. Pearson de commencer à réévaluer la « politique de sécurité nationale » du Canada à la lumière des changements créés dans le domaine de la défense par le développement des armes thermonucléaires et la capacité croissante de l'Union soviétique de lancer une attaque nucléaire directe sur l'Amérique du Nord. MacKay faisait valoir que les implications politiques, économiques, sociales et militaires étaient telles qu'on ne savait plus vraiment s'il était justifié de recommander le maintien des politiques de sécurité nationale en cours. Le sous-secrétaire d'État adjoint aux Affaires extérieures recommandait qu'un comité spécial de haut niveau composé de civils et de militaires soit mis sur pied pour réévaluer la politique de défense du Canada et faire rapport sans tarder au Comité du Cabinet sur la défense.<sup>1</sup>

Bien qu'approuvé par Pearson, l'examen proposé ne reçut aucun soutien au ministère de la Défense nationale. Pas moins de quatre lettres de Pearson à Campney sur cette question sont restées sans réponse pendant les quatre premiers mois de 1955. Foulkes et les chefs d'état-major ont finalement accepté de participer à l'examen en avril, après une intervention de Bryce en faveur du ministère des Affaires extérieures. Le 20 juillet, les sous-ministres participèrent à la première et unique réunion du comité tenue en 1955. Le comité tint une autre réunion improductive en février 1956, avant de disparaître.

Malgré cet échec, le document suivant mérite d'être rendu public. La première ébauche rédigée par George Ignatieff en mars 1955 fit l'objet d'un examen attentif de la part de Pearson, et fut commentée par les hauts fonctionnaires du service extérieur, dont Arnold Heeney, Dana Wilgress et Charles Ritchie. Cette version-ci représente l'opinion mûrement réfléchie du ministère des Affaires extérieures sur la dissuasion nucléaire et la politique canadienne de défense.

In the fall of 1954, R.A. MacKay urged L.B. Pearson to begin reevaluating Canada's "national security policy" in light of the changed defence environment created by the development of thermonuclear weapons and the Soviet Union's growing capacity to launch a direct nuclear attack against North America. "The political, economic, social and military implications are so far-reaching", he argued, "that we can no longer be sure that we would be justified in recommending continued adherence to current national security policies." The Associate Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs recommended that a special civil-military committee be set up at a senior level to reassess Canadian defence policy and report urgently to the Cabinet Defence Committee.<sup>1</sup>

Although endorsed by Pearson, the defence review garnered no support in the Department of National Defence. No fewer than four letters from Pearson to Campney on this subject went unanswered during the first four months of 1955. Foulkes and the Chiefs of Staff finally agreed to participate in the review in April when Bryce intervened in support of the Department of External Affairs. On July 20, deputy ministers gathered for the committee's first and only meeting in 1955. The committee held one more inconclusive session in February 1956, before it faded away.

Despite the failure of this exercise, the following document merits publication. A first draft, prepared by George Ignatieff in March 1955, was examined closely by Pearson, and commented on by senior members of the foreign service, including Arnold Heeney, Dana Wilgress and Charles Ritchie. The version printed here represents the considered views of the Department of External Affairs on the nuclear deterrent and Canadian defence policy.

[Ottawa], August 2, 1955

THE INTERNATIONAL SETTING OF CANADIAN AND ALLIED DEFENCE POLICY
AIMS IN THE LIGHT OF THE NUCLEAR DETERRENT

The development of nuclear weapons, jet aircraft and guided missiles has revolutionized warfare. The possession of these weapons, which have such terrible effects, and their means of delivery by both groups of major world powers, the Communist as well as the non-Communist, has produced a new strategy based upon the nuclear deterrent.

2. These revolutionary developments in weapons and strategy call for a re-thinking of our concepts of defence. The object of this departmental memorandum is to provide at least a preliminary analysis of the policy implications of these developments in the setting of the current international situation, as a contribution to the broader reassessment of Canadian national security and commitments which is to be conducted on an interdepartmental basis.

3. This analysis is divided into seven parts: the strategy of the nuclear deterrent, NATO, continental defence, limited or local wars, the cold war, disarmament and the desire for a détente. The analysis is introduced by a summarized statement of the aims of Canadian and allied defence policy in the light of the nuclear deterrent.

Aims of Canadian and Allied Defence Policy

4.(i) The main aim of Canada and its allies, as set out in the North Atlantic Treaty, is to preserve peace without sacrificing any vital interests. The chief means of doing this at the present time is by building and maintaining on a collective basis deterrent strength, particularly the capacity to retaliate instantly with nuclear weapons in the event of aggression; but in view of the Soviet nuclear capability and the devastating consequences of mutual retaliation, we cannot contemplate using the nuclear weapons except when the interests threatened are truly vital. (Paragraphs 1-12) [The strategy of the nuclear deterrent has been incorporated into NATO defence planning and preparations by the approval of M.C. 48 (Paras. 16-20)]

(ii) Considering the horrible consequences if nuclear and thermonuclear warfare were to occur, it is in the interest of all NATO governments to explore all possible means of limiting wars that cannot be avoided and to this end they must be in a position to distinguish aggressions of less directness and magnitude from all-out threats. Canada's aim should therefore be to seek through consultation with the allies which possess nuclear weapons an effective political control over the putting into effect of any plans and preparations for nuclear warfare. (Paras. 13-22)

(iii) Because of the vital importance of the nuclear deterrent to NATO defence planning, the defence of the deterrent power in North America should be treated as an integral part of the problem of defending the NATO area. (Paras. 23-25)

(iv) Similarly the air defence of Canada and the United States should be treated as one problem and the adequacy of the existing Canada-United States agreement governing defence cooperation and arrangements under it require examination in this light. (Paras. 26-37)

(v) An essential part of the policy of the nuclear deterrent should be to assess in each case of threat the importance of the interests of the free world involved in order that the Western Powers should not incur the risks of all-out war unless the threat to their interests justifies it; Canada should participate in such an assessment and be consulted by the United States before nuclear weapons are used anywhere in the world in view of the inescapable consequential effects on Canada if general war occurs. (Paras. 38-43)

(vi) If, in any given case, the risks of all-out or nuclear war are not justified, and yet important interests of the free world are involved, it is essential that the Western Powers should be prepared to deal with limited wars with limited means and within limited objectives. Canada itself would be unlikely to participate in such limited or local wars unless by a decision of the United Nations which it had accepted. (Paragraphs 44-47)

(vii) The Communist threat and methods vary from area to area according to available resources and the weaknesses and contradictions which they can exploit; allied strategy should therefore employ political and economic as well as military measures to deter the indirect threats which may be posed by the Communists in an effort to outflank the nuclear deterrent. These should include the maintenance of an expanding economy. (Paragraphs 48-52)

(viii) The risk of war through miscalculation remains despite the nuclear deterrent, since the Soviet Union might believe a threat of attack existed when in fact it did not; it is essential therefore that there should be no grounds for misunderstanding of allied defensive and peaceful intentions by the Communist bloc. Every opportunity should therefore be taken to bring about a détente through diplomatic negotiations, an essential feature of which should be the regulation and balanced reduction of armaments and armed forces and the control and ultimate elimination of nuclear weapons. (Paragraphs 53-69)

Assumptions

It has been necessary to make certain assumptions on which the reasoning in the supporting arguments are based.

