criticism. Such can hardly be the main motive of the attack on Mr. King. He man is so familiar with its workings and the policy they embody as the hope of snatching a victory through his ignorance or inexperience. Certainly no member of the party seems willing to risk his deposit on being able to do so, for Mr. King's election is conceded without opposition so far as the Conservative party is conthat policy has much less to do with it than nervousness. It is not the ability or inability of Mr. King to discharge the duties of his position which worry the critics most but the fear that through the dis charge of those duties he will develor a political strength which they can not hope to encounter-strength, too at the very point where they have been strong and have hoped to be come stronger.

The main strength of the Opposition is and has been in the industrial centres of the country. Their fiscal apneal has been to the wage-earner the factory. To him they have ad dressed the argument that high tar iff encourages enterprise and thereby makes work and wages. The doctrine has been loyally backed by the influ ence-and sometims the coercion-of the employers who benefitted or stood to benefit by the high duties.