Military

1. The United States provides most of the nuclear capability on the allied side in the form of the Strategic Air Command which has nuclear and thermonuclear weapons and aircraft to carry them to Soviet targets. The United Kingdom capability in weapons and carriers is very small.

2. Although the United States capability in relation to the Soviet Union's capability is at present believed to be larger in magnitude and explosive power of stockpiles, more effective in means of delivery and superior in defence against Soviet retaliation, the Soviet Union's capability is growing and is believed to include: (a) a high priority large-scale atomic energy programme which is expanding; (b) a substantial stockpile of fissionable materials; (c) the capacity of producing explosives in the range from the equivalent of a few kilotons up to approximately 1,000 kilotons of TNT; and (d) a constantly improving and expanding aircraft production programme including long-range jet aircraft.

3. Megaton thermonuclear weapons have already been developed on both sides of the Iron Curtain of such devastating power that their effective use might imperil the ability of even the greatest nation to recover quickly and carry on the war effectively.

4. Within a few years the Soviet Union is expected to have a sufficient number of intercontinental bombers to deliver an attack of catastrophic force against this Continent, although at the grave risk of exposing itself to a retaliatory blow of equal or greater force, unless it develops a defensive capacity beyond the degree now foreseen.

5. Within ten years, as a result of the development of intercontinental ballistic missiles, it is probable that neither side will be able reasonably to expect that by striking the first blow it could eliminate the power of the other to inflict mortal damage.

Political

6. Canada and its NATO allies will remain united in the resolve to maintain an effective regional system of collective security, in the absence of an effective universal system of collective security; and that this regional security system will include the maintenance of a nuclear deterrent capability, until an effective international armaments control system becomes feasible.

7. The United States and the United Kingdom Governments will be restrained by moral and spiritual conviction brought to bear by their public opinion from initiating a nuclear or any other kind of war, except in retaliation against an act of overt armed aggression; nevertheless, they will remain resolute to retaliate against all-out Soviet attack.

8. The United States will be prepared to use the threat of nuclear retaliation of less than total force to deter local or limited Communist military aggression and to use smaller nuclear weapons in local and limited wars if necessary.

9. The Soviet Union has every reason to avoid embarking on general war in the near future, both because it can have no prospect of escaping nuclear retaliation and because war is not essential to the pursuit of its basic aims. The most dangerous possibilities are (a) that the use of force in a local and limited conflict might lead to general war by accident or miscalculation, and (b) that the Soviets may miscalculate U.S. intentions by believing that the Soviet Union is about to be attacked. In the latter event, the Soviet Union might consider it vital to its interests to attack in an effort to forestall U.S. action. The fact that, under conditions of mounting international tension, it is more difficult to distinguish between real and apparent threats to vital national interests and security, suggests that the U.S.S.R. (as well as the Western Powers) have an interest in reducing international tensions, at least to the point where they are able to calculate more accurately the possibility or likelihood of all-out attack.

10. Even if it is assumed that the Soviet Union co-operates in the reduction of international tensions, there is as yet no evidence on which to base any expectation that they, or the other countries of the Communist bloc, will abandon in any essential way the pursuit of their political aims by subversive means.

THE SUPPORTING ARGUMENTS

The Strategy of the Nuclear Deterrent in Relation to the Aims of Allied Defence Policy

The United States and the Soviet Union now confront one another with the prospect of mutual devastation by thermonuclear and nuclear weapons. It is this prospect, and not the mere existence of weapons of such destructive power, which is one of the most important deterrents of war. With the capability of the Soviet Union to retaliate in kind growing both in terms of weapons and the means of delivering them, this deterrent works both ways; it is now a case of mutual deterrence.

2. It is also true that at present the United States enjoys superiority in numbers and types of weapons as well as in the means of delivering them, and even though the Soviet Union has built up deterrents of its own, it cannot be sure that if it were to make a surprise atomic attack upon the United States or any of its allies, it could prevent an immediate nuclear retaliation on a far larger scale. This, mainly in the form of the Strategic Air Command of the United States Air Force, is the deterrent power on the allied side.

3. Because of the scale of devastation that may be expected from thermonuclear or nuclear attacks, it is almost certain that a general war would be fought only against an actual or apparent threat to a nation's vital interests or those of its allies. As a corollary, it is probable that any nation would hesitate to start a war, even when further political or non-warlike action is not open to it for the pursuit of its aims, unless it apprehended a direct threat to its own security.

4. Thus if the strategy of the nuclear deterrent works, it is because it strikes fear and uncertainty in the calculations of a potential aggressor about the possible outcome and consequences of his aggression. Because of this fear, it provides a kind of psychological fence to reinforce other deterrents against the use of general war as an instrument of policy. The strategy of the nuclear deterrent, as its name implies, is a strategy for preventing a general war, not for fighting one. If the deterrent fails to prevent general war, the ensuing damage from nuclear and thermonuclear weapons is bound to be catastrophic.

5. While the prospect of devastation from thermonuclear or nuclear war may act in this way as a deterrent of general war, it may fail to act as a deterrent against the threat of other kinds of hostile action if the consequences apprehended do not include thermonuclear or nuclear devastation. On the other hand, the threat of the use of nuclear retaliation, where vital allied interests are not affected, runs the risk of precipitating war, since such a threat might be interpreted as an actual or an apparent threat to a country's vital interests. The use of such threats by one of the members of NATO, therefore, is a matter of lively concern to the other allies.

6. The United States, which possesses the principal nuclear retaliatory power on the side of the Western Powers, has so far reserved the right to determine by the authority of its President when and in what circumstances it may use or threaten to use its power of nuclear retaliation.<sup>7</sup> This is of particular concern to Canada because of her special geographical location in relation both to the United States and the USSR.

7. The emphasis in considering the possible use of atomic weapons by the West is upon retaliation, for the Western Powers will not deliberately start a major war, which by its very nature cannot serve the aims proclaimed in the North Atlantic Treaty "to live in peace with all peoples and governments and to safeguard the freedom, common heritage and civilization of their peoples". But the allies have made it clear that they are maintaining preparations for instant nuclear retaliation against the event of Soviet all-out attack.

8. The fact that the United States has been prepared to use the threat of nuclear retaliation to deter the threat of Communist attacks, other than the threat of an outright attack against the security of the United States and its allies, has posed difficult questions affecting the relationship of the United States with its allies generally and with Canada in particular.

9. Mr. Dulles' speech on massive retaliation in January of last year is a case in point. The Secretary of State for External Affairs, in commenting on this speech in the House of Commons on March 25, did not question the proposition that the capacity to retaliate with nuclear weapons could be a valuable deterrent against aggression, but he sought clarification at the same time on the applicability of this strategy to various forms of Communist threat and on the manner in which decisions would be made, i.e., with or without prior consultation with the allies.

10. The danger of this doctrine was that it appeared to assume that the other side either could not or would not retaliate with nuclear weapons, an assumption which is invalid, at least in so far as the capability of the Soviet Union is concerned. Thus, in trying to restrain any form of military action on the Communist side by the threat of all-out attack, such threats of "massive" nuclear attack run the risk that if the Soviet Union intervenes, hostilities which begin as a local or limited war might turn into a thermonuclear one. There is also the danger that this type of threat risks becoming a boomerang as Soviet nuclear capability grows. For it cannot be overlooked that the Soviet Union (and Communist China) may likewise exploit the threat of nuclear retaliation in weakening the will of the Western Powers to risk war in the protection of their essential interests.

11. Considerations such as these have evidently been taken into account in Washington, for "massive" retaliation has given place to "measured" retaliation. The idea now seems to be that instead of threatening the use of the full force of nuclear destructive power to deter local Communist military threats where vital allied interests are not involved, the United States threatens the use of nuclear weapons of a limited destructive nuclear power and only in a tactical role against military targets. This change is based not only on considerations of policy, but also on the fact that the United States has developed a variety of nuclear weapons ranging from a destructive power of the equivalent of 500 tons of TNT, upwards to the equivalent of a million tons and more.

12. The possibility that this concept of "measured retaliation" might be applied in Asia was brought out by Mr. Dulles in reporting on the military arrangements of the Manila Treaty on March 8. He said that the allies now possess plenty of power in this treaty area and that this power includes sea and air forces equipped with "new and powerful weapons of precision which can utterly destroy military targets without endangering unrelated civilian centres". The President, in backing Mr. Dulles up, gave the impression that these smaller nuclear weapons could be used like conventional weapons. "On strictly military targets and for strictly military purposes, I see no reason why they shouldn't be used just exactly as you would use a bullet or anything else", he said.

13. The question of whether a valid military distinction can be drawn between large and small nuclear weapons can probably be answered only by competent experts on the basis of full technical data. So far, the United States has not made available to its allies the necessary data and it is, therefore, difficult to offer a firm opinion on the validity of the distinction which the U.S. authorities have sought to draw. But whatever may be the difficulty of defining the military problem in the absence of the necessary facts, it can be assumed that our main aim is to seek an effective political control over the putting into effect of any plans or preparations for nuclear warfare.

14. As will be stated in greater detail in the succeeding section on NATO, this principle of consultation has already been initially established in the NATO context. Ways and means now are being worked out to make that principle effective both in the Atlantic Council, if circumstances permit such formal consultation, or on a more immediate basis through tripartite "alert" procedures agreed in advance between London, Washington and Ottawa.

15. The problem of reducing the possibility of unilateral action by the United States in relation to a local or limited war is much more complicated and will be discussed further under the succeeding section entitled "Limited or Local Wars". However, once satisfactory procedures of consultation are worked out in the NATO context, it should be possible to argue in Washington that since even the "measured" or "limited" use of nuclear weapons in local wars runs the risk of leading to world conflict, it would be highly desirable that there should be consultation with those allies which are likely to bear some at least of the consequences, before any use of nuclear weapons is authorized by the United States anywhere in the world. In trying to find a solution to this important problem of consultation, the critical question arises: how far is the United States really prepared to go or can be persuaded to go in taking its allies into its confidence in its military-political planning? The progress already made in recent years, provides the basis for hope that further advances in understanding on matters of such mutual concern to the security of both countries is possible.

NATO

16. At its Ministerial meeting in December 1954, the North Atlantic Council approved a report of the Military Committee on the most effective pattern of NATO military strength (Document M.C. 48(Final) of November 22, 1954) over the next few years, which in effect incorporated the strategy of the nuclear deterrent in future NATO defence planning and preparation. The relevant conclusion in this report was as follows: "It is militarily essential that NATO forces should be able to use atomic and thermonuclear weapons in their defence and that the NATO military authorities should be authorized to plan and make preparations on the assumption that atomic and thermonuclear weapons will be used in defence from the outset."

17. The approval of the Council was for purposes of planning and preparations only, and reserved to governments the right of decision with respect to putting such plans and preparations into action. The relevant Council resolution read as follows: "The Council approves the report M.C. 48 as a basis for defence planning and preparations by the NATO military authorities, noting that this approval does not involve delegation of the responsibility of governments for putting plans into action in the event of hostilities."

18. In approving this resolution on behalf of the United States (which of course provides most of the nuclear capability on the allied side), Mr. Dulles explained what he understood to be the effect of this approval on the right of decision of governments. An examination of Mr. Dulles' remarks reveals that there are two particular ways in which, in his view, governments have retained the freedom of power and exercise of their political responsibilities:

- (a) responsibility for deciding on belligerent action, and
  - (b) responsibility for evaluating the nature of the threat posed (i.e., determining whether it is a threat that should be dealt with by a "limited" or by an "all-out" defence).
- General Gruenther, also, in the course of the discussion of the Military Committee's report, made an explanatory comment which is not out of line with Mr. Dulles' understanding. General Gruenther's comment was summarized in the record as follows: "It is unquestion-ably a political decision to decide whether or not there is an act of war, and there is no thought in our headquarters (SHAPE) that there should be a military decision — and certainly not one that our headquarters should make. But, it having been decided that there was an act of war and that it was an all-out act of war, and not simply a local war, he felt it was not feasible to go to this or that strategy.”

19. The Council's approval of M.C. 48, which raises the stakes involved in the East-West conflict, would seem to have two main political implications for the NATO alliance. One is to impose a restriction on the freedom of Soviet action, and thus to strengthen the position of the West by issuing a clear warning that, if an armed attack does occur involving the commitments of member governments under Articles V and VI of the North Atlantic Treaty, the probability is that the ensuing war will be a nuclear war. Judging from the reactions of Soviet propaganda on the theme that NATO is preparing an atomic war, this implication has not been lost on the Soviet leaders. Indeed the risks, military and political, that nuclear warfare would involve for the Soviet Government may well exclude direct aggression in Europe as a likely measure of Soviet policy, particularly since in most cases war is probably not essential to the pursuit of basic Communist aims.

20. This in turn increases the probability that the Soviet Union will use other methods of pursuing their aims which will not provoke nuclear retaliation — well-known Communist methods of diplomatic manoeuvre and political warfare designed to weaken the unity and effectiveness of the Western Coalition. Against such methods reliance on nuclear weapons will not be of much avail, and it becomes all the more necessary to take other measures in NATO, particularly non-military measures such as various forms of political and economic cooperation under Article II, which will strengthen the unity and morale of the coalition.

21. The other political implication is to restrict our own freedom of action, or rather to place a devastating price on any miscalculation. It becomes of prime importance to Canada and the rest of the NATO countries to be able to judge quickly and accurately, in the event the deterrent is not effective, whether a given hostile action is such as to merit all-out defence, involving nuclear retaliation, or just limited defence, involving measures short of nuclear retaliation. This question is, of course, vital to Canada in particular, not only because we are a member of NATO but also because, in the event of a Soviet nuclear attack, Canada would probably be the scene of the air battle.

22. Under these circumstances the exercise of effective control by governments over all stages of “alerts procedures” is particularly important. The ability of governments to make an evaluation of the facts which give rise to apprehension of the imminence of war obviously depends on having access to intelligence reports on indications of enemy mobilization measures. This consideration would be relevant if the outbreak of war were preceded by a period of increasing international tension. In the event of a sudden all-out attack the problem of evaluating the facts would not, of course, arise; they would presumably be self-evident and would call for immediate action for survival.

23. There is also an important military implication. The nuclear deterrent has for a long time been implicit in the NATO strategic concept, but with the approval of M.C. 48 it has now been explicitly adopted as an integral part of NATO defence planning and preparations. Consequently it becomes all the more important that there should be effective co-ordination of defence planning in NATO as between North America and the rest of the NATO area and that the organization of the defence of the nuclear deterrent in North America should be related to NATO defence planning as a whole. This may mean some re-organization of the Canada-United States Regional Planning Group, although it must be recognized that U.S. sensitivity will make it necessary to retain actual control of planning for continental defence in North American hands.

24. In practice the only real co-ordination and balancing of priorities as between the defence of Europe and the defence of North America that is now being carried out is being done on a purely national basis, as for instance in Washington. As far as we can judge, present United States policy in this respect is to continue to develop their nuclear deterrent power, to maintain substantially their present forces in Europe, to scale down where possible commitments in other parts of the world (e.g. in Korea) and to build up in North America a strategic mobile reserve and continental air defences against the Soviet nuclear threat. The NATO sector of this policy was defined in a declaration by the United States President, in which he confirmed that, when the Paris Agreements came into force, it would be United States policy "to continue to maintain in Europe, including Germany, such units of its armed forces as may be necessary and appropriate to contribute its fair share of the forces needed for the joint defence of the North Atlantic area while a threat to that area exists, and to continue to deploy such forces in accordance with agreed North Atlantic strategy for the defence of this area".

25. Related to this question of co-ordination of defence planning is the question of measures to strengthen the unity of the coalition, to which reference was made earlier. If our allies are to appreciate the importance of North American defence as part of the defence of the NATO area, it is surely necessary that it should be a subject of multilateral concern and not exclusively of bilateral consultation. Moreover, the maintenance of Canadian and United States forces in Europe should be recognized as a question of concern to NATO as a whole and not merely of individual national concern. The presence of these forces in Europe has an important political effect, as a token of trans-Atlantic solidarity, in addition to its military effect, and any substantial withdrawal might seriously affect the unity of the alliance. Any withdrawals which might become necessary for the purpose of North American defence, therefore, must not only be in the interest of NATO as a whole but must be seen by our allies as such. This factor is likely to be of particular importance if, as may be expected, the Communist side puts increasing emphasis on measures short of military aggression to weaken the West and especially to isolate North America from its European allies.

Continental Defence

26. The prevention of war, except in the defence of vital interests, is the main aim of Canadian national policy as it is of our allies. A strategy designed to achieve this objective therefore is of prime importance to Canadian national interests. Canada's geographical location, between the USA and USSR and athwart the trans-polar routes, puts Canada in a position to contribute to the nuclear deterrent power of the allies in two ways: by the provision of facilities on or over Canadian territory and through continental defence. For it must be assumed that in any future war, the Soviet Government would realize that their primary aim of defeating the Western Coalition could best be served by placing the emphasis on directing nuclear air strikes on North America in order to destroy SAC bases and the centres of war-making capacity, the weight of which, if left untouched, would be brought to bear against the Soviet Union with disastrous effect. Air nuclear attack against North America would probably be the most important element of Soviet strategy since the neglect of this element more than any other would clearly be disastrous to the Soviet Union.

27. Continental defence thus involves the protection of the population and other resources of North America, upon which the ability of Canada and the United States — and indeed of the Western Coalition — to sustain a war in the long run depends. It also includes in its broadest sense the defence of the nuclear retaliatory power of the United States, which is one of the principle NATO as well as North American defence objectives. Both require a common defence structure including the early warning system, interception, the dispersal of targets, and civil defence. Accordingly, for the purposes of planning and preparing these defences, it has been assumed that the air defences of Canada and the United States must be considered as one problem, and this has been agreed to at the Chiefs of Staff level. Planning may very well soon call for a substantial increase in the number of fighter squadrons based in Canada, particularly if the principle is accepted that efforts should be made to fight any air battles as far north of the settled areas of Canada as possible.

28. Coupled with the defence of North America and the defence of the nuclear deterrent power, so far as Canada is concerned, is the provision of facilities which may be sought by the United States on Canadian territory for the effective development of the deterrent power, that is, SAC operating bases. It may be expected that an increasingly significant proportion of the installations which are likely to be constructed in Canada in the next five to ten years will be for the Strategic Air Command and that an increasing number of United States personnel will be sent to Canada to man them.

29. In determining the share which Canada should bear in these defence activities, it is clear at least that Canada cannot assume exclusive responsibility for that portion which is operated directly by or for the Strategic Air Command. On the other hand, unless Canada assumes its share of responsibility for continental defence activities, which are more likely to involve combat operations over Canada than are SAC operations, there is a risk of losing effective control of these activities on Canadian territory. This risk would be particularly dangerous in view of the importance for Canadians of keeping any air battles which may be fought over Canadian territory as far north of the populated areas of Canada as possible. United States planners are not likely to feel the imperative of this consideration as acutely as Canadians, as an air battle fought over Canada's populated areas would be far enough north not to be a serious threat to U.S. targets. Present air defence plans do not adequately take account of this consideration; Canada's interceptor squadrons now operate mainly near settled areas, as evidenced by the presence of Air Defence Command at St. Hubert.

30. To judge the extent of Canadian participation which is necessary or desirable, it is necessary to strike a balance between the demands on Canadian resources of Western European defence and North American defence. Both are vulnerable to Soviet nuclear retaliation, but both come under the umbrella of United States nuclear deterrent power. This balance depends upon political and military considerations. The military considerations involve an assessment of the comparative degree of threat against North America and Western Europe; but since it must be assumed that one of the aims of the Soviet Union is to isolate North America from its Western European partners and thus disrupt NATO, the military threat cannot be divorced from the important political consideration of maintaining the unity of the Alliance which is itself an important element of the deterrent. It is presumably because of considerations such as these that the present United States policy envisages the maintenance of United States forces substantially at present levels in Europe, while building up the deterrent and means of defending it in North America.

31. Moreover, the degree of control exercised over continental defence by Canada depends not only on the extent of its participation in these activities, but also upon the form of the air defence command structure. The current concept of a coordinated rather than an integrated air defence system for North America stems from the joint declaration of 1947 on the principles of defence cooperation between the two countries, and in particular on the statement that "as an underlying principle all cooperative arrangements will be without impairment of the control of either country over all activities in its own territory".

32. The adequacy of these existing arrangements as a framework for continental air defence is open to serious question. In the first place, the policy of imposing a "command boundary" along the border between the two countries may have been politically justifiable thus far, but may not be for much longer. It is militarily unsound and makes necessary the disposition of forces on the basis of national rather than military factors; it invites the USAF air defence commanders to treat the populated parts of Canada as the scene of the air battle, rather than as an integral part of the region to be defended. This situation will become increasingly serious with the advent in the near future of air-to-air and ground-to-air missiles armed with atomic warheads, which would do fearful damage if intercepted and exploded over populated areas.

33. Secondly, enough information is now available about United States plans for air defence installations to be established in Canada between now and 1960 to make it clear that the numbers of air defence personnel in the populated part of Canada will be greatly increased, including sections of the country where the Canadian air defence organization is at present, to all intents and purposes, non-existent.

34. Thirdly, the deficiencies in the existing command arrangements, organization, and plans for the deployment of forces and weapons will have an adverse effect on air operations primarily over Canada, rather than the United States. The system is probably sufficiently effective for the protection of the United States alone that, because of a reluctance to appear to be forcing Canada into an integrated organization and because of internal inter-service differences, the United States authorities are not likely to take the initiative in trying to change it. In other words, if Canada considers that the situation is developing in a manner detrimental to its interests, then the Canadian Government should take the lead in pressing for a change.

35. The implications of the situation now developing are of the greatest importance to Canada and require urgent study. Consideration should be given to the possible necessity of negotiating a new comprehensive bilateral agreement between the two countries to provide for the establishment of an integrated North American Air Defence Command, and the possible relationship of such a command to the North Atlantic Treaty Organization.

36. Quite apart from the planning and preparation for the contingencies of general war, including defences against the possibility of nuclear attack on North America, the strategy of the deterrent has important political and military implications in a period of international tension characteristic of the cold war. Even in anticipation of the possible immminence of general war, the United States may wish to carry out certain precautionary deployments of their strategic aircraft and weapons and to alert continental air defence. This may involve requests for permission for aircraft to overfly Canadian territory to the bases used by the Strategic Air Command in order to be prepared for instant action, and requests to make precautionary alerts of the continental air defence system. If war were to seem imminent, the United States Government could be expected to approach the Canadian Government with the request for permission not only to deploy the Strategic Air Command, but also to carry out air strikes from bases in Canadian territory and to mobilize fully the continental air defence system.

37. Thus the interdependence of Canada and the United States in Air Defence and the inter-related continental defence arrangements which stem from this, make any United States policy which may lead to general war a matter of special concern to Canada, whether or not that policy involves a Canadian commitment.

Limited or Local Wars

38. Proceeding further with the examination of the main assumptions of this paper that under the conditions of mutual nuclear deterrence, the aim of Canada and its allies should be to avoid war except in defence of vital interests, it is particularly important to consider the problem of preventing local and limited wars becoming global and nuclear ones. Against minor aggressions by the Soviet Union, Communist China or another Communist proxy, the free world would be faced with the choice of: (a) prompt and united collective action on the Korean model using conventional methods of warfare only; (b) reaction led initially by the U.S. involving the probable use of nuclear weapons at least locally and tactically; and (c) inaction to minimize the risk of hostilities spreading.

39. There is evidence that the United States is prepared to use nuclear weapons in local and limited wars, both to deter local Communist military aggression and as an alternative to committing United States ground forces to shore up the various weak spots of strategic importance in the defences of the free world. The position taken by the United States Government in regard to the fulfilment of its commitments under the South-East Asia Collective Defence Treaty presents an important current illustration of this strategy.

40. Mr. Dulles, in his speech on the results of the Bangkok meeting of the Manila Treaty Powers on March 8, included a warning that the nuclear retaliatory power of the United States may be used to deter Communist China from further military encroachments in Asia. He said: "For military defence we shall rely largely upon mobile allied power which can strike an aggressor wherever the case may demand. That capacity will, we believe, deter aggression. We shall not need to build up large static forces at all points and the United States contribution will be primarily in terms of sea and air power." Then he went on to say: "The Allied nations possess together plenty of power in the area. The United States in particular has sea and air forces now equipped with new and powerful weapons of precision, which can utterly destroy military targets without endangering unrelated civilian centers."

41. Mr. Dulles' warning to Communist China implied not only the threat of the use of nuclear weapons as a deterrent; it also implied the risk of spreading the war. On this aspect of the deterrent, Mr. Dulles said: "I pointed out at Bangkok that, for military purposes, the Chinese Communist front should be regarded as an entirety because if the Chinese Communists engage in open armed aggression, this would probably mean that they have decided on general war in Asia. They would then have to take into account the mutual defence treaties of the United States with the Republic of Korea and the Republic of China and the forces maintained under them. Thus, general war would confront the Chinese Communists with tasks at the south, centre and north; tasks which would strain their inadequate means of transportation."

42. This kind of warning is undoubtedly calculated to make the undertaking of a local or limited attack by the Communists a risky business. But it also carries a risk for the side that issues such a warning, in the event the deterrent fails to work. For even with the threat of "measured retaliation", there is the danger of a local or limited war becoming general and total. For while a distinction can be drawn between the tactical and strategic uses of nuclear weapons at the commencement of hostilities, there are justifiable doubts as to whether this distinction would be maintained once the dictates of military necessity came into play. Military commanders are likely to use the amount of force necessary to accomplish their objective, and once they are permitted to use nuclear weapons of a lower range of power it would be difficult to know exactly where to draw the line in the upper ranges, especially if their use was thought to make the difference between victory or defeat. Anyway, this "measured retaliation" has not yet been put to the test, except as a threat. The threat, however, because of Soviet nuclear retaliatory power, at least opens up possibilities among which Soviet intervention, if it judged its vital interests threatened, cannot be excluded.

43. Considering the prospects of nuclear devastation which the Allies would risk to a larger or lesser degree should this kind of deterrent fail, and the war spread to global and nuclear proportions, it would be highly desirable that consultation between the United States and Canada should precede the use of nuclear weapons anywhere in the world. If hostilities cannot be avoided, every effort should be made to fight limited wars with limited means and limited objectives on the Korean model. This involves not only the choice of weapons and the choice of objectives, but also giving the other side adequate opportunities to understand the intentions of the governments which have undertaken to resist aggression, and an adequate opportunity for negotiations on reasonable terms to bring hostilities to an end.

44. The choice of weapons has an important bearing on whether hostilities, if they cannot be avoided, can at least be limited; the choice of weapons also may be a determining factor in deciding whether the resistance is effective or not. It may be just impracticable, for instance, to atomize the "free Thais" or the "Pathet Lao", even if there may be some Communist Chinese behind them. This is, of course, realized by some observers in the United States. For instance, William Kaufmann of Princeton University, in his book The Requirements of Deterrence says: "It is probably hopeless to expect that a single deterrent will cover the entire range of contingencies and still satisfy the criteria of credibility. The attempt to devise such a deterrent is likely to result in either a sparrow hunt with a cannon or an elephant shoot with a popgun." This points to the desirability of maintaining conventional armed forces and conventional weapons as a supplementary means of deterrence, as well as for the purpose of fighting local or limited wars if hostilities cannot be avoided. At the same time, it must be recognized that, at least as far as the United States is concerned, the day is not far off when it will be difficult, if not impossible, to fight a limited war with conventional weapons. United States defence policy is now predicated on the use of small atomic weapons and before long, whenever U.S. forces go into action, they are likely to use nuclear weapons. The possibilities need to be explored of extending the principle of consultation, being developed initially in the NATO context, to other areas, so that nuclear weapons should not be used without some accord with the other countries likely to be affected by the consequences of U.S. action.

45. The possibilities of unilateral action by the United States involving the use of nuclear retaliatory power in limited and local wars may be reduced by the development of the collective approach to defence or local security. A sharing of responsibility for security may be organized through the United Nations, through regional defence organizations, or through the Commonwealth. The Commonwealth, as a special political association with world-wide links of loyalty and tradition rather than common security interests, does not offer a suitable framework for the organization of regional defence. Where Britain, however, has assumed responsibility for resistance to Communist encroachments in a colonial territory which is adjacent to another Commonwealth member whose national security interests are directly involved, special arrangements for defence cooperation may follow as in Anzani.

46. However, responsibilities for building up local defensive strength must obviously devolve primarily on the governments and peoples of each region; organizations which may be built upon the initiative of outsiders will lack firm foundations. For the foundations of any defence structure must be the recognition of mutual security interests, the determination to join together in self-defence and an adequate measure of political stability. To the extent that these factors have been lacking, for a variety of reasons, in the areas of South-East Asia and the Middle East, progress towards regional organizations, despite the existence of a Communist threat, has been slow. However, the South-East Asian Defence Pact and the new Turkish-Iraqi Treaty, which the United Kingdom and the United States are expected to join, may provide the framework for the build-up of regional defence to counter the Communist threat in South-East Asia and the Middle East respectively. The contributions of countries from outside the region threatened must of necessity be limited, for if the military resources of the free world are scattered all over the place, they risk being too thinly scattered and ineffectively applied in any given place. The mobile sea and air forces of the United States, and to a lesser extent those of the United Kingdom, are notable exceptions.

47. With considerations such as these in mind, it is in Canada's interest to see that effective regional defence organizations are built up, but not necessarily with Canada's direct participation. Canada's own security interests lie primarily in North America and the North Atlantic Treaty area, where its commitments are already heavy. Canada's interests would not be involved directly in the holding of any particular area around the Soviet periphery in the Far East or the Middle East, except in so far as Canada may share with other members of the free world the general interest of resisting Communist expansion. But even though Canada may not be directly involved in such peripheral and local wars, she cannot escape certain consequences if the United States were involved, especially because of the interdependence of the two countries in air defence. Such local and limited wars are, therefore, of concern to Canada. Canada, naturally, has an interest in upholding the universal principle of resistance to the use of force and the other objectives of the United Nations. It is reasonable to deduce, therefore, that Canada would not participate in local or limited wars, unless by a decision of the United Nations which it had accepted.

The Cold War

48. It is a truism to say that the Communist threat by no means poses a straight military problem. A characteristic of Communist strategy has been its opportunism. The Communists have employed a variety of ways of extending their control, adapting their methods according to the resources, psychological as well as material, available to them in any particular area. In places where political instability and economic discontent provide opportunities for seizing the control of governments by subversion, political rather than military methods have been employed. Assuming that current efforts to improve East-West relations do not bring about a change in the basic Communist aims of extending their control over the rest of the world, the cold war may be expected to go on.

49. Communist strategy in the cold war has already had a large measure of success. The Soviet orbit has been growing apace, (particularly by the inclusion of China) without general war and without the Soviet Union being itself openly involved in hostilities. The free world as a result of gradual Communist peripheral advances may be confronted with the peril of about eight hundred million Communists now within the Soviet orbit consolidating the Eurasian land mass into one economic and politico-military power system. It cannot be assumed that this bloc is solid yet. Indeed it is to be hoped that Russian and Chinese policies and interests may diverge, and it is obviously in the interests of Canada and its allies to encourage any such fissile tendencies. The consolidation of this bloc under monolithic control would represent a concentration of power — political, military and economic — that would obviously affect the world balance of power.

50. On the other hand, if the Western powers enjoy a comparatively strong bargaining power vis-à-vis the Communist bloc, it is in large part due to the buoyancy and expansion of their economies. Since the margin of advantage would disappear if there were a severe economic dislocation, large-scale unemployment, social discontent or any marked decline in living standards, the maintenance of an expanding economy should have a high priority in the planning of national security policy, whatever may be the outcome of current East-West negotiations. In short, the way of life offered by the free world must be shown to be superior to that offered by the totalitarians, as well as defensible. It must be shown to be superior not only by example and performance but also by measures of political cooperation and economic assistance to the nations of Asia and Africa which are striving to have their share of the benefits of material civilization.

51. Canada has already assumed responsibilities in terms of increased diplomatic effort and economic assistance in cooperating in measures against Communist indirect aggression. Considering the heavy burdens already borne by Canada in the defence of the free world through its responsibilities for continental defence and in NATO, it could be argued that Canada should not be expected to increase its contribution in this field. And yet, if under the condition of "mutual deterrence" the use of military force becomes increasingly risky and if the cold war is continued, the Communist threat increasingly may assume the form of covert activities to gain Communist control of territory by subversion, economic competition to win over converts, and diplomacy to split up the opposition in the free world.

52. This may justify a further reconsideration of the proportion of Canadian resources which should be devoted to such non-military efforts in the cold war as increased diplomatic representation in threatened areas, increased contributions to United Nations activities in the non-military sphere as well as to Commonwealth cooperative enterprises such as the Colombo Plan, particularly if as a result of a détente between East and West some reductions in defence expenditures are found possible.

A New Look at Disarmament

53. The recent Stassen appointment in Washington probably reflects a deepening realization, not only among officials but increasingly among the public, that the present positions of the Western Powers on disarmament represent an inadequate response to the new weapons and the challenge of the risk of mutual annihilation, particularly when the Inter-Continental Ballistic Missile, against which there is no defence, may have been perfected. Even now, before the advent of push-button warfare, many of the premises on which our present disarmament proposals are based, have been overtaken by events and have become obsolete.

54. Among the array of uncomfortable facts that must now be taken into account are the following:

- (a) the prospect of the possibility of reciprocal nuclear destruction;
- (b) nuclear armaments have been integrated with the conventional armaments of the United States (and possibly Soviet) forces;
- (c) the United States atomic monopoly (on which the United Nations Majority Plan was premised) has long since ceased to exist and the stockpiles of thermonuclear weapons in both the United States and the USSR are now so large that it would be technically impossible to back check on past production under the most favourable conditions of complete inspection within more than 90% accuracy at best;

(d) the advent of the hydrogen bomb makes an undisclosed and virtually undiscoverable atomic molehill into a thermonuclear mountain in terms of destructive power;

(e) some authorities now believe that it may be possible to dispense with the uranium-plutonium detonator of an "H-bomb" — and, as the lighter elements are relatively plentiful and require less elaborate processing, the control problem may be made still more difficult;

(f) a certain amount of mutual trust is a prerequisite of disarmament — and it does not exist;

(g) not only its concept of national sovereignty but the very foundations of the Soviet State would be so deeply undermined by the acceptance of the type of international control organization proposed by the Western Powers that it is hardly conceivable their leaders would ever agree to it.

55. Without attempting to provide answers to questions that are perhaps unanswerable, it may be useful to attempt to clear some of the ground in preparation for any serious "new look" at disarmament that may be undertaken, either in conjunction with Mr. Stassen's re-examination of the problem, or separately.

56. Disarmament negotiations during the past nine years have invariably come to a standstill on the question of control. If, as some experts say, there is no way of ensuring the complete elimination of existing stockpiles of nuclear weapons by any method of control, a way around the control problem may be sought in three directions:

(a) in place of a comprehensive disarmament programme embracing all aspects of the question, certain fields might be isolated. As a short-cut of this type, the USSR has been harping for years on a series of propaganda themes isolating the atomic side of the problem ("ban the bomb", "ban the use of the bomb", and now "destroy atomic stockpiles");

(b) on our side, for logical strategic reasons the inverse of this proposition might be suggested; that an attempt be made to control conventional armed forces and armaments, and in particular all means of delivering atomic weapons, while accepting the continuation of nuclear and thermonuclear stockpiles on both sides at or near the point of saturation;

(c) both sides have also proposed, in connection with large programmes, a freeze of armed forces and armaments as a first step on the road towards disarmament.

57. Of these three propositions, only the third may be feasible. The first has been repeatedly rejected by the Western Powers for the same strategic reasons as the second is not likely to interest the Soviet Union. The atomic and conventional sides of the problem are now inseparable. A freeze might have real attractions for the USSR, particularly if, as they have proposed in London, it were subject to more or less nominal control. But unless such a scheme were implemented as part of a comprehensive programme, it could lull Western public opinion into a quite unreal sense of security that could be more dangerous than the present stalemate.

58. While it might be desirable to examine possible short-cuts from a technical standpoint, it might be more fruitful to consider what reduction might be acceptable in the safeguards to be applied to the whole field of disarmament. If control is the barrier, and we cannot get around it by reducing the categories to be controlled, we might examine once again whether we must insist on such stringent control measures as in the past. For we can now bring to the re-examination the realization that since we do not have, and cannot hope to have, absolute security, or anything approaching it, we are compelled to consider whether relatively greater security might be attainable through disarmament. Could we, in short, have less control rather than less to control? And could adjustments be made in the timetable for the establishment and gradual build-up of the control organization in such a way as to provide a better balance of risks and safeguards on both sides at each stage?

59. The main argument in support of such an approach arises from the control problem itself. To control conventional weapons or to control atomic weapons would require such wide powers, at least of inspection, that interference in national affairs and the opportunities for uncovering state secrets in uncontrolled fields would be approximately as great as if the whole range of armaments and armed forces were subject to control. The inspectors would still have to have power to go wherever they chose in order to discover activities in violation of the agreement. For this reason the control might as well be comprehensive in its coverages of war-making potential. The only room left for manoeuvre would, therefore, appear to be as regards the timing of control and the rights, functions and powers of the control organ itself.

60. Yet for years the Western Powers have maintained that no dilution of safeguards could be acceptable. This position has tended to harden, at least in the United States, with the new complications presented by Soviet stockpiling and by thermonuclear weapons which, in logic, must require more effective, rather than less effective, forms of international control. But a new approach might begin by examining what specific safeguards are necessary to ensure that nations would have adequate warning against a surprise attack, which is the greatest risk in the presence of nuclear weapons so long as there is no system for the international control of armaments.

61. From this tentative assessment of the problem, it may be that we are thrown back in our conclusions upon reliance on mutual deterrence as the only realistic policy. The capacity — present or future — of each side to destroy the other is unquestionably of the greatest importance in preventing war. If it makes war too horrible to contemplate, the deterrent may even lead to disarmament, or at least to serious negotiations. But the risks and limitations of relying on mutual deterrence have already been examined in this paper; at best it can only be a policy faute de mieux.

62. If our policy may be described as "deterrence if necessary but disarmament if possible", the search for a new approach to disarmament might embrace not only an effort to rethink the control problem but some consideration of the following factors which may be listed on the more hopeful side of the ledger:

(a) the problems posed by the new weapons are unprecedented; we must, therefore, not discard, on the basis of past performance alone, solutions which seem to be required by the facts; for example, we should not abandon altogether our attempts to negotiate a control system because any real control appears contrary to the Soviet system — their leaders face an unprecedented situation too;

(b) we have at present reached an approximate balance of military forces and this balance is likely to be maintained at least until the saturation point is reached when each side would have the capacity to deal the other a mortal blow at any time and no surprise attack would succeed in warding off retaliation in kind;

(c) there are some who believe that when the saturation point is reached, thermonuclear weapons will, in all probability, never be used, at least against centres of mass population, even in the event of a major war; this expectation is not officially shared in NATO and could not be entertained without greatly weakening the value of the deterrent; this does not mean, however, that some tacit self-denying ordinance of this kind is out of the question, now or in the future;

(d) although a completely effective back checking of past nuclear production is no longer possible, and we must assume that any control system would fail to discover significant quantities of fissile material and weapons, it should be possible to control the means of delivery; as part of a comprehensive system of disarmament, forces on both sides would be so far reduced as to minimize the temptation to make use of hidden stocks for a surprise attack; moreover, each side would suspect that the other would have retained secretly at least some capacity to retaliate in kind, so that the deterrent would continue to operate, with far less international tension to induce an explosion;

(e) looking at the record of disarmament negotiations since 1946 as impartially as possible, there seems to have been some progress, at least in words, and probably in substance. The gap, though still immense, has been narrowed, no doubt because neither side could afford to ignore the strength of public opinion on this issue.

63. Looking to the probable resumption of talks on disarmament in the United Nations, it would help to regain some momentum if other powers were to join the United States in trying to work out a genuine new approach to disarmament in the light of the new assumptions of the nuclear age. Among possible directions which such a re-examination might explore are:

(a) lowering our safeguards as part of a comprehensive disarmament programme, since "security" these days is a highly relative term, with or without disarmament, with the emphasis on the need for warning of a surprise attack and preparations for aggression;

(b) the possibility of banning further test explosions of thermonuclear weapons;

(c) the possibility of relating disarmament to the other main roots of international tension, such as the rearming of Germany and Japan, on the principle that it would be unnecessary to proceed very far along this road if, by means of a disarmament agreement, some reduction in the levels of forces of all major countries could actually be achieved.

Desire for a Détente

64. From the arguments in the foregoing sections, it may be deduced, that so long as the Western Alliance remains united and maintains its nuclear and other military capabilities, the risks involved in starting a war and the probable devastating consequences should a nuclear war develop, would probably discourage the Soviet Union, or any other power, undertaking war as a deliberate act of policy.

65. The circumstances in which the Soviet Union would be the most likely to decide to go to war, would be if it became convinced beyond a reasonable possibility of doubt that the Western Powers intended to attack it. It might then decide to strike first as a forestalling or preventative measure.

66. The risk of war through such miscalculation, therefore, remains despite the nuclear deterrent, because the Soviet Union might believe that a threat existed, when in fact it did not. For this reason it is essential that allied peaceful and defensive intentions should not only be apparent at all times, but should be communicated to the Soviet Union and its ally, Communist China, in such a way as there should be no possible grounds for misunderstanding allied intentions.

67. It is in these circumstances, therefore, that efforts to reach a détente, or a cessation of strained relations between the Communist and non-Communist groups of powers, assume such importance in allied policy. The establishment of normal diplomatic negotiations for the settlement of outstanding issues and the cessation of political and economic warfare is an essential means of avoiding the kind of misunderstanding which could conceivably lead to war despite the nuclear deterrent.

68. Consideration might, therefore, be given to the establishment of some form of continuing Four Power diplomatic machinery arising out of the Geneva talks, so that regular diplomatic contact between Foreign Ministers to deal primarily with security problems between the Big Powers should not again be broken off.

69. If a détente could in turn lead to agreement on a comprehensive system of disarmament, including the prohibition of nuclear weapons, which would leave no powers more armaments and armed forces than are necessary for strictly defensive purposes, and if such disarmament arrangements could be supervised and enforced by a system of international control which would give all nations the assurance of adequate warning of any aggressive intent and preparations, the foundations would have then been laid for the preservation of peace on a more lasting basis than that of the fear of mutual nuclear devastation, if all-out war begins.
